The third and fourth approaches relate to problems intrinsic to the artistic organization of the work itself. "One cannot long discuss imagery," says Burke, "without sliding into symbolism. The poet's images are organized with relation to one another by reason of their symbolic kinships. We shift from the image of an object to its symbolism as soon as we consider it, not in itself alone, but as a function in in a texture of relationships" (Attitudes toward History [1937], v. 2, pp. 154-55). Certain plays of Shakespeare, it was discovered, are saturated with one kind or another of similar images or "clusters" (usually figurative)—the i. of light and dark in Romeo and Juliet, for example, or of animals in King Lear, or of disease in Hamlet, and so on—and it was reasoned that these recurrences, although barely perceptible except upon close examination, are continually at work conditioning the reader's responses as he follows the action of a play. Thus F. C. Kolbe, a pioneer—along with Whiter and Spaulding—of cluster criticism, claimed in 1930: "My thesis is that Shakespeare secures the unity of each of his greater plays, not only by the plot, by linkage of characters, by the sweep of Nemesis, by the use of irony, and by appropriateness of style, but by deliberate repetition throughout the play of at least one set of words or ideas in harmony with the plot. It is like the effect of the dominant note in a melody" (Shakespeare's Way). Modern critics have added that clusters may form dramatic discords as well as harmonies.

From this argument it was a small step to classify images according to their relationship to the dramatic conflicts in the work. There are basically two sorts of clusters: the recurrence of the same image at intervals throughout the work, or the recurrence of different images together at intervals throughout the work. If the same image recurs in different contexts, then it (theoretically) serves to link those contexts in significant ways, and if different images recur together several times, then the mention of any one will serve to call the others to mind. Thus Brooks, in discussing the implications of Spurgeon's discovery of clothes-imagery and the i. of the babe in Macbeth, argues: "Perhaps her interest in classifying and cataloguing the imagery of the plays has obscured for her some of the larger and more important relationships." He continues: "I do not know whether 'blanket' and 'pall' qualify as garment metaphors in Miss Spurgeon's classification: yet one is the clothing of sleep, and the other, the clothing of death—they are the appropriate garments of night; and they carry on an important aspect of the general clothes imagery." What he makes of his classification as opposed to Spurgeon's is as follows: "The clothed daggers and the naked babe—mechanism and life—instrument and end—death and birth—that which should be left bare and clean and that which should be clothed and warmed—these are facets of two of the great symbols which run throughout the play. . . . And between them—the naked babe, essential humanity, humanity stripped down to the naked thing itself, and yet as various as the future—and the various garbs which humanity assumes, the robes of honor, the hypocrite's disguise, the inhuman 'manliness' with which Macbeth endeavors to cover up his essential humanity—between them they furnish Shakespeare with his most subtle and ironically telling instruments" (Well Wrought Urn).

The next and fifth step was to reason once again from inside to outside the work, but this time ostensibly for the sake of returning to it with greater insight. According to Burke, a poem is a dramatic revelation in disguised and symbolic form of the poet's emotional tensions and conflicts, and if, therefore, some idea of these tensions and conflicts in his personal life can be formed, the reader will then be alerted to their symbolic appearance in his works. Thus Burke can make equations among Coleridge's image clusters by comparing the poet's letters with The Ancient Mariner, and can conclude that the albatross symbolizes Coleridge's guilt regarding his addiction to opium, and this, he reasons, illuminates the "motivational structure" of that particular poem.

It is not difficult, on the other hand, to equate image clusters in a particular work with larger patterns found in other works and myths instead of with the poet's personal life (a dream is the "myth" of the individual, a myth is the "dream" of the race), as does Northrop Frye, and even Burke himself, for the "action" of which a poem is "symbolic" frequently resembles larger ritualistic patterns such as purgation, scape-goating, killing the king, initiation, and so on, although expressed on a personal level and in personal terms. R. P. Warren sees in the Ancient Mariner a symbol of the artist-archetype, symbolized in the Mariner, torn between the conflicting and ambiguous claims of reason, symbolized by the sun, and the imagination, symbolized by the moon: thus the crime is a crime against the imagination, and the imagination revenges itself but at the same time heals the Mariner; the wandering is also a blessing and curse, for the Mariner is the poète maudit (q.v.) as well as the "prophet of universal charity" (see Elder Olson's review of Warren's interpretation in Critics and Criticism, pp. 138–144). Thus, in large and general terms, the artist is seen as the hero and his art as a sacrificial ritual, and he is seen as dying to his life in order to be reborn in his art as the redeemer (see Otto Rank, "Myth and Metaphor," Art and Artist, tr. C. F. Atkinson [1932], pp. 207–31). One may find implicit images of descent, guilt, purification, and ascent running throughout a poem whose literal action may be of quite a different nature. Image clusters are seen, then, as forming a "spatial pattern" or even a "subplot" calling for special attention in itself.

The difficulties with the fourth and fifth approaches are: first, that the concern centers rather exclusively on problems of moral vision, on the assumption that the really important thing about poetry is its way of viewing life and experience, a "mode of apprehension"; second, that, as a result, almost any poem or play is read as an allegorical struggle between Good and Evil, Reason and Imagination, Guilt and Redemption, or any other favored pair of opposites, and this is excessively reductive; third, that many such inferences as those discussed above are made on the basis of insufficient evidence and faulty or incomplete hypotheses (a statistician could point out, for example, that some recurrences are accidental, and a logician could point out, for example, that a favored hypothesis, in order to be valid, must be tested against other alternatives); fourth, that the literal action of a poem or play, when viewed as an artistic construct, tends to be inordinately deemphasized or even ignored altogether; and fifth, that these approaches tend to be so loosely oriented and vaguely defined as to allow anything and everything in a work to be seen in terms of anything and everything else.

The importance, however, of these approaches to i. in a work is that they did indeed refocus critical concern on the work itself, and its parts and devices, at a time when attention was wandering down the bypaths of literature rather than the main highway. Nor does the dubious validity of some of the theorizing necessarily cancel out the worth of all the practical results it fostered.

It may now be asked, what i. does in a poem. Although many good poems contain little or no imagery, i. has come to be regarded as a special poetic device. Neither its presence nor the use of one kind of i. or another, however, makes a good poem; the poet needs more than a unified sensibility in order to compose poems—he needs, in addition, certain constructive powers. That is to say, i., if used, must be part of a larger whole and cannot in and of itself constitute a whole. Far from being itself a unifying form, it must be unified along with all the other elements of a poem (such as rhyme and meter, stylistic, rhetorical, and grammatical schemes, patterns of sequence and order, the devices of point of view, the methods of amplification and condensation, the methods of selection and omission, aspects of thought and character and action, and so on). I., then, is either material or technique—what is being represented or how—rather than form.

It may be, in the first place, the speaker's subject, what he is talking about, whether present before him or recalled to mind afterwards. Included here are, roughly speaking, people, places, objects, actions, and events. In Arnold's Dover Beach, for example, the speaker and his lady are physically located by the English Channel, and the speaker describes the view—the full tide, the fair moon, the light gleaming on the French coast, the cliffs of England, the tranquil bay, the sweet night air, the beach, and the grating roar of the waves on the pebbles. Furthermore, we may infer that he is looking out of the window of some sort of seaside dwelling and talking to his lady, whom he asks to join him there. All of this comprises literal i. of subject matter.

Since economy is a fundamental artistic principle, it may be said that usually literal i. is converted into a pseudo-subject, becoming the symbol of something else as a result of the speaker's reflective and meditative activity. Mere scenery, that is, is rarely enough in itself, except in descriptive poems, to justify its presence in a poem. Thus Arnold converts the scene into a symbol as follows: as it begins to signify sadness to the speaker, it reminds him of Sophocles listening long ago by the Aegean and reflecting similarly. Although the literal sea before him at Dover Beach is now at full tide, the "Sea of Faith" now seems to him to be ebbing. Thus the problem which is troubling the speaker (the discord he senses between an apparently meaningful world and an actually meaningless one) finds its image in the contrast between what he sees—the calm sea, the full tide, the fair moon, the bright gleam of lights, the tranquil bay, the sweet night air—and what he hears—the partially submerged and ominous sound of the grating roar

Of pebbles which the waves suck back, and fling,

At their return, up the high strand,
Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
The eternal note of sadness in.

It will be noted that the language of this passage is set in contrast to that used above: grating roar, suck back and fling, tremulous, slow, and sadness, as opposed to calm, full, fair, glimmering, vast, tranquil, and sweet. Still talking in terms of the pseudo-subject in the second paragraph, the speaker contrasts what Sophocles heard and thought to what he hears and thinks: the great dramatist, long ago and in another place, heard this same "grating roar" and it brought to his mind "the turbid ebb and flow / Of human misery," while the modern Eng. speaker finds "also in the sound a thought, / Hearing it by this distant northern sea." Taken in context, since the meaning is not wholly explicit, this may imply that Sophocles found some meaning, however tragic, in the coming and going of the waves, while Arnold's speaker, focusing now not on the rapid motion of the waves but rather upon the slow ebb and flow of the tide (a shift in i. of which some critics have complained), sees only the absence of any meaning whatever. To the ancient Greeks, that is, the world made sense in moral terms (e.g., the catharsis or sense of justice produced by the tragedies of Sophocles), while to the modern European the world is devoid of value. Thus, although the physical tide is full, the moral tide is ebbing, and he can only hear

Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
Retreating to the breath
Of the night-wind down the vast edges drear
And naked shingles of the world.

At the end, therefore, since the faith of humanity at large is gone, he can appeal to his lady to reaffirm at least their own faith in one another, "for the world, which seems / To lie before us like a land of dreams" (a reference back to the opening description), is really joyless, confused, and without love. Thus does Arnold's sea-imagery function at once as subject and symbol.

Thirdly and lastly, images may function as analogies brought into the poem from outside the world of the speaker, apart from his literal subject, to function in a purely figurative fashion. In Dover Beach, in addition to the i. already discussed, there are several figures of speech: the "Sea of Faith" once "Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furled," the world seems "To lie before us like a land of dreams," "And we are here as on a darkling plain etc." The girdle, land of dreams, and darkling plain (battlefield), that is, do not derive from the speaker's literal subject at all.

It may be asked, finally, what the poet gains by the use of such devices. I., especially of the figurative or symbolic sort, may, in the first place, serve as a device for explaining, clarifying, and making vivid what the speaker is talking about. Arnold was not content with merely locating his speaker geographically, but had him register his awareness of the precise physical details of the scene before him so that the reader would not only know but feel what he (the speaker) is responding to. Secondly, and correspondingly, the terms in which he is making that response serve to reveal implicitly the mood of tempered sadness in which we find the speaker. Thirdly, and consequently, since this scene serves to call up to the speaker's consciousness—and thereby becomes the vehicle of—a problem which has long been troubling him, it stimulates and externalizes further his mental activity. Fourthly, the poet's handling of i., through his selection of detail and choice of comparisons, serves to dispose the reader either favorably or unfavorably toward various elements in the poetic situation. That faith, therefore, the loss of which the speaker mourns, is made to seem worthy of his lament not only because the reader knows in general what the speaker is talking about but also and more particularly because he compares it to a bright girdle, thereby arousing in the reader's mind the connotations of a thing of value and ornament, pleasant, precious, and useful. I. may serve, fifthly, as a way of arousing and guiding the reader's expectations. Thus, since he places "sea" as the second word of his poem, Arnold prepares the reader for the speaker's symbolic lament: "The Sea of Faith / was once, too, at the full."

I., then, may derive from the speaker's subject, if that happens to involve a person, place, object, action, or event; from a symbolic combination of subject and meaning, if his thought happens to find its expressive vehicle in his physical experience; or from exterior analogies, if he happens to use figures of speech. It may be interpreted in terms of whether it functions to vivify the subject, reveal the speaker's mood, externalize the speaker's thought, direct the reader's attitudes, or guide his expectations.

Although these categories are merely suggestive, an interpretation of i. in a given poem would do well to examine it, at least to begin with, strictly in relation to the particular context and in terms of such distinctions.

F. I. Carpenter, Metaphor and Simile in the Minor Elizabethan Drama (1895); G. Buck, The Metaphor: A Study in the Psychology of Rhetoric (1899); J. G. Jennings, An Essay on Metaphor in Poetry (1915); H. W. Wells, Poetic I. (1924); Richards, Principles; S. J. Brown, The World of I. (1927); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (1928); J. E. Downey, Creative Imagination (1929); E. Holmes, Aspects of Elizabethan I. (1929); C.F.E. Spurgeon, Shakespeare's I. and What it Tells us (1935); I. A. Richards, The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936); U. Ellis-Fermor, Some Recent Research in Shakespeare's I. (1937); I. A. Richards, Interpretation in Teaching (1938); M. A. Rugoff, Donne's I. (1939); C. Brooks, "Metaphor and the Tradition," Modern Poetry and the Trad. (1939); M. B. Smith, Marlowe's I. and the Marlowe Canon (1940); L. H. Hornstein, "Analysis of I.: A Critique of Literary Method," PMLA, 57 (1942); E. A. Armstrong, Shakespeare's Imagination (1946); C. D. Lewis, The Poetic Image (1947); C. Brooks, "The Naked Babe and the Cloak of Manliness," The Well Wrought Urn (1947); Tuve; R. B. Heilman, This Great Stage: Image and Structure in "King Lear" (1948); R. H. Fogle, The I. of Keats and Shelley (1949); Wellek and Warren, ch. 15; D. A. Stauffer, Shakespeare's World of Images (1949); T. H. Banks, Milton's I. (1950); W. H. Clemen, The Development of Shakespeare's I. (1951); K. Muir, "Fifty Years of Shakespearean Crit.: 1900-1950," ShS, 4 (1951); F. Marsh, Wordsworth's I. (1952); J. E. Hankins, Shakespeare's Derived I. (1953); Frye; F. Kermode, Romantic Image (1957); C. Brooke-Rose, A Grammar of Metaphor (1959); D. C. Allen, Image and Meaning: Metaphoric Traditions in Renaissance Poetry (1960); J. W. Beach, Obsessive Images: Symbolism in the Poetry of the 1930's and 1940's (1960); R. Frazer, "The Origin of the Term Image," ELH, 27 (1960); Metaphor and Symbol, ed. L. C. Knights and B. Cottle (1960); H. Musurillo, Symbol and Myth in Ancient Poetry (1961); P. Wheelwright, Metaphor and Reality (1962).

N.FRIE.

IMAGINATION is derived from L. imaginatio, which was a late substitute for phantasia (a simple transliteration of the Gr. from which fancy is derived). The two terms, with their derivatives, long appeared as synonyms designating the image-receiving or image-forming faculty or process. From philosophy they were borrowed by criticism, and in both contexts were subject to different evaluations by different schools. Their history, though far from a simple linear development, falls into fairly clearly marked divisions.

I. CLASSICAL AND MEDIEVAL. (1) The history starts with the elementary recognition, first, of a mental image accompanying sense perception (and viewed by the materialist as real and an impress made by the object, by the idealist as mere appearance, by the dualist with depreciation as dependent on matter and the senses), and, secondly, of images occurring in the absence of any object, and in various combinations, which might be depreciated as fictitious, suspected as proceeding from the passions, valued as divinely inspired, or simply examined as psychological phenomena.

(2) All these attitudes find some reflection in Plato, who further recognizes a connection of art and poetry with i. Initially, he regards the image as illusory, yielding no knowledge of reality (since of the "idea" one can form no image) but confined to appearance and opinion, and a prey to every prompting from the irrational soul; hence in part the limitations of artist and poet. Thus Plato inaugurates a long tradition of distrust, which was little mitigated by his own important second thoughts, namely, that "images answering to true opinions are true," that to form images from "ideas" was indeed possible to the god, that an image of pure beauty (subsuming the ideas of truth and goodness) while it could not be produced by any activity of the soul, might be passively received from above, or even "remembered" from the soul's earlier state, a process in which earthly images of beauty might be instrumental, and, finally, that provision was perhaps made (in close proximity to the irrational soul) for a reflection, in the form of images, of ideas entertained by the rational soul. But the gap between "ideas" and "images" was never securely closed. At most the soul could passively receive an image reflecting an idea: it could not actively produce such an image. In the Platonic tradition the distrust of phantasy is emphatic; not until it is dissipated can Platonism make its full contribution to the theory of i. (see below 12, 13, 15, 18).

(3) Aristotle's interest, in the De Anima, was psychological and free from prejudice. Set in motion by sense perception, phantasy forms images of objects and their relations; and from such images reproduced, reason abstracts its ideas. Thus, in the process of deriving knowledge from experience, images are the intermediaries between sense and thought; and in the act of choice images have an equally essential role. Aristotle's failure, however, to invoke his theory of the reproductive image in expounding, in the Poetics, his view of art as an "imitation of nature" at once realistic and philosophical, was to impede the recognition of the imagination's role in poetry (see below 7).

(4) Distrust of phantasy is dominant in the Stoics (despite some inheritance from the De Anima). Neoplatonism, as represented by Plotinus, is more ambivalent. His emanationist theory permitted him to distinguish a higher and a lower phantasy: the lower dependent on sense and a function of the irrational soul, the higher reflective of ideas because a function of the rational soul, but with the lower capable of being brought into harmony with the higher because it is indeed its shadow. Further, as soul was an emanation of mind, nature was an emanation of soul, inferior to it because lacking, among other powers, that of phantasy and, consequently, all perception of its own activity, namely, the imposition of forms upon matter (the last and lowest of the emanations). Here was a philosophy with large, if undeveloped, possibilities for poetic theory: for the imaginative reflection of the ideal, and even for something like Coleridge's conception of "poesy or art" (see 15).

(5) Though, in discussing the art of poetry, Horace had ignored i. and thus impeded its recognition (cf. 7), Quintilian, with illustrations from Virgil, recognizes that by visiones (or phantasies) absent things seem present, whence the orator can feel and, by his eloquence, arouse emotion; and Longinus, with illustrations from Euripides, recognizes i. as a source of sublimity when "moved by enthusiasm and passion you seem to see the things whereof you speak and place them before the eyes of your hearers." Here as later (cf. 10, 18) i. and passion unite to characterize poetry and eloquence. A further development is adumbrated in Philostratus, when imitation is declared to be inferior to phantasy, since it can represent only what has been seen, but phantasy what has never been seen, fashioning it according to the analogy of the real.

(6) While Christian asceticism, with biblical phrases about vain i., no doubt fortified existing prejudices, St. Augustine distinguished the reproductive from the simple sensory image, reserving to the former the term phantasia or imaginatio. He recognized its role when, in reading history, or in writing and reading fables, we see in our mind's eye persons and scenes; he further noticed the interdependence of the reproductive image and the will in the hypothetical representations formed by addition, subtraction, or combination of attributes. But for him i. remained inferior to intellect: to the former prophetic vision might be vouchsafed, but its interpretation only to the latter. In the "faculty psychology" of the Schoolmen, where this order is maintained, i., like the other faculties, is given its location and its distinctive function, namely, with or as the sensus communis, to produce from sense data the images of objects and their relations, and (sometimes under the designation of phantasia) to reproduce and combine images at will. Of the truth of images reason must judge, and from them it abstracts ideas, which memory in turn retains. This is the basic scheme, of which there were many variants. Dante's interest centered on ascent from the image of earthly beauty to intellectual or heavenly love, and on the image divinely bestowed or inspired; but his practice as poet outran his theory: where, in the Divine Comedy, he finally declares that i. fails, he is actually making his most effective use of the symbolic image, and in his account of the poem's fourfold meaning he does not refer to i. at all.

II. RENAISSANCE TO ROMANTICS. (7) In Pico della Mirandola's On Imagination, the early Renaissance combined a renewed reference to classical sources with much from medieval tradition. Those critics who, in the 16th c., commenced to formulate the principles of neoclassicism, built upon Aristotle and Horace and largely ignored imagination in favor of the imitation of nature; and even when Scaliger and Sidney acclaimed the poet as a "creator," they still clung to the doctrine of imitation. Puttenham's summary of current theories which ascribe poetry to creation, imitation, natural endowment, divine inspiration, etc., remarks (under the first of these) that the poet may indeed be likened to the Creator "who without any travail to his Divine Imagination made all the world of nought," but also bears testimony to long-established prejudice in his defense of i. as, in its healthful state, no wise irregular but very orderly, productive of "beautiful visions," and so helpful to invention that "without it no man could devise any new or rare thing." But it is not till Bacon that i. really begins to claim a central role in poetry—and then with an attendant limitation, for poetry ceases to be knowledge and becomes fiction and play. "History," he writes, "is referred to memory; poesy to imagination; philosophy to reason." With "the primary materials of knowledge" the "mind . . . exercises itself and sometimes sports. For as all knowledge is the exercise and work of the mind, so poesy may be regarded as its sport." For "being not tied to the laws of matter," as are memory and reason, i. "may at pleasure join that which nature hath severed and sever that which nature hath joined" and give thereby "some shadow of satisfaction to the mind of man" by representing "a more ample greatness, a more exact goodness, and a more absolute variety than can be found in the nature of things."

(8) For immediate acceptance this view ran too completely counter to the neoclassical conception of poetry as an imitation of nature. In England, however, neoclassicism early sought its philosophical basis in empiricism, and while it regarded poetry as an imitation of empirical reality (a severely limiting criterion, as seen in Hobbes) and yielded i. only a secondary role, a philosophy which grounded all knowledge in sense experience had less reason to distrust i. than had rationalism in its Cartesian or any other form, and psychological interest prompted a study of its operation. Hobbes sums up his view of poetry in the dictum: "Time and education beget experience; experience begets memory; memory begets judgment and fancy; judgment begets the strength and structure, and fancy begets the ornaments, of a poem." But this did not close the subject. I. or fancy, drawing all its data from sensation, was in its "simple" form, he averred, merely the memory of sensory images; but it had also the power of "compounding" them to form new images. Further, images presented themselves in "trains," the result of undirected association, or (more significantly) of a directing desire or design, in which case i. (cooperating with judgment) became the indispensable instrument of invention in "whatsoever distinguisheth the civility of Europe from the barbarity of the American savages." In critical theory Addison, in effect, grafts Hobbes's psychology of the i. upon Bacon's theory of poetry.

(9) For Addison all the data of i. are supplied by the sense of sight. Its primary process is to form visual images of objects in their presence. Its secondary is to reproduce their "ideas" (i.e. images) "when the objects are not actually before the eye, but are called up into our memories or formed into agreeable visions of things that are either absent or fictitious." Here indeed are two processes: simple reproduction of images, and "altering and compounding those images . . . into all the varieties of picture and vision. . . ; for by this faculty a man in a dungeon is capable of entertaining himself with scenes and landscapes more beautiful than any that can be found in the whole compass of nature." And "because the imagination can fancy to itself things more great, strange or beautiful than the eye ever saw, and is still sensible of some defect in what it has seen, . . . it is the part of a poet to humour the imagination . . . by mending and perfecting nature where he describes a reality, and by adding greater beauties than are put together in nature where he describes a fiction." In "the fairy way of writing" the poet quite loses sight of nature and "out of his own invention" represents "ghosts, fairies, witches, and the like imaginary persons" (which Hobbes had specifically rejected as contradict-ing nature). In a word, i. "has something in it like creation: it bestows a kind of existence."

(10) To the influence of Addison's Spectator papers much of the emphasis on i. in 18th-c. criticism may be traced. "In the fairyland of fancy," wrote Edward Young, "genius may wander wild; there it has a creative power and may reign arbitrarily over its own empire of chimeras." Reynolds, abandoning "ideal form" for "appeal to the imagination" as his criterion in art, declares that its aim "is to supply the natural imperfection of things" and "to gratify the mind by realizing . . . what never existed but in imagination." Unlike the majority of his predecessors, he makes some distinction between i. and fancy in the assertion: "Raphael had more taste and fancy, Michelangelo more genius and imagination." Such theorists as Lord Kames and Alison anticipate the romantics in their emphasis on emotion and its dependence upon i.

(11) Meanwhile Hume, having deposed reason, in effect replaced it by i., which he was careful to distinguish from "the loose reveries of the fancy." Adam Smith made sympathy, the groundwork of the moral sentiments, depend on i. Alexander Gerard, attempting an empirical account of genius, describes it as fertility in associating ideas, and attributes this in turn to an active i., as also does William Duff, in whom merge the cults of i., of genius, and of the primitive: the mark of genius is "an inventive and plastic imagination" which "sketches out a creation of its own," and is something quite different from the mere "quickness and readiness" of "a sportive fancy"; and genius, thus conceived, flourishes best in primitive societies. Blackwell, Wood, Blair, and other primitivists expatiate on the metaphorical character of primitive poetry; and while not all attribute this mainly to i., all would agree with Vico (in Italy) that "imagination is more robust in proportion as reasoning power is weak." Vico's importance lies less in his theory of i. ("imagination is nothing but extended or compounded memory") than in the results which he attributed to it in ancient poetry and myth, thereby anticipating modern anthropological criticism. To Herder and the Germans it chiefly fell to take up and develop Eng. ideas of primitive poetry and the i. of the folk. More central are the interests of Dougald Stewart, who ascribes imagery wholly to "fancy," the power that "supplies the poet with metaphorical language," while i. (freed from its close association with the image) is the power "that creates the complex scenes he delineates, and the fictitious characters he delineates," as illustrated in Milton's Eden, Harrington's Oceana, and Shakespeare's Falstaff or Hamlet. This is perhaps the final development and utmost reach of the tradition that stops short of making for i. the transcendental claims put forward by the romantics.

(12) Of such claims there were, however, some intermittent premonitions. After basing his early aesthetic on Hobbes, but unlike Hobbes attempting some distinction between i. and fancy (imagination connoting the general power whose first activity is "invention or finding of the thought," while its second activity is "fancy or variation . . . of that thought"), Dryden became restive under its limitations and (with liberal quotation from Bellori) advanced the theory that i. could reach to images of the essential ideas of things, which images were the models for painter and poet when they would represent "nature wrought up to a nobler pitch." There are hints of a similar doctrine in William Collins and the eclectic Reynolds; but it could make little headway against the prevailing empiricism. Nor must it be forgotten that the tradition opposed to empiricism, and represented by Shaftesbury, set its own limits on i. Shaftesbury's famous pronouncement on the true poet as "a second maker, a just Prometheus under Jove" speaks in terms of the imitation of nature, not of i., which indeed it disparages in accordance with his oft-repeated Stoic prejudice. In It. criticism attention was being given to the i. with somewhat different results, and notably by Muratori in his defense of the It. poets against the strictures of Fr. neoclassicists. In order to please, poetry must present what appears to be true and beautiful, marvelous but verisimilar. Herein intellect and i. must cooperate and good taste control. If intellect alone works upon the images, the result is philosophical knowledge; if i. alone, dream and delusion. "Simple" or "natural" images appear immediately true to both. Others may appear immediately true to i., but only mediately to the intellect: such are those images, described as "artificial" or "fantastic," which are applied metaphorically under the stress of emotion. Both kinds are approved by Muratori and copiously illustrated from the poets. In German criticism Eng. ideas on poetry and i. were sometimes grafted on the different philosophical stock of Leibniz, as by Bodmer and Baumgarten. But it is to Kant and his followers in Germany and to the romantic poets in England that we must look for the final exalting of i.

III. THE ROMANTICS. (13) Blake takes an extreme line. Ultimate reality is spiritual, and the i. is the organ of its perception: "Imagination is spiritual sensation." It is the "first principle" of knowledge, "and all others are derivative." It perceives—almost one might say, confers—form and value: "Nature has no outline, but Imagination has: / Nature has no tune, but Imagination has. / Nature has no supernatural and dissolves: Imagination is Eternity." In his reaction against empiricism and the theories of art based thereon, Blake condemns all those "who pretend to Poetry that they may destroy Imagination by imitation of Nature's Images drawn from Remembrance." Nothing but i. can resolve the antinomy of material object and spiritual reality, nothing, that is, but the power to look upon the object and see the reality: "to the eyes of the man of Imagination, Nature is Imagination itself." Creative i. issues not in fiction but in the highest truth. Without benefit of German metaphysics, "English Blake" reverses the assumptions of the empirical tradition.

(14) Meanwhile, in the Critique of Pure Reason, Kant had emphasized the role of i. (Erbildungskraft) in the formation of knowledge, describing it as "an active faculty for synthesis," which unites and unifies the manifold data of sense perception. Without it, no subjective knowledge would be possible, and no ordered knowledge of an objective world. It is "a necessary ingredient of perception itself" and the indispensable mediator between "mere sensibility and understanding"; and, in order to account for these empirical results, Kant has further to infer "a transcendental synthesis of imagination." Nor is this all. In the Critique of Judgment he treats i. in another context, which places it in a different relation to understanding and brings into relief free (as opposed to determined) activity. In aesthetic judgment, "we do not refer the representation . . . to the object by means of understanding, with a view to cognition, but by means of imagination (acting perhaps in conjunction with understanding) we refer the representation to the subject and its feeling of pleasure or displeasure." There i. is free: not simply "reproductive" under "the laws of association," but "productive and exerting an activity of its own"; and even when it is restricted by the form of the object of sense represented, and "does not enjoy free play as it does in poetry," the representation is still judged in relation to such a form "as the imagination, if left to itself, would freely project in . . . general conformity to the law of the understanding." In a word, in cognition i. is at the service of understanding; in aesthetic judgment, "understanding is at the service of imagination" in its free activity. Kant's antinomy of the necessary and the free becomes in Schelling that of the real (nature, the finite and determined) and the ideal (mind, the infinite and free) subsisting within the absolute, and the function of art is to mediate between them, to build the infinite into the finite, through the active and intermediary power of "intelligence," which no doubt subsumes i.: "Intelligence is productive in two ways . . . , unconsciously in the perception of the universe, consciously [and, he adds, with freedom] in the creation of an ideal world."

(15) In Coleridge there are elements from both Kant and Schelling. I., he defines as the intermediate faculty which joins the predominantly passive and predominantly active elements in thinking, but as applied to poetry it connotes "a superior degree of the faculty joined to a superior voluntary control over it." And in a more famous passage he writes: "The primary imagination I hold to be the living power and prime agent of all human perception, and as a repetition in the finite mind of the eternal act of creation in the infinite I AM. The secondary imagination I consider as an echo of the former, co-existing with the conscious will, yet still as identical with the primary in the kind of its agency, and differing only in degree and in the mode of its operation. It dissolves . . . in order to recreate or . . . to idealize and to unify." It is thus sharply differentiated from fancy, which is a mere "mode of memory emancipated from the order of time and space" but receiving "all its materials ready made from the law of association." Coleridge is critic as well as philosopher, and one of his concerns is to validate, against empiricism, the productions of the "secondary" i., the creative i. of poet or artist, by identifying it in kind with the "primary" i., the finite counterpart of God's creative act, and thereby to give philosophic ground and content to the traditional idea of the poet as creator. Unlike fancy and understanding, which are confined to the level of the phenomenal, of natura naturata, reason and creative i., aspiring to the noumenal, approximate to each other, so that i. becomes (in Wordsworth's phrase) "reason in her most exalted mood." Deliberately Coleridge seeks to unite creative i. with the imitation of nature, properly understood. For "poesy or art" does not "copy" natura naturata but "imitates" natura naturans; and thus to imitate nature is in effect to interpret it in and by "symbols," "living educts of the imagination, of that reconciling and mediatory power which, incorporating the reason in images of the sense, and organizing (as it were) the flux of the senses by the permanence and self-encircling energies of the reason, gives birth to a system of symbols, harmonious in themselves and consubstantial with the truths of which they are the conductors."

(16) Imagination, says Wordsworth, "has been forced to extend its services far beyond the point to which philosophy would have confined them: "the word . . . has been overstrained . . . to meet the demands of the faculty which is perhaps the noblest of our nature." His own criterion is not philosophic but experiential; and he rejects a complete differentiation of i. and fancy, listing them together as one of the qualities requisite for the poet—deceived (Coleridge thinks) by their co-presence in his own poetry: They differ indeed, but mainly in respect of value: "Fancy is given to quicken and to beguile the temporal part of our nature, imagination to incite and to support the eternal." He was early conscious of creative activity in perception itself—"creative sensibility" as he was to call it. This is the beginning of the long evolution traced in the Prelude, and the end, a recognition of i. as the organ equally of truth, of beauty and of spiritual love: "This spiritual love acts not, nor can exist / Without imagination, which in truth / Is but another name for absolute power / And clearest insight, amplitude of mind, / And reason in her most exalted mood."

(17) Though still concerned with the image, Coleridge and Wordsworth extend the sway of i. to "thoughts and sentiments," "characters" and "actions": Wordsworth distinguishes the "human and dramatic" i. of Shakespeare from the "enthusiastic and meditative" of the Bible, Milton, and (he adds) Spenser; and Coleridge between the i. of Shakespeare, by which he goes forth and identifies himself with his subject, and Milton's, by which he brings everything to a center in his own experience. But above all i. manifests itself in the unity of the whole: it draws (says Wordsworth, quoting Lamb) "all things to one" and makes them "take one colour and serve to one effect"; it reveals itself, says Coleridge, "in the balance or reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities; of sameness with difference, of the general with the concrete . . . , the individual with the representative, . . . the sense of novelty and freshness with old and familiar objects, [and] a more than usual state of emotion with a more than usual order. . . ."

(18) Others are more eclectic: Hazlitt, who emphasizes the dependence of poetry on emotion, and of emotion on i.; Keats, whose insights include stress on the poet's imaginative sympathy (these with no distinction of i. and fancy), and (with some attempt at distinction) Leigh Hunt, who notes that i. can dispense with the sensory image and wishes for a new term. Shelley attributes to i. all creative activity in life as well as art, sets it in opposition to reason, and claims for it alone that access to the realm of ideas which Plato had seemed to deny to it; he further assigns to i. a central role in ethics, as it begets and diffuses sympathy, a conception which looks back to Adam Smith and on to John Galsworthy. Though "more Platonic than Plato," Joubert, in the name of i., opposed the master on poetry: by i., "active and creative" and the very "eye of the soul," the poet "purifies and empties the forms of matter and shows us the universe as it is in the mind of God. . . . His portrayal is not a copy of a copy, but an impression of the archetype." "In their quest of beauty poets come on more truth than philosophers in their quest of truth."

(19) Ruskin distinguishes three modes in which i. operates: the "penetrative" (whereby the artist, reacting to the inner "verity" of his subject, can present it directly, without resort to metaphor or symbol), the "associative" (the instinctive process, contrasted with conscious "composition," whereby he harmonizes every detail so that it may contribute to the effect of the whole), and the "contemplative" (whereby the artist, in treating a subject that transcends nature and the concrete image directly employed, resorts to an analogical or figurative use of image to convey its meaning and suggest the attendant emotion). None of these modes does he regard as "creative," however. For art to create is to depart from truth and produce fiction, and this is the lower activity of three modes of fancy corresponding to the three modes of i. But, despite his characteristic schematism, Ruskin really cares little for terminology, so long as he can assert that great art embodies truth intuitively apprehended and beyond the reach of reasoning. The criticism of reason usually entails a distinction of its discursive and intuitive operations; but Arnold chooses rather to contrast reason and the senses with i. and the heart (i.e., feeling) and, finding neither satisfactory, seeks his ideal in what he calls "imaginative reason" as exemplified in the greatest poetry. In general, however, the Victorians contributed little to the theory of i., using the term so vaguely that G. H. Lewes complained: "there are few words more abused."

IV. THE TWENTIETH C. (20) In popular criticism the word imagination and its derivatives are still encountered, if less frequently. Their meaning is sufficiently vague, connoting most often perhaps sustained fantasy as opposed to realistic writing; but it is largely devoid of the transcendental overtones inherited from the romantics. One could expect no less from the widespread and varied reaction against romanticism in general and transcendentalism in particular. An example of this reaction was seen in Am. humanism, though Irving Babbitt conceded the importance of i., and a distinction between the "ethical" (or classic) i. and the "idyllic" (or romantic) is pivotal in his doctrine. More unequivocally hostile to i. as such was the whole naturalistic movement in thought and letters (which the humanists also opposed). In and beyond its ill-defined boundaries transcendentalism is of course out of fashion. If, for example, Coleridge is to be accepted by I. A. Richards, he must first be divested of his metaphysics. The psychology and aesthetics of the romantics have been in part repudiated, in part developed. Whatever their metaphysical affinities, the romantics had assumed that essentially art was the expression of emotion, with emotion and i. indissolubly linked therein. Here contemporary opinion sharply divides, with one school of critics denying or markedly qualifying the dependence of art on emotion, while others (whose interests are more psychological than purely aesthetic) retain it. Again, if we hear relatively little about i., we hear a great deal about the image. The dominance of the image is a principle, and its investigation a method, common to groups holding divergent views on the nature of poetry: the Freudians who regard poetry as wish-fulfillment and analogous to dreams; cultural anthropologists who see it as reducible to archetypal myths and patterns, and those critics who regard the poem as a self-contained entity without significant external relations, whose meaning and effect reside in a pattern of interdependent images. This concentration has restored attention to the image-forming process, often at the expense of those wider powers manifested in description, characterization, narration, and structure, which with increasing emphasis previous criticism had ascribed to i.; but it has borne fruit in a closer study of the image as symbol. Such study looks back in part to Coleridge, and it is significant that Richards should find Coleridge on the i. of absorbing psychological interest. The Freudian association of i. with dream is as old as Plato, and the view of poetry as wish-fulfillment is fundamentally Baconian. Cultural anthropologists, though immediately responsive to Frazer and Jung, are the distant descendants of Vico and Blackwell. And Croce and Collingwood, among exponents of the aesthetic as an area and mode of knowledge, and the role of i. therein, are evidently continuing the explorations of Kant.

(21) In Croce's doctrine of art as intuition (where intuition demands expression and expression is art), i., as productive of the unifying image, is in its turn identified with intuition, so that the doctrine might as well be phrased, art as i. The central role here accorded to i. (fantasia) implies a sharp distinction from the mere recalling of images in accidental succession or arranging them in constrained or capricious combinations.

(22) R. G. Collingwood, in expounding a not dissimilar theory, treats i. in greater detail. I. is neither mere sensibility, which is passive and below the level of consciousness, nor intellect, whose activity issues in thought, in the formation and ordering of concepts: it is an activity of mind which coexists with full consciousness, and it is the intermediary between the other two. It furnishes "the basis for a theory of aesthetic experience"; and it fills an essential "place in the general structure of experience" since it provides the means whereby "the activity of thought makes contact with the merely psychic life of feeling." It is creative because it is an activity of mind and produces something, namely, the work of art. Its product is not, however, mere make-believe, but a form of knowledge and, within its own terms of reference, true. For it is not only creation, but expression, and what it expresses is real feeling, raised in the process to the level of consciousness. Nor is this all. If the psychic life is nothing but feeling, thought, the activity of intellect, also carries its "emotional charges," and to these likewise i. can give expression in its own proper medium, which is art. Nowhere, perhaps, in contemporary aesthetics are so many of the past findings on the i. critically examined and, if they survive the test, built into a coherent theory of art.

REFERENCES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY BY NUMBERED PARAGRAPHS (1-6) M. W. Bundy, Theory of I. in Classical and Mediaeval Thought (1927); (2) Plato, Republic 10 (595-608), Phaedrus (245, 247, 250-51), Philebus (38-40), Timaeus (70-71); (3) Aristotle, De Anima 3.3-8 (427-31); (4) Plotinus, Enneads, as in Bundy ch. 6; (5) Quintilian, Institutio Oratoria 6.2.29-32, 10.7.15; Longinus, On the Sublime 35; Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 6.19; (6) St. Augustine, Epistles 6.7; Bundy ch. 9; (7-12) L. P. Smith, "Four Romantic Words," Words and Idioms (1925); J. W. Bray, Hist. of Eng. Crit. Terms (1898); A. S. P. Woodhouse, "Collins and the Creative I.," Studies in Eng., ed. M. W. Wallace (1931), "Romanticism and the Hist. of Ideas," Eng. Studies Today, ed. C. L. Wrenn and G. Bullough (1951); G. Williamson, "Restoration Revolt against Enthusiasm," sp. 30 (1933); R. S. Crane, "Eng. Neoclassical Crit.," Critics and Crit. (1952); D. Bond, "'Distrust of I.' in Eng. Neoclassicism," PQ, 14 (1935), "Neoclassical Psychology of the I.," ELH, 4 (1937); W. J. Bate, "Sympathetic I. in 18th C. Eng. Crit.," ELH, 12 (1945); W. J. Bate and J. Bullitt, "Distinctions between Fancy and I.," MLN, 60 (1945); (7) Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie; Bacon, Advancement of Learning, Descriptio Globi Intellectualis, De Augmentis Scientiarum 2.1.13, 5.1; Bundy, "'Invention' and 'I.' in the Renaissance," JEGP, 29 (1930), "Bacon's True Opinion of Poetry," sp. 27 (1930); (8) Hobbes, Answer to Davenant, Leviathan 1.2-3.8; C. D. Thorpe, Aesthetic of Thomas Hobbes (1940); (9) Addison, Spectator, nos. 411-21; C. D. Thorpe, "Addison's Theory of the I.," Papers of the Michigan Acad. of Science etc., 21 (1935); (10) Young, Conjectures on Original Composition; Reynolds, Discourses, Notes to Mason's tr. of Du Fresnoy; J. Warton, Essay on Pope, Ode to Fancy; H. Home, Lord Kames, Elements of Crit.; Alison, Essays on Taste; (11) Hume, Treatise of Human Nature; Adam Smith, Theory of the Moral Sentiments; Gerard, Essay on Genius; Duff, Essay on Original Genius; Blackwell, Enquiry concerning Homer; Blair, Lectures on Rhetoric; Vico, Scienza Nuova (tr. T. C. Bergin, M. H. Fisch, 1948); D. Stewart, Philos. of the Mind 1.3, 5, 8; (12) Dryden, Preface to Annus Mirabilis, Parallel of Poetry and Painting; Collins, Ode on the Poetical Character; Shaftesbury (3d Earl), "Advice to an Author" (in his Characteristics); Muratori, Della Perfetta Poesia Italiana; J. G. Robertson, Studies in the Genesis of Romantic Theory (1923; ch. 3). (13-18) Wellek; Woodhouse, "Romanticism and the Hist. of Ideas" (above); Abrams; (13) Blake, Letter to Trussler, Aug. 23, 1799, Milton, Ghost of Abel, Marginalia to Wordsworth, Vision of the Last Judgment (in Descriptive Catalogue); (14) Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (tr. N. K. Smith), Critique of Aesthetic Judgment (tr. J. C. Meredith); E. L. Fackenheim, "Schelling's Philos. of the Lit. Arts," Philos. Quart., 4 (1954); (15-17) Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (ed. J. W. Shawcross), Poesy or Art, Lay Sermon, Table Talk; Wordsworth, Preface to Poems (1815), Prelude (esp. Bk. 14); (18) Hazlitt, "Poetry in General" (Lectures on Eng. Poets); Hunt, What is Poetry?; Shelley, Defence of Poetry; Joubert, Pensées; (19) Ruskin, Modern Painters 3.1.15.2-3; 3.2.1-4 (and see Index); Arnold, "Pagan and Mediaeval Religious Sentiment" (Essay in Crit., 1st ser.); G. H. Lewes, Principles of Success in Lit., ch. 3; (20) I. Babbitt, Rousseau and Romanticism (1919); I. A. Richards, Principles of Lit. Crit. (1924) and Coleridge on Imagination (1934); (21) Croce, Aesthetic (tr. D. Ainslie, 1922); (22) R. G. Collingwood, Principles of Art (1938). A.S.P.W.

IMAGISM refers to a concept of poetry associated with a school or movement that flourished between 1912 and 1917. Neither the theory nor the school, however, is clear enough in outline to justify confident, satisfactory definition, and i. can only be discussed after this concession has been made.

In 1912 appear Ezra Pound's first recorded references to it and, in the appendix to Ripostes, his somewhat archly allusive comment that established its associations with T. E. Hulme. The next year he and F. S. Flint further publicized the school through articles in Poetry: A Magazine of Verse, and in 1914 Pound brought out Des Imagistes: An Anthology. By this time, however, his interest had declined, and Amy Lowell displaced him as leader of the group. Under her leadership anthologies called Some Imagist Poets were published for the three years 1915-17, but by 1917 she felt that the movement had run its effective course. Her first two anthologies contained prefaces which, along with the Poetry articles, constitute the most deliberate statements of imagist theory and which stand therefore as its manifestoes.

The poems of the anthologies are at least a partial illustration of those principles that can be isolated from the manifestoes. Though they may appear to have merely casual relation to Pound's definition of the Image, they place their values in clarity, exactness or concreteness of detail, if only through their preoccupation with the objective world; in economy of language and brevity of treatment; in an organic basis for the selection of rhythmic patterns. Poems and manifestoes, together with isolated opinions expressed in print by poets who contributed to one or another of the anthologies, come to a definition of i. that might be stated in this way: a belief in the short poem, structured by the single image or metaphor and a rhythm of cadences, presenting for direct apprehension by the reader an object or scene from the external world, and refusing to implicate the poem's effect in extended abstract meaning. Thus H. D.'s Oread:

Whirl up, sea—
Whirl your pointed pines,
Splash your great pines
On our rocks,
Hurl your green over us,
Cover us with your pools of fir.

Working from this basis, but realizing that individual poems, except for a few like Oread, or Pound's In a Station of the Metro, or some of the imitations of Japanese forms, seldom satisfy all of these requirements, it is possible to see i. as an experiment toward the rejuvenation of the language of poetry, a reaction against the flabby, abstract language and structure into which poetry of the 19th c. had degenerated. As such it has parallels with, for example, the romantic reaction a century earlier against the poetic diction of degenerate neoclassicism, and its concentration on the object and the realistic bias which accompanies this recall similar strictures in Wordsworth's Preface to the Lyrical Ballads.

In its concern with technique and its restriction of meaning, however, it belongs with more nearly contemporary developments which reflect poetry's attempt to redefine its values in resistance to the pressures of science. It is a stage in the growth of a formalist aesthetic beginning with Poe, finding expression in the reticent commentary of Mallarmé, and culminating in the "new criticism." Pound's insistence upon recharging the word and the general agreement upon the immediacy of effect that arises from close association of word and object are in part a program for improving the craft of writing. Taken with the rejection of "message" as an integral part of the poem, however, they lead in the direction of an emphasis upon writing as an art distinct in its medium and justified by it.

It is in the theory of T. E. Hulme that the movement seems most modern. Here the poem is a moment of discovery or awareness, created by effective metaphor which provides the sharp, intuitive insight that is the essence of life. The quality of this insight, marked by irony, the imagists were scarcely aware of; but through Hulme and its own allusions to the image, the movement drew attention to a metaphorical or analogical basis for structure, as well as to a concept of form that was the basis for the symbolism of Mallarmé and the poetics of Eliot, Richards, Ransom, and others. Since imagist form is reducible to style or technique and since i., in its concern with surfaces, light and color, has links with impressionism, it is not wholly to be associated with formalism. At the same time, this is the gist of Pound's theory. The general trend of the movement toward encouraging formal experimentation, especially with image and metaphor, is probably more significant than the occasional instances of its direct influence on the work of poets like Eliot, Crane, and Stevens. For Russian i. see RUSSIAN POETRY.

E. Pound, Ripostes (1912), "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste," Poetry, 1 (1913), "Affirmations," The New Age, 16 (1915), "This Hulme Business," The Townsman, 2 (1939), The Letters of Ezra Pound, ed. D. D. Paige (1950); F. S. Flint, "Imagisme," Poetry, 1 (1913) and "The History of i.," The Egoist, 2 (1915); R. Aldington, "Modern Poetry and the Imagists," The Egoist, 1 (1914); T. E. Hulme, Speculations, ed. H. Read (1924), Notes on Language and Style, ed. H. Read (1930), Further Speculations, ed. S. Hynes (1955); R. Taupin, L'Influence du symbolisme français sur la poésie am. (1929); M. Roberts, T. E. Hulme (1938); S. K. Coffman, i. (1951); H. Kenner, The Poetry of Ezra Pound (1951); W. C. Pratt, The Imagist Poem (1963). S.K.C.

IMITATION. Until very recently, when it was restored to the critical vocabulary by Francis Fergusson, Kenneth Burke, and members of the "Chicago school" (see also Auerbach's Mimesis), "i." had been out of favor as a literary term since the 18th c. Its eclipse began with the critical stirrings that led the way to romanticism, when "i." was more and more felt to be out of keeping with the new spirit of spontaneity and self-expression. Its revival today is associated with other manifestations of a reaction against romanticism, a tendency to adopt a more objective view of the poet's relation to his subject.

"i." the Latin imitatio, is a translation of Gr. mimesis. The original connotation of the latter seems to have been dramatic or quasi-dramatic (see MIMESIS). Whether any theory of poetry as i. was developed before Plato is uncertain. Gorgias's notion of tragedy as a "beneficent deception" (apate) perhaps anticipated it in part; and Democritus certainly held that the arts in general arose out of imitation of nature: singing, for example, from imitation of the birds. But the first place where we can actually grasp mimesis as a critical term is Plato's Republic, Books 3 and 10. In Book 3, however, the context is political and pedagogical rather than merely literary. Plato's concern there is with the education of his élite corps of Guards, and he judges poetry strictly by that criterion. "i." is identified almost exclusively with the dramatic mode: i.e., with the direct impersonation of literary characters. This involves an identification of oneself with others which is perilous for the young; it may lead them away from their best selves to an indiscriminate i. of low and unworthy persons. Hence poetry, but especially the drama, must be banished from the professional education of the ideal ruler. In Book 10 Plato renews his attack on a broader front. i. is now identified as the method of all poetry, and of the visual arts as well. The poet, like the painter, is incapable of doing more than counterfeit the external appearance of things; Truth, the realm of Ideas, is inaccessible to him. In this second discussion (perhaps written later) Plato's attention has shifted from the method of i. to its object, and i.—i.e., art—is condemned not merely for its moral effects but because it cannot break through the surface of Appearance to the reality it ought to reproduce, the Ideas.

This crushing verdict upon "i." does not result, as we might expect, in banishing the term from Plato's world of discourse; on the contrary, it permeates his thinking more and more in the later dialogues. In the Sophist (236) he hints at the possibility of a "true i.," which would reproduce the real nature and proportions of its object. Indeed Plato came to think of the whole complex relation of Becoming to Being, Particular to Idea, as a kind of i. Thus the Timaeus (27ff.) presents the universe itself as a work of art, an "image" of the world of Ideas made by a divine craftsman. From this it is only a step to conceiving visual art, and then poetry, as a sensuous embodiment of the ideal. The Neoplatonists (see Plotinus, Enneads 5.8, and cf. Cicero, Orator 2.8–9) took this step, but Plato himself did not. The condemnation of poetry in the Republic was never explicitly revised or withdrawn (it is substantially repeated in the Laws, Books 2 and 7), and the developments just mentioned remain hints (highly fruitful ones for later thought) rather than a new positive doctrine of poetic i.

Aristotle accepts i. (Poetics, ch. 4) as a fundamental human instinct—an intellectual instinct—of which poetry is one manifestation, along with music, painting, and sculpture. His real innovation, however, and the cornerstone of his new theory of poetry (see CLASSICAL POETICS), is a redefinition of mimesis to mean not a counterfeiting of sensible reality but a presentation of “universals.” By “universals” he means (ch. 9) not metaphysical entities like the Platonic Ideas, but simply the permanent, characteristic modes of human thought, feeling, and action. It goes without saying, or at least Aristotle does not bother to say, that knowledge of such universals is not restricted to the philosopher. The poet can represent them, and his readers can grasp them, without benefit of metaphysical training. Poetic i. is of action rather than simply of men, i.e., characters. Tragedy (and, with certain reservations, the epic) is an i. of a single, complete, and serious action involving the happiness of an important human being. More specifically, the i. is lodged in the plot (mythos) of the poem; and by “plot” Aristotle means not merely a sequence but a structure of events, so firmly welded together as to form an organic whole. It follows that the poet’s most important duty is to shape his plot. He cannot find it already given; whether he starts from mythical tradition, history, or his own invention, he is a poet only so far as he is a builder (poietae, “maker”) of plots. Thus “i.” comes very close to meaning “creation.” But the poet’s creation is not of some “second nature” existing only in his fancy; it is a valid representation of the actions of men according to the laws of probability or necessity.

Aristotle’s concept of i. was subtle and complex. His chief successors in criticism were men of another stamp, more literary than philosophical in their view of poetry. So far as i. remained a key term in the Hellenistic age (actually we do not hear a great deal about it), it seems to have been conceived as meaning the portrayal of standardized human types: the hot-headed man, the braggart soldier, the wild Thracian, etc. Aristotle’s “probability” (to eikos, verisimile), and the even more characteristic concept of “appropriateness” (to prepon, decorum), are now tailored to the measure of particular social standards and conventions more than to any permanent principles of human nature. At the same time Aristotle’s insistence on action gives way to more relaxed and eclectic views: the object of i. may be character, thought, or even natural phenomena. Anything can be imitated, in accordance with the laws of the genre one has chosen, and the object, whether fable, fact, or fiction, is tacitly assumed to have more or less the same status as a natural object (see CLASSICAL POETICS).

Alongside the Aristotelian concept of i., thus denatured, another of very different provenience—and still easier to understand—took on increasing importance in the Hellenistic and Roman periods. This was the relatively simple idea of imitating the established “classics” (the word is Roman, the concept Gr.), the great models of achievement in each genre. Its origin was rhetorical (see CLASSICAL POETICS), but it ended by spreading impartially over prose and poetry. The treatise of Dionysius of Halicarnassus On Imitation is lost except for fragments, but we can get some idea of the theme from the second chapter of Book 10 of Quintilian’s Institutio Oratoria. From these two authors, and more particularly from “Longinus” (see SUBLIME), we can see that the doctrine had its higher side. I. of the great writers of the past need not and should not be merely a copying of devices of arrangement and style, but a passionate emulation of their spirit. Dryden (in the Essay of Dramatic Poesy) puts it very well: “Those great men whom we propose to ourselves as patterns of our imitation, serve us as a torch, which is lifted up before us, to illumine our passage and often elevate our thoughts as high as the conception we have of our author’s genius.” Here i. is united with its apparent opposite, inspiration. Nevertheless, both in antiquity and in the Renaissance, i. in the sense of emulation of models meant chiefly stylistic i., and thus helped to fortify the prevalent understanding of poetry as an art of words.

The Renaissance inherited at least three major concepts of i. from antiquity: (1) the Platonic: a copying of sensuous reality, (2) the Aristotelian: a representation of the universal patterns of human behavior, and of an action embodying these, and (3) the Hellenistic and rhetorical: i. of canonized literary models. But each of these was further complicated by a deviation or variant interpretation: (1) the Platonic by the Neoplatonic suggestion that the artist can create according to a true Idea, (2) the Aristotelian by the vulgarization of Aristotle’s “universals” into particular social types belonging to a particular place or time, and (3) the rhetorical by its rather adventitious association with “enthusiasm” and the furor poeticus (a good example is Vida’s Ars Poetica 2.422-444). That this mixed inheritance did not lead to complete critical chaos was due partly to the chronological accident that the Poetics did not become known in Italy until well after 1500 (see CLASSICAL POETICS, sec. 8), partly to the incorrigible syncretism of the humanists, which refused to give up any part of the ancient tradition but insisted on blending it into a new amalgam, and partly to the plain fact that the chief literary creed and inspiration of the It. Renaissance was rhetorical. Humanism was an imitative movement in its very root and essence: the i. of classical, particularly classical Latin, literature was its life-blood. Thus the burning question in the 15th c., and well into the 16th, was not What is imitation? or Should we imitate? but Whom (i.e., which classical author or authors) should we imitate? The fiercest battle was waged over prose style, i.e., over the question whether Cicero should be the sole and all-sufficient model for L. prose or others such as Sallust, Livy, Seneca, Tacitus might be admitted also. Lorenzo Valla spoke to this issue in a spirit of enlightened Ciceronianism, in his De Elegantii Linguae Latinae (between 1435 and 1444) and about seventy years later (1512) we find Gianfranco Pico della Mirandola, nephew of the more famous Count Giovanni, and the learned Pietro Bembo (later secretary to Leo X, and Cardinal) debating it once more, with references to a previous controversy between Cortesius and Politian (cf. the latter's Epistles). Pico takes the eclectic side, Bembo the Ciceronian, as Politian and Cortesius had done before them. The Ciceronian squabble was more or less ended by Erasmus's Ciceronianus (1528). Alongside it ran a similar but less acrimonious dispute over poetic i., centering around Virgil and ending in his canonization by Vida (1527) and Scaliger (1561) as the supreme poet and perfect model.

Meanwhile an issue of more theoretical, or at least of more general, interest was presented by the perennial need for a defense of poetry against doctrinal and moral objections from the side of the Church. In this struggle it was only natural that Plato's indictment of poetry as mere i. should be pressed into service by the attackers, e.g., by Savonarola in his De Divisione ac Utilitate Omnium Scientiarum (1492), while on the other side "Platonic"—actually Neoplatonic—ideas of poetry as a showing forth of Truth and Beauty made their appearance on the other side. The younger Pico (see above) invoked such ideas in his plea for a broad view of "i."

A genuine theoretical interest in the concept of poetic i. as such could not arise, however, until Aristotle's Poetics had come to light again and begun to be studied: that is, until after the first quarter or third of the 16th c. Vida's Art of Poetry (1527) is still innocent of this new trend. It preaches the i. of "nature" (2.455: nil conarier artem, Naturam nisi ut assimulet propiusque sequatur), but for no other real purpose than to inculcate the i. of the ancient poets, above all Virgil, who followed her to the best advantage (hanc unam vates sibi proposuere magistram). Daniello (Poetica, 1536) knows Aristotle's definition of tragedy as i., but hardly knows what to make of it, since he draws only a faltering distinction between poetry and history. Robortelli, in his commentary on the Poetics (1548), allows the poet to invent things that transcend nature. Fracastoro (Naugerius, sive de Poeta Dialogus, 1555) pieces out Aristotle's concept of i. with the Platonic idea of beauty, identifying the latter with the universal. Scaliger (1561) recommended the i. of Virgil because Virgil had created a "second nature" more beautiful than the first; and Boileau gave the problem its definitive formulation for neoclassical theory: the surest way to imitate nature is to imitate the classics. But the real difficulty and challenge of Aristotle's idea of i. had not been grasped, much less solved. The later Renaissance was as unable as the earlier to make an effective distinction between poetry and history on the one hand, and between poetry and rhetoric on the other, because it could not seize and define any true "universal" as the object of poetic i., except in vague Platonic (Neoplatonic) terms, and so fell back into regarding poetry as essentially a special way of discoursing about "things." As for the treatises De Imitatione penned by humanists north of the Alps in the 16th c.—Camerarius (1560), Sturmius (1574), Ascham's discussion of the subject in the Scholemaster (1570)—they belong almost entirely to the history of L. pedagogy, not to criticism.

Although i. was implicitly accepted down through the 18th c. as the goal and method of the fine arts in general, including poetry and painting, it began to slip into disrepute after 1770, being felt more and more to imply a derogation of the artist's integrity. Edward Young sneered at "the meddling ape, Imitation," and Coleridge opined that "To admire on principle, is the only way to imitate without loss of originality." The revival of "i." in our own day (see first paragraph above) has very little to do with either the classical or the neoclassical tradition; it goes straight to Aristotle, not through intermediaries, and views i. above all as a structural concept, the principle of organization of poetic wholes.

S. H. Butcher, Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and Fine Art, ch. 2 (4th ed., 1911; suggestive, but overmodernizes A.); U. Galli, "La mimesi artistica secondo Aristotele," Studi Ital. di Filol. Class., n.s., 4 (1926), comprehensive, covers Plato also; J. Tate, "'I.' in Plato's Republic," CQ, 22 (1928) and "Plato and 'I.,'" CQ, 26 (1932); R. McKeon, "Lit. Crit. and the Concept of I. in Antiquity," MP, 34 (1936), enlightening survey, and "I. and Poetry," in Thought, Action and Passion (1954); W. J. Verdenius, Mimesis:

IMPRESSIONISM

Plato's Doctrine of Artistic I. and its Meaning for Us (1949; prudent, well documented); F. Fergusson, The Idea of a Theater (1949), esp. ch. 1 and Appendix; K. Burke, "A 'Dramatistic' View of 'I,'" Accent, 12 (1952); Auerbach; H. Koller, Die Mimesis in der Antike (1954; ambitious but unreliable); G. F. Else, Aristotle's Poetics: the Argument (1957) and "'I.' in the 5th C.," CP, 53 (1958). See also ORIGINALITY. G.F.E.

IMPRESSIONISM. The term i. is commonly said to have been derived from Claude Monet's painting Impression: Soleil Levant first exhibited in Paris in 1874. Monet, Sisley, and Pissarro (the chief representatives of the impressionistic school of painting) sought to capture the fleeting impression of the moment, by means of pure spectral colors, which they applied to the canvas in small, irregular brush strokes. When viewed from the proper distance, these dabs were to merge in the observer's eye. Scorning the use of local color, the impressionists wanted to record the light as it is reflected from objects through the air surrounding them. In their paintings, all outlines are blurred and all formal values slighted. But around 1885 a new interest in form was already aroused under the impact of Seurat's pictorial divisionism (pointillism). In the impressionistic tone poems of Claude Debussy, emphasis is laid on the tone color and the overlapping of melodic fragments (vibration) rather than on rhythmical progression.

It is no easy task to define i. in literature, let alone in poetry. Hermann Bahr spoke of it as subjective naturalism and defined it by saying that, in it, the naturalistic états de choses have been replaced by the corresponding états d'âme. In prose literature, the works of the brothers Goncourt are generally regarded as impressionistic. The impressionist poets, like their fellow painters, desired to capture the fleeting impression at the very moment in which sensations are transformed into feelings. On the whole, their art is strictly nonintellectual and—if carried to the extreme—defies all rational explanation. It scorns logical progression and relies on the unpredictable movement which is effected by mental associations. Here, too, outlines are blurred, forms dissolved and images stillborn. Instead of naming the thing he is concerned with, the impressionist describes the effect which it produces. As the observer disappears, the organs of sense perception are confused (synaesthesia), and the poet turns into a medium through whose nervous system sensations and indistinct feelings communicate (Mallarmé's "céder l'initiative au verbe"). Impressionistic poetry aspires in general to the condition of music, but never attains it, since words are in themselves symbols and have rarely direct access to the world of our senses. A poem composed of words that have an established meaning simply cannot be regarded as an abstract symphony of moods, since to regard it as such would mean to negate the very properties by which language is distinguished from other modes of expression.

Perhaps there is no better way of defining the limits of poetic i. than to study its relation to other types of poetry which are sometimes mentioned in connection with it. As for its affinity to symbolism (q.v.), one can only agree with Ruth Moser that "en littérature, le symbolisme et l'impressionisme se servent, en partie, des mêmes formes d'expression." The main difference would seem to lie in the impressionists' negative attitude toward the symbol. The symbol, after all, carries with it the suggestion of meaning; and there is nothing the impressionist dreads more than an epistemological interpretation of the sense data he has assembled. In that sense, Verlaine's Art Poétique may be called a manifesto of poetic i., whereas the poetry of Baudelaire, Mallarmé, and Valéry is more concerned with the intellectual. A similar discrepancy exists between poetic i. and imagism (q.v.); for while the impressionist denies the existence of clearly circumscribed forms, the imagist aims at producing poetry that is "hard and clear, never blurred or indefinite." And whereas the impressionist joyfully immerses himself in the stream of life and consciousness, the imagist, lifting the fleeting impression out of the flux, transforms it into an "emotional and intellectual complex" (Pound). However, since poetic theory is one thing and poetic practice another, we can discover much that is impressionistic in the poetry of the imagists Amy Lowell and John Gould Fletcher. Although the impressionist creed is opposed to the cult of form indulged in by Stefan George and his circle, the early volumes of George's Blätter für die Kunst contain many a statement that conforms with the tenets of genuine Eindruckskunst. And along with Hofmannsthal's Vorfrühling, George's Komm' in den tolgesehenen Park und schau offers the best example of i. in German poetry.

While there is little use in speaking of an impressionistic school of poetry in Fr. or Anglo-Am. literature, German literary historians are unanimous in designating Detlev von Liliencron (1844–1909) as the leader of a school which also includes Richard Dehmel (the naturalistic aspect of his poetry excepted), Max Dauthendey, Gustav Falke, and a number of minor poets. Many of these German impressionists, however, rely all too heavily on the use of onomatopoeia and of slang or dialect. Theirs seems to be a poetry in which the naturalistic technique of imitation has been most radically exploited. In spite of the typographical idiosyncrasies which are embedded in them (notably the consistent use of the so-called Mittelachse), the poems contained in the original version of Arno Holz's Phantasmus come much closer to fulfilling the conditions we have set up for a truly impressionistic poetry.

H. Bahr, Die Überwindung des Naturalismus (1891); R. Hamann, Der Impressionismus in Leben und Kunst (1907); L. Thon, Die Sprache des deutschen I. (1928); A. Burkhard, "The Language of Detlev von Liliencron's Lyrics and Ballads," JEGP, 30 (1931); Ch. Bally et al., El Impressionismo en el Lenguaje (1936); D. W. Schumann, "Detlev von Liliencron," Monatshefte, 36 (1944); R. Moser, L'Impressionisme français (1951); B. J. Gibbs, "I. as a Literary Movement," MLJ, 36 (1952); H. Sommerhalder, Zum Begriff des literarischen Impressionismus (1961). U.W.

IMPRESSIONISTIC CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

IN MEDIAS RES (L. "into the middle of things"). A common way of opening an epic, a drama, or a work of fiction. The author chooses as his beginning some crucial situation in the middle of a series of related events which will begin a chain of incidents and at the same time be the result of preceding ones. Thus he may work forward and backward in time to narrate his story or action. The effect is to arouse the reader's suspense and interest. In his advice to the young poet, Horace in the Ars Poetica 148-150 gives perhaps the locus classicus of this point: "semper ad eventum festinat et in medias res / non secus ac notas auditorem rapit, et quae / desperat tractata nitescere posse relinquat" (Always he [the poet] hastens to the outcome and plunges his hearer into the midst of events as though they were familiar, and what he despairs of treating effectively he abandons). R.A.H.

IN MEMORIAM STANZA. So called from its use in Tennyson's In Memoriam. A stanza of 4 lines of iambic tetrameter, rhyming abba:

I hold it true, whate'er befall;
I feel it when I sorrow most;
'Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all.
(In Memoriam, 27)

Although Tennyson believed he had invented the stanza, it may be found in earlier poetry, notably in that of Ben Jonson (If Beauty be the Mark of Praise), Lord Herbert of Cherbury (Ode upon a Question Moved, whether Love Should Continue for ever). It is true however, that Tennyson exploited the inherent formal capacities of the stanza with a greater mastery than did his predecessors. In particular, he utilized its suitability for successive, mutually independent philosophical observations, each enclosed within its "envelope" of stanzaic pattern, and its possibilities for special emphasis through the rhyme of first and fourth lines. Later uses of the stanza are rare. An interesting example is Oscar Wilde's The Sphinx, in which the stanza is printed as 2 lines.—H. Corson, Primer of Eng. Verse (1892); E. P. Morton, "The Stanza of I. M.," MLN, 21 (1906) and "Poems in the Stanza of I. M.," MLN, 24 (1909); Baum; Hamer.

INCA POETRY. See AMERICAN INDIAN POETRY. SOUTH AMERICA.

INCANTATION (L. "to consecrate with charms or spells"). The use of a formula of words, spoken or chanted, to produce magical effect or charm; more generally, use of magical ceremonies, sorcery, enchantment: "With nigromance he wolde assaile To make his incantacion" (Gower, Confessio Amantis 3.45). Also, the magical spell, usually a poem, itself: "Double, double, toil and trouble . . ." (Shakespeare, Macbeth). Sometimes the term refers to any verses intended to be sung or chanted. Incantation is common in primitive literatures, e.g., Am. Indian, Eskimo, Negro poetry. See also SOUND IN POETRY. R.O.E.

INCREMENTAL REPETITION. A phrase coined by F. B. Gummere to describe a rhetorical device peculiar to Eng. and Scottish folk ballads. In i.r. a line or stanza is repeated several times with some small but material substitution at the same crucial spot. A sequence of such repetition accounts for the entire structure of some few ballads, among them Lord Randal and Edward. More usually, however, i.r. spans a passage of only 3 or 4 stanzas, and it is frequently confined to the lines of a single quatrain, as in the following stanza from Sir Hugh; or, The Jew's Daughter:

Then out and came the thick, thick blood,
Then out and came the thin;
Then out and came the bonny heart's blood,
Where all the life lay in.

Suspense is the principal effect achieved by this device, for with each iteration and its substituted element, tension mounts until the climactic substitution, which resolves the pattern, is reached. Gummere interpreted i.r. as another proof of the choric origins of traditional balladry; he argued that it was a certain test of what was and was not a ballad. More recent ballad theorists, like Louise

Pound and G. H. Gerould, hold that i.r. is generally rhetorical not structural and that it is not a determining characteristic of the orally transmitted traditional ballad.—I.r. is elaborately illustrated throughout F. B. Gummere, The Popular Ballad (1904, 1907), esp. pp. 117-24. For pugnacious crit. of Gummere, see L. Pound, Poetic Origins and the Ballad (1921), pp. 121-35. G. H. Gerould, The Ballad of Tradition (1932), pp. 105-10, arbitrates the dispute.

A.B.F.

INDIAN POETICS. The Vedic Seers, being self-conscious poets, made observations on their art: they spoke of Speech being refined in their intellects, as flour in a sieve, being imparted beauty and fitted into measured lines, even as chiseled pieces of wood into a chariot. The Muse they said chose to yield herself to the elect, even as a wife to her husband. It was in a state of afflatus, a magnification of personality, that they uttered their hymns with which they established rapport with the Gods they adored. The Vedic Seer-poet was called Rishi and Kavi, "Seer" and "Maker," which as the 10th-c. Kashmirian critic Tota explained, emphasized that poetry depended both on vision and expression. The hymn was also called Rasa, "essence or most delectable thing," and the Upanishad said that what was well done and perfect was indeed the most delectable thing (Rasa). Here can be seen the concept of Rasa which later became the core of Ind. aesthetics.

In the epics there is mention of literary qualities like sweetness, beauty, richness of thought, and the power to make the past live through the graphic narrative. The Rāmāyana has a story of its origin in which the epic states that it was emotion (Rasa), pathos in its case, that became poetry.

The earliest and fullest surviving treatise on theory is Bharata's Nāṭya śāstra which deals with dramaturgy in all its aspects and includes topics of poetics, language, meter, figures of speech, literary flaws, stylistic qualities, and above all, the emotions (Rasas) without which, Bharta said, nothing stirred in a drama. The story of a play was minutely analyzed and five elements, stages, and junctures were established for the gradual unfolding of the plot. Similarly, character-types were also studied and ten types of drama were described; but all these were to subserve the main purpose of evoking emotional response. Of emotions, eight or nine were emphasized: Love, Heroism, Pathos, Laughter, and so on. Each Rasa developed from a basic mood which inhered in all human hearts as a permanent instinct and was fed by a number of minor feelings—longing, despondency, envy, etc.—common to more than one mood. When the hero and heroine or the hero and his adversary presented the effects of their emotions, the corresponding emotion in the spectator's heart was stimulated in a pleasurable manner. Bharata stated that the best spectator was one who could enter into the play and feel glad when the character is joyous and sad when he is sorrow-stricken. Bharata defined drama as Imitation, or as his commentator Abhinavagupta explained, as Representation, of men and women in different actions and states of feeling.

Poetics developed out of the theories of Bharata, but the early rhetoricians held that the emotions primarily pertained to drama, and in poetry which was narrative, they could be brought out only indirectly through description. Bhāmaha and Dandin (ca. 700 A.D.), as also Vāmana (ca. 800), defined poetry as Word and Sense in unison and endowed with beauty: this beauty was the result of the choice of proper words and constructions, avoidance of literary flaws, addition of stylistic qualities and figures of sound and sense and emotions. The emotions too, they said, went to embellish only the expression in poetry, and hence these ancient critics who emphasized "Form" could be styled "Expressionists."

But in the beginning of the 9th c. A.D. the idea began to gain ground that emotions were the center of appeal in poems also, and soon there appeared in Kashmir the foremost Ind. aesthete Anandavardhana (9th c.) who unified criticism by taking drama and poetry together and applied to all forms of literary expression—play, poem, lyric, and stray verse—the same principles of analysis and evaluation. Taking his stand on emotion, which he reemphasized as the soul of poetry, he directed his main inquiry to the intriguing question of how this emotion was conveyed by the text of the poem and realized by the reader or spectator. Obviously the express mention of an emotion could not evoke an emotional response. Emotional experience could not be part of the direct meaning of words and sentences, nor of their secondary significance. Between the text and the emotions, the only possible relation is suggestion, manifestation, or revelation—Dhvanī, Vyanjanā, Prakāśa. Suggestion is a unique process and could be employed even in realms where the primary or secondary capacities of words were enough to convey an idea. Even figures could be rendered more attractive by suggestion; in fact, suggestion added a new dimension to speech, and reinforced the power of the limited medium of language. It was by the symbolism of suggestion that even the message of a whole work was conveyed by the poet. Anandavardhana thus emphasized content or emotion as against formal features, style, figures, etc.—all of which he put in a subordinate place. The formal features were to be evaluated as good or bad, not by themselves, but in relation to the emotion which they were to suggest, and this relative value of expression called Auchitya (adaptation or appropriateness) was developed by Kshemendra (11th c.) as a life-giving complement to the principle of emotional suggestiveness.

There was still the moot question: How could the emotion of one, the actor and character, be relished by another, the spectator; for in life, one's emotion produces diverse and disparate reactions among the onlookers. Another eminent Kashmirian critic of the 10th-c., Nāyaka, offered the solution that in poetry the artistic medium generalized or universalized or abstracted the emotion from its contextual references, and this enabled the emotion as such, not as the emotion of a particular person and situation, to touch the corresponding emotion in the spectator's heart. Nāyaka did not accept Suggestion as all-in-all in poetry, though he accepted it as one of the many resources at the command of the poetic genius. He and his younger contemporary Kuntaka emphasized the unique way (kavi-vyāpāra) of the poet's genius as the basic principle in poetry. Comparing poetic expression with law and scripture on one hand, and story and news on the other, Nāyaka said that in the former the letter mattered; in the latter, the substance alone mattered; in poetry the way a thing was said or conveyed was all-in-all.

Abhinavagupta, the outstanding Kashmirian philosopher and critic (ca. A.D. 1000), accepted Nāyaka's theory of universalization (sādhārāṇīkaraṇa) of emotion and pointed out that aesthetic experience was a unique category, unlike any of the known epistemological processes—sense-perception, inference, remembrance, etc. It manifested itself on the presentation of the artistic stimulus which conditioned its duration; it was a cycle which started with the poet and the poem and completed itself in the heart of the connoisseur who had become, by constant literary activity, attuned to the poet and was hence called Sa-hridaya, "one of the same heart." Aesthetic enjoyment is not a joy in any mundane sense, for it is a repose of the heart. It is the equilibrium, the peace and poise of the soul, which is constantly disturbed by worldly preoccupations and which the artistic experience restores for the nonce. Adopting more clearly the view of Self according to Sankara's philosophy, Jagannātha (17th c.) clarified this theory of aesthetic bliss as the manifestation of the inner light and bliss of the Self when the encrustations obscuring it are broken down by the impact of art. He accordingly defined poetry as expression in a verbal medium whose contemplation results in a supramundane blissfulness. This has been the prevailing mode of criticism ever since; but in the 11th c. A.D. the royal polymath, King Bhoja of Dhar, propounded an out-of-the-way theory that the inner sublimated Ego or Self-consciousness or Self-love of men is Rasa or Emotion par excellence and that it is not only the basis of all other namable emotions, but lies at the root of all creative art and higher cultural activity.

The poetic theories of Sanskrit, the figures, styles, and Rasa served as poetic theory for all the Ind. literatures. Rasa, like Dharma, is one of the key-words of Ind. culture, characterizing its aesthetic side. Modern writers of India have used the terms of Eng. criticism, but the more authentic voices like Tagore reemphasized the traditional approach, expressing emphatically their Vedantic orientation, viz., that aesthetic joy is a foretaste of spiritual realization and that all art is thus a spiritual aid (sādhana). At the same time, it may be noted that echoes of the Ind. theories of Suggestion and Rasa are evident in the writings of Western critics like Abercrombie, Richards and Eliot.

R. Tagore, Creative Unity (1925), Sadhana (1926), and Personality (1926); V. Raghavan, The Number of Rasas (1940), Studies on Some Concepts of the Alankara Sastra (1942), Bhoja's Sringara Prakasa (full ed., 1963); "Sanskrit and Prākṛit Metres," and "Sanskrit Drama and Performance," Jour. of the Madras Univ. (Section A., Humanities), 23 (1952-53) and 29 (1957-58); P. J. Chaudhury, "Ind. Poetics," JAAC, 19 (1961); S. K. De, Sanskrit Poetics as a Study of Aesthetic (1963).

V.R.

INDIAN POETRY. SANSKRIT. Ind. poetry represents a continuous and copious literary activity which, in its time-space sweep, comprehends 4,000 years and about a score of cultivated languages of two major linguistic groups, the Indo-Aryan and the Indo-Dravidian. For 3,000 years, it was predominantly Sanskrit literature, with a subsidiary contribution in the earlier popular forms of Sanskrit, viz., Pāli, Prākṛit, and Apabhramśa. The last 1,000 years witnessed the growth of the modern Ind. languages and literatures. A popular devotional and religious literature was the first form for which these regional languages were employed, and along with that adaptations and translations of Sanskrit originals were also produced in them. For higher philosophical and technical literature, the spoken languages looked to Sanskrit which continued to set the norms. To this day, the underlying unity of Ind. literatures is what the common heritage of Sanskrit gives them.

Sanskrit poetry begins with the very first stratum of that language, the Rigveda, a collection of poetic hymns sung by sages in praise of deities worshipped by them. The Vedic poet employed meter with skill, added sound effects and end rhymes and gave brilliant descriptions of his deities, many of whom were personifications of natural phenomena, the Sun, the Dawn, the Wind, etc. The Rigvedic poet revealed in figures of comparison and could give graphic natural descriptions and had a gift for bodying forth abstract speculations in sublime words.

The Veda was thus the foundation of Ind. poetry, not merely of Ind. religion and philosophy. The meters of classical Sanskrit were a direct development from the Vedic. In the Vedas, there are also hymns praising patrons and heroic kings, and dialogues, myths, and legends, and in the later portions there are examples of narrative literature. All these supplied the themes for the later literature, the heroic lays sung by bards from which the next important phase of epic poetry, couched in a more popular language, developed. The following description of dawn from the Rigveda will illustrate vedic style:

adhi pesāmsi vapate nrtūrivā-pornute vaksha usreva barjaham / jyotir visvasmai bhuvanāya krnvati gāvo na vrajam vyushā ā vartamah //

Beauteous forms doth She put on like a danseuse;

Her bosom she maketh bare, like unto the milch-cow its udder;

Extending light to the entire universe,
Like unto cows coming to their pen (doth she come back to the East).

Thus hath Dawn dispelled darkness.

(Rigveda 1.92.4)

The two great epics of India are the Rāmāyana of Vālmīki and the Mahābhārata of Vyāsa, which have been, as it were, the two eyes of the nation; with their characters, they have molded the ideals of the whole nation and in their sway over the peoples and the religious movements they gave birth to, they outgrew their pure literary character. The Rāmāyana in 24,000 couplets and the Mahābhārata in a million couplets, are both composed in the heroic measures śloka (anushtubh) and upajāti. The former shows greater unity of authorship while the latter incorporated into the framework of its main story many ancient lays and edifying dialogues and discourses on ethics or philosophy. Vālmīki, like the Vedic poets, delighted in similes, and among human emotions, he depicted not only the great love of Rāma and Sītā and the poignant suffering undergone by the latter, but also portrayed as leading motifs such emotions as friendship, brotherly love, and, above all, the love of the father for the son. In his hero Rāma, Vālmīki presented an embodiment of truth and righteousness, who could, for the sake of these principles, sacrifice even his dearest. The Rāmāyana has been called the first of poems, Ādi-kāvya, and truly did Vālmīki lay down the path for the later classical poets, in formal features, in the development of the theme, in the portrayal of character and the delineation of emotion.

Vyāsa depicted in his hero Yudhishtira the same ideal of righteousness; his Mahābhārata is the story of the feud and fratricidal war of the cousins Kauravas and Pandavas, through which Vyāsa sought to emphasize the vanity of earthly possessions and the futility of wars on their behalf. Some of the old stories imbedded in this great epic, e.g., of Nala and Damayanti, are superb for their simplicity, grace and pathos; of the many great dialogues and discourses here, that between Lord Krishna and Arjuna on the eve of the battle, the Bhagavad Gītā, has today been translated into every language of the world.

The passage from the natural epic to the shorter artificial epic poem is obscured by the loss of the creations of the early classical poets. The two epics supplied the themes and on them poets wrote the major poetic type called the Mahā-kāvya extending from 8 to 20 cantos, and the major dramatic type, the Nāṭaka in 5 to 10 acts. Side by side with the two epics, the great storehouse of popular stories, fables, and romances, the Bṛihat-kathā (Great Story), served as a source for plays and romances. In poetry, there developed the minor variety of short poem, "centuries of verses" on specific descriptive and reflective themes, the prose romance, storybooks, lyrics, gnomic and didactic writings, historical poems, and a genre called Champū in which prose and verse were mixed. In drama, there were besides the heroic Nāṭaka, the social Prakarana, and the graft-type Nāṭikā, derived from the above two. There were also nine other varieties of which two were more systematically developed, the farce and the monologue of amour; allegorical and philosophical plays, irregular dramatic compositions, and musical ones done with song and dance were also developed, the last-mentioned category deriving inspiration and material from local folk forms also.

Sanskrit poetry and drama set as its aim the presentation and evocation of emotion or Rasa and subordinated character and plot to it. A large variety of striking meters were employed by the poets. Sanskrit language has a rich sonorous music in it and the Sanskrit poet was a past master in making sound echo the sense. In natural descriptions, he was a capable miniature painter. With his Vedantic background he saw the one life pulsating in man, animal, tree, and creeper, and consequently, the integration of man and Nature formed a lining, as it were, to his poetry. In drama, the Sanskrit poet was moved primarily by the ideal of presenting Rasa. The most obvious feature of the Sanskrit drama is its bilingualism, which is part of its realistic features, as also its mixture of prose and verse. Unity of time or place was not insisted upon, but unity of emotional impression was zealously safeguarded. In the main scenes, the dramatist concentrated on the dignified, sweet, and emotional aspects of the story and left the rest to be communicated in the interludes. While tragic complication, opposition, and suspense were duly introduced, tragedy as understood in the Gr. or Western sense was not countenanced, for the Ind. attitude did not accept the eventual triumph of evil and held that the play should show virtue as finally victorious. The plays opened with an informative and suggestive prelude which Goethe borrowed in his Faust.

Exemplifying the above characteristics, there was vast output of classical Sanskrit poems and plays roughly from about 500 B.C. Many of the early specimens are lost and we have more survivals of early drama than of early poetry. In the 3d c. B.C. the Mauryan minister Subandhu wrote a rather out-of-the-way play, emboxing act within act and combining a romance of King Udayana with a court intrigue. After Subandhu, probably, came Bhāsa who wrote many plays marked by simplicity, without allowing their action to be smothered by poetry. The period between 2d c. B.C. and the 4th c. A.D. is one of unsettled literary chronology, but it was the period when the three foremost Sanskrit poets and dramatists flourished, Kālidāsa, Aśvaghosha, and Śūdraka. Aśvaghosha was a Buddhist poet who pioneered in harnessing poetry and drama for the service of his new faith; he wrote two poems and a drama on the Buddha.

Kālidāsa was indeed the finest flower of Ind. culture; he was a supreme aesthete who, at the same time, reflected in his works the well-rounded picture of the Ind. attitude and ideals in life, viz., the balanced pursuit of virtue, gain, enjoyment and, above all, the spiritual emancipation for which he prayed as he laid down his pen at the close of his masterpiece, the Śākuntala. In depicting love, in which he was the unrivaled master, he employed the idea of separation and suffering and introduced the child also, both as means of purifying and stabilizing love into a lasting spiritual union. It is Kālidāsa's harmonizing of the here and the hereafter that made Goethe speak of the union of heaven and earth, of flower and fruit, in the Śākuntala. His style is marked by grace, economy, and suggestiveness. Like the Vedic poets and Valmiki, he is celebrated for his similes. Kālidāsa wrote four poems and three plays. In an early effort of his, the Ritusamhāra (Cycle of Seasons), he sang of the six seasons of the year as a descriptive poem and a love lyric. In a second short poem, the Meghadūta (Cloud Messenger), a separated lover sends a love message to his far-off beloved through a floating cloud. This lyric is the best tribute to Kālidāsa's originality, inventive skill, and richness of imagination, and the spell which it cast resulted in numberless imitations. The Raghuvamśa (The Line of Raghu), on the kings of the Solar dynasty (among whom is God incarnated as Rama), is his longest poem. It is in 19 cantos and reflects all the sides of the poet's mind.

In a shorter poem of 8 cantos, the Kumārasambhava (Birth of the (War-Lord) Kumāra), the poet depicts the Father and Mother of the Universe, Siva and Devi, yearning in penance for each other, and thereby gives expression in a unique way to his ideal of sublime love. The poet wrote three plays also: The Mālavikāgnimitra (Mālavikā and Agni-mitra) is a romance in the harem of King Agnimitra of the Sunga dynasty, full of plot interest and attractive motifs of dance, painting, etc. In his second play, the Vikramorvaśīya (Urvashi attained by valor), the poet shows the influence of Nature on a love-lorn heart. Here as well as in his last testament, the dramatic masterpiece Śākuntala, the poet introduces separation to chasten love and the child to fasten the tie of love into an inseparable unity. After Kalidasa, all dramas, Nāṭikās or Nāṭakas, follow the Mālavikāgnimitra or the Śākuntala.

If the Śākuntala is the outstanding specimen of an idealistic play, the Mricchakatika (Little Clay cart) of Śūdraka is the foremost Ind. achievement in the field of social play. The social play called Prakarana holds up the mirror, as it were, to life and features characters drawn from the common classes; it assigns greater place to suffering and tragic developments. Śūdraka brings out the possibilities of this type to the utmost in his production, the most stage-worthy of ancient Ind. plays and most interesting to a modern audience because of the variety of its interest, story, characterization, and humor.

Kālidāsa was followed by two important poets who produced the artificial epic with success: Bhāravi, author of the Kirātārjunīya (Siva as a Hunter and Arjuna), and Magha, author of the Śiśupālavadha (killing of Śiśupāla); both poets had undoubted poetic gifts, and have left some exquisite passages on love and life and descriptions of Nature; but with them started the tendency to overload the poem with longer and longer descriptive digressions, the introduction of learned ideas and the display of the skill of the poet in composing difficult verses involving pictorial designs. Even gifted writers allowed themselves to be smothered under these learned and recondite displays; they began packing two themes in one poem by sustained double entendre, and composing poems illustrative of rules of grammar or different continued sound effects or pictorial designs.

While such undesirable developments were taking place in the form of the artificial epic, there were some healthy departures in its theme. The historical poem dealt with a contemporary king or line of kings. The outstanding example of this is the River of Kings (Rāja-tarangini), valuable for the history of Kashmir. Historical poems arose on almost all the local dynasties from about the 11th c. A.D., but these generally had romantic and poetic effusions which reduced their historical value.

Classical Sanskrit prose literature is dominated by Subandhu and two outstanding masters, Bāna (7th c. A.D.) and Dandin (ca. A.D. 700). The earlier specimens are lost. Bāna wrote a romantic story in prose called Kādambarī in which two pairs of lovers pass through more than one birth and gain each other, and the Harshacharita in which he told the stories of himself and his royal patron, King Harshavardhana of Kanauj. Encyclopaedic in his knowledge, Bāna is also a master of the sheer music of words which makes his prose an endless delight to the sensitive Ind. reader. Dandin, who was equally encyclopaedic in his knowledge, adopted a style of simplicity and grace; his Story of the Ten Princes (Daśakumāra-charita) is realistic and holds up the mirror to life, particularly of the underworld.

When prose and verse had been fully exploited, poets evolved the new form called Champū, mixing prose and verse, in which they dealt with the traditional themes. A theme innovation was wrought in this type by an 18th-c. South Ind. poet who presented in his Viśvagunādarśa (Mirror of the Characteristics of the Universe), the pros and cons of everything through two reviewers of the world, an admirer and an unsparing critic.

The new lines of development were now mostly in the shorter poem and reflective writing, collections of stray observations or minor poems on a single topic, lyrics, didactic writings, etc. The most celebrated collection of this type is that of the three centuries of verses on proper conduct, love, and dispassion by Bhartrihari, reputed to be a royal writer and philosopher; many centuries of verses on these three topics arose later, for example, "on proper conduct," the 120 verses ascribed to Sundarapandya is an excellent collection on wisdom; "on love," the century of Amaruka is easily the best in the whole field of Sanskrit. Lyrical poetry in Sanskrit has two gems, the Cloud Messenger (Meghadūta) of Kālidāsa already mentioned, and the dramatic poem called Gitagovinda (Song of Lord Govinda) on the love of Krishna and Rādhā, composed by Jayadeva (ca. A.D. 1200), which like the former is originally conceived and endlessly imitated; also the same musico-dramatic poem served as a model for music and dance-drama compositions and traditions in all parts of India. Lyric poetry comprises also a vast amount of prayers, praises, and psalms by poets, religious teachers, and philosophers. Among the many collections of verses of reflective, didactic, and moral value to which the compact expression possible in Sanskrit lent itself admirably, the Anyāpadeśa is a class giving criticisms of life and reflections on men and their virtues or vices through praise or blame of animals, birds, etc.; two effective performances in this category are the "centuries" of the Kashmirian Bhallata (9th c. A.D.) and the South Ind. Nilakantha Dikshita (17th c. A.D.); the latter had indeed a flair for satire and wit and gave other minor poems of direct criticism of professional quacks, cheats, pests, parasites, poetasters, etc. (the Kalividambana and the Sabhārjanā); but before Kshemendra (11th c.) had pioneered in the line of satires with many a minor poem of his.

One of the most significant branches of Sanskrit literature which had gained for India world-wide celebrity in ancient times is animal-fable literature, Panchatantra (The Five Expeditors) and Hitopadesa (The Salutary Advice) (prose and verse), to which all the animal fables of the world can ultimately be traced. In the category of stories, a number of works were produced but the most important of these is the old store-house of stories, the Bṛihatkaṭhā, originally written in the Paisachi dialect, but now available in three later Sanskrit versions.

The field of drama had some distinguished names to succeed to Kālidāsa and Śūdraka. King Harshavardhana of Kanauj (7th c.) wrote three plays of which Nāgānanda (The Joy of the Serpents) is on the unique theme of the hero sacrificing his life to save the serpents from annihilation. In the same age, South India could also boast of a royal dramatist in Mahendravarma Pallava of Kāंची who produced two brilliant farces, in one of which he made use of the yogic feat of entering another's body to make a courtesan talk Sāmkhya philosophy and an ascetic coquette with his pupil. Bhavabhūti (ca. A.D. 700) attempted both the social and the heroic, but his success lay in the latter, where he was acclaimed as a master of pathos for his play on the Later life of Rama and the abandonment of Sitā; Bhavabhūti's expression reveled in profusion, and like Bāna, he was master of the music of Sanskrit. Viśākhadatta, member of a royal house (8th c. A.D.), produced two masterly creations in political drama: the Mudrārākṣha (Rakṣha secured through the Signet Ring) on the Mauryan emperor Chandra-gupta and his famous minister Kautilya-Chānakya, the author of the great treatise on polity, the Artha Śāstra; and the Devī-Chandraguṇa (The Queen and Chandraguṇa) on the inside story of the greatest ancient Ind. monarch Chandra-gupta II Vikramaditya of the Gupta dynasty. Among the smaller plays, the monologue of amour, like the farce, afforded scope for satire and humor; four early specimens of this class, published under the title Chatur-bhānī (the Four Bhanas), and numerous good specimens produced in the South in the 18th-19th c. are known. Among the lost dramatic masterpieces is a precious social play Pushpadūshitaka in which the playwright depicts the suffering of a virtuous housewife, the purity of whose character had been, on circumstantial grounds, impugned. New ground was cut in drama when the logician-poet of Kashmir (9th c.) produced his play on the different schools of philosophy disputing among themselves. Already Asva-ghoṣa had produced centuries previously a Buddhist play with allegorical characters. Krishna Miśra (11th c.) was the author who perfected the allegorical play for the advaita school of philosophy and this type was later imitated by poet-protagonists of different schools of philosophy and religion, and even of the science of medicine and the planets.

In the different categories described above, a voluminous output of poems and plays and shorter literary pieces continued to appear down the centuries. The countless poets included over thirty women poets. The Muslim period even saw some translations from Persian and some cultivation of Sanskrit and literary creation in it by Muslims. With the advent of the British and the contact with Western literature, Sanskrit began to adopt some Western trends: minor poems, easy straightforward prose, both narrative and expository, short stories, novels, plays, biographies, satires, and similar new forms. The Ind. Independence movement inspired many minor poems, as also longer poems and prose works on the political leaders, Gandhi, Tilak etc. Sanskrit which is one of the languages enumerated in the Constitution of Free India continues today to be used for poetic and dramatic creations and the present writer himself recently received a title for a long Sanskrit poem of his on the life of a celebrated musician-saint of South India.

PRĀKRITS. Of the early Prākṛits or popular forms of Sanskrit, the dialect called Mahārāṣṭri in the Dekkan was cultivated for poetry and the earliest literature in this is an anthology, the Gāthā-Saptasatī, 700 love lyrics and stray descriptive verses put together by King Hāla Sātavāhana of the 2d or 3d c. A.D. Two other similar collections are the Vajjālagga and Gāthakośa. These Prākṛit verses are examples of sweet diction, fine feeling and exquisite cameos of rural life, and on the subject of love, formed the sources on which later lyricists drew. On the romance of King Hāla himself, there is a beautiful story-poem in Prākṛit verses called Lilāvati. In Prākṛit medium, replicas of the Sanskrit artificial epics were also produced, the best example of which is Pravarasena's Setubandha (The Building of the Causeway). In drama where Prākṛit was always used, a type wholly in Prākṛit called the Sattaka was developed later. The Jains produced some voluminous and valuable religious works in Prākṛits, e.g., Kuvalaya-mālā (8th c.).

In Apabhraṃśa, which was the next popular linguistic development, works on the model of the Sanskrit and Prākṛit poems grew and Jains especially contributed much to this literature. Out of the Apabhraṃśa, the modern Indo-Aryan vernaculars of the North started growing from the 11th c. A.D. onward: Marathi in the South, Kashmiri, Panjabi, Rajasthani, Sindhi and Gujarati in the North and West, different Hindi dialects in the middle, and Assamese, Bengali, Bihari and Oriya in the East. The cultivated languages of the South, Tamil, Telugu, Kannada and Malayalam belong to the Dravidian family and have an old literature, particularly Tamil.

The literary efforts in all these languages took the form of translations and adaptations of Sanskrit or original productions on themes from Sanskrit; the literature of these is thus an extension of Sanskrit. There is none among these languages which does not have its own Rāmāyana and Mahābhārata or works based on them; in fact, some of the vernacular Rāmāyanas command as great a devotion as the Sanskrit original, e.g., the Rāmāyana of Kambhar in Tamil and of Tulasidās in Hindi (Avadhi). The literature in all these languages underwent a uniform revolution on the impact of Western contact: first new forms of poetry and plays on Western models arose in all the literatures. Blank verse, sonnets and short lyrical poems were introduced. Then new ideas of social reform influenced writings; social plays, humorous skits and satires arose. With the rise of nationalism and the freedom struggle, patriotism became an inspiration and there was a rediscovery of the past and the country's soul; the egalitarian political ideologies sweeping the West swayed India also, and among younger writers a new kind of progressive writing before whose iconoclasm traditional patterns and old ideals have been crumbling has been manifesting itself. This is, however, a recent trend and it is too early to assess all this seething contemporary literary activity or to predict whether an authentic and characteristic Ind. harmony will emerge from it. Of forms, the short story has become extremely popular; the novel comes next. In poetry and drama, the former has fared better, though great poetry cannot be said to be plentiful. Drama which faced a paralysis before the cinema, is being nursed now by the radio and academies and may recover.

MODERN INDO-ARYAN

MARATHI. Marathi literature begins with the religious and philosophic writings of saints and adherents of different sects and cults. The leading saint-poets of Mahārāshtra whose influence is somewhat pan-Indian, are Jñāneshvar (1271-96), Nāmdēv (1270-1350), Ēkanāth (16th c.), Tukhārām (1608-49) and Rāmdās (1608-81). Among poets of this class were many drawn from the lowest strata of the society. These authors brought the Sanskrit classics, chiefly Bhāgavata and Gītā to the Marathi masses. Mukteshvar, grandson of Ēkanāth, rendered the Mahābhārata. The political victories of the Marathas in the 17th and 18th c. gave rise to the heroic ballads called Powadā. Side by side with these developed the love lyric called Lāvanī. In the modern age, Mahārāshtra had been, like Bengal, in the forefront of several socio-political and literary movements. The modern Marathi stage had a rapid growth from the last quarter of the 19th c. After a period of musical vernacular adaptations of Sanskrit plays, Shakespeare was studied and plays on contemporary social themes were produced. Minor poems, lyrics, rural poetry, children's poetry, all arose in due course and mention may be made here of Keshavasut, N. W. Tilak, Vinayak, R. G. Gadkari, Balkavi, Muralidhar Gupte and, among the more recent, Y. D. Pendharkar (Yeshwant), S. K. Kanetkar (Gireesh), M. T. Patwardhan (Madhav-Julian), A. R. Deshpande (Anil) and V. V. Shirwadkar (Kusumagraj).

GUJARATI. The Jain monk and Sanskrit polymath Hemachandra Sūri (1089-1173) is the founder of modern Gujarati. Among the early authors in this tongue are the Vaishnavite saints, mystics, and preachers among whom are the Princess Mira (1403-70) and Narasimha Mehta (1415-81) whose songs are sung all over India; others of this type are Akho, the goldsmith (1615-75), Premanand (1636-1734) and Dayaram (1767-1852). The modern period was ushered in by the scholars and poets Dalpatram (1820-98) and Narmadasankar (1833-86). Among Parsis who contributed to the growth of modern Gujarati poetry are B. M. Malabari and A. F. Khabardar. Nanalal, poet laureate of Gujarat, has been a prolific poet, and equally prolific has been, despite his political and organizational preoccupations, K. M. Munshi (born 1892), the author of many dramas. The modern Gujarati stage has developed forms like dramatic dialogues styled Nāṭya Rūpak and ballets or Nritya Rūpak in songs with prose links. Among other poets and playwrights are to be noted Sursinghi, chief of Lathi State, B. K. Thakore, R. V. Desai, Umashankar Joshi, Sundaram, Sundarji Betai, Batubhai Umarwadia, Yashwant Pandya, Pranjivan Pathak, Gulabdas Broker, Jayanti Dalal, and Chunilal Madia. Gujarat which gave to India Gandhi and some of his ablest lieutenants has perhaps been most successful in modern Gujarat prose, criticism, biography, journalism, etc.

PANJABI. Panjabi literature comes into prominence with the rise of the Sikh religion in the latter part of the 15th c. The most important and basic Panjabi literature is the collection of the religious and didactic teachings in the form of songs which the founder of Sikhism, Nanak, and his successors sang and which have been collected in the Adi-Granth (The First Book) and its supplements. The Muslims of the Panjab developed their own sectarian literature in Panjabi and the Sufis made significant contribution to Panjabi poetry. A popular ballad poetry also existed. Real modern Panjabi literature started growing only with the present century and the study of Panjabi in schools and colleges. Among modern poets are Vir Singh and Puran Singh, and of playwrights are to be noted I. C. Nanda, Gurbaksh Singh, and Kirpa Sagar. Younger writers today include some leftists.

KASHMIRI. The earliest phase of the rather meagre literature of Kashmiri is represented by the verses of the Saivite lady-mystic Lalla Devi. Lalla Devi was followed by Noor-ud-Din, a didactic poet. Then came the age of love-lyrics, some of which were mystic and some contributed by women like the famous peasant girl who became a Queen, Haba Khatoon (16th c.), and Arnimal (18th c.) of sad fate. Kashmiri has its quota of poetic renderings or versions of the old Sanskrit epics and myths done in the 19th c., e.g., the Rāmāyana of Prakasa Ram, the Sivalagan, the Sudāmacharita, etc., of Paramanand. The blend of Persian culture in Kashmiri brought Persian themes, meters, and forms, as also some Muslim writers of Kashmiri. Dance-songs and folk forms were also taken up for fresh literary developments. New life was infused into Kashmiri writing only very recently, and about the beginning of the present century new types of modern Kashmiri writings arose. The new political, social, and economic movements gave a fresh direction to authors: Ghulam Ahmed Mahjur is a pioneer in this line; Zinda Kaul is a lyricist; Nadim, Roshan, Rahi and Premi are contemporary poets who have stood for Kashmiri against outside political aggression or interference. The effort in drama has been meager.

HINDI. Hindi or Khariboli, the federal language of India to be, is a recent development, its precursors being a number of dialects: Rajasthani, in which there was bardic poetry; Brajabhasha, the medium of expression for Krishna-devotion; Avadhi, the language of Rāma-devotion; and Bhojpuri, in which the Hindu-Muslim eclectic preacher Kabir (1399-1518) sang his numerous songs. The fervent devotional movements centering round Rāma and Krishna produced in the 16th c. the foremost poets and singers: Tulasidas, author of the Rāmāyana which has usurped the place of the Sanskrit original in the whole of the Hindi-speaking area and Sūrdās of Agra (1483-1563), the blind singer on Krishna. Bihārīlāl (1603-63) wrote 700 couplets (Satsai) of fine poetry on Rādhā-Krishna love. Malik Muhammad Jayasi (ca. 1540) composed the masterpiece of a historical poem in his Padmāvat. The Mughal period saw the rise of Muslim writers in Hindi, some of whom were devoted to Hindu deities, e.g., Abdul Rahim Khankhana, Raskhan, Kabir Mubarak, and Usman. New trends began to show with the beginning of the 19th c., and the pioneering stage is dominated by the prolific and versatile Bhāratendu Hariśchandra (1850-83), author of 175 works, including 18 plays and 1,500 lyrics. The new Hindi writing was successively under the influence of the movements Chāyā-vāda (or romanticism), Prayoga-vāda (or experimentalism), and Pragati-vāda (or progressivism and leftism). There is also a school of writers of rural poetry. Jaysankar Prasad (1889-1937), Sumitranandan Pant (b. 1901), "Nirala" Suryakant Tripathi (1896-1961) and Mahadevi Varma (b. 1907) have been reflective and mystically inclined. Maithilisan Gupta (b. 1886), Makhnāl Chaturvedi (b. 1889), Siyaramasaran Gupta (1895-1963), and Subhadra Kumari Chauhan (1904-48) have been ardent nationalistic poets. The writings of Tara Pande, Ramesvari Devi, and Hridayesa have a pessimistic tone. Harivamsa Rai (b. 1907) and Girijakumar Mathur have been in the romantic camp and Balakrishna Rao is noted for his sonnets. Others among the old and the young who must be mentioned are: Mahavir Prasad Dvivedi (1868-1938), Balakrishna Sharma Navin (1897-1960), "Dinkar" Ramdhari Sinha (b. 1908), "Suman" Sivamangal Singh (b. 1916), a progressivist, Narendra Sarma (b. 1916), and Bhagavati Charan Varma (b. 1903). In drama, Bhāratendu was followed by Lakshminarayan Misra (b. 1903), Ram Kumar Varma (b. 1905), Upendranath Ashk (b. 1910-), Uday Sankar Bhatta, and others, and these have produced all types of plays, romantic productions, historical pieces, social plays, satires, farces, etc.

URDU. Urdu language and literature, like Muslim architecture, is one of the cultural products of Indo-Islamic contact on the soil of India. If the increase of the Persian element produced Hindustani, further Persianization and use of Arabic script gave rise to Urdu. It is used both in the North and the Dekkan. Urdu is mostly poetical in its literary output. The greater of the early Urdu poets of the Dekkan and the Northern Muslim courts are Nusrati, Shamsuddin Waliullah, Qadī Mahmud Bahri, Mirza Janijanan Mazhar, Mir Taqī Mir, Mir Dard, Ghulam Hamdani Mushafi, Wali Muhammad Nazir, Haidar Ali Atish, Imam Baksh Nasikh, Anis and Salamat. The 1857 upheaval ushered in the modern phase of Urdu; Azad and Hali were the pioneers in this new movement; its greatest figures were Ghalib and Iqbal. There are several leading contemporary Urdu poets, e.g., Hasrat Mohani, Fani, Ashgar, Jigar; there are other Urdu poets who show Hindi influences and reflect fully the composite Indo-Islamic culture. The political and ideological revolutions have had their effect on Urdu also, which has its own group of iconoclastic writers. In drama, curiously, it was the Urdu Indra Sabha and the Urdu playwrights employed by the Parsi Theatrical Co. that led to an all-India theatre-enthusiasm; but modern Urdu has expressed itself very meagrely in the drama.

MAITHILI. Very close to Bengali is Maithili, still struggling for public and scholarly recognition of its separateness. The most famous name among the early makers of Maithili is Vidyapati whose devotional love lyrics spread far and wide. There was a Maithili song-drama which mixed Maithili and Sanskrit, the best known specimen of which is the Pārijātaharana (The Taking of the Pārijāta Tree from Heaven) of Umāpati. In the 19th c. the versatile Chanda Jha produced the Maithili version of the Rāmāyana; the major and minor poem-types of Sanskrit were imitated in Maithili by several poets. Among modern writers of verse, the most noteworthy is Sitarama Jha. Of younger ones, Ishanatha Jha is a poet and playwright and Jivanatha Jha, Kashikanta Misra and several others are contributing to modern Maithili poetry. In drama, Jivana Jha broke new ground by eschewing Sanskrit bilingualism and by taking to social themes. The humorous one-act play is very popular.

BENGALI. Bengal led modern India in several fields and its greatest writer in modern times, Rabindranath Tagore, was an inspiration for all India. The most prominent among the early Bengali productions are the devotional lyrics of Chandidas (14th-15th c. A.D.). In epic, Krittivas gave the Rāmāyana in Bengali (A.D. 1420), Maladhar Basu (1473-80) and Raghunātha (16th c.) the Bhāgavata, and Kāvindra, Srikara Nandi (ca. 1500) and Kasirama (17th c.) the Mahābhārata. In the devotional field the appearance of Chaitanyadev (1483-1534) created new inspiration, both within Bengal and without. The Muslim contact gave a noteworthy group of Muslim writers who also rendered Hindi and Persian works into Bengali. The modern post-Eng. phase of Bengali starts with Michael Madhusudan Datta and Bankim Chandra Chatterji, the latter the creator of the immortal song on Mother India Vande Mātaram, which inspired the country in the freedom struggle. Among the earlier modern Bengali poets are Rangalal Banerji (1827-87), Viharilal Chakravarti (1835-94), and Navin Chandra Sen (1847-1909). The earlier dramatists are Dinabandhu Mitra (1830-73), Rajkrishna Roy (1852-95), Amritalal Bose (1853-1929), and the greatest and most prolific of them all: Girish Chandra Ghosh (1844-1911), author of about 90 plays. The next age of Bengali literature is dominated by the greatest, most versatile and prolific of modern writers, poet Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941), whose securing of the Nobel Prize for literature (1913) brought modern Ind. literature to the notice of the world. Tagore has left his mark on new India as one of the architects of cultural renaissance, and his song on Mother India Janagana is today the official National Anthem. Besides Tagore, there have been in his period a number of important poets and playwrights: Devendranath Sen, Akshaya Kumar Baral, Rajani Kanta Sen, Mrs. Kamini Ray, Satyendranath Datta, Dvijendralal Ray (best known among these), Kshirod Chandra Vidyavinod (author of about 50 plays), and Atul Prasad Sen (lyricist). Nazrul Islam, Jibanananda Das, Premendra Mitra, and Buddhadev Bose are three progressive writers.

ASSAMESE. Creative work opens in Assamese at the end of the 13th c. with the artificial epic poems on the Sanskrit model and on the mythological themes by Hema Sarasvati, Harihar, and Kaviratna, followed by translations of the Rāmāyana and the Mahābhārata by Mādhava Kandali (11th c.) and Rāma Sarasvati, and the Bhāgavata and Gītā by Bhattadeva. Fresh impetus to devotional literature centering round Krishna was given by the Vaishnava movement among the masses in the 15th-16th c. and the greatest saint of this school, Śankaradev, and his pupils produced, besides translations and original poems, songs called Borgits and devotional dance-drama compositions called Ankiya Nats. The pioneering Eng.-educated modernist in Assamese literature was Hemchandra Barua (1835-96), a scholar and playwright. Lakshmināth Bezbarua (1868-1938) is the foremost figure among modern Assamese poets and dramatists. Chandrakumar Agarwalla is a lyricist; Kamalakanta Bhat-tacharya, a fervent nationalist; Hiteswar Barbarua, historically inclined; Raghunath Ghoudhuri, a Nature-poet; the lady Nalinibala Devi, mystical; and Sarat Chandra Goswami (1886-1944), a realist. Hem Barua is a progressive. Gunabhiram Barua, Padmanath Gohain Barua, Chandradhar Barua, Nakul Chandra Bhuyan, Prasannal Choudhury, Daibachandra Talukdar, Chandrakanta Pukan, and Surendranath Saikia may also be mentioned.

ORIYA. The Oriya Mahābhārata was produced by Sarala Das (14th c.), the Oriya Rāmāyana by Balarama Das and the Oriya Bhāgavata by Jagannath Das. Oriya versions of other Sanskrit mythological works followed. Sanskrit devotional adaptations went on till 1700. Upendra Bhanja was the most accomplished composer of difficult and highly artificial types of verses. The next phase was a series of devotional and religious works chiefly on Krishna-worship. In the British period, Ramashankar Roy and Radhanath pioneered in blank verse. Fakirmohan Senapati (1843-1918) was both prolific and versatile; Gopabandhu Das combined literary work with constructive activity. In drama fresh interest was infused into traditional dance-drama, and original plays were produced by Ramashankar Roy, Kamapala Misra, Vikaricharan Patnaik, Govinda Surdeo, Asvini Kumar Ghosh, and Kalicharan Patnaik. There was also a group of writers who took inspiration from Tagore of the neighboring Bengal which has always exerted literary and cultural influence on Orissa. Orissa too is having its quota of Freudian and Marxian writings today.

INDO-DRAVIDIAN

TAMIL. Of the Indo-Dravidian languages, Tamil possesses the oldest literature. As in the case of Sanskrit, the earliest literature in Tamil has been collected and preserved in anthologies. The Sangam works, the oldest corpus of Tamil poetry, whose date comes up to about A.D. 300, reveals over 500 poets, some of whom are women, e.g., Avvaiyār, the great moralist. The corpus comprises 8 anthologies, 10 idylls, and 18 didactic works bearing medical metaphorical names. The early anthologies and works of this corpus contain verses and short and long poems on love and war, glimpses of rural and social life and customs, moral maxims, proverbs, praises of the Tamil kings, Pallavas, Cholas, Pandyas, and Cheras, and their exploits and liberality, devotion to different deities, description of cities and ports and Tamil trade, which had overseas connections from early times. Special mention must be made of two works in the didactic collection, the Tirukkural of Tiruvalluvar and the Four Hundred Quatrains called Nāḍiḍyār. The former is a marvel of brevity and a tabloid of wisdom. It deals with virtue, spirituality, material welfare, and love and has been widely translated. Tamil language received elements from Munda and Sanskrit. The Sanskrit epics Rāmāyana and Mahābhārata had begun to appear in Tamil even in the earliest period. Like Sanskrit, Tamil also has five major *kāvya*s or artificial epics of which the best in the Lay of the Anklet (Chilappatikāram), the sad story of the chaste wife Kannaki who was later deified. As in Kannada, in Tamil too, the Jains made copious contributions. The next stage of Tamil is the reaction against Buddhism and Jainism which had spread in the South. In the 6th, 7th, and 8th c., a line of saints and devotees of Siva and Vishnu, Nāyanārs and Ālvārs, arose who, with their soul-stirring songs set to music, made Tamil country the spring-board of Hindu revival. The sweet and appealing quality of Tamil is best enjoyed in Tamil hymnology. In the great days of the Imperial Cholas (10th to 13th c.), there were important poets in Tamil, Kambar, Jayankondār, Ottakkūttar, and Puhālēndi, but the greatest of all these is Kambar (12th c.), author of the Tamil Rāmāyana, expounded and listened to with as much devotion as the Sanskrit original of Vālmiki. Modern Tamil starts with the arrival of European missionaries two of whom, De Nobili and Fr. Beschi, naturalized themselves as native teachers and wrote Tamil works and poems. New trends started in Tamil too with the establishment of modern universities and contact with Eng. literature. It was not till the Freedom Movement, however, that the Tamils got their great modern poet, Subrahmanya Bharati, author of India's finest patriotic poetry. Bharati is the only genuine and considerable poet of modern Tamil, but in his wake there have been talented followers: S. D. S. Yogi, Surabhi, Desiga Vinayakam Pillai, and Namakkal Ramalingam Pillai. The chief characteristics of modern Tamil are its simplicity of diction, patriotic feeling and zeal for social equality. As elsewhere these trends have led Tamil into leftism. Tamil has a good heritage of music, dance and dance-drama. The devotional song-poems of Gopalakrishna Bharati, couched in popular Tamil, are the most outstanding of this class in modern times. Tamil drama started with the Manonmaniyam of Sundaram Pillai and the efforts of Suryanarayana Sastri. P. Sambandha Mudaliar, the doyen of the amateur stage, has written countless plays, translations from Sanskrit and Eng., and also original ones. Tamil genius is effective in the satirical social drama; and the Tamil stage now can boast of a number of enjoyable social hits.

TELUGU. Telugu poetry on a large scale starts with Nannayya (11th c.). He, Tikkana (13th c.) and Yerrapragada (14th c.), produced the Telugu Mahābhārata. Several poets did the Rāmāyana into Telugu. Potana's Telugu Bhāgavata (15th c.) rises to the heights of the Sanskrit original. Other Sanskrit philosophical classics and mythological works were also rendered into Telugu. Saivism inspired Somnatha, who produced two substantial and erudite poems. Nonreligious Sanskrit works also attracted the attention of the Telugu poets: the prose romance of Dandin, the Ten Princes, was adapted by Katana, and the most accomplished of Telugu poets śrīnātha produced his masterly poem, the Telugu Naishadhiya Charita (Story of the king of Nishadha, Nala) and his patriotic poem on the heroes of Palnad. The Vijayanagar empire (14th to 17th c.) greatly stimulated the Sanskrit and Telugu renaissance, and the great king of this line, Krishnadevaraya, had eight poets as the eight pillars of his court. As in Malayalam, so in Telugu, this age developed the type called Prabandha, mixing prose and verse on the Sanskrit Champu model, and dealt with all kinds of stories in this medium. The Sanskrit Śataka or century of verses on themes like love, devotion, ethics, etc., was developed on a large scale in Telugu. The Sanskrit saturation of Telugu diction can be compared only with that of Malayalam. Telugu has also been the favorite medium of South Indian music and dance, the best of which was developed more in the heart of the Tamil country, Tanjore.

K. Veeresalingam Pantulu inaugurated modern Telugu poetry, drama, prose, etc. Vedam Venkataraya Sastri was a similar all-round genius of prodigious accomplishment. On themes of social reform, modern plays were produced by Ch. Lakshminarasimhan, G. Appa Rao, and Bellary Krishnamacharlu. Inspired by Eng. minor poems and the renaissance in Bengali, a new movement of Bhāva-kavitva or lyric was started, and B. Appa Rao, A. Bapu Raju, Tirupati Venkata Kavulu, R. Subba Rao, D. V. Krishna Sastri, V. Satyanarayana and D. Rami Reddi took part. The motif and song-medium of simple rustic folk were employed by some of these writers with great success. Among contemporary playwrights are Justice P. V. Rajamannar and Narla Venkatesvara Rao. As in other regions, in Telugu also there has been a swinging of the pendulum to right and left; if realists have rebelled, a school of neo-classicists has also arisen in Telugu and has done well indeed.

KANNADA. Jains pioneered in making Kannada literature in its earliest stages. Kannada versions and adaptations of the Sanskrit epics, mythological literature and classical works started; the Champu or Prabandha form, mixing prose and verse, was favored here also. Pampa, Ponna, and Ranna of the 10th c. brought the Mahābhārata and the Rāmāyana into Kannada. The immortal Sanskrit prose-romance Kādambarī was done into Kannada by Nāgavarman at the end of the same century. There was then a swing toward simplicity, native meters, and a fresh approach to the masses, partly inspired by the Vira Saiva movement. Along with it, the Vaishnava movement of the Haridāsas approached the masses through music and song in homely language. The patronage of the Vijayanagar kingdom introduced a fresh classicism and return to Sanskrit sources, especially by Kumāra Vyāsa and Kumāra Vālmiki. In drama, the traditional dance-drama called Yakshagāna achieved its greatest successes in the 18th and 19th c. Modern Kannada literature has been made by the trinity, B. M. Srikanthayya, D. V. Gundappa, and Masti Venkatesa Ayyangar, whose works enriched poetry, drama, story, etc. Other poets at the present day are Govinda Pai, Bendre, K. V. Puttappa, V. Sitaramiah, P. T. N. Rajaratnam, Mugali, Madhura Chenna, K. Narasimhaswami, Adiga, Sridhara, Vinayaka, etc., who have tried every modern form of poetry. The new drama, especially with social themes, developed in the hands of Huylgol, Kerur, T. P. Kailasam, Adya, and Gokak.

MALAYALAM. Evidence of Malayalam as distinct from Tamil appears in the 9th c. A.D., but the influence of Tamil continued up to the 14th c., in works like the Rāmacharitam and the Mahābhārata songs. Soon the influence of the highly learned Nampūtiri Brahmans Sanskritized the language and its literary forms. Malayalam is the most highly Sanskritized Ind. language and has a regular genre of its literature called Manipravala, an euphonically and rhetorically perfected Sanskrit-Malayalam bilingual form. The outstanding Malayalam poet is Tunchattu Ezhuttacchan (15th c.) who gave in Malayalam measures called Kilippāttu (Parrot's song), versions of the Sanskrit epics Mahābhārata and the Adhyātma-Rāmāyana. Kerala, the land of this literature, is famous today for its national art of dance-drama called Kathakali for which a corpus of song-plays on mythological stories was produced from the 17th c. onward. A second popular dance-drama form called Ottan-Tullal was introduced by Kunchan Nampyar (18th c.) who made this a humorous and satirical medium of public criticism and moral edification. With the impact of Eng. education, Malayalam also entered on its modern phase and can today boast of a literary renaissance of all-round richness including classical authors (e.g. Ulloor Paramesvara Aiyar), romantic and lyrical authors (e.g. Kumaran Asan, Vallathol, G. Sankara Kurup, Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, Vailoppalli Sridhara Menon, Pala Narayanan Nair), progressive writers and dramatists (E. V. Krishna Pillai, C. J. Thomas, M. Govindan).

INDO-ANGLIAN. Among the non-Eng. speaking countries, India is unique for its cultivation of the King's or Queen's Eng. with industry and care. Like Sanskrit in the past, Eng. has been in the last century and a half the common medium of communication for all India, and a medium of expression of all aspirations. Though the political slavery of India prevented Ind. Eng. from attaining any distinct recognition, some Indian speakers like V. S. Srinivasa Sastri and writers like Sarojini Naidu and Nehru have drawn the admiration and praise of Englishmen for the correctness and charm of their Eng. Eng. has developed in India in journalism, essay, exposition, short story, and the novel; but the output in poetry has also been considerable. The more successful among the early Ind. writers of Eng. verse came from Bengal: Michael Madhusudan Dutta (d. 1875), the lady Toru Dutt (1856-77) (A Sheaf Gleaned in French Fields, Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan), Romesh Chunder Dutt (Lays of Ancient India, 1894; Mahabharata and Ramayana in verse, 1898, 1900), Sarojini Naidu who produced some volumes of exquisite poetry (The Golden Threshold, 1905; The Bird of Time, 1912; The Broken Wing, 1917); and last but not least the mystic Aurobindo Ghose whose collected poems and narratives—lyrical, dramatic, mystic, metaphysical—run to 700 pages. Among non-Bengalis, while there have been writers of creative Eng. in all parts of India, the South Indians specialized, so to speak, in Eng. Two outstanding examples of South Ind. Eng. poets are G. K. Chettur and Manjeri S. Isvaran, the latter, author of several volumes of poetry. In drama mention should be made of the plays of Harindranath Chattopadhyaya and the Madras lawyer and judge, V. V. Srinivasa Ayyangar (Dramatic Divertissements).

ANTHOLOGIES AND TRANSLATIONS: The Ind. Heritage, ed. V. Raghavan (1956; an anthol. of Sanskrit Lit. Translations and narrative versions. Includes Vedas, Upanishads, the two epics, the Gita and the Bhagavata Purana); Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus, tr. H. H. Wilson (3d ed., 1871); Sakuntala and Other Writings of Kalidasa, tr. A. W. Ryder (1912); The Little Clay Cart (Mricchakatika), a Hindu Drama Attributed to King Shudraka, tr. A. W. Ryder (1905); Rajatarangini of Kalhana: The Saga of the Kings of Kashmir, tr. R. S. Pandit (1935); The Kadambari of Bana, tr. C. M. Ridding (1896); The Ten Princes: Dandin's Dasakumaracarita, tr. A. W. Ryder (1927); The Satakas or Wise Sayings of Bhartrihari, tr. J. M. Kennedy (1913); Indian Poetry, Containing "The Indian Song of Songs" from the Sanskrit Gita-Govinda of Jayadeva, tr. E. Arnold (6th ed., 1891); Hitopadesa, the Book of Wholesome Counsel, a Translation, F. Johnson and L. D. Barnett (1928).—Psalms of the Maratha Saints, tr. N. Macnicol (1919); Mirabai—Songs, Tr. from the Original Hindi, R. C. Tandon (1934); The Adi-Granth or the Holy Scriptures of the Sikhs, tr. E. Trumpp (1877); The Words of Lalla the Prophetess, tr. R. C. Temple (1929); Kashmiri Lyrics, J. L. Kaul (1946); Prihvīrāj-rāsau of Chand Bardai, ed. and tr. J. Beames and A. F. R. Hoernle (2 pts., 1873–86); One Hundred Songs of Kabir, tr. R. Tagore (1926); The Holy Lake of the Acts of Rama; Eng. tr. of Tulasidas's Ramacharitamanasa, W. D. P. Hill (1952); Mathura, tr. F. S. Growse (tr. of poems of worshippers of Krishna); The Padumavati of Malik Muhammad Jayasi, ed. and tr. G. A. Grierson and M. S. Divedi (1896–1911); The Quatrains of Hali, ed. and tr. G. E. Ward (in prose) and C. S. Stute (in verse) (1932); Vidyapati: Bangiya Padavali. Songs of the Love of Radha and Krishna, tr. A. K. Coomaraswamy and A. Sen (1915); R. Tagore, Collected Poems and Plays (1937); Selections from Oriya Lit., ed. B. C. Majumdar (3 v.); Ten Tamil Idylls (Patup-pāttu), tr. J. V. Chelliah (1947); The Śilāp-adikāram or the Lay of the Anklet, tr. V. R. R. Dikshitar (1939); Two Thousand Years of Tamil Lit., J. M. Somasundaram Pillai (1959); The Sacred Kural or the Tamil Veda of Tiruvalluvar, tr. H. A. Popley (1931); Kamba Rāmāyanam, V. V. S. Aiyar (1950); The Verses of Vemana, tr. C. P. Brown (1829); Modern Ind. Poetry, ed. G. Goodwin (1927); An Anthol. of Indo-Anglian Verse, ed. A. R. Chida (1935).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. A. Macdonell, India's Past (1927); A. B. Keith, The Sanskrit Drama (1924) and A Hist. of Sanskrit Lit. (1928); M. Winternitz, A Hist. of Ind. Lit., 1 (Calcutta, 1927); Aurobindo Ghose, Kalidasa (1st ser., 1929; 2d ser., 1954); V. Raghavan, The Social Play in Sanskrit (1952) and Love in the Poems and Plays of Kalidasa (1954); G. A. Grierson, The Modern Vernacular Lit. of Hindustan (1889); S. K. Chatterji, Indo-Aryan and Hindi (1942); Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, Contemporary Ind. Lit. (1957); K. M. Munshi, Gujarat and its Lit. (1935); Mohan Singh, A Hist. of Panjabi Lit., 1100–1932 (n.d.); Indar Nath Madan, Modern Hindi Lit. (1939); Ram Babu Saxena, A Hist. of Urdu Lit. (1927); J. K. Misra, A Hist. of Maithili Lit. (2 v., 1949–1950); D. C. Sen, Hist. of Bengali Lang. and Lit. (1911); B. K. Barua, Assamese Lit. (1941); P. T. Srinivasa Iyengar, Hist. of the Tamils to 600 A.D. (1929; hist.-cum-anthol.); S. C. Chitty, Tamil Plutarch (new ed., 1946; biographies); S. Vaiyapuri Pillai, Hist. of Tamil Lang. and

Lit. (1956); P. Chenchiah and Raja M. Bhujanga Rao Bahadur, A Hist. of Telugu Lit. (1928); E. P. Rice, A Hist. of Kanarese Lit. (1918); K. Godavarma, A Short Survey of Malayalam Lit. (1945); K. R. Srinivasa Iyengar, The Ind. Contribution to Eng. Lit. (1945; hist.-cum-anthol.).

V.R.

INDIAN PROSODY. Ind. poetry is remarkable for the large variety and beauty of its meters. Its earliest form, the Veda, is called simply "the measured utterance" (Chandas). Mystic values were often attached to meters. Vedic poetry employs fifteen meters, seven of these being popular and three most frequent. They show flexibility of form and richness of design. The Vedic line was neither completely fluid nor completely fixed, the concluding syllables always being more defined, in terms of an iambic or trochaic cadence. The 8-, 11-, and 12-syllable lines composed the most common meters, and out of these grew in well-defined syllabic instants, long and short, the most popular epic and classical meters, Anushtubh and Upajāti. As the meters passed from the Vedic to the epic and from the epic to the classic, the character of each syllable progressively hardened and the bulk of classical meters are scanned by schemes of long and short in the constituent syllables, with marked caesura recognized in some. Less frequent are meters in which the 4 feet are not equal; there is also a class of meter measured merely by total quantity of morae (mātrā) per foot, and this is more commonly used in drama, lyric, and Prākṛit poetry. Mostly the meters bear charming feminine and lyrical names, due probably to their use in early drama, song, and lyric poetry; there are some in which the rhythm has sharp rise and fall, showing their greater musical character. About 850 meters are defined in a corpus of literature on prosody comprising about 150 treatises. A good many of these were developed by the mixture of typical cadence patterns comparable to Gr. cola. Poetic practice shows that about a score of these meters were frequently handled, and from the same poetic practice we could deduce certain broad principles underlying the use of meters for specific purposes, themes, and emotions.

Indians read different meters in different recitative styles. Prākṛit prosody was based mostly on the total quantity of each foot, each short syllable being one mātrā and the long one being two; Prākṛit prosody employed alliteration and rhyme, but Sanskrit only rarely and under the influence of Prākṛit. Prākṛit meters were also more distinctly musical. The metrics of the Dravidian literatures is based on a different and more complicated scheme of scanning but during the long course of coexistence and mutual contacts, there has been give and take of metrical patterns and practices on both sides, Sanskrit and the Dravidian. Like the Prākṛit meters, the Dravidian also employ features of alliteration, are dependent more on the mātrās or morae and tend to be, at least in the later measures, more definitely rhythmical than Sanskrit.—B. Brown, Sanskrit Prosody (1869); E. W. Hopkins, The Great Epic (1900; ch. 5); E. V. Arnold, Vedic Metre (1905); Rajagopala Rao, Comparative Prosody of the Dravidian Languages (n.d.); A. C. Chettiar, Advanced Studies in Tamil Poetry (1943); H. N. Randle, "Sanskrit and Gr. Metres," Jour. of Oriental Research (Madras), 17 (1947); H. D. Velankar, Jayadāman (1949; four prosody texts); V. Raghavan, "Sanskrit and Prākṛit Metres," Jour. of the Madras Univ. (Section A., Humanities), 23 (1952-53). V.R.

INDONESIAN POETRY, as distinguished from Malay poetry, which has been largely common to both Indonesia and Malaya, is defined here as the poetry written in the Indon. language or Malay of Indonesia now called Bahasa Indonesia. The period of modern Indon. literature begins with 1917 and since most of the modern poets have received a Western education it is not surprising that the pantun and sjair of older Malay literature (see MALAY POETRY) have been replaced by Western verse forms.

One of the first of the modern Indon. poets was Mohammad Yamin (1903-62), who introduced the sonnet form into Indon. poetry. His earliest poems deal with his homeland, at that time Sumatra, and appeared in 1922. Entitled Tanah Air (My Fatherland), they reveal a strong sentimental and lyrical tone. Yamin was greatly influenced by Rabindranath Tagore, who visited Indonesia in 1927 and one of whose works Yamin translated as early as 1928. A contemporary of Yamin is Rustam Effendi (1903-), author of the volume of lyrical poems Pertjikan Permenungan (A Sprinkling of Meditations), which appeared in 1926. In 1927 Sanusi Pané (1905-) published his Puspa Mega (Flowers of the Clouds) and in 1936 appeared Tebaran Mega (Scattered Clouds), a volume of moving poems by Sutan Takdir Alisjahbana (1908-), which was published just after the death of his first wife and dedicated to her. Prominent among the members of the Pudjangga Baru (New Writer) circle were Takdir Alisjahbana, Sanusi Pané, and Amir Hamzah (1911-46), son of a ruling family in North Sumatra, who is generally regarded as the outstanding poet of this pre-World War II group. Extremely sensitive, steeped in the older classical Malay language and literature, his reputation as a poet has steadily increased in Indonesia, though, for one with little knowledge and background in this field, his language is often difficult to understand. He was not a prolific writer, his best known collection of poems being Njanji Sunji (Songs of Loneliness), which shows the strong influence of the East as does Sanusi Pané in contrast to Takdir Alisjahbana who is more Western-oriented. Amir Hamzah also translated a number of poems from Eastern literatures and published these in 1939 under the title Setinggi Timur (Incense of the East).

During the Japanese Occupation (1942-45) literary activity was rather circumscribed and a strong censorship prevailed. It was, however, during this period that many of the prominent poets of the present day first began writing. Foremost among these was Chairil Anwar (1922-49), who is generally regarded as the leader of the so-called Generation of '45, a group which played a leading role during the Revolution (1945-50). Its poetry is characterized by a strong sense of realism with short, pungent, direct phrases and sentences and with emphasis upon content rather than upon form in distinct contrast to the prewar poets who composed largely in the romantic vein, using polite phrasing in long and often involved sentences. The latter group came under the influence of the Dutch Generation of '80 (Tachtigers, q.v.), especially the writings of Perk and Willem Kloos. Chairil Anwar's poems have been posthumously collected in several volumes, notably Deru Tjampur Debu (Melee of Noise and Dust), and Kerikil tadjam dan Jang Terampas dan jang putus (Sharp Gravel and Plundered and Broken). His influence upon his contemporaries as well as upon those of the next generation has been inestimable.

Among other poets of the Generation of '45 should be mentioned Rivai Apin; Asrul Sani, and Sitor Situmorang. In the meantime a new generation ('50) has appeared on the scene and some of its representatives, W. S. Rendra, Kirdjomuljo, and Nugroho Notosutanto, show considerable promise. Though writing almost exclusively in Dutch the Javanese poet Noto Soeroto (1898-1951) published a number of volumes of poetry which had considerable influence on such poets as Yamin. One of his best known collections is called Melatiknoppen (Jasmine Blossoms) and appeared in 1915.

ANTHOLOGIES AND TRANSLATIONS: Poeisi Baroe, ed. S. T. Alisjahbana (1946); Kesusasteraan Indonesia dimasa Djepang, ed. H. B. Jassin (1948); The Flaming Earth, ed. A. Ali (1949); Gema Tanah Air: Prosa dan Puisi, ed. H. B. Jassin (3d ed., 1954); Indon. Writing in Tr., ed. J. M. Echols (1956); Anthol. of Modern Indon. Poetry, ed. B. Raffel (1964).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Pané, Kort overzicht van de moderne Indonesische literatuur (1949); J. S. Holmes, "Angkatan Muda, a Checklist of Writings in Western Lang. Tr.,” Indonesië, 5 (1951-52) and “A Quarter Century of Indon. Lit.,” BA, 29 (1955); H. Subandrio, “La poésie indonésienne,” France-Asie, 6 (1952); W. A. Braasem, Moderne Indonesische literatuur (1954); R. B. Slametmuljana, Poëzie in Indonesia (1954); A. Teeuw, Pokok dan tokoh dalam kesusasteraan Indonesia baru (3d ed., 2 v., 1955; best general survey) and “Iets over de jongste indonesische letterkunde: het werk van Sitor Situmorang,” Bijdragen tot de taal-, land- en volkenkunde, 112 (1956); S. T. Alisjahbana, “Le développement de la langue et de la litt. indonésiennes,” Cahiers d'histoire mondiale, 2 (1955); H. B. Jassin, Chairil Anwar, pelopoor Angkatan 45 (2d ed., 1959) and Kesusasteraan Indonesia modern dalam kritik dan esei (2 v., 1962). J.M.E.

INITIAL RHYME. See ALLITERATION.

INITIATING ACTION. See PLOT.

INSCAPE AND INSTRESS. Inscapè in the aesthetic of Gerard Manley Hopkins, who coined the term, refers to the principle of physical distinctiveness in a natural or artistic object. Rooted in the Scotist concept of haecceitas or “thisness,” inscapè is whatever uniquely differentiates a thing from whatever was, is, or shall be. Hopkins himself somewhat inadequately defined the term in a letter to Robert Bridges as “design” or “pattern.” (The Letters of G. M. H. to Robert Bridges, ed. C. C. Abbott, 1935, p. 66). In his critical study of Hopkins, W. A. M. Peters gives a more elaborate definition of inscapè as “the outward reflection of the inner nature of a thing, or a sensible copy or representation of its individual essence.” (G. M. H.: A Critical Study Toward the Understanding of His Poetry, 1948, p. 2). W. H. Gardner states simply that inscapè is “the name for that ‘individually-distinctive’ form (made up of various sense-data) which constitutes the rich and revealing ‘one-ness’ of the natural object.” (Poems and Prose of G. M. H., 1953, p. xx).

Inscapè and instress are closely related terms—inscapè, the principle of individuation, and instress, the force which sustains and emanates from inscapè. In the words of Gardner, instress is essentially the “sensation of inscapè,” the impulse “which acts on the senses and, through them, actualizes the inscapè in the mind of the beholder” (op. cit., p. xxi). Peters notes that instress is the force that “holds the inscapè together” as well as “the power that ever actualizes the inscapè” (pp. 14-15). For Hopkins, instress is the energy by which “all things are upheld” (Note-books and Papers of G. M. H., ed. H. House, 1937, p. 98).—J. Pick,

G. M. H.: Poet and Priest (1942); G. M. H., ed. J. C. Ransom and C. Brooks (1945); W. H. Gardner, G. M. H.: A Study of Poetic Idiosyncrasy in Relation to Poetic Tradition (2 v., 1948-49); Immortal Diamond: Studies in G. M. H., ed. N. Weyand (1949); A. Heuser, The Shaping Spirit of G. M. H. (1959). S.H.

INSPIRATION is the urge that sets a poet to work and the devotion that keeps him at it. There have been two theories of the origins of this urge and devotion. The first, more widespread in space and time than the second, is that i. comes from outside the poet; the second, that it comes from within him. The data on which this first concept is based come from literature and anthropology; the data for the second, from psychology.

In a passage from On the Orator (2.46.194) Cicero comments: “. . . I have often heard that—as they say Democritus and Plato have left on record—no man can be a good poet who is not on fire with passion and inspired by something like frenzy.” And Plato (Laws 719c) alludes to the same view. He often refers to it, sometimes at length (e.g., Symposium 197A; Phaedrus 244-45). One brief dialogue, the Ion, is wholly devoted to a discussion of i. There Plato suggests, borrowing from Democritus, that just as iron filings become magnetized through the power of the magnet, so the poet is inspired through divine power, and that that power is conveyed by him to those who recite poetry—the professional rhapsodists—and, in turn, to their audiences. (See R. C. Lodge, Plato's Theory of Art, 1953).

Cicero discussed i. in his On Divination (1.18.37), On the Nature of the Gods (2.66: “No man was ever great without divine inspiration”), On the Orator, and The Tusculan Disputations (1.26). In modern Eng. translations of these passages (e.g., in the Loeb Library) the word inspiration is used but the words so translated are in Cicero afflatus, instinctus, or concitatio: inspiratio does not appear until the late Latin period.

Some recent discussions of Aristotle on this point (see A. H. Gilbert, Literary Criticism, Plato to Dryden, 1940, pp. 117, 118) conclude that Aristotle rejected i. as the source of the poet's power. (But see Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.7). So did Castelvetro in 1570, Dryden in 1679, and William Morris in the 19th c.

Testimony to i. from the poet's point of view occurs as early as Odyssey 22.347-48, where the bard, Phemius, says, “. . . the god has put into my heart all manner of lays, and methinks I sing to thee as a god. . . .” Homer, Hesiod, and Pindar invoke divine i. and so does Theocritus, but with the latter perhaps the invocation is just a literary convention. Virgil's address to the muse is well-known, and Ovid also has references to i. (Ars Amatoria 3.549; Fasti 6.5).

Longinus opens another aspect of the subject. He thinks of i. from the consumer's point of view. When a poem brilliantly imitates the work of another, we think its author inspired (13, 32). Likewise, when we read or hear a poem that is far beyond our experience, we again think it inspired (15).

When Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire, a Judaeo-Christian strain was added to the Graeco-Roman tradition that poetic i. came from outside the poet. For the Hebrew contribution consider Joel 2:28-30 and Ezekiel 2:1-10. The Church Fathers—Jerome in particular—often referred to David as the perfect poet-prophet, inspired by God.

From the 8th c. through the first quarter of the 19th we have many testimonies to a belief in the idea that poetic i. comes from outside the poet. Consider the following literary references: Bede (Ecclesiastical History of the Eng. Nation 4. 24; account of Caedmon); Dante, Purgatorio 1. 1-20; Boccaccio, Genealogy of the Gods (tr. Osgood), 14, 15.39, 15.99, etc.; J. C. Scaliger, Poetics (tr. Padelford), 1. 2; Sidney, Defence of Poetry (ed. Cook), pp. 8, 43; Francis Bacon, Advancement of Learning (World's Classics edition), p. 90; and Ben Jonson, Discoveries (ed. Schelling), pp. 74-76. The most significant, and probably the most serious, expression of the idea of i. in Eng. poetry of the 17th c. is found in Milton's invocations in Books 1, 3, 7, and 9 of Paradise Lost. Milton's Muse is not a tired literary convention carried over from classical poetry but a source of enlightenment comparable to the Protestant "inner light" and equated with the spirit from whom Moses received the Ten Commandments.

In the 18th c. i. was suspected of being "enthusiastic," as were the sermons of the more radical Protestant preachers. To classicists, who believed that the artist should rely primarily on conscious craftsmanship, this was undesirable (e.g., Shaftesbury's Letter on Enthusiasm); but to preromantics i. remained important: e.g., Edward Young's Conjectures on Original Composition (ed. Edith Morley), p. 30; William Blake's letter to Thomas Butts of April 25, 1802; Wordsworth's conclusion to The Recluse; Coleridge's account of the origin of Kubla Khan (see E. Schneider, Coleridge, Opium, and Kubla Khan, 1953, ch. 2); Poe's Poetic Principle; Emerson's The Poet.

So much for the first theory, the traditional one, that the poet's i. comes from outside himself, usually from the gods or God. Now for the second theory, that i. comes from within the poet. Of this there are two varieties, the first of which, the theory of genius, will serve as a transition between the two main theories of i. The idea of genius, characteristically, was held by the romantic writers (ca. 1760-1840), who were severely taken to task for this view by Irving Babbitt in his essays On Genius and On Being Original.

Genius is a L. word, probably considered by the Roman as the equivalent of the Gr. daimon (demon). Socrates regarded himself as directed by his daimon. We still have in common parlance the phrases "good genius" and "evil genius." When Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire daimon came to be thought of primarily as diabolical. In late L., however, genius came to be used as the equivalent of ingenium and its operation was transferred from the outer to the inner world of the poet. Genius appears in the Eng. language as early as the 16th c. It came to mean native talent. By romanticists, however, a distinction was made between genius and talent; the former being something more significant than talent. (See S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, chs. 2, 15). Between 1751 and 1774, twelve publications treat the concept genius. The most important and influential of these was Edward Young's Conjectures on Original Composition (1759) in which one finds most of the romantic ideas which Irving Babbitt attributes to Rousseau and his influence. (See especially E. Morley's edition of Young's essay, 1918, p. 13). William Hazlitt published two essays on Genius and Common Sense (in Table Talk) and one on Whether Genius Is Conscious of Its Power? (in The Plain Speaker). See also Charles Lamb, The Sanity of True Genius (in Essays of Elia).

The second variety of the modern notion that the poet's i. comes from inside himself is due to the labors of psychologists who from about 1840 on were trying to make their field a true science. These researches are found in systematic treatises on descriptive or experimental psychology, in accounts of abnormal or subliminal psychology, and in volumes like Th. Ribot, Essay on the Creative Imagination (1906) or R. M. Ogden, Psychology of Art (1938). They give us many data on, but fail to solve the mystery of, the poetic temperament. The most coherent body of literary theory that has emerged from these researches is that named surrealism (q.v.) which draws on Marxian interpretations of Hegel as well as on psychological studies such as those of Freud and Jung. The surrealists believe that i. arises from the poet's observations of his own suppressed desires, but they also stress an objective factor—the observation of conflicts in society and the economic and political conditions from which the poet rebels. Thus the surrealists have reverted to the position of Blake in his Marriage of Heaven and Hell and (in fact) of Heraclitus (fl. 504 B.C.). Herbert

Read, who describes surrealism as "the resurgence of romanticism" in the essay listed in the Bibliography (below), says that with the aid of Marx and Freud the surrealists have arrived at a scientific basis for creative activity in terms of its own dynamics.

But even in the midst of this, Croce can still refer to the theory of external i.: "The person of the poet is an Aeolian harp which the wind of the universe causes to vibrate." The problem of the poetic mind is still a mystery. See also IMAGINATION, INVENTION, WIT.

G. E. Woodberry, The I. of Poetry (1910; Lowell Lectures); F. C. Prescott, The Poetic Mind (1922); R. M. Ogden, The Psychology of Art (1938); Gilbert and Kuhn (see index); A. H. Gilbert, Lit. Crit. from Plato to Dryden (1940; see index); N. K. Chadwick, Poetry and Prophecy (1942); J.W.H. Atkins, Eng. Lit. Crit., Medieval Phase (1943); R. Harding, An Anatomy of I. (3d ed., 1948; a "case book," somewhat similar to Ghiselin's The Creative Process); H. Read, "Surrealism and the Romantic Principle," Crit., ed. M. Schorer, J. Miles, G. McKenzie (1948); H.J.C. Grierson, Crit. and Creation (1949); W. Fowlie, Age of Surrealism (1950); B. Ghiselin, The Creative Process (1952; a "case book," testimonies from mathematicians, musicians, novelists, painters, philosophers, poets, psychologists. Dryden and Mozart earliest); Abrams; C. M. Bowra, I. and Poetry (1955; see opening article). A.R.B.

Longinus' meaning, nor perhaps the most important consequences of his treatise for the romantics. Intensity is also a power of mind which interfuses its quality throughout the entire fabric of a poem. In his discussion of Sappho's ode Longinus makes i. the reconciler of opposites, with an effect objectively evident in the artistic unity of the whole. "Extremes meet"—the lover freezes and burns, is joyous and wretched simultaneously, and Sappho is able to render these contradictions acceptable. So in Keats i., like imagination, is a power, exemplified poetically in the Ode to a Nightingale, the Ode on Melancholy, and the Ode on a Grecian Urn, which "brings the whole soul of man into activity." It is not merely passion, but insight as well. "The excellence of every art is its intensity, capable of making all disagreeables evaporate, from their being in close relationship with Beauty and Truth. Examine 'King Lear,' and you will find this exemplified throughout" (Keats, Letters).

Equally important, in Longinus i. is the ultimate justification for the rhetorical and the poetic figures, the element which gives life to his elaborate analysis of figures. This with the Eng. romantics: Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Shelley find in i. of feeling the origin and justification for poetic language and metaphor, the quality which distinguishes poetry from poetic diction.—T. R. Henn, Longinus and Eng. Crit. (1934); Abrams. R.H.F.

INSTRESS. See INSCAPE AND INSTRESS.

INTENSITY is a fundamentally romantic criterion of poetic value, which, however, goes back to Longinus, On the Sublime. Longinus' use of ecstasy as the criterion of excellence anticipated the romantic reliance upon sensibility and taste. M. H. Abrams remarks that "the opinion of some nineteenth century critics that only the intense and necessarily brief fragment is quintessential poetry had its origin in Longinus' emphasis on the transport that results from the lightening revelation, the shattering image, or the stunning burst of passion." This tendency to isolate a pure poetry, and to locate it in individual figures and scattered passages, is to be found in Shelley, De Quincey, Lamb, and Hunt, more prominently in Keats, and most significantly in Hazlitt, where as a doctrine of "gusto" it leads to Pater and impressionistic criticism. Poe carried the tendency to its logical extreme in his requirement that poems be short: "It is needless to demonstrate that a poem is such, only inasmuch as it intensely excites, by elevating, the soul; and all intense excitements are, through a psychal necessity, brief."

This emphasis upon the sudden single flash does not, however, represent the whole of INTENTIONAL FALLACY. See INTENTIONS, PROBLEM OF.

INTENTIONS, problem of. The chief end of criticism is to elucidate the literary work or the relation of the reader or of the author to the literary work. All critical discourse can be classified under one or more parts of this three-part relationship: author to literary work to reader. The critic at his best recaptures what the author created, or either more or less than what the author achieved in creating from conscious or unconscious intentions. Original i. and achieved i. are not the same thing, and in most instances there is probably a considerable discrepancy. "One would think it a matter of mere common sense, that in order to criticise justly you must put yourself, for the time being, as nearly as possible at the author's point of sight; form a sympathetic estimate of what he is striving to do, and then you can tell how nearly he attains his purpose" (Harriet Beecher Stowe). What the author was striving to do is "intentional," whereas what he achieved within the work is "actual." As distinguished from (1) original i., (2) the actual i. is the effect which the work aims to evoke, the organizing principle informing the whole, or the meaning which the work manifests or suggests. We may know what the author was striving to do because he has set down what he intended in public prefaces (Henry James) or in letters (Hart Crane). We know also what the author was striving to achieve by evidence of the work itself; he has achieved what he was striving for insofar as he has achieved a work of art. The problem of i. arises from the fact that the author's declared i. as to his design or meaning are one thing, and his achieved i.—the actual intention or meaning framed within the work itself—quite another thing, even when the one and the other happen to agree or coincide.

Also, ingenious interpretations or apparently far-fetched readings give rise to the question of i. Every freshman, confronted with what his teacher finds in the text or reads into it, asks the question: "How do you know that's what Shakespeare intended?" "The view that the genuine poem is to be found in the i. of the author is widespread even though it is not always explicitly stated. It justifies much historical research and is at the bottom of many arguments in favor of specific interpretations. However, for most works of art we have no evidence to reconstruct the i. of the author except the finished work itself. . . . 'Intentions' of the author are always a posteriori ratiocinations, commentaries which certainly must be taken into account but also must be criticized in the light of the finished work of art" (René Wellek). Assuming that the work warrants certain interpretations, how do we know that the author "intended" them?

"What did the author set out to do? Was his plan reasonable and sensible, and how far did he succeed in carrying it out?" (Goethe). What Matthew Arnold set out to do in The Last Word we know by evidence of the poem alone. Also, we know by the poem itself—on evidence of its contradiction in the intended effect or meaning—that his plan was not reasonable and consequently he could not succeed in carrying the poem through to a successful conclusion, for the ending of The Last Word contradicts the beginning in mood and theme. Furthermore, every work of art undergoes from age to age various interpretations, taking on new significances or shedding former ones—"colours which the artist neither foresaw nor intended." Writers frequently "compass more than they intend." "It can hardly be denied," writes a reviewer in the London Times Literary Supplement (Dec. 10, 1954), "that the excellence of any work of art must depend on the degree in which the artist has achieved what he intended—or, in Croce's language, has succeeded in expressing his own impressions." True—insofar as "what he intended" is taken to mean what resides within the text rather than outside it. Nothing the author asserts about his i. can possibly establish the status of his work as work of art, for obviously what tests it as such is finally the work itself.

When the critic relies upon the author's declared intention, either the author's work or the critic's interpretation of it is deficient. Once the work is produced, it possesses objective status—it exists independently of the author and of his declared intention. It contains, insofar as it is a work of art, the reason why it is thus and not otherwise. The difference between art and its germinal event is absolute. The best artist constructs his work in such a way as to admit of no interpretation but the single intended one; its single i. being a single effect, one over-all meaning, one composite theme. All parts of the work of art are, ideally, relevant or functional to the whole. Irrelevant to the objective status of the work as art are criteria which dissolve the work back into the historical or psychological or creative process from which it came. "The function of the objective critic is by approximate description of poems, or multiple restatements of their meaning, to aid other readers to come to an intuitive and full realization of poems themselves" (W. K. Wimsatt, Jr.). The critic answers the question: What is the work's organizing principle? Analysis discovers what is intended by each part, all parts having relationship one to the other (the Jamesian canon). All analyses are open to criticism, all judgments are corrigible. The critical reader is the ideal reader.

While it may be supposed that the ideal reader is the author himself inasmuch as he presumably knows what he intended, such is not generally the case. Some German poets, replying to a questionnaire sent out by an ingenious psychologist at Munich, are reported to have become indignant at the imputation that they knew what they were doing. Hart Crane, on the contrary, knew precisely what he was doing, as evidenced by his letter on At Melville's Tomb (reprinted in The Critic's Notebook, 1950). Authors in the main tend toward concealment of their secret intention (if they have one) and write facetiously about it—Mark Twain, for example. In public pronouncements they play down or belittle the conception of themselves as the conscious craftsman. They obfuscate what their books are really all about by issuing bogus trade-secrets. They deny that their work has any artistic scheme or significance. A notable exception is Henry James in his Prefaces (collected in The Art of the Novel, 1934). "Never trust the artist. Trust the tale. The proper function of a critic is to save the tale from the artist who created it" (D. H. Lawrence).

Even when the critic's interpretation coincides with the author's declared intention, such a case of author's approval does not preclude interpretations by other critics; no one interpretation is the authorized one. If it were otherwise, then to grant validity to this correlation between the critic's interpretation and the author's declared intention presupposes that his declared i. is identical with his achieved one; but how can we ascertain this identity of i.? For, according to this conception, a work possesses not objective, intrinsic, or resident values; but only subjective, extrinsic, or nonresident ones. And the criteria for judgment would then be located in external, rather than internal, evidence. Again, the critic is using the work of art as a means for the reconstruction of the author's original intention, and the critic's practice is being judged not by other critical readers but by the author himself, as if the author were the only one who can properly measure the success of his critic's interpretation.

These assumptions are not valid and the questions based upon them are misleading. Even our most conscious craftsmen do not know fully what they intended during the process of creation. As T. S. Eliot remarks, a great deal more goes to the making of poetry than the conscious purpose of the poet; but apart from this consideration, not every artist creates consciously. Though Poe was a conscious craftsman and analyzed The Raven as a consciously constructed work, nevertheless his "Philosophy of Composition" remains a fabrication subsequent to the creative process or event. (Cf. W. E. Leonard's "The Poetic Process from the Inside," Bookman, Aug. 1932.) Where the artist reconstructs his blueprint of his creative process or original intention, as Poe and Stephen Spender have done, this avowed and externally ascertainable intention constitutes extrinsic evidence which, critically considered, is irrelevant or supererogatory. The work itself takes unconditional precedence, in establishing its status as work of art, over any externally ascertainable data which the author or commentator supplies about its genesis. The author's supposed or avowed i. must not be permitted to intrude or modify our interpretation of his achieved intention. The avowed intention of the author and/or the private history of his work provide clues to the critic for interpreting the work, but not the ultimate grounds for evaluating it. For the i. of a work resides within the work: "No judgment of intention has relevancy unless corroborated by the work itself, in which case it is supererogatory. It is therefore circular and misleading to speak of judging the work with respect to its success in carrying out the author's intention" (Wimsatt).

As for the critic's reconstructing from the work the author's germinal state of mind at the moment of creation (Tillyard to the contrary), the only concrete and full revelation of his state of mind is the work which has issued from it (Wellek and Wimsatt). The creative process "is a process of discovery which objectifies itself as a making," wherefore the artist does not know his actual intention until he achieves it (R. P. Warren). The only thing the artist can know to be what he meant to say is what he said in the work (Croce). Often his only "intention" may be simply to make a work of art. And once he has created a work the author becomes simply another reader of his work and, as such, is liable to misinterpret it (Wellek). Consequently, all questions about the author's own attitudes to his utterances within the work of art are critically irrelevant (C. S. Lewis).

M. C. Beardsley and W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "Intention," in Shipley and "The Intentional Fallacy," SR, 54 (1946); R. W. Stallman, "The Crit. Reader" and "A Note on i.," CE, 9 (April 1948) and 10 (Oct. 1948); The Critic's Notebook, ed. R. W. Stallman (1950; ch. 8). For items not listed in Critic's Notebook, see E. Vivas, "The Objective Basis of Crit.," WR, 12 (1948); L. Fiedler, "Archetype and Signature: A Study of the Relationship between Biography and Poetry," SR, 60 (1952); L. Thompson, Melville's Quarrel with God (1952); R. Stewart, "New Critic and Old Scholar," CE, 15 (1953); R. W. Stallman, "The Scholar's Net: Lit. Sources," CE, 17 (Oct. 1955); cf. F. W. Bateson in CE, 17 (Dec. 1955), 131-35 and R. W. Stallman, ibid., 180; Wellek and Warren; T. M. Gang, "Intention," EIC, 7 (1957). R.W.S.

INTERLUDE (L. inter "between," ludium "play") is an ancient term denoting a brief entertainment (dramatic, acrobatic, mimetic or musical), introduced as a sort of break or recess between the courses of a feast or the acts of a play. In the Renaissance drama of Italy, the term used for short pieces inserted between long acts was intermedii. In France comic or satiric pieces of a similar type were known as entremets and in Spain as entremés. The latter became a distinct dramatic genre. In England the term "i." seems to have been applied, first by J. Payne Collier, to the plays of the transitional period between the medieval religious drama—mysteries, miracles, and moralities—and the professional drama that appeared after theaters were built and companies of actors organized, roughly from about 1500 to 1576. It is still a vague term, since the context of the concept is very mixed. It is used to designate not only early forms of romantic drama (Henry Medwall's Fulgens and Lucrece, 1497) but farce (John Heywood's The Pardoner and the Friar and The Four PP), morality plays (Mundus et Infans and Medwall's Nature), late mystery plays (Godly Queen Hester and John Bale's Kyng Johan), imitations of L. comedy and tragedy (Udall's Ralph Roister Doister and Preston's Cambises) and various dramatic survivals and new inventions. There is thus no clear line to be drawn between the i. and the earlier drama, nor, indeed, between the i. and the Elizabethan drama proper.—A. W. Ward, A Hist. of Eng. Dramatic Lit. to the Death of Queen Anne (3 v., rev. ed., 1875); C. F. Tucker Brooke, The Tudor Drama (1912); F. S. Boas, University Drama in the Tudor Age (1914) and An Introd. to Tudor Drama (1933); E. K. Chambers, The Elizabethan Stage (4 v., 1923); A. W. Reed, Early Tudor Drama (1926); A. P. Rossiter, Eng. Drama (1950). H.C.

INTERNAL RHYME. See RHYME; LEONINE RHYME.

INVENTION. Ancient theories of social rhetoric commonly listed five "parts" of oratory: invention, disposition (or arrangement), elocution (or expression or style), memory, and delivery. The first three of these concepts have been widely employed also in the discussion of poetry to distinguish not only the tasks and abilities or faculties involved in writing poems but also the elements of poems themselves. In the typical statement of classical rhetoric, i. (heuresis; inventio, "discovery" [cf. also ennoeo; excogitare, "to think of"] refers to the nature and source of what is said rather than to how it is said; it is, for example, "the excogitation of true or plausible things which render one's cause probable" (Rhetorica ad Herennium 1.2.3; cf. Aristotle, Rhetoric 2.26.1403^a 34-^b1; Cicero, De inventione 1.7.9). Likewise, in poetics—although the concept has sometimes been used in such a way as to indicate the production of form or structure (e.g., in Aristotle's Poetics, Ch. 14), or of language or style (e.g., in J. du Bellay's Deffense et illustration de la langue françoise 1.8 [1549] and the passages on Homer's "expression" in Pope's Preface to the Iliad [1715]), or of poetry in general (e.g., in Boccaccio's De genealogia deorum 14.7 [ca. 1365]), or of specific poetic kinds (e.g., in J. C. Scaliger's Poetices libri septem 1.1 [1561]), or of a particular whole work of art (e.g., in A. Gerard's Essay on Genius 1.3 [1774])—"i." has reference most often to finding, or otherwise producing, the subject matter or "content" of poems. The special meanings given to the term within this general usage, however, have been numerous. Sometimes, for example, i. is contrasted with "imitation" (of prior models), thus signifying originality and independence in the production of subject matter (see Horace, Ars poetica 119-20; Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 10.2.12; Johnson, Rambler, no. 121 [1751]; E. Young, Conjectures on Original Composition [1759]); sometimes it is contrasted with "judgment" and thus refers to the native power of producing poetic substance as opposed to the control of that power by reason or convention (see Pope, Essay on Criticism 1.114 [1711]; Preface to the Iliad); sometimes it refers to the production of things "fanciful" or incredible (see Johnson, Rambler, no. 4 [1750]); sometimes it means the production of "fiction" as opposed to historical truth (see the discussion of comedy in L. Castelvetro's Poetica d' Aristotele [1571]); sometimes it indicates the artful combination of historical truth and imaginative falsehood (see G. de Scudéry's preface to M. de Scudéry's Ibrahim [1641]).

Basic differences in the conception of poetic i. are in large part functions of more general differences in poetic theory, particularly regarding what is necessary, practicable, or desirable in poetic subject matter, and why. Some of the principal theoretic variations may be suggested here. (See also IMAGINATION; IMITATION; EXPRESSION; INSPIRATION.)

In one large group of theories, in which essentially rhetorical principles and doctrines are predominant but are combined in various ways with ideas found originally in the "mimetic" poetic theories of Plato, Aristotle, and Democritus, poetic i. of the proper sort is a matter primarily of the proper imitation of nature (in one or another of several senses), since, it is argued, the desired effects of poetry are possible only through positive images or likenesses of real or natural things (see, e.g., Plutarch, Moralia 17-18; Thomas Aquinas, In libros Posteriorum analyticorum expositio 1, Lectio 1; P. de Ronsard, Abrégé de l'art poétique françois [1565]; Dryden, Parallel betwixt Poetry and Painting [1695]; Johnson, Preface to Shakespeare [1765]). "Imitation of nature," however, has been a very inclusive concept, and in some theories in this tradition poetic i. legitimately embraces the powers of "imagining" things and of producing visionary, supernatural, and "marvelous" subjects; but the justification of these products usually remains the achievement of the proper effects of poetry, or those of a particular poetic kind, in an audience for which such things have, through education and tradition, become "natural" (see, e.g., G. Giraldu Cinthio, Discorso al comporre dei romanzi [1549]; Dryden's essay on "heroic plays" prefixed to The Conquest of Granada [1672]; A. G. Baumgarten, Meditationes philosophicae de nonnullis ad poema pertinentibus, 43-59, 109-14 [1735]).

With this group should be mentioned also certain other theories strongly influenced by the tradition of ancient rhetoric (e.g., those of Demetrius, Horace, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Longinus, Dante, and Pope) in which earlier Greek conceptions of poetic mimesis are somewhat less important and the poet (or other writer) is said to produce his subject matter more by drawing from his own natural and acquired fund of imagery, thought, feeling, or argument and by artfully imitating or emulating prior literary models than by copying from reality or nature. (Cf. R. McKeon, "The Concept of Imitation in Antiquity," in Critics and Criticism, ed. R. S. Crane [1952].)

There have been, on the other hand, a number of theories (including those of some of the Stoics and Neoplatonists, and, more recently, of "romantics" like Shaftesbury, Aken-side, Herder, and Coleridge) in which rhetorical principles are less central and true poetic i. is conceived as the production of subject matter which in a radical dialectical sense transcends "ordinary" human images or ideas of nature and the natural, because the poet can best be justified not as one who satisfies a particular human audience but rather, e.g., as one who rivals or reflects a higher, "creative" being. Sir Philip Sidney's statement is characteristic: "Only the poet [of all human artists] . . . lifted up with the vigor of his own invention, doth grow in effect into another nature, in making things either better than nature bringeth forth, or, quite anew, forms such as never were in nature. . . . Neither let it be deemed too saucy a comparison to balance the highest point of man's wit with the efficacy of nature; but rather give right honor to the heavenly maker of that maker, who, having made man to his own likeness, set him beyond and over all the works of that second nature; which in nothing he showeth so much as in poetry, when with the force of a divine breath he bringeth things forth far surpassing her doings" (Defense of Poesie [1583; 1595]). In some theories in this general tradition (e.g., in those of Shelley and Emerson) the emphasis is on the poet's special inspired or intuitive "vision" of ultimate reality, since poetry must be justified by its provision of a better kind of "cognition" than that obtainable from ordinary human discourse. In others (e.g., those of A. W. Schlegel and Wordsworth) the emphasis is on the poet's power of supremely great or original thought and feeling, since poetry should be defended not as primarily depictive, plastic, or imagistic, but rather as a superior kind of "expression." Later dialectical theories have tended particularly to stress the need for a combination or coalescence of two or more transcendent powers, as in W. K. Wimsatt's conception of poetry as a "tensional union of making with seeing and saying" (Literary Criticism: A Short History [1957], pp. 752-55; cf. B. Croce, Estetica [1901]; J. Maritain, Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry [1953]; P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain [1954]; E. Vivas, Creation and Discovery [1955]).

It has sometimes been said that, while the original meaning of "i." involved primarily the idea of "finding" subject matter (even by imitating or borrowing from other writers), the term later came generally to suggest, through association with the concept of imagination, not so much finding as "creating." This observation has some validity, but it should not be allowed to obscure the fact that there never was a time in the history of European criticism when poetic i. was not conceived by someone in terms of the poet's creative or imaginative ability to transform given or discovered materials (for better or worse) or to produce entirely fictional or fantastic ("invented") subjects. And perhaps the most significant development in the recent history of the concept has been a general shift of emphasis, beginning in the 18th c. (see Pope's Preface to Shakespeare [1725]), away from the principle that the poet produces his subject matter (and his form and style) by habits or deliberate acts of learned artistry, including the imitation of prior works as well as the imitation of nature, to the converse principle that poetic substance (or at least the better poetic substance) is generated in the poet's soul, either in organic processes or in mechanical operations, by God or nature. (On the varieties of "organic" and "mechanical" theories of i. in 18th- and 19th-c. criticism, see M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp [1953], pp. 156-225.)

C. S. Baldwin, Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic (1924) and Medieval Rhetoric and Poetic (1928); M. W. Bundy, "'Invention' and 'Imagination' in the Renaissance," JEP, 29 (1930); The Great Critics, ed. J. H. Smith and E. W. Parks (3d. ed., 1951; index); R. McKeon, "Imitation and Poetry," in Thought, Action, and Passion (1953); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500-1700 (1956); Weinberg, R.M.

INVERSION. (a) Rhetoric: turning an opponent's argument against him; (b) Grammar: reversal of normal word order, for the sake of meter ("Thus ceased she: and the mountain shepherds came" [Shelley]), rhyme scheme, or emphasis ("Down comes the winter rain—" [Hardy]). I. is often frowned upon as a device for securing emphasis, though it is frequently used. (c) Prosody: commonly the turning about of a foot by substituting stressed for unstressed, unstressed for stressed syllables, e.g., using a trochee for an iamb in iambic verse:

'
Catcht by|Conta'gion, like|in pun|ishment
(Milton, Paradise Lost 10.544).

In traditional Eng. verse inversion of stress is a common device for securing variation, occurring most frequently in the initial foot and often immediately after the caesura, only very rarely in the final foot. Efforts by prosodists to limit the term to its meaning in the sense of reversed word order seem unrealistic. R.O.E.

INVOCATION. A request for assistance addressed by the poet to a muse, patron spirit, or deity. The i. is standard in classical lyric and narrative poetry, and particularly in the epic. It usually comes at the beginning of a poem but invocations can be used for emphasis at critical moments in a narrative to introduce subsections of a work as, for example, books of an epic. Serious invocations are found at the beginning of the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the Aeneid. Invocations to God, Christ, or the Holy Ghost are common in early Christian poems (e.g., Sedulius, Carmen Paschale; Aldhelm, De Virginitate). Renaissance poems continue to use invocations, sometimes pagan and sometimes Christian (e.g., Gerusalemme Liberata and Paradise Lost). Mock-heroic poetry naturally produced mock invocations (e.g., Pope's Rape of the Lock; Byron's The Vision of Judgment). With the decline of classical influence the i. has ceased to be an important poetic convention but is still occasionally used as, for instance, in Hart Crane's The Bridge and St.-John Perse's Amers. A.R.B.

IONIC. The origin of this verse form was associated with the Ionians of Asia Minor who appear to have used it in the orgiastic worship of Dionysus and Cybele (cf. the galliambic). The greater I. foot (ionicus a maiore) was composed of 2 long followed by 2 short syllables (— — —), whereas in the lesser I. (ionicus a minore) the 2 short preceded the 2 long syllables (— — —). Ionics were employed by some of the Gr. lyric poets (especially Anacreon) and by the tragedians, particularly Euripides, whether in monometers, dimeters, trimeters, or tetrameters (including galliambics). Horace, Odes 3.12, furnishes a good instance of lesser Ionics in a familiar sequence:

mīserarum̄ est|nēquē amōrē|dārē lūdum̄|nēquē
dūlci, etc.,

where the frequency of diaeresis may be noted. The use of regular ionici a maiore seems to have originated in the Hellenistic period, and in Latin an example is provided by Varro, Satirae Menippeae 489. An instance in Eng. poetry of lesser I. trimeter is Browning's "In the midnight, in the silence of the sleep-time." —J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); Hardie; Hamer; Dale; B. Gentili, "Gli ionici a maiore nella poesia greca," Maia, 2

(1949); Koster; P. Habermann, "Antike Versmasse," Reallexikon, 2d ed., I. R.J.G.

IRANIAN POETRY. See PERSIAN POETRY.

IRISH LITERARY RENAISSANCE. Irish Literary Revival, Irish Renaissance. The Ir. Lit. Ren.—which flowered during the half-century beginning about 1885, and which had minor sister movements in Celtic Britain—constitutes the most striking general literary phenomenon of its period and represents a major segment of the clearest post-Victorian phase of the romantic movement. But though it has strands reaching into other segments of that movement (particularly symbolism), it is not parochial in appeal, despite a certain self-containment referable to its spiritually well-defined racial quality. And as the expression of a people in whom the lyric and romantic impulses had blossomed before Continental Europe was out of the dark ages, it found its most intense expression in verse, in dream-wound plays, and in short prose fiction. It was not technically inventive, unless in portions of James Joyce and sporadic efforts to imitate the technical effects of early Ir. verse such as those of F. R. Higgins; a conservative tradition as old as the filid—the ancient scholar-poets—operated generally to limit technical aspiration to the perfection or modulation of established forms (some of whose characteristics, from internal rhyme to burden, may have been Celtic inventions). Its real glory—and power—lies in its fusing of delicacy with extravagance, of the tender with the heroic: it is constantly a revelation of restrained savage vitality and spiritual sensitivity. Its ethical background is largely Protestant or nonorthodox; its significant statement is in Eng. But in the end one leaves it in the conviction that it is a logical reiteration of that wild beauty smoldering in the hero-tales and romances, the intricately fashioned lyrics, of centuries gone—this despite touches of overlush romanticism and the fact that ancestral tradition was often a harder and more "realistic" thing.

Initially, this Ren. was sparked primarily by the desire of W. B. Yeats and his literary friends to create "a national literature that made Ireland beautiful in the memory," by the antiquarian and political impulses of Sir Charles Gavan Duffy (in 1842 one of the founders of the Nation) and his kind, and by the linguistic and historical enthusiasm of Dr. Douglas Hyde and his sympathizers. Behind the activities of these men, of course, lay the spadework of numerous historians, translators, and miscellaneous intellectuals; among the journals hospitable to their work may be mentioned especially the Dublin University Review, Sinn Féin (a 1906 transformation of The United Irishman), and Æ's Irish Homestead.

Indubitably the finest poet of the movement—and quite clearly one of the finest lyrists the world has yet seen—was W. B. Yeats (1865–1939), behind whose early work stand most clearly Blake, Morris, Shelley, and Whitman, with Donne a subsequent exemplar. But there is also a tremendous amount of excellent stuff in the verse of Æ (G. W. Russell), James Stephens, Dr. Oliver St. John Gogarty, Padraic Colum, F. R. Higgins, and many others. Unfortunately, limitations of space do not permit a proper estimate of this mass of work; much less of the remarkable body of drama and prose fiction accompanying it. Suffice it to say in conclusion that the Ren. brought not only recreation of heroic Ir. story (as in Yeats's Wanderings of Oisín) and “reincarnations” of verse originally in Ir. (as in some of Stephens'), but also mystical and transcendental lyricism linked with Emerson and the East (as in Æ), a remarkable development of the reined-in line of Keats, Poe, and Morris (especially in Yeats), a revival of balladry, an extension of the “metaphysical” element, an infusion of the personal lyric with dramatic surcharge more powerful than ever before evident in Eng. (again, most strikingly in Yeats), and a notable evocation of natural accent and speech rhythms.

There is no definitive account of the movement in all its aspects. The following books will be found generally useful: G. Moore, Hail and Farewell (3 v., 1911–14); F. L. Bickley, J. M. Synge and the Ir. Dramatic Movement (1912); M. Bourgeois, John Millington Synge and the Ir. Theatre (1913); C. Weygandt, Ir. Plays and Playwrights (1913); E. A. Boyd, Ireland's Lit. Ren. (1916, rev. 1922); L. R. Morris, The Celtic Dawn (1917); A. E. Malone, The Ir. Drama, 1896–1928 (1929); S. L. Gwynn, Ir. Lit. and Drama . . . (1936); W. B. Yeats, Autobiography (1939); U. M. Ellis-Fermor, The Ir. Dramatic Movement (1939); R. Farren, The Course of Ir. Verse in Eng. (1947). G.B.S.

IRISH POETRY. EARLY PERIOD. Early Ir. poetry is inevitably of special interest to the prosodist. This is not to deny the existence of scattered pieces of naive charm or occasionally moving content: it is merely to emphasize the constricting concern with early-established, early-codified, and highly conservative lyric techniques. Epic—like formal drama—is non-existent, its nearest approximations being confined to certain adventure stories like Immram Snédgusa ocus Maic Riagla (Voyage of Snédgus and Mac Riagla: 9th c.), a tale of monkish pilgrimage, and—perhaps—some of the verse interpolations in the uirsceál, or “romance,” into which the Ir. preferred to channel their heroic stories. So one may for brief comment concentrate on the lyric tradition, which reaches back to two or three gnomic pieces fancifully attributed to Amergin, reputedly one of the invading “Sons of Milesius” in pre-Christian times.

Actually, much of the earliest Ir. verse appears to have emanated from the southern half of the island: verse largely rhetorical and genealogical in character, accentually controlled in some degree, loose in syllabic line-structure, and marked by protracted alliterations. (Northern poetry was technically somewhat more regular and less alliterative: one may cite, with Flower, the Voyage of Bran.) This early material (6th c. and later) was eventually supplanted by verse based on syllable-counting, complicated patterns favoring short-lined quatrains conceptually self-contained, and consonantal rhyme governed by arbitrary grouping of the consonants (e.g., words ending in ll could rhyme only with those ending in m, nn, ng, and rr). Behind this intricate verse lie 8th-c. L. influences; in it are to be found many anonymous monkish quatrains, often preserved in tracts or on manuscript-borders. The first clearly isolated poet, the Connachtman Fland mac Lonáin, emerges in the 9th c., to which also belongs the anonymous lyric in which a wandering Leinster scholar compares himself to his cat, Pangur Bán—the lyric named by Flower as the first manuscript example “of the personal poetry of the Irish.”

That early lyricism seems in general most moving in its nature pieces and elegies; for it has few love poems, and its numerous eulogies—like its historical pieces—have small interest for the general reader. Between the 7th and 17th c. appeared also much religious verse, seldom poetically consequential; its better authors, known and unknown, include the 13th c. Donnchadh Mór Ó Dálaigh.

Early Ir. verse was, of course, a special concern of the fabulously privileged fili, a man highly trained in law and history as well as poetry, whose terrifying satires, with their supposedly magical effectiveness, helped ensure popular respect; and of the humbler bard. (And one may note that the Ir. distinguished between “poetry” and “bardcraft.”) But the fili eventually lost status, perhaps during the Scandinavian invasions; the baird emerged after the Anglo-Norman invasion as in many cases retainers of wealthy and influential families—and composers of quantities of tiresome encomiastic verse.

In the Anglo-Norman aristocracy, artificial Fr. lyrical conventions found a channel permitting fusion with Ir. practices, though the preserved evidence is largely of the 16th and 17th c. Certainly, however, this tradition explains such work as that of the 14th-c. “Gerald the Rhymer,” Earl of Desmond, to mention only one polished practitioner. To these initial modern centuries, incidentally, belong some very earthy lyrics out of anonymous clerical tradition—lyrics underscoring the realism and irony which, sentimental assumptions to the contrary, give Ir. poetry its real character.

With the dispersal of the aristocracy in the 17th c., and consequent loss of patronage, the "Bardic Schools"—organizations which had originated among the filid, and which had imposed rigorous metrical training upon their neophytes—began to break up (cf. here the verse of David O'Bruadair), and a loosening of the strict metrical system (whose rules the bards had codified) followed. Vowel-rhyme, stress-government, and long lines began to appear; but structure still remained far from simple, not least in respect to internal association.

Much postmedieval Ir. verse, which includes a good many "vision" poems, can interest few except the dedicated. Thus, e.g., the entire 17th c. seems to offer little more exciting than the tiresome Contention of the Bards, though—like its successor—it produced many ballads exploiting the matter of the great Fenian story-cycle, as well as patriotic pieces poetically negligible. And perhaps the only approximations of major work in the 18th c. prior to Brian Merriman's effort are Michael Comyn's Laoi Oisín i dTír na nÓg (Lay of Oisín in the Land of the Young), a work underlying Yeats's Wanderings of Oisín, and Torolbh Mac Stairn, an adventure story suggestive in flavor of the late-medieval.

G.B.S.

LATER IR. POETRY, GAELIC AND ENG. As practiced by professionals, significant Ir. poetry in the vernacular came to an abrupt end about 1780 with Brian Merriman's Cúirt An Mheadhan Oidhche (The Midnight Court). What followed for over a century were the semi-literate productions of rural poetasters given to satiric, patriotic, and religious versifying. Their technique, based on Ir. forms, passed eventually into street-songs made in Eng. With the 20th c. there developed a linguistic enthusiasm which provoked some interesting, though not widely known, work. That nothing of consequence should have succeeded Merriman's poem is surprising, for The Midnight Court, a thousand lines in length, shows no decadence: it is exuberant, and while keeping to the machinery of the traditional aisling and using the elaborate pattern of bardic poetry, it has a new outlook; nostalgia is changed to extravagance and earthiness. Nevertheless, Ir. poetry from Goldsmith on (The Traveller is dated 1765; The Deserted Village, 1770) becomes mainly poetry in Eng.

Signs of such a development had, indeed, become apparent during the century preceding Goldsmith's, though much of the evidence could be called literature only by courtesy. Examples can be culled from the work of such figures as Sir John Denham (1615–69), the Virgilian who wrote Cooper's Hill (1643) and who was actually named "one of the fathers of English poetry" by Samuel Johnson; Thomas Duffet (fl. ca. 1676); Dryden's collaborator Nahum Tate (1652–1715); the nimble-witted Mrs. Mary Monk (?1677–1715); et al. But it remained for Goldsmith to prove himself the first Anglo-Ir. poet of any stature.

Eventually Ir. poetry began to attain intermittent racial distinctiveness through translations of native folk song or through the writing of verse in Eng. for the old harp music. An instance would be The Outlaw of Loch Lene, a translation (1798) by Jeremiah Joseph Callanan which reproduces the unemphatic rhythm and assonantal effects of the Ir.: "Oh, many a day I made good ale in the Glen, / That came not from stream nor from malt, like the brewing of men. / My bed was the ground, my roof the greenwood above, / And all the wealth that I sought, one fair kind glance from my love." Afterward Thomas Moore (1780–1852), following the pattern of the old music, achieved a like unemphatic rhythm—something different from the usual Eng. metric with its stress on particular words: "At the mid hour of night, when stars are weeping, I fly / To the lone vale we loved when life shone warm in thine eye, / And I think that, if spirits can steal from the region of air / To revisit past scenes of delight, thou wilt come to me there, / And tell me our love is remember'd even in the sky!" Moore was spiritually responsive to traditional Ir. material, though imperfectly aware of it. At his best in Ir. Melodies, of which ten numbers—the verses set to traditional music—appeared between 1807 and 1834, he shows less depth than facility in the songs. The Harp That Once through Tara's Halls, however, remains a superb specimen.

Moore's pathetic younger contemporary, James—self-baptized "Clarence"—Mangan (1803–49) made the only other pronounced verse contribution to the romantic movement then surging in Eng. literature. Quite rightly, the Concise Cambridge History of Eng. Literature has credited Mangan with having anticipated Poe "in his use of a repeated and varied refrain." His distinctive poems are based on translations of Ir. originals; examples would be The Lament for the Princes of Tir-Owen and Tir-Connaill, Dark Rosaleen, Kathleen-ni-Houlihan, and O'Hussey's Ode to the Maguire. These versions are closer to the originals than Mangan usually gets credit for being. In Ode to the Maguire the verse is like the storm that spends its fury on the chieftain addressed; it rises and falls, pauses and lashes out. The Lament for the Princes of Tir-Owen and Tir-

Connail has magnificent structure. The structure of Dark Rosaleen is weak, but the piece has a fervor and a flashing imagery that make it one of the world's greatest patriotic poems. Dark Rosaleen is an address to Ireland under the "secret" aristocratic name; Kathleen-ni-Houlihan is an address under the "secret" peasant name, and in it Mangan achieves a charmingly varied rhythm.

With Sir Samuel Ferguson (1810-86) came the first significant attempts to exploit legendary Ir. saga in verse. Lays of the Western Gael (1864), Congal—an attempt at epic (1872), and the other matter leading to the collected Poems of 1880 testify to soundness of intention, at least, though a genuine poetic gift is harder to find here than metrical talent abetted by antiquarian scholarship. Yet one can understand the enthusiasm of the young Yeats in referring to Ferguson as "the one man of his time who wrote heroic poetry," even while one prefers the translated folk-songs—Cashel of Munster, Dear Dark Head, etc.—to the original matter.

Like Ferguson, more to be praised in the intention than in the achievement, is Aubrey de Vere (1814-1902), who in The Foray of Queen Maeve . . . (1882) and elsewhere reflected his own explorations of Ir. saga and romance. And with him might perhaps be mentioned William Allingham (1824-89), a fellow of the British Pre-Raphaelites whose The Fairies, at least, seems safely corralled by the anthologists.

Much patriotic verse, poetically of little consequence, had, it should be added, begun to be printed after the "Young Ireland" group got its own periodical—The Nation—in 1842. But conditions in Ireland during these years were hardly conducive to the development of a literary culture. In 1846 the dreadful famine struck; in 1848 the abortive rising under William Smith O'Brien led to deportation and voluntary exile for some promising literary figures; in 1867, scarcely two years after the birth of William Butler Yeats, came the unsuccessful Fenian rising.

In Yeats (1865-1939), of course, the first indubitably great Ir. poet arrived. It is his Wanderings of Oisín (1889—preceding by five years George Russell's Homeward: Songs by the Way) that really ushers in the "Irish Literary Renaissance" (q.v.). Herein Yeats takes up where the bardic poets left off, so to say, for his story of the younger hero of the Finn saga in the Land of the Young is rooted in Comyn's Lay of Oisín.

Through his long life, by example and discourse, Yeats was to lead the poets of his country away from what was facile and rhetorical. A personal passion, a deliberate style, a language that was living speech were the constituents he stood for. He discounted the nationalist propaganda which previous poets thought it was their duty to offer and which, even when not explicit, made their verse rhetorical. The discipline he insisted on is bound to have an enduring effect on Ir. poetry:

Irish poets, learn your trade,
Sing whatever is well made,
Scorn the sort now growing up
All out of shape from toe to top.

And as creator of a national theatre he gave a new faculty to the poets, whose rhythms and accents sometimes recalled those of Dr. Douglas Hyde's translations. Meanwhile such collections as O'Grady's Silva Gadelica (1892) and Sigerson's Bards of the Gael and Gall (1897) had helped to consolidate interest in traditional Ir. lyricism, as well as to intensify concern with that of the many poets of the Renaissance stimulated by Yeats's example. P.C.; G.B.S.

ANTHOLOGIES AND OTHER MATTER IN TR.: The Love Songs of Connacht (1893) and The Religious Songs of Connacht (8 v., 1906), both ed. and tr. D. Hyde; The Voyage of Bran, ed. and tr. K. Meyer (2 v., 1895-97; with an essay by A. Nutt); Duanaire Finn, the Book of the Lays of Finn, ed. and tr. E. MacNeill (1908); Selections from Ancient Ir. Poetry, ed. and tr. K. Meyer (1911); An Anthol. of Ir. Verse, ed. P. Colum (1922; enl. 1947); Bards of the Gael and Gall, ed. and tr. G. Sigerson (3d ed., 1925); K. A. Jackson, Studies in Early Celtic Nature Poetry (1935) and A Celtic Miscellany (1951); The Silver Branch, tr. S. O'Faoláin (1938); The Fountain of Magic (1939) and Kings, Lords, & Commons (1959), both tr. F. O'Connor; 1000 Years of Ir. Poetry, ed. K. Hoagland (1947); Ir. Poets of the 19th C., ed. G. Taylor (1951); Early Ir. Lyrics, ed. G. Murphy (1956); Oxford Book of Ir. Verse, ed. D. MacDonagh and E. S. L. Robinson (1958).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: D. J. O'Donoghue, The Poets of Irel. (1893, 1911); D. Hyde, A Lit. Hist. of Irel. (1899); E. Hull, A Text-book of Ir. Lit. (2 v., 1906-8); R. I. Best, A Bibliog. of Ir. Philol. and of Printed Ir. Lit. (1913) and A Bibliog. . . of Ir. Philol. and of Manuscript Lit. . . 1913-41 (1942); E. Quiggin, Prolegomena to the Study of the Later Ir. Bards 1200-1500 (1914); D. Corkery, The Hidden Irel. (1925); E. Knott, Ir. Syllabic Poetry (1928, 2d ed., 1957); St. J. D. Seymour, Anglo-Ir. Lit., 1200-1582 (1929); J. Vendryes, La Poésie de cour en Irlande et en Galles (1932); R. Flower, The Ir. Tradition (1947); M. Dillon, Early Ir. Lit. (1948); G. B. Saul, The Shadow of the Three Queens (1953); R. K. Alspach, Ir. Poetry from the Eng. Invasion to 1798 (rev. ed., 1958).

See also Six Ir. Poets, ed. R. Skelton (1962); New Poets of Ireland, ed. D. Carroll (1963); A. and B. Rees, Celtic Heritage (1961). G.B.S.

IRISH PROSODY. See CELTIC PROSODY.

IRISH RHYME. See ODL; CELTIC PROSODY.

IRONY. (Gr. eironeia, originally, "dissimulation," especially through understatement). The iron of Gr. comedy was the underdog, weak but clever, who regularly triumphed over the stupid and boastful alazon. The later usage of the term shows the influence of its origin. In Plato's Dialogues, for example, Socrates acts the part of an iron. His questions seem naïve, often pointless, and even foolish; in the end, however, it is Socrates' antagonist whose case is demolished. Hence the term Socratic irony.

Classical rhetoricians distinguished several varieties of i. In i. proper, the speaker is conscious of double meaning and the victim unconscious; in sarcasm both parties understand the double meaning. Other forms include meiosis and litotes (understatement); hyperbole (overstatement); antiphrasis (contrast); asteism and charientism (forms of the joke); chleuasm (mockery); mycterism (the sneer); mimesis (imitation, especially for the sake of ridicule). Depending on their use, pun, paradox, conscious naïveté, parody, etc. can all be ironic. Renaissance critics inherited the whole cumbersome schema of figures worked out by classical rhetoricians. They added little to the critical understanding of i. during the 16th and 17th c. On the other hand, baroque poets and dramatists exploited i. more fully and more consciously than their predecessors. They bequeathed a generally ironic point of view to the writers of the 18th c. In Voltaire and Addison i. is frequently a device for avoiding commitment—perhaps a reflection of skepticism and rationalism. In Swift, one of the great ironists, it is the masque of a saeva indignatio directed against the complacency of the age.

To the German romantics (Schlegel, Tieck, Solger) i. is a means of expressing the paradoxical nature of reality. Since it expressed two meanings simultaneously it could suggest the polarities (e.g., absolute vs. relative; subjective vs. objective; mental categories vs. Ding an sich) which post-Kantian philosophy found everywhere in experience. Romantic i. is a special form of irony described by Tieck and practiced most notably by Jean-Paul Richter and Heinrich Heine: the writer creates an illusion, especially of beauty, and suddenly destroys it by a change of tone, a personal comment, or a violently contradictory sentiment.

Modern discussions have tended to emphasize two main categories of i.: simulation (verbal i) and dramatic i.

Verbal i. is a form of speech in which one meaning is stated and a different, usually antithetical, meaning is intended. In understatement the expressed meaning is mild, and the intended meaning intense; as, for example, Mercutio's comment on his death-wound, "No, 'tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a church door; but 'tis enough, 'twill serve." In overstatement, a device especially common in Am. folk humor, the reverse is true. Often a statement becomes ironic because of its context. When one looks out of his window at a rain storm and remarks to a friend, "Wonderful day, isn't it?" the statement can only be understood in an ironic sense. When Hamlet rejects the idea of suicide with the remark, "Thus conscience does make cowards of us all," his remark is unconsciously ironic because conscience is a sacramental word associated with moral goodness, whereas coward has pejorative connotations. The same kind of i. is illustrated in Comus' speech of seduction, where a true principle (natural fertility) is used to prove an untrue doctrine (libertinism). Often, i. can arise from explicit or implicit contradiction, as when Marvell begins his proposition to his coy mistress with the remark that time is short, and ends with the observation that love can make time pass more quickly ("Thus, though we cannot make our sun / Stand still, yet we will make him run.") Finally, foreshadowing is often ironic. Hamlet's speech on the fall of the sparrow has one meaning in its immediate context and a somewhat different one when considered in connection with Hamlet's own "fall" at the end of the scene.

Naïveté is a special form of i. half way between verbal and dramatic i. Basically, it is a pose of innocence or simplicity. Socrates used it; it appears frequently in the literature stemming from St. Paul's remark that the wisdom of God is the folly of this world, and the wisdom of this world is the folly of God. The tradition of ironic naïveté can be traced in The Praise of Folly, Shakespeare's fools and clowns, Gulliver's Travels, Blake's Songs of Innocence, Dickens' Barnaby Rudge, Dostoevski's Idiot, and Faulkner's Sound and the Fury. An extremely rudimentary example of this form of i. is the stanza,

The golf links lie so near the mill
That almost every day
The laboring children can look out
And see the men at play.
(Sarah N. Cleghorn)

Dramatic i. is a plot device according to which (a) the spectators know more than the protagonist; (b) the character reacts in a way contrary to that which is appropriate or wise; (c) characters or situations are compared or contrasted for ironic effects, such as parody; (d) there is a marked contrast between what the character understands about his acts and what the play demonstrates about them.

Tragedy is especially rich in all forms of dramatic i. The necessity for a sudden reversal or catastrophe in the fortunes of the hero (Aristotle's peripety, which, he said, is found in all true tragedy) means that the fourth form of i. (form d) is almost inevitable. Oedipus Rex piles i. on i. For example, form (a) is present because of the fact that the audience becomes increasingly conscious as the play progresses that Oedipus is rushing blindly to his doom. Form (b) is present because of Oedipus' insistence on pursuing his investigation to its bitter climax (and the fact that his basic motivation is a desire for justice and public welfare is a further i.—his fall is in part caused by his nobility). Form (c) is illustrated in the parallel between blind Tiresias (who can "see" morally) and the figure of Oedipus when he, too, has gained "vision" after blinding himself. Form (d) is, of course, present in the contrast between what Oedipus hopes to accomplish and what he finally does accomplish.

Among later ironists, Chaucer, Montaigne, Shakespeare, Voltaire, Swift, Fielding, Flaubert, Henry James, and Thomas Hardy are especially noteworthy, although this list can only suggest the richness and variety of dramatic i. Shakespeare's plays, because of their multiplicity of characters and fluid act and scene structure abound in dramatic i. of form (c); and often several characters are placed in analogous situations, so that their reactions ironically contrast with each other (e.g., the lovers in As You Like It). The 19th-c. determinists often emphasize "i. of fate," by which is meant the contrast between the individual's conscious aspirations and what fate (or biology or society or psychology or the "immanent will") eventually makes of him. Cosmic i. is the contrast between man's feverish efforts and the indifferent universe, as in Hardy's The Dynasts.

A variety of reasons can be given for the presence of i. in literature. J. H. Robinson, for example, says that man is a child and a savage, the victim of conflicting desires. Man may talk like a sentimental idealist and act like a brute. "Human thought and conduct, can only," he says, "be treated broadly and truly in a mood of tolerant irony." Certain literary critics in the 20th c., including I. A. Richards, Cleanth Brooks, and Robert Penn Warren, have insisted that the truly good poem or work of fiction employs a method of i., in the sense that a writer is aware that his proposition or belief may be relative to opposed propositions and beliefs and, being aware, he expresses a temper of mind and employs a language that is necessarily ironic. Kenneth Burke has said that i. is especially common in 20th-c. literature, and the reason, as he has it, is that we live with "relativistic sciences," like psychology and anthropology, which have tended to undermine once stable values. Whether Burke is correct or not, it remains true that the ironic attitude is common in modern literature. Possibly it is a safe generalization to say that periods in which religious and social opinions are relatively homogeneous will feel less need for the skeptical and ironic mind, but even in such periods i. functions as an agent of qualification and refinement.

J. A. K. Thomson, I., an Historical Introd. (1926); G. G. Sedgwick, Of I., Especially in the Drama (1935); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); D. Worcester, The Art of Satire (1940); W. Van O'Connor, Sense and Sensibility in Modern Poetry (1948); Wellek; Wimsatt and Brooks; G. Dempster, Dramatic I. in Chaucer (1959); R. B. Sharpe, I. in the Drama (1959); I. Stroh Schneider-Kohrs, Die romantische Ironie in Theorie und Gestaltung (1960); N. D. Knox, The Word "I." and its Context, 1500-1755 (1961). v.v.o.c.

ISOCHRONISM. The equality of successive temporal units. In prosody, the assumption that meter (q.v.) consists of a succession of equal-time units (feet, lines, stanzas), said to be isochronous. I. is a term frequently employed by accentual and temporal prosodists (as distinguished from syllabic or accentual-syllabic prosodists) and by those theorists who describe the phonetic phenomena of verse in musical terms. Many maintain that Eng. is a naturally isochronous language, characterized by "a tendency to squeeze units into relatively equal time spans, marked by stress pulses" (S. Chatman, "Robert Frost's 'Mowing': An Inquiry into Prosodic Structure," KR, 18 [1956], 421-38). Those committed to i. as a prosodic assumption (these theorists are sometimes called "stress-timers") hold that a dissyllabic and a trisyllabic foot occupy equal intervals of time. See PROSODY. P.F.

ITALIAN POETICS. See MEDIEVAL, RENAISSANCE, BAROQUE, NEOCLASSICAL, MODERN POETICS.

ITALIAN POETRY. 1200-1400 THE SEED. It. poetry is rooted in spiritual song. The first noble composition in an It. dialect was a deeply felt, though brief, song of thanksgiving and praise to God. Written by St. Francis of Assisi early in the 13th c., it is usually referred to as the Laudes Creaturarum (Praises of God's Creatures). Starting with the word Altissimu, and ending with the word humilitate, the poem is a sustained outpouring of gratitude to God by all of creation for its existence, beauty and goodness. Despite a rather complex versification and rhyme the form as a whole is marked by a primitive simplicity.

ITALIAN POETRY

The earliest forceful poet in It. poetry was Jacopone da Todi (ca. 1230-1306). His collection of 100 laude reveals a highly ascetic and penitent spirit seeking self-annihilation in God through sacred song. His almost morbid descriptions of rotting flesh and the horrors of death achieve poetic proportions when used as analogies to the sinful soul. It is, however, in those poems intended to provide an antidote for this negativism that Jacopone is at his best. Here he points the way to possible redemption in the contemplation of the Incarnation and Passion through the eyes of the Virgin. Only through complete absorption in God can true Love be achieved—the loftiest of all possible goals:

Amore; amore che sì m'hai ferito, altro che amore non posso gridare;
amore, amore, teco so' unito,
altro non posso che te abbracciare;

Love, oh love, you have wounded me so that no other word can I cry out; Love, oh love, so united am I with you that only you can I embrace . . .

At about the same time that Umbria was producing this spiritual poetry, Sicily was being hostess to the brilliant court of Frederick II. Having become an international cultural center, this court gave a new direction to It. poetry. From the Emperor on down, everyone seemed to dabble in poetry—especially the type of courtly love poetry imported from Provence. In reworking the manifold aspects of this theme, this first group of It. poets established metrical forms that set the pattern for two of the principal It. lyric forms, the canzone and the sonnet. The best known members of this "Frederician Circle" were Jacopo da Lentino, Pier della Vigna, Giacomino Pugliese, and Rinaldo d'Aquino. (See SICILIAN SCHOOL.)

With the collapse of Frederick's court in the middle of the 13th c., It. poetry underwent its next significant changes in Tuscany. Here it first experienced a period of abstruse contents and complex form at the hands of staunchly individualistic writers. The most typical representative of this period as well as the first prolific It. poet was Guittone d'Arezzo (d. 1294) whose poetry, on a great variety of themes, was highly intellectual.

By the third quarter of the 14th c. what may be called a new movement in poetry had spread from the University center of Bologna to Florence. Because of a fortunate phrase used by Dante, this movement has since been referred to as the dolce stil nuovo, q.v. ("sweet new style"). Its essence consisted in a formal Christian spiritualization of courtly love. The Beloved actually becomes an Angel of God. The poet whom Dante called the "father" of the school was Guido Guinizelli (ca. 1240-1276). It was his canzone starting Al cor gentil repara sempre Amore . . . that set the pattern for the new direction. The last stanza in Rossetti's translation typifies the new approach:

My lady, God shall ask, "What dared'st thou?"
(When my soul stands with all her acts re-view'd);

"Thou passed'st Heaven, into My sight, as now,
To make Me of vain love similitude.

To Me doth praise belong,

And to the Queen of all the realm of grace
Who endeth fraud and wrong."

Then may I plead: "As though from Thee he came,

Love wore an angel's face:

Lord, if I loved her, count it not my shame."

As this approach to love gained more adherents, the philosophical-mystical elements were supplanted by technical and intellectualistic ones.

Another important member of the movement was Guido Cavalcanti (ca. 1255-1300). His principal contribution consisted in a detailed "psychological" analysis of love as a passion, using "spirits" and "little spirits" to represent various states of mind. This led to a highly involved theory of love which found expression in the dense and lengthy canzone beginning Donna mi prega . . . It is not here, however, that Cavalcanti excels as a poet. It is rather in those sonnets, ballads and canzoni in which he sings of his own love experiences, and in which he reveals an anguished restlessness and passion.

It remained for Dante Alighieri (1265-1321) to gather together the various threads seen thus far. Many and varied were the poems that Dante had composed prior to the Divine Comedy, and everywhere is the influence of his predecessors evident—particularly in his earliest ones. In Dante's hands, however, the theme of fino amor undergoes a significant change: from worldly and self-centered it now becomes religious and selfless. It too is inspired by a beloved, but this time she bears the name Beatrice, a name that assumes a progressively deeper significance as Dante's artistry matures. Already in his earliest noteworthy poem Dante had her partake of the miraculous:

For as she goes by

Into foul hearts a deathly chill is driven

By love, that makes ill thought to perish
there;

While any that endure to gaze on her

Must either be made noble, or else
die. . . .

Also this virtue owns she, by God's Will:

Who speaks with her can never come to
ill. . . .

Humbleness, and the hope that hopeth well,
By speech of hers into the mind are brought,
And who beholds is blessed oftenwhiles.
(Rossetti)

Her presence not only purifies and ennobles, but can even result in actual salvation. By 1293 Dante gathered 31 of his poems on Beatrice, connected them with prose commentaries and called the work the Vita Nova or "New Life." The booklet's importance lies in its being a prefiguration of the Divine Comedy. Dante's apparent concern for artistic effect in his use of a highly mystical and Christian symbolism makes of the book an exalted effort to define the nature of Beatrice and the love she inspires in terms that are highly poetic and Christian at the same time. By the end of the Vita Nova Beatrice stands in relation to Dante as Christ stands in relation to humanity. The entire drama nevertheless remains within the framework of an intensely lyrical story of young and devoted love. Most of the other poems written by Dante in his youth but not included in the Vita Nova bear the imprint of experimentation in technique rather than true lyrical inspiration. Three of these, three long canzoni, Dante incorporated into his highly learned and unfinished Convivio or "Banquet," through which he desired to share his fund of knowledge with other men. The canzoni were to serve as courses while elaborate commentaries were to be the bread. The moral and social direction that the commentaries give to the poems deprive them of whatever freshness they might have originally possessed.

Dante's true greatness as a poet rests, of course, on his Divine Comedy. In it Dante succeeds in giving a vision of life based on the highest ideals and aspirations of Christianity. By making us see the universe through the eyes of God whose presence is reflected everywhere in the poem, Dante achieves a sublimity which has since been unrivaled. Everywhere in the poem one encounters the hand of the Triune God: the terza rima, the 3 cantiche, the 33 canti in each cantica, the 9 divisions of each realm, the very year in which the story unfurls (1300), etc. Everywhere in the poem must one be prepared to see beneath the surface of the image presented to the mind's eye, for to understand God's language calls for maximum concentration. Thus, just as Dante himself, the protagonist, stands for something more than Dante, the same holds true of the hundreds of other characters and events found in the work. But what gives the work exceptional poetic breadth is the drama of love that unfurls from beginning to end, for in showing mankind the way to salvation Dante has recourse to his love for Beatrice who in her death has become the handmaiden of God and the Revealer of the Truth. The Comedy is a veritable paean of Love.

Other poets of the time associated with the "Sweet New Style" were Lapo Gianni, Gianni Alfani, Dino Frescobaldi and Cino da Pistoia (ca. 1265-1337).

With Francesco Petrarca (1304-74) It. poetry reaches its loftiest lyricism. Few poets before Petrarch had sung of human love with longer strain or deeper penetration. No poet has, indeed, exerted a more lasting influence on love poetry throughout the world. Unlike Dante, Petrarch refused to let metaphysical preoccupations interfere seriously with his view of life. He was essentially a moralist whose knowledge of antiquity, unparalleled in his own day, had convinced him that in the ethical area there was no conflict between his three favorite thinkers, Cicero, Seneca, and St. Augustine. It is no wonder, therefore, that his chief poetic symbol, the name of his beloved, should possess an ambiguity not present in Dante. Laura, the ancient laurel or the Christian palm, possesses, as poetic imagery, an internal tension which at the hands of Petrarch attains lofty lyric heights.

Of the more than 400 It. poems written by Petrarch, 366 form his Canzoniere on which his reputation rests. Most of the poems are sonnets, but there are many canzoni, ballads, and madrigals. The collection as a whole is basically a diary or story of Petrarch's love for Laura, proceeding from the life to the death, and then to the transfiguration of the beloved. The work is divided into two parts; the first comprising 263 poems written during Laura's life, the remaining after her death. There are a number of poems on other themes, but the basic theme is the perennial one of unrequited love, with the one actor a poet of exceptional sensibility, refinement and culture. Thus each love poem is a highly polished song revealing a new psychological facet of the drama. While there are many traces of the influence of his Prov. and It. predecessors in Petrarch's lyrics, his Laura is a far cry from the beloved sung by the poets of the "Sweet New Style." The general tone of the collection is neither religious, nor Platonic, nor sensual; it oscillates between these three poles. Just as it is usually the absent rather than the present Laura that is the more suggestive, in the same way those love poems written after her death surpass the others in vividness as the poetry becomes pure reminiscence. Other distinctive features of the Canzoniere are: a new stress on nature description as background for the love motif; an almost haunting sense of the passage of time and the vanity of all things; an intense awareness of the conflict between spiritual and temporal values; a strong interest in public affairs and in the welfare of friends. The opening and closing poems of the collection are recantations for having succumbed to a sinful passion. The very last word of the final poem is Peace which throughout remains the longed-for but unachieved goal.

Technically, Petrarch achieved new levels of perfection in the canzone and the sonnet. His keen sense of euphony, proportion and linguistic exactness gives to his verse an impeccable artistic polish. On the other hand, to use the words of a critic: "Petrarch's very sensitiveness to verbal sounds, to variations in mood, and to imagined similarities betrays him, at times, into plays on words, into over-heightened contrasts, and into strained metaphors that are unworthy of his finer verse—but were appropriated all too readily by his imitators." It was this negative quality of Petrarchan verse that was later to form the substance of "Petrarchism" (q.v.). The other It. work of Petrarch that deserves mention is the Trionfi (Triumphs) which qualify as lofty poetry in their grandeur of conception and in certain isolated portions.

Though possessing neither great depth nor originality, the approximately 125 surviving lyrics of Giovanni Boccaccio (1313-75) possess considerable merit. In them, sonnets, ballate and canzoni, the characteristics of the "Sweet New Style" as modified by Dante and Petrarch receive an imprint of secular sprightliness reminiscent of the spirit of the Decameron. The beloved is now named Fiammetta, "Little Flame," and the background the social scene of Naples. Boccaccio's reputation as a poet rests, however, on a series of longer poems that either became milestones in the evolution of It. poetic genres or had a significant influence on foreign poets, especially Chaucer. These include the Caccia di Diana, the first It. hunting poem; the Filostrato, the first It. romance using ottava rima and written by a nonminstrel; the Teseida, the first epic by a Tuscan writer; and the Ninfale fiesolano, the first It. idyll. Except for the first of these, all of the poems are written in ottava rima, which subsequently became the standard form for It. narrative poetry. Unless the poems are read as Christian or moral allegories, their true value resides primarily in their technical achievements.

Among the many minor lyrists of the mid-14th c., the two outstanding ones were Franco Sacchetti (1330-1400) for the variety of his verse, and Fazio degli Uberti (ca. 1305-1368) for the deeply personal nature of his love poetry.

1400-1600. THE FLOWERING. The moral decadence accompanying the political and social crises of the Christian world during the 14th c. led to a religious revival in the first decade of 1400. As a result the lauda came once again into its own, receiving further amplification in the direction of the religious drama. Among the writers of such pieces, the outstanding were Feo Belcari (1410-84) and Giovanni Dominici (1356-1419). Popular poetry also enjoyed a great vogue at this time. Such poems of this period are usually referred to as giustinianee, after Leonardo Giustinian (1388-1446) whose strambotti and canzonette captured the folk spirit so perfectly that many of them have become part of the folk repertory.

By mid-century vernacular poetry had become so sterile that a contest was organized in 1441 by the famous humanist, Leon Battista Alberti. Known as the certame coronario, "the contest for the crown," it offered a laurel crown of silver to the poet submitting the best poem in It. Not only was there no winner, but the only significant results of the contest were the first attempts to use Latin meters in It. verse.

By the third quarter of the century, a revival set in. The man primarily responsible for the revival was Lorenzo de' Medici (1449-92) in whom was found the rare admixture of the intellectual and practical ruler. He was quick to see the political advantages of encouraging a culture that combined classical elements with the popular tradition. His princely freedom enabled him to write lyrics whose merit and variety made him the most representative poet of the new era. The variety of Lorenzo's verse is reflected not only in the number of different metrical forms he used (canzoni, sestine, ballate, canti carnascialeschi, laude, capitoli, terza rima, ottava rima), but also in the spirit of the poetry, constantly fluctuating between a sensual licentiousness, an intellectual mysticism that often seems sincerely religious, and a sensitivity to the psychological complexities of love, often recalling the stilnovisti or Petrarch but with stronger Platonic overtones. Lorenzo's chief poetic works are his Rime and his Commento sopra alcuni de' suoi sonetti. The former consists of sonnets done mostly after the Petrarchan manner; the latter of about 40 sonnets connected with a prose commentary after the manner of the Vita nuova. His canzoni and sestine attest to his versatility; while his two rhapsodies, the Selve d'amore (Improvisations on Love), envelop the love theme with classical-idyllic imagery so typical of later Renaissance verse. Having made the pre-Lenten celebration of Carnival more spectacular than ever before, Lorenzo also achieved notoriety as writer of the songs sung by participants. Known as ballate or canti carnascialeschi, many are licentious and even obscene. In fact, the spirit of Lorenzo's age is often summarized with the concluding verses of one such song which every It. schoolboy memorizes at an early age:

Quant 'è bella giovinezza, che si fugge tuttavia!
Chi vuol esser lieto, sia:
di doman non c'è certezza.

How beautiful is youth, which is in constant flight!
Let whosoever wishes be joyful:
there is no certainty of tomorrow.

Notwithstanding their intellectual bent, Lorenzo's nine religious laude reflect the spirit of Lent as convincingly as his carnival songs the spirit of Carnival.

The outstanding poet of Lorenzo's circle was Angelo Ambrogini, or Poliziano, as he called himself (1454-94), whose intensely humanistic training made him excel as a writer of odes and epigrams in L. and Gr. Of the various moods reflected in Poliziano's It. lyrics, the most successful one, poetically, was the carefree gaiety of youth against the background of beautiful landscape. Many of his numerous rispetti reflect this mood, but it is in his dance songs, and above all in his Stanze per la giostra (Stanzas for the Tournament) that it achieves superb lyrical expression. The enchantment of the music and polish of Poliziano's verse often conceals a vein of melancholy deriving from the often cited "sense of limit" that characterized much Renaissance poetry. His Stanze per la giostra are as typical of It. Renaissance lyric poetry as Botticelli's work is of early Renaissance painting. The poem was originally intended to celebrate a tournament won by Giuliano, Lorenzo's brother. Giuliano's untimely death, however, caused Poliziano to leave the poem unfinished at a point where the tournament was about to start. Since the 125 octaves of the first book as well as the 46 of the second had been devoted to a highly lyric depiction of the transfiguration of a youth as he enters adolescence and suddenly falls under the magic spell of Beauty and Love, the poem becomes a sublime expression of what one critic calls "the very dream of life." By symbolizing the essence of youth in the adventurous and carefree spirit of the dedicated hunter, and the transfiguration to adolescence in the sudden trapping of the unsuspecting hunter who one day chases a deer to a clearing in which sits a girl of captivating beauty, Poliziano hits upon poetic imagery of superb effectiveness. By then objectifying the power of love and beauty and its relation to youth in an elaborate and vivid description of the Realm of Venus, the poet intensifies still further the poetic effectiveness of the imagery. Stopping where it does, the poem remains a portrayal of youth and love still in potential, unfulfilled and vibrant, thereby leaving the reader with a sense of dream and myth.

The vigorous humanism that gave Florence undisputed supremacy in practically all fields by the end of the 15th c., received a temporary setback in the very last years as a result of the short-lived religious revival led by Savonarola. Meanwhile the Aragonese court of Naples was also sponsoring a group of distinguished poets and artists. One was Benedetto Gareth, better known as Il Cariteo (1450-1514), whose poetry, full of exaggerated Petrarchism and conceits, established him as a true pioneer of secentismo. Another was Jacopo Sannazzaro (1456-1530) who also wrote Petrarchan sonnets and canzoni. The idyllic qualities of his piscatorial eclogues in Latin and of his renowned pastoral novel, the Arcadia, also inform his It. lyrics. His verse furthermore gives evidence of a linguistic polish resembling the forthcoming purism of Bembo's circle.

Elsewhere in Italy, conventional vernacular verse of this period limited itself pretty much to a rather servile Petrarchism. Among the names most often cited as writers of such verse in the latter half of the 15th c. are those of Serafino Aquilano, Antonio Tebaldi, better known as Tebaldeo, and Matteo Maria Boiardo (1434-94) whose collection of lyrics, the best of the century together with those of Lorenzo and Poliziano, is usually overlooked because of his more renowned Orlando Innamorato.

Following the eclipse of the carnival song in Florence at the close of the century, popular poetry elsewhere in Italy continued to show signs of life with the frottola and the barzelletta (q.v.). At the same time, while lyric poetry was becoming mired in the quicksand of an artificial and uninspired Petrarchism, another form of popular poetry, the narrative poem, was coming into its own. Carolingian legends had from very early times taken root in the repertoires of It. cantastorie or minstrels. As these evolved throughout the peninsula, not only were new characters and situations introduced, together with other distinctively It. traits (such as use of the ottava rima, the divisions into two feuding families, etc.), but a new spirit, sometimes verging on disrespect for and mockery of the traditional Paladins and Charlemagne, became typical. It was at the Court of Lorenzo, in the third quarter of the 15th c., that Carolingian matter became for the first time grist for the pen of a court poet. At the request of Lorenzo's mother, Luigi Pulci (1432-84) undertook to write an epic in the popular style with a view to rehabilitating Charlemagne's reputation. In the first version of Pulci's work, the Morgante, this goal was not achieved. Pulci seemed rather to find delight in lingering on the doings of the famed giant, Morgante, of oral tradition, and of the semi-giant, Margutte, an original creation and the first fully developed picaresque figure in European literature. The droll, Rabelaisian spirit given to the work by the antics of these two, received further stress in a later version bearing the title of Morgante Maggiore.

At about the same time, the highly aristocratic court of Ferrara, under the house of Este, was finding special pleasure in the sentimental refinement of Arthurian romances. These also had long been popular in Italy, having been imported from France in the latter half of the 13th c. In Tuscany minstrels had adopted many of the stories either as prose romances or as plots for their cantari. But Tuscan audiences found greater delight in the stirring Carolingian tales. For the almost medieval court of Ferrara, on the other hand, composed of knightly gentlemen and cultured ladies, the Arthurian legends had special appeal. It is not surprising therefore that at this time one of its poets, Boiardo, should have undertaken a serious work dealing with Arthurian matter. In fact, by successfully fusing Arthurian matter with the Carolingian tradition in a single poem, Boiardo initiated a new epic cycle. The work, entitled Orlando Innamorato, still retains the Roland of Carolingian fame as its hero, but he now exemplifies Arthurian romantic love rather than Carolingian prowess. Throughout the poem, written in ottava rima, there is a skillful interweaving of plots and subplots as the poet takes his audience to distant lands of enchantment. The poem was never completed because of the poet's untimely death.

The new epic cycle instituted by Boiardo had such appeal for the Court of Ferrara that by 1506 another poet, Ludovico Ariosto (1474-1533), undertook to complete Boiardo's poem. In taking up Boiardo's story where it had left off, Ariosto cures Roland of his skirt-chasing vice by leading him through a series of events culminating in a violent insanity which leaves him only after divine intervention. Roland thus becomes once again the champion of yore as he leads Charlemagne's forces to ultimate victory. Some distinctive features of the poem include: an unparalleled perfecting of the ottava rima as well as of the technique of keeping several plots going simultaneously; a highly effective irony resulting from the periodic intrusion of the poet reminding the listener or reader that the story is fictitious; a sane and robust humor that prevails even in the most serious episodes; the complete rehabilitation of Charlemagne; numerous episodes open to allegorical interpretation; and a pervasive sense of classical beauty.

Throughout the turbulent years of the 16th c. Petrarchism reigned supreme in It. lyric poetry. By the first quarter of the century, it had actually become a literary canon or doctrine largely through the efforts of Pietro Bembo (1470-1547), an active courtier who eventually became literary dictator of his age. Much of the Petrarchan verse in the first half of the century, however, escaped the stigma of cold imitation, first because of the influence of the Neoplatonic movement of the time; and secondly because of a sense of formal elegance and good taste that dominated the versification. At the head of the better followers of the Petrarchan manner at this time must be placed Bembo himself, whose sonnets, canzoni, and ballate reflect an elegance that contrasts sharply with the distorted Petrarchism of a Cariteo or a Tebaldeo. Yet, even his poetry contains a virtuosity of diction that attests to the refined tastes of a literary admirer of Petrarch rather than to the effects of personal inspiration. There were also a number of women who wrote personal Canzonieri. Among these, the most capable were Vittoria Colonna, Gaspara Stampa and Veronica Gamba.

Notwithstanding the temptation of confusing poet and artist, the evaluation of the lyrics of Michelangelo (1475-1564) as among the best of the 16th c. is certainly justifiable. His about 200 completed poems as well as many of the uncompleted ones contain many echoes of the "Sweet New Style," of Dante, of Petrarch, of Savonarola and of the Neoplatonism of Ficino.

Despite the general disagreement among critics regarding the relative merits of the lyrics of Torquato Tasso (1544-95), recent criticism has tended to reevaluate his poetry on the basis of its modern traits. Of his nearly 2,000 lyrics, a good number suffer from a formal Petrarchism or from an intellectualistic vein. The great majority of the poems are inspired by ladies in whose understanding and beauty Tasso sought consolation. The inspiration found expression in traditional lyric forms, but the better ones, especially among the madrigals, possess a musical and rhythmic beauty and a wealth of imagery that often seem to anticipate 19th c. Fr. symbolism. This was the same Tasso who wrote the Gerusalemme Liberata (completed in 1575), Italy's foremost "heroic poem." Just as in the high Renaissance Boiardo and Ariosto had turned to Carolingian-Arthurian matter to write a narrative poem that would appeal to the highly secular Court of Ferrara; so a half century later, in the same Court, but in the midst of the Counter-Reformation, Tasso turns to the first Crusade in his attempt to write a truly Christian epic. Like the Furioso, Tasso's poem uses the Christian-Saracen conflict as its theme; concentrates on knightly prowess; makes wide use of love as a motivating drive; abounds in episodes of feminine valor and of fantastic adventures; and has frequent recourse to enchantments and divine intervention. However, while Ariosto had sung of "ladies, knights, arms, loves, courtesies and bold adventures," Tasso now sings "the pious arms and the Captain who liberated the great sepulchre of Christ."

There is little doubt that in the storming and capture of Jerusalem Tasso saw a theme open to spiritual interpretation. In fact, he himself wrote a highly medieval allegorization of the poem. His lyrical nature, however, had made him succeed much more with those episodes depicting the varying emotions of the several lovers than with those intended to portray the love affairs as sinful temptations that obstruct man's road to salvation. When he later tried to correct this by eliminating a number of such episodes and adding others, the result, entitled Gerusalemme conquistata, was but a cold echo of the Liberata. Rather than the vigor, irony and good humor of the Furioso, the dominant qualities of the Liberata are a sweetness touched with melancholy, and a sustained dignity. Tasso's was one of the last great voices that had helped Italy maintain a cultural predominance over the rest of Europe for three centuries. The three great themes of its poetry since 1200 had been love, religion, and patriotism. It was in a sense unfortunate that all three themes found sublime expression in the early stages of the rise of the vernacular, for as a result the imitation of Dante, Petrarch and Boccaccio became the rule, rather than personal inspiration. This, of course, could only lead to stagnation.

1600-1760. THE DROUGHT. The stagnation of It. poetry in the 17th c. was actually due to a variety of causes. Not only did political and religious factors tend to stifle inspiration, but the fact that poetry had already undergone its period of glory while other arts, especially music and architecture, were about to reach new levels of vitality, now relegated poetry to the role of handmaiden rather than mistress. It was indeed these two arts that now gave poetry still another direction, for musicality together with elaborate and extended figures of speech and constructions became the most desired qualities of versification. The metaphor tending toward shocking conceits and witticisms became the order of the day. Figures such as "the young leaf that weaves the shade together with the sun" enjoyed high favor. As for the contents, no matter was too trivial. In retrospect, however, these general tendencies of secentismo, as the movement was called (from Seicento-17th c.), and as is the case with all decadent tendencies, contained within them a seed for future growth. This was a new consciousness of the intrinsic value of the written and spoken word which is capable of arousing images, impressions and sensations that constitute the essence of life. Naturally, a great deal of exaggeration resulted from the application of this new discovery, but it is not difficult to see latent within it an attitude suggestive of modern theories of aesthetics.

These new tendencies were pushed to their extremes by Giambattista Marino (1569-1625) whose name is often used to designate the movement (marinismo, q.v.). Poetry for Marino was but a means to personal glory, and had as its chief object the arousing of surprise and marvel. Whence the exaggerated rhetorical devices that abound everywhere in his poetry. His principal work is the long, lascivious poem Adone, published in Paris in 1623. Intended originally as an account of the simple love story of Venus and Adonis, the poem took about 20 years to complete and in its 20 cantos in ottava rima covers an abundance of heterogeneous material abounding in far-fetched and sometimes bizarre situations and figures of speech. His three other collections of lyrics were the Lira, the Galleria, and the Sampogna. In each work the lyrical and suggestive power of the word seems to be Marino's basic concern. Admirers of Marino's manner were not only numerous, but in many cases ranged far beyond the master's extremes. The excesses of the extremists were such as to produce a poem comparing Mary Magdalen's hair to a river, her eyes to suns, and, consequently, her weeping over Christ to bathing His body with suns and drying it with rivers!

There was also a less radical side to secentismo. Among those who were almost untouched by the excesses of marinismo and who felt instead the pull of classical versification, the outstanding one was Gabriello Chiabrera (1552-1638). Of his massive production, his pindaric canzoni and especially his anacreontic canzonette are the only ones possessing some poetic virtues. A deep religious faith inspired the most powerful poetic voice of the It. 17th c., that of the dominican Tommaso Campanella (1568-1639). Despite a life fraught with persecutions, Campanella was the author of a prodigious number of works in both prose and poetry, in L. and It. His lyrics develop primarily the three themes of the greatness of God, the ignorance and evil of man, and the praises of God's creatures.

Between 1690 and 1760 a concerted drive was made against the excesses of 17th c. poetry. An actual Academy was organized in 1690 with the specific purpose of eliminating bad-taste from It. poetry by returning to classical standards. Since the new goal was to be a pastoral simplicity, the name given to the Academy was "Arcadia." In its condemnation of marinismo and promotion of classic taste, the movement performed a noble literary service, but poetry now became but a form of rhythmic and musical virtuosity. For this reason it found its best expression in the arias and other lyrical moments of the libretti of Pietro Metastasio (1698-1782) and in his separate canzonette and sonnets.

1760-1860. THE NEW ROOTS. The political vicissitudes of Northern Italy during the early and middle portions of the 18th c. generated a social consciousness which began to find its way into poetry toward the third quarter of the century. Its first clear voice was that of Giuseppe Parini (1729-99) who in 1763 began publication of Italy's most famous satire, a long poem in blank verse entitled Il Giorno. The poem depicts the typical day of an It. giovine signore, or gallant, of the times as seen through the eyes of his preceptor. The work is divided into four parts, Morning, Noon, Evening, and Night. The distinctive quality of the poem is a persistent irony arising from the deadly serious tone with which the poet treats the triviality and pettiness of the gallant's activities. The pervasive elegance of the verse, with its mixture of classical and baroque imagery, adds considerably to the irony. In exposing the absurdity, the injustice and the cruelty of the reigning aristocracy, the poem is a lofty expression of deep indignation. Parini's moral, civic and pedagogical convictions form the basis of 19 odes which, in their lyrical treatment of subject matter (civic, pedagogic) that had hitherto been considered outside the province of poetry, represent a reaction against Arcadia and the opening of new horizons for subsequent It. poetry.

The poet who, next to Petrarch and Michelangelo, gave the strongest personal imprint to the It. sonnet was Vittorio Alfieri (1749-1803), known primarily as Italy's foremost tragedian. Inspired essentially by an overpowering sense of liberty, Alfieri's sonnets are spontaneous outcries of an intensely proud and strong-willed soul rebelling against any form of undue restriction. This, together with a highly personal style, causes even his love lyrics, of obvious Petrarchan inspiration, to assume distinctive qualities. The principal themes of Alfieri's poetry are love, glory, liberty, art and death; while its predominant tone is tragic and melancholic and seems to have its roots in the perennial dissatisfaction and restlessness that typified the poet's own life and prompted some critics to characterize him as "protoromantic."

The most distinctive quality of It. poetry since 1200 had been its literary and learned character. It was largely bookish and scholarly in its conscious attempt to reflect a high degree of culture. In fact, few were the better poets who were not also noteworthy men of letters. The neoclassical tastes of the third quarter of the 18th c., together with the new advances of the Enlightenment, made it a propitious time for this quality of It. poetry to emerge full force. With Vincenzo Monti (1754-1828) we have the lettered poet par excellence. Everywhere in his poetry can be heard echoes either of Antiquity or of Dante or of the Renaissance or of the recent Ossianic fad. (Basvilliana, Il Bardo della selva nera, Prometeo)

The infiltration of northern romanticism into Italy never succeeded in entirely supplanting the essentially classical traits of It. poetry. The poems of Ugo Foscolo (1778-1827) represent the almost perfect fusion of the spirit of romanticism with the classical sense of harmony and beauty. Foscolo's early poetry reflects a variety of influence, ranging from Petrarch, the Arcadia, and Parini, to Ossian, Rousseau and Young. Though mediocre for the most part, it reveals a constant improvement in technique—especially in the composition of the ode, a form in which Foscolo seemed to be most at home. His romantic side emerges full force in his twelve sonnets, many of obvious Petrarchan inspiration, which are usually listed among the best of the 19th c. Foscolo's best known work is Dei sepolcri (On Sepulchers), a long poem in blank verse, in which the classical and the romantic are in almost perfect harmony. The basic inspiration is the strong personal reaction of the poet to a Fr. decree stating that all tombstones in Milan were thenceforth to be of identical size and form. In arguing against the decree, the poem becomes the answer of the heart to what appears to be inexorable reason. Despite the dialectic, the poem proceeds by lyrical flights as the poet adduces the history of civilization, the cult of the dead in various epochs, and great men of the past and present. The second half of the poem, however, is a hymn to immortality in which can be felt a tragic sense of illusion as the poet becomes aware of the fact that even the grave is a temporary expedient in the unending flux of life. For many, Foscolo's masterpiece is an unfinished elaborate poem entitled Le grazie in which the poet attempts to depict the function and mission of the Graces as initiators of wisdom and beauty.

Just as Parini, Alfieri and Monti had been the chief poetic voices of the It. Rinascimento, the "Renewal" of It. thought and letters; so Foscolo, Manzoni and Leopardi are the first three great poets of the Risorgimento, the great political "Resurgence" of Italy extending from Napoleon's death to the establishment of the It. Kingdom in 1870. Of these, Alessandro Manzoni (1785-1873) was not only most directly involved in the political events of the period but was among the chief It. theoreticians of romanticism. Though his fame rests upon his novel I Promessi Sposi, he wrote many lyrics attesting to his greatness as a poet. The single event of his life that had the deepest influence on his poetry was his conversion to Catholicism in 1810. Prior to this time he had written much poetry in the conventional neoclassic manner, some of which (In morte di C. Imbonati, Qual su le Cinzie cime, Urania and Adda) contained promise of potential blossoming. Following his conversion, his poetry constantly reflected a highly Christian philosophy. Between 1812 and 1822 he wrote five Inni sacri intended as lyrical glorifications of the principal feast days of the Church: the Resurrection, the Name of Mary, Christmas, the Crucifixion, and Pentecost. Each hymn consists of 12 or more stanzas, but the metrical structure varies. The tone is solemn and dignified, after the classical manner, but the spirited fluency with which Manzoni gives human significance to divine rites reveals a distinctive modernity. Manzoni's lyricism also takes wing in his two historical tragedies, Il Conte di Carmagnola and Adelchi, written in the years 1816-22. Tragedies only in outward form, they are rather lyric resolutions of tragic situations. This might also be said of his famous ode, Il cinque maggio, on the rise and fall of Napoleon's star.

With Giacomo Leopardi (1798-1837) we come to the poet who, alongside Petrarch, represents the highest point of development of It. lyric poetry. It is to Leopardi that 20th-c. It. poets have turned as master. Yet, despite its modernity, Leopardi's poetry affords an outstanding example of how the literary and learned nature of It. poetry can be made to reinforce its lyric power. In relation to the poetry of Manzoni, Leopardi's is, as it were, the other side of the same coin. While Manzoni's seeks to resolve the perennial grief and despair of mankind in the utter abandonment and faith in God and in the Hope of a better world to come; Leopardi's is basically the recognition of the illusory nature of this solution and the acceptance of the nonexistence of any solution. Life, for Leopardi, is but a Great Betrayal by nature, and man's greatness consists in his awareness of this fact.

Leopardi's lyrics, usually collected under the title of Canti, fall into four distinct periods. In the pre-Canti period (1810-18) we see the youthful poet, eager for knowledge and fame, revealing such traits as the admiration for unsuccessful valor and civic pride (La morte di Ettore, La morte di Saulle); a deeply idyllic temperament (La Campagna, La Mietitura); as well as a bent for light verse verging on satire (Alla sorella, La Dimenticanza). This was also a period of intensive study and meditation which bore fruit in the second period (1818-1823). During these years Leopardi wrote five great patriotic canzoni on the vicissitudes of Italy and on her state of vile subjection (All'Italia, Sopra il monumento di Dante, Nelle nozze della sorella Paolina). It is also at this time that the illusory nature of human values begins to emerge as a recurrent theme. Thus, in the canzone, Bruto minore, Leopardi has Brutus proclaim virtue utter folly as he is about to take his life: "Foolish virtue, misty caves and fields of restless larvae are your schools, and repentance is your reward to your followers." Only the Patriarchs knew happiness, for they lived in the age of myth when harmony prevailed between man and nature (Alla primavera, Inno ai Patriarchi). One of Leopardi's loftiest lyrical moments is his short idyll, L'Infinito, in which the poet finds a temporary solution to the problem of human misery in a self-annihilation in the infinity of space and time. In almost all these poems there is a constant clash between the serenity of nature and the state of the poet. The second period ends with a ray of hope as the poet seeks solace in human love; but even his lady turns out to be but an illusory ideal (Alla sua donna).

The third period (1824-28) was likewise one of deep meditation. This found expression in several prose works of a philosophic or philosophical nature, and, ultimately, poetic sublimation in the poems of the fourth period (1828-37). Rays of light also dot the works of this period. In Il Risorgimento the poet expresses a strong will to live, even if life is grief, and a willingness to succumb to some of the illusions besetting mankind. In A Silvia the dreams of youth emerge as symbols of Hope. But these themes are quickly supplanted by the conviction that pleasure is but the cessation of pain (Quiete dopo la tempesta) or that it is nothing more than an anticipation (Il sabato del villaggio). The tragic sense of human unhappiness emerges again in the famous Canto notturno di un pastore errante dell'Asia in which an oriental shepherd gives voice to his bewilderment as he observes the relentless working of Nature. The ecstasy of love and delusion is sung in a series of poems that includes Il pensiero dominante and A se stesso, of which the latter again echoes a bitter outcry for self annihilation. La Ginestra, Leopardi's last and most significant poem, is a panoramic synthesis of his entire outlook on life. The lowly broom plant on the slopes of Vesuvius serves as a symbol of the tenacity with which life and beauty continue to survive despite the enmity of nature. Man must accept his destiny heroically without recourse to forces other than those residing within himself, for these are the bonds of human brotherhood.

The greatness of Leopardi's poetry lies in the fact that it takes the very essence of the thought and feeling of a highly learned and extremely sensitive poet and converts it into notes of sublime song. Every line, every word gives evidence of an extraordinary acuteness for tonality and rhythm. As a result, its musicality seems to produce what has been called "a catharsis of grief."

Romanticism assumed distinctive characteristics in Italy, and for a variety of reasons produced only minor poets. One of the chief reasons was that its energy was at that time being channeled in the direction of national unity. As a result, most of the poetry was inspired by patriotic zeal or by a spirited longing for freedom and independence. One of the earliest and strongest exponents of romanticism in Italy was Giovanni Berchet (1783-1851). In 1816, in a pamphlet entitled Lettera semiseria di Grisostomo, he defended the position that poetry should be addressed, not to the intellectuals nor to the ignorant, but to those classes in-between; that it should deal with matters of national or contemporary interest; and that it should be a direct expression of feeling. As a poet, he tried hard to achieve these goals, but with little success. Among the satirists of the period, Giuseppe Giusti (1809-50) was the most brilliant. Typically composed of brief stanzas and short lines, his satires are founded on a great love of Italy. They satirize such evils as bureaucracy, pacifism, false patriots, mechanized education and demagoguery.

The new romantic emphasis on popular themes resulted in a widespread use of dialect in verse. In fact, two of Italy's greatest dialect poets wrote at this time. The first was Carlo Porta (1775-1821) who used the dialect of Milan in writing a number of humorous pieces relating to the contemporary scene. The other was Giuseppe Belli (1791-1863) whose two thousand sonnets represent the epic of the common people of Rome.

A poet whose reputation suffered considerably because of an erratic personality was Niccolò Tommaseo (1802-74) known also for his novels and philological studies. Religion, Grief, Nature, and the Cosmos are the chief themes of his poetry. Perhaps the most typically romantic Italian poet of the mid-19th c. was Giovanni Prati (1815-84). His prolific output brought him much popularity in his day, especially his long Byronic poem on contemporary Venetian life, Edmenegarda. His best work appears in the two collections Psiche and Iside, especially in the latter in which he analyzes the manifold aspects of Nature in an atmosphere of dream and myth. One of the more powerful poets of mid-century was Giacomo

Zanella (1820-88), a priest and professor whose staunch faith inspired many poems on the relationship of religion and science. His salute to scientific progress is tempered by the strong sense of Man's original stain. All the inventions of science, he sings in one poem, "do not decrease the grief which, eternal companion to the weak Adam, flows through the furrows of earth."

Around mid-century a group of Roman poets, known as the "Roman School," organized a resistance movement against the inroads of French and English romanticism and called for the reinstatement of puristic classical standards. In reaction there arose in Milan a group of poet-artists, styled the scapigliati ("the disheveled ones"), who advocated daring novelities in all the arts. Influenced strongly by such continental poets as Baudelaire, De Nerval, Verlaine, Rimbaud, and Mürger, their rallying principle was the affinity of the arts. In actuality they represent but a link between secentismo and the forthcoming "isms" that form the intermittent chain of decadentism in Italian art and letters. Three of the stricter adherents of the group were Emilio Praga (1839-75), Arrigo Boito (1842-1918), and Giovanni Camerana (1845-1905).

1860-1960. THE NEW HARVEST. A reaction to the excesses of romanticism and of the scapigliati was inevitable. It was led polemically and in practice by Italy's outstanding poet of the third quarter of the century, Giosuè Carducci (1835-1907). His "reform" was basically a return to the noble and learned tradition of Italian poetry and a revolt against the sentimentality and morbidity of Nordic romanticism. Reared in rough country by a rude and liberal father, and strongly influenced by a highly humanistic education, Carducci developed a robust character typical also of his writings. At twenty-one he founded a literary society of "Pedant Friends" whose object was the defense of classical and pagan values. His anticlerical convictions never left him, though they were, along with others, somewhat tempered in later life. At the age of twenty-five he became Professor of Italian Literature at Bologna; and in 1906 he won the Nobel Prize for literature. In his first collection, Juvenilia, we see the young poet feeling his way as he imitates great classical and Italian poets. In the Levia gravia (Light and Serious Verse), the poet, in his early thirties, becomes aware of the stark reality that impedes his ideals. In 1863 his true character bursts forth in his Inno a Satana (Hymn to Satan), exalting the forces of nature and Reason and denouncing the repressions of traditional religion. This was followed by a collection of Giambi ed epodi (Iambics and Epodes) representing the loftiest political poetry of the 19th c. With the Rime nuove Carducci reached his poetic maturity. The old spirit of rebellion is still present, but with stricter control. All of Carducci's world finds echo for the first time in this collection: his youthful aspirations, past memories, nature, and significant moments of Italian history. Among the more famous poems are: Traversando la maremma toscana (On Crossing the Tuscan Maremma), Il bove (The Ox); San Martino; Pianto antico; Primavera elleniche; Davanti San Guido; Faida di comune (Communal Feud); and ça ira (the battle cry of the Fr. Revolution). In his Odi barbare (Barbarian Odes) Carducci imitates the cadences and patterns of Latin strophes in an attempt to give to what he considered classic moods an expression far removed from the simple Romantic forms. The Rime e ritmi continue the same strains, with the Alps as background and the poet, standing on the mount of centuries, looking deeply into the past to prophesy the future. Generally speaking, the chief characteristics of Carducci's poetry are an intense hatred for moral decadence, a confidence in Man, Nature, and Art, a worship of the classical past, an intense conviction that the seeds of greatness still lie in Italy, and a constant concern for form.

There followed in the wake of Carducci a rather widespread movement in the direction of what has been called "professorial poetry." This had as themes not only nature and personal feelings but historical and civic ones as well. Its solemn and dignified tone as well as its obvious pedagogical intent attested to learned authors rather than to poets in close communion with nature.

A typical characteristic of European poetry in the last quarter of the 19th c. was a constant wavering between the exaltation of scientific progress and a state of bitterness or disillusion toward the sciences. This was also true in Italy. A poet who gave voice to both attitudes was Mario Rapisardi (1844-1912), professor and translator of Lucretius, Horace, Catullus, and Shelley. In four of his poems, Palingensi, Lucifero, Giobbe, and Atlantide, he attempted a sweeping historical panorama of his age, including such areas as the new social ideals, the assault of Science on Dogma, and the overpowering sense of Mystery and Grief. The same general tendencies may be observed in the poetry of Arturo Graf (1848-1913), likewise a professor of literature.

The anxieties and turmoil occasioned by the sweeping social changes at the turn of the century were sung with depth and feeling by a poetess, Ada Negri (1870-1945). Work and maternity, used as symbols of punishment for the transgression of Adam and Eve, constitute her chief themes. Despite the softer accents of many of her lyrics, Ada Negri remains essentially a rebellious, strong and impetuous soul in her resentment over the working and living conditions of the lower classes. Fatalità, Tempeste, Maternità are the titles of her earlier works.

An almost perfect fusion of the traditional erudition of It. poetry and the spiritual disorientation of the turn of the century occurred in the poetry of Gabriele d'Annunzio (1863-1938). A child prodigy, he became a versatile writer as well as a daring patriot and adventurer. His prodigious poetic output and incredible linguistic facility has been variously adjudged a continuation of the sensual and erotic poetry stemming from the Ovidian tradition, the work of a dilettante in sensations, or effusions of an orator. While all these judgments contain some truth, the formidable influence exerted by d'Annunzio on It. poetry cannot be minimized. His earliest verses, Primo vere (In Early Spring), already contain the germs of the later d'Annunzio: an heroic accent, a love of fatherland, a taste for the morbid, a voluptuous delight for beautiful and musical words set in classical rhythms, and a special predilection for transfiguring the physical aspects of Nature into song. The influence of Carducci, obvious in this first collection, largely disappears in the second, Canto novo, despite the continued presence of classical elements. Here the prevailing tone is a "cosmic exuberance" that prompted one critic to refer to the collection as, "an explosion of colors, of lights and of Wagnerian sonorities." With his Intermezzo di rime d'Annunzio achieves a stylistic mastery of the sonnet and the ottava, and, at the same time, abandons himself to the excesses of decadentism. In the collections, Isotteo and La chimera we see d'Annunzio's relentless experimentation with form. The first is an elaborate redoing of 14th and 15th c. Tuscan lyrical forms, while the second contains elaborations of the sensual motifs of the Intermezzo in a variety of forms, including a Japanese outa.

The 25 Elegie romane are basically a love song with Renaissance and 17th c. Rome as background. In the Poema paradisiaco, on the other hand, the poet's romanticism bursts forth as he celebrates the simple family life following a life of utter dissipation. The poem might be said to represent a spiritual convalescence, and offers many indications of the influence of Verlaine and Maeterlinck. With the Laus vitae we come to another phase in the spiritual evolution of d'Annunzio: the celebration of heroic morality, or the heroism of the Nietzschean Superman. The new hero is a reborn pagan Ulysses, superior to Christ Himself. In this hymn to life, which often reaches Dionysian proportions, d'Annunzio used an original form: stanzas of 21 verses with verse lengths varying from 5 to 9 syllables. Alcyone marks the peak of d'Annunzio's artistry, symbolized in the image of Summer whose celebration constitutes the main theme of the collection. The poem is a fulfilment of the poet's conviction that Man's ultimate destiny is an harmonious identification with Nature, and in it he portrays his spirit as being abandoned "to the voracious melodies of the winds." All of nature consequently becomes musical sensation. The Alcyone has been called one of the greatest poems of the last two centuries.

Despite the widespread influence of d'Annunzio, the most accomplished poet of the turn of the century was Giovanni Pascoli (1855-1912) who has been called "poet of the neutral zone of our spirit . . . of the indefinite and the occult . . . the most original of the It. 20th c. . . because nurtured by a more profound classical culture which became humanitas. . . ." His youth, spent amidst the simplicities of rural life, plus a series of domestic tragedies and hardships left deep impressions on the poet's sensibility. Successor of Carducci at Bologna and renowned classical scholar, Pascoli spent his last years teaching and writing poetry. The title of his first collection, Myricae (Tamarisks) already attests to a new sort of inspiration. Of Virgilian derivation, the title refers to the idyllic-descriptive nature of the short poems that constitute its bulk. They deal mostly with the manifold aspects of country life, none of which were too small or too insignificant for the poet's keen sensibility. This can be seen in such titles as, Trees and Flowers, The Hedge, The River, The Nest. The greater part of these earlier lyrics gives the impression of having been written by a young boy who, in his musings, discovers that in order to recall pleasant things, they must first come to an end or die . . . that beauty exists only because of death. In keeping with this child-like perspective, the verses are brief and rapid, with onomatopoeia a recurring device and with a conscious predilection for minute distinctions of form, sound and action. Two subsequent collections, Canti di Castelvecchio and Poemeti, renew and extend the themes and moods of the Myricae, though there now prevails an elegiac-meditative tone. The sense of the mystery of life and death becomes stronger as the poet's vision begins to range beyond the simple rural life and he feels the full anguish of mankind surrounded by the mystery of its destiny. Pascoli is at his greatest when, in an almost childlike stupor, he attempts to penetrate the essence of the simple and the little. As he does so, his marvel increases upon discovering that in each small life there is a new universe surrounded by mystery. By translating this experience into images and sounds betraying the bewildered heart of the young child, Pascoli succeeds in creating a fusion of myth and reality. In addition, he uncovered new stamping grounds for It. poetry, grounds whose location in the neutral, greyish zones of consciousness was to be typical of the poetry later called crepuscular.

The term "crepuscular poetry" was first used by G. Borgese to refer to "the voice of a great poetry which is passing away," meaning by this the poetry written after Carducci, Pascoli and d'Annunzio. The expression, however, has since acquired ideological connotations. It also refers to the poetry of the period having all or some of the following characteristics: the poet's propensity for solitude, a subdued tone akin to Christian humility, a predilection for viewing Nature at dusk, a philosophical intuition of life symbolized by the daily passage of light into shadow, a preference for simple themes dealing with domestic and rural life with all its goodness and serenity, a "poetry like prose," and a heavy sense of weariness.

Of all the crepuscular poets, Guido Gozzano (1883-1916) continues to be the most popular. His fanatic determination to escape the influence of d'Annunzio led to an ironical tone that in turn smacks of the superman, while the women he sings attest to a sensuality and a worldliness akin to d'Annunzio's. Another crepuscular poet was Corrado Govoni (1884-) who came closest to Pascoli in the vastness of his production on rural life.

The antitraditionalism of the apparently defunct scapigliati erupted anew in the manifesto of the so-called school of futurism (q.v.). In an attempt to oppose something new to the poetry of Carducci, d'Annunzio, and Pascoli, the manifesto proclaimed complete anarchy not only in versification but in the use of words and in inspiration. Blank verse was the new king, and the electric motor was the symbol for the new dynamic spirit that was to invest poetry. In some manifestations it had much in common with Fr. surrealism and dadaism. But being a polemical rather than a strictly poetic movement, Futurism produced no noteworthy poetry.

It might be mentioned parenthetically that dialect poetry also prospered at this time, primarily at the hands of the Neapolitan, Salvatore di Giacomo (1860-1934) and the two Romans, Cesare Pascarella (1858-1940) and Carlo Salustri (1873-1950) better known as Trilussa.

The one poet who from the early twenties has held a place apart in the development of contemporary It. poetry and yet is today considered one of the top three, is Umberto Saba (1883-1957). In 1928 he integrated his several collections into a single one entitled Il canzoniere, intending thereby to establish a link with the past masters, Petrarch and Leopardi. His essential inspiration is a detailed analysis of the "convolutions of his mind." This autobiographical direction resulted in a prosaic tone that often interfered with the quality of his earlier verses, and even in his later ones creates the misconception that they are of an extreme simplicity. The style also contributes to this effect, interspersing clearly traditional expressions with dialectal ones and even with the obscurities of the decadents. It is, however, in the originality of his conception rather than in his technique that his merit emerges. The theme of the poet's life as a prototype of poetry, in that it was but a constant panting after the resolution of discords, is a recurring one. The conflict between the poet's desire to verbalize his love of life in its external aspects and the compelling necessity of turning inward to examine his actual status produces disturbing tensions and discords leading to an oddly appealing lyrical unease.

Saba's isolated position receives relief when we consider that the other two of the top three contemporary It. poets, Giuseppe Ungaretti (b. 1888) and Eugenio Montale (b. 1896) spawned a movement known as hermeticism (q.v.), which emerged in Italy following the clash between supporters of advance guard ideas and reactionaries. The conflict imperceptibly led to what has been called "the progressive erosion of the narrative and logical elements" in poetry, which in turn led to a poetry based on the compelling need to project internal movements immediately and photographically at their moment of inception, the so-called "flash of inspiration" or "pure poetry" that could encompass an instant (atomism) or longer periods of sustained inspiration. This new poetry also entailed widespread use of highly personalized language, experiences and complex devices (analogy) which, when used to excess, often produced eccentric and bizarre poetry. One of the first singers of the new poetry was Dino Campana (1885-1932) whose Canti orfici (1914) and eccentric personality (strongly resembling Rimbaud) had a strange appeal to younger writers. His constant striving after a poetry which would establish a direct contact with another "reality" by being shorn of all intellectual categories led to a poetry whose merits are still being debated.

Ungaretti's figure still looms the largest among the exponents of hermeticism. His earlier collections center around his experiences as a soldier, and often contain extremely brief pieces whose full effect was intended to be conveyed as much by the silences and the blankness surrounding them as by the words. The extreme example is a poem entitled Una colomba (A Dove), consisting of a single verse:

D'altri diluvi una colomba ascolto.

I listen to a dove of other floods

At other times the technique attempts to prolong a single instant eternally, as in Godimento:

. . . . Stanotte
avrò un rimorso come un latrato perso in un deserto.

Tonight I shall have a remorse like a howling lost in a desert.

Most of Ungaretti's earlier poems were collected in a single collection under the title Vita d'un uomo (1947). He published another collection, La terra promessa, in 1950 in which the tendency to make technique a primary preoccupation gives way to more classic inspiration.

The third member of the triumvirate is Eugenio Montale. His early and strong interest in T. S. Eliot had a direct bearing on the direction of his poetry. As one critic pointed out, ". . . better than any other Italian Montale has realized the objective correlative [q.v.], and his complete identification of sentiment with things seems to have been a particular difficulty for It. critics, who are fond of pointing out the 'scabrosity' and 'rockiness' of Montale's poetry." His earlier poetry does linger on well-defined concrete images which are used as a rocky enclosure for a terribly arid life vainly seeking relief in a metaphysical which is itself in turn engulfed in the "scabrosity." This is especially true in his collection significantly entitled Ossi di seppia (Sepia Bones, 1925) in which the poet's cosmos is essentially a prison. In this earlier poetry, Montale's inspiration, unlike Eliot's, seems to proceed from an external object to the correlated feeling. As the poet moves to his later collections, Le occasioni (1939) and Finisterre (1943), there is a progressively greater turning inward and humanization: "the psychological element takes control and the new work becomes a labyrinth of presences in a kind of timeless time where there are memories of the future and previsions of the past."

If post-World War II poetic merit can be based on the winning of one of the better poetry prizes offered annually in Italy, the following poets deserve mention: Sergio Solmi, Fine di stagione (1933), Poesie (1950); Camillo Sbarbaro, Trucioli (1949); Libero de Libero, Banchetto (1949); and especially Alfonso Gatto whose Nuove Poesie (1950) and La forza degli occhi (1954) have been called "from the standpoint of technique, the most exciting volumes to appear in these last years." On the other hand, two of the best known poets in Italy today are Salvatore Quasimodo, and Leonardo Sinigalli. Both these poets exemplify hermetic poetry in its most recent stage.

Although the best It. poetry written since the close of the Second War has been by hermetic writers, their production shows signs of a progressively closer bond with the past. In 1949, precisely 30 years after the Ronda had advocated a neoclassicism with Leopardi as model, eight poets published a manifesto advocating a new "lyric realism." In 1919 the leader of the movement had been Vincenzo Cardarelli (1887-1959) whose poetry, Poesie (1936), put into practice what its author had preached. In 1949 the writer of the manifesto was Aldo Capasso (b. 1909), also a poet of considerable merit, (Il passo del cigno, 1930). The manifesto was essentially a revolt against the linguistic acrobatics, the arbitrary symbolism and the irrationality of hermetic poetry. It takes a firm stand against the creation of "another reality" opposed to daily reality, a magic freed from feeling and logical coherence." However, it is also against "that narrow traditionalism . . . which, today, after the second world war, wishes to take up again the classicism of Carducci or the romanticism of Hugo or even the more recent formulae of Moréas and Hérédia." It seems, rather, to seek a middle road: "Instead of rebelling against logical coherence . . . the task of poets is to give men coherent, fully comprehensible expressions of normal humanity, and at the same time to incorporate in the words the imponderables which the language of pure logic does not recognize." Though this had already been more or less realized in the poetry of Saba and the later Quasimodo, it remains true that just as the first half of the century opened with a revolt against d'Annunzio, the second half has opened with a revolt against Ungaretti. It is interesting to note that the 1959 Nobel Prize for literature was awarded to Salvatore Quasimodo who attributed the award to his conviction that "poetry is not a game." The progression from the relatively early collection Ed è subito sera (1942) through four others, and then to La terra impareggiabile (1958) attests to the seriousness of this conviction.

ANTHOLOGIES: An Anth. of It. Poems, 13th to 19th C., tr. Lorna de' Lucchi (1922 and later); Rimatori del dolce stil nuovo, ed. L. Di Benedetto (1925; representative of the movement); I classici italiani, ed. L. Russo (1940); Poeti lirici moderni e contemporanei, ed. G. de Robertis (1945); E. M. Fusco, Antologia della lirica contemporanea, dal Carducci al 1940 (1947; annotated and with fine introd.); H. H. Blanchard, Prose and Poetry of the Continental Renaissance in Tr. (1949); G. Spagnoletti, Antologia della poesia italiana (1909-1959) (1959; standard); The Oxford Book of It. Verse (2d ed., 1952); Lirica del Novecento, ed. L. Anceschi and S. Antonielli (1953; standard); The Promised Land, and Other Poems, ed. S. Pacifici (1957); The Penguin Book of It. Verse, ed. G. Kay (1958); Canzoniere italiano: Antologia della poesia popolare, ed. P. P. Pasolini (1961); Contemp. It. Poetry, an Anthol., ed. C. L. Golino (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. R. Gaspari, The Hist. of Early It. Lit. to the Death of Dante, tr. H. Oelsner (1901); L. Einstein, L. Pulci and the Morgante Maggiore (1902); E. G. Gardner, The King of Courts Poets (1906); J. E. Shaw, Essays on the Vita Nuova (1929); C. G. Osgood, Boccaccio on Poetry (1930); C. R. Miller, Alfieri (1936); E. R. Vincent, The Commemoration of the Dead: a Study of "Dei Sepolcri" (1936); S. E. Scalia, Carducci: His Critics and Tr. in England and America, 1881-1932 (1937); C. Calcaterra, I lirici del Seicento e dell'Arcadia (1936); C. Calcaterra, Nella selva del Petrarca (1942; for motivating and unifying forces in P's works); U. Bosco, Petrarca (2d ed., 1961; best on P. as poet); J. F. De Simone, A. Manzoni: Esthetics and Lit. Crit. (1946); A. Momigliano, Manzoni (1948); V. Branca, Alfieri e la ricerca dello stile (1948); B. Croce, La letteratura italiana del Settecento (1949); C. S. Singleton, An Essay on the Vita Nuova (1949; for stylistic and aesthetic insight) and Dante Studies 2: Journey to Beatrice (1959); E. H. Wilkins, The Making of the Canzoniere and Other Petrarchian Studies (1950; for philol. insight); U. Cosmo, A Handbook to Dante Studies, tr. D. Moore (1950); S. A. Chimenz, Dante (n.d.); M. Fusco, La lirica (1950; a basic source for the present art.); E. Williamson, "Contemp. It. Poetry," Poetry, 72 (1951-52); I. Origo, Leopardi (new and enl. ed., 1953); A. Galletti, Il Novecento (3d ed., 1954; standard on 1900); A. Belloni, Il Seicento (2d ed., 1955; standard study on 1600); A. S. Bernardo, "Petrarch's Attitude toward Dante," PMLA, 70 (1955, p. 488 for basic distinctions between poetry of the two poets); G. Natali, Il Settecento (4th rev. ed., 1955; standard on 1700); O. Macri, Caratteri e figure della poesia it. contemporanea (1956); G. Mazzoni, L'Ottocento (6th repr. with rev., 1956; standard on 1800); V. Rossi, Il Quattrocento (6th repr. rev., 1956; standard on 1400); N. Sapegno, Il Trecento (2d ed., 1960; standard on 1300); G. Toffanin, Il Cinquecento (6th rev. ed., 1960; standard on 1500); E. Auerbach, Dante, Poet of the Secular World, tr. R. Manheim (1961); S. Pacifici, A Guide to Contemp. It. Lit.: From Futurism to Neorealism (1962).

See also The Complete Poems of Michelangelo, tr. J. Tusiani (1960); L'antologia dei poeti italiani dell'ultimo secolo, ed. G. Ravegnani and G. Titta Rosa (1963); The Triumphs of Petrarch, tr. E. H. Wilkins (1962); L. Anceschi, Le poetiche del Novecento in Italia (1962). A.S.B.

ITALIAN PROSODY. See ROMANCE PROSODY.

ITHYPHALLIC (from Gr. "erect phallus," "ode and dance performed in festivals of Dionysus"). This short verse with the appearance of 3 trochees (brachycatalectic trochaic dimeter), but usually with a long syllable at the end, could be used as a colon (q.v.) or closing element (clausula) of a long line, e.g., the Archilocheans of Horace's Odes 1.4 are composed of dactylic tetrameters and ithyphallics:

solvūtū|r ācrīs hī|ēmps grā|tā vīcē|| vēri|s ēt
Fā|vōnī

The i. is as old as Archilochus and Sappho but is rare in Gr. choral lyric. Plautus often used it after cretics and sometimes substituted a spondee for the second trochee:

rem āccī|pē hanc āb| nōbīs
(Casina 830)

More rarely he permitted resolution of the penultimate syllable:

cūm lū|crō rēs|pīcīās
(Pseudolus 264)

W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); Dale; Koster; Crusius. R.J.G.

IVORY TOWER (Fr. tour d'ivoire) owes its currency in its commonest sense—as a metaphor for intellectual or artistic isolation—to Sainte-Beuve, who adopted the phrase (biblical in origin; cf. Song of Songs 7:4) in characterizing the "meticulous and delicate" Vigny and comparing him with the "tough partisan," Hugo ("A M. Villemain," Pensées d'Août, 1837).

Only one in a series of sculptural or architectural images (e.g., white marble statue, column, obelisk) by which Sainte-Beuve sought to express his judgment of Vigny's character, life, and work, the phrase tour d'ivoire apparently symbolized for Sainte-Beuve what he considered to be Vigny's defective sense of reality, his love of illusions, and his subjection to chimeras; his obtusely haughty, aristocratic, detached personality; his view of the position of the poet as an isolated sufferer, and his exaltation of art above practical concerns, which, he believed, would make it their slave; his hostility to politics and to everything not of the pure realm of the spirit, and his consequent lack of commitment to any social value or institution save the sterile and useless one of military honor; and, finally, his pure, delicate, polished, classical, but socially and intellectually uncommitted verse. With its heavy emphasis on Vigny's isolation, Sainte-Beuve's phrase suggests but imperfectly the social implications of Vigny's commitment to "the reality of the ideal" and his view of the poet, even in his isolation, as a messianic spiritual leader.

Although "tower of ivory" may still be used in its biblical-liturgical sense (cf. W. R. Childe, "Turris Eburnea"), tour d'ivoire in Fr. and "ivory tower" in Eng. have become idiomatic in the sense derived from Sainte-Beuve. "Ivory tower" is now used as a metaphor for unawareness of, indifference to, or isolation from concerns held to be important by the user, and thus as a means of depreciating intellectual or artistic attitudes or pursuits held to be "unreal" or impractical or irrelevant to those more important concerns. According to Panofsky, it "combines the stigma of egotistical self-isolation (on account of the tower) with that of snobbery (on account of the ivory) and dreamy inefficiency (on account of both)"; to these may be added the stigmata of affectation, of pusillanimity, and, in connection with poetry, of obscurity. The currency of the phrase in these senses is doubtless to be explained chiefly by the urgency and frequency with which, during the 19th and 20th c., men of letters and social theorists have agitated the question adumbrated by such phrases as "the social responsibility of the artist," "art for art's sake," "the alienation of the artist," and "the treason"—or "the flight"—of the intellectuals.—C. A. Sainte-Beuve, "Poètes et Romanciers Modernes de la France. XIX. M. de Vigny," Revue des Deux Mondes, 4. sér., 4 (1835), Pensées d'Août (1837), "Portraits de Poètes Contemporains. M. de Vigny," Revue des Deux Mondes, 2. pér., 50 (1864); H. Levin, "The Ivory Gate," Yss, 13 (1954); E. T. Underwood, "Blueprint for an Ivory Tower: Vigny and Sainte-Beuve," (Ph.D. diss. Univ. of Wisconsin, 1955); E. Panofsky, "In Defense of the Ivory Tower," Centennial Review of Arts and Science, 1 (1957).

J.D.K.

J

JAPANESE POETRY. In every historical period J. poetry has reflected a knowledge of Chinese or Western poetry, but its origins remain native in a prehistoric past and the autonomous character of its language and prosody. (For reasons of definition, not quality, the following are excluded from this survey: poetry in Chinese by J., folk song, art song, and most dramatic verse.) The agglutinative, highly vocalic character of this apparently discrete language was kept pure for centuries by the exclusion of Chinese loan words, which seemed alien and unassimilable, incapable at first of adaptation to the syllabic prosody of alternating 5's and 7's defined sometime about the 7th c. and still the basis of all prosody apart from vers libre. Initially the language—with its modal and aspectual inflections of verbs and adjectives and its dominantly concrete, imagistic nouns—later, tradition, and elements in the J. sensibility itself have made J. poetry intellectually thin and undidactic, but have given it unusual affective depth. Philosophically dominated by a residual Shinto animism and imbued from early historical times with Buddhism, it tends: to mold its affective wealth into a poetry of states, often in harmonies of different states of awareness and perception; to explore feeling; to use images at once as concrete details and for metaphorical implications (rather than representations); and to excel in tonal rather than thematic complexity. The traditional interest in the circumstances of composition, real or imagined, has led in many periods to small aesthetic distance between poet and materials, but until modern times the social ambience of J. poetry has been so pronounced that almost the whole range of J. poetry seems to be a lyricism emerging from social contexts—leading J. to distinguish between formal poetry (written with great care for a large social audience) and informal (written less carefully for but one or a few readers). Public poetry achieves greatness only in the Early Literary period; thereafter, however elevated or social poetry may become, it is uniformly private.

I. PRIMITIVE PERIOD, TO A.D. CA. 685. Primitive poetry and song survive in about 500 examples embedded and distorted in alien contexts of two chronicles, the Kojiki (712) and the Nihongi (720), and in some later collections. Contextual interpretations, often odd ones, attribution to fictional authors, and (often) revision by the chroniclers—such factors make accurate as-essment of Primitive verse exceedingly difficult. The syllabic prosody and literary forms were apparently unfixed, and the best poems appear to have been revised at a late date. Revision involved the syllabic regularizing of the line, alternation of long and short lines, the introduction of complex forms of parallelism, apparently under Chinese influence, and recasting into such later forms as the tanka and chōka (see below). The poems are of such types as songs of praise or lament, of clan heroes, of private or social occasions, and of work or play. Early clan structure included guilds of reciters to repeat the history of the clan, and there were also mummers to entertain. Few primitive songs are of intrinsic interest, the usual range of expression and thought being limited; some possess a racy or vivid immediacy and the corpus of early poetry already shows the lasting tendency to relatively short, affective expression.

II. POETRY OF THE COURT, CA. 685–1350. The unification of the country led rapidly to a remarkable efflorescence of native culture, stimulated by an influx of Chinese ideas. Poetry was defined in two major forms: the tanka (also uta, waka) in 5 lines of 5,7,5,7,7 syllables and chōka (also nagauta), of alternating 5 and 7-syllable lines (the longest extant chōka is of 149 lines) concluding with an extra one of 7 and commonly followed by one or more envoys (hanka, also kaeshiuta) in the tanka form. Other forms, notably the sedōka (two tercets of 5,7,7), were experimented with in the Early Literary period but soon fell into desuetude, as also the chōka after the Early Literary period. The Court periods produced what may be regarded as the greatest and classical achievement of Japanese poetry. After the early flowering, there is a decline, then successive periods of redefinition of poetic aims and practices, with a growing tendency toward refinement and kinds of neoclassicism. Poetic diction, subjects, ideals of achievement, and prescriptions of practice become more explicitly set, traditionalism vying with freshness and increasing technical complexity.

A. The Early Literary Period, ca. 685–784. Gradual and largely obscure as the transition from primitive to Court poetry is, it can be defined in terms of the one great early anthology extant, the Man'yōshū, which contains some Primitive verse and whose last datable poem is of 759. The bulk of the some 4,500 poems date from 600–750; they are selected from various collections no longer extant and from the personal collections of the compilers, whose methods of compilation vary in method and critical sophistication. The Man'yōshū contains the longest and some of the greatest J. poetry. In particular, Kakinomoto Hitomaro (fl. ca. 680-700), Yamabe Akahito (d. ?736), Yamanoe Okura (?660-?733), Ōtomo Tabito (665-731), and Ōtomo Yakamochi (718-85) display a variety and grandeur that render the Man'yōshū special to the J. (Clan names or surnames are here given first in J. fashion, although poets are commonly referred to by given names, styles, or pen-names.) Hitomaro is unquestionably the greatest poet, combining as he does lyricism with narrative forms, public subjects (elegies for princes, imperial excursions, visits to former capitals, and poems on the death of private individuals) with such rhetorical techniques of the period as extremely complex parallelisms and the pillow-word (makurakotoba), a prefixed conventional attribute or word, usually in a 5-syllable line, used for amplifying and imagistic purposes. His grand openings, subtly developed and warm ironies, skill with imagery and phrasing, and sustained, complex structures are of an extraordinary richness seldom rivaled. His tone at least can be inferred from an envoy to On Passing the Ruined Capital of Ōmi.

The Cape of Kara
At Shiga in Sasunami yet remains
As it ever was,
But though it wait throughout the ages,
The courtiers' pleasure boats will not return.

(Translations of poems from the Court period are by R. H. Brower and E. Miner, J. Court Poetry, copyright 1961, Stanford University Press; other translations in this article are by E. Miner, copyright 1961, Orient/West.)

Okura's intense feeling and terse style conveyed a more moral vision and at times a didactic vein resembling certain kinds of the poetry of China, where he had studied. His style is seen at its best in an envoy to an elegy on his son.

Since he is so young,
He will not know the road to take:
I will pay your fee—
O courier from the realms below,
Bear him there upon your back!

Akahito's lovely descriptive styles introduced new elements, but his supremacy in tanka foretells the decline of the chōka. His lyric description has a fresh purity seen in this envoy to a chōka on the Yoshino Palace.

The jet-black night
Deepens to a hush among the birches

In the stream's pure bed,
Where the plovers softly raise their call
Above the gentle murmur of the stream.

Toward the end of the period the chōka was given a final greatness in the subjective, reflective style of Yakamochi. There is also a good deal of poetry in the Man'yōshū by anonymous, pseudonymous, and little known authors; and verse from the provinces and poems composed in reality or fiction by such authors as war-men, frontier guardsmen, beggars, and even prostitutes. But the greatest poets are courtiers of middling rank, scholarly inclination, and pronounced individuality of outlook.

B. The Early Classical Period, 784-1100. A transitional period in which Chinese poetry flourished unchallenged as serious literature was followed by a reaction and redefinition of J. poetry into highly subjective, witty, high-spirited, and often conceited styles expressed wholly in the tanka form. Various Chinese ideals and techniques, as well as a remarkable personality, were integrated into a new poetry early in the period by poets like Ariwara Narihira (825-80), whose subjective and extremely concentrated style achieves something like philosophical weight.

What now is real?
This moon, this spring, are altered
From their former being—
While this alone, my mortal body, remains
As ever changed by love beyond all change.

The poetess Ono no Komachi (fl. ca. 850) wrote of, and with, a strength of passion unknown earlier.

On such a night as this
When the lack of moonlight shades your way to me,
I wake from sleep my passion blazing,
My breast a fire raging, exploding flame
While within me my heart chars.

Their poetry and that of the generation of Ki no Tsurayuki (884-946), Ki no Tomonori (fl. ca. 890), Ōchikōshi Mitsune (fl. ca. 900), Lady Ise (fl. ca. 935), and others was collected in the 1st and most influential of the 21 imperial anthologies, the Kokinshū (ca. 905), Tsurayuki's Preface to which is the first major critical document in J. poetry. The generation of Tsurayuki and the next few following generations stabilized poetry by giving it a rationale, setting subjects and diction, creating doctrines of decorum, and defining the anthology as a genre with two main groups of subjects, seasonal and love poems, and several shorter groups. Throughout the period there is a questioning of subjective reality with constant reference to dream experience or comparisons between very different poetic elements. Although the pillow-word continues to be used, the characteristic rhetorical device is the pivot-word (kakekotoba), which utilizes a single series of sounds to yield two or more parsings and meanings. The consolidation and critical definition of poetry, the experimentation with mixed genres of poetry and prose, the rise of such socio-literary phenomena as the poetry contest, and the assured tone of literature reflect the fact that court society was now at its zenith. There is a falling off in poetic quality in the late 10th and 11th c., accompanied by an intensification of critical interest and experimentation with new styles. Some poems by Sone no Yoshitada (fl. ca. 985) anticipate, in spite of certain eccentricities, later descriptive poetry—

The sun sets,
And the luminous underleaves
Low upon the trees
Are stifled in the shadowing
Of the frightening summer dark.

But the poetry of Lady Izumi Shikibu (ca. 970–1030) is more normative for the tradition and more recognizably human.

Lying down alone,
My thoughts are fixed on you—so deeply
That I have forgot again
The tangles of my long black hair
In yearning for the hand that stroked it clear.

Poets not so given to experiment or expression of passion were, however, over-cautious. Tsurayuki's definition of poetry into formal styles had been more than successful; signs of lassitude and conventionalism increased.

C. The Mid-Classical Period, 1100–1241. The slow decline of the Court in power and wealth continued after the establishment of the first feudal government in the late 12th c. and gradually led to poetic changes: a greater seriousness, a conventionalizing of poetic subjects, borrowings from graver Chinese poets, formalizing of the conditions of poetry, and a neo-classical veneration of the past. Such changes came slowly, crystallizing towards the end of the period in the 8th imperial anthology, the Shinkokinshū (1206), 2d in historical importance only to the Kokinshū, and most admired by J. today after the Man'yōshū. The new styles are largely descriptive, and the natural elements described function symbolically to imply human responses. The dominant tones are those related to loneliness, whether miserable in the now almost uniformly unhappy poems of Courtly love, or sad but comforted with beauty in the numerous superb autumn poems of the period. Nouns, rather than the verbs of the preceding period, fill the poems;

the pillow-word and pivot-word are retained, but the most significant technique is allusive variation (honkadori), in which the neoclassicism of the age expresses itself by the allusion to older poems.

Dimly, dimly,
In the morning mist that lies
Over Akashi Bay,
My longings follow with the ship
In vanishing behind the distant isle.
(Anon., Kokinshū)

Pillowed above the oars
And deep in sleep until dawn breaks,
I awake to find no ship:
The one which bears my longing in the dream
Has borne me in the daylight from this boat.

The Abbot Jien (1155–?1225) has here incorporated the earlier love poem into one dealing with the sadness of travel. Other poems show that the passage of time and cultural change weigh heavily upon the poets.

The plank-roofed halls
Of the barrier fort of Fuwa "The Enduring"
Are emptied of their men,
And in the ruin of all that was before,
Only the rustle of the autumn wind.
(Fujiwara Yoshitsune, 1169–1206)

The descriptive symbolism commonly employs a muted natural scene.

While denying his heart,
Even a priest must feel his body know
The depths of a sad beauty:
From a marsh at autumn twilight,
Snipe that rise to wing away.
(Priest Saigyō, 1118–90)

Fujiwara Shunzei (1114–1204) resolved the experimentation of earlier poets and directed the energy of the age by setting forth ideals of tradition in some realms and of creative change in others. Since he aimed at depth, he may incorporate in a single autumn poem descriptive symbolism, allusive variation on two earlier poems, and a strong implicit sense of time.

As evening falls,
From along the moors the autumn wind
Blows chill into the heart,
And the quails raise their plaintive cry
In the deep grass of secluded Fukakusa.

The depths of allusion are not always to be felt by the Western reader unfamiliar with the works alluded to. A poem by the greatest poet of the age, Shunzei's son Teika (1162–1241), alludes both to an earlier poem and to

The Tale of Genji; but its syntactical, metaphorical exchange of subjects and predications produces an atmosphere of beauty intelligible to any reader.

For her straw-mat bedding
The Lady of the Bridge of Uji now Spreads the moonlight out,
And in the waiting autumn night
Still lies there in the darkening wind.

Teika's many styles and his criticism dominate an age richly endowed with both. It had developed slowly but flowered in a host of great poets, including such others as ex-Emperor Go-Toba (1180-1239), Fujiwara Ietaka (1158-1237), Fujiwara Ariie (1155-1216), Princess Shokushi (d. 1201), and Shunzei's Daughter (fl. ca. 1200). Although practiced earlier, the poetry contest between two appointed sides and on set poetic topics now becomes, with the composition of poetic sequences modeled on the imperial collections, a major means of "publishing" formal poetry. Records of the contests, many sequences, private collections, and other sources survive to amplify the canon of the age far beyond the imperial anthology.

D. The Late Classical Period, 1241-1350. The grandchildren of Teika fell out over financial and poetic disputes, the senior line ultimately winning and dooming Court poetry to living death in conventionalism. The junior lines produced but two imperial anthologies, the Gyokuyōshū (ca. 1313) and Fūgashū (ca. 1345), which show remarkable originality and talent. The originality lay partly in the focus upon the intense moment or the intensely minute, but also in the development of styles of total description (imagery alone) for seasonal poems and of no imagery for love poems. Reizei Tamehide (d. 1372) shows the intensely perceived imagistic moment.

Even in the flashing
Of the lightning that does not linger
Even for a moment,
The very number of the drops of rain
Could be counted on the leaves of plants.

So intense is the scrutiny of the moment that there are often surprising changes, as in this image-less poem.

In my heart,
Weakened now by your betrayal
To the point of death,
Even misery takes on pathetic beauty
And my bitterness is gone.
(ex-Empress Eifuku, 1271-1342)

The experimentation of the period and its search for intensity led to the increased use of such rhetorical devices as reversed diction (a kind of hypallage) and synesthesia, and even to the introduction of novel subject matter, as in the following by ex-Emperor Hanazono (1297-1348).

No trace remains Among all the crumbling hovels
Of their bamboo fences,
And only a dog breaks the silence,
Barking from the hindmost shack.

Another of his poems, a complex allegory on the Bodhisattva Beautiful in the Lotus Sūtra, shows even in its imagistic vehicles the new beauty of religious poetry.

The sun at dusk
Fades in brightness from the eaves
Where swallows twitter;
And among the willows in the garden
Blows the green breeze of the spring.

The counterpart of such rich detail is the extreme difficulty of the minute distinctions in the generalized language of the love poetry. At its best the age produced an intense new poetry, at its unhappiest mere agitation in the verse of the innovative poets and utter sinking into convention by the conventional. Other major poets of the age are Kyōgoku Tamekane (1254-1332), Lady Jūsammi Chikako (fl. ca. 1300), ex-Emperor Fushimi (1265-1317), Lady Jūsammi Tameko (fl. ca. 1300), ex-Emperor Go-Fushimi (1288-1336), and Saionji Sanekane (1249-1322).

III. THE LATER FEUDAL PERIODS, 1350-1867. The political and economic decline of the Court from the 12th c. led at first to gradual, and later to radical, social change. De facto power was exercised by successive feudal regimes, the last and most enduring of which was established in 1603. In response to such changes, in reference to Chinese culture, and especially in cognizance of the Court tradition, the poetry of Feudal times developed its distinctive forms. These rose alongside the earlier forms and styles, which continued to be taught and practiced—often with distinction and well into Modern times—by the hereditary schools of Court poets. Indeed, such Court poetry dominated the Feudal literary scene in volume and in prestige, maintaining an organic connection with the past and influencing the new poetry in both general and particular ways.

A. The Mid-Feudal Period, 1350-1600. The fall of the Court into ceremonial and conventional nullity was slow, and the new genres grew organically out of old forms. Nō (q.v.) owed much of its theatrical debt to forms not respected by the Court, but its aesthetic and the style of its poetic passages grew in major degree from Court poetry. The prosody combines the old syllabic 5's and 7's with the freer rhythms of popular songs; such rhetorical techniques as the pivot-word and allusive variation (on Court poetry and Buddhist texts) are skillfully employed. The cultural continuity was provided in large degree by Zen priests of the so-called Five Temples (Go-San), who were patronized by a succession of aesthetically-minded Feudal rulers versed in the cultural traditions of the Court. Zen priests and Late Classical poets had been on close terms, sharing inter alia enthusiasm for Sung poetry and criticism. Reflecting monastic rather than Court life, the principal Feudal genres developed are "linked" forms—renga, haikai—composed in alteration and according to extremely elaborate rules by a small group of poets. Renga has a long pre-Feudal history. In Mid-Classical times it had served Court poets as relaxation after the rigors of composing in the tanka form. As such, it tended to frivolity, but its serious consideration by ex-Emperor Go-Toba in particular led to distinctions between serious (ushin) and playful (mushin) forms. In Late Classical times, Nijō Yoshimoto (1320–88) codified the elaborate rules developed for renga, establishing the genre in the form it possessed till modern times. Renga grew from the diction, rhetoric, aesthetic, and certain formal aspects of Court poetry. The standard renga consisted of 100 stanzas alternating the first (5,7,5) and second (7,7) "halves" of the tanka in a fashion like the 100-poem sequences of Court poetry; the stanzas were integrated with the same techniques of association and progression developed originally for private sequences and for the imperial anthologies (see below). Yoshimoto and the first major period of the renga built upon the aesthetic and style of the conservative Nijō poets of Late Classical times. The second flowering of renga came with the priests Shōtetsu (1381–1459) and Shinkei (1406–75), who returned to Teika's ethereal early style for ideals they termed coolness (hie) and slenderness (yase). Sōgi (1421–1502) sought new ideals in the liberal Late Classical poetry of the Kyōgoku-Reizei schools. A third peak was reached by poets associated with Satomura Shōwa (?1523–1602). Parallel in development with renga, haikai or haikai renga grew from the concept of playful (mushin) renga. Sōgi's major distinction between haikai and renga was apparently the use of Chinese words in haikai. More fundamental distinctions between the two forms were made by Arakida Moritake (1473–1549) and Yamazaki Sōkan (?1465–1553), who disregarded some of renga's more elaborate rules and introduced colloquial diction and wit. Sōkan's poetry verged at times upon mere playfulness, but Moritake's possessed a depth and seriousness capable of further development. It must be added that the renga is of such formidable complexity that it is the least studied and understood of all J. genres.

B. Late Feudal Period, 1600–1867. Priests, courtiers, and a few cultivated warriors had developed Mid-Feudal poetry, but the stability and prosperity of Feudal society enabled large numbers of the battleless warriors, prosperous farmers, and wealthy townsmen to participate in the development of the characteristic genres of Late Feudal poetry, which grew from the haikai of Moritake and others. (Haikai was later called renku, and the first stanzas, or the hokku, of haikai were often treated specially. But haiku conceived of as discrete poems of 5,7,5 syllables is a concept and form of Modern times.) Through most of late Feudal times, serious poetry is conceived of in terms inherited from the haikai of Moritake, as redefined by Matsunaga Teitoku (1570–1653), whose study of tanka and renga brought a new formal seriousness to haikai (though his followers often became over-witty); by Nishiyama Sōin (1604–1682), who introduced a prosodic freedom and less restricted diction; and by Kamijima Onitsura (1660–1738), who sought greater tonal elevation. But Onitsura's contemporary, Matsuo Bashō (1644–94) proved to be the greatest and most influential of Late Feudal poets, gathering about him a wide following. Creator of many styles and a master at the mixed genre of haikai and prose, haibun, Bashō formed his practice and criticism on neoclassical and religious lines. He studied and often alluded to Court poetry; especially the priest Saigyō, to whose ideal of sabi, or loneliness, he gave a patina of his own. The renga poets, especially Sōgi, earlier haikai poets, and the more restrained, descriptive Chinese poets were especially congenial to his ideals. This background enabled him to endow the simple or even the low with a profundity of associational richness. Yet in his varied styles, the elegant, the humorous, the ironic, and the grand also appear. Modern readers have read him with over-literal biographical sentiment, failing to see that his art has shaped, e.g., the mingled poetry and prose of Oku no Hosomichi (The Narrow Road of Oku, ca. 1689) from a diary into fiction. Among his best known poems, the following are typical of different styles.

Kareeda ni
Karasu no tomarikeri
Aki no kure.

A crow is perched
Upon a leafless withered bough—
The autumn dusk.

* * *
Inazuma ya
Yami no katayuku
Goi no koe.

The lightning flashes!
And slashing through the darkness,
A night-heron's screech.

* *

Tabi ni yande
Yume wa karen o
Kakemeguru.

Stricken in travel,
And turning over withered moors,
A world of dreams.

Bashō was accompanied by a host of distinguished haikai poets, whose successors degenerated steadily. The revival of haikai in the 18th c. can be epitomized by Bashō's greatest successor, Yosa (or Taniguchi) Buson (1716-83). Study of renga and classical literature, familiarity with Chinese criticism of painting, his own stature as a painter, and reinterpretation of Bashō's ideal of "elegance" led him to a style of somewhat greater objectivity and concrete imagistic beauty, often with a strong pictorial conception.

The sea in springtime,
All the warm day in breathing swells,
In breathing swells.

* *

The moon passes
In splendor through its central heavens
And I through wretched streets.

The strength of haikai lay in its depth of tradition and in its assumptions of integration of separate stanzas. Bashō and Buson composed integrated sequences (themselves or in company with others) and a number of hokku, opening stanzas. These were regarded as the crucial base for subsequent stanzaic development; and collections of hokku, or of separate stanzas intermingled with prose (haibun) were common. After Buson haikai once more deteriorated, as can be seen both in the famous though largely sentimental poetry of Kobayashi Issa (1763-1827) and in the development of the parodic form of the hokku of haikai, senryū. Senryū possess at times an incisive wit bringing the world into proportion and grows from the daily life of feudal Japan. But wordplay is commonly an end in itself, and the best senryū of Karai Hachimon (1718-90; pen name Senryū) and others are in reality hokku manqué.

IV. THE MODERN PERIOD, 1868—. To the inherent difficulties of assessing recent times must be added other matters—the sudden proliferation of literature in a nation achieving nearly total literacy in a short period; the tendency of Modern J. writers to group into schools of small groups and short lives; an abundance of skilled poets; and a scarcity of truly great ones.

There are a few new and consistent phenomena: the enormous impact of Western culture, the rise of the professional writer to accepted social status, a romantic prizing of individualism, and the dominance of a many-faceted, peculiarly J. "Realism."

A. The "Enlightenment" and After, 1868-1931. The 15-20 years following the opening of Japan brought in a flood of foreign culture and technology that threatened to overwhelm the indigenous civilization. Writers seemed uncertain whether to make the foreign Japanese or to give native literature a foreign cast, as the New Style poetry (Shintaishi, ca. 1882) shows. Molding the traditional syllabic 5's and 7's into single lines, the New Style poets translated Gray, Shelley, and other Eng. poets. The academic exercise retains a historical importance, while the use of such compound lines (1897) by the novelist-poet Shimazaki Tōson (1872-1943) returned to so native a tone and language that there seemed little reason for the new prosody, though his style possessed a moving and influential romanticism. The awaited revolution came with Masaoka Shiki (1867-1902), perhaps the greatest, certainly the most seminal, of Modern poets. Prolonged study of haikai led him to radical revisionism: scorn of haikai and collections of hokku, sifting of Bashō, and praise of Buson. His eloquent criticism led him to adumbrate the ineffable "Objective Realism" that pervades modern J. poetry. Essentially aesthetic in aim, highly imagistic in method, it yet prizes individual "sincerity" and abjures "artifice." Its Western inspiration came, in a historical accident, with the simultaneous introduction to Japan of romanticism, realism, and naturalism—with a host of other postromantic schools following hard after. Shiki's achievement lay in his holding Western thought at arm's length in order to return to what he felt essentially J. qualities. He built on the work of Feudal scholars and lesser predecessors, and his haiku styles change as his ideas develop, his best haiku showing often the pictorial qualities of Buson.

The ocean freshly green,
Mountain on mountain peaked with snow,
Birds homing to the north.

From ca. 1898 Shiki turned to the reformation of tanka poetry. The National Scholars (17th-19th c.) had laid the foundations for his reformation by their study of the great works of the Court, by their veneration of the Man'yō-shū as the supreme J. poetic achievement, and by their own poetry imitative of certain Man'yō styles. Shiki's revisionism went further, entailing the rejection almost in toto of the poetry of the Classical and subsequent periods for its presumed artifice and the elevation of the Man'yōshū to a touchstone of objectivity, realism, sincerity, and the truly J. poetic spirit. Such primitivism had the good effect of refreshing study of older poetry, but it led to useless theories and sentimentalism, a quality seen broadcast, but found with a mingled self-consciousness and social concern in the work of Ishikawa Takuboku (1885-1912). Yet one of the most individual voices was that of Yosano Akiko (1878-1942), whose tanka more than recall the frank passion of Komachi and Izumi Shikibu.

Piling on The Spring Dawn
Yet another romance, The Tales of Ise, Gives too weak a pillow:
The agitation of our making love
Yielded in a moment to collapse.

Such wry and historically resonant vividness was rare, however; most of the good poetry, whether tanka or haiku, tended to fill out or extend with practice the outlines set forth by Shiki's theories. Many experiments with free verse followed upon the discovery of Western symbolism (ca. 1905) and, in spite of prosodic uncertainties, greatly increased the range of J. poetry. Free verse was, however, identified with foreign or unorthodox ideas. Before World War I Takuboku had voiced socialism in this medium, and the avant-garde in Tokyo was often better abreast of events in Paris than German, Eng., or Am. poets.

B. Wars and Repression, 1931-1945. Government repression had begun early in the new century, but it was strongly opposed and evaded until the outbreak of the Pacific War closed the country and introduced economic sanctions. J. "Objective Realism" had from the beginning had strong ties with romantic nationalism, and during this period there is much fresh (as well as misdirected) study of the Man'yōshū, the poet-scholar Saitō Mokichi (1882-1953) showing in his monumental study of Hitomaro (5 v., 1934-40) and his tanka an exceptional dignity and intellect. His roots were in the creative Early Modern years, however, and although younger writers of free verse sought to maintain contact with (and to emulate) such Western movements as symbolism and imagism, repression stiffened as conditions worsened, until the deteriorating economic situation made poetry an unsupportable luxury. It seemed as if only isolated and radically individualistic poets like Miyazawa Kenji (1896-1933) could create original styles—his being rather feverish and uneven poetry that came to public notice only after his death. The old barely survived, and then largely discredited by the young while the only thing new of literary value to emerge was the terrible subject of repression, war, and suffering.

C. After the Wars, 1945-. Social and economic collapse after 1945 made conditions worse in some ways than during the war. In the confusion of forms and values, there was an initial rejection of all poetry associated with prewar days when not connected with literary or social liberalism. Some earnest but dull proletarian poetry appeared—reviving Takuboku and a few other writers not associated with the totalitarian regime. Many sought to learn what had happened in the West during the years of repression, and as the country rebuilt itself Fr. movements were once more conveyed by translation and discussion, a modified existentialism and decadence proving popular. T. S. Eliot's intellectual style, if not his ideas, and then the later poetry of Yeats brought a new toughness and a degree of abstraction into the poetry of numerous coteries. Within about 15 years after the end of war, the old haiku and tanka schools had revived; but the dominant poetry of the time was a more objective, intellectual, and often wholly obscure free verse. Problems of prosody and of rapport with society, of creating native canons for free verse (many poets wrote in Western languages) remained crucial; and as at the beginning of the Modern period or in ca. 1930, poets often felt themselves stranded in the middle of the bridge between J. reality and Western modernity.

Although a review of the Modern period shows an impressive variety of as yet inadequately sifted or assessed poetry, it may be divided into three forms: the tanka, strongly influenced by Feudal and Modern interpretations of the Man'yōshū and other aspects of Modern taste; the haiku, developed in a multitude of traditional and experimental styles; and free verse. If free verse be considered the distinctive Modern achievement, its range and tendencies (beyond those of the writers already mentioned) can be exemplified by some of the best contemporary writers. Hagiwara Sakutarō (1886-1942) seemed to many to image the Modern world in his lyricism, pessimism, and symbolism. In both practice and translation, Horiguchi Daigaku (1892-) has introduced Fr. literature into Japan, just as the poetry, teaching, and translations of Nishiwaki Junzaburō (1894-) has naturalized 20th-c. Eng. poetry. Both Kitagawa Fuyuhiko (1900-) and Takenaka Iku (1904-) are representative and influential poets whose connections with various literary magazines and movements have contributed to the definition and practice of contemporary poetry. The socialism of Kondō Azuma (1904-) typifies a large number of politically activist poets, though few have achieved his moving intensity and depth.

So brief a survey of the centuries of J. poetry omits not only numerous great and good poets but also certain outstanding features of the literature of a nation irresistibly given to verse. (Some say that in the mid-1950's there were 1,000 or more poetry magazines.) Foremost among the omissions is discussion of the survival of old styles and forms. Only two forms and few styles have died—the Court long poem (chōka) and the “linked” poetry of Feudal times. The tanka in particular has lasted from earliest historical times to the present, always exercising powerful (if sometimes negative) influence on J. poetry and the J. sensibility. In any given period, the styles of several previous periods are usually practiced by descendants of the originators and by other cultivated people. Often there is a decorum of styles—the old, new, descriptive, or passionate being appropriate for this or that occasion.

The two forms lost show how the history of J. poetry exhibits two powerful and contradictory tendencies—to fragmentation and integration. The giving way of chōka to the shorter tanka led to prose contexts, often relating several tanka; while the anthology came to be a distinct form integrated beyond Western conceptions. Beginning with the Kokinshū, imperial collections were integrated by temporal progressions in seasonal and love poems. To progression was gradually added close association of successive poems by complex manipulation of imagery, rhetoric, and shifting viewpoint. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the approximately 1,980 poems of the Shinkokinshū are integrated into a single poem of several parts and almost 10,000 lines. The methods of association and progression were embodied in the poetic sequences of, commonly, 100 poems composed by single poets in Mid- and Late Classical times and led naturally to renga and haikai. These “linked” forms—with their breakage of the tanka into two parts for stanzas and their composition by several authors at one sitting—show the persistent fragmentation; the extremely elaborate rules for composition show the contrary integration. In Modern times, as the haikai and tanka were set apart or fragmented into such discrete units as haiku, poems were often integrated by grouping into variations on a theme; but integration of sustained poetry has been sought chiefly in free verse.

The several kinds of integration were philosophically based upon the Buddhist sense of continuity in flux and the poetic tendency to deal less with conceptualized thought than with states of mind and feeling. But the emphasis upon the social contexts of composition has also assisted integration, both in de-emphasizing the discreteness of single poems (as assumed in the West) and by clustering poets into groups that tended to corporate conceptions of poetry and integrated collections of their poems. The tendency to form houses, dynasties, and coteries of poets is a constant feature of J. Poetry after the Early Classical period; and in Modern no less than in Feudal times, a single leader has usually gathered a group which may last for centuries or splinter at any time into groups with their own momentum. The groups are all but invariably dominated by a strong individual; members commonly owe social allegiance to the leader, but in practice may compose in styles traditional, official for the group, and idiosyncratic.

No problem for the Western critic of J. poetry is less capable of solution than that related to the concept of genres. J. poetry is usually thought of as wholly lyric; if so, then Western assumptions about poetry, the range of lyricism, and concepts of poetry need revision. The J. concept of poetry (its nature, aesthetic distances, and social functions); the fact that almost 800 poems are blended into the great “novel,” Genji Monogatari (The Tale of Genji, ca. 1010); other mixed genres of poetry and prose; the mingling of casualness and unbelievably intricate rules in the jointly composed “linked” forms—such elements suggest that neither “lyric” nor any other Western generic term really applies to J. poetry.

The human as well as historical dynamism of J. poetry consistently emphasizes the strength of tradition or the survival of the old alongside the new. In any given period or poet's canon the forms and styles of earlier ages are apt to outnumber the productions we may associate with the temper of the age or with individual originality. Since the Early Classical period, there are almost no poets unassociated with groups of like-minded, socially obligated, or personally related (father to son, teacher to disciple) writers. Yet every period has been initiated by poets of strongly individualistic genius and decidedly individual character. The original might latterly become the traditional or the personal the oft imitated, but the great poetry has exemplified in practice as well as theory an originality and integrity with the poet's personality unknown in the West before the romantic movement. Moreover, if the emulators of a Teacher-poet, of Chinese poets, or of Western movements have not infrequently lapsed into numerous small idiosyncrasies or stereotyped imitation, the great original poets have consistently achieved their innovations and break-throughs by creative study of the traditional past. J. poets have, in such manner, over some 15 centuries achieved greatness in writing poems of personal response (conventionalized to the point that men create women speakers in courtly love poetry or that confession and diary become set genres) to audiences of fellow poets; and in finding creative originality in a tradition that became, over the centuries, various enough to hold as traditional numerous departures from tradition. With much of the poetic past alive or latent in every period, each age has awaited its great strong personalities to bring a new poetry into being. The uncertainties of the latter 20th c. have frequently been seen before, and there is no reason to think that the old ways of resolving them will fail in the future.

JAVANESE POETRY

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: Kokubungaku Kenkyū Shomoku Kaidai, ed. I. Asō (1957, Annotated Bibliog. of J. Lit.); Japan P.E.N. Club, J. Lit. in European Langs. (1957?); annual bibliog. issue of Journal of Asian Studies.

ANTHOLOGIES AND TRANSLATIONS. Kokka Taikan, ed. D. Matsushita and F. Watanabe (2 v., 1903, Great Canon of J. Poetry); Zoku Kokka Taikan, ed. D. Matsushita (2 v., 1925-26, Great Canon . . . Cont.); Kōchū Kokka Taikei (28 v., 1927-31, Great Compendium of J. Poetry, Colated and Annotated); An Anthol. of Haiku Ancient and Modern (1932) and Masterpieces of J. Poetry Ancient and Modern (2 v., 1936), both ed. and tr. A. Miyamori; Anthol. de la poésie japonaise, comp. G. Bonneau (1935); The Manyōshū, 1000 Poems pub. for Nippon Gakujutsu Shinkōkai (1940); Haiku (4 v., 1949-52) and Senryū, J. Satirical Verses (1950), both ed. and tr. R. H. Blyth; J. Konishi, Haiku: Hasei Yori Gendai Made (1952, Haiku: From its Begin. to Modern Times); Gendai Nihon Shijin Zenshū, ed. A. Kōno, et al. (16 v., 1951-53, Complete Works of Contemp. J. Poets); Anthol. of J. Lit. (1955) and Modern J. Lit. (1956), both comp. and ed. D. Keene; Minase Sangin Hakuin, ed. and tr. K. Yasuda (1956, renga of 3 Poets at Minase); An Anthol. of Modern J. Poetry, ed. and tr. I. Kono and R. Fukuda (1957, free verse); Nihon Kagaku Taikei, ed. N. Sasaki (6 v., repr. 1958, Great Compendium of J. Poetic Treatises) and . . . Bekkan, ed. N. Kyūsōjin (2 v., 1958, Supplement to . . .); Nihon Shiikashū, ed. K. Yamamoto (1959, a comprehensive, 1-v. anthol. of J. poetry); Nihon Koten Bungaku Taikei, various editors (1957ff., Great Compendium of J. Classical Lit., a monumental annotated ed., incl. poetry from earliest through Feudal times).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Nihon Bungaku Daijiten, ed. T. Fujimura (4 v., 1935; 1 v., 1955, Dict. of J. Lit.); S. Hisamatsu, Nihon Bungaku Hyōronshi (5 v., 1936-50, Hist. J. Lit. Crit.); Y. Yamada Renga Gaisetsu (1937, General Explanation of Renga); G. Bonneau, Hist. de la litt. j. contemp. (1940); O. Benl, Die Entwicklung d. j. Poetik bis z. 16 Jh. (1951); J. Konishi, Nihon Bungakushii (1953, Crit. Hist. J. Lit.); D. Keene, J. Lit. (1953); Nihon Bungakushii, ed. S. Hisamatsu (6 v., 1955-59, Hist.

J. Lit.); Y. Okazaki, J. Lit. in the Meiji Era, tr. V. H. Viglielmo (1955); J. Konishi, "Association and Progression: . . . Integration in . . . J. Court Poetry, A.D. 900-1350," Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies, 21 (1958); R. H. Brower and E. Miner, J. Court Poetry (1961).

NEW TITLES: Penguin Book of J. Verse, tr. and ed. G. Bownas and A. Thwaite (1964); D. Keene, Modern J. Poetry (1964).

E.M.

JARCHA (written kharja in Eng.). See SPANISH POETRY.

JAVANESE POETRY. The influence of Sanskrit literature upon Jav. literature has been very great and, for the most part, this influence has persisted through the centuries. Divided into three periods which are called for convenience's sake Old Jav. (1000-1500), Middle Jav. (1500-1830) and Modern Jav. (1830-), the first two periods exhibit especially significant Indic influence while the third period is characterized by a conservatism based on the forms inherited from the earlier stages of Jav. literature. The early literature in the Jav. language is largely in the form of poetry termed kakawin which includes epic, lyrical, erotic, and didactic art forms in Hindu style. The kakawins form a distinct and important group among the various literary genres in Old Jav. literature and their number is considerable. During the 19th c. Dutch and Indonesian scholars edited, published, and sometimes translated all or portions of the more significant kakawins. Among these are the Rāmāyana of the 10th c., Ardjunawiwāhā (Ardjuna's Wedding) by Mpu Kanwa in the 11th c., the Bhomakāwya, the Bhārātayuddha and the historically important Nāgarakṛtāgama of Prapancha (1365), alleged to be a contemporary account of the Mojopait Empire of East Java. In form, old Jav. poetry, like L. and Gr., was quantitative rather than qualitative.

Alongside the Sanskritized court verse forms found in the kakawin there developed during the Middle Jav. period a popular verse form called kidung. There were two types, tengahan and matjapat, the latter type consisting of a number of irregular lines in contrast to the court poetry in which all verses are of equal length. Tengahan differs in some technical aspects from matjapat. Since there was neither word stress nor quantitative distinctions in Jav. proper, rhythm played no role. Two of the best-known examples of kidung verse are the Sudamala and Kidung Sundāyana. An example of matjapat verse is the following:

The son of regent Andajaningrat
At Pengging
And the son of His Majesty the Sultan
Prince of Pangging by name

Came to obtain knowledge
From Siti Djenar

The Golden Age of Jav. literature flourished from the 11th to the 15th c., and Professor C. C. Berg has compared its products favorably with the best the Middle Ages in Europe has to offer. After the fall of the Mojopait Empire and with the advent of Islam Jav. literature went into a recession. While Arabic verse forms seem to have exercised some influence on Malay literature, there is no evidence for such influence upon Jav. poetry. A new indigenous verse form, a kind of sloka, appears at this time; it has 4 lines of 16 syllables but is not based on quantity. Modern Jav. literature is generally conceded to begin after the Java War of 1825-1830, when poetry in the Jav. language underwent a renaissance with the appearance at the courts of Central Java of such poets as Mangkunegara IV, Jásadipura father and son, and the most famous of them all, Raden Ngabèhi Ranggawarsita (ca. 1803-74). Ranggawarsita's poetry, which exhibits some Western influence acquired through his close association with several budding Dutch scholars in the field of Jav. studies, is probably best represented by the poem Tjemporèt (1856) which treats of the marriage of a prince and princess of olden times. The language used is excessively refined, even the peasants speaking this lofty language among themselves. All situations are described in great detail and, for the modern reader, the narrative moves very slowly. There is very little evidence that Jav. poetry in modern rhythms or even in traditional style is being composed at the present time to any great extent.

ANTHOLOGIES: Proza en poëzie van Oud-Java, ed. C. Hooykaas (1933); Proza en poëzie van Oud- en Nieuw-Java, ed. T. J. Bezemer (1942).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Wrtta-sañcaya. Oud-javaansch leerdicht over versbouw, ed. H. Kern (1875); "Literatuur (Javaansche)," Encyclopaedie van Nederlandsch-Indië, IV (1918); G. A. J. Hazeu, Oud en nieuw uit de Javaansche letterkunde (1921); C. C. Berg, Kidung Sundayana (Kidung Sunda C) (1928) and Hoofdlijnen der Javaansche literatuurgeschiedenis (1929); Th. Pigeaud, "Over de beoefening der Javaansche letterkunde in de laatste 40 jaren," Djawa, 12 (1932); R. M. Ng. Poerbatjaraka and T. Hadidjaja, Kepustakaan Djawa (1952); the nearest thing to a general survey of Jav. lit.; no adequate survey exists as yet); R. B. Slametmuljana, Poëzie in Indonesia (1954); R. Hardjowirogo, "R. Ng. Ranggawarsita," Buku kita, 1 (1955).

J.M.E.

JE NE SÇAI (SAIS) QUOI. A prize specimen in the curio-cabinet of critical terms which enjoyed a widespread vogue in the literature of France in the 17th c. and was used occasionally later as an expression for the indefinable grace that was regarded as "a sine qua non in every phase of life and art" (W. E. Thormann). A critical theory of poetry was only incidentally related to the discussions of the je ne sais quoi. First used in England in 1656 for that "strange" feeling of being ill without apparent reason, the term served, particularly in the early 18th c., as a cover-all for the "superior beauties" or qualities which connoisseurs of poetry could only label as an indescribable, inexpressible, unanalyzable "something"—the I-know-not-what. Thus Alexander Pope wrote that the term "was the very support of all ignorant pretenders to delicacy" (Observations on the Catalogue [of Homer]). Still, in England as in France the notion behind the expression proved very useful for many persons, including "wise" pretenders to taste like Pope himself. The age of canons and rules was also the age of critical speculation about poetry with nameless graces beyond definition. The je-ne-sais-quoi therefore saw considerable service along with nescio quo modo (I know not how), il poco più and il poco meno (the little more and the little less), and similar expressions of persons of taste. "How do the slight touches of the chisel, the pencil, the pen, the fiddlestick, et cetera,—give the true swell, which gives the true pleasure!" (Tristram Shandy 2.6)

Before the close of the 18th c. the je-ne-sais-quoi disappeared from fashionable theorizing about poetry and the arts but was occasionally used to describe a general "air" of elegance or indefinable grace, as in the original Fr. expression. In "The Je Ne Sçai Quoi. A Song" by William Whitehead, poet laureate, the singer amusingly attributed the indescribable I-know-not-what that accounted for his falling in love to "the provoking charm of Caelia altogether." The term reappeared in the light verse of the late 19th c. to characterize the taste, appearance, and manners of the poetical-aesthetic, je-ne-sais-quoi young man of Patience.—Bray; E. B. O. Bergerhoff, The Freedom of Fr. Classicism (1950); E. Kohler, "Je ne sais quoi, ein Kapitel aus der Begriffsgeschichte des Unbegreiflichen," Romanistisches Jahrbuch, 6 (1953-54); W. E. Thormann, "Again the 'Je Ne Sais Quoi,'" MLN, 73 (1958).

S.A.L.

JINGLE. Any verse which pleases the ear by catchy rhythm and pronounced sound-repetitions, as rhyme or alliteration, usually at the expense of sense. Eeny meeny miny mo and hickory dickory dock are jingles. Because they are easily memorized and repeated, jingles are often as enduring as the loftiest poetry. Mark Twain in "Punch, Brothers, Punch" (Tom Sawyer Abroad, . . . and Other Stories) humorously describes his "catching" and passing on a contagious newspaper jingle. The term is sometimes depreciatively applied to any poetry which makes pronounced use of sound-effects. Addison (Spectator no. 297) criticizes Milton for often affecting "a kind of Jingle in his Words" in Paradise Lost.—The Oxford Book of Nursery Rhymes, ed. I. and P. Opie (1951). L.P.

JOC PARTIT (Prov.), jeu parti (Fr.). See PARTIMEN.

JONGLEUR. A wandering musician and entertainer of the Middle Ages, somewhat analogous in function to the Anglo-Saxon scop (q.v.) or to the minstrel, trouvère, or troubadour (qq.v.) of a later era. Although the word dates only from the 8th c., jongleurs seem to have existed in France from the 5th c. to the 15th. In the earlier period the name was applied indiscriminately to acrobats, actors, and entertainers in general, as well as to musicians and reciters of verse. From the 10th c. on, however, the term is confined to musicians and reciters of verse, largely because the church favored them.

At one time the terms "j." and "troubadour" seem to have been used interchangeably; later, however, as the gulf between creative and performing artist deepened, the term "j." came to denote an entertainer who presented material not of his own composition. Material drawn from the great chansons de geste (q.v.) often formed an important part of the jongleur's repertoire. The jongleurs were of great importance in the transmission of medieval literary forms from one country to another.—E. Faral, Les Jongleurs en France au moyen âge (1910); P. Wareman, Spielmannsdichtung. Versuch einer Begriffsbestimmung (1951); R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesía juglaresca y orígenes de las literaturas románicas (6th rev. and enl. ed., 1957); M. Valency, In Praise of Love (1958). F.J.W.; A.P.

JUDICIAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

JUGENDSTIL. In 1896 Georg Hirth established the liberal journal, Die Jugend, which was for long, together with Simplicissimus, März, and Süddeutsche Monatshefte, one of the leading literary journals published in Munich.

Essays on art and literary criticism were the main features of the first volumes, and cartoons and sketches by important artists of the day (e.g., A. Weisgerber, F. V. Ostini, Mattei et al.) were contained in each issue. The journal itself provided the name for the common style which these artists developed: Jugendstil is the name of the decorative style that prevailed in Germany from about 1893 to 1910. Gothic art, Japanese colored wood-cuttings and motifs from the Eng. Pre-Raphaelites influenced its development. Its linear and spatial ornamentation often employed garlands, fruit, foliage, birds, etc. in a highly stylized form.

J. is one of the many terms (e.g., "baroque," "Biedermeier," "impressionism," etc.) which was first employed in the history of art and was subsequently applied to literature (cf. the writings of F. Strich and O. Walzel in bibliog.). The term has been clearly defined in the history of art; in its application to literature it remains, as all the other terms, extremely ambiguous. In some literary histories the young Rilke, Hofmannsthal, and George, as well as Beer-Hofmann, Dehmel, M. Dauthendey, and R. v. Schaukal, are regarded as belonging to J., whereas in others they are considered to be "impressionists" or "neoromantics"—each time because of almost the same stylistic features: exploitation of language for its ornamental value, abundant use of both adjectives and adverbs, preference for the flowing effect created by intransitive and reflexive verbs. If "ornament" is in fact the characteristic feature of J., can all literature in which ornament is of the essence (e.g., the literature of the 17th c., Joyce's Finegans Wake, etc.) be considered as J.? From an over-all view of European literature in the 19th and 20th c., the development and main features of literature cannot be understood by postulating a variety of "isms," but by taking it as a whole and analyzing and perceiving the structural and stylistic elements which such poets and writers as Baudelaire, George, Benn, W. Stevens, Flaubert, James have in common.—O. Walzel, Wechselseitige Erhellung der Künste (1917); F. Strich, Deutsche Klassik und Romantik (1922); G. K. Schauer, "Neue Literatur zur Jugendstilfrage," Impri-matur, N. F. (1956-57); V. Klotz, "J. in der Lyrik," Akzente, 4 (1957); W. Lennig, "Der literarische J.," Deutsche Universitätszeitung, 13 (1958); E. Klein, J. in der deutschen Lyrik (1958); J.—der Weg ins zwanzigste Jahrhundert, ed. H. Selig (1959). E.L.

K

KANNADA POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

KASHMIRI POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

KATHARSIS. See CATHARSIS.

KENNING (pl. kenningar). An implied simile in circumlocution for a noun not named; a feature of the diction used with Old Germanic prosody (q.v.). It ranges in kind from stereotyped descriptive compound epithets varying the plain name of a thing (dispenser of rings: lord) to complex metaphorical periphrases, especially in skaldic verse (sea of Odin's breast: divine mead of inspiration: poem), and thence beyond legitimate poetic functions, through more and more turgid conceits, into affectation and enigma. In such highly formulaic poetry as the Old Germanic, the kenningar were sometimes, understandably enough, petrified expressions which might not be especially appropriate to a given poetic need; but in the best poetry they were more frequently portmanteau devices whose suggestive associations deserve to be unpacked with care. The most familiar k. encase perceptions of some delicacy or power (God's beacon: sun; foamy-necked floater: ship under sail; joy of a bird: feather). Very different values are conveyed by these apparently similar k. for "sea, ocean," all used in Beowulf: windgeard "enclosure or home of the winds": the sea, its storms, its difference from other kinds of "yards" on land, its aspect as an area to be traversed by sailing ships; ganotes bæð "bath of the gannet": a shoreward salt-water area where the sea-fowl dips, fishes, sports, bathes; hronrād "riding place of the whale": not "the whale's road," but the great open ocean where the whale rides massively, impressively.—R. Meissner, Die K. der Skalden (1921); H. Van der Merwe Scholtz, The K. in Anglo-Saxon and ON Poetry (1927); M. Marquardt, Die altenglischen K. (1938); C. Brady, "The Synonyms for 'Sea' in Beowulf," in Studies in Honor of Albert Morey Sturtevant (1952); D. C. Collins, "The Kenning in Anglo-Saxon Poetry," E&S, 12 (1959). J.B.B.

KHARJA. See SPANISH POETRY.

KIND. Term widely used in 17th and 18th c. Eng. for genre or literary type, e.g., epic, tragedy. See GENRES.

KNITTELVERS (also Knüttelvers, Knüppelvers, Klippelvers). A derogatory name ("badly knit verse," doggerel) applied by Opitz and other classical poets of the 17th c. to a popular meter of 15th- and 16th-c. German poetry. K. consists of lines of 4 stresses each, rhyming in couplets; in its earlier form (freier K.) the meter uses an indeterminate number of unstressed syllables (as in Christabel meter, q.v.), but as employed by Hans Sachs and others in the 16th c. the meter (strenger K.) contained a regular total of 8 or 9 syllables per line. The reforms of the Opitzian school resulted in the substitution of the French-derived alexandrine (q.v.) for the 4-beat line, but K. was revived in the 18th c. by Gottsched, who restricted it to comic effects, and by Schiller (Wallensteins Lager) and most notably by Goethe (Hans Sachsens poetische Sendung; the older parts of Faust I.).

Habe nun, ach! Philosophie, Juristerei und Medizin,
Und leider auch Theologie
Durchaus studiert, mit heissem Bemühn.
Da steh ich nun, ich armer Tor!
Und bin so klug als wie zuvor.
(Goethe, Faust I.354-59).

Later poets who used the meter include Gerhard Hauptmann.—O. Flohr, Gesch. des Knittelverses vom 17. Jh. bis zur Jugend Goethes (1893); A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgesch., III (1929); W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960).

KNOWLEDGE AND POETRY. See MEANING, PROBLEM OF; POETRY, THEORIES OF (OBJECTIVE THEORIES); CRITICISM, FUNCTION OF (COGNITIVE THEORIES).

KOREAN POETRY should be divided into two broad categories: that composed in a kind of Sinico-Kor. and that composed in the indigenous tongue. The former body of verse will not be treated here, although in quantity, and occasionally in quality, it exceeds that of the latter. Furthermore, prior to the invention of the alphabet, or han'g'ul, in 1443, even in pure Kor. verse a special writing system called idu, or "official reading," was developed which employed Chinese characters to eke out the sounds, and often even the meaning.

The oldest verse form is doubtless the tusolga, which is thought to mean "sounds for appeasing spirits." Most of the poetry of the Ancient, Three Kingdoms, and Unified Silla periods (ca. 1st c. B.C.-A.D. 935) is linked with religious myths or legends. Fourteen hyangga, or "native songs," of the only twenty-five extant are preserved in the 13th-c. compilation by the Buddhist monk Ilyŏn, Samguk Yusa (Remaining Records of the Three Kingdoms). This verse form employs 4, 8, or 10 lines divided into two stanzas of 8 and 2 lines respectively. The number of syllables in each line can vary from as few as 4 to as many as 15. Several of the poems describe natural scenes, although always in a religious context.

In the Koryŏ Dynasty (935-1392), poetry was divided clearly along class lines. The aristocracy developed the kyŏnggich'aega, or the "kyŏnggi-style poem," in which both stanzas ended with the fixed refrain, "kyŏnggi yŏha," or "the scene, how is it?" Educated men and scholars employed this form largely to eulogize natural beauty, and the poems contain little romantic element. The common people, however, had their own verse form, the changga, or the "long poem," of 10 or more lines or stanzas, with refrains at the end of each. Most of the changga dealt with the theme of love. At the end of the Koryŏ Dynasty a new poetic form, the sijo, emerged, putting an end to literary class-division, since it came to be composed by both groups. It became the most significant Kor. poetic genre, occupying much the same position which the tanka does in Japan. Indeed it must be considered the foremost contribution of Korea to world literature, since Korea did not achieve any great success in prose.

The word sijo means, literally, "melody of the times"; as this implies, it was originally sung or chanted according to fixed tunes and to the accompaniment of musical instruments. These tunes have since been largely lost, and only the words remain. The sijo came to consist of 3 lines, each composed of 4 groups of syllables. The first and middle lines each had 3, 4, 3 or 4, and 4 syllables in its four groups, but the last line had a pattern of 3, 5, 4, and 3 syllables. Thus, the first 2 lines had either 14 or 15 syllables in all, and the last line a fixed 15. The sijo, as a whole, then, could range from 43 to 45 syllables. Although the major breaks came at the end of the first and middle lines, there were secondary breaks at the end of the first 2 syllable groups in each line. Rhyme is not an important feature, although it is not specifically avoided. Head rhyme, however, is often found. The fixed prosody for the sijo did not prevent certain poets from writing poems which have more or less than the usual 43 to 45 syllables.

An example of one of the first and best known sijo is the following:

Paeksŏl-i chajajin kot-e kurŭm-i mŏhŭraera
Pangaon maehwa-nŭn
ŏnŭi kot-e p'ŏnŭngo Sŏkyang-e hollo sŏsŏ kal kot molla hanora.

In the valley of deep snows
 the clouds gather;
 The long-awaited plum flower—
 In what place does it bloom?
 At sunset I stand alone, not knowing where to go.

During the Yi Dynasty (1392-1910) the sijo was further refined, and leading poets, such as Yi I (1536-84) and Chŏng Ch'ŏl (1536-93), emerged. It treated a broad range of themes, but as in most lyric verse, those of nature and love predominate. Many of the poems show a curious mixture of Confucian and Buddhist thought, attesting Korea's intermediate position between China and Japan.

The kasa, or "song words," and the chapka, or "miscellaneous songs," were subsidiary verse forms which developed during the long Yi period. The former usually contained 8 syllables in a line, which was further subdivided into two phrases, usually of 4 syllables each; some variation was permissible. There was no limit to the number of lines, and many kasa had hundreds of them. The foremost poet in this form was the aforementioned Chŏng Ch'ŏl, whose Melody of Beauty is an acknowledged masterpiece. Chapka were long narrative poems sung by male professional entertainers.

In the modern period (1910-) many poets have abandoned traditional forms to experiment with the free-verse styles of contemporary Western poetry. Outstanding among such free-verse poets is Kim Ki-rim, who employs a subtle, intellectual style. Other modern poets, however, have maintained the long and great sijo tradition.

ANTHOLOGIES: Ch'ŏnggu Yŏng-ŏn (modern ed. [1930] of oldest and largest anthol. of Kor. poetry, comp. by Kim Ch'ŏn-t'aek [1727], containing over 1,000 sijo and kasa from the late Koryŏ period to the early 18th c.); Haedong Koyo (modern ed. [1930] of work comp. by Kim Su-jang [1763], containing 883 songs, 149 by the compiler, of Koryŏ and Yi poets); The Orchid Door: Ancient Kor. Poems, tr. J. S. Grigsby (1935, free-verse tr. with brief introd.); Hyŏndae Chosŏn Munhak Chŏnjip: Siga-jip, ed. Pang Ŭng-mo (1938; containing poems and biogr. sketches of 33 contemp. poets); Chosŏn Minyo-sŏn, ed. Lim Hwa (1939; containing songs never before recorded); An Anthol. of Modern Poems in Korea, ed. Zong In-sob (1948); P. P. Hyun "Seven Modern Kor. Poems, Selected and Tr. with an Introd.," New World

Writing (1955); "Tr. from Cl. Kor. Poetry," Kor. Survey, 4 (1955), by V. H. Viglielmo; Songs of Ancient Korea, an Anthol. of Poems in the Sijo Form, tr. V. H. Viglielmo (forthcoming).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Cho Yun-je, Chosŏn Siga Sagang (1937; an account of Kor. poetry from ancient times to 1910) and Chosŏn Siga ūi Yŏn-gu (1948; a coll. of essays on hyangga, sijo, kasa); Pang Chong-hyŏn, Ko-sijo Chŏnghae (Detailed Commentary on Old Sijo) (1949); D. S. Suh, "The Kor. Mind as Revealed Through Cl. Poems," Kor. Survey, 5 (1956), with tr. poems by V. H. Viglielmo; Voices of the Dawn: A Selection of Kor. Poetry from the 6th C. to the Present Day, tr. P. Hyun (1960).

NEW TITLES: Anthol. of Kor. Poetry, comp. and tr. P. H. Lee (1964); P. H. Lee, Kor. Lit.: Topics and Themes (1964).
v.h.v.

KVÐUHÁTTR. An ON alliterative verse form which resembles the fornyrðislag (q.v.), "with the difference that instead of having four syllables in each line, its lines alternate between three syllables and four" (Turville-Petre, Origins of Icelandic Lit., p. 34). The earliest poem in which k. is found is Ynglingatal (before 900). In the 10th c. Egill Skallagrímsson used it effectively in his famed poems Arinbjarnarkviða and Sonatorrek, and it was also used by some of his contemporaries and later skalds. The following lines from his first-named poem will serve as an illustration:

Vask árvakr, bark orð saman
með málþjóns mörginverkm

In his equally renowned poem Höfuðlausn Egill introduced end rhyme into Icelandic poetry with a meter called runhent, modeled upon an OE verse form.—The Skalds, tr. and ed. L. M. Hollander (1945).
R.B.

L

L.M. Abbreviation for long measure or meter. Hymn stanza.

LAI (Fr.), lay (Eng.). A short lyrical or narrative poem. (1) The oldest lyric lais in OF are by Gautier de Dargies who flourished in the first third of the 13th c. The l. is addressed to an earthly lady, or to the Virgin, but it differs from other poems of this theme by having varying rhymes and syllable counts in its stanzas, without refrain. One of the most interesting by Ernoul le Vieux has no love theme; it is the Lai de l'ancien et du nouveau testament. It is not certain that l. and descort are the same thing. (2) The oldest narrative lais, almost always written in octosyllabic verse, are the contes or short romantic tales originated by Marie de France in the third quarter of the 12th c. She had Breton themes for most of these, but a few of them are based on local traditions and folk elements. Later the term "l." became synonymous with conte. As for the origin of l., some authorities believe that the word is derived from a Celtic form similar to Old Ir. loid (song). (3) The term "Breton lay" was applied in 14th-c. England to poems set in Brittany, written in a spirit similar to that of Marie's, or, often, simply because the poem says so. About a dozen Breton lays are extant in Eng., among them Sir Orfeo, Sir Launfal, Emare, and Chaucer's Franklin's Tale. Since the 16th c. "lay" has been used for song, and in the early 19th c. the term was sometimes used for a short historical ballad, e.g., Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel.—Lais et descorts fr. du XIII^e s., ed. A. Jeanroy and others (1901); E. Hoepffner, Les Lais de Marie de France (1935) and "The Breton Lais," Arthurian Lit. in the Middle Ages, ed. R. S. Loomis (1959).

U.T.H.

LAISSE. In the OF epics or chansons de geste (q.v.) this is a stanzaic, or paragraph, division of no specified length. The length of each l. depends upon the emphasis which the poet wishes to make. Each of these divisions has its own assonance, or—in later poems—rhyme. Sometimes the content of a l. would be repeated item for item in one or two following laissez, with differing assonance or rhyme, of course. Such repetitions are called laissez similaires.—A. Monteverdi, "La Laisse epique," Liège. Université. Faculté de philosophie et lettres. La Technique littéraire des chansons de geste (1959).

U.T.H.

LAKE POETS, L. school, Lakers: Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey. In the first number of the Edinburgh Review (Oct. 1802) Jeffrey began twenty years' abuse of these three as a "new school" which in 1807 he coupled with "the Lakes of Cumberland." A denunciation of Wordsworth in Jan. 1809 is listed under "L.p." in the ten-year index of 1813, but a review of

Feb. 1812 is the first to use the expression in context. The poets are called "Lakers" in Nov. 1814, and thereafter such references are common.

Wordsworth wrote all his long life about his "dear native regions." Coleridge linked his name with Wordsworth's by collaborating in the Lyrical Ballads and then by following his friend to the north. Southey in turn followed his brother-in-law Coleridge and outstayed him by thirty years. In 1813 Southey's appointment as Poet Laureate and Wordsworth's as a Distributor of Stamps drew attention to their Lake-district residence and invited Byron's continuing ridicule. Circumstance and coincidence, extending to 1843 when Wordsworth succeeded Southey as Laureate, thus lent support to the fiction of a "school." The "system" ascribed to it was Wordsworth's program of simplicity in diction and subject; Coleridge's collaboration was brief, and Southey's not direct or systematic.

F.A.D.

LAMENT. A nonnarrative type of poetry, arising as part of oral tradition, expressing profound regret, sorrow, or concern for a loss of a person or, sometimes, position. The l. seems to have arisen alongside heroic poetry and exists in almost all languages, including Hebrew, Chinese, Zulu.

Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet . . .

David's Lament for Saul and Jonathan,
1017 B.C.(?)

Thou hast finished, finished the nations,
Where wilt thou go forth to battle now?
J. Shooter, The Kafirs of Natal (1857).

In Deor's Lament (Anglo-Saxon) the scop regrets his change of status, having been displaced in the favor of his patron by a rival. Many poems which rely heavily on the ubi sunt (q.v.) theme are, in a general sense, laments. Also the separate tragedies in the Mirror for Magistrates, wherein a ghost relates the story of his fall from fortune, were called laments (e.g., Sackville's "Lament" for the Duke of Buckingham), and so were in Scotch and Ir. folk music the airs used on occasions of mourning. Any dirge or mournful type of complaint (qq.v.). The essential characteristic seems to be the sense of personal loss.—Chadwick; C. M. Bowra, Heroic Poetry (1952).

R.O.E.

LAMPOON. A personal satire, often scurrilous. The word is said to derive from Fr. lampons, "let us drink," associated with the slang term lamper, to guzzle, swill down. Lampoons abound particularly in the Restoration and 18th c., as do public professions of abhorrence.

Dryden, a magnificent lampooner, abjures the form as dangerous and unlawful: "We have no moral right on the reputation of other men." The l. is often differentiated from satire (q.v.) on grounds that it is (a) personal, (b) motivated by malice, (c) unjust; thus John Dennis: ". . . Satire . . . can never exist where the censures are not just. In that case the Versifier, instead of a Satirist, is a Lampooner, and infamous Libeller." While the word dates only from mid-17th c., the thing itself is as old as poetry, and as widespread.—An Anthol. of Inveective and Abuse, ed. H. Kingsmill (1929); J. Dryden, "A Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of Satire" (1693), Works, ed. W. Scott and G. Saintsbury (1882-93), xiii, 82-84; J. Addison, The Spectator, no. 23; J. Dennis, Works, ed. E. N. Hooker (1939-43), ii, 325, 396-97.

R.C.E.

LATIN POETICS. See CLASSICAL POETICS; MEDIAEVAL POETICS.

LATIN POETRY. CLASSICAL. L. poetry is commonly censured as derivative. The L. poets wrote in meters originated by Greeks, employed a more or less assimilated Gr. mythology as a poetic vehicle, and confined their efforts, for the most part, to genres already well established when Rome was little more than a barbarous village. Yet, despite this real dependence, there remains nothing less Gr. than the masterpieces of L. poetry, whose imitation of the Gr. was never slavish, and whose tradition was a double one. On one side stood the centuries of developed Gr. literature, a literature of infinite variety and vast achievement, supplying L. poets with models and sanctions, and the more valuable for being foreign without being alien. On the other stood the developing corpus of L. literature, steadily informing the cultural context within which a given poet wrote and lived. Between these two traditions the tension was lively and fruitful for Republican poetry especially; if the earlier poetry can be generally divided between a "Romanizing" school on the one hand and a "Hellenizing" school on the other, for later poets the problem is one of preserving the double loyalty they felt without doing damage to either tradition. This double loyalty, it needs to be said, was not maintained by the simple mechanical act of domesticating Gr. meters and forms or adapting them to a specifically Roman sensibility, but by the far more delicate operation of blending the strengths and virtues of both sensibilities in a common form. This marriage of two traditions was the achievement of Virgil more than any other L. writer; and for Virgil's followers his example looms so large that their problem is less whether they should be Greeks or Romans than whether they shall be Virgilians or something else.

Further governing the finished L. poem were two states of mind almost completely alien to classical Gr. poetry. The first was the L. poet's consciousness of his tradition and his place in it. Like the Roman historian, the L. poet was intensely aware of his tradition and normally intensely loyal to it; and at times his humility before his tradition's authority approaches servility. It is this intense traditional loyalty that most nearly explains the small range and variety of L. poetry when measured against Gr. or Eng. poetry. Tradition for the L. poet early acquired an enormous authority, extending to subject, conventions, form, and even rhetorical modes; it was something to be exploited but the exploitation is an exercise in humility and craft, a constant refinement of a more or less dominant mode. Rarely does the L. poet rebel against his tradition, though he may rebel against one of its modes for another. In poetry as in character the virtue of pietas (dutiful loyalty) is central, and continuity is therefore one of the dominant features of L. poetry: in all essential respects the poetics of Virgil and the poetics of Claudian four centuries later are the same. But for the same reason that L. poetry exhibits a restricted range, it also exhibits much less flagrant sensationalism and striving for originality; yet it would be a mistake to suppose that L. poets were indifferent innovators or that style is somehow impersonal. Nowhere is sensationalism of rhetoric and situation more prevalent than in L. poetry, and especially in post-Virgilian verse; but it needs to be observed that rhetorical innovation is almost always marginal, an elaborate, sometimes frigid, refinement of the dominant rhetoric of the language. Almost never is there revolution at the core or rejection of the cardinal principles of traditional poetics. Combined with consciousness of the tradition, the second dominant characteristic of L. poetry was the passion for utility in literature, for its application to some patriotic or instructive end—a passion never really absent, even in the hyperesthetic pieces where the poet emphasizes its existence by his determined avoidance of it. But it is not difficult to see how the poetry that emerged from the juggling of these elements was completely different from any Gr. poetry ever written.

Origins. Traces of wholly indigenous L. literature are almost nonexistent. There were rude farces, in the rough Saturnian stress-meter, before the irruption of Gr. culture into Latium, but we possess no fragments. This meter, however, was employed in the first L. poem of which we have even the barest knowledge—a translation of the Odyssey written about the middle 3d c. B.C. by Livius Andronicus, a Gr. ex-slave. He handled the jiggling, heavily accented iambo-trochaic movement of his verse with little distinction, but he had the incalculable advantage of being first, and his work was used as a school text for more than two centuries. His younger contemporary, Gnaeus Naevius, represents a further stage in the transition. His versified chronicle of the First Punic War was done in the same meter, but he seems to have owed much to Homer, while he also wrote tragedies and comedies on Attic models where he employed Gr. meters, based on syllabic quantity rather than stress. But the towering figure of the early years is Quintus Ennius (239–169 B.C.), in the wreck of whose work we may discern the roots of most subsequent L. poetry. He wrote tragedies, comedies, didactic poems and epigrams, all largely derived from the Greeks, but his most important work was the Annals, an epic chronicle recording the history of Rome from the arrival of Aeneas down to Ennius' own times. The fragments of this work—which established the dactylic hexameter as the medium of L. epic—still serve to illustrate the peculiar nature of L. poetry. Based openly on the Homeric poems, and in some sense a continuation of them, it seems to have been influenced by Hellenistic poetic histories, and fused these two sources, separated by centuries in time and outlook, into something distinctly Roman by its dedicated patriotic and instructive bias. Ennius' somewhat older contemporary, Titus Maccius Plautus (250–184 B.C.), set a number of plays of the Gr. New Comedy into L., but his debt to the rough native dramatic tradition is probably quite great, as the rather tired comedy of manners of the late Hellenic and Hellenistic ages suffers a sea-change, becoming excellent, bawdy farce. The twenty-one Plautine comedies which we possess are rude, colloquial and frankly aimed at the pit, but they are funny and vital as well.

Preclassical. The 2d century B.C. saw Rome's first literary-philosophical coteries, a gathering of philhellenes centered around the younger Scipio Africanus for the purpose of the serious study and adaptation of Gr. culture. The two great poets of the century were active members of this Scipionic circle. The first was Terence (Publius Terentius Afer, 195?–159), whose six verse-comedies show a definite reaction from the "excesses" of his predecessors, such as Plautus, back to the pure Menandrian ideal of the Gr. New Comedy. The purity and beauty of Terence's language is a definite landmark; but more important is the implication of his subtlety. In stressing form, expression, and relationships at the expense of strength, character, and humor itself, he clearly turned away from the general public to address the educated classes—a situation that had not occurred in Greece until the beginning of the Hellenistic Age, but a necessary step in this grafting of a sophisticated (Gr.) tradition onto a crude but vital (Roman) one. Henceforth, with few exceptions, L. poetry was by learned poets for a more or less learned audience. The other great name was Gaius Lucilius (180-102 B.C.), commonly called the father of satire, the only genre to whose invention Rome can lay fair claim—though the satirical attitude has a long history in Greece, and Lucilius was directly influenced by the Alexandrian Gr. Callimachus. His work itself, some thirty books of miscellanies, or saturae, ranged discursively over human experience, the moralizing appropriate in a poet who was a member of a clique whose orientation was largely Stoic. We possess numerous fragments of his work, but none, unfortunately, of any length. Like Terence, he addressed himself to the man of some culture.

Late Republican. The 1st century B.C. witnessed the rise of rhetoric and the fall of the Roman Republic, both of them events of prime importance for poetry. But the first important poem of which we possess any considerable remnants was the translation by the orator Cicero (106-43) of the Phaenomena of Aratus of Soli, an Alexandrian didactic work which combined devout Stoicism with a notably faulty astronomy and meteorology and was destined to be translated twice more in the next 500 years. Cicero was no great poet, but his phraseology (and, by reaction, his Stoicism) had a great influence on the most remarkable poem of the period, the De Rerum Natura ("On Nature") of Lucretius (Titus Lucretius Carus, 99?-55?), a delineation, in 6 hexameter books, of the Epicurean natural philosophy. The models were the 5th-c. Gr. philosopher Empedocles, also the author of a poem On Nature, and Ennius—but the Ennius of the Annals, not of the didactic efforts. The result is certainly the fairest didactic poem ever written. Though a missionary, and passionately convinced that his doctrine was needed to free the Roman mind from superstition and the fear of death, Lucretius confined his psychagogic outbursts to clearly discerned "purple patches," letting reason carry the argument through the rest of the poem. The resultant transitions are often jarring, and the versified physics has repelled casual investigators and particularly those to whom Epicureanism is merely unqualified hedonism or non-Roman quietism; but in spite of this, and in spite of its unfinished state, the De Rerum Natura stands alone. It even stands outside the mainstream of poetic development at Rome, which was at this time sharply divided, as the patriotic and utilitarian old guard came under attack from a group which styled themselves the "New Poets." These adopted the standards and forms of Alexandrian criticism and performance, preferring the brief, highly-wrought genres—epyllion, lyric, epigram, elegiac—to full-scale epic and didactic. Chief among this learned circle was Gaius Valerius Catullus (84?-54?), whose range was remarkably wide. He wrote epyllia in the Hellenistic fashion which are remarkable for the variety and beauty of their textures, their care for responson and juxtaposition, as The Marriage of Peleus and Thetis, a marvelous instance of unity in layered diversity. In his intenser, shorter pieces, however, he turned from Gr. practice—though not from Gr. theory—employing the full range of colloquial L., in a wide variety of meters, to greet friends, damn enemies, and celebrate and abuse his mistress. These, and especially the last group, are not the white-hot yawns that romantic criticism has dotingly supposed: Catullus in love is a learned poet still, and to say that he conveys the immediacy of passion more directly than any other L. poet is not to deny the elaborate learned intricacy of even his shortest poems.

Augustan. The Hellenizing New Poets never succeeded in making—if they ever intended—a full break with the didactic-patriotic tradition, and ironically enough, their achievements were incorporated into the superb and subtle didactics of the next age. This is best shown in the work of Rome's greatest poet, Virgil (Publius Vergilius Maro, 70-19 B.C.). His first considerable work was the Eclogues or Bucolics, a collection of ten pastoral poems which observed the New Poets' architectonic structure, intense attention to the word, and approved Hellenistic sources—in this case the Alexandrian Theocritus. But with this significant difference: Virgil's shepherds are not Gr., but Italian, and the pastorals expound openly and covertly on everything from partisan patriotism to literary politics. The same tendency is heightened in the Georgics, a poem modeled on the didactic farming-poem of the Gr. Hesiod, the Works and Days, but transcending its agricultural poetics with a magnificent celebration of man in general and It. man in particular. Virgil's magnum opus, the Aeneid, represents an ostensible return to Homeric epic. But Homer is built upon, not imitated, and the whole poem is devoted, in form and subject alike, to the marriage of the hitherto divided traditions of Gr. and Roman sensibility. The Aeneid's achievement is the willful creation of a culture, fusing apparently disparate and warring traditions into the full mythos of L. culture, and this synthesis perfectly mirrored and supported in the almost miraculous marriage of form to subject. Poetry and history alike meet in the Aeneid and the New Rome which is its subject, and the formulation is so perfect that it came almost to be final as well. Virgil, that is, almost usurps the entire tradition, and his example (and the prestige of his success) was so great that it practically compelled subsequent poetry into its path and rendered it impossible by its exhaustion of the ground. The poem is overtly and proudly patriotic and hymns the New Rome of Augustus Caesar by showing it to be the product of ineluctable fate. This end was not wholly of Virgil's choosing; it had been urged by the age's most important literary force, Augustus' desire for poet-propagandists. But to see in Virgil merely an imperial propagandist of immense talent is to ignore the quality of the commitment in the omniscience of hindsight. We know now the despotism which Augustus' principate inaugurated; but the Aeneid is the poem of a convinced and partisan genius in which the brightness of the affirmation is undercut, not by insincerity, but by a tragic vision.

Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus, 65-8 B.C.) is a clearer example of persuaded commitment than Virgil. His earliest works—the Epodes—polished iambic poems based on the Gr. Archilochus—and the Satires—much more skillful, polished and kindly developments of Lucilius' form—show occasional praise of Rome in their survey of human foibles. But in his transfer of the lyric forms of Sappho and Alcaeus into L., the Odes, Horace became both great poet and persuasive propagandist. These lyrics (written ca. 30-23 under the patronage of Augustus' loyal aide Maecenas) treat, in various meters, in a felicity of language equaled only by Virgil, in exquisitely formal precision, love and wine lightly, life and death deeply, and the Augustan virtues from the approved Stoic point of view. In this Tennysonian approach to what amounted to a laureateship, Horace was completely successful. His later works consist of a Roman centennial ode (written to order in the lyric Sapphic strophe), and a collection of mildly satirical verse epistles in three books, of which the last, the famous Ars Poetica, versified the literary doctrines of the 3rd-c. Gr. Neoplatonism of Parium, and formulated for all time the basic Roman literary tenet: the successful poet must mix the useful (utile) with the pleasing (dulce).

Augustus' patriotic utile was not so easily urged in another quarter, however. Though Gr. elegiac poetry is various in theme, Roman elegy, which derived from Catullus, Alexandrian elegy, and Gr. New Comedy, was largely restricted to one theme—love, not in the Horatian sense, but as the most important thing in the world. If Albius Tibullus (54?-19) was ever approached by Augustan officials, he declined, for his spare-dictioned, deceptively simple elegies treat, with flowing structure, only of his mistress, his farm, peace, and oc-asionally the praise of his patron, Augustus' disenchanted lieutenant Messalla. Sextus Propertius (ca. 50?-after 16), most violent and original of Roman poets in his structure, language, and imagery, fared differently. Though protesting, he was persuaded by Maecenas away from the intense, introspective poems on his mistress which comprise his earliest collection to the odd sort of "official" poetry found in his fourth and last book (publ. in 16)—an adaptation of the learned Callimachean etiological poem as a vehicle for retelling incidents from Roman history. With the last of the great Roman elegists, the recruiting system broke down completely. Ovid (Publius Ovidius Naso, 43 B.C.-A.D. 17?) utilized every bit of his formidable rhetorical training in his poetry, seeking, even at his wittiest, to elicit the underlying human reality by an intense exploitation of the conventional poses of the amatory elegist. Thus, in his love elegies, the Amores and Heroides (verse letters from famous women of Gr. mythology to their lovers), and even in his double-edged satirical treatments of didacticism and love-practice (The Art of Love and The Remedy of Love), he develops the unheard-of concept of equality between the partners in a love affair. But erotic poetry stabilizes no moralizing empire, and when Ovid's greatest work, the Metamorphoses, ostensibly an epic glorifying Augustan Rome, turned out to be an interweaving (on the thread of "form-changing") of 250-odd stories and epyllia, most of them amatory, which exalted the individual at the expense of temporal and divine authority, Augustus had had enough. Ovid, already compromised by the supposed lasciviousness of the Ars Amatoria, became involved in some unsavory affair and was summarily banished to Tomi on the Black Sea—an event which brought to a premature end his Fasti, a versified Roman calendar made up of poems resembling Propertius' etiological efforts. His last collections, the Tristia (Sorrows) and Epistulae ex Ponto (Letters from the Black Sea), return to the elegiac form, protesting or admitting guilt and complaining of his bitter life in his Gothic outpost.

Post-Augustan. The last considerable age of classical L. poetry shows only too clearly the cramping effects of authoritarianism, and the changes made in the social life of poetry by despotism. Rhetoric, already of danger to poetry, became now an end rather than a means. The literary past, both Greek and Roman, assumed enormous authority and became a cramping power, and especially the example of Virgil, whose great success with epic tended to demote all other genres by comparison with the prestige of the grand manner. Characteristically, Silver L. poetry exhibits a spectacle of uprooted rhetoric, flourishing for its own sake or supporting grandiose mythological structures lacking almost any social or political relation with the times; socially, it is the age of the dilettante poet and public recitations, in which genuine talent was suppressed or prevented by politics or poverty. Only in satire does Silver L. verse show vigor and power, and here the greatest part of the vigor derives from the fact that the satirist normally wrote in colloquial, or at least less formidably literary, L. and possessed a real attitude to his age.

The worst of the age's poetry was little more than pious imitation of Virgil, as in the Virgilian pastorals of Calpurnius Siculus (under Nero); the wretched Virgilian epic on the career of Scipio Africanus, the seventeen-book Punica of Silius Italicus (late 1st c.); and the competent, scholarly but lifeless Virgilian reworkings of familiar Gr. epic material—the Thebaid and unfinished Achilleid of Statius and the Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus. Others turned to the cultivation of harmless genres. Manilius used inaccurate astrology as a peg for Ovidian wit and rhetoric, though not Ovidian poetry, in his Astronomica. Phaedrus versified the fables of Aesop; Statius wrote polished occasional verse in his Silvae. In satire, however, there are three notable figures. Martial (d. 104?) raised the L. epigram to its highest level of compression and wit, and his personal satire, epigrammatic though it is, is one of Rome's real contributions to world literature. Persius (Aulus Persius Flaccus, 34–62) left 6 crabbed, priggish, yet powerful Stoic satires, and Juvenal (Decimus Iunius Iuvenalis, fl. ca. 100–130), whose tight and memorably phrased indictments of human pretense and weakness are Rome's greatest, wittiest, and angriest satires, is an appealing, passionate figure in an age of limp rhetorical coterie literature. Elsewhere the blending of Stoicism and rhetoric which moved satire worked less well. The closet dramas of the younger Seneca tend to work over the subtle motivations of the great Attic tragedians with a lurid rhetorical gloss, and the result is too often impoverished bombast, while the greatest epic of the age, the Civil War (sometimes called the Pharsalia) of Seneca's nephew Lucan (39–65), in spite of some glorious passages, remains, by forcing rhetoric to obscurity and humanity to a bleak and rigid philosophical scheme, a work of unfulfilled promise. It is, finally, the novelist-satirist Petronius (d. 66) who makes the most positive poetical advance of this last age. In the love lyrics left in the section we possess of his great Menippean satire, the Satyricon, and in the L. Anthology, Catullan intensity is combined with the Ovidian ability to dissociate, pointing beyond the subsequent inroads of Christianity and late—though able—archaizers like Claudian to the secular lyrics of the Middle Ages, and thence to modern poetry. Of subsequent L. poetry, apart from a few poems of Claudian, Ausonius, and the De Reditu Suo of Rutilius Namatianus, little of value remains. The lovely delicacy of the Pervigilium Veneris, still unsatisfactorily dated, is, so far as classical L. poetry is concerned, a sport, and it is rightly regarded as the first of the great L. lyrics of the Middle Ages.

GENERAL: W. Y. Sellar, Roman Poets of the Augustan Age (2 v., 1897); H. E. Butler, Post-Augustan Poetry (1909); E. E. Sikes, Roman Poetry (1923); T. Frank, Life and Lit. in the Roman Republic (1930); J. F. D'Alton, Roman Lit. Theory and Crit. (1931); J. W. H. Atkins, Lit. Crit. in Antiquity, II (1934); L. Richardson, Jr., Poetical Theory in Republican Rome (1944); H. J. Rose, A Handbook of Lat. Lit. (2d ed., 1949); J. W. Duff, A Lit. Hist. of Rome from the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age (3d ed., 1960) and A Lit. Hist. of Rome in the Silver Age (2d ed., 1960), both ed. A. M. Duff; K. Buechner, Römische Literaturgeschichte (3d ed., 1962); K. Quinn, L. Explorations: Crit. Studies in Roman Lit. (1963).

SPECIALIZED STUDIES: M. M. Crump, The Epyllion from Theocritus to Ovid (1931); J. W. Duff, Roman Satire (1936); G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy (1952); W. Beare, The Roman Stage (2d ed., 1955); F. O. Copley, Exclusus Amator: A Study in Lat. Love Poetry (1956); Critical Essays on Roman Lit.: Elegy and Lyric, ed. J. P. Sullivan (1962).—E. E. Sikes, Lucretius, Poet and Philosopher (1936); A. L. Wheeler, Catullus and the Traditions of Ancient Poetry (1934); E. A. Havelock, The Lyric Genius of Catullus (1939); K. Quinn, The Catullan Revolution (1959); H. J. Rose, The Eclogues of Vergil (1942); W. F. J. Knight, Roman Vergil (2d ed., 1944); V. Pöschl, The Art of Vergil, tr. G. Seligson (1962); L. P. Wilkinson, Horace and His Lyric Poetry (1945); E. Fränkel, Horace (1957); S. Commager, The Odes of Horace (1962); H. F. Fraenkel, Ovid: A Poet Between Two Worlds (1945); L. P. Wilkinson, Ovid Recalled (1955); Ovidiana, Recherches sur Ovide, ed. N. I. Herescu (1958); G. Highet, Juvenal the Satirist (1954).
W.A.; D.S.P.

MEDIEVAL AND MODERN. The history of med. and Renaissance L. poetry is not the history of an unreal and artificial literary activity but part of the history of a literature which had a living relation to the intellectual, religious, and social conditions of a period covering many centuries.

Med. L. poetry begins as the poetry of the new Christian civilization of the West. Christian L. literature had sprung up in Africa and in Italy to meet the needs of an educated class which now formed a substantial element in the church. The language of the liturgy finally changed from Gr. to L., and, as the use of hymns was brought in from the East, L. hymns appear for the first time, in the compositions of St. Hilary of Poitiers and of St. Ambrose. The future lay with the hymns of Ambrose, whose iambic dimeters and 4-line strophes easily developed into rhythmic verses of 8 syllables, adorned, as time went on, with regular rhymes. So the foundation of all Western L. hymnaries was laid.

We need only mention the strange verses of Commodian (4th c.) and Augustine's Psalm against the Donatists. Besides these semipopular compositions there was a large body of more sophisticated poetry, the work of men who had been trained in the old schools of grammar and rhetoric. Prudentius (d. ca. 405) stands apart as the creator of the Christian ode and of the Christian poetical allegory as well as of some compositions in lyric measures in honor of the martyrs. In Gaul, especially in the 5th c., the Christian epic flourished, where, following the example of Juvenius and Sedulius (a Spaniard and an It. respectively), a number of versifiers set forth the story of sacred history and similar themes in Virgilian dress. Paulinus of Nola (d. 431) showed more originality in personal poetry and in his invention of the Christian elegy. To the 6th c. belong Boethius, who seems to represent the close of the old order, and Venantius Fortunatus (d. ca. 604) who in his mystical hymns (Vexilla regis; Pange, Lingua) is perhaps the herald of the new.

In a manner that is still somewhat obscure, rhythm and rhyme were beginning a long and wonderful career; for they were destined to guide and transform the vernacular literatures of Western Europe. The mysterious writings of Virgil the Grammarian show that rhyme and rhythm were well known in 6th c. Gaul; and, possibly from Gaul, they were adopted by the Ir., whose fondness for the new forms is evident in the Bangor Antiphony, the Liber Hymnorum, and the Book of Cerne. Columba's (d. 597) impressive Altus prosator struck the imagination of many generations. Bede was well acquainted with the technique of rhythmical verse and the Anglo-Saxons were not slow in experimenting with it. But in England, at Canterbury, Jarrow, and York, the old classical tradition, under It. influences, reasserted itself, and when with Alcuin from York, Theodulf from Spain, and Paul the Deacon and Peter of Pisa from Italy, the so-called Carolingian revival began, in the Frankish kingdom there was a great flowering of verse in classical meters: epic, occasional, and religious. At the same time, especially in Italy, there was a large output of rhythmical poetry, much of it secular in character. To the 10th c. belong the songs, O Roma nobilis, O tu qui servas, and O admirabile Veneris idolum.

It was an age of musical development, centering mostly in the monasteries, which were the home of the most important new literary and musical composition, the sequence, which was sung at Mass between the Epistle and the Gospel by alternate choirs. It began as prose, usually with parallel strophes and, if rhythmical at all, with a rather indeterminate rhythm based upon the melody; and it developed in the course of time into an elaborate composition, still with parallel strophes, but in full rhythm with a regular scheme of rhyme. The early development, though not the origins, is associated with Notker of S. Gall (d. 912) and it culminates in the 12th c. with the regular sequences of Adam of S. Victor.

The 11th and 12th c. were a time of immense growth in all directions. A great intellectual movement began whose home was, mainly, the Cathedral schools, especially those of France. A new class of men of letters appears, many of whom were poets who took their craft seriously, corresponded with one another, and, if they imitated ancient models, wrote on matters of current interest in epigrams, poetical epistles, and occasional verses, composing also religious rhythms and hymns. It is necessary only to mention here such names as Fulbert, Hildebert, Marbod, and Baudri. The 2-syllabled feminine rhyme was developed and there was a passion for leonine measures. This experimentation with the application of rhyme to hexameters and pentameters began about the 9th c. with assonance or with rhymes of 1 syllable, until, later, we have rhymes of 2 syllables, and the elaborate scheme of internal and tailed rhymes in Bernard of Cluny's De contemptu mundi.

The appearance of satire is the mark of a sophisticated society, Nigel de Longchamps' Speculum Stultorum, an ambitious satirical allegory in elegiacs, was much read and was known to Chaucer. By the side of historical poems on contemporary events were long hexameter epics, like the De bello Troiano of Joseph of Exeter, and the Alexandreis of Walter of Châtillon.

The art of versification was studied, and treatises appeared, such as Geoffrey of Vinsauf's Poetria nova (ca. 1210), which exercised a considerable influence on vernacular poetry. The most significant and fruitful development in this period was that of the L. lyric, which is to be associated, not with "wandering scholars," but with the needs of a society becoming more cultivated and refined—with princely and episcopal households, with the Cathedral schools—in short, with circles in which a taste for music, and presumably for the new polyphony, created a demand for songs of every kind: moralistic, satirical, erotic, and, in the extralitururgical sense, religious. The collections of this kind of poetry, ranging from the Cambridge Songs to the Carmina Burana, are literary and social documents of great importance. The Cambridge Songs, collected in the 11th c., are a mixture of profane and religious pieces, gathered perhaps for some Rhineland bishop. They form what is essentially a songbook, and, apart from pieces in early Sequence-form, contain, among other things, some secular love lyrics which are a prelude to the full achievement of the 12th-c. poets. Among the most original poets of that century was Peter Abelard, whose hymns and, especially, his Planctus, are worthy of his outstanding genius.

One of the most accomplished masters of rhythmical verse was Hugh of Orleans, known as Primas, a needy poet, living as best he could on the bounty of the great, and ready to be satirical or spiteful at the expense of his benefactors. He had a great facility in the use of rhyme in hexameters as well as in rhythms. Equally accomplished and equally disreputable is the mysterious Archpoet, the author of the famous Confessio, in the "goliardic" measure, which begins: "Boiling in my spirit's veins with fierce indignation, / From my bitterness of soul springs self-revelation: / Framed am I of flimsy stuff, fit for levitation, / Like a thin leaf which the wind scatters from its station." (J. A. Symonds). This measure was widely used, mainly for satirical pieces (for the term goliard is to be associated with satire), but it lent itself equally well to the mystical raptures of Archbishop Pecham's Philomena. Walter of Châtillon was fond of using it with a classical verse, hexameter or pentameter, to close the stanza. Walter, a great scholar and a canon of Reims, was not merely a satirist; he wrote songs for the Feast of Fools, pastourelles, songs of love and springtime, and poetry of a deeply personal character.

Another important poet is Philip the Chancellor of Paris (d. 1236), a famous theologian, known for his disputes with the University and with the Friars. Besides his admirable hymns on Mary Magdalene are numerous pieces, designed to be sung, motets, conducti, etc., of a moralistic, satirical, or philosophical character. The greater part of the lyrical verse of this time is anonymous, and is to be found in various collections of which the most famous is the Benediktbeuern Collection (Carmina Burana), made, probably in Bavaria, early in the 13th c. (see GOLIARDIC VERSE). With this lyrical poetry, we can join the numerous "poetical debates," representing a genre which may have a combined classical and popular origin. Of this literary form, the Conflict of Wine and Water is a good example. The authors of all this "lyrical" poetry had been trained in schools where they had learned to compose in classical measures and they were well acquainted with the old L. poets as well as with mythology and the rules of rhetoric.

The vogue of this poetry, as well as of the devotional poetry, associated largely with the Franciscan movement and culminating in the Stabat Mater, the Dies Irae, and in the religious verse of Thomas Aquinas and of John of Howden continued in the 13th c. and beyond. But the vernacular literatures had now come into their own, and the beginnings of the Renaissance brought a definite turning away from rhyme and rhythm to poetry based on a closer study and understanding of classical L. versification. The result, from the 14th to the 16th and early 17th c., was an immense output of what may be called humanistic poetry, which, in the eyes of contemporaries existed by as good a title as that of the vernacular poets, who were, indeed, profoundly influenced by it; Petrarch centered his hopes of future fame on his L. poems and Dante had considered the use of L. for his Divine Comedy.

This new poetry was inspired by a sense of form which was largely lacking in the medieval versifier, who had little feeling for formal perfection or the evocative power of great poetry. Italy was its first home and its Golden Age was the second half of the 15th c. The themes and forms were varied; the poets took their themes very much from contemporary life and their own experience even if the forms chosen had classical models, such as Virgil's Eclogues and the Aeneid, Ovid's Amores and Tristia, as well as the measures used by the great lyric poets. The output of verse was enormous, and only a few names can be mentioned here: in Italy Politian, Pontano, Marullo, Sannazaro, Mantovano, and Navagero; in France Remacle d'Ardenne, Baif, Belleau, and Macrin; in Holland Johannes Secundus; in Germany Conrad Celtis. Among the numerous religious poets were the Polish Jesuit Casimir Sarbiewski (d. 1640) and the German Jesuit Jacob Balde (d. 1668). In Tudor England Constable, Skelton, Lily, Leland and Thomas More are conspicuous names. In the 17th c. L. poetry began to be little more than an academic exercise. John Barclay (d. 1621) was indeed widely read, and in France J. B. Santeuil wrote hymns, which, like those of Coffin later, found their way into Fr. hymnaries. And, even after the final triumph of the vernacular, the composition of L. verses has survived until our own day, in schools and universities, as an accomplishment proper to a classical scholar.

MIDDLE AGES. Anthologies: Analecta Hymnica Medii Aevi, ed. G. M. Dreves, C. Blume and H. M. Bannister (55 v., 1886-1922; a vast coll. of hymns, sequences); Early L. Hymns, ed. A. S.

Walpole (1922); Med. L. Lyrics, ed. H. J. Waddell (1929); Les poésies des Goliards, ed. O. Dobiache-Rojdestvensky (1931); J. Lindsay, Med. L. Poets (1934) and Song of a Falling World (1948); The Goliard Poets, ed. and tr. G. F. Whicher (1949); F. Brittain, The Med. L. and Romance Lyric (2d ed., 1951); Hymnen und Vagantenlieder, comp. and tr. K. Langosch (1954); Oxford Book of Med. L. Verse, ed. F.J.E. Raby (1959).—Hist. and Crit.: M. Manitius, Gesch. der christlich-lateinischen Poesie bis zur Mitte des VIII Jhs. (1891) and Gesch. der lat. Lit. des Mittelalters (3 v., 1911–31; for reference); M.L.W. Laistner, Thought and Letters in Western Europe, A.D. 500–900 (1931; new ed., 1957); F. A. Wright and T. A. Sinclair, Hist. of Later L. Lit. from the Middle of the 4th to the End of the 17th C. (1931); J. de Ghellinck, Litt. latine au moyen âge (2 v., 1939) and L'essor de la lit. latine au XIIe s. (2 v., 1946); M. Helin, A Hist. of Med. L. Litt. (1939); F.J.E. Raby, Hist. of Christian L. Poetry (2d ed., 1953) and Hist. of Secular L. Poetry in the M.A. (2d ed., 2 v., 1957; each work has a full bibliog. and complete texts or extracts from many poems); K. Strecker, Introd. to Med. L., rev. R. B. Palmer (1957).

RENAISSANCE AND LATER: Anthologies: E. Costa, Antol. della lirica latina in Italia nei secoli XV e XVI (1888); M. Herrmann and S. Szamatoski, Lateinische Literaturdenkmäler des XV und XVI Jhs. (1891–1912); W. P. Mustard, Studies in the Ren. Pastoral L. Texts (6 v., 1911–28).—History and Criticism: G. Elinger, Italien und der deutsche Humanismus in der neuat. Lyrik (1929) and Die neuat. Lyrik Deutschlands in der ersten Hälfte des XVI Jhs. (1929); D. Murarasu, La Poésie neolatine et la Ren. des lettres antiques en France, 1500–1549 (1928); L. Bradner, Musae Anglicanae. A Hist. of Anglo-L. Poetry 1500–1925 (1940); P. van Tieghem, La Litt. lat. de la Ren. (1944; the best and most useful general survey).

RECENT TITLES (Middle Ages): Poesia latina medievale, ed. and tr. G. Vecchi (2d ed., 1958); J. Szövérfy, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung: ein Handbuch (1964).

F.J.E.R.

LATIN PROSODY. See CLASSICAL PROSODY.

LATVIAN POETRY. Folk poetry apparently preceded the reduction of Latv. to writing, which took place in the 16th c. under the impact of the Reformation. The earliest references to this anonymous poetry (tautas dziesmas or dainas) go back to the 17th c., but it did not become widely known till Herder inserted specimens of it in his Stimmen der Völker in Liedern (1807). K. Barons's standard edition of the dainas did not begin to appear till 1898 and was completed only after Latvia had won her independence. Since then several new collections have been published. Barons's contained 35,000 originals, without variants, and now this figure has more than doubled. The dainas are mostly in the form of unrhymed octosyllabic quatrains, e.g.

Smagi pūta sila priedes
Smalka lietūs pielījušas:
Gauži raud tie bērniņi,
Kam nav tēva māmulīņas.

The forest pines sighed heavily,
Besprinkled with fine rain:
Those little children weep bitterly
Who have neither father nor mother.

Here we note a trochaic movement (as Latv. words are stressed on the first syllable) and a characteristic parallelism of images. Occasionally the rhythm is checked by resort to monosyllables in the middle of the verse; rhyme may also appear; and now and then alliteration is used (as in the first line above). These devices help to vary the relative rhythmic monotony of the dainas, and stanzaic variation (couplets, sextets, even paragraphs) contribute to their flexibility. The themes are mainly individual experiences, social customs, and mythological matter. Many of the dainas embody an expression of the emotional life of a woman but there are also men's songs. A considerable amount of research on the dainas was done in Independent Latvia by such investigators as P. Šmits, L. Bērziņš, A. Švābe, and K. Straubergs, and this research is being continued by the last two in exile. These scholars and others have helped to establish the chronology of the dainas, which conjecture has pushed back well beyond the later 12th c., when the Germans first established themselves in Riga.

Many centuries later the successors of these Germans gave Latvia its earliest written literature. Most of the authors who wrote the language between the early 17th and the early 19th c. were German Lutheran pastors, among whom the outstanding personalities were Mancelius, Fürecker, Glück, and the elder Stender. Christopher Fürecker contributed notably to Latv. hymnology (cf. Lettische geistliche Lieder und Collecten, ed. H. Adolphi, 1685), and Gothard Stender (1714–96), a typical product of the Age of Enlightenment, tried to wean his flock away from their "silly" songs (dainas) by writing sentimental ditties (ziņģes) and translating Gellert and Brookes. At the beginning of the 19th c. other German pastors (K. G. Elverfeld, J. Lundberg, K. Hugenberger) wrote Latv. secular verse with equal competence and continued to acquaint their readers with some of the products of German sentimentalism and romanticism. The native Latv.

poets who followed them wrote their poetry in the spirit and within the bounds which their German predecessors had set.

It was only in the middle of the 19th c. that the Latv. national revival (atmoda) took place. Among its leaders were Krišjānis Barons (1835–1923), who confined himself mainly to collecting dainas, and Juris Alunāns (1832–64), who followed classical as well as German models in his Dziesmiņas (Ditties, 1856) and was the stronger poet of the two. This volume marks the real beginnings of Latv. poetry and illustrates measures and stanzas which have been imitated since then. The heralds of the national revival were followed by its most conspicuous poets, Andrējs Pumpurs (1841–1902), author of the epic Lāčplēšis (The Slayer of the Bear, 1888), and Auseklis (M. Krogzems, 1850–79), the “morning star” of the revival and the first significant name in the history of Latv. poetry. Pumpurs had more enthusiasm than talent, but his influence was considerable; for it was he who created the symbolic hero of the Latv. people, whom Rainis (Jānis Pliedšāns, 1865–1929) immortalized later in his verse drama Uguns un nakts (Fire and Night, 1907). Rainis represents the next phase in the evolution of Latv. poetry and began and ended his career as a symbolist. He wrote most of his verse dramas while in exile, but added considerably to his creative work after his return to Independent Latvia in 1920. In spite of his dramatic bent, Rainis was essentially a poet who has covered the whole gamut of human experience from passion to contemplation. His contemporaries, Aspazija (Elza Rozenberga), J. Poruks, Anna Brigadere, and K. Skalbe were unique in their idealism and in the outstanding quality of their poetic talent. All of them were already known before the advent of Latv. independence.

Between 1919 and 1940 Latv. poetry was first inspired by these and then gradually developed a national style, which reached a peak in the powerful poetry of Edvarts Virza (Liekna, 1883–1940), the singer of Ulmanis's authoritarian regime. Since Virza's death immediately before the loss of independence, the figure of Aleksandrs Čaks (Čadarainis, 1902–50) has loomed particularly large. Though Čaks accepted the Soviet order, he had been closely connected with poetic developments in the authoritarian period, and so seems to bridge the gap between Independent and Soviet Latvia.

The Soviet annexation has led to the creation of a center of Latv. poetry outside the USSR. While poetry in Latvia since 1945 has been subjected to the dictates of socialist realism, which has encouraged uniformity and mediocrity, the spirit of Independent Latvia still survives in the poetry of the many talented Latv. poets (e.g., A. Egļitis) living in enforced exile.

ANTHOLOGIES: Les Chansons mythologiques lettonnes, ed. M. Jonval (1929); Latvju modernās dzejas antologija, ed. A. Čaks and P. Kikuts (1930); Latvju lirika, ed. R. Egle (1934); Dziesmas mīlai; dzejoļu antologija, ed. J. Dreimanis (1936); Latv. Poetry, ed. A. Baumanis (1946); Latviešu tautas dziesmas, ed. A. Svābe et al. (12 v., 1952–56; includes Barons's ed. and that of the Latv. Archives of Folklore); Dzīvā dzeja: Latviešu lirika u. liroepika 99 gados: 1856–1955, ed. A. Johansons (1955); Lettische Lyrik, ed. and tr. E. Eckardt-Skalberg (1960; new and enl. ed.); Dzejas un sejas / Latviešu dzeja svešumā, ed. T. Zeltiņš et al. (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: V. Plūdonis, Latviešu rakstniecības vēsture (3 v., 1908–32); A. Uptitis, Latv. jaunākās raksts. vēst. (2 v., 1921); J. Lautenbachs, Latv. literatūras vēst. (2 v., 1922–28); T. Zeiferts, Latv. raksts. vēst. (3 v., 1926–34); Latv. lit. vēst., ed. L. Bērziņš (6 v., 1934–47); U. Katzenelenbogen, The Daina (1935; also anthol.); W. K. Matthews, The Tricolour Sun (1936; also anthol.); E. Blese, Latv. lit. vēst. (1947); A. Johansons, “Latv. Lit. in Exile,” SEER, 30 (1952); J. Andrupis and V. Kalve, Latv. Lit. (1954); W. K. Matthews, A Century of Latv. Poetry (1957; also anthol.). See also Storia delle letterature baltiche, ed. G. Devoto (1957). W.K.M.

LAUDA. It. verse form with religious content having as its origin popular adaptations of church liturgy. The oldest examples, in Latin, date back to the 13th c., the most famous being the Stabat mater and the Dies irae. The earliest in It. was the Laudes creaturarum of St. Francis. The form gained widespread popularity through the confraternity singing of the Flagellants whose movement arose in Umbria in 1260. Their songs, following the general pattern of the ballata, were either incitements to the good life, or lyrical-narrative stories of Christ or of the saints. The responsive participation called for by many of the songs invited a development of the form along dramatic lines, with actual dialogue occurring among the various characters. The versification in both the lyrical and dramatic types evolved from the unrefined meter of the cantilene to that of the ballata and of the octosyllabic sestina with alternating rhyme in the quatrain followed by a rhymed distich. By the 15th c. the lyrical l. became a regular art form, but practically ceased to be written by the beginning of the next century.—G. Ippoliti, Dalle sequenze alle laudi (1914); Wilkins. A.S.B.

LEICH. A medieval German lyric form (similar to the OF descort, q.v.), which was widely used between ca. 1200 and 1350. It was designed to be sung to music, and, as its etymology suggests, was probably originally accompanied by dance. The Leich is distinguished from the Liet, or Lied, in that its stanzaic form is irregular and nonrepetitive; accordingly, its musical accompaniment was continuous and nonstrophic. The distinction between Lied and Leich was consciously made as early as 1022. Although the Leich probably derived from the ecclesiastical chant, it came to embrace a variety of themes. In general, three types may be distinguished: the Tanzleich or "dance lyric," the religiöse Leich or "religious lyric," and the Minneleich or "love lyric." After the 14th c. the form survived only in religious verse. Noted medieval composers of Leiche include Walther von der Vogelweide, Ulrich von Lichtenstein, Konrad von Würzburg, and Tannhäuser.—F. Wolf, Über die Lais, Sequenzen und Leiche (1841); O. Gottschalk, Der deutsche Minneleich und sein Verhältnis zu Lai und Descort (1908); G. and E. Hüsing, Dt. Leiche und Lieder (1932); H. Kuhn, "Leich," Reallexikon, 2d ed., II.; S. Beyschlag, Die Metrik der mittelhochdeutschen Blütezeit . . . (3d enl. ed., 1959).

LENGTH. See DURATION.

LEONINE RHYME. Strictly used, the term means a disyllabic rhyme of the last syllable of the second foot and the first syllable of the third foot, with the two syllables of the sixth foot of a Latin hexameter. More commonly it indicates the rhyme of the word preceding the caesura with the final word in both hexameters and pentameters. Although known in classical L. (e.g., Ovid, Ars Amatoria 1.59), it was not greatly favored. But around the 12th c. writers began to cultivate it assiduously as, for instance, Bernard of Cluny in his De Contemptu Mundi (in couplets). It was used in particular as a mnemonic device and for epitaphs, e.g., "Hac sunt in fossa, Bedae venerabilis ossa." It also appears in the OE Rhyming Poem, where it contributed to the decline of the long line of alliterative verse by tending to break the verse into two hemistichs. Some attribute the name to Leoninus, canon of St. Victor's in Paris (12th c.); others to Pope Leo.—Schipper; H. G. Atkins, A Hist. of German Versification (1923); J. W. Draper, "The Origin of Rhyme," RLC, 31 (1957); finds l. r. in the Gāthās and Yashts of the Avesta; F. J. E. Raby, A Hist. of Secular L. Poetry in the Middle Ages (2d ed., 2 v., 1957). R.A.H.

LETRILLA (diminutive of letra, a short gloss). A Sp. poem generally written in short lines, often having a refrain, and usually written on a light or satiric topic. Such poems can be found in Sp. literature as early as the 14th c. at least, but were apparently not given the name letrilla until much later. Famous examples are Góngora's Andeme yo caliente, y riase la gente (As long as I am comfortable, let people laugh if they wish) and Quevedo's Poderoso caballero es don Dinero (A powerful gentleman is Sir Money).—Navarro. D.C.C.

LETTER IN VERSE. See EPISTLE.

LIGHT VERSE. A name rather loosely given to a wide variety of types or forms of metrical composition, worldly in character and most often witty, humorous, ingenious, or satirical. Among the kinds of poem that fall into this category are vers de société, occasional verse, satire, burlesque, the mock heroic, nonsense poetry; such brief forms as the epigram, the comic or ironic epitaph, the limerick, and the clerihew; and all types of tricky and ingenious verse as acrostics, shaped or emblematic poems, alliterative or rhyming tours de force, riddles, puns, and other forms of versified trivia. Usually a certain standard of excellence, or at least competence, in the handling of verse forms is assumed in the writer of l.v., and a certain finish or polish is characteristic of this kind of poetry no matter how trivial its subject or frivolous its treatment. Elegance, polish, and refinement of taste can sometimes impart a serious poetic significance to l.v., particularly, for example, in the Petrarchan love poems of the 16th c., the Cavalier lyrics of the 17th, or the satirical heroic couplets of the 18th.

An interesting early attempt to define l.v. was made by Frederick Locker-Lampson in the Preface to his anthology Lyra Elegantiarum (London, 1867). This Victorian anthologist limits his consideration to vers de société and the elegant classicism of aristocratic poetry mainly in the traditions of Anacreon, Theocritus, or Horace, but his analysis is sound and illuminating as far as it goes. Locker-Lampson begins by distinguishing his collection of l.v. from the many popular collections of "sentimental, heroic, humorous, juvenile, and devotional" poems. He then describes the limits and province of his anthology and in doing so supplies us with an excellent, if necessarily restricted, working definition of l.v. He calls it "another kind of poetry which was more in vogue in the reign of Queen Anne, and, indeed, in Ante-Reform Bill times, than it is at the present day; a kind which, in its more restricted form, has somewhat the same relation to the poetry of lofty imagination and deep feeling, that the Dresden China Shepherds and Shepherdesses of the last century bear to the sculpture of Donatello and Michael Angelo; namely, smoothly written verse, where a boudoir decorum is, or ought always to be, preserved; where sentiment never surges into passion, and where humour never overflows into boisterous merriment." The characteristics of l.v. here distinguished are elegance, decorum, moderation, neatness of expression, perfection of form, and coolness of sentiment and tone. This is the classical respect for the golden mean, an Horatian, or more precisely, an Addisonian ideal, with just an overtone also of Victorian squeamishness. The writers of verse who fit into it most comfortably would be such men as Campion, Herrick, Lovelace, Prior, Goldsmith, Cowper, Oliver Wendell Holmes, W. M. Praed, C. S. Calverley, and Austin Dobson. Many of the Elizabethan miscellanies and song books contain madrigals and other poems that would be considered light either by the standards of Locker-Lampson or of later critics. These can be conveniently sampled in the late 19th-c. collection edited by A. H. Bullen, Lyrics from the Song-Books of the Elizabethan Age (London, 1888). The more ribald, but often quite as smoothly turned verse of the 17th c. and the Restoration are represented in two other anthologies edited by Bullen, Speculum Amantis (1888) and Musa Proterva (1889). The nature of the verses collected by Bullen (or defined by Locker-Lampson) is well described in a prefatory quatrain on the flyleaf of Musa Proterva:

Gay, frolic verse for idle hours,
Light as the form whence Venus sprang;
Strains heard of old in courtly bowers,
When Nelly danced and Durfey sang.

The Durfey referred to here is Thomas D'Urfey (1653-1723), one of the earliest and best collectors of l.v., his Wit and Mirth, or Pills to Purge Melancholy (1719) being an interesting collection of the comic and erotic songs of the Restoration period.

Locker-Lampson's definition limits itself to vers de société. The definition is amplified by some nice discriminations: l.v., the critic wrote, "should be short, graceful, refined, and fanciful, not seldom distinguished by chastened sentiment, and often playful. The tone should not be pitched high; it should be terse and idiomatic, and rather in the conversational key; the rhythm should be crisp and sparkling, and the rhyme frequent and never forced, while the entire poem should be marked by tasteful moderation, high finish and completeness. . . . The poem may be tinged with a well-bred philosophy, it may be whimsically sad, it may be gay and gallant, it may be playfully malicious or tenderly ironical, it may display lively banter, and it may be satirically facetious; it may even, considered merely as a work of art, be pagan in its philosophy or trifling in its tone, but it must never be flat, or ponderous, or commonplace." Most of this is discriminating and accurate, but the limitations imposed are narrow and, the modern reader may feel, snobbish rather than genuinely aristocratic; and they lead the Victorian anthologist to exclude much that modern anthologists of l.v. (David McCord, Michael Roberts, J. M. Cohen, or W. H. Auden) would wish to include. One poem, for instance, is left out as being too broadly humorous, another as too satirical and savage, others as too pathetic, too serious, too homely, too fragmentary, or too lengthy. Comic poetry, as such, nonsense poetry, and the merely tricky or ingenious are excluded. More important, savage satire and bitter irony, because of their intensity, are outside the pale of l.v. The Rape of the Lock is l.v. (indeed, except for its length it might be considered as the ideal exemplar of what l.v. ought to be), but The Dunciad is not; the sophisticated urbanity of Prior and Gay is certainly light, but the savage indignation and cool ferocity of Swift is not. Popular folk poetry is excluded as being "low."

Modern criticism has widened (and deepened) the scope of what can be considered l.v. All of the categories excluded by the Victorian anthologist have, under certain circumstances, been considered by 20th-c. anthologists and critics to fall within the scope of l.v. The conditions are that the point of view should be worldly or secular, the finish polished or ingenious, and the attitude objective and superior; but the tone, particularly in satire, may be as intense or coarse as the occasion and purpose demand. Hard-boiled popular poetry and rough invective have been admitted into the canon, and while intellectual brilliance is still demanded of the writer of l.v., his social credentials are not nearly so strictly aristocratic. This wider view of the inclusiveness of l.v., and, indeed, of the "serious" import of kinds of poetry that have usually been thought of as merely casual or frivolous owes something perhaps to Freudian ideas of the significance of the insignificant. As Geoffrey Grigson remarked in the preface to his New Verse Anthology, "It is a fact that an epic and a limerick are poems. You cannot suppose a divine or an inspired origin for one against a secular or rational origin for the other. You can only distinguish in them differences of effect and quality." This is what W. H. Auden in the Introduction to the Oxford Book of Light Verse set himself to do. Like Grigson, Auden sees no essential distinction between the light and serious elements in poetry or between l.v. and serious poetry. The difference—or, more precisely, the source of the difference—lies in the relation between the author and society. "When the things in which the poet is interested, the things which he sees about him, are much the same as those of his audience, and that audience is a fairly general one, he will not be conscious of himself as an unusual person, and his language will be straightforward and close to ordinary speech."

The result is, Auden believes, that the verse of such a poet will be "light." It will fall into one of three categories, which Auden defines as follows: "(1) Poetry written for performance, to be spoken or sung before an audience, e.g. Folk Songs, the poems of Tom Moore. (2) Poetry intended to be read, but having for its subject-matter the everyday social life of its period or the experiences of the poet as an ordinary human being, e.g., the poems of Chaucer, Pope, Byron. (3) Such nonsense poetry as, through its properties and technique, has a general appeal, e.g. Nursery Rhymes, the poems of Edward Lear." Thus Auden seems to equate l.v., or, perhaps, what might better be called "light poetry," with classical poetry (in its more aristocratic aspects) and with popular balladry and folk song (in its more plebeian connections). The conditions postulated in the first two categories above favor the production of unadventurous descriptive verse and simple narrative, of convivial or amorous songs, and Tory satire, any of which may or may not be "light." As a result, the Oxford Book of Light Verse is a curious conglomeration of poetry and rhyme, ranging from doggerel street ballads to The Rape of the Lock and from medieval carols and Elizabethan madrigals to 19th-c. songs like She was poor but she was honest. The only element they have in common is that they are all extremely lively. Their "lightness" is due to the absence of pretentiousness, solemnity, and self-regard; and although the standards of excellence by which each poem must be judged are various, the excellence of each piece as poetry is never in doubt for the modern reader. That this should be so is due in part to the impact of the criticism of T. S. Eliot, especially to its emphasis on "unity of sensibility" and its precise analysis of the "wit" of the metaphysical poets. Indeed, the essential characteristic of genuine l.v. has been described by Mr. Eliot in defining the "wit" of Andrew Marvell's To his Coy Mistress, as "a tough reasonableness beneath the slight lyric grace" by which the seriousness of the poem is unexpectedly enhanced. "Tough reasonableness"—an absence of squeamishness, hard-headedness, good sense, intelligence, a sense of values, a rational worldliness—these are the qualities of attitude and tone which condition the spirit of l.v.; "slight lyric grace" (slight means unostentatious), verbal elegance, technical accomplishment, perfect and economical adaptation of means to ends—these are the formal requirements of the art.

L.v. can be regarded as poetry at play. Much of it is characterized by ingenuity and displays of technical virtuosity, particularly in the handling of complex meters and polysyllabic rhymes but also in the manipulation of intricate stanza forms and in the exploitation of verbal meanings, as in puns, and of verbal patterns involving tricks with syllables and letters, as in anagrams, palindromes, and tours de force of alliteration. Most of these devices have on occasion been used in serious poetry, as in Browning's skillful use of complex and divided rhymes or in some of the conceits of the 17th-c. metaphysical poets, but generally the display of technical and linguistic ingenuity for their own sake or in an unusual degree serves notice that the mind is at play and that what we have before us—if it escapes the abyss of the merely silly—is l.v. Complex and divided rhymes are found often in limericks, a neat example being the one that tells how "a great Congregational preacher" complimented a hen, which immediately laid an egg in his hat, and ends "Thus did the hen reward Beecher." W. S. Gilbert in his Bab Ballads and in the Savoy operas is a master of the comic effect of intricate rhymes, while among the moderns, Ogden Nash has added the effect of phonetic spelling to catch the rhyme and distort the word. Leigh Hunt wrote a piece of verse consisting of a series of triplets, the rhymes in each of them being achieved by dropping the initial letter from the word ending the previous line. The most famous and difficult display of ingenuity in alliteration is the poem by Alaric A. Watts that begins

An Austrian army awfully arrayed Boldly by battery besieged Belgrade and goes on with undiminished vigor through the whole alphabet. Other successful displays of "apt alliteration's artful aid" are found in parodies of Swinburne—Arthur C. Hilton's Octopus, Mortimer Collins' Salad, and Swinburne's own Nephelidia, and in such a quatrain as this from The Mikado:

To sit in solemn silence in a dull dark dock,
In a pestilential prison, with a life-long lock,
Awaiting the sensation of a short sharp shock,
From a cheap and chippy chopper on a big black block!

Not only verbal or metrical complexity but demanding stanzaic patterns and formal shapes have proved stimulating to writers of l.v. The strict and sometimes very difficult Fr. or It. forms, such as ballade, double ballade, rondeau, sestina, and the brief, fragile triolet (qq.v.) have all been used with considerable skill by writers of l.v., particularly in the production of vers de société. Certain Eng. writers of the 70's, 80's, and 90's of the last century wrote much that has charm and grace in these forms. Among them should be noted C. S. Calverley, W. E. Henley, Andrew Lang, and, most accomplished of all, Austin Dobson. Emblematic verses (verses whose shape on the printed page is imitative of the poem's theme) had been much in vogue among Eng. religious poets in the 16th and 17th c., but in the 20th c. the device came to be used occasionally by experimental poets—Guillaume Apollinaire in Calligrammes and E. E. Cummings passim—in l.v., that is not the less light because its intention is often serious.

Serious l.v., as it is found in British and Am. poetry in the 20th c., is not, of course, a modern invention nor an Eng. one. It is found at its purest in Horace and at its most intense in Catullus, Ovid, and Propertius. European romanticism proved favorable to one of its most fruitful sources of inspiration—the mixture of egoistic sensibility and ironic self-questioning that can be found in Byron and Heine alike and that came into modern poetry through Fr. poets of the latter half of the 19th c., particularly Théophile Gautier, Tristan Corbière, and Jules Laforgue. The influence of all these on the lighter side of Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot is clear and unmistakable, while the Homage to Propertius and translations of lyrics from Die Heimkehr of Heine by Pound transmitted the quality of serious l.v. to later modern poets with inescapable gusto. Serious l.v. flourishes so richly today that one is tempted to see it as the characteristic expression of the modern temper. Among its authors, besides Eliot and Pound, are W. B. Yeats, E. E. Cummings, W. H. Auden, and many lesser figures.

L.v., in the more ordinary sense in which it is understood, as humorous, comic, or ingenious verse, is also very widely and skillfully produced. Among the best of the contemporary writers are Ogden Nash, Richard Armour, Phyllis McGinley, Franklin P. Adams, Morris Bishop, Arthur Guiterman, and David McCord in the United States, and Sir Owen Seaman, A. P. Herbert, and John Betjeman in England.

ANTHOLOGIES: (NB: Items marked with an asterisk contain valuable critical material): Wit and Mirth, or Pills to Purge Melancholy, ed. T. D'Urfey (1719); Lyra Elegantiarum*, ed. F. Locker-Lampson (1867); Musa Protetiva, ed. A. H. Bullen (1889); A Vers de Société Anthol.*, ed. C. Wells (1900); Poetica Erotica, ed. T. R. Smith (1921); A Little Book of Am. Humorous Verse, ed. T. A. Daly (1926); An Anthol. of L.V., ed. L. Kronenberger (1935); The Oxford Book of L.V., ed. W. H. Auden (1938); The Faber Book of Comic Verse, ed. M. Roberts (1942); The Stag's Hornbook, ed. J. McClure (2d ed., 1943); What Cheer*, ed. D. McCord (1945); The Worldly Muse*, ed.

A. J. M. Smith (1951); Comic and Curious Verse, ed. J. M. Cohen (1952); Verse and Worse, ed. A. Silcock (1952); The Silver Treasury of L.V., ed. O. Williams (1957); The Fireside Book of Humorous Poetry, ed. W. Cole (1959).

GENERAL: L. Untermeyer, Play in Poetry (1938); R. Armour, Writing L.V. (1947).

A.J.M.S.

LIMERICK. A verse form composed of 5 lines rhyming aabba, of which the first, second, and fifth are trimeter and the third and fourth dimeter. Occasionally it is written in 4 lines, the third line being in tetrameter with invariable internal rhyme. The dominant rhythm is anapestic, and the final line is often a repetition, or varied repetition, of the first, as in the following example by Edward Lear (Book of Nonsense, 1846), the unquestioned master of the form:

There was an Old Man of the Dee,
Who was sadly annoyed by a Flea;
When he said, "I will scratch it,"
They gave him a hatchet,
Which grieved that Old Man of the Dee.

The l. is unique in that it is the only Eng. stanza form used exclusively for light verse. Always comic, it is often nonsensical and frequently bawdy. Theories concerning its origin range from the belief that it was an old Fr. form brought to the Ir. town of Limerick in 1700 by returning veterans of the Fr. war to the theory that it originated in the nursery rhymes published as Mother Goose Melodies for Children (1719). What is certain is that the l. may be found in a volume entitled The History of Sixteen Wonderful Old Women, published by J. Harris in 1821, and in Anecdotes and Adventures of Fifteen Gentlemen, published by John Marshall about 1822 and possibly written by one R. S. Sharpe. The latter volume is cited by Lear as having given him the idea for his l. Whatever its origin, the l. has a secure, if eccentric, place in the history of Eng. verse. In the wake of Lear such notable authors as Tennyson, Swinburne, Kipling, Stevenson, and W. S. Gilbert attempted the form, and by the beginning of the 20th c. it had become a veritable fashion in England. The etymology of the term "l." never used by Lear, is unknown.

The chief tendency in the modern l., as exemplified in the practice of the Am. light poet Morris Bishop, has been the development of the final line for purposes of surprise or witty reversal, in place of the simply repeated last line of Lear's day. See also LIGHT VERSE, NONSENSE VERSE, CLERIHUEW.—Dict. of Nursery Rhymes, ed. I. and P. Opie (1951); C. Fadiman, Any Number Can Play (1957). F.J.W.; A.P.

LINE. A formal structural division of a poem, consisting of one or more feet arranged as a separate rhythmical entity. The line, as Brooks and Warren point out, is a "unit of attention," but it is not necessarily a unit of sense: in fact, poems are rather rare in which individual lines constitute complete sense units. For this reason, line divisions, unless they happen to coincide with sense pauses (whether indicated by punctuation or not), are often as unrelated to the rhetoric of poetic assertions as foot divisions. Lines are commonly classified according to their length in feet:

monometer	a line of 1 foot
dimeter	2 feet
trimeter	3 feet
tetrameter	4 feet
pentameter	5 feet
hexameter	6 feet (see also ALEXAN- DRINE)
heptameter	7 feet
octameter	8 feet

Because the memory can retain a rhythmical pattern of only a limited duration, heptameters and longer lines tend to receive from reader or hearer an unconscious restructuring: the heptameter commonly breaks into a tetrameter and a trimeter (as in ballad meter, q.v.), the octameter into two tetrameters, and so on. Line divisions frequently function like foot divisions in providing a form of counterpoint (q.v.) to the rhetorical and syntactical design in a poem. Although generalization on this point is traditionally hazardous, it may be suggested that short lines (trimeter and shorter) tend to imply levity of tone, and that the pentameter line (or a line of similar duration, measured by whatever system of scansion) has proved the most flexible in Eng.—Baum; Brooks and Warren. P.F.

P.F.

LINE ENDINGS. Divided prosodically into two general types depending upon the position of the final stress in relation to the other syllables near the end of the iambic or anapestic line. A masculine ending (generally productive of an effect of some force or weight) has the stress on the final syllable of the line:

Upon the moon I fixed my^x eye[']
(Wordsworth, Strange Fits of Passion 9)

A feminine ending has the last stress on the penultimate (or even the antepenultimate) syllable and most often requires terminal extra-metrical syllables:

Whatever ails me, now a-late especially,

I can as well be hanged as refrain seeing her^x
(Middleton, The Changeling 2.1)

† In Supplement, see also GENERATIVE METRICS.

Feminine ending is very common in the blank verse of the Elizabethan and Jacobean drama, where it is frequently used to give the verse a suggestion of colloquial informality, lightness, or irregularity. The term weak ending is sometimes used to describe masculine ending with a secondary (instead of primary) degree of stress. Marianne Moore's In Distrust of Merits is full of weak endings. See TRUNCA-TION.—P. W. Timberlake, The Feminine Ending in Eng. Blank Verse (1931). P.F.

P.F.

LINGUISTICS AND POETICS.† The study of a literary work of art, like that of any organized form, requires for its proper conduct a knowledge of the principles according to which such works are constructed and a theory by means of which these principles can be ordered into some rational and consistent whole. Since Aristotle's classic work on the subject, the study of these principles and theories has been designated by the name "poetics." Poetics, so understood, is thus the most general, hence fundamental, discipline of literary criticism in its widest sense. Inasmuch as it is language which lies at the base of literary studies, it is not surprising that scholars and literary theorists of various backgrounds and persuasions have explored the linguistic characteristics of literary works of art in formulating their particular systems of poetics. It would thus be possible in an article on linguistics and poetics to discuss at some length the contributions of Leo Spitzer, Dámaso Alonso, Amado Alonso, and various other scholars and critics. Since, however, this article is concerned primarily with post-Bloomfieldian linguistics, only passing mention can be made of their contributions. (But see MODERN POETICS. 20TH C. FR. AND GERMAN, IT., SP., and the articles on EXPLICATION, STYLISTICS, and RUSSIAN FORMALISM.)

Just as we may say of linguistics that it is the study of language and intend thereby that it is the study of its principles of organization and of explanatory theories, so we may, similarly for reasons of convenience—and also for the purposes of this Encyclopedia, which is limited to poetry—refer to poetics simply as the study of poetry. On these assumptions, it would appear, inasmuch as language is the medium of poetry, that l. and poetics have (at least in part) a common function. But this conclusion requires some consideration. For, granting that language is the medium of poetry, a poem's status as a linguistic production is nonetheless different from the status of ordinary language productions. The task is thus to ascertain whether any but purely linguistic factors contribute to the different status which a poem enjoys and then, to the extent to which the answer to this question is negative, to determine whether the theories and techniques of l.

designed as they are to deal with ordinary language productions, are adequate to the linguistic analysis of poetry.

Of the various views that have been advanced concerning extralinguistic contributory factors, only one will be specifically considered here, namely, the view which would attribute the poem's different status to special psychological sets or responses on the part of the reader (or hearer). The discussion of this view, however, may be taken as paradigmatic for all other extralinguistic factors which might be adduced to explain this special quality of a poem.

It is not ordinarily in the province of 1. to deal with psychological sets or responses. But if the poem induces psychological responses beyond those of ordinary communication, then one may reasonably expect to find some linguistic feature or features in the poem to correlate with these responses. If such responses occur for which no linguistic correlate is to be found in the poem, then they would seem to constitute data for psychologists, not linguists. If it should be asserted that such responses in fact constitute the given data of poetics, then there can be no argument from the side of 1.; 1. simply has nothing to say about them. Further, a psychological set, or Einstellung, would seem to be significant only if the reading of the poem sustains that set, and here again one might expect to find correlating linguistic features in the poem. In this case, too, if no linguistic correlation can be established, 1. gives over to some other line of inquiry. The approach suggested here has the virtue that it implicitly establishes a hierarchy of validity for critical judgments. From the point of view of 1., those judgments that can be supported by linguistic correlates naturally occupy a higher rank in the hierarchy than do those that cannot.

According primacy to those critical judgments for which support can be found in the language of the poem resembles the practice in certain contemporary critical approaches which maintain that the poem must be judged in terms of itself alone. But this view of the New Criticism embodies a response to a poem not merely in terms of the reader's linguistic capabilities, but also in terms of his critical faculties and sensibilities. Linguistic analysis of poetry does not insist on this added requirement. Insofar as it is feasible, linguistic analysis of poetry is usually content to accept the judgments of literary critics, to whom superiority of response is accorded, on the basis of their experience, sensitivity, and general critical capacity, and then to set out and find linguistic correlates for these judgments. If such attempts are made and fail, then two inferences are possible: either the critical responses are occasioned by extralinguistic factors, or the failure to find linguistic support for them reflects present inadequacies in linguistic theory or techniques. Only in this way, by more and more intensive linguistic analyses attempting to explain various critical responses, can the question be settled of whether a poem's special status is due exclusively to linguistic factors.

Whether a poem's special status is a function of its language alone thus remains to be demonstrated. Some linguists, however, tend to proceed on the assumption that it is. In doing so they are not necessarily making a factual claim to this effect—although some of them do. It is rather that a good many critical statements that are purportedly historical, cultural, or biographical, or, alternatively, mythic, doctrinaire, or aesthetic are held by linguists to be prompted immediately by the language in a poem, and it is the language that thus deserves the most immediate systematic study. In the same way a good many value statements may turn out to have linguistic correlates in the poem and, that being the case, it is certainly advisable to describe the latter. Thus, while the question of whether, ultimately, the impact of a poem can be explained entirely in terms of its linguistic composition is obviously one of great theoretical interest, it is clear that a good deal of significant work can be done in the linguistic analysis of poetry without waiting to see whether and how the question will finally be answered.

From the point of view of 1., the more substantive question is whether or not the theories and techniques of linguistic analysis are adequate to deal with the purely linguistic aspects of poetry. To provide an answer to this question requires some discussion of the aims and capacities of linguistic analysis. To begin with, linguistic analysis is primarily concerned with language, not with language events. It of course analyzes language events, but it does so only with the view of establishing the system which lies behind these events and makes them possible—the system as such not being available for analysis. One distinguishes in this connection between langue and parole, or code and message, or grammar and utterance. A poem is (to select one alternant) an utterance (where this subsumes written as well as spoken language productions). But the question immediately arises whether a poem is a manifestation of the same grammar as the grammar manifested by ordinary language utterances. This question has nothing to do with the presence in poetry of such conventional features as rhyme, meter, alliteration, etc., inasmuch as these features accompany a language which is independently distinctive. Since, for reasons of convenience and utility, 1. has dealt largely with regular utterances, most linguistic descriptions or theories have resulted in or implied grammars such that poetry would fall outside their scope. This would make it appear that, for descriptive purposes at any rate, poetry is written according to grammatical rules that are different from the grammatical rules governing ordinary language utterances. It would of course be possible to revise grammatical descriptions or theories so as to take account of poetic utterances directly, by increasing the scope of the grammar. But such a course would have two disadvantages. In the first place the grammar would lose a good deal of its generality; in the second place, and more important from the point of view of poetics, this course would preclude the use of the grammar as a standard or norm against which to explain the way in which poetic language is distinctive. As a matter of fact, a good deal of recent work in linguistically oriented poetics has adopted the position, explicitly or implicitly, that poetic language is characterized by deviation from grammatical rules.

Another problem derives from the fact that most work in l. has proceeded on the assumption that the sentence is the highest-level linguistic unit about which grammatical statements can be made. L. Bloomfield's statement (Language [1933], p. 170) that "... each sentence is an independent linguistic form, not included by virtue of any grammatical construction in any larger linguistic form" has, as one of its corollaries, the fact that linguistic forms larger than the sentence, if they are unified at all, are unified by relations that are different from the relation of grammatical construction. Thus, while relations of some sort certainly bind sentences together into larger units, it is not yet sufficiently clear, from the point of view of linguistic analysis, just what these relations are. The measure for intra-sentence relations is grammaticality, for supra-sentence relations, coherence; and linguistic techniques for dealing with the latter are not yet very highly developed. Moreover, those supra-sentence relations which most immediately come to the linguist's mind—features like anaphora, tense sequence agreement, etc.—have little interest for stylistic analysis, inasmuch as they reflect, in the main, obligatory constraints.

There have been a few attempts to discover and account for supra-sentence relations. Z. Harris, in his "discourse analysis," has suggested techniques for judging sameness and difference of structure in the sentences making up a complete discourse ("Discourse Analysis," Language, 28 [1952], 1-30, and "Discourse Analysis: A Sample Text," ibid., 474-94). More recently, M. W. Bloomfield and L. Newmark have adapted generative grammar to the generation of complete discourses (not merely sentences); cf. A Linguistic Introduction to the History of Eng. (1963), pp. 240, 260ff. Consistent with these procedures is the definition of style proposed by A. Hill, according to which it "... concerns all those relations among linguistic entities which are stable, or may be stable, in terms of wider spans than those which fall within the limits of the sentence" (Introduction to Linguistic Structures [1958], pp. 406ff.). Levin's book (1962) is an attempt to describe the structure of poetry along these lines. It must be admitted, however, that in the area of discourse analysis (a poem being a discourse in this sense) l. has not yet gone very far. What is needed is to develop means for analyzing the linguistic devices which contribute to the coherence and unity of multi-sentence units, to ascertain what sort of inter-sentence relations these devices enter into, and then to determine the status and function of these devices in the general linguistic system. For a start in this direction, see M. Halliday, "The Linguistic Study of Literary Texts," Proceedings of the IXth International Congress of Linguists (1964).

L. has dealt with poetic language on the levels of phonology, word, and syntax. Phonology is divided by l. into two aspects: segmental and suprasegmental (or prosodic). The former aspect deals with those phones (sounds) that appear in morphemes, words, and longer sequences composed of these units, whereas suprasegmental phonology deals with the dynamic features—stress, pitch, and juncture (pausal and transition phenomena)—that accompany the segmental units in the speech act. In actual language utterances, of course, segmental and suprasegmental features occur simultaneously. A morpheme, word, or longer stretch is accompanied by stress(es), pitch(es), and junctures. For purposes of analysis, however, these co-occurring features must first be separately isolated before their mutual relations and their function with the segmental material can be properly evaluated. In general, the study of segmental phonology in poetry is relevant to the question of sound-texture, and the study of suprasegmental phonology is relevant to the question of meter.

In this discussion sound-texture is understood as the texture imparted to a poem by various patterns and configurations of its segmental phones. The standard forms of such patterns and configurations are of course rhyme and devices like alliteration and assonance. Frequently, however, it is possible to discern less obvious phonological patterns in a poem, patterns which similarly play a constructive role in its organization. An attempt at codifying many such patterns is D. Masson, "Sound-Repetition Terms," Poetics. Poetyka, pp. 189-99. Analyses of the latter kind—in which vowels, consonants, diphthongs, and even distinctive features have been shown to pattern in some nonrandom way—have been carried out by Firth, Fónagy, Masson, Oras, and others. Findings of phonic pattern-regularity have a rather obvious bearing on the question of poetry's higher degree of textural density as well as on questions of greater organizational unity. On the assumption that sounds possess phonaesthetic properties, attempts have also been made to correlate such findings with judgments of a poem's tone or affective address. Other studies (J. Lynch, "The Tonality of Lyric Poetry: An Experiment in Method," Word, 9 [1953]; D. Hymes, "Phonological Aspects of Style: Some Eng. Sonnets," Style in Language, pp. 109–31) have gone further and have attempted to show that in certain sonnets and other short poems the phonic patterns thus found frequently converge in a single "summative" word occupying a strategic place in the poem. This pattern thus represents one mode in which form and meaning may be fused in poetry.

Metrics has been one of the most significant areas of convergence for l. and literary analysis. Concerned as it is with the phonological tissue of poetry—an isolatable and measurable thing—it has long attracted literary scholars who like exactness of statement and linguists who have aesthetic yearnings. At the turn of the present century, a great search was made for precision in metrics by means of what some might consider the ultimate sacrilege, the machine. The development of devices for analyzing speech sounds, like the Marey tambour (sometimes called the kymograph) and later the oscilloscope, led to mechanical displays of verse like those of Scripture and Schramm. Earlier workers (like Warner Brown, Ada Snell, P. Verrier, and Amos Morris) had exploded long-believed fictions like the literal equality of feet and the long-short dichotomy, but Scripture was the first to outline an entire theory of meter on a mechanical basis. Recognizing the phonetic complexity of metrical elements, he discarded the traditional identification of ictus with "stress," substituting the concept of "centroid" instead. The centroid was the sum of features like greater auditory impressiveness, intenser loudness, pitch change, slowed transition, and more precise pronunciation. Scripture's basic unit of description was the line: "a stretch of the verse-stream that coincides with the printed line." He denied the existence of feet, since they could not be found in the phonetic trace. Nor, for that matter, could one discover syllables in a trace—all that exists, he contended, is syllabicity. He developed an elaborate terminology to describe linear kinds, inventing such terms as "nucretic," "nudiambic," "nuclydonic," etc. His entire emphasis was to discover the vast variety of phenomena occurring in recited verse, and he was all too successful in his search. Schramm also presented a visual display or "score" of verse performance, although his terminology was somewhat more conventional ("accent," "stress," etc.). Intonational curves, calibrated to the musical scale, were marked on one staff, and intensity was presented on a coteponal one. Time was divided by vertical bars at one-second intervals. Unlike Scripture, Schramm continued to use the concept of foot—although he recognized its purely formal mode of existence—as a convenient tool of analysis.

Recent developments in acoustic phonetics (frequency and intensity analyzing machines) have made the mechanical analysis of verse performance much easier and more exact. But, at the same time, the rise of phonemic theory has shown the need to correlate physical data with the system that language is today universally recognized to be. Thus—and especially for metrical analysis—not raw phonetics but functional phonology, the system of linguistic sounds that mark semantic differences, must be consulted. The need was recognized as early as 1933 by Jakobson in words which laid the groundwork for modern metrics. Jakobson pointed out that meter could not be studied as a purely phonetic object: "Not the phone, but the phoneme as such is utilized as the cornerstone of verse." Although work had been carried on by European linguists like Mukařovský, Lotz, and de Groot, the first recognition and practical application of this notion to Eng. meter came in the 1950's in work by Whitehall, Hill, Chatman (1956), Epstein and Hawkes, and Smith. Whitehall, alone and in collaboration with Hill, first suggested the utility of structural linguistics to metrics and pointed to the Trager-Smith description of the Eng. stress system as an excellent vehicle for precision in metrical statement (G. L. Trager and H. L. Smith, Jr., An Outline of Eng. Structure [1951]). Chatman attempted the first application by analyzing a variety of recitations of a given poem to show how variously meter is actualized in performance. Epstein and Hawkes presented what might be called the orthodox Trager-Smith metrics, elaborating the concept of "relative strength" and providing a somewhat too vast inventory of foot-types, although only four basic feet were recognized, spondees and pyrrhics being declared impossible on the contention that one syllable must always be louder than the other. They postulated 6,236 kinds of iambs, 2,376 kinds of trochees, and a vaster number of three-syllabled feet. The most suggestive concept educated by Epstein and Hawkes was that of the foot as the simplest recurring unit, on principles of homogeneity and regularity.

Smith reviewed and elaborated upon some of the Epstein-Hawkes procedure. Wells (Style in Language, pp. 197-200), coming to the subject from a slightly different angle, applied a technique of "logical construction" to the Trager-Smith system, distinguishing the abstract meter from (1) the orthographic record, (2) a recitation of the poem (a more adequate record), and (3) the phonemic system itself. He also suggested the possibility of considering metrics as a derivational or extractational process based upon operational (not prescriptive) rules, the most important being the "maximization principle": one picks the interpretation which gives the maximally regular meter. Thompson (Poetics. Poetyka, pp. 167-75) wrote essentially a historical treatment, showing how the Trager-Smith analysis could help to understand how Eng. meter as we know it today was substantially formed in the 16th c.

A different analysis of Eng. intonation, stress, and related features—that of Bolinger ("A Theory of Pitch Accent," Word, 14 [1958])—formed the basis of the most recent linguistic metrics, by Chatman (1964). Distinguishing on purely rhythmical grounds between event and prominence features in the metrical construct, he identified the syllable as the linguistic actualizer of the former, but found the latter more complex; metrical prominence could be actualized by one of several features: linguistic stress, or accent, or linguistic zero (no overt performance feature at all). He asserted the need to distinguish between performance (a purely linguistic record), scansion (the reduction of linguistic data to the metrical system in one performance), and metrical analysis (the sum of all reasonable scansions), demonstrating these distinctions by analyzing in acoustic and phonemic depth several recorded performances of Shakespeare's eighteenth sonnet. He developed the concept of simplicity suggested by Epstein and Hawkes, presenting formal guidelines for defining the metrical concepts and procedures in terms of efficiency of metrical design.

These assertions of the utility of 1. for metrics have not gone uncontested. A significant critique of linguistic procedure (as well as other procedures) was offered by Wimsatt and Beardsley, who objected chiefly to what they considered an excessive concern for linguistic as opposed to metrical detail in some of the early studies. A defense was made by Pace ("The Two Domains: Meter and Rhythm," PMLA, 74 [1959]), who suggested that not all linguists would agree to the formulations already presented. It is undeniable that there exists nothing so monolithic as the linguistic position. Further, it is to be hoped that Wimsatt and Beardsley's very perceptive criticism has been or will be successfully answered in later work. Happily, at least three literary scholars who are not primarily linguists—Thompson, Hollander, and Halpern—have used the linguistic approach without apparent injury to their critical sensibilities.

A matter related to but not to be identified with meter is that of verse performance. Modern techniques of phonological analysis, particularly as they apply to stress, intonation, and related phenomena, have made it possible to discuss problems of oral recitation in increasingly finer detail. One subject of interest has been the analysis of the various components of the ultimate performance—what identifies the reader's concept of the persona of the poem (an old man, a neurotic, a duke who has had his wife put to death, etc.) and of the persona's attitude (anger, fear, etc.)—particularly as these relate to unavoidable carryovers of the reciter's own speech (his general intonational range, voice quality, etc. [Chatman, 1962]). Another concerns the normative problem of reading: what is the proper interpretation of a line? And how does that interpretation relate to meter? Chatman's argument that meter could be used to assist in interpretation and that performance and meter are cross-revealing (1956, 1957) was criticized by Wimsatt and Beardsley as a confusion between meter and intonation, and his argument that metrical ambiguity is more apparent than real and that performances usually demand resolution was contested by Levin ("Suprasegmentals and the Performance of Poetry," Quarterly Jour. of Speech, 48 [1962]), who argued that certain syntactic ambiguities cannot be resolved in performance and that forced oral resolutions may do a serious disservice to poetry's richness.

Relevant to the question of performance is the discussion by Trager ("Paralanguage: A First Approximation," Studies in L., 13 [1958]) of the role played in the speech act by such features as voice set, voice quality, and vocalizations—laughing while speaking, crying, whining, vocal intensity, general pitch height, etc. Such features do not appear to be structured systematically as are other linguistic features, but they obviously do signal relevant information. Investigation of these features has been conducted by linguists in some psychiatric interviews. As is suggested by the description of these features and also by the fact that they are studied in clinical situations, "paralinguistic" features signal information about the speaker, not about the message. For this reason their study is quite peripheral to linguistic analysis. In evaluating the oral performance of poetry, however, one must deal with them, if only to discriminate between what is linguistically relevant and what is not.

Grammatical studies of poetic language may be divided according as the emphasis is on words, and according as it is on grammatical sequences of words. Under the first subdivision fall those studies that are concerned with a poem's diction, and under the second those that are concerned with a poem's syntax. Diction studies may in turn be divided into those that deal with the meanings of words and thus lend themselves to statements of a poem's content or import, and those that deal with words primarily as grammatical entities and leave semantic considerations aside. Because words as grammatical entities are much more susceptible to properly linguistic statements, it is with diction in the latter sense that linguistic analysis of poetry has been chiefly concerned. Assuming that part-of-speech membership is given—either tacitly or by analysis—then the words occurring in poetry lend themselves readily to quantitative analysis, and such analysis can be used as a linguistic correlate for certain judgments about a poet's style or aesthetic orientation. Thus, using the data presented by Josephine Miles in an earlier article ("Eras in Eng. Poetry," PMLA, 70 [1955]), in which she distinguished quantitatively between verbal style and substantival style in several centuries of Eng. poetry, A. Kroeber showed that it is in the work of "reasoning" poets like Jonson, Donne, Coleridge, etc. that verb forms predominate, whereas in the work of sensory or visually imagistic poets like Spenser, Milton, Tennyson, etc. the adjectival forms predominate ("Parts of Speech in Periods of Poetry," PMLA, 73 [1958]). Studies with more highly developed statistical techniques have been conducted by Yule and Herdan. In the work of these men there is a greater concern with the problem of establishing adequate statistical procedures, but here also the statistics are used to determine stylistic indices on the basis of the frequencies with which word-classes are represented in literary works. Herdan in fact is interested in establishing a field of "stylo-statistics." Although worth-while results may be expected from statistical analyses, certain methodological difficulties remain to be overcome. Two problems mentioned by Plath ("Mathematical L.," Trends in European and American L. [1961], pp. 21-57) are that of deciding on the optimal size and nature of the sample to be used, and that of finding statistical measures which will hold no matter what the sample size, so that results obtained from texts of different lengths may be compared directly. Both Yule and Herdan have suggested techniques for dealing with these difficulties, and no doubt statistical procedures will ultimately be refined to the point where such quantitative studies will yield more important results for stylistic analysis.

In syntax the development by Chomsky of generative grammar (Syntactic Structures [1957]) offers considerable promise for the analysis of poetry. The aim of all linguistic analysis, as has been stated, is to arrive at a statement and understanding of the grammatical system of the language. Unlike the descriptive approach, however, which proceeds directly from a corpus of actual linguistic material to a statement of the grammar, the generative approach proceeds from a set of rules for generating sentences, where these rules in fact constitute the grammar. The form which the grammar takes on the descriptive approach is one stressing primarily the different classes of grammatical entities, whereas on the generative approach the emphasis is on the rules. Inasmuch as descriptive grammar assigns elements to classes on the basis of their ability to enter into certain combinations with other grammatical elements, it would appear that the rules could be deduced from the statements governing the classification. As a matter of fact, a descriptive grammar will in most cases comprise statements concerning sentence types. Usually, however, these are of rather gross sentence types, and only rarely are all the constraints discovered in the classifying process incorporated into them. When aberrant sentences turn up in an extension of the original corpus, or even in that corpus itself, they are usually listed as reflecting exceptional sentence types. Many sentences occurring in poetry would be treated in this manner. In the main, this procedure seems to work: the extension of the corpus reveals few sentences whose members cannot be fitted into the pre-established categories. For purposes of ordinary language analysis this procedure thus has practical value. Its method of dealing with aberrant sentences renders it fairly uninteresting, however, from the point of view of poetic language. Unusual sentences are either lumped in with regular sentences, in this way obviating the possibility of using the grammar for explicative purposes, or they are simply listed as falling outside the domain of the grammar, in this way characterizing them as unusual.

In generative grammar one starts with rules for sentence generation. Unlike descriptive grammar, in which methodological considerations govern the analysis at every step, generative grammar is not concerned, theoretically, with the question of how the rules are arrived at. In practice, of course, the rules result from many of the same kinds of observations that lead to the establishing of classes in a descriptive grammar. The strict adherence in the latter approach to methodological requirements makes it difficult, however—in some cases impossible—to incorporate certain types of grammatical relationships into the description. By proceeding deductively, generative grammar overcomes this disability. Moreover, there is a check on a generative grammar also; it comes at the output end of the generative process, namely, in the form of the sentences which the particular set of rules logically entails. If the output sentences are all grammatical and all grammatical sentences are generated, then the rules are adequate; if the rules do not meet these requirements, then they are defective. In the course of making such a set of rules adequate, it develops that more and more constraints on co-occurrence must be built into the rules; this to ensure grammatical outputs. Many of these constraints would, as a matter of fact, be considered lexical in nature. A generative grammar is thus very finely articulated. It is this articulation which renders generative grammar a suitable tool for poetic analysis.

The language of poetry is referred to in various ways that attest to its distinctive character. Pre-systematically, one uses such terms as different, novel, arresting, etc. Aristotle noticed this property of poetic language, and much later, in the 1920's, the Prague School aestheticians signalized it, referring to the "foregrounded" or "deautomatized" expressions of poetry. Attempts to explain these effects have usually centered on the notion of deviation from the norm. The problem has been, however, to characterize the norm. In eras governed by normative dicta, there may be in effect certain linguistic conventions binding literary forms, and transgressions of these conventions would constitute deviations. From the linguistic point of view, however, such norms are artificial, grafted upon antecedent and more fundamental, genuinely linguistic norms. Attempts to specify these linguistic norms have taken three main approaches in modern linguistic studies: statistical, information-theoretical, and grammatical.

In statistical studies of diction, counts are made of the incidence of various words, types of words, or parts of speech. This same procedure can naturally be employed in dealing with syntactic units like phrases, clauses, and sentences. Assuming that a body of statistics on such units was gathered from a corpus of ordinary language texts, then the frequencies of syntactic units found in poetry could be matched against these original statistics (which would be taken as constituting the norm) and in this way the distinctive effect of the poetic units would be explained as stemming from their statistical rarity or preponderance. Frequently, moreover, deviations are effected in poetry for which the explanation is to be sought not in respect to an external norm, but in respect to a norm built up within the poem itself. Such a situation arises where a poem builds up a statistical preponderance of certain kinds of syntactic patterns (phrase types, clause types, sentence types, etc.), or, in fact, of any linguistic features, and then deviates from this pattern at some subsequent point in the poem. Dealing with such intra-poem statistics is a rather straightforward process, but the problem of explaining deviation in poetry with respect to statistics on ordinary language frequencies is not so simple, since the difficulties mentioned earlier as attending on statistical sampling are naturally pertinent here too. As a matter of fact, these problems are intensified in the area of syntax. For in poetic analysis a good deal of the interest attaches to particular syntactic sequences; one is interested, that is, not merely in the types of syntactic construction used in a poem, but to an even greater extent in the actually occurring syntactic sequences. In order to provide a statistical background of any reliability, therefore, the sampling would need to be much more extensive and fine-grained. Statistical work of the required magnitude does not yet seem to have been achieved.

The principles of information theory have recently been discussed as perhaps affording another avenue for explicating deviation in poetic language. Information theory approaches the question of deviation not in terms of frequency of occurrence, as does statistics, but from the point of view of transitional probability. Given an inventory of elements and the permitted sequences of these elements, information theory incorporates a measure for assigning probabilities to the occurrence of each element in the inventory at any given point in a sequence. Based on these calculations some elements may have zero probability of occurring at a certain point in a sequence, others one hundred percent probability (complete predictability), and others a probability somewhere in between these limits. Information theory thus measures the rarity or surprise factor of a given element at a given position. It thus amounts to a formal apparatus for explaining deviation. But the problems of data-sampling arise here too in rather severe form. Information theory is an excellent tool for dealing with the transitional probabilities of small inventories of elements, such as phonemes or letters, but in the field of syntax, where the probabilities would have to be established for millions (actually an infinite number) of combinations, it does not seem to offer more than an interesting theoretical possibility.

In discussing descriptive grammar it was pointed out that deviant sentences could be simply listed as exceptions to the stated rules. This of course amounts to a rather trivial explanation of deviation. The corresponding decision in a generative grammar would be made where the sequence or sentence in question was not an output of the grammar. Ipso facto such a sequence would constitute a deviation. But using a generative grammar as a norm does not limit one simply to absolute decisions of this kind. Since a generative grammar consists of a finely articulated set of grammatical rules, one can test the deviant sequence against these rules and in this way determine in just what particular respect the sequence is deviant. Generative grammar thus makes it possible to arrive at decisions on kinds and degrees of deviation.

A generative grammar, at least in most versions, comprises a transformational level. On this level sentences are transformed from one grammatical shape into another; e.g., actives into passives, statements into questions, and sentences into nominalizations. In addition to these transformations, various other and more complex grammatical structures can also be shown to stand in the transform relation to each other. This formalized technique for showing relations between different sequence and sentence forms can be put to use in bringing to light certain regularities that lie, as it were, beneath the linguistic surface of the poem. If the grammatical structures occurring in a poem are similar or identical to any appreciable extent, that is obviously a stylistic fact of some importance. But if such similarities or identities are not discoverable in the actual language of a poem, it need not follow that there is no regularity of syntactic structure to be discovered. For it may turn out that there is indeed a regularity of structure, but it is manifested in the fact that various of the sequences in the poem are related to each other transformationally. Thus, transformational analysis provides an additional linguistic means for confirming judgments of a poem's unity of structure.

E. W. Scripture, Grundzüge der englischen Verswissenschaft (1929); R. Jakobson, "Über den Versbau der serbokroatischen Volksepen," Archives néerlandaises de phonétique expérimentale, 7-9 (1933); W. Schramm, Approaches to a Science of Eng. Verse (1935); G. U. Yule, The Statistical Study of Lit. Vocabulary (1944); H. Whitehall, "From L. to Crit.," KR, 13 (1951); S. Chatman, "Robert Frost's 'Mowing': An Inquiry into Prosodic Structure," KR, 18 (1956) and "L., Poetics, and Interpretation: The Phonemic Dimension," Quarterly Jour. of Speech, 43 (1957); J. R. Firth, "Modes of Meaning," Papers in L. 1934-1951 (1957); B. Havránek, "The Functional Differentiation of the Standard Language," A Prague School Reader on Esthetics, Lit. Structure and Style, ed. P. Garvin (1958); J. Mukařovský, "Standard Language and Poetic Language," A Prague School Reader; H. Whitehall and A. A. Hill, "A Report on the Language-Lit. Seminar," Readings in Applied Eng. L., ed. H. B. Allen (1958); E. L. Epstein and T. Hawkes, L. and Eng. Prosody (1959); M. Riffaterre, "Criteria for Style Analysis," Word, 15 (1959); H. L. Smith, Jr., "Toward Redefining Eng. Prosody," Studies in L., 14 (1959); W. K. Wimsatt, Jr. and M. Beardsley, "The Concept of Meter: An Exercise in Abstraction," PMLA, 74 (1959); G. Herdan, Type-Token Mathematics (1960); R. Jakobson, "L. and Poetics," Conference on Style, Indiana Univ., 1958. Style in Language, ed. T. A. Sebeok (1960); M. Riffaterre, "Stylistic Context," Word, 16 (1960); S. Saporta, "The Application of L. to the Study of Poetic Language," Style in Language (1960); International Conference of Work-in-Progress Devoted to Problems of Poetics. 1st, Warsaw, 1960. Poetics. Poetyka . . . (1961; see the various articles dealing with l. and poetics); S. Chatman, "Linguistic Style, Lit. Style and Performance: Some Distinctions," Georgetown Monograph Series on Language and L., 13 (1962); S. R. Levin, Linguistic Structures in Poetry (1962); S. Chatman, A Theory of Meter (1965). s.c.; s.r.l.

LIRA. A Sp. stanza form of 4, 5, 6, or, rarely, more Italianate hendecasyllables and heptasyllables, the term denoting loosely any short-strophe canción (q.v.) in Italianate verse. The name was first applied to the form aBabB and was taken from the end of the first line of Garcilaso's A la flor de Gnido. Garcilaso (1501?-1536) supposedly imitated it from Bernardo Tasso, who is credited with its invention. This form is sometimes designated the l. garcilasiana and has come to be known also as estrofa de Fray Luis de León, l. de Fray Luis de León, and quintilla de Luis de León for being popularized through Fray Luis de León's works and later being replaced in popularity by other forms, particularly the l. sestina (aBaBcC, also called media estancia).—Navarro. D.C.C.

LITHUANIAN POETRY. Of the two varieties of Lith. poetry one belongs to folklore and the other to literature proper. The anonymous folk songs (Lith. dainos, singular daina) ante-date personal expression in verse by several centuries, and are mentioned in medieval sources, whereas written literature arose in Lithuania during the Reformation and Counter-Reformation. The daina comprises the most numerous and original part of Lith. folklore (about 200,000 folk songs have now been recorded). It is best represented by the purely lyrical love songs. The lyrical nature of poetic expression is very characteristic of daina in general, and it is strongly evident even in the war songs and ballads. Other types of daina include songs of work, dancing, and games, which are the oldest, various holiday songs and songs of family life, among which the wedding songs and funeral lamentations are of particular interest. Mythological and historical songs are rather rare. The originality of the daina lies chiefly in various poetic artifices and their specific usage. The most typical among them are the numerous diminutives, lavishly used in various forms and degrees, the highly developed parallelisms, and a rather intricate symbolism, basically of an erotic nature. The metrical structure of the daina, which is often of considerable length, is rather complex and quite frequently defies the familiar prosodic standards. Because the text and melody are integrally connected in the daina, the rhythm is of great importance, and, as a result of the free stress in Lith., it is variable and often mixed. The rhyme, however, is not essential. The stanzas have mostly two, three, or four lines, either with or without refrain. Some older songs have no stanzas at all.

The first three dainos to appear in print were selected and published, with a German translation, by P. Ruhig (1675-1749) in 1745 and attracted Lessing's attention. Subsequently Herder incorporated eight in his collection of folk songs (1778-79), one of which, originally from Ruhig, was woven by Goethe into his "Singspiel," Die Fischerin. As a result of this attention, the collection and publication of the daina was undertaken on a large scale in the 19th c. and has continued with increasing scholarship to the present. The earliest collection (1825), was by L. Rhesa (1776-1840), the largest (4 v., 1880-83), by A. Juškevičius (1819-80). Eventually the tradition of folk poetry became a strong factor in the formation of the distinctly national character of Lith. poetry, its influence extending to many contemporary poets.

Written Lith. poetry begins in the 16th c. with versions of canticles and hymns, including those of Martynas Mažvydas (Mosvidius, d. 1563), who also prepared in Königsberg the first printed Lith. book, Catechismusa prasty szadei (1547), a translation of the Lutheran catechism, and prefaced it with a rhymed address to his compatriots. Until the end of the 18th c., hardly anything of higher poetic value, with one significant exception, was achieved. The exception was the appearance in Prussian Lithuania of Kristijonas Donelaitis (Donalaitis, 1714-80). His major work, Metai (The Seasons, 1765-75, published 1818), is a long poem (about 3,000 lines in hexameter) which exhibits in forceful language a keen love and observation of nature and depicts vividly the life and character of the common people. The poem is comparable to similar work of James Thomson and Ewald von Kleist.

A more active literary movement appeared at the beginning of the 19th c., marked first by pseudo-classicism and sentimentalism and later by the influence of romanticism and a growing interest in Lith. folklore. The latter trend was particularly evident in the poetry of Antanas Strazdas (1763-1833), who was one of the first to merge the folk-song tradition with personal expression. The next peak in the development of Lith. poetry after K. Donelaitis was Antanas Baranauškas (1835-1902), the author of the lengthy, picturesque poem Anykščių šilėlis (The Grove of Anykščiai, 1858-59), a veiled lament for Lithuania under the czarist Russian regime. The pre-20th c. development of Lith. poetry was concluded by Maironis (pen name of Jonas Mačiulis, 1862-1932), the creative embodiment of the ideals of the national awakening and a foremost lyric poet (cf. his collection Pavasario balsai /Voices of Spring, 1895), whose formal and structural innovations (e.g., the introduction of a new tonal structure instead of the former syllabic versification, and the normalization of the poetic language) had great influence on the growth of the new Lith. poetry.

The beginning of the 20th c. brought changes of great importance. The general relaxation of Rus. political pressure and the ever growing cultural consciousness increased literary production and widened its horizon. The utilitarian aims of poetry were less emphasized and, inspired by literary movements abroad, new approaches to poetry were sought that would fit the Lith. spirit and satisfy purely aesthetic demands. Although evident before World War I, these trends were fulfilled after the war, during the period of independence (1918-40), when Lith. poetry reached high standards of creative art. Symbolism left a strong imprint on the early poetry of this period, best represented by Balys Sruoga (1896-1947), also an outstanding dramatist, Vincas Mykolaitis-Putinas (b. 1893), later a leading novelist as well, and Faustas Kirša (1891-1964). This group can be supplemented by Jurgis Baltrušaitis (1873-1944), who, after achieving distinction among the Rus. symbolists, began to publish verse in his native Lith. around 1930. In the 1920's the more conservative trends were countered by the futurist and, to some extent, by dadaist and surrealist poets who, led by Kazys Binkis (1893-1942), formed the group of Keturi Vėjai (Four Winds), which further rejuvenated poetic form and content. Somewhat later, neoromanticism, neosymbolism, aestheticism, and expressionism appeared on the scene, while the group Trečias Frontas

(Third Front) advocated poetry of leftist orientation.

These trends were transcended, however, by the individual traits and achievements of the four leading poets of the second generation: Jonas Aistis (b. 1904), a highly intimate poet and a master of subtle and refined expression, Bernardas Brazdžionis (b. 1907), whose poetry, sometimes rhetorical and of prophetic overtones, is a synthesis of national traditions, modern life and religious conceptions, and Antanas Miškinis (b. 1905) and Salomėja Nėris (pen name of S. Bačinskaitė-Bučienė, 1904-45), both of whom have transformed the best qualities of the daina into their own personal expression. The transitional features leading to the poetry of the next generation were best reflected in the verse of Vytautas Mačernis (1920-44).

The natural development of Lith. poetry has been disrupted by the annexation of the country by the USSR during World War II. This event is responsible for the schism that has since divided Lith. poetry. On the one hand, in Lithuania, poetry is dominated by the paralyzing ideology of socialist realism. A few of the older poets, such as Salomėja Nėris, Liudas Gira (1884-1946), and Teofilis Tilvytis (b. 1904), have become eulogists of the Soviet regime, while the others, e.g., V. Mykolaitis-Putinas and A. Miškinis, are laboring less conspicuously. Among the younger ones, more prominent are Eduardas Mieželaitis (b. 1919), Algimantas Baltakis (b. 1930), and Justinas Marcinkevičius (b. 1930). On the other hand, the spirit and tradition of the poetry of Independent Lithuania is continued, with the absorption of contemporary movements in Western poetry, by the poets in exile, especially in the United States. Among them, J. Aistis, B. Brazdžionis, and F. Kirša are pursuing their former creative paths, while Henrikas Radauskas (b. 1910) has developed into a first-rank poet of the modern idiom in classical form. Of the younger emigré poets, who have reached maturity in exile, the leading ones are Kazys Bradūnas (b. 1917), the bard of the native soil, Alfonsas Nyka-Niliūnas (b. 1919), an existentialist of a deeply felt philosophical thought, and Henrikas Nagys (b. 1920), who embraces both emotional expressionism and neoromanticism.

ANTHOLOGIES: The Daina, ed. U. Katzenelenbogen (1935); Aus litauischer Dichtung, ed. and tr. H. Engert (2d ed., 1938); Litauischer Liederschrein, ed. V. Jungfer (2d ed., 1948); Lietuvių poezijos antologija, ed. J. Aistis and A. Vaičiulaitis (1951); Lietuvių liaudies dainos, ed. J. Čiurlionytė (1955); Lith. Folksongs in America, ed. J. Balys (1958); The Green Oak: Selected Lith. Poetry, ed. A. Landsbergis and C. Mills (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: M. Biržiška, Lietuvių dainų literatūros istorija (1919); B. Sruoga, "Lith. Folksongs," Folk-lore (London), 43 (1932); V. Mykolaitis-Putinas, Naujoji lietuvių literatūra (1936); V. Jungfer, Litauen: Antlitz eines Volkes (1938); J. Maublère, Panorama de la littérature lithuanienne contemporaine (1938); A. Vaičiulaitis, Outline Hist. of Lith. Lit. (1942); J. Balys, "Lith. Folk Song," Funk and Wagnalls Standard Dict. of Folklore . . ., II (1950); J. Balys, Lith. Narrative Folksongs (1954); Lietuvių literatūros istorija, ed. K. Korsakas (1957 ff.); A. Senn, "Storia della letteratura lituana," Storia delle letterature baltiche, ed. G. Devoto (1957; 2d ed. in preparation).

W.K.M.; K.O.

LITOTES (Gr. "plainness," "simplicity"). A figure, related to meiosis (q.v.), employing deliberate understatement for purposes of intensification, or affirmation by the negative of the contrary, usually used to secure emphasis or irony; however, according to Lausberg, "Die Ironie ist in der Litotes nicht total, sondern nur graduell" (Handbuch der literarischen Rhetorik 586). Servius, commenting on Virgil's Georgics 2. 125 says, "non tarda, id est, strenuissima: nam litotes figura est" (not slow, that is, most brisk: for the figure is litotes), though in fact it seems to be hyperbole. The figure is used so frequently in Beowulf, and other OE poetry, that it has become (with kennings) a distinguishing mark of that literature: "þæt wæs god cyning" (that was a good king), following a passage telling how the king flourished on earth, prospered in honors, brought the neighboring people to obey him and pay him tribute. "Nor are thy lips ungraceful, Sire of Men, / Nor tongue ineloquent" (Milton, Paradise Lost 8). Effects vary from the obvious ironies of Beowulf to the sophisticated subtleties of Pope; i. is also an effective satiric instrument: "He was nat pale as a forpynd goost, / A fat swan loved he best of any roost" (Chaucer, The Canterbury Tales. Gen. Prol. 205-6). As an affirmation by negative of the contrary: "I'll bet you won't" meaning "I'm certain you will."—O. Jespersen, Negation in Eng. and Other Languages (1917); A. Hübner, Die "MHD Ironie" oder die L. im Altdutschen (1930); F. Bracher, "Understatement in OE Poetry," PMLA, 52 (1937); L. M. Hollander, "L. in Old Norse," PMLA, 53 (1938); Lausberg.

R.O.E.

LJÓÐAHATTIR. An Eddic meter, of which the first and third lines of each stanza are similar to the usual line of the fornyrðislag (q.v.), while the second and fourth lines are shorter and have no caesura. The short line, which may have 3 or more accented syllables, is an independent unit, which alliterates in itself:

Deyr fé, deyja frændr, deyr sjálfr it sama.

L. is the metrical form of Hávamál and other, especially didactic, Eddic poems.—The Poetic Edda, tr. H. A. Bellows (1923) and tr. L. M. Hollander (1928, rev. ed. 1962). R.B.

LOGAOEDIC (Gr. "prose-poetic"). Term invented by metricians of Roman imperial times as a general description of mixed anapaestic and iambic or dactylic and trochaic cola (ascending and descending rhythm respectively) in Gr. lyric verse. L. anapaestic cola may be composed of 2 or more anapaests followed by an iambic dipody catalectic or, more usually, by a single iambus, and 1. dactylic cola of 2 or more dactyls followed by a trochaic dipody (the last syllable being anceps), or by a trochaic dipody catalectic. Anacrusis (q.v.) sometimes is postulated in the latter category, e.g., in Pindar's famous description of Athens:

o tai liparai kai iostephanoi kai aoidimoi

To the varieties of 1. dactylic cola belong the Ibycean (— — — | — — — | — — | —) and Praxilleian (— — — | — — — | — — — | — — | — —), and with both anacrusis has been assumed. Some modern metricians abhor the name "Iogaedic," e.g., A. M. Dale, CR, 62 (1948), 124, who prefers to speak of "prosodiac-enoplian."—T. D. Goodell, Chapters on Gr. Metric (1901); J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); Kolář; Dale; Koster. R. I. G.

LONG (syllable). See MORA; CLASSICAL PROSODY.

LONG METER (L.M. of the hymn books). In effect a variant of ballad or common meter, for if the trimeters of that 4343 pattern are lengthened, the 4444 pattern of l.m. results. The foot pattern is sometimes trochaic, but usually iambic as in Burns's

Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair?
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae weary fu' o' care?

Instead of the abcb rhyme scheme, l.m. is frequently found in abab, and even in aabb, the latter differing from octosyllabic couplets in thought development and by being printed as quatrains on the page. The aabb pattern gives a different "turn" to the ideas and is especially well suited, although not limited, to poems of light compliment. L. J. Z.

LYRIC. The term used to designate one of the three general categories of poetic literature, the others being narrative and dramatic. Although the differentiating features between these arbitrary classifications are sometimes moot, 1. poetry may be said to retain most pronouncedly the elements of poetry which evidence its origins in musical expression—singing, chanting, and recitation to musical accompaniment. Though the drama and epic as well as the 1. may have had their genesis in a spontaneously melodic expression which soon adapted itself to a ritualistic need and thus became formalized, music in dramatic and epic poetry was secondary to other elements of the works, being mainly a mimetic or mnemonic device. In the case of 1. poetry, however, the musical element is intrinsic to the work intellectually as well as aesthetically: it becomes the focal point for the poet's perceptions as they are given a verbalized form to convey emotional and rational values. The primary importance of the musical element is indicated in many generic terms which various cultures have used to designate nonnarrative and non-dramatic poetry: the Eng. "1.," derived from the Gr. lyra or musical instrument; the classical Gr. melic, or mele (air, melody); the Chinese shih, or "word song."

To speak of the "musical" qualities of l. poetry is not to say that such poetry is written always to be sung. Neither does the appellation of "musical" indicate that l. poetry possesses such attributes as pitch, harmony, syncopation, counterpoint, and other mechanical characteristics of a tonal, musical line or sequence. To define the quality of lyricism in this way is to limit a l. poem to the manner in which it is presented or to its architectonic aspects. This is largely the approach which classical criticism and its followers have taken in their treatment of l. poetry. On the other hand, an equation of poetic lyricism with the non-architectural or "emotional" qualities of music is even less profitable from the critical point of view, because it leads to such question-begging definitions of the l. as "the essence of poetry," "pure poetry," or, most vaguely, "poetry." To declare that "the characteristic of the l. is that it is the product of the pure poetic energy unassociated with other energies, and that l. and poetry are synonymous terms" (Drinkwater) is as extreme a definition of lyricism as to claim that a passage is lyrical simply because it possesses "the quality of metrical construction or architecture" (Gilbert Murray).

Most of the confusion in the modern (i.e., 1550 to the present) critical use of the term "l." is due to an overextension of the phrase to cover a body of poetic writing that has drastically altered its nature in the centuries of its development. The first critical use of the word mele by the Greeks was for the purpose of broadly distinguishing between various non-narrative and nondramatic types of poetry: the melic poem was intended to be sung to musical accompaniment, as contrasted with the iambic and elegiac poems, which were chanted. The first general use of "l." to characterize a selection of poetic literature encompassing several genres did not come until the Alexandrian period. Then "l." became a generic term for any poem which was composed to be sung, and this was the meaning which it largely retained until the Renaissance. The preoccupation of Aristotle, Horace, Josephus, Jerome, and other pre-Renaissance critics with the metrics of melic or l. poetry was entirely appropriate to the principle upon which the category was established.

But with the Renaissance, poets began suiting their work to a visual rather than an auditory medium; even while such critics as Minuturno, Scaliger, Sidney, and Puttenham were formulating their discussions of l. poetry, the l. was becoming something quite different from the classical melic poem. No longer a performing bard, scop, or troubadour, the poet ceased to "compose" his poem for musical presentation but instead "wrote" it for a collection of readers. The l. poem, nominally successor to a well-established poetic method, inherited and employed specific themes, meters, attitudes, images, and myths; but in adapting itself to a new means of presentation, the l. found itself bereft of the very element which had been the foundation of its lyricism—music.

At the time the l. was undergoing this important metamorphosis, critics of the 15th and 16th c. chose either to ignore the genre or to treat it in the same quantitative or metrical fashion as the classicists had done. Until the end of the 17th c., therefore, critics failed to distinguish between the true or melodic l., such as the "songs" of Shakespeare, Campion, and Dryden, and the nonmusical, verbal lyrics of Donne, Marvell, and Waller. Both the straightforward, clear song-poem and the more abstrusely phrased print-poem were called "l.": to refer to the "sweetness of numbers" in Waller or Dryden was the critic's substitute for precision of terms in distinguishing poems intended for musical accompaniment from those not so designed. The neoclassical critical concern in 18th-c. France and England with the tragic and epic genres was sufficiently overwhelming to permit the l. to become somehow lost as a subject for discussion; and when the romantic movement came with its championing of lyrical modes, terminological confusion continued in the equation of "l." with "poetry" by Wordsworth, Goethe, Coleridge, Poe, and other literary theorists. The 19th-c. development of a scientific methodology, with consequent insistence on accuracy of terms and precision of generic distinctions, translated itself in the field of literary criticism into a concern with the intrinsic and characteristic nature of the l. The definitions by Drinkwater and Murray were the overinclusive and over-exclusive criteria which resulted from this concern; and critical attempts to reestablish the melodic or musical substance of l. poetry were a third, and equally unsuccessful, method of dealing with the paradoxical nature of a "musical" poetry which was no longer literally "melodic." Such, in greatly simplified lines, is the background of the verbal ambiguity with which post-Renaissance critics concealed their basic failure to define exactly the nature of the l. genre which distinguishes it from narrative and dramatic poetry and which includes all the disparate types of poem commonly called "lyrical."

Critical attempts to define l. poetry by reference to its secondary (i.e., nonmusical) qualities have perhaps suffered by being descriptive of various historical groupings of lyrics rather than definitive of the category as a whole. Among the most well-known and popularly cited proscriptions regarding the l. are that it must necessarily be brief (Poe); "be one, the parts of which mutually support and explain each other; all in their proportion harmonizing with, and supporting the purpose and known influence of metrical arrangement" (Coleridge); be "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings" (Wordsworth); be an intensely subjective and personal expression (Hegel); be an "inverted action of mind upon will" (Schopenhauer); or be "the utterance that is overheard" (Mill).

Though the attributes of brevity, metrical coherence, subjectivity, passion, sensuality, and particularity of image are frequently ascribed to the l. genre, there are schools of poetry obviously l. which are not susceptible to such criteria. Milton's mood poems, L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, as well as the most famous of the Eng. elegies are "brief" in only the most relative sense. Much of the vers libre of the present age contradicts the rule of metrical coherence. Imagist lyrics are hardly "empathized" in the ordinary sense of the word. The "lucubrations" of the metaphysicals are something less than sensual in the romantic meaning of the term. The problem of subjectivity must always plague the critic of the Elizabethan love l. And, finally, the common artistic admission that the universal can be expressed best, and perhaps solely, through the particular image largely invalidates any distinction between the l. and non-l. on a metaphoric or thematic basis.

The irreducible denominator of all l. poetry must, therefore, be those elements which it shares with the musical forms that produced it. Although l. poetry is not music, it is representational of music in its sound patterns, basing its meter and rhyme on the regular linear measure of the song; or, more remotely, it employs cadence and consonance to approximate the tonal variation of a chant or intonation. Thus the l. retains structural or substantive evidence of its melodic origins, and it is this factor which serves as the categorical principle of poetic lyricism.

Contemporary critics, predicating the musical essence of the l. as its vital characteristic, have come close to formulating an exact, inclusive definition of the genre which eliminates semantic contradictions. "Words build into their poetic meaning by building into sound . . . sound in composition: music" (R. P. Blackmur). "A poet does not compose in order to make of language delightful and exciting music; he composes a delightful and exciting music in language in order to make what he has to say peculiarly efficacious in our minds" (Lascelles Abercrombie). Lyrical poetry is "the form wherein the artist presents his image in immediate relation to himself" (James Joyce). "Hence in lyrical poetry what is conveyed is not mere emotion, but the imaginative prehension of emotional states . . ." (Herbert Read). It is "an internal mimesis of sound and imagery" (Northrop Frye). Thus, in contemporary critical usage it may be said that "l." is a general, categorical, and nominal term, whereas in the pre-Renaissance sense it was specific, generic, and descriptive. In its modern meaning, a l. is a type of poetry which is mechanically representational of a musical architecture and which is thematically representational of the poet's sensibility as evidenced in a fusion of conception and image. In its older and more confined sense, a l. was simply a poem written to be sung; this meaning is preserved in the modern colloquialism of referring to the words of a song as its "lyrics."

However useful definitions of the l. may be, they cannot indicate the great flexibility of technique and range of subjects which have helped this category to comprise the bulk of poetic literature. There are literally dozens of l. genres, ranging from the ancient parthenia to the modern vers libre; and no topic, whether a cicada or a locomotive, has been neglected by the l. poets. Though it is manifestly impossible to say everything about the historical development of the l. in a short summary, certain general facts prove interesting as pieces in an evolving pattern of theories about and treatment of the lyrical mode between various ages, cultures, and individuals. The l. is as old as recorded literature; and its history is that of human experience at its most animated.

It is logical to suppose that the first "lyrical" poems came into being when men discovered the pleasure that arises from combining words in a coherent, meaningful sequence with the almost physical process of uttering rhythmical and tonal sounds to convey feelings. The instinctive human tendency to croon or hum or intone as an expression of emotional mood is evidenced in the child's babbling; and the socialization of this tendency in primitive cultures by the chanting or singing of nonsense syllables to emphasize tribal rites is a well documented phenomenon. At that remote point in time when the syllables ceased to be nonsense and became syntactically and connotatively meaningful, the first l. was composed but in what Cro-Magnon or Neanderthal cave this took place, no one will ever know, though speculations about the folk origins of literature range from those of Herder to Jung to A. B. Lord. The earliest recorded evidence of l. poetry would indicate that such compositions emerged from ritualistic activity accompanying religious ceremonies and were expressive of the mystical experience which the "poet" or speaker was undergoing. The dividing line between the nonsense babblings of the Pythoness at Delphi and the transliteration by the priests into a coherent unit of thought is indicative of the fashion in which many of the early religious lyrics came into existence. Scholars have found evidence to support this theory of the religious derivation of poetry in general and the l. in particular in such literatures as the Sanskrit, Celtic, and Japanese, as well as the Gr.

The most complete written evidence of early l. activity is the Egyptian: the Pyramid Texts (ca. 2600 B.C.) includes specimens of the funeral song (elegy), song of praise to the king (ode), and invocation to the gods (hymn); and tomb inscriptions from the same period include the work songs (chansons de toile) of shepherds, fishers, and chairmen. Also among the earliest l. writings of the Old Kingdom are the dialogue, the proverb, and the lament (complaint). Works from the New Kingdom (ca. 1555 B.C.) include the love song, the song of revelry and the epitaph. Although relatively unsophisticated, the Egyptian l. contained in nascent form many of the elements which were to become characteristic of later l. poetry. The poetic lines were probably some form of free rhythm without rigid meter. Alliteration and parallelism were devices frequently used, as was paronomasia or punning. Irony and paradox were present in a primitive form; and these first of all lyrics were already treating such subjects as death, piety, love, loneliness, jealousy, martial prowess, and happiness. Furthermore, the personal tone of the l., though not ubiquitous, was apparent in such poems as those enclosed in The Dispute with His Soul of One Who Is Tired of Life.

Remains of such other ancient literatures as the Babylonian and the Assyrian are too fragmentary to disclose much in the way of advancement over the Egyptian l. poems, which the inhabitants of the Fertile Crescent appear to have imitated in certain obvious ways. The most complete of the ancient bodies of lyric poetry is the Hebrew, which, while owing something to Egyptian and Babylonian sources, nevertheless marked positive improvement in the l. technique. These lyrics, well known to modern readers because of their religious associations and highly important because of their effect on the patristic lyricists of the Middle Ages, are among the most strikingly beautiful ever written. Though textual evidence indicates that some Hebrew l. poetry was written as early as the 10th c. B.C. (notably the Song of Deborah), many poems were of a later date; and the earliest Jewish literary criticism dealing with the l. was as late as the time of Christ. Philo Judaeus (ca. 20 B.C.-A.D. 50) indicated the Egyptian origin of some Hebrew lyric techniques by declaring that Moses was taught "the whole theory of rhythm, harmony, and meter" by the Egyptians; and Flavius Josephus (ca. A.D. 37-95), dealing with the famous hymn of Moses in Exodus 15:1-2 ("I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously") said that it was written in hexametric verse. The hymns and songs of David, Josephus also wrote, employed various meters, including trimeter and pentameter. Later discussions of Hebrew meters were carried on by Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome; but it is questionable how applicable to Hebrew lyrics the Gr. metric nomenclature was in fact, and it must be conceded that very little is known even yet about the nature of ancient Hebrew l. meters. It is known, however, that the lyrics were accompanied by such instruments as the harp, sackbut, and cymbals; and suggestions of the manner in which hymns, elegies, songs of rejoicing, and songs of triumph were composed and performed may be found in the story of David in I Samuel 16:23 and II Samuel 1:17-27, 6:5, 15-16.

The ancient Jewish poets were proficient in the use of parallelism and alliteration, perfecting these devices and using them in a variety of ways. Parallelism is obvious in such lyrics as Psalm 19 ("The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork") and in Proverbs 21:17 ("He that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man; he that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich"); but it is also, more subtly, used as in Jeremiah 6:24 ("Anguish hath taken hold of us, and pain, as of a woman in travail"). The use of tropical devices is highly developed in Hebrew l. poetry, with similes and metaphors predominating; the apostrophe and hyperbole increase the personal tone of the l. far beyond the Egyptian.

Many of the lyrics indeed appear intensely subjective, as Psalm 69 ("Save me, O God; for the waters are come in unto my soul. I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing"); but even these poems reflect what Frye has called "the sense of an external and social discipline." Yet the personal tone remains and is essential to the lyricism of such passages as those in Isaiah 5:1 ("Now will I sing to my well beloved a song of my beloved touching his vineyard"); Psalm 137 ("By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion"); and II Samuel 1:19 ("The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places: how are the mighty fallen!").

The Hebrew lyricists developed a number of types and subtypes of the l. genre, which are classified by method of performance, source of imagery, or subject matter. These include the psalm (derived from the Gr. psallein, "to pull upon a stringed instrument"); the pastoral, which draws heavily upon the agrarian background of Hebrew culture; and the vision or apocalyptic prophecy, which employs the indirection of the trope to imply its perceptions. Other types include the proverb, the epigram, and similar forms of "wisdom" literature; the descriptive love l.; the triumph; various sorts of threnody; panegyrics of different kinds; and even a lyrical dialogue (or "drama") in the Book of Job. Some overlapping of these types is obvious (the triumph was frequently a panegyric on some hero, and the threnody or elegy was often pastoral); but the ambiguity is an historical one and terminological distinctions have yet to be drawn. Viewed as descriptions, the types are helpful in understanding the characteristics of the variations of the l. expression.

Like the Egyptian and Hebrew, the Gr. l. had its origins in religious activity; the first songs were probably composed to suit an occasion of celebration or mourning. Gr. lyrics were chanted, sung, or sung and danced; each of these lyrical methods of presentation is traceable to some form of religious practice. The dithyramb, for example, may have been composed to commemorate the death of some primitive vegetable god or the birth of Dionysus; in any case, it was originally sung to the accompaniment of the flute playing a melody in the Phrygian mode, which the Greeks considered the most emotional. In time, the dithyramb took on a more particular form involving formalized dance steps corresponding to passages in the text: these rhythmical and thematic patterns conceivably were the prototype of the fully developed ode, or song of celebration, with its divisions of strophe and antistrophe as written by Pindar, Sophocles, and others. Similar tracings of the development of other lyrical modes in Greece from the Heroic Age to the Homeric to the Periclean may be made, though it must be remembered that all are largely hypothetical.

The essential element of the Gr. l. was its meter, which was of two kinds: the stichic, that spoken or recited; and what may be termed the melic, that suited for singing or singing and dancing. Stichic meters were well demarcated lines of equal length and repetitive rhythm that can be broken into equivalent feet or metra. Melic meters were composed of phrases of varying length or movement, the cola, which were combined into a unit rhythmically complete or rounded, the periodos. Some cola are rhythmically repetitious in themselves and may be broken into dimeter or trimeter; but in the melic poems, it was the periodos or stanza that constituted the l. unit. Melic meters were obviously subject to wide adaptation by individual writers, and most of the best known Gr. lyrical meters are named for the poets who developed and customarily used them: the Alcaic, Anacreontic, Pindaric, and so on. The earliest Gr. lyrics were folk in origin, but even in the works of Homer and Hesiod there is evidence of an artistic concern with the lyrical mood and subjects, if not the lyrical form. In the Iliad, for instance, there are such embryonic lyrics as Helen's laments, Achilles' speech at the death of Patroklos, and the elegiac statements at Hector's funeral. The hymn was among the first developed of the definably l. genres, being composed in significant numbers before 700 B.C. The Homeric Hymns date from this period and indicate the religious nature of the first lyrics: they are addressed to Artemis, Dionysus, Heracles, Helios, Selena, et al., and the pattern of some became a distinct type of l. hymn (i.e., the "paean" was a hymn to Apollo). The hymns employ devices appropriate to the apostrophe but are not very expansive in their tropes, chiefly using the attributive epithet, as in the hymn to Hera, xii (Evelyn-White trans.): "I sing of golden-throned Hera, whom Rhea bore. Queen of the immortals is she, surpassing all in beauty."

The Homeric epigrams are attributed to this period, also, thereby setting up an archetype for the later iambics: "Thestorides, full many things there are that mortals cannot sound; But there is nothing more unfathomable than the heart of man." The period from 700-500 B.C. saw the rise of elegiac and political verse, written by Solon among others, and the personal lampoon in iambics, by Archilochus, Hipponax, and Simonides of Amorgos. After 660 B.C., melic poetry developed, primarily in two strains: the Aeolian, or personal, lyrics written at Lesbos by Sappho and Alcaeus; and the Dorian, or objective, by Alcman, Arion, Stesichorus, and Ibycus. This group of lyrics may also be categorized by method of performance as solo or choral, but the dividing line is not sharp, as Gr. scholars have pointed out. Although the ancient distinctions of melic poetry on the basis of metrics may have indicated separate categories, the modern definition of the l. would be hard pressed to differentiate between such poems as those of Ibycus, Sappho, and Alcman: (Lattimore tr.)

Blessed is the man who blithely winds out all days of his life without tears. But I must sing the light of Agido. O see her like the sun that Agido summons up to shine upon us.

(Alcman)

Now in this season for me
there is no rest from love.
Out of the hard bright sky,
a Thracian north wind blowing with searing rages and hurt—dark, pitiless, sent by Aphrodite—Love rocks and tosses my heart.

(Ibycus)

Throned in splendor, deathless, O Aphrodite, child of Zeus, charm-fashioner, I entreat you not with griefs and bitternesses to break my spirit, O goddess. . . .

(Sappho)

The 5th c. in Greece produced some of the best of the l. poets: Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchylides; it was then that the l. found such magnificent expression in the choral odes of Sophocles, Aeschylus, and Euripides. Melic poetry became national in tone, with the Dorian mode prevailing; there was an abundance of such l. types as the hymn, paean, dithyramb, processional, dance song, triumph, ode, and dirge. Other popular genres were the partheneia (songs sung by virgins to flute accompaniment); nomos (ode or war song); kommos (a mournful dirge sung in Attic drama by an actor and the chorus alternately); prosodion (processional song of solemn thanksgiving); hyporcheme (a dance song); epinicion (song of victory); threnos (a dirge); wedding songs for men; and the scolion (a banquet song accompanied by the lyre and supposedly originated by Terpander).

The Gr. critics were less concerned with l., or melic, poetry than with the tragedy and the epic; the few extant comments which they made predicate the musical nature of the genre. Plato's denunciation of all poetry, especially the "representational" tragedy, included the melic, which Plato considered "untrue" or false in its depiction of reality. Stripped of musical coloring and laid bare as ideas, the melic poems revealed the ignorance of the poet, which clothed itself in "rhythm, meter, and harmony." (The Republic 10.4) Aristotle, in the Poetics (1-4) observed the absence of a generic term which might denote such non-epic and nondramatic kinds of poetry as the works in iambic, elegiac, and similar meters, which imitated "by means of language alone" as contrasted with the melic poems, which used rhythm, tune, and meter "all employed in combination." This statement indicates the existence of poetry, i. in the modern sense, which was not melic in the Gr. sense; but the Alexandrian use of "l." to indicate such disparate types as the dithyramb, iambs, elegies, and sapphics, while a broad attempt to repair the deficiency noted by Aristotle, was inexact and confusing.

Roman critical remarks on the l. would indicate that the term was used in the sense of melic poetry or poetry sung to the tune of the lyre. Horace indicated a belief that l. poetry was less substantial in content than epic poetry, being the jocosa lyra; and Quintillian concurred in the view that l. poetry was less weighty than epic though the ode might be worthy of more significant themes. To Horace's mind, the "dainty measures" were suited to "the work of celebrating gods and heroes, the champion boxer, the victorious steed, the fond desire of lovers, and the cup that banishes care"; they included the iambic, trimetric, and elegiac distich. These general criteria for form and content were adopted by most of the commentators following Horace—Ovid, Petronius, Juvenal, Pliny the Younger—so that, in l. theory, the Romans were little advanced beyond the Greeks.

In practice, Roman poets tended to imitate the Alexandrian l. writers, who composed works primarily meant to be read rather than performed. Moses Hadas has pointed out that this practice tended to produce l. poems more enigmatic and allusive than earlier "sung" poems had been; and it may be generally noted that Roman l. poets are more subject to examination as formulators of a "personal" or subjective poetry than the Greeks. The extent to which the lyrics of Sappho and the Aeolian school reflected the true feelings of their authors must be largely postulated; but with the Roman l. poets, sufficient internal detail in the poems plus objective evidence recorded of the poets' lives tempts the critic to speculate on the relationship between the nature of the l. mode and the private feelings of the lyricist. Thus, while they modeled their poems on the hymns of Callimachus, the Idyls of Theocritus, the epigrams of Anacreon, the elegiac laments of Bion and Moschus, and the later Gr. lyrics, Roman poets adapted the l. to produce a more subjective or autobiographical utterance. Conventional and minor Roman lyricists were content with the school of "fastidious elegance" which kept them copying the Greeks, and which Catullus mocked, but the Roman genius emphasized his particularized experiences: Propertius in his observations, Catullus in his amours, Virgil in his rustic pleasures, Ovid in the sorrows of his exile, Tibullus in his love pangs, Martial and Juvenal in their private asperities, and so on.

The private insight, the subjective focusing of experience is more keenly apparent in Roman lyrics than in other ancient works: in Ovid's Tristia 1.8. ("To their sources shall deep rivers flow"); Martial's Epigrams 1.8 ("Thou hast a name that bespeaks the season of the budding year, when Attic bees lay waste the brief-lived spring"); Catullus' To Hortalus 65 ("Though I am worn out with constant grief and sorrow calls me away"); and Tibullus, To Delia 1.2 ("More wine; let the liquor master these unwonted pains"). Coincidentally, there are many more "occasional" lyrics among the Roman poets which celebrate private rather than public festivals, with a greater proportion of such genres as the prothalamium and epithalamium (wedding songs), the vale or farewell, the epigram, the satire, and the epistle. Topicality is a notable element in many L. lyrics.

The formalistic approach to meter which typifies the l. writers of the pre-Augustan and Augustan periods of Roman literature began to weaken by the middle of the 1st c. A.D. and a greater flexibility of form resulted. The rigid preoccupation of the Horatian and Virgilian schools with the exact meters dictated by the system of quantitative verse was probably a classical attempt to substitute precision of metrics for the abandoned melodies of the true l. In any case, the lyrics of Petronius, unlike the imitative formal measures of the Stasian odes, were experimental in form; and during the 2d c., definite steps were made by writers of L. lyrics toward a nonquantitative or accentual form of verse. In the 3d c., the completely new principle of rhyme could be found in the verse of the patristic lyricist, Commodian; it was then that the principles which were to guide medieval L. verse—rhyme and accent—were established.

As in the case of the Jews and the Greeks, the patristic critics of literature were an Epimethean lot, choosing to discuss forms and practices long established rather than treating contemporary practices. Eusebius and Jerome were concerned with examining Hebrew l. modes in terms of Gr. meters; Origen's comments were similarly analytical of metrics; and the anthologer, Isidore of Seville, discussed Hebrew and Gr. meters in conventional fashion, noted the musical element of l. poetry, but still failed to make any distinctions between the various genres. Patristic l. criticism throws little light on the practice of the times.

The first church lyrics were, not surprisingly, hymns which were patterned on the Hebrew Psalter and the Gr. hymns. The earliest verse hymns were those of St. Hilary, who probably used meter for its mnemonic effectiveness and who employed the meter that was to become a favorite with Prudentius, Fortunatus, and Thomas Aquinas as well as the basis for several of the medieval sequences: the versus popularis or trochaic tetrameter catalectic. St. Ambrose developed the use of iambic dimeters grouped in quatrains (the "Ambrosian" stanza); St. Jerome made L. more flexible as the language of poetry; and Augustine wrote a didactic poem which Brittain has said to contain in embryo the three elements of Medieval L. versification: accentual rhythm, isosyllabism, and rhyme. The Rule of St. Benedict, drawn up in the 6th c., required hymns to be sung at all the canonical hours, and this edict spurred on the writing of numerous lyricists. It should be noted that once more lyrics were composed to be sung or chanted; the indissoluble connection between the L. words and meters and the melodic line must not be forgotten. The Sequence depended on the repetition of phrases, both verbal and musical; and the involved meters as well as the simple rhymes of the hymns which Abelard wrote for Heloise and her nuns to sing were due to their avowedly musical nature:

Christiani, plaudite,
(Resurrexit Dominus)
Victo mortis principe
Christus imperat.
Victori occurite,
Qui nos liberat.

The church lyrics of the 12th and 13th c. are among the most perfect produced in the centuries of liturgical literature: the Stabat Mater and Dies Irae must be included in any list of the world's great lyrics, and there are numerous other examples of accomplished l. art: sequences, cantiones, nativities, and hymns of various kinds. The importance of patristic songs cannot be exaggerated in the history of the l.: not only is the body of church lyrics significant in itself, but it presages most of the metric and tropic techniques which are the foundation of the modern l.

Related to the development of patristic l. poetry was the Mozarabic poetry of Spain. Mozarabic writers inherited from the Visigoths the hymns of various Church Fathers—Hilary, Prudentius, Ambrose—transcribed into Gothic characters. Maurico, the compiler of Mozarabic l. in the 10th and 11th c., collected a large number of the hymns and songs written by Mozarabic poets of earlier periods and patterned on the Gothic and L. copies of patristic l. The Mozarabic l. include hymns, psalms, pleas, and such occasional poems as arose from the ordination of bishops, the building of churches, and the births and deaths of nobles. Though in time the Mozarabic l. adapted itself to accommodate characteristic cultural themes and attitudes of its era of Sp. history and came to be written in the vernacular, it remains one of the least known of all bodies of European l. poetry. Doubtless its claim to being the earliest vernacular poetry of the postclassical period in Europe will lead to its fuller investigation and evaluation in the future.

The centuries between A.D. 300 and A.D. 1200 also produced two separate traditions which must be noted in any tracing of l. development. One of these, the Anglo-Saxon, was Western; the other was Eastern. Anglo-Saxon poetry is interesting as an example of a community literature with ancient religious origins. The verse form, composed to be sung and presented by bards or scop, consisted of a heavily accentual rhythm of a 4-beat line with a caesura; thematically, the poetic lines, redolent of Egyptian and Hebrew poetry in their parallelism and alliteration, were developed through the kenning (metaphor). The range of Anglo-Saxon lyrics, subjected to various influences, includes the gnomic verse, the rune, the lament, the complaint, the elegy, and the hymn. In lyric mood and subject matter, The Wanderer and The Seafarer touch on the highly emotional and personal; The Phoenix is an example of descriptive allegory; The Wife's Lament, Deor, and Widsith represent differing experiences and attitudes; and the Caedmonian hymns display the superimposition of the patristic tradition of hymn-writing on the Anglo-Saxon. The Anglo-Saxon l., long ignored except by such rare commentators as Sir William Temple, has come in for great enthusiasm in recent years because of the efforts of such imitators as G. M. Hopkins, Ezra Pound, and W. H. Auden.

Chinese poetry is almost entirely lyrical: although the earliest lyrics, folk in origin, were composed before the 6th c. B.C., the perfection of the Chinese l. came during the T'ang Dynasty (A.D. 600-900) when such lyricists as Yüan Chieh, Li Po, and Po Chü-i lived. The ancient folk ballads and odes for sundry occasions were replaced in the 4th c. B.C. by the lyrics of Ch'ü Yüan, author of the Li Sao. From the first types of "art" l.—the lament, the nostalgic complaint, the pastoral description—the Chinese poem developed into other areas: the political allegory ("The Liberator" by Wu-ti), the marching song ("Song of the Men of Chin-ling" by Hsieh T'iao), the satiric song ("Tchirek Song"), and, finally, the controlled descriptive or mood poems of Li Po. In the 8th c. A.D., Po Chü-i adapted the l. to instructive purposes, writing with the utmost stylistic simplicity in describing scenes which served as the basis for serious reflection.

Unrewarded, my will to serve the State;
At my closed door autumn grasses grow.
What could I do to ease a rustic heart?
I planted bamboos, more than a hundred shoots. . . .

(tr. Arthur Waley.)

The succinct quality of these Chinese lyrics, as well as their visual effects, has had a decided effect on the imagists of the 19th and 20th c.

Though roughly contemporaneous with Chinese poetry, Japanese l. poetry is a completely separate tradition. The first Japanese l. poetry was reputedly composed by the god Iza-nagi and his descendants, and it is reasonably certain that a few kinds of folk l. were composed in the centuries before Christ: the war song, drinking song, and ballad. It is impossible to date the origins of what are apparently the earliest regular forms of Japanese poetry—the chōka (also, nagauta); the tanka, which was used either autonomously or as envoys to chōka; and the sedōka. The first extant anthology to include them was the Man'yōshū (compiled late 8th c. A.D.), after which the chōka and sedōka died out as vehicles of great poetry. The tanka, the most popular of Japanese l. forms for centuries, is composed of 31 syllables, and the haiku (or hokku) is composed of 17 syllables; each has alternating lines of 5 and 7 syllables. Though a relative late comer to Japanese poetry, the haiku has been perfected since its inception in the 15th c. by a long line of masters: Sōkan, Moritake, Teitoku, and the great Bashō. Fusing in its brief span references to nature, human emotion, time, mood, infinity, the haiku is perhaps the most concise kind of l. poetry ever devised.

Another oriental l. tradition which should be mentioned is the Persian, ancient in origin but flourishing in the 12th through the 15th c. Persian lyrics, originally religious and objective in nature, became more personal in the works of Omar Khayyam, Sa'di, and Hafiz: the famous Rubāiyāt of Omar being a specimen of the Persian philosophical wit poem. Other highly developed l. types included the qasida (hymn), hajw (satire), marthiya (elegy), qit'a (a fragment characterized by its prosody), ghazal (ode), and learned and descriptive poetry. The vogue for oriental literature in 18th and 19th c. England served to reveal Persian l. poetry to Eng. writers and thus to cause the oriental l. to affect directly the western lyric tradition.

In Europe, the 12th and 13th c. saw the growth in popularity of the wandering minstrel: the quasi-ecclesiastical goliards, who wrote secular songs in L.; the trouvères in northern France, and the troubadours in the south; the Minnesinger in Germany. The l. was sung, or sung and danced, widely. The troubadours, composing in the vernacular, produced the chanso (song, often of love), sirventes (topical songs of satire, eulogy, or personal comment), the planh (complaint), tenso (debate), pastorela (account of a pastoral episode), alba or aubade (dawn song), and some songs designed for dancing (balada and dansa). Much has been said about the differences between the chansons courtois and chansons populaire, the caroles and rondets for dancing and the chansons designed for singing only, the chansons de toile (work songs) and their subspecies in a number of excellent studies. Few areas of l. history have been as thoroughly dealt with as the medieval.

Medieval lyrics remain in abundance and they exert a special charm for the modern reader in their mixture of naïveté and sophistication. They range from the slapstick "macaronic" songs (a jumble of languages) to the simple understatement: in "Fowles in the frith," from the obvious but delightful "Sumer is iumen in" to the complex rondeau of Chaucer's "Now welcom somer, with thy sonne softe" and his ballade, "Hyd, Absalon, thy gylte tresses clere." Although this period produced such masters of the written "art" l. as Chaucer, Bertrand de Born, Chrétien de Troyes, Walther von der Vogelweide, Rutebeuf, Pierre Vidal, and Sordello, l. poetry was still a thing of the people, composed to be sung and enjoyed. The melodic element of the l. genre in the medieval period has not been equalled since the dawn of the Renaissance.

This is not to say that after 1400 the l. and music were immediately and completely dissociated; but in time, the divorcement became more apparent with the rise of such primarily melodic forms as the madrigal, glee, catch, and round which subordinated words to the musical line. In spite of the later efforts of writers primarily poets and not composers—Swinburne, Hopkins, Yeats, Vachel Lindsay, and Edith Sitwell—the l. genre since the Renaissance has remained a verbal rather than a musical discipline and the traces of a melodic origin have become largely vestigial. The influence of the Roman metricians on the It. and Fr. lyrical theorists of the Renaissance may have helped to produce the latter day emphasis on meter as a substitute for melody. Or Renaissance lyricists, writing for an aristocratic audience of readers, may simply have unconsciously adapted their forms to a different medium. In any event, the l. suffered a sea change after the 15th c. with the consequences noted above.

Renaissance lyrics, diffused as they are through several countries and centuries, nevertheless share certain general characteristics which are evidence of their common origin in the earlier Prov. lyrics. In Spain, l. poets fused their Mozarabic and Prov. traditions to perfect some older forms (the cantiga and possibly the cossante) and to develop some new ones (the bacarola, bailada, and others). After its inception in the Sicilian court of Frederick II, the sonetto rose to full perfection in Dante's Vita Nuova and Petrarch's Sonnets to Laura. Petrarch's Canzoniere, the prototype of It. l. poetry, contained sonnets, sestinas, ballatas, and even a few madrigals. In such Sonnets as nos. 33 ("Gia fiammeggiava l'amorosa stella") and 35 ("Solo e pensoso i piu deserti campi"), Petrarch struck the thematic chords that were to echo in the lyrics of countless imitators in Italy and England in the following centuries. In spite of excellent canzone written by Ariosto and others, it is Petrarch whose name remains synonymous with Renaissance It. art lyrical verse. More popular vernacular verse in Italy—the strambotto and rispetto—was also composed in great numbers.

What Petrarch was to lyric poetry in Italy, Ronsard was to the poetry of Renaissance France. The leader of the Pléiade, a stellar group of poets including Joachim Du Bellay, Ronsard published his version of the sonnets to Laura in Les Amours in 1552, and a later collection of sonnets, the Sonnets pour Hélène, in 1578. In addition to writing sonnets, Ronsard also composed odes, mythological and philosophical Hymnes, and elegiac and pastoral poems. Scorning the older forms of the rondeau and rondelle, Ronsard explored the whole range of lyric images and emotions in his sonnet collections. Though the earlier sonnets contained frank Petrarchan notes (e.g. "Cent et cent fois penser un penser mesme"), the later works were perfectly Ronsard's own ("Adieu, cruelle, adieu, je te suis ennuyeux"). The later ages of Fr. literature have traced Fr. lyricism back to Ronsard just as often as they have traced its antithesis back to Malherbe.

In England, the publication of Tottel's Miscellany in 1557 marked the beginning of the most lyrical of England's poetic eras. A collection of "songs," sonnets, and other kinds of verse, the Miscellany evidenced the musicality of Eng. poets of earlier periods and set up a form of anthology to be imitated by scores of compilations from The Phoenix Nest and England's Helicon to the eventual Broadside Ballads and Bishop Percy's Reliques. Wyatt and Surrey were among the first in England to test the possibilities of the sonnet's thematic and metrical subtleties; and dozens of Eng. sonneteers—Sidney, Daniel, Spenser, Shakespeare et al.—published lengthy sonnet sequences, more or less directly patterned on Petrarch's. Certain old forms of the lyric were redeveloped in England, e.g. the prothalamium and epithalamium; and adulation for Horace and other L. lyric poets caused the vogue of the ode to become widespread. The song remained popular, both in its melodic and ballad forms, being written by such experts as Campion, Sidney, Ben Jonson, and Shakespeare.

In general, it may be said of Renaissance l. poetry that it was a succinct example of the philosophy of humanism. The lyric's preoccupation with the subjective self dovetailed neatly with the humanistic interest in the varied forms of human emotion; and the new geographical concerns of the Renaissance supplemented the pastoralism of the traditional l. to produce an imagery that enforced a fusion of the scientific and poetic perspectives. The effect of printing on the lyrical poets has already been touched on; and though the shifting nature of l. poetry was not apparent to those Renaissance critics who discussed that "divine" art—Minturno, Scaliger, Torquato Tasso, Sibilet, Gascoigne, Sidney—its aftermath was important in poetic practice as well as theory.

Although the past 300 years in the history of the l. may be divided into certain chronological "periods" (i.e., the Renaissance, Restoration, Augustan, Fin de siècle) or certain distinctive "movements" (metaphysical, neoclassical, romantic, symbolist, expressionist, naturalist, hermeticist, and so forth), these terms reveal little about the true nature of lyrical poetry and practice. Far more accurate is the designation of all l. poetry after 1600 as "modern." The range of this body of lyrics from the most objective or "external" to the most subjective or "internal" may be included in three chief l. types: the Lyric of Vision or Emblem, the Lyric of Thought or Idea, and the Lyric of Emotion or Feeling.

The L. of Vision or Emblem, although it has its antecedents in classic, Anglo-Saxon, and Chinese poetry, is nevertheless fundamentally the product of the Age of Type. It is this sort of lyric that Ezra Pound has discussed as "Ideograms" and Apollinaire has called "calligrammes." This is the most externalized kind of l., utilizing the pictorial element of print to represent the object or concept treated in the context of the poem itself: it is a literal attempt to follow MacLeish's admonition that "a poem should not mean, but be." The optical l. exists, therefore, in itself without need of reference to a private sensibility, whether of poet or reader. The first use of the visual in the modern l. came in the Elizabethan Age with the experiments of Gascoigne and George Puttenham, who wrote critical appraisals of the technique. Renaissance poets printed poems in the shape of circles, spires, and pillars. Later, George Herbert showed wings, altars, and floor patterns in poems on the subject; and the prevalence of pictorial lyrics among Fr. and Eng. poetasters of the 17th and 18th c. drew Dryden's scorn in Macflecknoe and Addison's laughter in The Spectator. The imagists of the 19th and 20th c., under Chinese influence, revived the practice; the symbolists were influenced by it; and the most recent practitioners of lyrical emblemism include Amy Lowell, H. D., William Carlos Williams, E. E. Cummings, and the French dadaists of the 1920's.

Somewhat more personal but still objective in tone and method is the L. of Thought or Idea, which may be divided into the Expository or Informative and the Didactic or Persuasive (critics like Drinkwater believe "l." and "didactic" to be contradictory terms). This school of lyricists is classically oriented, believing with Horace that poetry must be utile as well as dulce and consequently emphasizing musicality of form to balance prosaic content. The Expository l. writers include Boileau, Dryden, Cowper, Schiller, and Tennyson in former years; and such modern poets as Rainer Maria Rilke in his early descriptive works, the Sp. "naturalists" (Juan Ramón Jiménez, Jorge Guillén, Rafael Alberti), St. John Perse and T. S. Eliot are formulators of a lyrically expository verse. The preoccupation of 19th- and 20th-c. poets with "sound" and verse form has produced vers libre, which is an obvious effort to accompany poetic statement with musical techniques just as the rigid heroic couplets of the neoclassical poetry of statement were.

The Didactic or Persuasive L. includes the allegorical, satiric, exhortatory, and vituperative species. L. allegory is apparent in the animal myths of La Fontaine, Herrick's use of Cupid, Mandeville's bees, Heine's Atta Troll, Arnold's merman, Davidson's dancers in the house of death, and Frost's departmental ants. The satiric l. includes, of course, the l. parody, such as Lewis Carroll's burlesques of Wordsworth and Swinburne's mockery of Tennyson; but it also includes directly satiric verse: Donne's verses on women, Mayakovsky's Bed-bug, Bertolt Brecht's acrid observations on romantic love, Ogden Nash's disillusionment with life in Old Virginia. The exhortatory l. is often patriotic or moralistic as in the Elizabethan panegyrics on England, Burns's call to the Scots, Gabriel D'Annunzio's fervent championing of life and freedom, or Kipling's tributes to Britannia. The vituperative l. aims its darts everywhere: against critics (Pope's Epistles); convention (Rimbaud's Illuminations); war (Owen and Sassoon); poverty and suffering (Antonio Machado's Del Camino); or against the world in general (Allen Ginsberg's Howl). No discussion of the Didactic L. can ignore Ezra Pound's Cantos, which combine all of the subtypes—allegory, satire, exhortation, and vituperation—in a unique manner.

The most subjective or "internal" strain of modern l. poetry is the L. of Emotion or Feeling. It is this lyrical type which has become synonymous with "poetry" through the criticism of the romantic school and which is the prototype of the "personal" or "experienced" l. expression. The L. of Emotion comprises three major groups: the sensual l., the "imaginative" l. which intellectualizes emotional states, and the mystical l. The mystical l. is antipodal to the lyric of emblem: these two varieties of "vision" l., one literal and the other metaphorical, mark the extreme limits of objectivity and subjectivity which confine the l. genre.

The sensual l. enjoys an unbroken continuity from the 16th c. to the 20th in the sonnets of Ronsard and the Pléiade, the love poetry of the Elizabethans and metaphysicals, the erotica of the restoration and 18th c., the synaesthetic images of Keats and the romantics, the symbolist glorification of the self and its peculiar sensations, the neurotic sensualism of the Yellow Nineties, and the "new" sensualism of the Lost Generation, the Existentialists, and the Beat Generation. Ranging from the carpe diem to the memento mori, the sensual tradition is sustained in differing forms by Shakespeare, Donne, Collins, Herder, Heine, Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Whitman, D'Annunzio, Millay, and Dylan Thomas.

The "imaginative" or "intellectualized" l. of emotion furnishes a host of examples. The German lyricists provide a large number of these (notably Goethe and Schiller with Rilke, Hauptmann, and Stefan George as more recent examples). The "verbalized feelings" of the Eng. romantics and the Fr. symbolists have their modern counterparts in the lyrics of Apollinaire and Valéry, as well as in the poetry of García Lorca and the It. hermeticists, Ungaretti and Montale. Many of the lyrics of Pushkin and Boris Pasternak fall in this category. Writers of British lyrics of this type are Auden, MacNeice, Empson, and Spender; Americans include Emerson, Emily Dickinson, Frost, Jeffers, MacLeish, Wallace Stevens, and Marianne Moore. Finally, the poetry of mysticism is significant in modern l. history, possibly being an attempt to find some substitute for the Gr. myths which provoked the classic lyrics, or for the Christian mythology which stimulated the medieval l. Foremost among the mystical lyricists are Herbert, Vaughan, Smart, Blake, Hopkins, Baudelaire, Claudel, Yeats, and Rilke.

The abundance of lyrical poetry in the modern period is equaled, if not exceeded by the plethora of critical comments on and theories about that poetry. Mention was made above of the development of lyrical theory from Sidney to Joyce, but this is a meager indication of the vast body of critical writing resulting from the application of scientific methods to literary criticism. Perhaps the most exhaustive studies of the l. are contemporary German ones. Behrens, Rauch, Closs, Ermatinger, von Wiese, and Witkop are among those who have contributed expansive studies of the history of various l. traditions; and the theories of Staiger, Petsch, and Friedrich supplement this historical scholarship. In France, there are a number of academic critics, such as Henri Bonnet and Gaëtan Picon, although there are increasing numbers of writer turned critic who deal with literary theory and practice: Maurice Blanchot, Jean Rousselot, Seghers, Cocteau as well as Sartre and the existentialist critics belong to this group. In Spain, there is Ortega y Gasset. The Eng. tradition of the poet writing about poetry has developed into the backbone of criticism in England and America, where such practicing poets as Eliot, Auden, MacNeice, Empson, Thomas, Ransom, Tate, Warren, Elder Olson, Randall Jarrell, and Karl Shapiro have also doubled as critics of their own and others' work. There are, however, still a number of contemporary critics of the l. who are primarily critics and not creative writers: Cleanth Brooks, Edmund Wilson, I. A. Richards, Ivor Winters, Babette Deutsch, and the rest. So diverse are their theories of the l. that the interested must go to the original works for an accurate understanding of the distinguishing tenets of each critic's beliefs. Perhaps the task of future encyclopedists will be eased by a discriminating time which illuminates the outstanding critical works of the 20th c. while throwing the rest into darkness.

Thus from its primordial form of the song as the embodiment of an emotional reaction, the l. has been expanded, discussed, altered, and developed through the centuries until it has become one of the chief literary instruments which focus and evaluate the human condition. In flexibility, variety, and polish, it is perhaps the most proficient of the poetic genres. In the immediacy and keenness of its expression, it is certainly the most effective. These qualities have caused the 19th and 20th c. to look upon the l. as largely their own work, but l. poetry has belonged to men of all ages.

GENERAL AND BIBLIOGRAPHICAL WORKS: F. B. Gummere, The Beginnings of Poetry (1901); J. Drinkwater, The L. (1915); Gayley and Kurtz; J. Pfeiffer, Das lyrische Gedicht als ästhetisches Gebilde (1931); M. R. Ridley, "The L.," E&S, 19 (1933); Behrens; G. Benn, Probleme der L. (1954); C. Heselhaus, Die L. des Expressionismus (1956); Frye.

SPECIALIZED STUDIES: J. Erskine, The Elizabethan L. (1903); F. E. Schelling, The Eng. L. (1913); G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry (1915); E. Ermatinger, Die deutsche L. (1925); P. Witkop, Die deutschen Lyriker (1925); A. Erman, The Lit. of the Ancient Egyptians, tr. A. M. Blackman (1927); P. S. Allen and H. M. Jones, The Romanesque L. (1928); H. J. C. Grierson, Lyrical Poetry of the 19th C. (1929); G. Murray, The Cl. Tradition in Poetry (1930); K. Rauch, Der L. eine Bresche (1931); G. Kar, Thoughts on the Mediaeval L. (1933); A. L. Wheeler, Catullus and the Traditions of Ancient Poetry (1934); Bowra; R. Brittain, The Mediaeval Latin and Romance L. to A.D. 1300 (1937); A. Closs, The Genius of the German L. (1938) and Die neuere deutsche L. (1951); M. Kastendieck, England's Musical Poet, Thomas Campion (1938); H. Färber, Die L. in der Kunsttheorie der Antike (1939); R. Petsch, Die lyrische Dichtkunst (1939); G. Errante, Sulla lirica romanza delle origine (1943); E. Staiger, Grundbegriffe der Poetik (2d ed., 1946); E. K. Chambers, Early Eng. Lyrics (1947); Dale; C. M. Ing, Elizabethan Lyrics (1951); J. Wiegand, Abriss der lyrischen Technik (1951); N. Maclean, "From Action to Image: Theories of the L. in the 18th C.," in R. S. Crane, Critics; M. Hadas, Anticilla to Classical Reading (1954); H. Friedrich, Die Struktur der modernen L. (1956); W. Killy, Wandlungen des lyrischen Bildes (1956; 2d enl. ed. 1958); J. L. Kinneavy, A Study of Three Contemporary Theories of L. Poetry (1956); B. von Wiese, Die deutsche L. (1957); C. Heselhaus, Deutsche L. der Moderne. Von Nietzsche bis Ivan Goll (1961); E. Muir, The Estate of Poetry (1962).

J.W.J.

LYRICAL CAESURA. See CAESURA.

LYRISME ROMANTIQUE. An aspect of Fr. lyricism that drew upon the individual poet's private experience and emotions with an immediacy, particularity, and depth unprecedented in the language. Its development has been traced to the Rousseauistic cultivation of the self in profoundly subjective terms, which led to the romantic moralité des passions and in expression lent on occasion so lyric a quality even to prose that the first great poets of

Fr. romanticism have been identified as Rousseau and Chateaubriand. This contact with le moi profond introduced a new musicality into Fr. verse, and prepared for a revolution in Fr. poetic imagery and for at least a partial break with the domination of rhetoric in Fr. poetry. It lies also in the background of the irrational stress on the subconscious in symbolist and surrealist lyricism.—A. Monglond, Le prérromantisme français, II (1930), 355–67; A. Thérive, “La nouvelle théorie du lyrisme,” La revue de Genève, 4 (1922); H. Read, “The Romantic Revolution,” LonM, 2 (1955). A.G.E.

M

MACARONIC VERSE incorporates words of the writer's native tongue in another language and subjects them to its grammatical laws, thus achieving a comic effect. The traditional basic language for m.v. is L. Tisi degli Odassi seems to have been the inventor of m.v.; he interspersed L. with It. (Carmen macaronicum, 1488). Teofilo Folengo, however, using the same mixture, lent m.v. its renown through his famous mock-epic Maccaroniae (1517–21). Its anonymous Fr. translator (1606) describes Folengo as the “prototype of Rabelais.” According to Folengo, the name “m.v.” indicates a crude mixture—like that of flour, cheese, and butter in macaroni—and its burlesque appeal. The Fr. m. classic was Antoine de la Sablé. Priests (or Protestants) and literati were the favorite targets of m. satire. The wealth of German m. production (Nudelverse) is second only to that of the Italians, but, prior to Folengo's influence, it may have originated independently in Germany, that is, in student circles and with the mere intent to amuse. One of the rare examples of true m.v. in Eng. is the short 17th-c. epic Polemo-Middinia, ascribed to W. Drummond, in which L. terminations are skillfully tacked on to the Lowland Scots vernacular.

Loosely speaking, the term “m.v.” has also been applied to any verse mingling two or more languages together, as in the OE Macaronic Poem (Krapp-Dobbie vi, 69–70), Máel Ísu Ua Brolcháin's Deus Meus (Early Ir. Lyrics, ed. G. Murphy, 1956), the poems by J. Skelton, R. Brathwait's Barnabae itinerarium (1638), and, more recently, in the humorous verse of the American J. A. Morgan.

F. W. Genthe, Gesch. der macaronischen Poesie (1829); J. O. Delepierre, Macaronéa ou mélanges de litt. macaronique des différents peuples de l'Europe (1852); J. A. Morgan, M. Poetry (1872); Die Floia und andere deutsche macaronische Gedichte, ed. C. Blümlein (1900); Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records, ed. G. P. Krapp and E. V. Dobbie (6 v., 1931–53); W. O. Wehrle, The M. Hymn Tradition in Medieval Eng. Lit. (1933); U. E.

Paoli, Il latino maccheronico (1959); B. Ristow, “Macaronische Dichtung in Deutschland,” Reallexikon, 2d ed., II. U.K.G.

MACRON. See PROSODIC NOTATION.

MADNESS, POETIC. See POETIC MADNESS.

MADRIGAL. A short monostrophic, polyphonic song form. It originated in northern Italy in the 14th c.; those with texts written by Petrarch are good examples of the early type. Revived in the 16th c., the m. underwent a tremendous vogue which extended as far as England, where it was assiduously cultivated by the Elizabethan poets and composers.

In its metrical form the m. displays considerable variety, particularly in its later manifestations. The m. of the 14th c. was usually composed of 2 or 3 tercets followed by 1 or 2 rhyming couplets, the lines generally being of 7 or 11 syllables. By the time of its 16th-c. revival, however, its metrical form had become so free that Bembo, himself a composer of madrigals, wrote that it is bound by no rule concerning number of lines or arrangement of rhymes. But the last 2 lines almost always rhymed, and madrigals seldom exceeded 12 or 13 lines.

The following song from Shakespeare's Measure for Measure is a good example of the type of verse to which the term “m.” was applied in the later Renaissance:

Take, O, take those lips away,

That so sweetly were forsworn,

And those eyes, the break of day,

Lights that do mislead the morn;

But my kisses bring again, bring again,

Seals of love, but seal'd in vain, seal'd in vain.

The echoing device in the final couplet is a characteristic refinement of the later m. verse.

The content of the earlier madrigals is generally pastoral, and the consistent themes of the form, throughout its history, remained nature and love. Verse of the m. type was written in the 19th c. by Carducci and D'An-nunzio in Italy, by Goethe and Platen in Germany. The 20th c. has seen a great revival of m. singing in both England and America.—E. H. Fellowes, Eng. M. Verse, 1588–1632 (1920), The Eng. M. Composers (1921) and The Eng. M. (1925); A. Einstein, "It. M. Verse," Musical Ass., Proc., 63 (1937), The It. M. (3 v., 1949); B. Pattison, Music and Poetry in the Eng. Renaissance (1948).

MAGYAR POETRY. See HUNGARIAN POETRY.

MAITHILI POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

MAL MARIÉE. An OF song, often in ballade meter with a 2-line refrain, in which a married woman is overheard lamenting her marriage and calling upon her lover. In some of these the lover then appears and rescues her. A common variant is the lament of the nun who wants her ami to take her from the convent. Jeanroy insisted that this is a popular type which has spread from the Franco-Prov. border region; but it could be aristocratic in origin. There is one malmaridada by King Denis of Portugal, in imitation.—J. Bédier, "Les fêtes de mai et les commencements de la poésie lyrique au moyen âge," Revue des deux mondes, 135 (1896); Jeanroy, Origines. U.T.H.

MÁLAHÁTT. An Eddic measure closely related to fornyrðislag (q.v.); each line of the 4-line stanza is divided into 2 half-lines by a caesura, and the half-lines have 2 accented and 3 (or even 4) unaccented syllables. The alliteration is similar to that of fornyrðislag. The following lines from Atlámið en grænlenzku, the only Eddic poem to employ this measure in its pure form, will serve as an example of its metrical construction:

Horsk vas húsfreyja, hugði at mannviti, lag heyrði orða hvat á laun mæltu

The Poetic Edda, tr. H. A. Bellows (1923) and tr. L. M. Hollander (1928, rev. ed. 1962). R.B.

MALAY POETRY. Rude rhythmical verse, with stock tags to cover the reciter's flagging memory or inspiration, appears to have been the Malay's first essay in poetry. Known by a Tamil name, the form may have come from southern India. Specimens occur in the Hikayat Raja-raja Pasai, written between 1350 and 1500, but the best are found in the shaman's incantation, in Minangkabau songs of origin from Negri Sembilan and in such folk tales as Awang Sulung, Ma'lim Deman and Sri Rama. With the pantun, they reach the highest level of Mal. poetry. Rhapsodist recitation of this verse left Mal. prose "a legacy of balance and antithesis, like the antiphons of the Psalms, a device due not only to the need of chanting passages twice over for the ears of an audience liable to inattention but also to the relief afforded to a reciter, whose memory and inventiveness could not be at full stretch all the time."

While rhythmical vers libre must have been the oldest popular form, the earliest court verse recorded is on an Achehnese royal tombstone, dated A.D. 1380, in a pre-Muslim Indian script; this form is in the Sanskrit upajâtīc measure, which was employed by the Javanese also and may have given rise to the classical Mal. sha'er with its 4 rhyming lines. Many sha'er derive from the 15th c. and probably from Malacca where Mal. and Javanese mingled. A typical example, indebted to Java's Panji tales, is the Ken Tambuhan. But the Mal. sha'er, in such poems as the Sēri Bēnian and Bidasari, is inspired also by Indian romances of the period transitional between Hinduism and Islam. Later sha'er contain the folklore of the Muslim Deccan or are adapted, as by Hamzah of Barus at the end of the 16th c., for propagating Islamic mysticism. A good example from 18th c. Perak describes a royal picnic. And the next century saw sha'er on such various topics as a fire in Singapore, the Russo-Turkish War of 1854, the eruption of Krakatau, and Mal. pearl-fishing in Australia. But the favorite topics have been erotic or didactic and owe a debt to Persian and Arabic models. Today, in Indonesia, the sha'er form, outworn as the heroic couplet, has been supplanted by a variety of novel meters due to European influence.

By far the best and most interesting Mal. verse form is the pantun, which does not occur in literature before the 15th c. It would seem to have been begotten by jingling riddles (with assonance of internal as well as final syllables) upon the Indian sloka (q.v.), as it occurs in the Ramayana and Sakuntala. Like the sloka the Mal. quatrain may have all four lines rhyming, but in most the first line rhymes with the third, and the second line with the fourth. The Chinese ode, too, seems to have influenced the pantun, for in both, before coming to the topic of the poem, some natural object or well-known event is mentioned to prepare for what follows:

Asal kapas mēnjadi bēnang,
Asal bēnang mēnjadi kain.
Asal lēpas, jangan di-kēnang,
Sudah mēnjadi orang lain.

From cotton coarse our thread we fashion,
From the thread our cloth is wove.
No remorse! When sped the passion,
I'm another, not your love.

In its assonance the pantun resembles the Persian tarsi, but at its best is "simple, sensuous and passionate." See also INDONESIAN POETRY.

ANTHOLOGIES: Pantun Melayu, ed. R. J. Wilkinson and R. O. Winstedt (2d ed., 1955; an anthol. of verses by different poets—anonymous as always till lately); Kesusasteraan Melayu, ed. R. Winstedt (6 v., 1958; anthologies of Mal. history, poetry, etc.); Modern Mal. Verse, 1946-61, eds. O. Rice and A. Majid (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: R. O. Winstedt, The Malays, a Cultural Hist. (1950) and "A Hist. of Mal. Lit." [rev. ed.], Royal Asiatic Society, Malayan Branch, Jour., 31 (1958); E. Marrison, "A Mal. Poem in Old Sumatran Characters," Roy. As. Soc., Malayan Branch, Jour., 24 (1951); P. G. Brewster, "Metrical, Stanzaic, and Stylistic Resemblances between Malayan and Western Poetry," RLC, 32 (1958). R.O.W.

MALAYALAM POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

MANNERISM in literature has the general meaning of affected or excessive use of a peculiar style; recently, in imitation of art history, it has been used to designate a period style between Renaissance and baroque. In tracing the origin of the word, we must go back to Vasari (1511-74), who used the word maniera to mean impressive and distinctive quality, and more particularly, the ability to join together single beauties into a beautiful whole. It came to mean affected style in the 17th c., and when it appeared in the form of an "-ism" in the chief European languages around 1800, it meant more or less artistic affectation. In this century a main effort in art history has succeeded in imposing a neutral and chronological meaning on the word. Between Michelangelo and Rubens lies the trajectory of a whole period, within which flourished artists like Tintoretto, Cellini, Breughel, and El Greco.

If m. were applied to a similar period in European literature, it would include authors like Antonio de Guevara (1480?-1545) and John Lyly (1554-1606), and perhaps others such as D'Aubigné and Tasso. In the case of the first two, the difficulty would be in distinguishing their style from similar styles in late antiquity and the Middle Ages; and, in the case of the latter two, it would be in distinguishing their style from baroque. An ambitious scheme, deriving from the art-historical concept of mannerist style, is attempted in Four Stages of Renaissance Style (1955) by W. Sypher. In Donne and Hamlet, e.g., he finds a kind of instability which, according to the scheme, existed between the two syntheses of Renaissance and baroque. More demonstration would be needed, especially on a European scale.

In the meantime, the most useful application of m. to letters is in the general, non-historical sense of literature which depends heavily on ornament or ingeniousness. Prime examples would be the elaborately balanced or antithetical styles of Guevara and Lyly, the lush ornate style of Marino, the evocative sensual style of D'Annunzio and Valle-Inclán, and numerous artificial styles in poetry since Mallarmé. Among rhetorical devices used in abundance by mannerists are, to follow E. R. Curtius, hyperbaton, periphrasis, annominatio (paranomasia), and affected metaphors. Others would of course be found in particular cases.—Curtius; E. B. O. Borgerhoff, "M. and Baroque: A Simple Plea," CL, 5 (1953). See also A. M. Boase, "The Definition of 'M.,'" Intern. Comparative Lit. Assoc. Proc. of the Third Congress (1962); R. Daniells, Milton, M. and Baroque (1963). L.N.

MARATHI POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

MARINISM can usefully be accorded three ranges of meaning: the poetic style of Giambattista Marino (1569-1625); the style of a number of It. poets who may be considered direct disciples; and the general influence Marino had on other poets in Europe in the baroque period. It is often thought vaguely equivalent to preciosity, gongorism, euphuism, etc., usually by way of wholesale condemnation. A more precise view would hold that marinism is a species of baroque (q.v.) poetic style, and therefore a cousin to preciosity and gongorism, but only distantly related to euphuism.

Marino's several collections of lyrics, La Lira (1602-14), La Galleria (1620) and La Sampogna (1620), show the usual baroque gamut of subject matter, from sensuality to religiosity. His knowledge of It. poetry was considerable; one finds especially the influence of Ariosto and Tasso. There is, however, less direct Petrarchan influence than among the so-called antimariniisti; instead of ideal, nostalgic, tender love, Marino celebrates actual, languid, sensual love-making. His great reservoir, particularly for his most imposing work L'Adone (1623), is the whole of polished or sentimentalized mythology to be found in poets like Ovid and Claudian. The "fable" of this enormous poem (5,123 octaves) is, to cite Marino's own words, "narrow and incapable of incident"; nevertheless, he manages to "lengthen it with digressions and other luxuriations." His means are an unsparing use of catalogues, processions, tableaux, and miscellaneous descriptions. The style is characterized by rambling syntax, correlative clauses, inexorably pursued metaphors; moreover, the language is highly adjectival and sensually suggestive. As in Góngora's poems and Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis, frozen metaphors become, so to say, lingua franca in the poem: "purple" takes the place of "blood," "ivory" or "snow" of "white," etc.

It must be granted that Marino's poetry has variety within its narrow limits and that it has a mellifluousness remarkable even in It. poetry. There is also merit in the satirical and burlesque poems, especially in the Murtoliede (publ. in 1619) which was directed against the poetaster Gaspare Murtola. It is there that we find the supposed "poetics" of Marino ("Fischicata XXXIII"): "The poet's goal is wonder (I speak of the excellent and not the clumsy poet): he who does not know how to astonish, let him take up the currycomb!"

During Marino's stay in Paris (1615-23) at the court of Marie de Médicis and Louis XIII, there is no evidence that he frequented the Hôtel de Rambouillet (see PRÉCIOSITÉ); yet one of its habitués Jean Chapelain wrote a "Lettre ou Discours . . . sur le Poème d'Adonis du Chevalier Marino" in extravagant praise of the poet, which he later modified, saying that the poem was "a bottomless and edgeless sea and that no one but Saint-Amant has been able to survey it completely." In Italy, of course, Marino's influence was pervasive. His best known direct disciple is Claudio Achillini; yet even his opponents, such as Tommaso Stigliani and Gabriello Chiabrera could hardly escape his impress. Elsewhere, in England, his love lyrics had a certain vogue, and were translated or imitated by such poets as William Drummond of Hawthornden, Thomas Carew, Edward Sherburne, and Thomas Stanley. Marino's greatest influence here is on Richard Crashaw, who translated, under the title Sospetto d'Herode (1637), the first book of his Strage degli Innocenti (publ. in 1632). In Germany Marino's chief debtor was Christian Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau. In Spain the situation was, in a sense, reversed; not only did Góngora occupy any possible place Marino might have taken, but also Marino found himself tempted to borrow from Lope de Vega.

B. Croce, Lirici marinisti (1910) and Storia dell' età barocca in Italia (1925); L. P. Thomas, Góngora et le gongorisme considérés dans leurs rapports avec le marinisme (1911); G. Balsamo-Crivelli, "Introduzione" to his ed. of L'Adone (1922); M. Praz, Seicentismo e marinismo in Inghilterra (1925); A. Belloni, Il Seicento (1929); H. Geibel, Der Einfluss Marinos auf Christian Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau (1938); D. Alonso, "Lope de Vega despojado por Marino" and "Adjunta a Lope de Vega despojado por Marino," RFE, 33 (1949); Marino e i marinisti, ed. G. G. Ferrero (1954); F. J.

Warnke, "Marino and the Eng. Metaphysicals," SRen, 2 (1955); F. Croce, "Nuovi compiti della critica del Marino e del marinismo," Rassegna della letteratura italiana, 61 (1957); J. V. Mirollo, The Poet of the Marvelous: Giambattista Marino (1963). L.N.

MARXIST CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

MASCULINE ENDING. See LINE ENDINGS; for MASCULINE RHYME, see RHYME.

MASQUE. The m. developed in the Renaissance as an entertainment in which a procession of masqued or otherwise disguised figures represented a highly imaginative action interspersed with speeches and songs. Many native and foreign traditions contributed to its various forms—morris dancing, mummers' pageants, ludi, "disguisings," "triumphs," ballets, morality plays, etc. In Italy, where the m. first acquired a distinctive form, the splendor of the spectacle was of the greatest importance to the presentation of the mythological or similarly fantastic subjects that provided the usual themes. Settings were designed by the greatest artists, Brunelleschi and Leonardo among them, according to the most sophisticated and imaginative taste, and machines were invented to incorporate fountains, artificial clouds, and fire in the production. A single setting might include several scenes in which more than one action or dance would be performed, concurrently or in sequence. The court masques of England equalled these in magnificence and taste even when they were being developed towards a more definite dramatic structure.

Circe, a ballet de cour produced in Paris in 1581, exerted a great influence on Eng. masques in providing the example of greater dramatic and thematic unity than had previously been usual. Ben Jonson's and Inigo Jones's The Masque of Blacknesse in 1605 moved still further toward establishing dramatic unity as a principle governing the structure of masques by fixing a single concentrated scene for the action upon a stage erected at one end of the hall.

Jonson conceived of the m. as primarily the work of a poet. In the preface to Hymenaei (1606) he argued that the design and the words of the m. are its soul, the spectacle and mime and dancing its body. He was thus proposing for the m. a fixed principle, Neoplatonic not merely in declaring the "body" of the m. to be the expression of the "soul," but in claiming the invention itself to be the expression of ideal beauty and truth. To Jonson is also due the credit of inventing the antimasque, a briefer m. to accompany the main one, ordinarily preceding it. This would represent grotesque or comic figures to contrast with the mythological or allegorical personages that were the staple of the main m. For both parts Jonson supplied erudite illustrations in marginalia, partly to point to the philosophic and emblematic nature of the very conception of the works.

Jones, Jonson's collaborator from 1605-31, regarded the spectacle as the main thing, and his own work, after the separation from Jonson, continued to give the greatest scope to visual magnificence. The means for such productions was made available from time to time during the reign of Charles I (Shirley's Triumph of Peace [1634] was as lavishly produced as anything under Henry VIII), but with the fall of the Stuarts and the destruction of the conditions that had made the court m. possible, the interest in masques was absorbed in various theatrical and operalike productions.

There had been some place for masques on the Elizabethan stage. The informal, improvised kind that seems to have been very popular in actuality is briefly shown in Romeo and Juliet. The more elaborate forms are rather fully presented in Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale and The Tempest. In the Jacobean and Stuart periods the establishment of the proscenium arch advanced a special form of the m. that has been called "the substantive theatre masque." After the Restoration, masques were sometimes assimilated in the new operatic forms, but in independent productions they appear to have been offered as special kinds of opera, as one may think the 18th-c. productions of Comus were regarded.

Whatever the variations, one might say that a m. always derives its form from the initial conception of royalty assuming the role or joining the company of the allegorized divinities of classical belief and, after the fable and dancing are concluded, reverting to its own splendor. Such a combining of dynasty and fancy and moralizing expresses the highest aspirations of a humanist society, the partnership of power and culture in a sententious and joyful entertainment. In the concluding dance, when the masquers, now unmasked, take their partners from the audience, there is the culminating recognition of the ease and grace and blessedness of the society the actors and dancers in their true selves govern. The spirit of the m. is the opposite of that of the carnival, being royal and noble and classical.

The anti-m. is the other side of the coin, the comic treatment of the unruly, of the forces and elements royalty subdues. To remain true to the tone of the m., the anti-m. opposes it not in satire, which would be alien to the assurance of the rulers, but in the grotesque, the wicked, useless, and amusing imaginings of the ignoble and unworthy.

The combining of music and dancing with drama and spectacle was directed toward a balance that excluded the tensions of drama, and much of the controversy between Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones relates to the problem of how much the burden of meaning and the presentation of character may be allowed to challenge the primarily choreographical and musical movement. Similarly, the spectacular effects were important as much for their variety and their changes as for their dramatic propriety.

R. Brotanek, Die englischen Maskenspiele (1902); A. Solerti, Musica, Ballo e drammatica alla corte Medicea dal 1600 al 1637 (1905); P. Reyher, Les Masques anglais (1909); H. Prunières, Le Ballet de cour en France avant Benserade et Lully (1914); L. B. Campbell, Scenes and Machines on the Eng. Stage During the Renaissance (1923); Designs by Inigo Jones for Masques and Plays at Court, ed. P. Simpson and C. F. Bell (1924); E. Welsford, The Court M. (1927); A. Nicoll, Stuart Masques and the Renaissance Stage (1938); D. J. Gordon, "Poet and Architect: The Intellectual Setting of the Quarrel between Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones," JWCI, 12 (1949); J. Arthos, On A Mask Presented at Ludlow-Castle, by John Milton (1954); E. Haun, "An Inquiry into the Genre of Comus," in Essays in Honor of Walter Clyde Curry (1954); Les Fêtes de la Renaissance, ed. J. Jacquot (1956).
J.A.

MASTERSINGERS. See MEISTERSINGER.

MATHEMATICAL LINGUISTICS. See LINGUISTICS AND POETICS.

MEANING, PROBLEM OF. In treating the nonaesthetic functions of poetry, we may pose problems about its social or political function, its moral function, its religious function. But logically prior to these problems is the problem which asks about the kind of meaning we find in poetry if, indeed, what we find is anything like what we conventionally call "m." For what we think about the social-political, the moral, or the religious function of poetry depends largely on what we conceive to be the capacity of poetry to make meaningful statements about these spheres of human activity. And to determine this capacity we must know whether poetry can make meaningful statements about anything; and, if it can, in what way it manages to do so.

Of course, in these days of such extensive semantic analysis in philosophy, the very meaning of "m." is continually disputed. And especially worrisome is the use of this word in reference to the peculiar kind of symbols employed in poetic discourse. For purposes of economy we shall simply restrict "m." to its primitive sense which concerns the reference of verbal symbols and their syntactic relations to the outside world of things and their real relations. This limitation will immediately dismiss that perhaps eccentric sense of "m." in somewhat common usage of late in poetics, which would treat only the aesthetic, intramural coherence among the words of a literary work in accordance with the internal consistency of their closed system of interrelations.

Because of the dominance of "imitationism" in the history of criticism through much of the 18th c., the simple referential view of poetic m. also went without serious challenge. Whether, like Sir Philip Sidney, critics approved or, like Plato, disapproved what poetry was saying, they were in wide agreement about its ability to say it. It is true, however, that in following the doctrine of imitation critics have been of two kinds, those who proclaimed the objective of poetry to be literal imitation or imitation of the particular and the far greater number who proclaimed it to be ideal imitation or imitation of the universal. Both could invoke the backing of Aristotle and even of Plato, whether they wanted poetry to copy life as it really is or to capture life as, freed from the imperfections of individuality, it ideally ought to be. Literary realists or literalists there have always been; but even as sophisticated and influential a recent philosopher as Charles W. Morris—who, as an anti-Platonist denies any relation of art to universals—appears to join the literal imitationists in his contribution to aesthetics of the notion of the "iconic sign."

Those who, like Samuel Johnson, thought purely in terms of an expanded concept of imitation that would deal not with the individual but with the species, have been far more influentially concerned with the nature of poetic m. For once poetry is not considered as a detailed mirror of minute actuality, the truth of its m. must for the imitationist depend on the general statements it makes or illustrates, since the representative type given us in a poem is treated as a sign pointing to a universal, which has an objective reality more certain and significant than that of mere particulars. As Sidney, citing Aristotle, puts it, poetry is superior to both history and philosophy. History describes particulars only; as descriptive it can never give us universal truth or tell us how to act. Philosophy can do both, but its terms are too general for us to apply the universal truth or general precept to the individual case. Poetry surpasses history in that its universal truths tell us how life ought to be and it surpasses philosophy in that it gives us the particular example. In this way Sidney resolves the ever-present problem of poetic theory which asks how poetry can be at once universal and particular. The poem exists primarily for its message or paraphrasable m., with its content irrevocably separated from its form, which—as merely a suitable felicity of language—can act only as embellishment. The felicity is there to help persuade, but it is thus performing a rhetorical rather than a poetic function. In addition to Sidney and Johnson, a greater number of distinguished writers in our critical tradition have maintained at least a qualified version of this view of poetic m. than have held any other: Horace, medieval writers like Dante and Boccaccio, most 16th-c. It. critics, neoclassicists like Dryden, Boileau, Addison, and Pope. Even in our own time, when, as an aftermath to Victorian didacticism, the wide acceptance of organicism has made this an unpopular view, we may detect an affinity to it in the neo-Humanists and even, perhaps, in Yvor Winters as well as in aestheticians like T. M. Greene.

However, as philosophic realism had sanctioned imitationism in poetics, so philosophic idealism often led to the opposite, poetic expressionism. For the idealist, the pure, mental creations of what William Blake termed the poetic genius could become a measure of ultimate reality more trustworthy than the limiting illusions of the external world. And poetry was to reflect the godlike mind rather than what was outside it. So profound a difference had to make itself felt in conceptions of poetic m. Thus there have been other, more romantic critics who have claimed there is more than one kind of m. and who would not lower the dignity of poetry by having it at the service of so inferior a kind of m. as the one here described as propositional. Rather, in seeing a psychological opposition between the reason and the imagination, they have regarded poetry as dedicated to the kind of m. furnished by the unbounded powers of the latter faculty. Since the imagination, as the poetic faculty, is considered the only means of reaching this transcendent m., their claims would make the cognitive function of poetry a unique and irreplaceable one, whereas the more traditional view we have examined sees poetry as involved with the same kind of m. as can be obtained—and probably more immediately, if less persuasively, obtained—from more directly discursive modes of language.

The first hint we get of this intuitionist view, strangely enough, may very well also come from Plato, who in his Ion pictures the poet as divinely inspired and even as possessed. He is the man chosen by the gods to intuit the highest truths. This definition of the poet was developed into the first theories of imagination by Dion Chrysostom, Philostratus, and finally by the Neoplatonic Plotinus. But it does not attain its most systematic and influential expression until the conception of imagination becomes a central concern of German idealism and is passed on to segments of British as well as German romanticism. Closer to our own period, Henri Bergson and Benedetto Croce are the principal exponents of this general position.

It is a position that would seem to demand a special metaphysic. If we look, for example, at the influential theory of F.W.J. Schelling, the theory that provided Coleridge with his concept of imagination, we find that he can grant such cognitive powers to the imagination only because he posits a monistic universe whose divine essence or ground lies immanently within every particular object. If the whole is in every part and never exists except in the part—if the ground, in other words, is only immanent and never transcendent—then only by fully apprehending the part can we intuit the indwelling whole. This activity certainly is not to be entrusted to our abstract reasoning power, which can never fully appreciate the particular. Nor need our intuition be subject, like propositional truth, to a rational check since imagination, beyond reason, can hardly be contained by the inferior disciplines which reason provides. The imagination, then, is the faculty which produces art since it captures the particular completely and sees through it to the underlying essence. And the act of imagination—the perception of a particular and seemingly lifeless object, which infuses it, through the power of mind, with the dynamic essence of the universe—is literally an act of cognition, the most crucial act of cognition we can perform. Of course, the relation between the universal and particular given us by Schelling is not at all like that given us by Sidney. Sidney considered poetry, with its use of particulars, as another path to propositional truth—from below, as it were, rather than from above. For Schelling the truth of poetry is the only final truth. The m. of the universe is revealed intuitively, through the vehicle of art, or it is not revealed at all.

But there are those too who have denied that poetry has any important dealings with any kind of m. They have not been interested in relating what is in the literary work to the nonaesthetic world outside—to life, as we usually term it. Rather they have sought to locate the function of poetry solely in its affective relations with its reader. Poetry for them exists not for what it is or for what, in terms of life generally, it means but for what it can do for us. While the older version of this approach commonly ended in hedonism, the more recent version—perhaps following a different path out of the Aristotelian tradition—usually ends by seeing poetry as therapy. Once poetry is denied the power of illumination that we associate with life-meanings, the only justification that can be claimed for its existence is the pleasure it can provide or the emotions it can affect. As the view that poetry yields propositional m. was seen to concentrate on the content or the teaching aspects of the poem, so this view concentrates on the formal or the pleasing aspects of the poem.

Many have held the view, that, as pleasure-giving, poetry is its own justification. As has been intimated, it has cropped up here and there as a minority version of Aristotelianism. A very few 16th-c. It. critics, notably Castelvetro and Mazzoni, expounded varying forms of this heresy amid the flourishing didactic theories. Only a faint, dissident voice in the Renaissance, this view was comparatively without adherents until the 19th c. But from the time that Gautier enunciated the slogan "l'art pour l'art," the movement grew. With its notion of pleasure restricted to the delicate aesthetic pleasure, it has since dominated the Fr. symbolist and Eng. aesthetic movements. And more recently it has dominated such "formalists" in the plastic arts as Clive Bell and Roger Fry, some Rus. literary formalists, and those who may constitute the only equivalent school in current Am. literary criticism, the Chicago neo-Aristotelians.

In order to assert poetry's affective function, the various proponents of this view, whatever their differences, have denied its cognitive function. Thus the neo-Aristotelian Elder Olson has suggested that it is absurd to think of a poem having a m. since the poem means only itself. Only those who are unmoved by the emotional effect of the poem feel the need to justify it by an irrelevant search after m. Frequently, too, critics who have taken this position have been forced to deny poetry any real importance in the total human economy unless, for the sake of a pure, unburdened art and the rarefied aesthetic emotion it permits, they deny the importance of all man's other and more time-consuming activities. But this is the by-product one would expect of a theory whose increasing popularity in the last hundred years has been largely dependent on the increasing dominance of the intellectual arena by scientific positivism. If knowledge is to be restricted to the sort of thing that allows of proof in the laboratory manner so that even speculative philosophy comes to be considered emotive rather than meaningful, how can poetry, so much less rigorous a mode of discourse, be justified except by abandoning any pretense at m. in order to seize upon its unquestioned capacity to please and to move?

While I. A. Richards (see BELIEF, PROBLEM OF) explicitly renounces any pleasure-theory, in denying m. to poetry and in claiming that poetry operates therapeutically by improving our neurological health, he may seem dangerously close to such a theory. He sees "referential discourse," with its use restricted to science, as giving propositional truth. In order to do so efficiently it must employ signs that are as transparent as possible: the relation of the sign to the thing or concept it represents must be as close to one-to-one as possible. But if this thin discourse is lucid, it is also—compared to less exact and more distorted discourse—cold and unfeeling. Thus there is also a need for an "emotive discourse," although as a positivist Richards cannot allow it a claim to truth. For it is not referential in character; if it were it would lose its warmth, its capacity to appeal to large and complex groups of impulses in readers. Instead of statements, then, poetry, as emotive, contains "pseudo-statements" (see PSEUDO-STATEMENT); it is pure myth. It exists only to affect our total psychology, a function until now and in the foreseeable future beyond the cold powers of laboratory-controlled knowledge. Since emotive discourse does not literally mean anything, since it finally points only to itself, there is no need for clarity. Ambiguity may be allowed, even encouraged, since the denser the discourse the more complexity it has and the more effectively it can perform its neurological task, which Richards defines as the arousal in the reader of as broad an organization of impulses—and of opposed impulses—as possible. The emotive-referential dichotomy, used by Richards to find an important place for poetry in an age of science, has also been commonly used to the detriment of poetry by philosophers of a positivistic bent who are more antihumanistic in intention.

However, some antipositivistic modern critics—for example, Allen Tate, Cleanth Brooks, and in places John Crowe Ransom—transform the elements of Richards' dichotomy in order to restore m. to emotive discourse, although, since the dichotomy is still maintained, it is a very different sort of m. from that yielded by referential discourse. They put in Richards' referential category the abstractions from the world made by science or philosophy for its own purposes. But this is for them hardly the only kind of m. there may be since the abstractions of science or philosophy hardly exhaust all that there is in the world. Indeed either science or philosophy must leave unaccounted for what is to these critics the most significant aspects of the world we experience

—what Ransom calls the particularities in "the world's body"—since these are the aspects which must slip through the inhumane sieve of formulae which either discipline must use to accomplish its limited purposes. These critics see the inadequacy of philosophy as well as of science, of propositional discourse in general, to be caused by the fact that it is and ought to be so purely referential. Because it is thin and its relation to things one-to-one, it cannot help but be generic, abstract. Brooks, for example, claims that, as ideally pure symbols, the terms of science are to be static and unyielding and are thus not to be highly charged and made dense with contextual qualifications and complexities. They obviously cannot be intended to do justice to the dynamics and the fullness of our experiential world. But in poetry the endless verbal complexities produced by qualifications, ambiguities, paradoxes, and ironies keep the alert reader from using the poem crudely, from treating it as a mere sign. The involved data of human experience must be sifted as little as possible, so that as much as can be aesthetically accommodated may come through into the poem.

According to this view, poetry, in a sense less useful because it is literally confounded, has a kind of m. afforded by no other form of discourse. It is different from propositional m., as we have seen; nor is it the intuitional m. suggested for poetry by the romantics discussed earlier. It is not related to any faculty-psychology and it is not to break through to the essential realities of a noumenal world. Rather it is related to the immediate world of our experience. Its difference from referential m., a difference caused by the peculiar and complex nature of the poetic context, is that it deals with a world differently conceived in accordance with a difference of purpose—or indeed a suspension of any precise and systematic purpose. And, as contrasted to referential m., the m. yielded by the poetic context might be termed "presentational m.," a many-faceted reflection of the fullness of experience which has its own rightful place as a possible cognitive function of discourse.

C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards, The Meaning of M. (1923); I. A. Richards, Science and Poetry (1926); C. W. Morris, "Esthetics and the Theory of Signs," Jour. of Unified Science, 8 (1939); "Science, Art and Technology," KR, 1 (1939); T. M. Greene, The Arts and the Art of Crit. (1940); J. C. Ransom, "Wanted: an Ontological Critic," The New Crit. (1941); J. Hospers, M. and Truth in the Arts (1946); C. Brooks, "The Heresy of Paraphrase" and "The Problem of Belief and the Problem of Cognition," The Well Wrought Urn (1947); A. Tate, "Lit. as Knowledge," On the Limits of Poetry (1948); E. Olson, "A Symbolic Reading of the Ancient Mariner," in Crane, Critics; W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "The Concrete Universal," The Verbal Icon (1954); E. Vivas, "Lit. and Knowledge," Creation and Discovery (1955); Krieger; Wheelwright; Frye; M. Krieger, "Recent Crit., Thematics, and the Existential Dilemma," The Tragic Vision (1960); R. Foster, The New Romantics (1962).

M.KRIE.

MEASURE. A metrical group or period. The m. may consist of the dipody as in classical iambic, trochaic, and anapaestic verse, or of the foot as in Eng. verse. In the so-called musical theories of versification the m. is usually the time sequence consisting of syllables beginning with a main accent and running to the next: "Night's / candles / are burnt / out, and / jocund / day" (Romeo and Juliet 3.5.9). In this example the initial word is an example of anacrusis (q.v.); there follow 4 measures of 2 syllables each, of relatively equal time; the final word belongs to the m. ended in the initial syllable of the following line.
R.O.E.

MEDIEVAL POETICS. All art of the Middle Ages is unified by Christianity and therefore begins with Christ and the Apostles. There is as yet no definitive study of med. poetics. This article especially refers to Western Christendom, where L. was the language of criticism, even of vernacular poetry.

The nearly fifteen centuries are divided into three periods of roughly equivalent length: (1) A patristic period, in which the foremost minds of the ancient world (patres, Fathers) developed a catholic culture out of diverse cultures—Semitic, Persian, Coptic, Hellenic, Italic, Celtic. The unifying element was belief in the Incarnation as revealed in the rhetoric of Christ and the Apostles (traditio) and the literature of the Holy Spirit (sacrae scripturae). (2) A scholastic period, in which that culture was transmitted to all people, largely barbarian and predominantly illiterate, by the regular (monastic) or secular clergy. (3) A secularizing period, in which the verbal arts, for half a millennium the special language of that single profession, spread to the nobility, the emergent professions, and the bourgeoisie.

(1) Throughout the pagan Empire, poet was primarily defined in four ways: by derivation, as a maker or creator; by assimilation, as a vates, who penetrated into very nature; by discrimination, as a fabulist devoted to entertainment (dilectatio) as contrasted with the historian devoted to record (res gestae); by synecdoche, as a versifier. Since in the creed of the Fathers God alone created, poetry in the first sense was false; "poet" became an opprobrious term for those who created false gods, to the delusion of the people. To the second sense the Fathers were more favorable; the Hebrews had regarded writing as more divine than had the rhetorically inclined Greeks and Romans. The poet did not create; but by the will of God he discovered the Truth, as did prophets. And he cast this living Truth into literary form. God, Himself the Creator, allowed His poem to be seen in fragments or shadows, except in the single instance of the Incarnate Christ, the Logos. Verbalized revelation of that True Poem in the Catholic Scriptures was the measure of all. Since these scriptures were, in the main, not versified, few Christian writers used poet in the fourth sense, lest it confuse the central issue; for metrical and other regulated lines they used versus and the like. Nevertheless, they intensely studied and practiced metrical and ornamental arts, which were aspects of Truth, discovered by or revealed to man. But perhaps poetry was most widely thought of in the third sense; for most Fathers, including Augustine, regarded the poets as fabulists, valuable only as their fables induced good morality. As such they were to be despoiled (as Moses despoiled the Egyptians) for Christian doctrine.

Adherence to these principles meant that poetics, in the classical or neoclassical sense, would not be composed; for theory could not guide creation, nor could criticism influence it. Nevertheless, the recipient of True Poetry needed to understand it. Consequently nearly all that the Fathers wrote was interpretation of Scripture—that is, exegesis—and may therefore in a general sense be regarded as poetics. Unlike the rhetoricians, the Fathers addressed themselves to readers as individuals; each reader was responsible for the effect of the poetry upon himself.

The center of exegesis was Alexandria, where grammar, that is, study of letters, had developed in the last pre-Christian centuries. Secondary centers were the apostolic sees of Antioch and Rome, and Caesarea, which early developed a great Christian library. In the Gr. world, Constantinople (Byzantium) became the heir to this Christian learning. There an active literary life continued until the 15th c. As in all aspects of its culture, Byzantine literary criticism was ultraconservative. Photius (ca. 820–897) and Tzetzes (1110–ca. 1183) are outstanding. But Byzantine criticism had almost no effect upon the West from the 6th to the 14th c.

At Alexandria, Philo the Jew, contemporary with Christ, established allegorical interpretation of Hebrew Scriptures. Clement of Alexandria and his pupil, the amazing Origen, predicating a perfect unity in a corpus of "canonical" works, resolved apparent discrepancies among the literal statements by an allegorical method—not verbal allegory, which is characteristic of poetry in any age, but an allegory of things—an actual relationship as of type and typed between events, expressed by verbal symbols. Only the chosen few (eruditi, electi, philosophi) had the power of apprehending the true meaning beneath the integument; the unsophisticated mass must be content with the literal (carnalia, superficialia, historia). This distinction of audience was akin to, but not identical with, the classical distinction of liberal and servile. The new form of polysemous interpretation, though intensely popular, especially with the monks, had its detractors in the Antiochene school. Nevertheless, both parties gave themselves wholly to understanding Truth through writing: Gr. Fathers like Athanasius, Eusebius, Basil, the two Gregorys, Theodore of Mopsuestia, John Chrysostom; Latin Fathers like Tertullian, Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, Ambrose, Rufinus, and Vincent of Lerins, but especially Jerome and Augustine.

Jerome, translator of the Scriptures, composed commentaries upon virtually every book of the canon and wrote many tracts upon literary education, methods of translation, inspiration, and literal and figurative meaning. His Illustrious Men was a literary history designed to give status to the Christian writers above the pagans; his hagiography encouraged Western Christians to cultivate the arts of "Greek romance"; his Chronicle formulated world history for later writers; his textual criticism formed the "Vulgate" of the West; his exegesis detached veneration from verbalism and centered attention on the thing expressed. He established, or confirmed, the lasting principle of Christian and pagan literary correspondence. Augustine, himself a professor of rhetoric before his conversion, especially through his earlier Master and Order and his later Christian Doctrine, stamped with the approval of the most influential Father the concept of seven disciplines as rational steps to True Philosophy. Since these disciplines, as he formulated them, consisted of grammar as the base with rhetoric and dialectic as other verbal arts, and music, geometry, astronomy, and "numbers" as rungs leading from material to pure intelligence, poetry was excluded, except as a kind of servant of grammar. These Latin Fathers played down form while emphasizing image and figure.

(2) In the 5th c. and thereafter to, roughly speaking, the Norman Conquest of England and Italy, the collapsed western empire, overrun by Teutons, Moslems, Hungarians, and Scandinavians, had only the claustral clergy to preserve and disseminate culture. Because their business was teaching at an elementary level, the culture was markedly traditional and scholastic. Though the very foundations of modern poetry were laid and its conventions shaped in this period, there was neither leisure nor inclination for criticism. Following Augustine, four writers whose texts became standard also neglected poetry. Boethius furnished the scholastic basis for philosophy, translating Aristotle's and others' works on rhetoric and logic, but he was executed before he treated poetics, if indeed he ever intended to. Cassiodorus, his successor as Master of Offices under Theodoric, founded a monastic school in southern Italy and wrote a syllabus for it (Institutiones). He adhered to the seven disciplines, as did the African Martianus Capella (De Nuptiis). Isidore of Seville, whose compendious encyclopaedia (Etymologiae) was very popular, treated the seven arts in detail, but relegated poetry to a book (8) in which he treated all forms of heresy and the pagan philosophers, poets, Sibyls, magi, and gods; his notion of poets as pseudo-creators influenced nearly every schoolboy. Bede treated The Art of Meter, in which the isosyllabic rhythms were first identified, and Figures and Tropes; he emphasized the kinship of pagan and Christian poetry by drawing his examples of classical poetic figures from the sacred scriptures. The masters whom Charlemagne assembled in an abortive renaissance, led by Alcuin from England, Paul the Deacon from Lombardy, and Theodulf from Visigothic Spain, partially revived study of ancient poetry, especially bucolics and epic, but their critical statements are of little importance now. John Scotus, who with Heiric and Remigius of Auxerre introduced the method of scholastic glosses, did begin a revival of Neoplatonism, which smoldered for two centuries before bursting into flame at Chartres. Perhaps the most original work of this scholastic period was the Book of Sequences of Notker Balbulus of St. Gall, who prefaced the collection of his own sequences with a description of methods of composition.

(3) During the 11th c. there were increasing signs that the long period of migration, chaos, poverty, and rudimentary teaching was passing. About the year 1000 the feudal nobility, born of the wars, had consolidated their holdings sufficiently to begin to build in stone, and castles and courts heralded a new stability. Wealth and manpower appeared in abundance. By the year 1100, the West had so far regained its balance as to be able to spend in excess upon crusades, schools, a resurgent papal church, and the arts. The time had arrived to disseminate the culture which had for so long remained with the clergy. The cathedral schools, which were the sole agency of public education beyond the primary training given by parish priests, had existed precariously; York (8th c.), Orleans and Auxerre (9th c.), Reims and Paris (10th c.), had barely kept the Boethian tradition alive. But under Fulbert, a disciple of Gerbert at Reims, the School of Chartres took on new life at the beginning of the 11th c., intensively studying the auctores, that is, the major classics, with emphasis upon poetry. Teachers like Bernard and Theodoric instructed novices who became poets of some stature. Simultaneously, Orleans, Reims, and Paris welcomed the younger sons of nobility displaced by primogeniture, who feted poetry despite the strictures of some schoolmen (e.g., Abelard, Introductio ad Theologiam 2.2). As court chaplains, archdeacons, and chancellors, they passed along to the nobility and the expanding bourgeoisie the skills formerly limited to the clergy. The 12th and first half of the 13th c. saw the production of many an "Art of Poetry" hastily coined to supply the trade: Marbod of Rennes (De Ornamentis Verborum), Alan of Lille (Anticlaudianus), Geoffrey of Vinsauf (Poetria Nova), Matthew of Vendome (Ars Versificatoria), Alexander of Villa Dei (Doctrinale), Eberhard of Bethune (Graecismus), Everhard the German (Laborintus), John of Garland (Poetria), and others.

It is hardly to be expected that, in such a period of expansion and reorientation, criticism of lasting merit would appear; but these authors made up in zeal, variety, and naive combinations of commonplaces what may have been lacking in taste. They often misapplied methods which were satisfactory for ecclesiastics: allegory, that is, verbal figures, took on pretensions of scriptural allegory, classical poets were "moralized" to accord with spurious Christian doctrine, and flowers of rhetoric were cultivated for their own sake. Yet the very excesses led to a new romantic idiom, giving Dante and Chaucer a language of color and emotion never known before. Concurrently, the need for summae in the emerging universities created a new kind of textbook in which treatment of poetry as an authentic art found place (Vincent of Beauvais; Brunetto Latini). True, Paris in the north, with its emphasis upon dialectical theology, and Bologna in the south, emphasizing law, soon overshadowed other schools, and study of poetry again languished. After the middle of the 13th c., the schools and universities no longer advanced the cause.

But they had done their work. While they preserved ancient poetry and justified its study, they taught the laity not only how to compose but how to sing. They codified both rhythms and meters, and adapted their L. principles to the vernacular tongues. New lyric, narrative, and dramatic verse, originated in the cloisters and developed in the schoolrooms, now emerged as a modern synthesis; hence the concept of poetry was unified throughout the western Kulturgebiet, no matter what vernacular was chosen for composition.

Averroes' paraphrase of Aristotle's Poetics was translated by Hermannus Alemannus, ca. 1250 (see G. Lacombe, ed., Aristoteles Latinus 1 [1939], 212-3), but seems to have had little significance. A purely western criticism developed among the late troubadours: Raimon Vidal de Besalú (Las razos de trobar) and Uc Faidit (Donatz proensals); at Toulouse in the 14th c. poetical questions were settled by a kind of judicial procedure, recorded in Leys d'Amors (see Hist. litt. de la France, XXXVIII [1949], 139-233). But already northern Italy had begun to cultivate poetic theory with a vigor characteristic of the rising communes. The new art found its greatest critic in Dante, not only in his Vita Nuova, Convivio, and letters (especially Epistle 10), but in a monumental though unfinished poetics, De vulgari eloquentia.

Dante's intent was to discover the appropriate and inevitable language and form of poetry. It is but one of the glories of his work that he saw the future of poetry in the vernaculars (the "natural" tongues) and not Latin ("grammar"). The diction must be illustrious (i.e., exalted), cardinal (standard), courtly (noble), and curial (judicial). Such a special language must be screened from all the separate dialects and be characteristic of none. He examines this diction with the discrimination of the scholar and the taste and perception of the poet. He then proceeds to consider the proper subjects of poetry, which are the salus, venus, and virtus ("safety, love, virtue"; cf. De vulgari eloquentia 2.2.70) of the troubadours in the exalted senses of the dolce stil nuovo (q.v.) and their proper forms (the hendecasyllabic line and canzone structure are his ideal). Tragic style is elevated, comic is middling, and elegiac is the style of the wretched. The illustrious vernacular should never be used for lowly or vulgar themes. Particularly striking is Dante's conception of the evolution of language and his discrimination of formulated from natural language. Had De vulgari eloquentia had the audience which it merited during the Humanist period, we may believe that poetical theory would have been much advanced.

PRIMARY WORKS: As yet, no useful collection of texts; representative of each period is: (1) Basilii Magni Caesareae, Sermo de legendis libris gentilium, ed. J. P. Migne, Patrologia Graeca, xxxi, 563-90. (2) Bede, De arte metrica, ed. H. Keil, Grammatici Latini, vi. (3) Dante, De vulgari eloquentia, tr. A. G.

Ferrers Howell, The L. Works of Dante (Temple Classics), pp. 1-124.

SECONDARY WORKS: P. Lehmann, "Literaturgesch. im Mittelalter," Germ.-rom. Monatsschrift, 1912, pp. 569ff. and 617ff.; Saintsbury, v. 1 (comprehensive and still provocative); Norden (important); E. Faral, Les arts poétiques du xii^e et du xiii^e s. (1924; incl. texts); H. Brinkmann, Zu Wesen und Form mittelalterlicher Dichtung (1928); G. Paré, A. Brunet, F. Tremblay, La Renaissance du XII^es.: Les écoles et l'enseignement (1933); H. H. Glunz, Die Literaturästhetik des europäischen Mittelalters (1937; uneven); H. Scharschuch, Gottfried von Strassburg: Stilmittel, Stilästhetik (1938; stylistics of a poet at the crossroads); Behrens (pp. 33-66 a systematic brief survey of period); É. Lesne, Les écoles de la fin du VIII^e s. à la fin du XII^e s. (Hist. de la propriété eccl. en France, v, 1940); E. deBruyne, Études d'esthétique médiévale (3 v., 1946); L. Arbusow, Colores rhetorici (1948); H. I. Marrou, St. Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (2d ed., 1950); E. Dekkers and E. A. Gaar, Clavis Patrum Latinorum (1951; Wegweiser for Latin Fathers to Bede); Curtius (his exceptional critical monographs listed, p. 600 of his European Lit. and the Latin M.A.); R. McKeon, "Rhetoric in the Middle Ages," pp. 260-296, "Poetry and Philosophy in the 12th C.," pp. 297-318, in Crane, Critics; H. Roos, Die Modi Significandi des Martinus de Dacia (1952; pp. 12-120 an excellent survey of the scholastic period); G. E. von Grunebaum, "The Aesthetic Foundation of Arabic Lit.," CL, 4 (1952); J.W.H. Atkins, Eng. Lit. Crit.: The Med. Phase (rev. ed., 1952); M. T. Houtsma et al., The Encyclopedia of Islam (new ed., 5 v., 1953ff.); R. H. Bolgar, The Cl. Heritage and its Beneficiaries (1954); G.W.H. Lampe and K. J. Woollcombe, Essays on Typology (1957; esp. pp. 39-75 on theological allegory); E. Auerbach, Literatursprache und Publikum . . . im MA (1958); Crit. Approaches to Med. Lit., ed. D. Bethurum (1960).

"MEDIEVAL POETRY" is not yet a definite term. Some critics have worked to discover and describe latent unity in the literature of med. western Europe in studies of genres like hymnography, dramaturgy, and mythology, and of arts of prosody, music, and rhetoric, while some aestheticians and historians like de Bruyne, Curtius, Auerbach, and Bezzola have tried to distinguish an essentially med. poetic vigor. But still others look upon med. poetry as debased classicism or a primitive stage of the several national literatures.

Except for fragments of oral verse caught up in letters, our heritage from the Middle Ages consists of works designed to be read or to be recited in accordance with a script. It is therefore literary poetry. The roots of literary poetry are L. L. Christianity introduced from the Alps to Iceland an alphabet, writing materials, schools and libraries, and an idiom primarily developed for religious expression by a clerical class. It fused elements of Semitic and Hellenic diction, syntax, and figure with the Roman imperial language. This Christianity embraced Celtic, Teutonic, and Scandinavian peoples who had developed indigenous oral poetry; and it was affected, though very lightly, by Byzantium and the Muslim world. In the course of ten centuries Western social systems changed radically as a whole and regionally. Consequently there are marked diversities, first as the exclusive cultures acquired the L. arts, then as vernaculars, now Latinized in various degrees, became literary and spread from clerical to noble and bourgeois classes. Particularly from the 7th to the 12th c. did regional poetry receive its L.-Christian impress, which makes the "western tradition."

I. LATIN POETRY. Especially in the century following the Nicene Council (A.D. 325), brilliant, rhetorically trained Romans devoted themselves to developing and disseminating Christian doctrine and liturgy. They supplied the language of med. poetry, primarily in prose: Ambrose's hymns and addresses, Jerome's translations of Scriptures (the basis of the Vulgate), and Augustine's doctrinal works expressed insensible realities in sensible terms. At the same time, Roman versifiers like Prudentius and Paulinus turned the Hebrew-Christian poetry into traditional L. genres. This patristic writing, the staple of early med. schools and libraries, was popularized in sermons, liturgy, and paraliturgical as a unified body of doctrine, tradition, legend, and myth which was, or might be, poetical.

A. Prosody and Verse Form. Med. verse evolved from meters to rhyme and rhythm. The great influx of foreigners, at first from the east and later from the north, affected L. metrical purity as early as the 2d c.; at the end of the 4th c. Augustine stated that his students could no longer distinguish between long and short syllables. Though learned poets continued the composition of meters throughout the Middle Ages, popular poets developed patterns derived in part from Kunstprosa, which had taken on "Asian" flourishes including homophony such as alliteration, homeoteleuton, and rhyme. Isosyllabism (as in Augustine's Psalm Against the Donatists), which supplanted meters, was not alone decor; it aided memory and helped to preserve the text. Such classical meters as had been isosyllabic (e.g., trochaic septenarius, iambic dimeter) acquired additional popularity as being simultaneously traditional and modern; at the same time, isosyllabic substitutes were developed for popular classical meters like the heroic, elegiac, and sapphic. Emphasis, as in Ambrose's hymns, upon linear units of thought, partly because of choral antiphony, stimulated growth of patterned terminal rhythms, which became stressed in Teutonic regions. However, there is at present only partial agreement about the evolution of stress and tonic accent. By the end of the 7th c., terminal rhyme, or at least homeoteleuton and assonance, was a common verse pattern. As L. increasingly became a scholastically acquired second language, these figures of sound increased. By the 12th c., complex 2- and 3-syllable terminal rhyme was standard.

Strophaic patterns seem to have followed these patterns of rhyme and rhythm. Long lines separated at rhymed caesuras. For example, the dactylic hexameter became leonine, that is, with rhyme at caesura and term, or, eventually, even more complex. Then versifiers learned to double or triple the number of lines with the caesural rhyme. The septenarius was another long verse which evolved into a cadenced stanza. Refrains became more common and regular.

Vernacular and L. verse tended to interchange sound patterns, but eventually L. predominated. There are a very few early attempts to compose L. verses in Teutonic stress rhythms. But the L. isosyllabism, rhyme, and patterned terminal accent became the vernacular standard. The octosyllabic developed from the Ambrosian iambic dimeter; the decasyllabic and It. hendecasyllabic (though long thought to be Fr.) probably partly from dactylic tetrameter catalectic and partly from Horatian sapphic. However, once the principles were established, both L. and vernacular versifiers tried every variation. The sequence, which began from the 9th c. as musical prose, introduced flexibility. By the middle of the 13th c. composers in L. had ceased to invent, and vernaculars led the development.

B. Characteristics. The clergy preserved selected classics especially adaptable to the schools, but Scriptures, including ancillary apocryphal writings and hagiography, were primary. Before about A.D. 1050, the word "poet" or "maker" was hardly ever used for a contemporary writer or versifier, even if he composed learnedly in meters; for God was the sole Creator. It was applied to classical poets somewhat pejoratively, though Virgil became Poeta as Aristotle eventually became Philosophus. Author was similarly affected. Versifiers were apt to designate their work as rhythmici, versus, carmina, but not poemata. Reverence for scriptures, that is, literature, exalted the science of grammar, and dislike of pagan eloquence as prideful depressed rhet- oric. Words needed to reveal simultaneously (according to traditional interpretation) the highest exaltation and the most mundane sensibility. The polysemous allegory which developed would have been ambiguous beyond understanding were its interpretation not anchored in a common doctrine. This doctrine had to be carried in the mind, for books were expensive and literacy uncommon; hence mnemonic formulas strongly determined med. aesthetics, including use of carmina figurata (see PATTERN POETRY), number symbolism, etymologies, and topics. The classical distinction between the content of poetry and prose disappeared. An author quite customarily wrote the same matter twice, once in prose for meditation and once in verse for recitation. Sometimes, in the model of Martianus and Boethius, he would alternate prose and verse (Sedulius Scotus, Liber de rectoribus christianis; cf. Boccaccio, Ameto). Contrast and color, more than formal unity, were desired.

Hence genres are difficult to identify. At the early centers of literacy, hymnody, hagiography, and scholastic verse were basic.

1. Hymnody was the heart of lyric poetry and scriptural psalms and canticles its muscle. Hymns (q.v.), defined as songs of praise, were admitted to the Office on sufferance after Hilary and Ambrose led the way. Later, sequences developed in the Mass from extension of Hebraic jublations like the Alleluia. Their melodies spread to the market places as paraliturgy. Med. love of parody and inversion grew with adaptation of these religious pieces to profane use.

From the 10th c. liturgical drama developed slowly out of hymnody by expansion of tropes (q.v.) and use of processions, until extensive representations of scriptural narrative in the form of Passion and Nativity Plays and Cycles ("mysteries," see MYSTERY AND MIRACLE PLAYS) came to be presented by laity as popular entertainment. Concurrently a more secular drama based on legends ("miracles") developed, quite possibly in the schools, since the earliest (Hildesheim) plays are scholastic. Dramatized allegories ("moralities," q.v.) and professional divertissements ("interludes" and "farces," qq.v.) do not appear to have become conventional before the late 14th c.

2. Hagiography, which in the late classical period had arisen as acta martyrum and vitae patrum, was designed for edification; in various proportions it combines semitic narrative, epideictic eloquence, and "Greek romance" in pious tales for conversion, meditation, and instruction in manners. Because in cloisters it was employed for reading in nocturnal office and in refectory as well as for private meditation, demand and supply were high. The oriental tradition of monasticism determined that oriental narratives and narrative devices should predominate. The romantic narrative tradition is markedly hagiographical: poetized knighthood takes its start from the Pauline arming of the Christian warrior in Ephesians; chivalry from the beast and saint of, for instance, Jerome's Malchus; peerage (the Twelve Peers of France) from discipleship; quests (quaerere) from oriental seekers, and gestes (gesta is hagiographical synonym for virtutes and miracula) from superhuman accomplishments; love and joy from amor Dei and gaudia Christi; courtliness from cohors (cognate garden) which in hagiography combined notions associated with Eden, the pastoral Canticles, the locus amoenus ("lovely spot"; cf. Horace, Ars Poetica 17; Isidore, Etymologiae 14.8.33) and the cloister.

3. Scholastic verse was ancillary to the other two, but helped to preserve classical tradition for useful adaptations. The scholars, as the only literates, composed occasional verse: epistles, eclogues, epigrams, panegyrics, processions, and the like, usually in meter. Secular drama (e.g., the Nicholas plays) developed from exercises based on Terence, a model of style. Scholastic imitations of Roman epics (Abbo's Siege of Paris) doubtless affected narrative verse. Even textbooks were sometimes cast into meter, partially as models. A most fruitful activity was student composition. Walafrid's Visio Wettini (9th c.) is a prototype of the Commedia. The St. Gall (?) Waltharius may be called the first chivalric epic; it phrases a Teutonic tale in the language of Virgil and Prudentius. The Ecbasis Captivi (from Toul ?) is a progenitor of beast epics (q.v.), and Ruodlieb, from Tegernsee, of the Parzival-type of psychological tale. Scholars provided the often quite imaginative verse chronicles and the specula or "mirrors" for leaders of church and state; they ranged from manners and advice to sheer trifles for amusement, in verse or prose.

As the West produced more scholars than the church could absorb, vagrants and wits became increasingly apparent, though they had always existed (see Augustine's De opere monachorum). They converted ecclesiastical art to a wider public, composing especially parodies, drinking and love songs, and scurrilities, often called goliardic verse (q.v.). Especially as they located posts in civil life as chaplains or chancellors, they were prime agents in adapting form, imagery, idiom, and melody of L. verse to the emergent vernaculars of the secular classes. The mendicant orders, especially the Franciscans (13th c.), composed some of the most moving lyrics (Stabat Mater, Dies Irae) of all time.

Petrarch represents the entire middle age in regarding L. as the language of true poetry;

Dante's exaltation of the eloquentia vulgaris as a fit poetical medium is exceptional.

II. VERNACULAR POETRY. A. Celtic. The term refers to what seems indigenous that has survived from Ireland, Wales, and Scotland. Caesar's observation (Bellum gallicum 6.14) that the Druidic schools kept some for twenty years memorizing verses, for letters were irreligious, is indicative. There are native words for poet (bard), musician, and song; but the earliest Welsh codices of poetry, four in number, date from the end of the 12th to the 15th c., the Scotch-Gaelic are later, and the Ir., except for scraps from the pens of Carolingian migrants, have only slightly greater range and number. Scholars try to distinguish in these documents what is indigenous from southern importations, but they often disagree; to compare L. works from the pens of known Celts like Erigena or treatments of Celtic materials by Latinate writers like Geoffrey of Monmouth or Gerald of Wales is infrequently helpful. The Celts seem to have enjoyed lyric, melodic strains, varieties of word play and rhyme, pathos, a sensuous view of external nature, cult of women, a demimonde of fairies and pixies, formulated codes and "prohibitions," and imaginativeness at the expense of coherence. There is reason to believe that the Celtic revivalists have not greatly erred in their instinctive choices of what to accent, though as with their literate and literary med. predecessors, they may have imposed an uncharacteristic form upon tradition.

B. Teutonic. The verse of Goths, Franks, Germans, and Eng. was primarily mytho-historical, but they were also given to charms, riddles (qq.v.), and convivial songs. The few genres seem to have been customarily composed in unmetrical lines of 4 stresses with alliteration. The Teutons lacked the lyricism of the Celts: Tacitus speaks kindly of their heroic songs, but Fortunatus complains of the dull thump of their conviviality. King Theodoric, reared at Constantinople, as king of the Goths and the Romans worked to transmit classical culture to the Teutonic races; he lived on in German poetry as the hero Dietrich.

The earliest vernacular documents are Eng. and do not precede Bede's description (Historia ecclesiastica . . . 4.22) of Caedmon, the earliest identifiable poet. According to Bede, he dreamed a hymn to the Maker of Heaven and Earth; thereafter, monastic doctors taught him Scripture, which he converted to verse for their transcription. Early verse was adapted transcription (Widsith, Beowulf), transference (Genesis), or imitation (Phoenix), of great poetic power. After the outburst in the century following Caedmon, OE poetry declined; the later survivals draw nearer L. models. Only after the Norman conquerors and their language and poetry had been absorbed did a ME poetry emerge. Though fecund and, in Chaucer's verse, magnificent, and though provincial versifiers revived and for a time enlivened some elements of native tradition (Piers Plowman, Pearl, Gawain), this late med. period depended upon France and, later, Italy.

The early Eng. missionaries on the continent transmitted Caedmon's art, and during the 9th c. German poets followed the methods of their Eng. relatives. The Hildebrandslied survives incompletely in a monastic (Fulda) codex as the only transcription of native song; but Otfrid's Gospel Book, the Muspilla, and the Heliand show how Caedmon's tradition was transplanted. Late in the century the Ludwigslied followed the trend of L. secular panegyric. Verse gave way to prose until the century after A.D. 1175. That glorious period under the Hohenstaufen emperors is marked by the lyrics of the Minnesinger (q.v.), with Walther von der Vogelweide at the head, the beast epic Reinhart Fuchs, the courtly tales of Hartmann von der Aue and Gottfried von Strassburg, the psychological and symbolical Parzival of Wolfram von Eschenbach, and the epic Nibelungenlied. Almost certainly, noble patronage and the exhilaration of crusade and discovery fertilized this bloom, which quickly withered. The 14th and 15th c., dominated by Meistersinger (q.v.), are crabbed in comparison.

C. Scandinavian. Though it acquired a life of its own, Scandinavian may be regarded as a branch of Teutonic. The lyrics are largely preserved in the Icelandic collections formed in the 13th c. by Snorri Sturluson and his nephews, but also as incorporated in sagas. These are a rich and independent form, though in some debt to the Ir. Unversified, designed for recitation with appropriate formal conventions of diction and phraseology, they more resemble poetry than eloquence. Their clear-eyed simplicity and accuracy of observation add force and conviction to heroic tales strongly historical. Composed by the governing class, they were written down after Christianization in the 11th c., apparently without notable change in form. From the 13th c., many poets went to the continent for education, and their works became romanticized. But the borrowing was not reciprocal, and only in the 19th c. when antiquarians revived the poetry did it measurably affect the Western stream.

D. Romance. The earliest (ca. 880) verses in romance vernacular are a paraliturgical exaltation of an early virgin martyr Eulalie in unevenly decasyllabic assonanced lines. That same codex contains both a L. Eulalia with lines borrowed from Prudentius and also the Ludwigslied; this suggests that monks supplied matter and form and Teutons supplied incentive for vernacular composition. A line through Eulalie and Alexis (11th c.) to the Chanson de Roland (12th c.) indicates the secularization of liturgical form in Fr. épopées, and Bédier and followers have, somewhat overzealously, described how the content accrued around shrines. The approximately 80 chansons, nearly all in decasyllabic assonanced verses, were recited, chanted, and possibly mimed at fairs, markets, camps. The Poema del Cid (12th c.), of similar genre, inaugurates Sp. poetry. Heroic in the 12th c., the chansons declined later to sheer buffoonery.

A parallel form of narrative was the courtly tale, which seems to have been secular edification growing out of scholastic verse, of which Waltharius is a prototype. Consolidation of feudality in castles and manors, burgeoning of schools, spread of literacy to the counties, induced poetry for a noble class almost as cloistered as the monks. For manorial festivals, clerks composed recitations in roman, commonly in octosyllabic rhymed couplets. The content was described by Bodel, one such trouvère (q.v.), as matter of Rome, France, or Britain; that is, tales drawn from scholastic classics about Troy, Alexander, Caesar, or tales of Charlemagne and his peers, or Celtic tales of Arthur and others. Centered in northern France, these romances spread in all directions, to become poetic models for diverse nations. As might be expected, the profanity, secularity, and virtual anarchical exaltation of the individual man on horseback and the dames with castellar pallor contrast with the often patriotic and religious fervor of the early chansons, though the genres overlap. Emphasis upon the tale, which now attracted an avid audience, resulted in ransacking all sources; the crusades, not only in Palestine but throughout eastern Europe, Byzantium, and Muslim Spain and Africa, were a fertile supply.

The first extant romance lyrics were composed by Duke William IX of Aquitaine (d. 1127), and the 12th c. witnessed an outpouring of lyrics in langue d'oc. Comparative peace and isolation in the 11th and 12th c. bred, as it were, a group of wealthy prisoners, and their verse, like prison literature, emphasized forms, enigmas, ambiguities, acuity, and surprise, with restricted content. New stanzaic structure for each song, within the restrictions of rhyme and rhythm, became prerequisite. The subjects were salus, venus, virtus ("safety, love, virtue"; cf. Dante, De vulgari eloquentia 2.2.70). The fruits of this cultivation ripened elsewhere. As civil war and other Prov. disruptions interfered with the art at home, the poets stimulated others elsewhere, especially the Portuguese, the Eng., the trouvères, the Minnesinger, and the Italians. The It. lyric began at the Sicilian court of Frederick II, but soon burst out in the north, eventuating in the dolce stil nuovo (q.v.) of Guido Guinicelli and then Dante and his contemporaries—a spiritualizing and, in some ways, platonizing of an earthbound tradition. Dante's Vita Nuova and his critical De vulgari eloquentia demonstrate that vernacular poetry was coming of age. The Commedia was indeed in many respects the voice of ten silent centuries; for if there is a middle age, that poem is at once its representation and supreme achievement. Through long vicissitude Italy had lost but never forgotten its Roman heritage; the new bourgeoisie of Tuscany and Lombardy held the pass from the cultivated barbarism of the north to Rome and even India. Dante, with transalpine scholasticism and cisalpine catholicity, bound in one volume the scattered leaves of the med. world. His two great Tuscan successors, Petrarch and Boccaccio, in their quite different ways catching Dante's high conception of the poet's function, returned to earth his exalted vision. Petrarch, primarily a rhetorician, but a priest of poetry, revived antiquity in receiving the laurel; his L. epic Africa was archeology, but his Canzoniere, replete with feeling and perception, imposed a stamp, not always felicitous, upon modern verse. Boccaccio, father of It. prose but meriting attention as font for Chaucer and many another, composed as his own epitaph, studium fuit alma poesis ("My study was nourishing poetry"). Medieval poetry had moved on from the days when poeta was an opprobrious word. See also EPIC, LYRIC, MEDIEVAL ROMANCE, etc. and the various national poetry articles.

ANTHOLOGIES: All major collections of med. texts are limited to a single language, nation, or genre. For initial guidance, consult F. Baldensperger and W. P. Friederich, Bibliog. of Comparative Lit. (1950); K. Strecker, Introd. to Med. Latin, ed. and tr. R. B. Palmer (1957); R. Bossuat, Manuel bibliographique de la litt. fr. du moyen âge (1951) and supplements; CBEL; W. Bonser, An Anglo-Saxon and Celtic Bibliog. (2 v., 1957); W. Stammer and K. Langosch, Die deutsche Lit. des Mittelalters: Verfasserlexikon (5 v., 1931-55). Standard collections containing the bulk of Latin verse: Patrologiae cursus completus [ser. Latina], ed. J. P. Migne (221 v., 1844-64); Monumenta Germaniae historica: Auctores antiquissimi (15 v., 1877-1919), Poetae Latini medii aevi (5 v., 1881-1939), Scriptores (32 v., 1826-1934); Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, "Rolls Series" (99 titles in 254 v., 1887-96) esp. The Anglo-Latin Satirical Poets, ed. T. Wright (2 v., 1872). Convenient anthol. in tr.: Med. Lit. in Tr., ed. C. W. Jones (1950); Med. Romances, ed. R. S. and L. H. Loomis (1958); Lyrics of the MA, ed. H. Creekmore (1959); Med. Epics, tr. W. Alfred et al. (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Hist. littéraire de la France . . . (38 v., 1865-[1949]; reaches beyond Fr. lit.; use indexes); E. K. Chambers, The Med. Stage (2 v., 1903); M. Manitius, Gesch. der lateinischen Lit. des MA (3 v., 1911-31; standard ref., by authors, through 12th c.); J. Bédier, Les Légendes épiques (3d ed., 4 v., 1926-29; standard, though theories discounted); K. Young, Drama of the Med. Church (2 v., 1933; with L. texts); Jeanroy; J. de Ghellinck, Litt. latine au m.a. (2 v., 1939) and L'Essor de la litt. lat. au xii^e s. (2d ed., 1955); R. R. Bezzola, Les Origines et la formation de la litt. courtoise en occident (3 v., 1944-63); G. Graf, Gesch. der christl. arabischen Lit. (5 v., 1944-53); Oxford Hist. of Eng. Lit. (v. 1 to appear; v. 2, in 2 pts., 1947); G. Lote, Le Vers français (3 v., 1949-55); Curtius (see esp. listing of his monographs, p. 600); Auerbach (pp. 50-231 on med. "realism"), and, idem., Literatursprache und Publikum in der lat. Spätantike und im MA (1958); F. J. E. Raby, Christian L. Poetry (2d ed., 1953) and Secular L. Poetry (2d ed., 2 v., 1957; standard surveys of med. L. lyric); H. A. W. de Boor, Gesch. der deutschen Lit., v. 1, 2, 5 (1955-62); Le Origini, ed. A. Viscardi and others (1956); F. Artz, Mind of the M.A. (3d ed., 1958; survey and bibliog.); D. Norberg, Introd. à l'étude de la versification lat. med. (1958); W. T. H. Jackson, The Lit. of the MA (1960; useful bibliog.); O. H. Green, Spain and the Western Tradition, I (1963). c.w.j.

MEDIEVAL ROMANCE. The meaning of the term "r." is obscured by the fact that both in medieval and modern times it has been used so loosely. In France, where it originated, it was applied at first to vernacular Fr. (versus L.) literature. Later it came to refer to imaginative works in verse whose subject matter was felt to be fictional or nonhistorical. By the 13th c., however, this distinction was becoming blurred. Any tale of adventure, whatever the origin of its matter, could be a r., and the adventure could be chivalric or merely amorous. Furthermore, r. soon began to be written in prose. Most modern critics distinguish r. from narrative poems treating national themes such as the Volksepos in Germany, the chanson de geste in France, and the national epic in Spain, even though the treatment of these subjects in the later Middle Ages can hardly be distinguished from that of r. There are several important r. cycles, such as those of Arthur and Alexander, which are associated more by a common background than the presence of a particular character.

The cycles are usually divided by scholars according to their subject matter: (1) "The Matter of Britain" (subdivided into "Arthurian Matter"—r. derived from Breton lays—and "English Matter," e.g., King Horn). (2) "The Matter of Rome" (stories of Alexander, of the Trojan war and its heroes, of Thebes, and of the Orient). (3) "The Matter of France" (titles of Charlemagne and his knights).

In general, r. is distinguished from the older chanson de geste (q.v.) and epic forms by its less heroic tone, its greater sophistication, its fondness for the fantastic, its more superficial characterization, (often) looser structure, and unity of action. The sources of r. are legion, and there is controversy over which is primary. According to one influential school (e.g., W. P. Ker), the form is the result of the sentimentalization of the earlier heroic materials which occurred when they were combined with such typically high medieval ideals as chivalry and courtly love (q.v.). Others stress classical sources and/or such late classical r. as Daphnis and Chloe by Longus and the Aethiopica (3d c. ?) of Heliodorus. Arthurian r. has received particularly full treatment. The theory of Celtic origins has been most vigorously propounded by Roger Sherman Loomis. An opposing school of thought, best represented in America by Urban T. Holmes, Jr., argues with equal vehemence that Chrétien de Troyes must be regarded as the inventor of Arthurian r. Other theories have also been advanced, but an early settlement of the controversy seems unlikely.

Although it is not confined to r., the courtly background is virtually indispensable to them. It is not a realistic background of contemporary courts but an ideal of chivalry, with stress on mercy to an opponent, good manners, and artistic sensitivity as well as the virtues of bravery, loyalty, and preservation of honor. The milieu of r. is tournaments, adventures, and particularly love. The winning of a lady is an essential part of all early r., and it is achieved by "love service," that is by worship, formal courtship, and unremitting attention to her wishes. In its highest form this love ennobles a man and makes him capable of deeds beyond his normal powers. A man truly in love lives a full life, both for his lady and for adventure. Such love may be between man and wife, as it is, after trials, between Erec and Enide, Yvain and Laudine, Parzival and Condwiramurs. It may be adulterous, as between Lancelot and Guinevere and Tristan and Isolde. Married love holds together society, adulterous love destroys it. In both the power of love is predominant over everything else. Later r., although they often paid lip service to the power of love, tended to regard it as merely one more adventure.

Although Arthurian r. are by far the most famous and influential, the earliest extant r.

do not belong to this cycle. They are r. of antiquity, rather misleadingly called the "Matter of Rome." An anonymous Roman d'Enée was written about 1150. Virgil's Aeneid was its source but its tone is emphatically medieval. The work becomes a love adventure with destructive love (Dido) spurned and true love (Lavinia) finally triumphant. The characters behave like medieval knights. A reworking by the German Heinrich von Veldeke (Eneide, ca. 1180) retains these characteristics. The greatest of Troy r., the Roman de Troie of Benoît de Ste. Maure (ca. 1165), tells the full story of the Trojan War, based on the L. account by "Dares Phrygius." Again love interests predominate, particularly that of Achilles and Polyxena and—probably Benoît's own invention—of Troilus and Cressida. Here the code of chivalry is applied fully to the warriors of Troy.

Although not originated by him, Arthurian r. is closely associated with Chrétien de Troyes. Chrétien's works are the earliest and greatest of the r. in Fr. Nothing is known of the author except that he was associated with the court of Marie de Champagne. He may have been a cleric. His r. appeared in the order Erec et Enide, Lancelot or the Knight of the Cart, Yvain, and Perceval or Li Contes del graal. Cligès, written after Erec, is an Eastern r. with Arthurian elements. Common to all these is the acknowledged superiority of Arthur's court as a center of civilized behavior, a high standard of manners, courage, and love of service, of which Gawain is the perfect type and Sir Kay the antitype. The world outside is full of uncouth creatures and is fit only for adventure. Erec and Yvain handle two facets of the same problem, the maintenance of equilibrium between love and adventure. In both cases married love is fulfillment and true adventure is possible only in the service of love. Lancelot shows this love carried to absurdity, for the lover, a brave knight, is made to obey every whim, however foolish, of his lady. Chrétien did not finish the work, and it is hard to deny that it is ironical. Perceval was clearly intended to show a knightly service higher than that of Arthur's court, for the foolishly simple Perceval is destined for the service of the Grail, which is definitely a religious symbol however mysterious it may be otherwise. The parallel adventures of the perfect secular knight Gawain again express the theme of the higher destiny. Chrétien did not finish the work but Wolfram von Eschenbach about 1210 used his work and other material as a source for Parzival. Here the Grail, a precious stone, becomes the gift of Paradise, the center of a band of religious knights whose king must be above the love-adventure morality of Arthur's courts. Parzival's pilgrimage takes him through innocence, error, pride, despair, and repentance, to humility. It is the way of the Christian man but not of any Christian man, for Parzival is a chosen king, an Arthurian warrior on his father's side, a grail warrior on his mother's. In Parzival r. reaches its highest spiritual manifestation while maintaining the essential characteristics of the type—adventure, love, and ideal background of chivalry.

If Parzival is the noblest romance, Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan and Isolte (ca. 1210) is the most polished and in some ways the most intellectually satisfying. Gottfried used the fine courtly r. of Thomas of Britain (ca. 1180) as a source but his hero is in fact more a minstrel and artist than a knight. The love episodes are courtly only on the surface, for Gottfried shows that courtly love is empty. His lovers seek a deeper, more spiritual, less attainable love which destroys both them and society.

With few exceptions the history of the r. in the 13th and 14th c. is one of decline. The chief characteristic is loss of form and purpose. The Alexander r., for example, the earliest of which date from ca. 1120, were capable of indefinite expansion by increase of incident; and the prose versions of Arthurian r. become highly involved adventure stories in which characters appear and disappear. New and voluminous r. were written about minor Arthurian knights and on persons hitherto hardly known. Two exceptions stand out. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight by an anonymous writer of the Eng. Midlands is a superb study of the moral problem of courage. Gawain undertakes a test of courage which he feels is his duty as the model Arthurian knight. He survives a planned assault on his virtue by a lady in the castle where he is staying. Yet he cannot resist the temptation of accepting a charm against wounds, even though it is dishonorable for him to do so. Sir Thomas Malory's misnamed Morte d'Arthur is best known in the form in which Caxton rearranged it. It is a final accounting of the Arthurian cycle, with a strong feeling for the fate which the sin of adultery brought to the ideal world of chivalry.

The traditions of r. lingered on, though often in distorted and even parodied form, to the Renaissance. Ariosto's Orlando furioso, the Teuerdank of Maximilian I, Amadis de Gaule all show the conventions of chivalry, and the humor of Don Quixote, as well as its tragedy, depends on a recognition of r. conventions.

COLLECTIONS: ME Metrical Romances, ed. W. H. French and C. B. Hale (1930); Medieval Romances, ed. R. S. and L. H. Loomis (1957).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: W. P. Ker, Epic

and R. (1897); W. Golther, Tristan und Isolde in der Dichtung des Mittelalters und der neuen Zeit (1907); G. Schoepperle, Tristan and Isolte (2 v., 1913); M. Wilmette, De l'origine du roman en France (1923); E. K. Chambers, Arthur of Britain (1927); R. S. Loomis, Celtic Myth and Arthurian R. (1927) and Arthurian Tradition and Chrétien de Troyes (1949); C. B. Lewis, Classical Mythology and Arthurian R. (1932); R. R. Bezzola, Les Origines et la formation de la litt. courtoise, 500–1100 (2 v., 1944–60); U. T. Holmes, Jr., A New Interpretation of Chrétien's Conte del Graal (1948); E. Neumann, "Der Streit um 'das ritterliche Tugendsystem,'" Festschrift für Karl Helm (1951); G. Cary, The Medieval Alexander (1956); J. Frappier, Chrétien de Troyes (1957); Arthurian Lit. in the Middle Ages, ed. R. S. Loomis (1959); L. A. Hibbard, Medieval R. in England (rev. ed., 1961); M. J. C. Reid, The Arthurian Legend: A Comparison of Treatment in Medieval and Modern Lit. (1961); R. S. Loomis, The Development of Arthurian R. (1963) and The Grail (1963). W.T.H.J.

MEIOSIS (Gr. "lessening"). A figure employing ironic understatement, usually to convey the impression that a thing is less in size, or importance, than it really is; generally synonymous with litotes (q.v.), though sometimes considered more generic in application. Quintilian discusses m. as an abuse or fault of language which characterizes obscure style rather than one lacking ornament, but he indicates that deliberately employed m. may be called a figure, and promises to discuss it later, though he neglects to do so (Institutes of Oratory 8.6.51). Puttenham distinguishes m. more particularly: "If you diminish and abase a thing by way of spight . . . , such speech is by the figure Meiosis or the disabler" (The Arte of Eng. Poesie). "Long for me the rick will wait, / And long will wait the fold, / And long will stand the empty plate, / And dinner will be cold" (A. E. Housman, A Shropshire Lad 8.21–24). A singularly persuasive literary device which may dominate an entire poem, as Auden's Musée des Beaux Arts or The Unknown Citizen. M. may also occur with startling simplicity as part of a longer narrative; e.g., Dante's famous "quel giorno più non vi leggemmo avante" (We read no more that day) from the Paolo and Francesca episode (La Divina Commedia: Inferno 5), or the concluding lines of Wordsworth's Michael. Note also Shakespeare's later tragedies, especially Lear, wherein simplicity and understatement often mark the most dramatic moments. R.O.E.

MEISTERSINGER. German burgher poets of the 14th, 15th, and 16th c. The heirs of the earlier Minnesinger (q.v.), they traced their ancestry traditionally to twelve "Meister," including such figures as Frauenlob, Walther von der Vogelweide, and Wolfram von Eschenbach, but in practice they generally replaced the erotic themes of the earlier poets with religious and didactic material.

The M. were characterized by their organization into guilds and by the rigidly formalistic nature of their productions. Some scholars believe the guilds originated in groups of laymen organized by the church to sing at public occasions. Whatever their origins, the M. had a remarkable fondness for rules and categories. Before becoming a Meister, an aspirant was obliged to work his way up through the grades of Schüler (pupil), Schulfreund (school-friend), Singer, and Dichter (poet). Even when the highest rank was reached, the Meister found his material and technique severely restricted. At the Schulsingen, or formal meetings, he could treat only religious subjects; at the Zechsingen, or informal meetings, frequently held in taverns, a wider range of material was permissible. In technique, the M. were restricted to certain set Töne, or patterns of tune and meter; the metrics were determined by syllabic number and often displayed great intricacy. In fitting words to the Töne, the M. followed the Tabulatur, an extensive and pedantic code of rules.

Famous M. include Hans Folz (d. ca. 1515), who successfully established the right of the Nuremberg Meister to introduce new melodies as well as new metrical patterns, and Hans Sachs, used by Wagner as the hero of his opera, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, a work which affords in general an accurate picture, though Wagner took liberties in presenting the art of the Meister as being subject to public appreciation and approval. He also idealized their performances to some extent. A very considerable body of scholarship (see B. Nagel, Der Meistersang, 1962) has maintained that the Meistergesang developed from the didactic poems of the so-called Spruchdichter of the 13th and 14th c.

The M. flourished for the most part in the Rhineland and in southern Germany; there were some individual Meister in the north, but the characteristic guild organization seems not to have existed there.

COLLECTIONS: Die Meisterlieder der Kolmarer Handschrift, ed. K. Bartsch (1862); Die Singweisen der Kolmarer Handschrift, ed. P. Runge (1896); H. Folz, Meisterlieder, ed. A. L. Mayer (1908).—HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Taylor and F. H. Ellis, A Bibliog. of Meistergesang (1936); C. Mey, Der Meisterges. in Gesch. und Kunst (1901); A. Taylor, Lit. Hist. of Meisterges. (1937); C. H. Bell, Georg Hager, a M. of Nürnberg (1552-1634) (4 v., 1947), The Meistersingerschule at Memmingen and Ils "Kurtze Entwerffung" (1952) and "A Glance into the Workshop of Meisterges.," PMLA, 68 (1953); B. Nagel, Der deutsche Meistersang (1952); E. Geiger, Der Meisterges. des Hans Sachs (1956). F.J.W.; A.P.

MEIURUS or myurus (Gr. "tapering," "mouse-tailed"). A hexameter verse in which the first syllable of the last foot is short instead of long. The classic example is: "Troes d' errhigesan, hopos idon aiolon ðphin" (Iliad 12.208), translated by Terentianus Maurus as: "attoniti Troes viso serpente pavitant," where in both cases the penultimate syllable in the line is naturally short instead of long. M. was recognized by the ancients as a special verse and was used frequently. It is also called teliambos.—T. F. Higham, Gr. Poetry and Life (1936); Koster; Kolář. P.S.C.

MELIC POETRY (Gr. "connected with music," "lyric"). Poetry sung or sung and danced. In the classical period the Greeks applied the name to all forms of lyric poetry in which music played a very important part. However, it did not include elegiac, iambic, and epic poetry because in these genres the musical accompaniment was not particularly significant. M. poetry was chiefly developed by the Aeolians and the Dorians and was written in a great number of meters. Its most brilliant period was between the 7th and the 5th c. B.C. It was divided into two classes, monodic or solo lyric and choral lyric. The monodic lyric was sung by a single voice and expressed the emotions and feelings of one individual. Its stanzas, usually made up of 4-5 lines, were repeated without interruption. Its chief representatives were Sappho, Alcaeus, and Anacreon. The choral lyric expressed the emotions of the group and was sung by a chorus. Its strophes were arranged in triads (strophe, antistrophe, epode) repeated several times. It was chiefly written by Alcman, Stesichorus, Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchylides. The main subdivisions of m. poetry as given by the Alexandrian scholars were: hymns, paeans, dithyrambs, epinicia, scolia, epithalamia, and parthenaia. In Alexandrian and subsequent times this type of poetry is referred to as lyric.—Smyth; Bowra; J. M. Edmonds, Lyra Graeca (3 v., 1952). P.S.C.

MESODE. In Gr. drama, a portion of a choral ode which occurs between a strophe and its antistrophe. A m. has no antistrophe. R.A.H.

MESOSTICH. See ACROSTIC.

MESUR TRI-THRAWIAD. A Welsh meter consisting of dactylic half lines of 6, 6, 6, 5; 6, 6, 6, 3 syllables. It derives its name ("3-stroke meter") from the 3 stresses only of the last line, which serve to slow down the movement and thus provide a finished effect. Not one of the "24 strict-meters" of Welsh poetry, it became commonly practiced in the 17th c. in popular verse, reached high perfection in the 18th-c. pastoral poetry of the scholarly Edward Richard, and in the 20th c. it has been embellished with full cyghanedd (q.v.), and very effectively used, particularly by Cynan in a poem set in the Aegean islands. It is a meter of great smoothness capable of lush effects, but also highly suitable for poetry of a reflective quality.—Morris-Jones; Parry.

D.M.L.

METAPHOR. A condensed verbal relation in which an idea, image, or symbol may, by the presence of one or more other ideas, images, or symbols, be enhanced in vividness, complexity, or breadth of implication.

The nature and definition of metaphorical terms and of the relations between them have both been matter for much speculation and disagreement. It is unlikely therefore that a more specific definition will at first be acceptable. The metaphorical relation has been variously described as comparison, contrast, analogy, similarity, juxtaposition, identity, tension, collision, fusion; and different views have been held regarding the nature, operation, and function of metaphor in poetry. In recent years the view has gathered weight that m. is the radical process in which the internal relationships peculiar to poetry are achieved; some critics maintaining that m. marks off the poetic mode of vision and utterance from the logical or discursive mode; others, usually on anthropological evidence, that all language is m. The traditional view, however, is that m. is a figure of speech, or a family of tropes, involving two (occasionally four) operative terms, and that it is used for adornment, liveliness, elucidation, or agreeable mystification.

The view of m. as tropical may be considered first. For this view Aristotle is taken to be the prime authority, particularly in his statement that "metaphor consists in giving the thing a name that belongs to something else; the transference being either from genus to species, or from species to genus, or from species to species, or on grounds of analogy" (Poetics 1457b). Some of these instances of "transference" have been classed by grammarians—not without ingenuity and precision—under such names as synecdoche, metonymy, catachresis, and so on—the terms not coinciding with Aristotle's division. And Aristotle's fourfold classification is found, without significant qualification, at the end of a neo-Aristotelean pronouncement in 1950 (see Crane, Critics and Criticism, 1952, pp. 80–82).

Grammarians since Cicero and Quintilian, again on Aristotle's authority (though based upon the Rhetoric where the discussion is limited to prose), have insisted upon the harmony or congruity of metaphorical elements, and upon a measure of visual clarity. Hence the traditional condemnation of "mixed metaphor" and the limiting of m. to a descriptive or expository function: so that, for example, George Campbell (Philosophy of Rhetoric, 1841) writes: "In metaphor the sole relation is resemblance." Grammarians, noticing some logical incongruity between the elements in m., have also suggested that m. not only transfers and alters meaning but may also pervert it; and this suspicion is preserved in the single definition offered by SOED: "Metaphor. The figure of speech in which a name or descriptive term is transferred to some object to which it is not properly applicable" (cf NED: "... some object different from, but analogous to, that to which it is properly applicable"). Philosophers particularly have indulged the suspicion—at least as old as Locke, though recently much encouraged by Wittgenstein—that m. is an "improper" connection of terms, regarding m. as a decorative but inexact alternative to what honest and forthright consideration would disclose in a literal form, and implying that the use of m. is a mark of carelessness, haste, or intellectual unchastity (cf Poetics 1458b 17 which, if read out of context, might seem to support this view).

Traditionally, m. has been represented as a trope of transference in which an unknown or imperfectly known is clarified, defined, described in terms of a known. This is exhibited as an overt or implied predication of the form (a) A is [like] B, or (b) A is as B—that is, A is [like X] as B [is like Y]. In this scheme a m. is explicated by translating it into a predicative form that will reveal the relation of resemblance. For example: (a) 1. "Love is a singing bird" = "Love is like a singing bird" or "Love makes you feel like (or, as though you were listening to) a singing bird"; 2. "the proud nostril-curve of a prow's line" = "a prow's line with the same curve as a proud man's nostril"; 3. "Her head . . . with its anchoring calm" = "Her head that, with its air of calm, makes you feel as secure (? and hopeful) as an anchor would in a ship"; 4. "a Harris-tweed cat" = "a cat that looks (smells, feels) as though it were made of Harris tweed"; (b) 5. "My love is . . . begotten by despair upon impossibility" = "My love is conceived as though its father were despair and its mother impossibility"; 6. "Hatred infects the mind" = "Hatred is like an infection in the mind"; 7. "Admiral earth breaks out his colours at the forepeak of the day" = "The earth discloses its colors in the morning with the same abrupt brilliance as the breaking-out of an admiral's colors (ensign) at the forepeak of his flagship."

All these examples happen to be "good" metaphors; the only objection would be to the method of exposition. Certainly there are "low-grade" metaphors, e.g., "Animal life always lives in the red," "He bull-dozed his way through all difficulties"; and the term "prosaic" m. might be used to mark these off from the "essential" m. that has preoccupied 20th-c. criticism, e.g., "the mill of the mind / Consuming its rag and bone." But such a distinction would turn less upon a definable difference in verbal events than upon the reader's (or writer's) attitude to m. in any particular passage. A m. becomes "dead" when the user forgets or does not know that a metaphorical relation was in the past implied or is still capable of being implied (e.g., "arrive" = late L. arribare, adripere, ad ripam [appelere, venire] = to call ashore, to come ashore or into harbour). The "prosaic" m. concentrates upon describing, clarifying, delineating, comparing—or is seen as doing so—and is—or is seen as—subject to the limitations of plausibility or of logical harmony. "Essential" m. deals in—or is seen as dealing in—a more complex, instantaneous, and even non-logical relation.

An unprejudiced examination of the examples given above suggests that although analysis by resemblance may be suitable for analysing resemblance, it is inadequate—even irrelevant—in most of these cases if we take into account not merely some notion of semantic equivalence but the actual sensation these metaphors induce. First, the apparently simple metaphors 1 and 4 have at least two or three simultaneous meanings; and this occurs not because of a variety of resemblances but because of a substantial though paradoxical coincidence of terms: each term preserves its distinctness, yet in the momentary coincidence—or identity (to use a term applied at least as early as 1930 by Bowra)—each term is changed. Second, examples 3 and 6 show that what appears to be a simple two-term relation can be a condensed four-term relation. Third, the function of the transitive verb in analogical m. (A is to X as B is to Y) is very important (with "hatred infects the mind" cf "hatred is [like] an infection in the mind" or "hatred works in the mind as infection works in the body"); to reduce or expand an analogical m. to predicative form destroys its vitality. These results may be tentatively consolidated. The radical form of m. is either A is B (a momentary or hypothetical identity being involved), or simply A-B (parataxis, the juxtaposition of two terms, e.g., "sphinx-woman" and 2, 3, 4 above). The analogical m. achieves strength and avoids a simple relation of resemblance by forming itself around a transitive verb (e.g., "bright chancicleer explodes the dawn," "the ship ploughs the waves").

Historically, however, the view of m. as primarily a figure for extending description, comparison, and exposition reflects literary usage rather than critical obtuseness. Rosamund Tuve, for example, has pointed to the 16th-c. emphasis, in handbooks and in practice, upon the delight roused by deft and sustained translatio, the exploration by metaphorical means of minute similarities within clearly defined fields of relationship (see Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery, 1947, pp. 121ff., 223–24). Guided by a clear notion of the didactic and explicatory function they wished m. to serve, writers of that period saw no reason to extend or explore the outer reaches of m. And Milton's use of epic simile, as compared with the Homeric use, is a refined development of translatio in the direction of multiple logical resemblances (see SIMILE below). Although at practically all periods we find instances of m. serving important poetic functions outside the scope of the received grammatical definition, these were evidently not thought important enough to modify the definition. Even the extended range of m. used by, say, Shakespeare, Milton, and Donne happened not to be matched by any extension in analysis or theory. And if Johnson may be regarded as representative of his age, he looked back at least two centuries when he said: "As to metaphorical expression, that is a great excellence in style, when it is used with propriety, for it gives you two ideas for one."

In fact, Aristotle's doctrine of m., though fragmentary, was far more comprehensive than his successors had reason clearly to recognize. He had also said that "the greatest thing by far is to be a master of metaphor. It is the one thing that cannot be learnt from others; and it is also a sign of genius, since a good metaphor implies an intuitive perception of the similarity in dissimilars" (Poetics 1458b; cf Rhetoric 1405a); and that "from metaphor we can best get hold of something fresh [new]" (Rhetoric 1410b), that "Liveliness [penergy] is specially conveyed by metaphor" (Rhetoric 1412a), and that "of the four kinds of Metaphor the most taking is the proportional [4-term analogical] kind"—e.g., "The sun sheds its rays" (Rhetoric 1411a). He had not only implied a sharp distinction between the uses of m. in prose and in poetry, but had also emphasized the energetic character of m. by choosing examples, not in predicative form, but as formed around vigorous verbs. In showing the relation between riddle and m. he had in a sense anticipated the doctrine of paratactic m. But tradition, and many later critics, neglected these niceties.

Although discussion about m. during the last thirty years has been concentrated upon "essential" m., the discourse has often carried within itself relics of the grammarians' empire, unexpunged because unexamined. The grammarians' view of m., however, cannot be dismissed as altogether irrelevant; for the grammarian has a legitimate claim to pronounce upon the form and use of figures as far as these can be manipulated according to rhetorical technique. Nor can the "prosaic" m. be banished from poetry as "not a genuine m."; for the dividing line between "prosaic" and "essential" m. is never in general distinct, and what is a "prosaic" m. in isolation may become an "essential" m. by being put back into its context or by an appropriate adjustment of the reader's attention. Most grammarians and many literary critics have failed to notice that the matrix of a m.—the vital context, often considered over a wide range—is an indispensable component of "essential" m. Once precise control of the matrix is lost—and one's memory of the history of a word can be an important part of the matrix—the m. dies.

The publication within less than ten years of Grierson's edition of Donne, Hopkins' poems, Eliot's Waste Land, three volumes of Yeats's mature poetry, Pound's paraphrases of Fenollosa, and Joyce's Ulysses brought to attention poetic facts and relations that were not to be explained on the traditional view. The New Criticism, which first established itself less as a systematic order of criticism than as a method of explication with a strong pedagogical bias, was quite early overtaken by the clamorous but intermittent inquiry into m. and symbol which has dominated criticism in this century. If there are few modern examinations of m. on any scale of completeness, this is to be explained by a remark of Middleton Murry (1927): "The investigation of metaphor is curiously like the investigation of any of the primary data of consciousness: . . . Metaphor is as ultimate as speech itself, and speech as ultimate as thought. If we try to penetrate them beyond a certain point, we find ourselves questioning the very faculty and instrument with which we are trying to penetrate them" (in Countries of the Mind, 2d ser., 1931, p. 1).

Eliot's doctrine of the unity of sensibility in Donne may first have raised the question how widely disparate elements came to be unified in poetry; but it was the deliberate and powerful articulation of symbol and myth (sometimes private symbol and myth) by Yeats, Eliot, Pound, and Joyce that raised some even more awkward questions. Pound's doctrine—which he shared with the Fr. symbolistes—that m., like the Chinese ideogram, was a matter of abrupt juxtaposition, carried the question beyond grammatical limits and suggested a direct connection with Aristotle's mimesis. Certainly the implied extension of this principle of juxtaposition in Eliot's Waste Land, in Joyce's Ulysses, and in Pound's Cantos showed that large-scale rhythms could be secured within a whole work by the abrupt juxtaposition of blocks of disparate material and by swift unmodulated shifts of emphasis from one focus to another over a large or small scale. Nevertheless there is danger in allowing the term "metaphor" to become too inclusive. Some anthropological arguments, and even Empson's illuminating analysis of the metaphorical structure of drama, seem to move toward the conclusion that any juxtaposition whatsoever is m. The corollary would be that no combination of words is not-metaphorical: and a useful term and a fruitful distinction is thereby destroyed.

The view that the term m. could legitimately be extended was encouraged by the work of Max Müller (1862-65) and by a succession of anthropologists, linguists, and psychologists who have studied the genesis and history of language. These have produced conflicting and even misleading hypotheses, and by customarily neglecting the evidence of developed literature have provided results not always serviceable to literary criticism. But they have helped to confirm the conclusion, drawn with increasing insistence from literary evidence, that in m. we see that "most vital principle of language (and perhaps of all symbolism)" (Susanne K. Langer, Philosophy in a New Key, 1953 ed., p. 112; here discussing Philip Wegener), and that "The genesis of language is not to be sought in the prosaic, but in the poetic side of life" (Otto Jespersen, Language, 1933). Shelley incidentally had already noticed this in a luminous if isolated passage: "Language is vitally metaphorical; that is, it marks the before unapprehended relations of things and perpetuates their apprehension, until words, which represent them, become, through time, signs for portions or classes of thought instead of pictures of integral thoughts: and then, if no new poets should arise to create afresh the associations which have been thus disorganized, language will be dead to all the nobler purposes of human intercourse" (Defence of Poetry).

The link with a rhetorical past was not easily broken. Much effort—both before and since the 1920's—has been spent on contriving terms suitable for describing how m. works: with distinctions between "what was said" and "what was meant," between "literal" and "metaphorical" meaning, between "idea" and "image," "form" and "figure," and so on. But it is dangerous to assume a readily distinguishable external datum of literality, for the literal meaning in each case is determined within the context; and the way Richards' terms "tenor" and "vehicle" fluctuated, even in his own hands (1936), arises from his attempt to answer both the question "how does metaphor work?" and the much more profitable question "what happens in a metaphor?" Some answers to this second question turned up not through consistent analysis but in more or less isolated apperçus. T. E. Hulme's dictum that "the great aim [in poetry] is accurate, precise and definite description" (Speculations, 1924) obviously needed repudiating. Richards stated in 1925 that m. is "the supreme agent by which disparate and hitherto unconnected things are brought together in poetry for the sake of the effects upon attitude and impulse which spring from their collocation and from the combinations which the mind then establishes between them. There are few metaphors whose effect, if carefully examined, can be traced to the logical relations involved" (Principles of Literary Criticism, 1925, p. 240). C. Day Lewis' neat epigram has been influential: "We find poetic truth struck out by the collision rather than the collusion of images" (The Poetic Image, 1947, p. 72). Richards' Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936), though disappointing, emphasized the "organizing" activity in some kinds of m., pointed out that a word may be simultaneously "literal" and metaphorical, and introduced Coleridge into the discussion—a man who had already made at least a perceptive route-traverse of the country with the eye of a psychologist and linguist as well as of a poet and critic. John Crowe Ransom's introduction, from idealist philosophy, of the term "concrete universal" provided a useful name for an old and abiding paradox of poetry: that poetry evokes its universals not by generalizing or direct description but by an acute concentration upon the concrete particular, discovering directness in obliquity.

Max Black's analysis (Aristotelean Society, 1955) provides a useful summary and stopping place. He wished to assail the philosophical commandment "Thou shalt not commit metaphor" and in looking for a use of m. acceptable in philosophical discourse analysed previous accounts of m. into three "views": substitution, comparison, and interaction. The first two he dismissed (with qualifications), but found that the third, as represented chiefly by Richards (though again with some qualifications), offered "some important insight into the uses and limitations of metaphor." He starts with Richards' definition: "In the simplest formulation, when we use a metaphor we have two thoughts of different things active together and supported by a single word, or phrase, whose meaning is a resultant of their interaction" (Philosophy of Rhetoric, p. 93);

but rejects the word "interaction" in favor of the image of a filter. The metaphor-word—the focus—calls up a system of "associated commonplaces" which are in turn related with various aspects of the principal subject: e.g., "Man is a wolf." "The metaphor [in this case] selects, emphasizes, suppresses, and organizes features of the principal subject by implying statements about it that normally apply to the subsidiary subject." Although Black recognizes that the elements of m. are "systems of things" rather than "things," and insists that these metaphors are untranslatable and that the secondary implications of a m. can be extremely intricate, his illustrations—as one would expect of a philosopher—are stated in propositional form. The outcome then is actually a comparison-metaphor, though of a much more highly organized and finely controlled kind than the comparison-metaphor recognized by tradition. Richards had clearly intended to go beyond his point, as some of his uses of the terms "tenor" and "vehicle" show. He wanted to talk about the "total meaning" of m. as arising from the interaction of elements. He had quoted Coleridge with approval: "A symbol is characterized by the translucence of the special in the individual . . . It always partakes of the reality which it renders intelligible; and while it enunciates the whole, abides itself as a living part in that unity, of which it is the representative." He seems to have chosen the word interaction with care: it allowed him to think of the metaphorical elements as preserving their integrity, and to think of the "total meaning" as the outcome of the impact of elements rather than as a derivative by comparison, fusion, or combination. If he had written his book ten years later he might have said that "interaction" was not like chemical combination but like nuclear fission. Richards' view is not definitive, but it either represents or has stimulated much of the more recent discussion. W. B. Stanford's definition, quoted with approval by W. K. Wimsatt in a review of Martin Foss, includes all the aspects Richards seems to have envisaged: "Metaphor is the process and result of using a term (X) normally signifying an object or concept (A) in such a context that it must refer to another object or concept (B) which is distinct enough in characteristics from A to ensure that in the composite idea formed by the synthesis of the concepts A and B and now symbolized in the word X, the factors A and B retain their conceptual independence even while they merge in the unity symbolized by X" (Greek Metaphor, 1936, p. 101).

An important adjunct to these views—and it is contained within the word "process"—was the New Critics' insistence upon tension, paradox, ambiguity, and irony as principles of poetic energy. As a means of reconciling these intimations of dualism, such words as "unification," "identity," and "fusion" have tended to come into use to express the complete metaphorical relation. Yet these images—as far as they are images of oneness—do not satisfactorily describe the sensations, emotional and semantic, induced by even such a simple transposing m. as "He has burnt his boats at both ends"; nor do they give an appropriate indication of what happens in the last two stanzas of Sweeney among the Nightingales or in Yeats's The Second Coming. It is conceivable that, if energy involves "tension" or bipolarity, m. like poetic experience exhibits an incorrigible dualism—or duplicity; and that although logical analysis can exhibit the vertiginous complexity of some metaphorical dualities, it can neither interpret them satisfactorily nor reduce them to monism except by radical distortion. We may well be able to apprehend metaphorical relations without being able to translate them into logical or any other terms.

Ingenious analyses of m. have been conducted by reducing all m. to the predicative form "A is B" and tracing the nexus of logical relations involved in an identity of A and B; identity, not mere similarity, being postulated for the relation. An interesting—and infinite—series of identifications, and identifications of identifications, then emerges. Clearly, if A is B, then A is not not-B; and also, in some sense, B is A, and B is not not-A. But beyond this, A is also not-B and B is not-A; otherwise the statement "A is B" or "B is A" would be tautological ("A is A" and "B is B"). Thereby a complete set of contrary relations is established. This procedure is capable of much more intricate and illuminating results than the repellent algebraic formulation would suggest; but it tends to preclude the controlled consideration of affective metaphorical context, and perhaps only comes into its own in analyzing the relations between symbols, myths, or archetypes. It is certainly a good way of analyzing all the logical implications of a statement of the form "A is B" where identity of A and B is assumed; but it is unlikely to commend itself to those who regard m. as a nonlogical—even antilogical—mode of connection, and therefore as a relation that by definition is not expressed in the form "A is B."

In an area so beset with the brambles of conflicting doctrine, some single view must be attempted. As a general definition Stanford's account serves very well. Certain observations and suggestions may be added. (The additional remarks accord—in some ways at least—with Martin Foss's Symbol and Metaphor in Human Experience, but are not derived from that study.) (1) M. is not simply a problem of language. Though m. is seen in a highly developed form in poetry, and is the characteristic mode of energetic relation in poetry, it may also prove to be the radical mode in which we correlate all our knowledge and experience. (2) M. is a nonpredicative energy-system, different from and opposite to (or complementary to) the logical mode. The m. is to poetry what the proposition is to logic. (3) When poetic energy is low the m. gravitates toward predication and simile—toward the "prosaic" m. (4) M. can fall into a large number of different grammatical patterns. Grammatical construction does not identify "essential" m., and is only a rough guide even to "prosaic" m. The line of division between "essential" and "prosaic" occurs at about the level of simile (q.v.); but some passages in the simile-form achieve a genuine metaphorical relation, and some passages in the metaphor-form are submerged similes. Also the analogical m. can be either "prosaic" or "essential": cf. "The chairman ploughed his way through the agenda" and "The ship ploughs the waves." (5) What Richards calls "interaction" may be called confrontation. This would imply, on the analogy of human relationship, juxtaposition (parataxis) and interaction—even a desire to communicate, to enter into communion—without either the merging or unification of elements or the destruction of integral individuality. (6) Although the verb "to be" is a primary mark of metaphorical coincidence or identity, the "prosaic" m. is usually (a) one in which immediacy of confrontation is destroyed by the verb "to be," "to seem," etc. (even when omitted), the space being bridged by the logical processes of comparison, descriptive emendation, and substitution (e.g., "to barter in the bawdyhouse of fame / their birthright for a misbegotten song": the apparent m. "bawdyhouse of fame" = "fame is a bawdyhouse," and anyway the whole m. is out of control); "When the play ended, they resumed / Reality's topcoat": the apparent m. "Reality's topcoat" = "Reality is a topcoat." Again, "prosaic" m. is often (b) one in which the setting does not prepare and control confrontation. (7) Metaphorical process may operate over a very limited or a very wide range. The tendency of metaphorical energy to spread outward and to draw other elements inward may be called resonance. (This at the logical level is what tradition meant by "consistency," "congruity.") The resonance of a m. is a function both of the setting (which may be extensive) and of the nature of the elements brought into relation: for example, a m. which relates symbolic and mythical elements tends to be, but is not necessarily, more resonant than a m. which relates only elements which are dominantly visual or conceptual. It would be profitable to see how resonance is affected by various parts of speech (verb, adjective, noun, etc.) and by sound and rhythm. It would also be profitable to find out how there is metaphorical resonance in a phrase like Donne's "a bracelet of bright haire about the bone," and in passages where most of the elements are abstract terms and the syntactical relations apparently discursive (see for example Wordsworth, Immortality Ode 140-50, or Preface to The Excursion 62-71). (8) "Essential" m. cannot be translated without severe cognitive loss, and is inexhaustible to analysis. The only sure test is the actual relation in the individual instance, and the actual degree and scope of resonance.

The Works of Aristotle, ed. W. D. Ross, xi (Rhetoric, tr. W. Rhys Roberts; Poetics, tr. I. Bywater) (1924); M. Müller, Lectures on the Science of Language, 2 ser. (1862, 1865); H. Paul, Principles of the Hist. of Language (1888); A. Biese, Die Philosophie des Metaphorischen (1893); P. Wegener, Untersuchungen über die Grundfragen des Sprachlebens (1898?); J. G. Jennings, An Essay on M. in Poetry (1915); H. Werner, Die Ursprünge der Metapher (1919); I. A. Richards, Principles; Coleridge on Imagination (1934), The Philos. of Rhetoric (1936); J. M. Murry, "M." (1927) in Countries of the Mind, 2d ser. (1931); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (1928); H. Konrad, Etude sur la métaphore (1939, 2d ed., 1958); H. W. Fowler, A Dict. of Modern Eng. Usage (1940; art. "M." and "Simile & M."); Langer; M. Foss, Symbol and M. in Human Experience (1949); W. Empson, The Structure of Complex Words (1951); H. Kenner, The Poetry of Ezra Pound (1951); Crane, Critics; G. Whalley, Poetic Process (1953); P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1954) and M. and Reality (1962); M. Black, "M.," Proc. of the Aristotelian Society, n.s., 55 (1955); Frye; C. Brooke-Rose, A Grammar of M. (1958); M. and Symbol, ed. L. C. Knights and B. Cottle (1960); M. I. Baym, "The Present State of the Study of M.," BA, 35 (1961); C. M. Turbayne, The Myth of the M. (1962). c.w.

METAPHYSICAL POETRY. The poetry written by John Donne, George Herbert, Henry Vaughan, Andrew Marvell, and other 17th-c. Eng. poets, distinguished by ingenuity, intellectuality, and, sometimes, obscurity. By extension, any poetry which displays similar qualities. M.p. of the 17th c. is characterized by a marked dependence on irony and paradox (qq.v.) and by the use of the conceit (q.v.) as well as such figures as catachresis and oxymoron (qq.v.). In its earlier manifestations (e.g. the Songs and Sonets of John Donne), Eng. m.p. was further distinguished by revolutionary and highly original attitudes toward sexual love. Donne rejected not only Petrarchan rhetoric (see PETRARCHISM) but also the pose of abject worship of the mistress which the 16th-c. poets had inherited, via Petrarch, from the troubadours. A new kind of sexual realism, together with an interest in introspective psychological analysis, thus became an element in the metaphysical fashion.

Realism, introspection, and irony remained the dominant features of Eng. m.p., but the greatest of Donne's successors—Herbert, Crashaw, Vaughan—generally chose to embed these qualities in a religious rather than an amorous context. The great body of m.p., including much of Donne's own, is devotional, sometimes mystical. Although some authorities regard the term "m.p." as a misnomer, pointing out that its practitioners are seldom overtly concerned with questions of metaphysics or ontology, others have maintained that the distinctive quality of m.p., the occasion of its technique, is precisely that the subject—love, death, God, human frailty—is presented in the context of some metaphysical problem. Whatever its theme or subject matter, 17th-c. m.p. showed relatively little dependence on sensuous appeal. As the preceding comments on their technique suggest, the m. poets employed primarily a kind of imagery which requires the mediation of the intellect for full comprehension. In this respect m.p. differs from the 17th-c. baroque (q.v.) poetry with which it is often associated. There are, however, a few poets who, like Crashaw, manifest aspects of both fashions. The assumption, made by most earlier critics, that Eng. m.p. derives primarily from attempts to imitate Donne has been successfully challenged by modern scholarship, which has demonstrated not only the notable individuality of such poets as Herbert and Marvell but also the fact that many features we usually associate with the metaphysical style were actually present in much poetry written either shortly before or during the time when Donne wrote his Songs and Sonets, by such poets as Southwell, Fulke Greville, and William Alabaster. Furthermore, modern research has drawn our attention to many poets on the European Continent, predecessors or contemporaries of Donne, who wrote poems in a strikingly similar style. Such poets as La Ceppède in France, Huygens in Holland, and Quevedo in Spain seem certainly to deserve the name "metaphysical poets." If there can be said to be a "School of Donne" in England, it consists really of such minor amorous lyrists as Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Carew, and Suckling, not of the great devotional poets.

Poets and critics during the heyday of m.p. had almost no awareness of that kind of poetry as a separate stylistic phenomenon; most theorists of the age continued to describe poetry in terms of traditional Renaissance poetics (see BAROQUE POETICS). However, some It. and Sp. writers did offer the doctrine of "universal analogy" as a basis for conceit and far-fetched metaphor in general, and the term "strong lines" was used by Eng. writers to designate the intricate intellectual quality of Donne and many of his contemporaries. The term "m." was first suggested by John Dryden (Discourse of the Original and Progress of Satire, 1692), in a reference to Donne: "He affects the metaphysics not only in his satires, but in his amorous verses, where nature only should reign, and perplexes the minds of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy." It remained for Dr. Johnson to supply the first analysis of m. imagery as well as to establish the term "metaphysical" permanently in Eng. literary criticism. Johnson described the basis of m. imagery as a kind of discordia concors, through which "the most heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together," and criticized the school for its lack of naturalness. The rejection implied by both Dryden and Johnson leads to some consideration of the wavering reputation of the m. style. Dominant until the Restoration of 1660 and the associated triumph of neoclassicism, m.p. went into a period of eclipse throughout the 18th and 19th c. Although such poets as Coleridge and Browning admired Donne, he and his successors were generally regarded as frigid and pretentious purveyors of intentional obscurity. A great revival of interest in the m. poets coincided with the development of "modern" poetry in the period of the first World War. T. S. Eliot, for example, saw in those poets, as in the Jacobean dramatists, the quality of "unified sensibility," a capacity for "devouring all kinds of experience" which he contrasted with the singleness of tone of the romantics and Victorians.

Some critics of the 1920's and 1930's, influenced by Eliot, went perhaps too far in stressing the modernity of the m. group, but balance has been achieved in recent years through scholarly studies which have demonstrated the links between m.p. and the phenomena of its own age—such phenomena as scholastic philosophy, Renaissance logic and rhetoric, the new science of the 17th c., and the practice of formal religious meditation. Nevertheless, Eliot has been one of the most provocative writers on m.p. It is to him, largely, that we owe the expansion of the term's denotation from the historical to the generic. Eliot implies three great epochs in which m.p. has flourished: 13th- and 14th-c. Italy, from Guido Guinicelli to Dante; 17th-c. England, in the lyric poetry of Donne and his "school" and in the drama of Shakespeare and his successors; France in the later 19th c., in the poetry of Baudelaire and his symbolist progeny. The last grouping is susceptible to a further extension: through Eliot, initially a follower of Laforgue and Corbière, and through Yeats, initially influenced by Mallarmé, 20th-c. Eng. and Am. poetry derives a decidedly m. cast which continues to characterize the work of the younger poets at mid-century.

If Eliot's perception is valid, one may be justified in seeking common historical causes for the periodic emergence of the m. fashion. Perhaps our own century, under the disturbing impact of scientific relativity, social fragmentation, and political chaos, stands in an intrinsic kinship both to the 17th c., when, in Donne's phrase, "new philosophy calls all in doubt," and to the 14th c., in which the medieval synthesis began to break up. Certainly the m. style, in its introspective and realistic orientation as in its wide-ranging metaphor and daring rhetoric, aims at creating a precarious unity from the scattered materials of an existence which has grown puzzling and unfocused. The m. poet, whether Donne, Baudelaire, Rilke, or Eliot, is perhaps compelled to "unify his sensibility" because he can find no unity in his world.

S. Johnson, "Life of Cowley," in Lives of the Eng. Poets (1781); H.J.C. Grierson, Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems (1921); G. Williamson, The Donne Tradition (1930); J. Smith, "On M.P.," Scrutiny, 2 (1933); J. Bennett, Four M. Poets (1934); J. B. Leishman, The M. Poets (1934); H. C. White, The M. Poets (1936); R. Tuve, Elizabethan and M. Imagery (1947); C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947); T. S. Eliot, "The M. Poets" and "Andrew Marvell" in Selected Essays (1950); L. Unger, Donne's Poetry and Modern Crit. (1950); M. Nicolson, The Breaking of the Circle (1950, rev. ed., 1961); O. de Mourgues, M., Baroque and Précieux Poetry (1953); L. L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954); J. E. Duncan, The Revival of M.P. (1959); A. Alvarez, The School of Donne (1961); L. Nelson, Baroque Lyric Poetry (1961); F. J. Warnke, European M.P. (1961). See also R. Ellrodt, L'Inspiration personnelle et l'esprit du temps chez les poètes métaphysiques anglais (3 v., 1960).

F.J.W.

METER. More or less regular poetic rhythm; the measurable rhythmical patterns manifested in verse; or the "ideal" patterns which poetic rhythms approximate. If "m." is regarded as the ideal rhythmical pattern, then "rhythm" becomes "m." the closer it approaches regularity and predictability. The impulse toward metrical organization seems to be a part of the larger human impulses toward order: m. is what results when the rhythmical movements of colloquial speech are heightened, organized, and regulated so that pattern emerges from the relative phonetic haphazard of ordinary utterance. M. is thus one of the fundamental and most subtle techniques of order available to the poet, like rhyme, line division, stanza form, and over-all structure.

Most theorists agree that poetic m., even when most primitive, produces a pleasant effect, but there is widespread disagreement among critics and scholars over the reason for the universal popularity of metered compositions. According to some theorists (mostly rationalists), m. is pleasant because it focuses attention and refines awareness; according to others (mostly romanticists), on the contrary, it is pleasant because it produces a lulling, drugging, or hypnotic effect. One theory holds that, since the beat in most accentual poetries is slightly faster than the normal heart-beat, the apprehension of poetic m. produces a physically exhilarating effect on hearer or reader: his heart-beat, the theory contends, actually speeds up to "match" the slightly faster poetic rhythm. The pleasure universally resulting from foot-tapping and musical time-beating seems to suggest that the pleasures of m. are definitely physical and that they are as intimately connected with the rhythmic quality of man's total experience as are the similar alternating and recurring phenomena of breathing, walking, and love-making. Perhaps one could untangle some of the disagreements about the pleasures of m. by suggesting that the quality of the apprehender will determine the nature of the pleasure in each case: children and the unsophisticated receive from m. primarily physical pleasure which manifests itself in foot- or finger-tapping, head-nodding, and the like; on the other hand, the more experienced and sensitive reader will probably derive most of his metrical pleasure from the higher level of rhetorical attention which m. enforces ("Meter keeps the mind on the stretch," one critic has observed), or from an intellectual delight in witnessing order and containment brought out of chaos and flux. Medieval theories of m., in fact, frequently assume that the pleasure man takes in m. is an image of the pleasure he takes in the observation of the principle of order in a universe which is itself will and order incarnate.

"M." derives from the Gr. term for "measure," and one way to investigate various meters or metrical systems is to examine what is being measured in each. On this basis, four metrical systems are generally—if not quite adequately—discriminated: the syllabic, the accentual, the accentual-syllabic, and the quantitative.

Syllabic prosody measures only the number of syllables per line: hence the term "numbers," frequently used as a synonym for "versification" by syllabic metrical theorists. In syllabic m. stress or accent is usually only a device of embellishment and not a criterion of the basic metrical "skeleton" of the line. Poetry in the Romance languages and in Japanese is fundamentally syllabic in construction. Some Eng. poetry after the Restoration became markedly syllabic (perhaps as a result of Fr. influence) until about 1740, but since that time syllabism has seldom been revived except as an experimental novelty: Robert Bridges, Dylan Thomas, W. H. Auden, and Marianne Moore are some of the recent poets who have experimented with syllabism. It would probably be agreed that syllabism is not a natural m. in a Germanic language so accentual as Eng., although interesting (if perhaps hyper-subtle) effects can result from it (here and below, all examples are of poetry in Eng. for purposes of comparison):

Mid the squander'd colour
idling as I lay Reading the Odyssey
in my rock garden
I espied the cluster'd
tufts of Cheddar pinks Burgeoning with promise of their scented bloom . . .

(R. Bridges, Cheddar Pinks [6- and 5-syllable lines alternating; stress used as embellishment])

One clear disadvantage of syllabic construction is that the reader, to sense the form of the poem, must halt unnaturally at line endings: the reader naturally measures by stresses, not by number of syllables, and he finds it almost impossible to grasp the metrical shape of the poem without an elaborately unnatural pause at the end of each line.

In accentual m., on the other hand, only the accents are measured; syllables may vary in number, it being assumed that 3 or 4 syllables can be uttered in the same time as 1 or 2. Most Germanic poetries, including OE, are based on accentual meter, as are most Eng. poems in which the number of syllables varies (through trisyllabic substitution, for example) from line to line:

Why should not old men be mad?
Some have known a likely lad
That had a sound fly-fisher's wrist
Turn to a drunken journalist;
A girl that knew all Dante once Live to bear children to a dunce;
A Helen of social welfare dream,
Climb on a wagonette to scream.

(W. B. Yeats, Why Should not Old Men be Mad? [4 stresses per line, with number of syllables varying from 7 to 9])

I sit in one of the dives
 On Fifty-Second Street
 Uncertain and afraid
 As the clever hopes expire
 Of a low dishonest decade:
 Waves of anger and fear
 Circulate over the bright
 And darkened lands of the earth
 Obsessing our private lives.

(W. H. Auden, September 1, 1939 [3 stresses per line, with number of syllables varying from 6 to 8])

Sometimes accentual meters like the two above are called "loose iambic."

The third metrical system, the accentual-syllabic, represents really a tightening of the accentual. Here, both number of accents and number of syllables are measured (frequently through the measuring of "feet" [see FOOT] of stated patterns). Variations in accent placement, addition, or omission are much more readily "allowed" than variations in number of syllables per line. The result of this strictness is a metrical container of some rigidity and inflexibility, but, at the same time, of great compressive power. Fairly strict accentual-syllabic m. will generally be found used by conservative practitioners in Eng.: Dryden, Pope, Swift, and Johnson are examples. One may conjecture that accentual-syllabic m. has been fashionable in Eng. primarily during periods marked by an interest in classical rhetoric and by a commitment to the maintenance of a sense of order and limitation, for of all Eng. metrical systems, it is the one most hostile by nature to impulse, irregularity, and unrestrained grandiosity:

Creatures of every kind but ours
 Well comprehend their natural powers;
 While we, whom reason ought to sway,
 Mistake our talents every day.

(Swift, The Beasts' Confession to the Priest [octosyllables with 4 stresses; "natural" in line 2 reduced to a dissyllable by syncope])

In a slightly looser form, sometimes tending, that is, toward accentualism, the accentual-syllabic system is the basis for the standard Eng. meters, such as iambic pentameter (blank verse), or iambic and trochaic tetrameter. The presence or absence of trisyllabic substitution often determines whether a given meter is to be classified as strictly accentual or accentual syllabic.

In quantitative m., finally, durational rather than accentual feet are measured, and each foot consists of a particular pattern of "long" and "short" syllables. Sanskrit, Gr., and later Roman poetries are quantitative, and there have been attempts (particularly during the Renaissance) to write Eng. verse according to the principles of duration rather than stress: "Unhappy verse, the witness of my unhappy state, / Make thyself flutt'ring wings of thy fast flying / Thought, and fly forth unto my love, wheresoever she be: / Whether lying restless in heavy bed, or else / Sitting so cheerless at the cheerful board, or else / Playing alone careless on her heavenly virginals" (Spenser, Iambicum Trimetrum [quantitative imitation of classical iambic trimeter]). Inspired by the theorizing of William J. Stone, Robert Bridges, among others, has performed some interesting experiments in our own time with quantitative Eng. verse. It must be said, however, that despite occasional successes with the quantitative principle in Eng., the language seems to be so heavily accentual by nature that no other characteristic can serve adequately as a basis for m. Bridges has testified to the difficulty of thinking in quantities instead of accents, and his experience suggests that a m. customary in a given language is customary just because it "measures" the most characteristic quality of the language.

In poetry, which is the most organic and "total" mode of verbal expression, m. (like the other formal elements) serves as one of the primary correlatives of meaning: since m. is an indispensable contributor to meaning, it follows that the m. of a poem, in and by itself, means something, and even that the m. maintains a portion, at least, of its meaning whether symbolic sounds are attached to it or not. A good illustration of this basic alliance of m. with meaning (perhaps through association only) is the function of m. in the limerick, where the short anapestic lines are themselves expressive of light impudence. The fact that a "translation" of a limerick into another m. (say, iambic tetrameter) seriously impairs the comic tone which is a part of the total expression indicates the large burden of meaning which m. alone carries. In the same way, most sensitive Eng. poets have discovered that triple meters (anapestic, dactylic) tend to have something vaguely comic, light, or superficial about them (some, like Longfellow in Evangeline, apparently have made the discovery too late), and they tend to eschew such meters in favor of duple rhythms for the treatment of more or less serious subjects. Taking a somewhat more complex illustration than a limerick, we can see the relationship of m. to meaning in Shakespeare's 129th sonnet:

Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame
 Is lust in action; and till action, lust
 Is perjur'd, murd'rous, bloody, full of blame,
 Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust;

Here the metrical disorder and violence of the 4th line is intimately allied with the violence and extremity of the statement, and indeed both creates and is created by that violence. One has only to imagine the same statement expressed in a regular anapestic m. to perceive how m. and meaning are indissolubly married here. In a good poem, thus, limerick or sonnet, rhythmical pattern (together with expressive variations from it) is a constituent and a source of significance; it is never a mere embellishment, appliqué from the outside onto what would otherwise be "prose" utterance; it issues from the pressure of feeling and reasoning at every point in the poem (see METRICAL VARIATIONS).

In addition to serving as a major technique for the reinforcement of meaning, m. performs more general functions in a poem. It often establishes a sort of "distance" between both poet and subject and reader and subject by interposing a film of unaccustomed rhythmical ritual between observer and experience. It can thus help to control emotion and inhibit cliché responses in both poet and reader. This ritual "frame" in which m. encloses what is often perfectly everyday experience resembles the frame or artificial border of a painting. It reminds the apprehender unremittingly that he is not experiencing the real object of the "imitation" (in the Aristotelian sense) but is experiencing instead that object transmuted into symbolic form. M., as a device of artificiality and unnaturalness, is thus a primary technique of artifice in poetry, just as similar conventions (the palpably artificial stone flesh of statues, for example) are primary techniques of artifice in the other arts. M. also tends to suggest (since ordinary people don't speak in meter) the vatic rôle of the poet, just as it tends to invest with a mysterious air of permanence and authority the words which are cut to its pattern. The strange power of m. to burnish the commonplace has even tempted some thinkers to regard metrical patterns as Platonic forms, themselves inherently and permanently beautiful, which the poet perceives unconsciously and towards which he constantly impels his own utterance.

If one regards absolutely regular m. (as some Platonists do) as the "ideal," then one becomes extraordinarily sensitive to those points in the poem where the "sense" pattern of the language rhythm lies at some distance from the normal or "base" abstract rhythm of the presumed metrical scheme. Prosodists and critics who have studied closely this frequent distance between a poem's "ideal" and "real" m. have developed a theory of prosodic "tension": these theorists maintain that one of the sources of metrical power and pleasure is just this tension between perfect and imperfect metrical patterns. To these theorists, the perpetual tension between "metrical" and real rhythms constitutes the sort of "play" or "suspension" (or even the Coleridgean reconciliation of opposites) which is the secret source of illumination and delight in all art.

A complete discussion of the nature of m. would require not only a consideration of the function of poetic m. in general, but also some investigation of the unique functions of m. in different kinds of poetry. Except for its most obvious offices, it is apparent that m. does not do the same things in lyric that it does in poetic drama; nor does it do the same things in narrative poetry that it does in satiric. Its function is mnemonic in "Thirty days hath September" and in the metered genealogies of epic; musical and hypnotic in Kubla Khan; and oratorical and analytically pedagogic in the Essay on Man. See PROSODY; ENG. PROSODY; LINGUISTICS AND POETICS.†

T. S. Omond, Eng. Metrists (1921); E. A. Sonnenschein, What is Rhythm? (1925); P. Barkas, A Critique of Modern Eng. Prosody (1934); Y. Winters, "The Influence of M. on Poetic Convention," Primitivism and Decadence (1937); J. C. Ransom, The New Crit. (1941), pp. 254-69, 297-330; D. A. Stauffer, The Nature of Poetry (1946); K. Shapiro, A Bibliog. of Modern Prosody (1948); Wellek and Warren; A. Stein, "A Note on M.," KR, 18 (1956); J. C. Ransom, "The Strange Music of Eng. Verse," KR, 18 (1956). P.F.

METONYMY (Gr. "change of name," "misnomer." L. denominatio). A figure, related to synecdoche (q.v.), in which one word is substituted for another with which it stands in close relationship; in common language such substitutions as hippos (literally horse) in place of to hippikon (meaning cavalry); o katharma (literally "that which is thrown away in cleansing" for "you scum"). Quintilian (Institutes of Oratory 8.6.23-27) does not distinguish clearly from hypallage (q.v.), but he does classify m. into various kinds: e.g., the name of the inventor or possessor, for the invention or possession; the container for that which is contained; to which may be added modifier for modified, symbol for thing symbolized, etc.: "Pallida mors aequo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas" (Pale death with equal foot knocks at the poor man's door—Horace, Odes 1.4.13). Common to all poetry, m. is well exemplified in Shakespeare: m. of the efficient cause—"As Ovid be an outcast quite abjur'd" (The Taming of the Shrew 1.1.33); m. of the material cause—"he tilts / With piercing steel at bold Mercutio's breast" (Romeo and Juliet 3.1.163); m. where effect is substituted for cause—"I have made my way through more impediments / Than twenty times your stop" (Othello 5.2.263). The major effect is to communicate through abstract, intangible terms the concrete or tangible; according to Kenneth Burke, abstract and spiritual words are metonymic in origin ("Four Master Tropes" in A Grammar of Motives, 1945, pp. 503f). There is some reason to believe that m., with metaphor, is more intimately related to the processes whereby experience becomes language and thought than study of it as a figure would suggest; Wellek and Warren write, "Recently some bolder conceptions of m. . . . have been suggested, even the notion that m. and metaphor may be the characterizing structures of two poetic types—poetry of association by contiguity, and poetry of association by comparison, joining in a plurality of worlds, mixing in the striking phrase of Bühler [Sprachtheorie, 1934], a 'cock-tail of spheres'". (Theory of Lit., 2d ed., 1956, pp. 184–85).—A. Fraunce, The Arcadian Rhetorike (1588; ed. E. Seaton 1950); Lausberg.

† In Supplement, see also GENERATIVE METRICS.

R.O.E.

METRICAL ROMANCE. See MEDIEVAL ROMANCE.

METRICAL VARIATIONS. A term covering the techniques of departing from metrical regularity for the purposes of either sheer variety or rhetorical reinforcement. Strictly speaking, m.v. are possible only in verse composed with a more or less regular base rhythm; they do not exist as such in cadenced or free verse.

"Substitution" (according to conventional graphic scansion) is the most frequent technique of metrical variation. Here, once a basic metrical pattern has been established, the rhythm may be varied by the introduction of a "substitute" foot to replace one or more of the normal ones. In the following example,

An aged man is but a paltry thing,
A tattered coat upon a stick, unless Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing
For every tatter in its mortal dress, . . .
(Yeats, Sailing to Byzantium)

each line uses a substitution for one of the "expected" iambic feet: line 1 has a pyrrhic in the third position; line 2 a pyrrhic in the third; line 3 a trochaic (or spondaic) substitution in the first position; and line 4 a pyrrhic in the third. These substitutions serve both to alleviate the metrical monotony of the long-continued iambic pentameter and to allow the metrical structure to "give" and shape itself according to the rhetorical pressures of the statement. In the following lines by Matthew Arnold,

Listen! you hear the grating roar
Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
At their return, up the high strand,

Begin, and cease, and then again begin, . . .
(Dover Beach)

one can see substitutions used with even stronger intentions of sense reinforcement. Against an iambic background, the initial trochaic substitution in line 1 constitutes an unexpected reversal of the metrical movement which emphasizes a shift in the address; in line 2, the spondaic substitution in the fourth position suggests the slowness of the sea wave as it coils back upon itself, gathering force to shoot itself up the beach; in line 3, the pyrrhic substitution in the 1st position suggests the speed with which the wave "flings" itself up the sand; and in line 4, the return to iambic regularity, after these suggestive variations, transmits a feeling of the infinite, monotonous continuance of the wave's process. In Eng. verse, the most common substitution is the replacement of the initial iamb by a trochee, as in the first line of the Arnold example. This initial trochaic substitution is usually found even in the most metrically regular poems, for the unvaried iambic foot becomes insupportably tedious after very many repetitions. In fact, a failure to employ m.v. is one of the stigmata of the bad poet. In the following example: "I know that Europe's wonderful, yet something seems to lack: / The Past is too much with her, and the people looking back. / But the glory of the Present is to make the Future free— / We love our land for what she is and what she is to be" (Henry Van Dyke, America for Me) the absence of an instinct for meaningful m.v. goes hand in hand with the complacent ignorance of the ideas and the fatuity of the rhetoric.

In addition to the device of dissyllabic substitution, lines can also be varied by the addition or subtraction of unaccented syllables, which is frequently accomplished by either trisyllabic or monosyllabic substitution. Trisyllabic substitution is regarded by conservative metrists as a "bolder" form of substitution than dissyllabic, for, in duple measures, trisyllabic substitution increases the syllabic length of the line.

As the examples above help illustrate, the fundamental principles of metrical variation are these: (1) a succession of stressed syllables without the expected intervening unstressed syllables tends to transmit an effect of slowness, weight, or difficulty; (2) a succession of unstressed syllables without the expected intervening stressed syllables tends to suggest an effect of rapidity, lightness, or ease; and (3) an unanticipated reversal in the rhythm (as in the first line of the Arnold passage, above) suggests a new direction of thought, a new tone of voice, or a change in poetic address.

The fact that m.v. such as these can be illustrated by scansion and analyzed dispassionately should not cause the reader to believe that, from the point of view of the poet (at least the good poet), they are anything but instinctual. Many poets whose work can be analyzed metrically according to the foot system would be astonished to be told that they have indulged in "substitution": the genuine poet composes according to the rhythms which his utterance supplies, and, although these rhythms frequently turn out to consist of "normal" and "substitute" feet, they do not necessarily begin that way. See METER, PROSODY, SCANSION, COUNTERPOINT, FOOT.—Saintsbury, Prosody; Baum; Brooks and Warren; L. Perrine, Sound and Sense (1956). P.F.

METRICUS, metrici (Gr. metrikos, metrikoi, student(s) of metrics). The metrici represented a school of ancient metrical theorists who held that only long and short syllables need be considered in analysis, and that the long syllable was always twice the length of the short, variations being too slight to be of consequence. In opposition to this group were the rhythmici, who maintained that long syllables differ greatly from one another in quantity, and that even short syllables may differ in some degree, thus demanding much more complicated methods of analysis. At present the speculations of both schools hold only historical interest.—T. D. Goodell, Chapters on Gr. Metric (1901); U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958). K.M.A.

METRON. In Gr. and L. verse the unit of measurement. In dactylic (— — —), cretic (— — —), and bacchiac (— — —) verse the unit is a single foot (e.g., the dactylic hexameter contains 6 feet) and the scansion is according to the foot (kata poda). On the other hand, in other disyllabic and trisyllabic feet, e.g., iambic (— —), trochaic (— —), and anapaestic (— — —), which do not contain more than 4 morae, the unit is 2 feet, i.e., a dipody or syzygy, and the scansion is according to the metron (kata metron). Thus the iambic dimeter, trimeter, or tetrameter is a verse of 4, 6, or 8 feet.

The importance and value of the distinction may be observed in the L. iambic trimeter as contrasted with the iambic senarius. In the former the inner thesis (of feet 2,4,6) must be "pure" (the even-numbered feet must not be spondee). Here the dipody is the unit of composition. Where, as in the senarius, and in fact most L. verse (not Gr.), no distinction between the inner and outer thesis or arsis (q.v.) is observed by the poet, the dipody is merely traditional and the true m. is the foot.—Koster. K.M.A.

MEXICAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

MIME (Gr. "imitation"). A dramatic form in which players rely mainly on gestures to tell a story. Found in ancient Greece and Rome the m. probably arose from the natural impulse to imitate persons or scenes from daily life. As a literary genre, however, it developed in Sicily and southern Italy where Sophron of Syracuse (5th c. B.C.) wrote in colloquial prose realistic scenes which border on the gross. Subsequently Herodas (3d c. B.C.) used metrics in his mimiambi which in turn influenced the Alexandrian poetry of Theocritus and the L. poets Plautus, Terence (dramatists), Horace (Epodes, Satires), and the Roman m. writers, Decimus Laberius and Publius Syrus (1st c. B.C.), whose works except for fragments are not extant. The genre is basically comic but differs from comedy in that it need not have a plot, emphasizing instead the portrayal of character. Ribaldry and burlesque were its chief ingredients and hence its source of great popularity. The Christian church waged war on the m. and its actors so that finally in the 5th c. A.D. all who took part in it were under ban of excommunication. As a genre it again became popular in 16th-c. Italy in the commedia dell' arte whence it spread to France and England. In 19th-c. France L'Enfant Prodigue, a three-act m. play, culminates the history of the genre. In the contemporary world the m. again is popular but as a part of dramatic technique. Today it relies exclusively on gesture, avoiding entirely the use of words.—H. Reich, Der Mimus (1903); O. Crusius, Die Mimiamben des Herondas (1926); A. Körte, Hellenistic Poetry (1929); A. Nicoll, Masks, Mimes and Miracles (1931); W. Beare, The Roman Stage (2d ed., 1955).

R.A.H.

MIMESIS. A Gr. term, customarily translated "imitation," but with a different and somewhat broader range of meaning than the Eng. word. Ultimately derived from mimos, which in the historical period denoted the "mime" or an actor therein, mimesis seems to have meant originally the mimicking of a person or creature through dance, facial expression, and/or speech and song. But the object so "imitated" might be a god, a mythical hero, or a fabulous creature, e.g., the Minotaur; in other words, m. could refer to an idea or a type as well as to an actual individual. For the extension of m. to literature in general and its establishment as a central concept in literary theory by Plato and Aristotle, see IMITATION; POETRY, THEORIES OF (MIMETIC THEORIES). G.F.E.

MINNESINGERS, authors of Minnesang (the first body of poetry in German to rank as part of world literature), which in its widest sense includes all artistic lyrical poetry of the Middle High German period and was composed to be sung or recited (not read) for the entertainment of courtly society. In the narrow sense it is a specific kind of love poetry, the aim and reward of the man's spiritual devotion to woman (hohe minne) being "that your worth be enhanced and you gain a joyous elation therefrom" (Albrecht von Jahnsdorf).

It flourished first in the Rhine regions, then chiefly at the courts of Austria and Southern Germany for a 200-year period, which may be subdivided into (1). Minnesangs Frühling (Spring of minne song), middle to end of 12th c. (e.g., Der Kurenberger, Heinrich von Veldeke, Dietmar von Aist, Meinloh von Sevelingen); (2). the great flowering, end of 12th to beginning of 13th c. (hardly more than 20 years, e.g., Hartmann von Aue, Albr. von Johansdorf, Heinrich von Morungen, Reinmar von Hagenau, Walther von der Vogelweide); (3). late Minnesang, beginning of 13th to beginning of 14th c. (e.g., Ulrich von Lichtenstein, Neithart von Reuenthal), generally considered a period of decline. The early poets came from the higher nobility, later ones also from the lower (professional or semiprofessional minstrels, or Spielleute, under the patronage of great nobles).

Love (minne) is the chief theme, although there is much formal treatment of nature and reference to contemporary history: the crusades, the poet's relationship to his princely employer, the state of the Empire (Walther!). Love had in earlier eras been condemned by the church as lust (luxuria). Since, however, Minnesang is court poetry, the relationship between man and woman assumes certain noble characteristics of the lord-vassal relationship. The man is vassal to his frouwe and he wishes to receive a reward (lôn) for his service (dienest). As the aim of German court society at the time of the Staufens dynasty was the perfect man, who achieved self-discipline and balance (mâze) by constant training (zuht), the value of the minne relationship shifted from the attainment of possession to the arduous but ennobling way which might lead to it. The woman, by this process, became so idealized that the goal became in fact unattainable, and the whole relationship fictitious. Only thus can one understand the apparent paradox of the poet's praise of the virtue of a married noble lady (often the wife of the minnesinger's own lord) whom he implores to relax her standards in his particular case. Minnesang, in the work of its greatest representatives, is an elevation of womanhood. In its quasi-religious praise of the Eternal-Feminine, this poetry reflects elements of the worship of the Virgin Mary. In the hands of the lesser practitioners, especially in the late period, Minnesang became a social game or empty conventionality to the point of caricature. There is, however, a more realistic strain; even the great singers around 1200 and certainly the late M. would write of sensual love, attainable from women of the lower classes (niedere minne). This poetry bears the marks of personal experience and expresses personal feelings.

Minnesang has strong affinities with the love poetry of the Fr. troubadours, but elements of older G. secular love poetry can also be discerned. It is often less gallant and more spontaneous than its Fr. counterpart. A relationship may, moreover, exist between minne song and medieval secular love poetry in L. (Vagantenpoesie). Lastly, the Arabic sung strophic love lyrics, placing woman in an exalted position, practiced at the Arabic princely courts of Spain, and antedating the troubadour poetry, must be considered in any attempt at historio-genetic explanation.

Form (1). The principal form used by the M. is the lied i.e., the strophic poem (the strophe represents both the poetic and the musical unit, as with the troubadours), a frequent variety (from Walther on) being the Tagelied (q.v.). While metric structure and rhyme patterns were, at first, indebted to prov. models, variations and innovations were developed from ca. 1180 on. (2). There is also the nonstrophic leich (q.v.) with varying length and number of lines, and set to continuous music. (3). For the short (originally 1 stanza) poem, which since Walther may deal with political and religious themes, Simrock and Wackernagel (1833) misleadingly introduced the term Spruch. It is really the same as a short lied; for it is not spoken, but also sung, and must not be confused with the didactic Spruch (q.v.) proper.

COLLECTIONS: Minnesinger, ed. v. d. Hagen (4 v., 1838, new printing 1923); Die Schweizer Minnesänger, ed. K. Bartsch (1886); Der Minnesang des 12. bis 14. Jhs., ed. F. Pfaff (2 v., 1891-1895); Deutsche Liederdichter des 12. bis 14. Jhs., ed. K. Bartsch and W. Golther (8th ed., 1928); Herbst des Minnesangs, ed. H. Naumann (1936); Trouvères et minnesänger, ed. I. Frank (I, texts, 1952) and J. M. Müller-Blattau (II, music, 1956); Die Lieder Neidharts, ed. E. Wiessner (1955); Deutsche Lyrik des Mittelalters, ed. M. Wehrli (1955); Dt. Liederdichter des 13. Jhs., ed. C. v. Kraus and H. Kuhn (2 v., 1952-58); Die Gedichte Walthers v. d. Vogelweide, ed. C. v. Kraus (12th ed., 1959); Des Minnesangs Frühling, ed. K. Lachmann (32d ed. by C. v. Kraus, 1959).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Lüderitz, Die Liebestheorie der Provenzalen bei den Min-

nesingern der Stauferzeit (1904); W. Wilmanns, Walther v. d. Vogelweide, ed. V. Michels (4th ed., 1916-24); K. Burdach, "Über den Ursprung des mittelalterlichen Minnesangs," Berliner Sitzungsberichte (1918); G. Müller, "Studien zum Formproblem des Minnesangs," DVLG, 1 (1923); L. Ecker, Arabischer, provenzalischer und deutscher Minnesang (1934); C. v. Kraus, Walther v. d. Vogelweide (1935) and Des Minnesangs Frühling: Untersuchungen (1939); M. Ittenbach, Der frühe dt. Minnesang (1939); M. F. Richey, Essays on the Mediaeval German Love Lyric (1943); T. Frings, Minnesänger und Troubadours (1949); A. Moret, Les Débuts du lyrisme en Allemagne (1951); F. Maurer, Die politischen Lieder W's v. d. Vogelweide (1954); H. Kolb, Der Begriff der Minne und das Entstehen der höfischen Lyrik (1958); B. Kippenberg, Der Rhythmus im Minnesang (1962).
U.K.G.

MINSTREL. A professional entertainer of the Middle Ages, successor to the earlier scop (q.v.), gleeman, or jongleur (q.v.). Minstrels flourished particularly in the 13th and 14th c.; their activity decreased in the 15th c., and with the invention of printing their function in society ceased to be meaningful.

As in the case of the jongleur, it is difficult to determine with certainty the nature and role of the medieval m. Some were attached to a court or a noble household; others wandered from town to town; some even performed in the public streets. The social position of the m. presents a similar problem. Sometimes the term is applied to the troubadours and trouvères (qq.v.), true poets and often men of education and social standing; on other occasions it denotes the wandering acrobats and buffoons. Some scholars have suggested that the more sophisticated entertainers rose out of their class as a result of their talents.

In any case, the literary productions of the minstrels are clearly distinguished in pace and tone from those of the two other main categories of medieval writers—the clerical and the aristocratic. For the most part, the minstrels retold the familiar stories of tradition, as derived from a variety of sources ranging from the chansons de geste (q.v.) and the Germanic legends to the later romances and folk ballads. Independent love lyrics are also attributed to minstrel authors. The romantic writers of the late 18th and early 19th c., influenced by a belief in the virtues of "primitive" poetry, endowed the minstrels with the colorful and picturesque aura which surrounds them, even today, in the popular mind.—E. Faral, Les Jongleurs en France au moyen âge (1910); H. Naumann, "Spielmannsdichtung," Reallexikon, III; P. Wareman, Spielmannsdichtung. Versuch einer Begriffsbestimmung (1951);

R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesía juglaresca y orígenes de las literaturas románicas (6th rev. and enl. ed., 1957).
A.P.

MIRACLE PLAYS. See MYSTERY AND MIRACLE PLAYS.

MOCK EPIC, MOCK HEROIC. Terms used in a broad sense to describe a satiric method in poetry and prose and, more specifically, a distinct verse form which seeks a derisive effect by combining formal and elevated language with a trivial subject. The mock-heroic poem per se consciously imitates the epic style, follows a classical structure and heroic action for deflationary purposes, and employs some of the standard paraphernalia of the epic—i.e., invocations, dedications, celestial interventions, epic similes, canto-divisions, and battles.

The Homeric Batrachomyomachia (Battle of the Frogs and Mice) served as a model for many an 18th-c. battle in mock-epic strain. The 1717 version of this work by Thomas Parnell belongs with many such neoclassic, burlesque battles of pygmies or cranes or rats or hoops or books or sexes. Chaucer had employed the mock-heroic style in Nun's Priest's Tale, but Boileau's Le Lutrin is commonly mentioned as the most influential modern poem magnifying a trivial subject on an ambitious scale. Dryden's MacFlecknoe and Pope's Rape of the Lock and Dunciad are classic examples of Eng. mock-heroic poetry aiming their shafts at literary pretence and social folly. Mock odes, mock elegiacs (Gray's ode On the Death of a Favourite Cat . . .), and mock eclogues abound in Eng. verse, but the mock heroic held supremacy among them until it blended with later burlesque and satiric modes.—R. P. Bond, Eng. Burlesque Poetry, 1700-1750 (1932); K. Schmidt, Vorstudien zu einer Gesch. des komischen Epos (1953).

R.P.F.

MODERN POETICS. I. 1750-1900. Modern poetics is distinguished by a gradual dislocation of traditional standards based on the neo-classical interpretation of Aristotle's Poetics and on the models of classical antiquity. These changes, and reactions against them, which have become most pronounced since the mid-18th c., may be clarified by an arbitrary division of the period into four phases: empiricism, transcendentalism, realism, idealism, and the revival of classicism, and symbolism.

1. The Empiricist Phase: In the empiricist phase of the later 18th c., under the impact of philosophers like Locke and Hume, a critical reorientation tended to replace external authority by the individual mind. Subjectivity and historal relativism in matters of taste and a degree of license in poetic forms and levels of style were the result of this development. But in stressing the individual self, this position also provided fertile ground for conceptions of the self as a principle of inspiration, in a Neoplatonic and Longinian sense, which had been implicit in neoclassical poetics. By suggesting that in inspiration a poet intuitively fathoms universal forms and truths, this principle reconciled a subjective view of creation with an insistence on classical rules.

In France, this reorientation is reflected in the work of the pre-Revolutionary generation of critics like Voltaire and Diderot. François-Marie Voltaire (1694-1778) combined a subjective theory of taste with a practical belief in the touchstones of critical judgment, harmony and decorum. Thus, Voltaire combined the famous dictum of "each to his own taste" with a belief in "good" taste that favored lucid, metrically sound verse and strict adherence to dramatic rules. He could praise Shakespeare's genius and yet condemn his rude violations of classical conventions. Differences between Homer, Tasso, and Milton are accounted for by a distinction between conventional beauties (locally determined) and essential beauties (based on universal reason). Denis Diderot (1713-84) worked more narrowly within the tradition of empiricism. Borrowing from the Lockean sensationalism of the Comte de Condillac (1715-80), Diderot developed a theory of signs according to which poetic language pictures the sounds and shapes of external nature and registers human emotions as they are experienced by the mind. Consequently, Diderot preferred descriptive and narrative poetry and employed it in the service of his particular moral didacticism. Later, his attention shifted from the poet and reader to "real" beauty, an eternal form beyond human perception, embedded in nature and copied by the work of art. Among other Fr. critics of the age, various accommodations between an empirical and a Neoplatonic position are found from the rationalism of the Comte de Buffon (1707-88) to the increasingly radical sentimentalism of Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-78) and Sébastien Mercier (1740-1814).

In England, a similar dual position is suggested by the continuing impact on 18th c. poetics of the Neoplatonic tradition of the Earl of Shaftesbury on the one hand and by Lockean and Humean doctrines of imagination and taste on the other. The concept of "original composition" of Edward Young (1683-1765) suggests that genius works through a supernatural power which enables the poet to penetrate to eternal forms despite the fact that each man is born an original. Underlying such theories is not only a Neoplatonic metaphysic but also a belief in the universality of taste and the generality of human, moral, and external nature held by critics like Sir Joshua Reynolds (1723-92) and Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-84). Dr. Johnson's criticism favored the universal, disparaged the grotesque in construction and style, minimized the poet's individual imagination, and stressed the need for rationally valid rules of good taste and sound moral judgment superimposed upon an enlightened historical relativism. At the same time, Eng. and Scottish critics like Henry Home, Lord Kames (1696-1782), Richard Hurd (1720-1808), James Beattie (1735-1803), or Hugh Blair (1718-1800) developed the implications of Lockean psychology—based on the apprehension and association of ideas and their signs (words) by the individual mind—for emotion, imagination, and taste in poetry. But while these critics contributed much to the refinement of poetic theory, they were also compelled to reconcile their views with the need for common standards of agreement in Dr. Johnson's sense.

In addition to Neoplatonism, these standards were to some extent provided by the "common sense" school of philosophy, exemplified by Thomas Reid (1710-96), which insisted that the mind intuitively apprehends matters of fact "as they are," knowledge of which is founded in men's common consciousnesses. In thinkers like Adam Ferguson (1723-1816) and Dugald Stewart (1753-1828), this view led to a definition of "imagination" as an innate, universally human power of abstraction and ordering which acts upon assemblages of sensible materials supplied by the lower "fancy." Thus, each of these theories is forced to deal with the problem of reconciling individual experience and emotion with an objective aesthetic. Edmund Burke (1729-97) offered a solution with his distinction between rationally accessible beauty and the sublime apprehended only as the result of grotesque and individual imagination. Paralleling this development is a growing belief in primitivism and an interest in history. The "discovery" of James Macpherson's "Ossian" and the vogue of folk poetry, as demonstrated by the activities of Thomas Percy (1729-1811), were explained on the grounds that primitive language and poetry are "purer" than civilized poetry because they are more immediately expressive of emotions. The view of poetry as an historical phenomenon, associated with the work of Joseph Warton (1722-1800) and his brother Thomas Warton (1728-90), is the result of an historical relativism in poetry impelled by the empirical point of view. On the whole, such criticism and poetry exhibit, ultimately, that very rejection of universality which Dr. Johnson had deplored. This tendency is revealed in the interest in bizarre subject matter, narrative verse reflecting individual experiences, and the decline of poetic drama during the second half of the 18th c.

Moreover, in England, as elsewhere in Europe, this development tended to weaken the Horatian notion, which had dominated Western poetics since the Renaissance, that a poem must teach as well as delight. What had been self-evident to Sir Philip Sydney and Alexander Pope required a Neoplatonic rationale or Dr. Johnson's stern defense in terms of the psychological and common sense doctrines of his time. As poetry became more and more associated with individual inspiration and expression, moral purposes requiring universal truths became more and more the insights or visions apprehended by individual poets. Didacticism continued in a different order of mystical apprehension in Blake, Wordsworth, or Shelley.

In Germany, the central conflict of 18th c. poetics was focused in the opposition of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-81) and Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744-1803). In his essay "Laokoon oder über die Grenzen der Malerei und Poesie" (1766), Lessing developed a theory of signs according to which the co-existent signs of the pictorial arts (denoting extension and form) and the successive signs of poetry (denoting action in time), must not encroach upon one another. Hence, despite some later modifications, Lessing was led to reject descriptive and to neglect lyrical poetry and to extol the epic and drama in which action predominates. Herder, on the other hand, stressed meaning and organic form which bind literary signs together through energy linking subject and object, space and time, in imaginative apprehension. Herder's concept of organic form, which in Italy was independently developed by Giambattista Vico (1668-1744), was applied to the evolution of history, language, and poetry, and led to an adulation of Homer, "Ossian," and Shakespeare as poets of nature. Herder expressed the protest against a prevailing prosaic rationalism by the generation of the Storm and Stress which also included the young Schiller, Goethe, and Wieland. These developments, however, were modified towards the end of the century. Friedrich Schiller (1759-1805) distinguished between ancient naïve poetry, which was essentially poetry of nature, and modern sentimental poetry, which was poetry of art, the former being identified with intuitive emotion, the latter with intellectual reasoning. Schiller's famous theory of art as play, moreover, placed poetry in an art-world of illusion in which the opposites of sense and intellect, subject and object, nature and art are resolved in an apprehension of eternal verities conceived in the spirit of Shaftesbury and Kant. At the turn of the 19th c., both Schiller and Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832) had reconciled their conception of poetry of nature and organic form with an essentially Neoplatonic view of an ideal unity of language and form inspired by the models of antiquity. The history of German poetics in the 18th c. shows a fluctuating development, ranging from a rigid neoclassicism and didacticism early in the century to the emotionalism and the belief in genius, primitivism, and organic unity held by Herder and the Storm and Stress movement, to the temporary reconciliation of both in the "classicism" of the mature Goethe and Schiller.

In Italy the second part of the century saw the triumph of sensationalism over the rationalism of Descartes and the intellectualism of Leibniz, which had dominated the earlier half of the century. The ideas of the German philosopher were reflected in the poetics of L. A. Muratori, G. Gravina, and A. Conti. Their basically classicistic attitudes were superseded by the sensationalist speculations of Pietro Verri, Cesare Beccaria, Saverio Bettinelli, and Giuseppe Parini, who centered their attention on the hedonistic aspect of art and attempted various ways to reconcile it with more traditional didactic views as well as with the new emphasis on the role of individual "genius," personal "taste," and free "imagination." The outstanding critic of the later 18th c. was Giuseppe Baretti (1719-89), who criticized Voltaire's strictures of Shakespeare, rejected most of Fr. neo-classicism and philosophy, and extolled the critical ideas of Dr. Johnson. His notions of the rational naturalness of expression ("direct construction") were later refuted by Melchiorre Cesarotti, (1730-1808) the translator of "Ossian." In Spain, one of the foremost neoclassical works of criticism in the 18th c. was Ignacio de Luzán's Poética ó reglas de la poesia en general y de sus principales especies (1737).

2. The Transcendentalist Phase: As Kantian metaphysics sought to oppose an apparent trend towards skepticism in 18th c. empiricism and sentimentalism, so the poetics developed from the Kantian Critiques sought to restore "objectivity" to criticism. In his first two critiques, Die Kritik der reinen Vernunft (1781-87) and Die Kritik der praktischen Vernunft (1788), Immanuel Kant (1724-1804) distinguished three realms of knowledge, that of sensibility or sensual apprehension, of understanding or rational knowledge of the world of appearances (Verstand), and that of truly "real" things-in-themselves, the world of transcendental Reason (Vernunft) which cannot be known empirically or rationally but which is accessible through adherence to the universal moral law. In his Kritik der Urteilskraft (1789-93) Kant defined the beautiful as "free," that is, as bound neither by the rules of the understanding nor by those of the moral duty. By this he meant that beauty is a disinterested emotion; the beautiful object manifests "purposiveness without a purpose"; its objective harmony serves only aesthetic enjoyment as an end in itself. At the same time, disinterested pleasure (beauty) and awe (sublimity) allow us to entertain visions of the transcendental world of Reason, but, since they exist autonomously, they cannot give us any knowledge of things-in-themselves which exist in the realm of Reason. Kant's successors, however, like Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1762-1814) and Friedrich Schelling (1775-1854), developed from this position an aesthetic which viewed the beautiful as yielding actual knowledge of the world of Reason; it becomes a cognitively accessible symbol of the transcendental ideal. Indeed, Schelling's Die Philosophie der Kunst (1802-3, publ. 1859) defined art as the presentation of the absolute or transcendental ideal in the sensible particular.

In Germany, this transcendentalist position was self-consciously applied to poetics in romantic criticism. Although Friedrich Schlegel (1772-1829) vacillates in his definitions of "romantic," a transcendentalist point of view is usually implied. The "romantic" mode is the essential characteristic of all poetry, an ideal distinguishing poetry from non-poetry, art from non-art, and thus approximating transcendental definitions of beauty. The term "romantic," however, is also used to distinguish between ancient and modern poetry as Schiller had distinguished between "naïve" and "sentimental." In this formulation, "romantic" denotes the opposite of classical beauty which distinguishes Christian poetry since the Middle Ages sharply from the ideal poetry of Gr. antiquity. "Romantic" thus designates the unordered and complex, all that is connoted by the task of representing the infinite in finite perception. In consequence, Friedrich Schlegel's notion of irony assumes significance in transcendental terms. A discrepancy is created between the poem as finite artifact and the infinite ideal which it mirrors in transcendental poetry. Irony points up this discrepancy and thus exhibits aesthetically the union (in opposition) of the personal creation and the impersonal ideal which it mirrors.

Other romantic writers like Ludwig Tieck (1773-1853) or Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann (1776-1822) included in this notion of irony devices like the deliberate breaking of an aesthetic illusion to show the continuous interrelation of finite, subjective perception and infinite, impersonal art. The elaborate Vorschule der Aesthetik (1804) by Jean Paul Richter (1763-1825) includes a view of humor as a bridge from the finite world of sense experience to the infinite world of the ideal. August Wilhelm Schlegel (1767-1845) also utilized the transcendental definition of poetry. He echoed his brother's distinction between pure limited classical form and limitless romantic form which, in turn, is based on a definition of poetry as organic and on a transcendentalist conception of modern poetry as reflecting the infinite. A. W. Schlegel defined poetic imagination as a universal, undiversified power through which all art is created, but he defended differentiation of genres and rigorous metrics by suggesting that poetry is not the image but the symbol of the infinite. In this way, he could stress the organic conception of character (in Herder's sense) rather than the mechanical conception of fate as the driving power of dramatic form and defend Shakespeare against the invocation of Aristotelian rules. The distinction between "classical" and "romantic" was obliterated on transcendental grounds by Adam Müller (1779-1828) who defined poetry as the creation of life in which all oppositions (including that of classical and romantic) are joined.

A further outgrowth of the transcendentalist point of view in poetics is a new conception of the poet and hero. Friedrich von Hardenberg (Novalis) (1772-1801) developed a "magical idealism" through which the poet unites himself with the world of experience in the synthesizing apprehension of the ideal world reflected in transcendental poetry. The poet or hero whose perceptions and dreams become the material of poetry functions as the intermediary between finite nature and infinite art. Allegory and myth were the most likely means whereby the aesthetic synthesis could be accomplished. Novalis worked out a theory of the poet as a "supreme mimic" who incorporates within himself alien points of view and who thus becomes the poet's aesthetic self ironically representing both the finite self from which he is derived and the infinite which he symbolizes. The "classical" enthusiasm, in verse and prose, and the philosophical deliberations of Friedrich Hölderlin (1770-1842) represent one slightly atypical manifestation of this trend; Freiherr Josef von Eichendorff's nature poetry and symbolic fiction is another.

Among other German romantic writers, these views found more radical expression in three interrelated forms: (1) the superseding of prescribed genres and forms by undifferentiating imagination and genius as advocated by Heinrich von Kleist (1777-1811), Achim von Arnim (1781-1831), and others; (2) the definition of poetry as an ideal language mirrored in our language of sense and a concomitant elevation of music (and hence of the lyric) as the crucial criterion of poetry, suggested especially by Bettina von Arnim (Brentano) (1785–1859); (3) the transformation of Herder's emphasis on myth as the basis of poetry into a self-conscious return to national folk myth and, in consequence, a gradual destruction of the previous cosmopolitan character of the romantic movement. This development was signaled early in the century by the collection of folk poetry Des Knaben Wunderhorn (1808) by Achim von Arnim and Clemens Brentano (1778–1842). Later, it was manifested in the linguistic studies, translations, and collections of Germanic myths by Jakob Grimm (1785–1863) and his brother Wilhelm Grimm (1786–1859). This shift in interest was explained by a distinction between natural poetry, expressing a national consciousness in its totality, and art poetry, reflecting artificially this expression of a national soul. This distinction was a radical and nationalistic echo not only of Herder's definitions of poetry but also of the Schlegels' transcendentalist derivations from Schiller's concept of naive and sentimental poetry.

The tendency of the later romantic movement to abandon aestheticism in favor of an increasing emphasis upon emotionalist and didactic interpretations was expressed by Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831). For Hegel's philosophy suggests a shift in transcendentalist doctrines of poetry from concern with the object mirroring the ideal to the ideal itself. Although for Hegel art is both concrete and universal, its development must lead away from its most concrete manifestations to higher universal forms in which art qua art ultimately disappears. Viewing poetry in three stages, symbolical or primitive allegories, classical or concrete and well-formed poetry, and romantic poetry, Hegel defined the last as the final stage in the development of poetic forms, as the overflowing of the absolute spirit. Although poetry is the highest form, approximating the ideal most closely through its simultaneous interaction of content and form in abstract and intellectual signs, it must also be superseded, for the approximation to spiritual reality (in a philosophical sense) is the ultimate end. The emphasis, therefore, remained on the spirit rather than on the form of art, and on its manifestation in a constantly evolving historical and dialectical process towards the ideal. The reformulation of Kant and Schelling by Arthur Schopenhauer (1788–1860), according to which poetry led to the necessary destruction of the transcendental Will through disinterested contemplation, was opposed to this trend, but Schopenhauer was less significant to his contemporaries than to succeeding generations. As a whole, from the 1830's on, transcendentalism survived chiefly as an extra-literary framework within which poetry was judged. The revolt of the Jung-Deutschland group, which included, among others, Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) against the literary dictatorship of Goethe and the aestheticism of the Schlegels tended to abandon more and more the symbolic implications of a transcendentalist poetics but almost unconsciously retained its nonaesthetic, ideological emphasis as suggested, in part, by the Hegelian formulation. As a result, philosophical idealism, subjectivism, and political purposes became the standards guiding critical discussion.

In England, the first impulse toward a transcendentalist position was not so much concerned with first principles as with new conceptions of nature and of the function of poetic language. Although the relationship of the poet to his world and his art was equally explored, the more empirical spirit which pervaded British thought during the closing decades of the 18th c. focused attention primarily on the world of experience and on the language through which it was to be communicated. The Preface to the Lyrical Ballads (1798–1800) by William Wordsworth (1770–1850) and Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834) (as substantiated by the poems themselves) sought to demonstrate this change and thus became the first document of romantic principles in England. Nature was not a universal principle but the particularized, sensibly accessible external world. Similarly, human nature was not defined by a universal principle but by the particular psychology of "simple" men who lived close to nature. Poetic language, against the opposition of critics like Francis Jeffrey (1773–1850), was to express the language of these people ("common speech") truthfully as well as to reflect suitably images of external nature. At the same time, as their various writings suggest, Wordsworth's and Coleridge's views of aesthetic perception were colored by empirical doctrines of psychology available to them in David Hartley's Lockean treatise Observations on Man (1749). The 18th c. disjunction between poetic perception, viewed in empiricist terms, and poetic imagination, defined in the inspirationalist terms of Shaftesbury and Neo-Platonism, entered into the distinction between fancy and imagination which was redefined in romantic poetics. For Wordsworth, fancy denoted aesthetic perception and association, whereas imagination, the intuitive fathoming of eternal forms, became an understanding of an all-pervading divine spirit within nature of which the poet was a part and which was hence no longer directly related to neo-classical definitions of form. Poetry as the "overflow of powerful feelings . . . recollected in tranquility" became the means whereby the poet established his identity with nature.

S. T. Coleridge recognized the kinship of the distinction between fancy and imagination with the aesthetic theories of Kant, Schiller, and Schelling. Identifying "fancy" with Kantian understanding (Verstand) and "imagination" with reason (Vernunft), Coleridge defined primary imagination as "a repetition in the finite mind of the eternal act of creation in the infinite I Am," and secondary imagination as the power of expressing this insight formally. In making these distinctions Coleridge echoed the 18th c. Eng. tradition associated with Shaftesbury, but from his German readings he understood that in the 19th c. this is also a transcendentalist formulation: the poet fuses himself and the world of objects into a transcendental reality of the spirit, exhibited in the poem as the result of the unifying or "esemplastic" power of the imagination. This point of view influenced Coleridge's discussions of meter and language in his criticisms of Wordsworth and his critical judgments of Shakespeare (whatever his debt to A. W. Schlegel may have been). Meter establishes aesthetic distance through its tension with the natural rhythm of language and thus unifies and objectifies the passions. Coleridge's view of the totality of the work of art, mirroring the totality of life, which he applied to his Shakespeare criticism, reflects the transcendentalist notion according to which the poem as a total and organized unit mirrors the unity of life as a whole.

Among other Eng. critics of the age, essayists like William Hazlitt (1778-1830) and Charles Lamb (1775-1834) emphasized the evocative and metaphoric nature of poetry and criticism in their general views and in their criticisms of Shakespeare and other poets. More central to the current of transcendentalist poetics was the thought of Thomas de Quincey (1785-1859) who favored Kant's philosophy and Jean Paul's views of the relationship of poetry and dream. De Quincey's distinction between literature of knowledge (impermanent assemblages of facts) and literature of power (lasting works of creative imagination) reflects Coleridge's distinction of fancy and imagination in terms of the Kantian dualism. Linking up this view with the notion that superior awareness resides in dream (often stimulated by drugs), De Quincey conceived of the self, in its heightened imaginative act, as the instrument of the reason and thus opened the way to the kind of transcendentalist poetics we find later in Poe, Baudelaire, Rimbaud, and the symbolist movement.

The distinction between the passive conception of self as experiencer and the active conception of self as attaining to superior truths in inspiration is applied to conceptions of the self as hero in the poetry of Lord George Gordon Byron (1788-1824) and Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822). The passive self is dramatized into the suffering as well as perceiving hero, the active self into that of the poet-hero as the conqueror of opposing external forces. At the same time, Shelley's Defence of Poetry (1821, publ. 1840), directed against Thomas Love Peacock's Four Ages of Poetry (1820) explores the relation of the poet to his craft and to the external world. Shelley defines imagination as a heightened experience, an inexpressible state of mind in which the mind is a bright coal fading in the actual process of creation. But he also views the poet as an active knower, an "unacknowledged legislator" of the world, who, while he expresses emotions, also copies eternal ideas through his language, and, beyond language, through symbols. Although John Keats (1795-1821) also identified truth and beauty, his concept of "negative capability" sought to exclude from the poet's search for truth a deliberate striving for perfect knowledge (which was to be left to the philosopher). For Keats, truth reveals itself in the act of feeling and creation through the genius of poetry rather than through the poet's self-conscious quest. Among later Eng. critics, Thomas Carlyle (1795-1881) did much to stimulate interest in German romanticism in England through translations and studies. The transcendentalist emphasis upon the self led in Carlyle's thought to an extension of the concept of the active hero into the supreme knower and creator with whom the poet was identified, as his work was identified with the echo of the divine ideal. In the United States, various derivations of transcendentalism from German and Eng. sources supplied defining characteristics to the mid-century flowering of romanticism in New England. Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803-82) sought a fusion of 18th-c. Eng. Neoplatonism and 19th-c. German transcendentalism. In his view, the soul rises to a comprehension of the universal order, to a realm of the spirit symbolized in external nature, which can be shared by the poet himself.

In France, the generation of François-René Chateaubriand (1768-1848), which was contemporaneous with Wordsworth, Coleridge and the older romantics in Germany, reflected views more easily associated with 18th-c. subjective empiricism and inspirationalism, coupled with neoclassical standards than with romantic formulations. With the appearance of De l'Allemagne (1813) by Mme de Staël (Germaine Necker) (1766-1817) German ideas in philosophy and literature were introduced into Fr. letters, but Mme de Staël's interpretation of these ideas emphasized the subjecttivism of German romantic theories and ignored their objective formulations. Alphonse de Lamartine (1790-1869) pointed the way to an increasingly subjective, lyrical view of the nature of poetry which was reinforced by his growing affinity with Byron and other romantic writers. In addition to its concern with the relaxation of dramatic rules, the issue in Fr. romanticism was lyricism. Poets like Alfred de Vigny (1797-1863) and Victor Hugo (1802-85) aimed at the liberalization of verse forms and of distinctions between genres and levels of style in favor of poetic inspiration. Victor Hugo viewed art as a totality, a complete reflection of beauty founded in myth, and thus believed in the identity of form and content and in the reconciling power of the imagination. Essentially, Hugo's romanticism implied, in various degrees, rebellion against authority, whether in drama, poetry, criticism, or politics, and a view of the poet as the towering exile whose vision is perpetually misunderstood. Among other romantic poets in France, Gérard de Nerval (1808-50) is noteworthy not only for his translation of Faust (1830) but also for his fusion of imagination, image, and dream which contributed to the transformation of romantic into symbolist poetics.

In Italy, the romantic position in the debate with classical authority had been foreshadowed by Vittorio Alfieri (1749-1803), who conceived the role of the poet as that of an inspired upholder of freedom and fighter against tyrants. The more mature romanticism was represented, among others, by Ugo Foscolo (1778-1827), Alessandro Manzoni (1785-1873), and Giacomo Leopardi (1798-1837). Their views of the nature of poetry and the poet, of imagination and prescribed form, reenact Fr. and German debates of the 18th and 19th c. Most influential during the second half of the century was the scholar and critic Francesco de Sanctis (1817-83). In his critical essays and lectures, as well as in his Storia della letteratura italiana (1870-71), De Sanctis held transcendentalist views of poetics in their Hegelian formulation; yet, more rigorously than Hegel, he taught strict adherence to aesthetic form which rises to the poet's mind simultaneously with the idea which it seeks to express. In Spain, the attempts to define the nature of folk poetry by Manuel Milá y Fontanals (1818-84) and the views of the role of metrics in verse romance advanced by Angel de Saavedra, Duke of Rivas (1791-1865) are of special interest. The reciprocal effect on Sp. poetics of the German romantic enthusiasm for Sp. medieval and Renaissance masterpieces, the influence of Fr. and It. poetics, and the mid-century vogue of German metaphysics (based on the derivative theories of Friedrich Krause [1781-1832]) channelled poetics in Spain in a romantic direction. In Russia, a neoclassic attitude towards poetry early in the century was gradually displaced by a new spirit in the 1820s when Byron became a vogue. Alexander Pushkin (1799-1837) and Michael Lermontov (1814-41) are perhaps the foremost representatives of this spirit. On the whole, Fr. and German ideas contributed to the formulation of romantic poetics in Russia which, as elsewhere in Europe, were interwoven with political issues.

3. Realism, Idealism, and the Revival of Classicism: Transcendentalism was a philosophical expression of the poet's new relationship with himself as experiencer and actor and with the world of nature as a sensibly accessible universe of experience. An important force in the growing rejection of romanticism emerged in the empiricist and scientific positivism of Auguste Comte (1798-1857). Positivism brought with it the suggestion that poetry is necessitated by its external conditions and can be explained by them. This attitude is enhanced by the writings of social reformers like Claude-Henri Saint-Simon (1760-1825) and Pierre-Joseph Proudhon (1809-65), who focused on the social origin of poetry, as well as by theorists like the painter Gustave Courbet (1819-77), who believed that any imposition of convention upon a rigorously executed reproduction of the external world had to be dismissed as an objectionable "aristocratic pose." Both these formulations required realism, i.e., the depiction of the world "as it is," in vision and technique. At the same time, realism also became an important aesthetic reaction against romantic idealism. This position is evident in the antiromantic posture of the Parnassian School of Théodore de Banville (1823-91), Théophile Gautier (1811-72), and others, who sought to represent concrete objects and to manipulate them in language and verse forms following neoclassical conventions. But unlike the realism advocated by Courbet, the realism of this school served purely aesthetic purposes which anticipate the art-for-art's sake movements later in the century. In the Eng. language, on the other hand, the use and advocacy of realistic techniques in the poetry and poetics of Alfred Tennyson (1809-92), Robert Browning (1812-89), or Walt Whitman (1819-92) was combined with an idealistic and often even mystical world view, a combination still betraying the lasting influence of Wordsworth. Similarly Wordsworthian, John Stuart Mill (1806-73) extended the identification of poetry with feeling by applying to it an associationist psychology without the aesthetic limitations drawn by Wordsworth's theories of memory and imagination. If Courbet's realism tended to dismiss poetry altogether by condemning all conventions, and if the Parnassian poets dissolved poetry into pure rhetoric, Mill's position allowed poetry to evaporate into pure feeling, a view which is epitomized in the contemporary positivism advocated in the early work of I. A. Richards.

The conception of realism which subjects poetry to its determining influences is evident in the historical theories of Ernest Renan (1823-92) and Hippolyte Taine (1828-93). Taine's slogan "race, milieu, moment" states that the moment and conditions of creation are sufficient to reveal the nature of poetry. In England, this point of view was reinforced by the rise of Darwinism as reflected in the writings of Thomas Henry Huxley (1825-95) and Herbert Spencer (1820-1903). Darwinist theories of evolution, in turn, affected continental poetics, as shown, for example, in the literary theory of Ferdinand Brunetière (1849-1906), according to which each literary genre is defined by its evolution and the manners which determine its changes during its progress through time. In Russia, the view of poetry as an expression of society was advocated by the Saint-Simonian Socialist Alexander Herzen (1812-70), Vissarion Belinsky (1811-48), and N. A. Dobrolyubov (1836-61). Belinsky, famous for his sociological criticism based on Feuerbach's materialistic interpretation of Hegel, identified poetry with society. Leo Tolstoy (1829-1910), from a very different ideological position, viewed poetry as a vehicle for the expression of emotions, for the communication of accurate perceptions of external reality, and for the implementation of desirable social and religious ends. The notion of literature as a social phenomenon serving the criticism of society, the naturalism of Émile Zola, most immediately affected prose fiction and the drama, but as a critical theory it also became profoundly significant to poetry.

The extension of romanticism into an increasingly idealistic conception of poetry is distinct from, though interrelated with, the positivistic point of view and the practice of realism. In the United States, Emerson had applied Coleridge's definition of the imagination to the notion of a universal spirit, which, through manifestation in the world of sense, unites the poet with the spiritual and moral order of which he is a part. Walt Whitman celebrated the poet as seer who found the universal truths embedded in the physical universe. Poetic language must express this impulse of identity with the universe, a view which accounts for Whitman's free verse as well as for his realistic techniques. Whitman's pantheism, by focusing on the immanence of the spirit in physical and human nature, reconciled his idealism with a sociological view of poetry as a mirror of democratic society. In Germany, post-Hegelian transcendentalism influenced both early Marxist and idealistic views of poetry. Realistic technique affected the extension of romantic nature poetry into the late 19th c., but at the same time essentially idealistic theories of symbolism and tragedy emerged under the aegis of Schopenhauer, in his reformulation of Kant, whose influence rose markedly during the second half of the century. The view propounded by Richard Wagner (1813-83) that music is the pure, aesthetic component of all artistic language and that all forms of art are fused into a music of ideas caught in the complex of aesthetic symbols profoundly influenced symbolist poetics in France.

Although he was deeply opposed to Hegelianism, Friedrich Nietzsche (1844-1900) incorporated in his view of tragedy the unity and opposition of formal and antiformal elements. Contrasting classical Apollonian order with the Dionysian annihilation of the limits of existence, Nietzsche viewed the former as the common characteristic of beauty and the latter as the true essence of tragedy. (See APOLLONIAN-DIONYSIAN). In the great Gr. tragedies both these elements are juxtaposed and intermingled, defining and opposing one another in mutual interaction. In this way, the poet of true tragedy can reenact man's fundamental impulses, founded in myth, through symbolic characters and events and provide a regeneration of these impulses through which alone man can satisfy his striving for existence. Similarly, the aesthetic speculations of Fyodor Dostoyevsky (1821-81) and the theological treatises of Søren Kierkegaard (1813-55) furthered the concept of the poet as attempting to annihilate the paradoxes of existence within a framework whose oppositions and reconciliations recall a Hegelian world view despite their profound rejection of the Hegelian system.

Post-Hegelian transcendentalism also directed historical, ideological, and philological approaches to poetry. Despite overt rejections of Hegel during some phases of the later 19th c., Hegel's identification of poetry with history, which obliterated the distinctions between genres and rendered poetic rules obsolete, resulted in a displacement of critical by historical criteria which had been prepared for by the historical and philological preoccupations of the Brothers Grimm. In a philosophical historian like Wilhelm Dilthey (1833-1911), the historical idea was fused with a psychological and cultural view of the relationship of poetry to man and society. As a result, Dilthey advocated an historical approach in which poetry was judged not by its inherent properties but by its manner of shaping and being shaped by its historical evolution and by its manner of mirroring the ideas and attitudes appropriate to its particular position in time. In this form, German Geistesgeschichte, which viewed the poem in terms of the spirit of the era which produced it (including its language, philosophy, science, painting, music, etc.) and in terms of the poet himself as the exemplar of this spirit, has determined much of the most important German criticism to this day. At the same time, the Hegelian conceptions of poetry did not necessarily displace tradition and poetic rules.

The criticism of Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve (1804-69) was both impressionistic and traditionalist, his method historical and analytic. In Sainte-Beuve's view, poetry is an expression of the poet's personality, a manifestation of the poet's intuition and of the social and historical context which shaped him. But at the same time Sainte-Beuve derived his critical standards from within the Fr. classical tradition. This dual position was fortified by theories of critics like Ferdinand Brunetière and literary historians like Gustave Lanson (1857-1934). A similar outlook, however, was sharpened in the criticism of Matthew Arnold (1822-88) into a well-defined classical position. Arnold combined his historical idealism (based on Coleridge, Shelley, and Goethe) with a classical point of view. On the one hand he viewed poetry as part of a movement of ideas and the poet as the intuitive critic of ideas. On the other hand, he insisted on the permanence of literary values both in his reaction against Carlyle and German romanticism and in his debate with scientific naturalism. This position is evident in Arnold's belief in the "touchstones" of great art and in his confidence in the models of the ancients. Taking issue with the scientific exclusion of poetry from actual knowledge, he claimed for poetry an all-inclusiveness traditionally reserved for philosophy and a moral efficacy traditionally associated with religion.

The vogue of Hegelianism, and its variants, in late 19th-c. philosophy produced many theories important to 20th- rather than 19th-c. poetics—notably Bernard Bosanquet's theory of catharsis, Henri Bergson's analysis of intuition and time, Benedetto Croce's analysis of art as expression and intuition and his Hegelian dissolution of genres into the flow of history. Manifesting themselves in realistic and idealistic positions, transcendentalism and positivism ushered in the major critical theories which have dominated 20th-c. poetics: the sociological and psychological theories of Marxist, Freudian, and behavioristic poetics, the impressionism and biographical approaches of George Saintsbury and Edmund Gosse, the emphasis on the history of ideas so important to critical discussion in Germany, France, and, recently, the United States. The stress upon tradition and classicism, moreover, aided in the development of modern formalist theories, which logically emerged from the symbolist implications of transcendentalism.

4. The Symbolist Phase: Symbolism, as a rebellion against both the traditionalism of Sainte-Beuve and the naturalism of Taine and Zola, originated in an aesthetic interpretation of transcendentalist poetics which was greatly affected by the ideas of Edgar Allan Poe (1809-49). Despite his rejection of Emerson, Poe's remarks about the nature of poetry and beauty are by no means unrelated to the transcendentalist tradition, but rather develop a symbolic concept of poetry, which returns to the early romantic conception of the ideal attained to in poetry as essentially aesthetic. Poe thought of the poet as the reflector of "supernal" beauty, an ideal reached by the marshalling of all the senses not to mirror objects of experience but to transform them symbolically. Beauty, moreover, is also feeling; poetry, distilled from the discursive functions of its language, is music which, through its dispositions of sound, organizes the essences of all experiences into art. So defined, pure poetry represents an end in itself, unalloyed by considerations of moral, social, and other didactic purposes.

In France, Charles Baudelaire (1821-67), under the influence of Poe, Gautier, Swedenborg, Wagner, and others, viewed the poet as translating his experiences into symbols of a transcendental reality through a fusion of all the senses. These symbols are concrete, preferably artificial forms which obtain an existence of their own as images from a realm beyond sense. Uniting his craft with the crafts of other arts, such as music and painting, the poet thus strives to capture the infinite within the finite limits of his poem. The result has been lyrical poetry in which, despite important modifications in metrics, the personal experience is translated into an aesthetic experience chiefly through imagery reflecting artificial objects and often through an allegorical or stylized depiction of external, human, and moral nature. Arthur Rimbaud (1854-91) extended Baudelaire's notion of the poet's function in a more radical direction. He enacted the role of the poet as seer who, in a heightened state of awareness often stimulated by intoxication and drugs, accumulates within himself all possible experiences, especially those arising from unconscious dream. Through an intense disordering of all the senses, the poet becomes "another" by recreating his conscious and unconscious perceptions in detached forms, manipulated neither by laws of psychology nor by logical or dramatic sequence but by aesthetic dispositions of color, imagery, and sound.

The symbolist point of view was developed further by Paul Verlaine (1844-96) and by the practice of poets like Tristan Corbière (1845-75). It was crystallized in the Symbolist Manifesto of 1886 in a pointed exchange between Anatole France (1844-1922), the exponent of rationalism and classicism, and Jean Moréas (1856-1910). Poets responsible for the symbolist program in France and Belgium (Gustave Kahn, Francis Viéllé-Griffin, Stuart Merrill, Maurice Maeterlinck, Emile Verhaeren, and others) were intensely concerned with dissolving the logic of Fr. poetry. They seized upon music as the most striking method whereby logical sequence could be "liquefied." Denying, with Verlaine, poetic language its communicative function, symbolists viewed the language of poetry as a veil preventing rather than enhancing intelligible communication. At the same time, paradox, as developed from the concept of romantic irony, was used not in a logical function but precisely in an illogical fashion—to destroy logic through unexpected contradiction. But the poet's duty was also to transcend the world of sense by absorbing its inherent contradictions. The dreams of his subconscious, reflections of a higher order, became concrete, though detached symbols, which, in their illogical connections and sound and image patterns, manifested that higher reality. The symbolist position, therefore, entailed an extreme subjectivism, a concern with the darkest aspects of the subconscious (which led to a label of "decadent"); paradoxically, however, it was also characterized by an extreme aesthetic detachment and by a preference for the artificial. The greatest exponent of symbolism was Stéphane Mallarmé (1842-98) who furthered the dissolution of logical verse into music and illogical paradox and resolved the apparent contradiction between the subjective origin of a poem and its objective detachment through form by counseling total annihilation of the "life" emotion which inspired the poem. The more rigidly the poetic symbol excludes the world of natural reality and the initial emotion the more closely it approximates the ideal of art.

In England, the art-for-art's-sake movement represented a fusion of native Platonism (developed from Coleridge and Shelley), a resurgence of Hegelianism, and Fr. symbolism and "decadence." John Ruskin (1819-1900), William Morris (1834-96), and others returned to "imagination" as the source of poetic genius and as a means whereby a transcendent realm could be reached in which ethical truth and aesthetic form were one. Walter Pater (1839-94) carried Ruskin's Platonic aestheticism further by identifying the aesthetic function of poetry with the production of pleasure valuable for its own sake. The "Pre-Raphaelite" circle of Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828-82), his sister Christina Rossetti (1830-94), and others, was a movement originally concerned with painting, insisting that conventions imposed since Raphael had obscured the eye for the object "as it is." Advocating the minute, photographic representation of objects rather than the use of objects as concretized symbols of inner states, the Pre-Raphaelites approached more a Parnassian than a symbolist aestheticism. Algernon Charles Swinburne (1837-1909) was one of the first important Eng. poets and critics to acknowledge the significance of Fr. poetry and to identify himself publicly with the art-for-art's-sake implications of Parnassian and symbolist aestheticism. In his essay on Blake (1868), he proclaimed the didactic heresy (l'hérésie de l'enseignement) and asserted a rigorous classical position of pure art. His dandyism was a Baudelairean rejection, as he understood it, of the bourgeois optimism of his time; his criticism a deliberate attempt to use the standards of Gautier, Baudelaire, and Mallarmé in the analysis and writing of Eng. poetry. Oscar Wilde (1856-1900) similarly acknowledged Fr. poetry as an important model for Eng. aestheticism. He celebrated art as the model of nature, and beauty as a symbol of ultimate truth "because it expresses nothing." George Moore (1857-1933) knew intimately, through reading and personal acquaintance, many of the important symbolist writers and introduced their notion of purity into the antididactic movement of the last decades of the century. Finally, Arthur Symonds' (1865-1945) devoted summary of The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) attests to the decisive mark which Fr. aestheticism and symbolism left on fin de siècle poetics in England.

Aestheticism in poetry pervaded most of Europe during the closing decades of the 19th c. In Russia, a formalist movement under the aegis of Fr. symbolism is associated with the names of Konstantin Balmont (1867-1943), Valery Bryusov (1873-1924), Vyacheslav Ivanov (1866-1949), Andrey Bely (1880-1934) (pseud. for Boris N. Bugayev), and Alexander Blok (1880-1921). In conjunction with academic criticism and scholarship, it gave rise to an important formalist school of criticism, poetics, and linguistics during the first three decades of this century. In Spanish literature, the Nicaraguan Rubén Darío (1867-1916) was a foremost exponent of the movement of modernismo, which drew heavily upon Fr. Parnassian and symbolist sources. Juan Ramón Jiménez (1881-1958) struggled towards a "pure poetry," ranging from an early dependence on Fr. symbolism to an increasing simplicity of style. Federico García Lorca represents the culmination of a modern development of poetry and poetics in Spain, both in the scope and in the quality of his achievement. In Italy, Gabriele D'Annunzio (1863-1938) stands out as a representative of a poetic theory which emphasized aesthetic form while celebrating subjective and unconscious inspiration. In Germany, the aestheticism of the school surrounding Stefan George (1868-1933), primarily influenced by Fr. symbolists, Nietzsche, and the Eng. Pre-Raphaelites, introduced a notion of poetry as prophecy and a highly formal and precious language which was not meant to serve immediate didactic ends but which, aristocratically divorced from life, was meant to transmit a visionary incantation of higher truths. Apart from the George circle, and often in opposition to it, Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926) developed a musical and pictorial approach to poetry which was reinforced by the models of Baudelaire and Verlaine. Rilke's theory of Dinge defined the phenomena experienced by the poet as concretized abstractions, which, obtaining a life of their own, are caught by the poet and reconstituted in art—a further refinement of symbolist method. At the turn of the 20th c., the symbolist position was extended by the rationalistic mysticism of Paul Valéry. Moreover, 20th-c. "classicism," as formulated by T. E. Hulme, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, and others, while rejecting the transcendentalist rationale of symbolism, nonetheless retained its analysis of the manner in which emotion in life is reformulated as emotion in art.

To avoid duplication, only a few items from the latter 18th c. are included in this biblog. For further references to this period, see NEO-CLASSICAL POETICS.

PRIMARY WORKS: M. Arnold, Essays in Crit., 1st ser. (1833), 2d ser. (1888); T. Carlyle, Critical and Miscellaneous Essays (5 v., 1839); S. T. Coleridge, Lectures on Shakespeare, 1st ser. (1808), 2d ser. (1811-12), Biographia Literaria (1817); R. W. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser. (1841), 2d ser. (1844); W. Hazlitt, Lectures on the Eng. Poets (1818); S. Johnson, Prefaces to the Plays of Shakespeare (1765), The Lives of the Eng. Poets (1779-81); W. Pater, The Renaissance. Studies in Art and Poetry (1910); E. A. Poe, "The Philosophy of Composition" (1846), "The Poetic Principle" (1850); W. Wordsworth, "Essay Supplementary . . ." (1815).—W. Dilthey, Das Erlebnis und die Dichtung (1906); F. von Hardenberg (Novalis), Fragmente und Studien, 1798-9, Novalis Schriften, ed. Kluckhohn (4 v., 1929; 2 and 3); H. Heine, Die romantische Schule (1833); J. G. Herder, Über die neuere deutsche Lit. (1767), Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität (1793-97); F. Nietzsche, Die Geburt der Tragödie (1871); Fr. Schiller, Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795), Briefe über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (1795); A. W. Schlegel, Gesch. der deutschen Sprache und Poesie (1818-19, ed. J. Körner, 1913); Fr. Schlegel, Gespräch über die Poesie (1800), Gesch. der alten und neuen Lit. (1812); L. Tieck, Kritische Schriften (4 v., 1848-52). C. Baudelaire, "Edgar Poe, sa vie et ses oeuvres" (1856), "Notes Nouvelles sur Edgar Poe" (1857), L'Art romantique (1868); M. H. Beyle (Stendhal), Racine et Shakespeare (1823); H. Bergson, Le Rire (2d ed., 1901); F. Brunetière, L'Évolution des genres dans l'hist. de la litt. (1890); F.-R. de Chateaubriand, Essai sur la litt. anglaise (1836); D. Diderot, Paradoxe sur le comédien (1778, publ. 1830); T. Gautier, Hist. du romantisme (1874); V. Hugo, "Préface de Cromwell" (1827), William Shakespeare (1864); S. Mallarmé, Divagations (6th ed., 1922); A. Rimbaud, "Letters to Charles Izambard and Paul Demeny" (1870) in Lettres de la vie littéraire d'Arthur Rimbaud, ed. J.-M. Carré (1931); C.-A. Sainte-Beuve, Portraits littéraires (3 v., 1862-64); H. Taine, De l'idéal dans l'art (1867), Introd. à l'hist. de la litt. anglaise, ed. I. Babbitt (1898).—Discussioni e polemiche sul romanticismo (1816-26), ed. E. Bellorini (2 v., 1943); G. Baretti, A Dissertation upon It. Poetry (1753), Discours sur Shakespeare (1777); G. Carducci, Discorsi letterari e storici (1868-88); F. De Sanctis, Teoria e storia della lett., ed. B. Croce (2 v., 1926); U. Foscolo, Essays on Petrarch (1823); G. Leopardi, Zibaldone di pensieri (1817-32); A. Manzoni, Preface to Il Conte di Carmagnola (1820); E. Visconti, Idea elementaria sulla poesia romantica (1818; in Discussioni . . . , 1).—M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Estudios de crítica literaria (5 ser., 1884-1908) and Historia de las ideas estéticas en España (9 v., new ed., 1890-1912); M. Milá y Fontanals, Observaciones sobre la poesía popular (1853) and Principios de lit. general (1874); F. de Paula Martínez de la Rosa, Poética (1827); A. de Saavedra, Duque de Rivas, Preface to Romances históricos (1841).—V. Belinsky, Lit. Reveries (1834), Thoughts and Notes on Rus. Lit. (1846), Selected Philosophical Works (Moscow, 1948, tr. anon.; contains both the above items); A. Bely, Symbolism (1910); A. Blok, "On the Present State of Symbolism" (1910); V. Bryusov, Rus. Symbolists (1894)*; A. Potebnya, Lectures on Lit. Theory (1894)*; A. Pushkin, Preface to Boris Godunov (1827); L. Tolstoy, What is Art? (5th ed., tr. A. Maude, 1899). * These titles are translated from the Rus. The books and essays in question are not yet available in Eng.

SECONDARY WORKS. Consult: Abrams; A. Béguin, L'Âme romantique et le rêve (1939); C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of Symbolism (1943); The Romantic Imagination (1949);

P. Van Tieghem, L'Ère romantique (1948); Wellek; Wimsatt and Brooks.—W. J. Bate, From Classic to Romantic (1946); F. O. Matthiessen, Am. Renaissance (1941); R. Z. Temple, The Critic's Alchemy (1953); B. Willey, 19th C. Studies, Coleridge to Matthew Arnold (1949); R. Wellek, Immanuel Kant in England, 1793–1838 (1931).—R. Benz, Die deutsche Romantik (3d ed., 1956); E. Cassirer, Idee und Gestalt. Goethe, Schiller, Hölderlin, Kleist (1921); H. A. Korff, Geist der Goethezeit. (4 v., 1923–53); O. Walzel, Die deutsche Lit. von Goethes Tod bis zur Gegenwart (5th ed., 1929), Grenzen von Poesie und Nichtpoesie (1937).—A. Cassagne, La Théorie de l'art pour l'art chez les romantiques et les premiers réalistes (1906); K. Cornell, The Symbolist Movement (1951); T. S. Eliot, From Poe to Valéry (1948); E. Fiser, Le Symbole littéraire (1941); Lehmann; Martino; Raymond; M. A. Souriau, Histoire du romantisme en France (2 v., 1927); B. Weinberg, Fr. Realism. The Critical Reaction, 1830–70 (1937).—G. Borgese, Storia della critica romantica in Italia (2d ed., 1920); G. Citanna, Il Romanticismo e la poesia ital. dal Parini al Carducci (1949); B. Croce, Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (2d part, 2d ed., 1922), Poesie e non poesia (1923), La Lett. ital. (4 v., 1956–61; m); M. Fubini, Romanticismo ital. (1953); G. Getto, Storia delle storie letterarie (2d ed., 1946).—I. L. McClelland, The Origins of the Romantic Movement in Spain (1937); E. A. Peers, A Hist. of the Romantic Movement in Spain (2 v., 1940).—H. Bowman, Vissarion Belinsky, 1811–48 (1954); V. Erlich, Russian Formalism (1955); L'estetica e la poetica in Russia, ed. E. Lo Gatto (1947; anthol. of essays by Russian poets and critics); O. A. Maslennikov, The Frenzied Poets: The Russian Symbolists (1952); D. S. Mirsky, A Hist. of Russian Lit. (1949). R.F.

II. 20TH-C. AMERICAN AND BRITISH. Under the influence of developments in other disciplines, especially philosophy and psychology, the theorizing about poetry that has gone on in this century has been multifarious. Since a good deal of it has been by critics, to classify the various approaches would be to duplicate too much what is done in Criticism, Types of (q.v.); and to attempt to deal with every figure who has at one time or another enjoyed some kind of prestige is clearly unfeasible. (But see the secondary works listed in the bibliography below.) Accordingly, most of the attention in this brief article will be directed to writers who have both contributed something new to poetic theory and have had, or seem likely to have, a marked effect on the writing, criticism, and teaching of poetry; and the subject will be treated mainly chronologically, with a view to exhibiting a distinctively 20th-c. pattern of development.

Most of the writers involved (a considerable number of whom have themselves been poets) have tended to concentrate on some or all of four closely related topics—the processes of poetic creation, the poetic medium, the process of reading a poem, and the cognitive status of poetry. The influence most widespread among them has been Coleridge's, especially his concept of the organic unity of a poem (see ORGANISM), and most of them have been concerned to redefine and defend poetry's autonomy. The pattern of development referred to above is as follows. Owing in part, no doubt, to the continuing influence of the symboliste movement (see SYMBOLISM), the first phase of "modernist" theorizing involved a revulsion from the then common notion that poetry is primarily interesting for its autobiographical revelations or for the profundity of its thought; a major effect of this revulsion was the theoretical banishment from poetry of much that has generally been thought to give it seriousness (and the ruling out, by implication, of the kind of sensitively and complexly philosophical approach employed by a critic like George Santayana); and the need of subsequent writers has been to find ways of reasserting the seriousness of poetry without falling into oversimplifications or sacrificing the best modern insights.

The notion that poetry should be restricted to being mimetic in the simpler of Aristotle's senses of the term—namely, concerned with representing physical phenomena—was first reasserted in this century by T. E. Hulme (between 1909, approximately, and 1917) and by Ernest Fenollosa in The Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry (written before 1908, in Ezra Pound's hands by 1913, and first published by him in 1920). Influenced by their studies of, respectively, Bergson and ideographic literature, both writers argued that reality was, in effect, a kind of flux, unseizable by means of "abstract" language and traditional logic. And, especially when taken in conjunction with the ideas of Remy de Gourmont (and, to some extent, of W. B. Yeats) and publicized by Ezra Pound, the prescriptions for poets that they set up on this metaphysical basis have had a very marked effect on modern poetry and poetics.

This influence was particularly prepotent during the formative decade between 1910 and 1920. Hulme's insistence on concreteness of presentation (which Fenollosa also advocated) and on sharpness of visualization, and his belief that emotion could best be conveyed by describing natural objects, were taken up for a time by Pound and the Imagists and almost certainly contributed to the formulation and acceptance of T. S. Eliot's notion of the "objective correlative" (q.v.). Influential, similarly, was Hulme's demand that poetry be dry, witty and anti-sentimental in tone, as was his support of the Free Verse movement. But perhaps most potent of all was the insistence of both Hulme and Fenollosa that ordinary daily language was imprecise and shop-worn, that poets should endeavor to revivify the language of their times, and that the essential strength of poetry lay in figurative language, especially metaphors; and the notion (held, to some extent, by Yeats too) that poetic language should be, in effect, an intensified and enriched form of contemporary speech was taken up influentially by Eliot and subsequently considerably developed and refined by F. R. Leavis.

But while most of these notions have become common currency, a number of objections to some of them have been raised at various times, and some of the most important ones can appropriately be mentioned here. First, (influenced by Irving Babbitt) Yvor Winters has argued that poetry is not mimetic at all but meditative—a poet's experience plus his understanding of it. Second, in The Problem of Style (1922) J. Middleton Murry, in addition to denying the primacy of visualization in poetry (as Leavis has done too), argued that a poet need by no means always employ metaphors or concrete particulars as symbols of his emotions, but that under certain conditions even ideas could be adequate symbols. Third, Murray Krieger, adopting a somewhat Crocean position, has recently argued that despite Hulme's emphasis on using words freshly, his emphasis on the presentation of things already apprehended tended seriously to undervalue the role of language in literary creation. And, lastly, the basic antithesis between "concretions" and "abstractions" has been challenged by T. C. Pollock and Donald Davie, who have argued that both are alike abstractions from an individual's total apprehension of a situation.

If Hulme, Fenollosa and Pound were much concerned with prescribing for others, T. S. Eliot was apparently considerably concerned in his most influential criticism (that between about 1917 and 1925) with indirectly defining and defending the kind of poetry that he himself wished to write; and the terms in which he did so were largely those of the psychology of poetic creation (a topic, incidentally, which has considerably interested such other writers as Robert Graves, Maud Bodkin, and Kenneth Burke). To extract a systematic poetics from this criticism is difficult, for Eliot's terminology is sometimes unclear and it is often difficult to determine whether he is speaking analytically or impressionistically, and whether of all poets, of some poets, or only of himself. But the main outline of his position appears to be roughly as follows. Essentially, a poet's task during creation is to give expression to some extremely complex state of mind that has been forming itself unconsciously out of his stored experiences and is now beginning to agitate him obscurely. If he is successful, the resultant poem will be, in a sense, impersonal (for it is not the direct emotional response of the poet to some particular situation in his own life); and it should not be valued for its ideas as such but for its demonstration of what it feels like to the poet to have them. But this does not mean that intelligence has no role in poetry. On the contrary, the more intelligent a poet is, the broader his education, and the more he belongs to a coherent cultural tradition, the better; for the greater then will be the variety of experiences and ideas that, given a suitably flexible sensibility, he will be able to absorb emotionally so that they can become, potentially, fit material for poetry. And what he should attempt to achieve in his poetry (and, presumably, in his consciousness too) is the kind of reconciliation of opposites, the ability to mingle seriousness and levity, and the mature poised tone (coming, in part, from a critical awareness of the limitations of the experiences involved) that Eliot saw as especially characterizing some of the metaphysical poets—notably Marvell.

Much careful criticism of Eliot's position has been offered by such writers as John Crowe Ransom, Eliseo Vivas, Murray Krieger, René Wellek, Leonard Unger, Marshal Van Deusen, and, most notably, Yvor Winters. The most serious point that has been made against it is, perhaps, that Eliot has attempted to draw too absolute a distinction between a man's poetic activities and his other activities. For ideas do not seem in fact to be the essentially public, static, and impersonal things that Eliot apparently supposed them to be, and some kind of emotional modification of a person's being, as Van Deusen has argued, is always involved in the having of them. And by dwelling so heavily upon the importance of a poet's objectifying his consciousness, rather than upon his endeavoring to understand it and modify his attitudes accordingly, Eliot would seem, in effect, to be denying to a poet the opportunity to work out in his poetry the kinds of moral or religious concerns that seem to play crucial roles in normal human consciousness. Manifestly Eliot himself, in his later poetry, has not been handicapped in this way; and in some of his later criticism, principally "Dante" (1929) and "Poetry and Propaganda" (1930), he has concerned himself more fully with the problem of belief (q.v.) and poetry. But his discussions still do not indicate clearly how moral activity can go on in the writing and reading of poetry, and seem reducible to little more than the formula that some poets give sensuous life to abstract ideas, their own or other people's; that the extent to which they believe in them can vary considerably from poet to poet; that, other things being equal, it is reasonable to prefer the poetry whose ideas seem to one the truest; but that even when the ideas seem untrue one can still reasonably enjoy successful poetry for the enlargement of awareness that it promotes.

Debatable though some of Eliot's conclusions may be, he has the distinction of having raised and confronted, in a seminal way, most of the major problems in modern poetics. And it seems reasonable to suppose that the challenge of this comprehensiveness considerably helped to stimulate the almost equal comprehensiveness of I. A. Richards. But whereas Eliot wrote primarily as a poet, Richards approached poetry as a psychologist and semanticist concerned to view poetic language under the aegis of language as a whole and refusing to regard poetic creativity as essentially different from other kinds (as A. E. Housman and Herbert Read, for instance, believed it to be). In his extremely influential Principles of Literary Criticism (1924) and Practical Criticism (1929) he founded his system of poetic value on the concept of psychological-physiological "impulses"—largely those of the reader. In a person's daily life, he argued, the greater part of the impulses towards action that are aroused are suppressed in the interests of self-consistency. In the reading of poetry, however, a far greater number than usual can be aroused and so harmonized (by way of the "reconciliation of opposites" that Coleridge described) that no suppression is necessary. And the effect on the reader is a sense of intensified and freshly-ordered life.

Much criticism has been levelled at this theory, especially by such writers as Eliot, Ransom, D. G. James, and Krieger. The weaknesses most often criticized in it are that there is no scientific way of giving any precise account of the 'impulses' in any particular situation, that the theory is too general and relativistic to be of much help to the practicing critic, and that by ignoring the question of poetic form Richards does not seem adequately to differentiate poetry from other forms of art. However, at least two corollaries of Richards' approach have had a very considerable influence on subsequent criticism. By insisting that the 'meaning' of a poem is not something objective and absolutely definable but is created afresh, and somewhat differently in every case, by each reader, Richards did much to encourage William Empson's concern, especially in Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930), with multiple meanings in poetry—a concern aroused, in part, by Laura Riding and Robert Graves's A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1927) and to some extent anticipated also in F. C. Prescott's The Poetic Mind (1922). And Richards' argument that by its inclusiveness a poem could be invulnerable to irony was later extended further by Cleanth Brooks, who argued that irony and paradox were in fact characteristics of virtually all good poetry. Influential, too, have been Richards' discussions of such more practical matters as figurative language (especially metaphor), rhythm, the components of poetic meaning (sense, feeling, tone, intention), and the ways in which poetry can be misread.

That discussions of poetics tended increasingly to focus upon the question of the differences between poetry and non-poetry and of the cognitive value of the former was also largely Richards' doing. In Science and Poetry (1926) he resolutely adopted the positivist position that knowledge comes, in language, only by way of publicly verifiable statements; and since many poetic utterances are clearly not of this nature they must therefore, he argued, be simply expressions of emotion. (The notion that poetry is nonreferential has also been arrived at, by a circuitous route, by Vivas and Krieger.) Such a position, obviously, makes poetry a far less intellectually respectable activity than science; and it must be said that the first major challenges to Richards (with the possible exception of Owen Barfield's Poetic Diction, 1928) did not do much to improve matters. Returning to near Hulme's position, Max Eastman, in The Literary Mind (1931), and John Crowe Ransom (especially between 1930 and 1938) objected independently of each other that actually science is concerned not with pure knowledge but with understanding relationships for the sake of their usefulness, whereas poetry results from a heightened and disinterested consciousness of things in their concrete particularity—for Ransom a consciousness informed by love—and a desire to render them in words. But when Ransom started to deal with poetry more concretely and historically than Hulme had done, a further serious difficulty of this mimetic position began to emerge.

That poetry simply describing natural scenes and objects could be very pleasant had been demonstrated by many Imagist poems and by the poems in George Moore's Pure Poetry: An Anthology (1924); but its range, Ransom pointed out, was very narrow. Yet to prefer, as Ransom did, the metaphysical poetry of the 17th c. necessitated a confrontation of the fact that the latter contained a good many complex, serious, and sometimes decidedly abstract ideas and was concerned with considerably more than natural objects. This difficulty

Ransom tried to resolve by treating the intellectual elements in this poetry as predominantly only delighted perceptions of unexpected resemblances, as manifested in the Metaphysicals' extensive use of figurative language. But, as Richards pointed out in The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936), a figure comprises both a vehicle and a tenor (q.v.); and when finally in The New Criticism (1941) Ransom himself came to argue that most poems do in fact contain a paraphraseable argument, this only brought out more acutely a point that Allen Tate had drawn attention to indirectly by his argument (apropos of "tension" in poetry) that many good poems are highly denotative as well as highly connotative. Either, that is to say, poems must be considered simply prose statements made less coherent (though pleasanter) by meter and other irrelevancies; or else if one believes that poetry, as Tate argued elsewhere, can provide a very important kind of knowledge of the world that is obtainable by no other means, then it is well to have sound theoretical grounds for this belief.

Two approaches seem to have been especially fruitful in confirming the essential seriousness and meaningfulness of poetry. The first, a fresh approach to the whole problem of referentiality, was, paradoxically, initiated by Richards. In Coleridge on Imagination (1934) he accepted the Kantian theory that each person creates his own reality out of the undifferentiated stimuli he receives, and that even the things in the realm of practical everyday experience are mental constructions. Therefore, Richards argued, the constructions that a poet makes by combining those things are not, generically, any less real than the constructions that a scientist makes by abstracting from them—a position that was adopted, too, by D. G. James in Scepticism and Poetry (1937). But it was Philip Wheelwright who, in The Burning Fountain (1954), most powerfully reasserted the claims of poetry to be knowledge. Emotional assent, he argued, is an essential element in the whole concept of truth, and emotion can have, positively, a semantic role. "Some degree of judgement," he insisted, "is implicit in all experience, emotive as well as sensory, and this implicit judgement tends to make some claim about the nature of things." And he accordingly grouped together poetry, symbolism, myth, and religion as the areas in which the emotional response can be at its most intense and a knowledge of the world be obtained that can be obtained in no other way. (Large-scale synthesizing expeditions into these regions have also been undertaken by Susanne K. Langer in Feeling and Form, 1953, and Northrop Frye in Anatomy of Criticism, 1957.)

Since then, Isabel C. Hungerland has attacked the fallacy of "regarding scientific discourse as the paradigm of language in general" and argued persuasively, in Poetic Discourse (1958), that "all the modes of meaning, features, and functions of everyday language are found in poetry."

The second approach has been the attempt to show how ideas and moral values can exist in a poem without its being merely didactic. The traditional notion that poetry provides imitations not so much of objects as of human (and morally evaluable) actions and thoughts—i.e., that it is mimetic in the second and more important of Aristotle's senses of that term—has been reaffirmed most explicitly in this century by the Chicago "Neo-Aristotelians," especially R. S. Crane, from about 1935 onward. (See CHICAGO CRITICS.) A number of other writers (including Cleanth Brooks, R. P. Blackmur, and especially Kenneth Burke with his theory of symbolic action, q.v.) have discarded the concept of mimesis altogether and taken the stand that essentially a poem is itself an action, the poet's own struggle to work out problems, insights, valuations. (See also NEW CRITICISM.) And it is the latter approach, perhaps, that logically permits the completest kind of moral evaluating of a poem. Two writers in particular have demonstrated how such evaluating can effectively be carried on. Since about 1929 Yvor Winters has governed his own criticism by the theory that a successful poem is the culmination of a writer's effort to understand experiences rationally and respond justly to them emotionally—the poem being a final act of perception in which emotion and understanding are simultaneously realized, with the use of verse permitting a more finely controlled emotional response than is possible in prose. (A synthesis of important elements in Winters' position and Wheelwright's has been effected by Van Deusen; Donald Davie has investigated the kind of control attainable through syntax.) And the poetic criticism of F. R. Leavis since 1932, with its concern with the extent and equality of of "felt life" in a poem and degree of maturity in the poem's tone, and its alertness to ways in which the psyche can be enriched or impoverished in its dealings with language, has been perhaps the finest demonstration in our time of the complexity and subtlety of the process of adjustment that can go on in the relating of a poet's experiences and values (as manifested in his poems) to one's own.

By way of conclusion, this much, perhaps, can be ventured. 20th-c. Am. and Brit. writers on poetics have undoubtedly shed more light on their subject than any previous group in British or Am. criticism. But if future writers are to benefit fully from their labors it can surely only be by giving up the attempt to separate poetry rigidly from other forms of discourse and by recognizing that there must be room in poetry, theoretically as well as practically, for all of man's deepest concerns—if, that is, any kind of support is to be given to I. A. Richards' splendid and traditional claim that "poetry is the completest mode of utterance."

PRIMARY WORKS: T. E. Hulme, Speculations, ed. H. Read (1924), and Further Speculations, ed. S. Hynes (1955); W. B. Yeats, Essays (1924); T. S. Eliot, The Use of Poetry and the Use of Crit. (1933), Selected Essays, 1917-1932 (rev. ed., 1950) and On Poetry and Poets (1957); M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934; a predominantly Jungian approach); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation (1936), "'Thought' and Emotional Quality," Scrutiny, 13 (1945), and The Common Pursuit (1952); C. Caudwell, Illusion and Reality (1937; the most ambitious of the Marxist studies of poetry); J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939), The Well Wrought Urn (1947), and, with R. P. Warren, Understanding Poetry (1938); K. Burke, The Philos. of Lit. Form (1941); T. C. Pollock, The Nature of Lit. (1942); R. P. Warren, "Pure and Impure Poetry," KR 5 (1943); Y. Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947; coll. of three earlier books) and The Function of Crit. (1957); The Importance of Scrutiny, ed. E. Bentley (1948); Critiques and Essays in Crit., 1920-1948, ed. R. W. Stallman (1948; extensive coll.; valuable bibliog.); R. Graves, The Common Asphodel (1949); Wellek and Warren; E. Pound, The Letters of Ezra Pound, 1907-1941, ed. D. D. Paige (1950), and Lit. Essays, ed. T. S. Eliot (1954; comprehensive coll. of Pound's crit. since 1913); Lit. Opinion in America, ed. M. D. Zabel (rev. ed., 1951; extensive coll. of 20th-c. crit.; valuable bibliog. appendices); Critics and Crit., ed. R. S. Crane (1952; essays by the "Chicago Critics"); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); D. Davie, Articulate Energy (1955); A. Tate, The Man of Letters in the Modern World (1955); G. Santayana, Essays in Lit. Crit., ed. I. Singer (1956); F. Kermode, Romantic Image (1957; analysis of Symbolist assumptions in 20th-c. theory); L. M. Van Deusen, "In Defense of Yvor Winters," Thought, 32 (1957). See also E. Vivas, Creation and Discovery (1955) and The Artistic Transaction and Essays on Theory of Lit.

SECONDARY WORKS: S. E. Hyman, The Armed Vision (1948; still the most comprehensive study of 20th-c. crit., by an admirer of Kenneth Burke); S. Coffman, Imagism (1951); W. V. O'Connor, An Age of Crit.: 1900-1950 (1952); W. K. Wimsatt and C. Brooks, Lit. Crit.: a Short History (1957); R. J. Foster, The New Romantics; a Reappraisal of the New Crit. (1962). See also M. Krieger, The New Apologists for Poetry (1956) and "After the New Crit.," Massachusetts Rev., 4 (1962); Sutton. J.F.

FRENCH AND GERMAN. Continental poetics remain remarkably autonomous and isolated within their national traditions. A few major figures extend their influence beyond the national borders and there are instances of fruitful cooperation between writers from different nationalities. But on the whole there is less contact between, for instance, Fr., G. and It. poetical theorists than there is between the actual poets of these countries.

In France, up to a recent date, literary theory was overshadowed by the techniques of "explication de texte," a discipline which is not primarily concerned with poetics. It aims at the correct reading of literary texts and is pedagogical rather than critical in purpose. To the extent that it contains an implicit theory of poetry, this theory is positivistic. From Taine, it inherits a considerable interest in the extrinsic forces that act upon literature: social, intellectual, and political history play a large part in the works of the most eminent representative, Gustave Lanson. Its methods are highly analytical and characterized by the virtues of precision and caution inherited from the natural sciences. Because of the particular structure of Fr. literary history, with its high period in the classical 17th and 18th c., the method was primarily devised to deal with authors of that period, hence the emphasis on rhetoric. Orthodox explication is much less at home with 19th-c. romantic and especially symbolist literature, avowedly antirhetorical in purpose. The gap between live poetry, which continued to develop in the wake of symbolism, and the methods taught in the schools kept widening and a reaction was bound to occur.

One should mention Bergson and Valéry among the main initiators of this reaction, because both translated the heritage of symbolism into poetic theory. In Valéry's case, this continues the tradition of a poetry which, ever since Baudelaire and Mallarmé, had been acutely aware of the problems created by its own existence, and had often expressed itself on matters of a theoretical nature. Valéry's main contribution may well have been his help in reawakening interest in theoretical poetics as such, by the numerous and widely read essays in which he advocates a direct study of poetic creation, independently of historical and critical considerations. His efforts culminated in the establishment of a chair in Poetics at the Collège de France, where Valéry himself, from 1937 to 1945, delivered a series of lectures which, unfortunately, have not been recorded. The actual content of his theory has been less influential, possibly because it did not mark such a sharp departure from the premises of the natural sciences. It was primarily the self-reflective, hyper-conscious aspect of symbolism (especially in Mallarmé) that interested Valéry; his thought aims at a rational description of the poetic act, often using his own creative experience as a starting-point towards "reducing poetry to a scientific operation of feeling" (Jean Hytier). Devoid, as Valéry deliberately was, of Mallarmé's dedication to the poetic work as an absolute expression of the human spirit, his theories lead to valid insights but remain, on the whole, the isolated display of his own intellectual idiosyncrasies. Nevertheless, his writings on poetics contain suggestions of great value on the relationship between the workings of the poetic and the rational mind, such as his critique of naive conceptions of "inspiration" and his emphasis on the deliberate, calculated aspects of poetic composition.

Although he was not primarily concerned with poetics and did not write systematically on the subject, Bergson exercised a profound influence on Fr. poetic theory. His constant emphasis on the presence, in human consciousness, of subjective elements pertaining to memory, imagination, intuition, next to—though sharply separated from—elements that possess objective reality, amounts in fact to a poetization of human experience. The entire area of man's contact with the outside world (perception, sensation, etc.) becomes similar to the experience found in works of art and literature. The poetic image, for instance, becomes a close verbal approximation to what perception and sensation are actually like, much closer, at any rate, than the purely intellectual representation of reality found in the scientific concept. Poetics thus becomes a vital source for theoretical psychology, rather than a minor part of it. It has been shown (among others by Fiser) that Bergson's conception is a close equivalent, in philosophical language, of the kind of imagery used by symbolist writers, from Baudelaire to Proust. The unity of a symbolist work always resides in the inner coherence between its images, a coherence similar, in Proust's words, "to the single relationship which, in the world of science, is called the law of cause and effect. . . ." Bergson's work is concerned with this same process as the unifying theme of human consciousness.

Later thinkers such as Jean Wahl or Gaston Bachelard are not to be considered Bergson's disciples in the usual sense of the term, but their independent speculations pursue a direction which Bergson had initiated. By his writings on poetry, by the considerable place he allots to poetics in the field of metaphysics and by his influence as a teacher, Jean Wahl has contributed to a renewal which by now has reached down into the field of practical literary criticism. By means of poetry, as Wahl puts it in a very Bergsonian formula, man will again be able "to communicate substantially with what is substantial in things"; genuine metaphysical thought can also achieve this, but poetry and thought are so closely related as to be almost one and the same thing. A similar insight, more systematically developed, appears in the series of studies which Gaston Bachelard, a philosopher of science, has devoted to what he calls "material imagination." He shows the imagination as acting in a manner which differs from rational cognition by being a direct, unmediated apprehension of matter, a "dreaming about" matter rather than an act of knowledge (one notices the similarity with Bergson's critique of the scientific "symbol" as the sole mode of cognition). In a series of four books, Bachelard attempts a typology of the poetic imagination, cataloguing images according to their dominant material element (fire, water, earth, air). The resulting method does not cover the entirety of the literary work: it describes only the imagery and, it could be argued, only a certain kind of imagery; when used without the inner sympathy with the poet's imagination which Bachelard constantly demands, it could easily become mechanical. The impact of these studies on current Fr. literary criticism is considerable. They allow for a return to the poetic experience as an experience of concrete reality, a return which is implicit in Bergson's philosophy.

Although often critical of Bergson, Jean-Paul Sartre is close to him in his contributions on poetic theory. His study of the imagination insists upon the radical distinction between perception and imagination, a thesis which figures prominently in Bergson's early Matière et mémoire (1900). The method of existential psychoanalysis which he advocates in l'Être et le néant (1943) involves an interpenetration between matter and consciousness which, despite important differences of emphasis, remains Bergsonian; its similarity to Bachelard's theory of material imagination would suffice to indicate this. Sartre's own literary criticism contains examples of such analyses, but in younger critics it is often difficult to separate Sartre's influence from that of Bachelard. In later writings, such as the essay What is Literature? (1949), Sartre has abandoned the pursuit of theoretical poetics which was at least potentially present in his earlier work. By drawing a sharp distinction between literary prose and poetry, he reintroduces interpersonal, ethical considerations in his evaluation of literature and, for the time being at least, puts aside problems of theoretical poetics.

Bachelard and Sartre's poetics are attempts at a phenomenology of the poetic consciousness. They differ from each other by the original situation which is taken as a starting-point: in Bachelard it is man's relationship to the texture and the spatial dimensions of matter, in Sartre it is the existential situation. Another writer who belongs in the same group, Georges Poulet, starts from the poet's sense of temporality, and shows how the structure of the style expresses his specific experience of time; aside from its philosophical implications, the interest of this approach stems from its concern with style and from the possible link it suggests between phenomenological analysis and stylistics. The manner, however, in which Poulet establishes this link remains problematic and in need of a theoretical foundation.

Such a foundation can only be discovered in an exhaustive study of the poetic act; Fr. literary theory has more and more felt the need for an ontology of the poetic as preliminary to a study on such a highly integrated level as that of style. The writer who has perhaps gone furthest in the formulation of such an ontology is Maurice Blanchot. If Valéry and Bergson can be considered as the theorists of symbolism, Blanchot appears in a somewhat similar relationship to the surrealist movement. Already in the oblique and subtle essays of Jean Paulhan and in the tormented meditations of Georges Bataille, some of the surrealist themes had continued to find expression. Blanchot shows how the works of poets gravitate around the ontological question, how they try and fail always again to define human existence by means of poetic language. His writings are unsystematic and highly subjective, but if the necessity for a fundamental questioning of the poetic act is granted, it is bound to begin as a tentative, difficult exploration, and not as a self-assured doctrine.

Practical applications of these and related theories to criticism and history have multiplied in later years. As could be expected, they are centered in the area of the 19th c., and they have modified the traditional picture of Fr. literary history as dominated by 17th-c. classicism. The success of historical studies founded on a symbolist poetics, such as Albert Béguin's book on romanticism (L'Âme romantique et le rêve, 1937) or Marcel Raymond's study of symbolism (De Baudelaire au surréalisme, rev. ed., 1952) illustrates this trend. The study of the 16th and 17th c. has also been influenced by the new trends, and the new emphasis on 16th-c. baroque can undoubtedly be traced back to the same shift in orientation. Among typical examples of books which make use of phenomenological poetics, one should mention Jean Pierre Richard's essays in the 19th-c. novel and symbolist poetry (Littérature et sensation) with an important preface by G. Poulet, 1955, Poésie et profondeur, 1956) as well as his recent study of Mallarmé (L'univers imaginaire de Mallarmé, 1962) which give a clear picture of the possibilities and the limits of the method. Roland Barthes's Le Degré zéro de l'écriture, 1956) is noteworthy because it suggests connections between phenomenological analysis and the structure, history and sociology of style. The very brief essay merely indicates the problem, but if further studies could help to bring these various disciplines closer together, Fr. poetics would move on to a stage where synthesis becomes possible.

While Fr. explication de textes derived its methods primarily from the natural sciences, German literary studies of the same era seem to have been especially eager to emulate the social sciences, as they were practiced in Germany at the turn of the century. Various forms of organic historicism appear as the dominant characteristic of several works. Sometimes, as in H. A. Korff's Geist der Goethezeit (5 v., 1925-57), the concept of history is triadic and Hegelian; in others, such as Walzel or Richter, it is derived from the visual arts—in this case Wölfflin's theories of vision and of "open" and "closed" form. Others still search for historical continuity in specific literary traditions and topoi (Curtius), in recurrent themes and attitudes (Unger, Rehm), in archetypal patterns (Kerenyi), in philosophical or aesthetic attitudes (Cassirer, Auerbach). In all these instances, the problem is essentially one of historical continuity: a certain theory of history is shown to bring order and coherence in the apparently erratic development of literature. Some of the authors mentioned have produced works of lasting value which often go far in revealing the inner workings of the poetic mind. But since they all start from the literary work as an unquestionable empirical fact, they do not claim to be writing on poetics, in either sense of the term. It is partly in reaction against the considerable authority of much philological and historical literary science that a new concern with poetics developed, not unlike that in France, although the issue is much less clearly defined.

As one significant example of such reactions, the disciples of the poet Stefan George set themselves up as deliberate opponents of the prevalent methods of literary study. Although George claimed that "from him, no road led to science," most of his later followers taught in universities. Since several among them were men of considerable learning, they exercised a great deal of influence. Their approach was antiphilological in the extreme (no footnotes, sources or bibliographies), but their merit lies rather in their respect for the autonomy of the poetic mind than in their attacks on traditional methods. The writer on literature must come as close as possible to the creative experience itself, helped in this by admiration and love for his subject rather than by scruples of accuracy and objectivity. There is great emphasis, also, on the messianic role of the poet as an almost superhuman figure, to be dealt with in a language closer to that of myth or religion than that of science. That such an approach is not always incompatible with true learning is clear from Gundolf's books on Shakespeare and Goethe. Only a few of George's disciples are still alive, and a vigorous reaction has, in turn, set in against the arbitrary elements in their works. This reaction, however, should not blind one to their contribution. It was certainly necessary, around 1910, to bring G. philology into closer contact with live poetry; George's disciples renewed the established image of Goethe, they were instrumental in the discovery of Hölderlin and contributed to the emphasis on the neo-Hellenic tradition which runs as a continuous strand through G. literature, from Winckelmann to the present. But if the George Circle was militantly aware of the need for poetic autonomy, the contribution of its members to poetics remains diffuse, mostly because their insistence on the messianic element tends to overshadow the formal element of poetry altogether. In their master, George himself, the tangible expression of the transcendental value of poetry was to be found in the perfection of the form; it was by the act of extreme formal discipline, a kind of askesis of the form, that the poet earned the right to statements of prophetic weight. If this formal discipline is taken away, the entire messianic attitude becomes dangerously arbitrary. Significantly, it is after he had left the George Circle that one of the most gifted among its members, Max Kommerell, wrote studies on the drama, on Faust and on Hölderlin that show real insight in poetic motivation and its relation to formal structure.

More recently, another challenge has been offered to G. philology, emanating this time from a philosopher, Martin Heidegger. In 1937, Heidegger began the publication of commentaries on the poetry of Hölderlin and in subsequent works, he has given an increased importance to the poetic as a prominent part of his philosophy, with occasional excursions in the practical field of exegesis. Heidegger's conception of the poetic is part of his attempt to reach beyond what he considers the limits of the Western metaphysical tradition. Because of their greater proximity to language, poets reflect the fundamental tensions of human existence more faithfully than even the greatest among the metaphysicians. And the purest of them all, the poet who, according to Heidegger, has been able to name the very essence of poetry, Hölderlin, offers therefore an insight into Being which is without antecedent in the history of human thought. Whoever is able, with the assistance of the commentary, to listen to Hölderlin, will stand in the presence of the poetic itself and discover that it is the unmediated language of Being. For Heidegger, the poet's language has eschatological power and is to be interpreted, not by means of a critical analysis which assumes a common frame of reference, but as a kind of revelation which, at best, we can hope to perceive but never to grasp critically, as one can grasp a concept. The methodological consequences of this attitude go against the very foundation of philological science. The implication is that traditional philological methods, based on the assumedly objective status of the work, are themselves imprisoned within Western rationalism, and therefore unable to gain true poetic insight. This inability extends to the era where the authority of philology reigns undisputed, that of the correct establishment of texts—and Heidegger has participated, directly and indirectly, in the controversies that surround the critical edition of Hölderlin's complete works. He has often been accused of stretching and distorting texts to make them conform to his own views; these controversial readings, however, are always consistent with his own philosophical assumptions and they can only be discarded or criticized within the context of this philosophy.

If Heidegger's commentaries are an extreme example of a poetics founded on "creation," G. scholars have also made important contributions to the poetics of style. Stylistic research (Stilforschung) is probably the most international among the trends we have mentioned. It originated out of an encounter between G. philology and the philosophy of the It. aesthetician Croce. One would expect Croce's main influence to be in the field of history of literature, since this is the area with which his massive philosophical work is primarily concerned; the orientation of his numerous It. disciples has generally been in this direction. But it seems now as if his impact is perhaps most strongly felt in stylistic studies, although he was himself somewhat reticent towards Stilforschung. The close friendship between Croce and the G. philologist Karl Vossler, leader of the Munich school of stylistic criticism to which Leo Spitzer also belongs, is an important personal factor in this influence. Croce and Vossler's intellectual kinship has for its common root the revolt against the scientific positivism of the 19th c., which it criticized in the name of Hegelian idealism;

the revealing title of Vossler's first work is Positivismus und Idealismus in der Sprachwissenschaft (1904). Vossler's later work is mainly a study of the dominant stylistic traits of literary language, as a key, not only to the personality of an author but even, as in his book on France (Frankreichs Kultur und Sprache, 1929), to the spirit of a nation. Leo Spitzer, using more intricate and more refined techniques, pursues a similar aim: he selects a distinctive feature of the style to penetrate into the work and reach the distinctive quality of a poetic personality: the study of one crucial passage in Phèdre, for instance, allows for a general interpretation of Racine. Such attempts may seem purely technical, but they are in fact a practical application of the monistic assumptions that dominate Croce's poetics. The writers of the Munich school derived from Croce the precept that, since poetic style is not to be separated from poetic experience and personality, it is legitimate to reach an exhaustive interpretation on the basis of the aspect of the work that is most readily and objectively available, namely the style. This kind of stylistic analysis differs sharply from positivistic stylistics in that it assumes the work to be an autonomous aesthetic unit. It restored to the systematic study of poetry values of taste and sensitivity, without falling back on impressionistic subjectivism, and it refined the tools of analysis and interpretation to a considerable extent. Vossler enjoyed a high reputation in Spain and thus established a link between G., It., and Sp. literary studies; Dámaso Alonso's book on Góngora was perhaps the most accomplished work to come out of this school.

Partly in reaction against the psychological aspects of Vossler's method, a new trend in stylistic study has recently originated in Zürich around Emil Staiger and the review Trivium (now no longer published). Staiger's techniques are still those of stylistic analysis, based on close reading, study of syntactical, rhythmical, and metaphorical structure, but his ultimate purpose is to reveal the metapersonal attitude of the poet toward the fundamental categories of existence, especially temporality. One is reminded of similar trends in France; Staiger, however, is backed by the highly developed methods of stylistic research established by his G. predecessors. His most theoretical work, Grundbegriffe der Poetik (1946), is based on the classical distinction between the three genres, lyrical, epic, and dramatic. It is especially noteworthy for its description of the lyrical as the fundamental poetic genre, the ideal from which all poetry springs forth and to which it tends to return. In this assertion, Staiger makes explicit a preference which is found in most of the tendencies that have been mentioned. Because it draws on a variety of doctrines, Staiger's school offers a balanced method of descriptive poetics. It is avowedly better suited to deal with the details of relatively brief lyrical poems, rather than with larger dramatic units. This reveals once more what has been apparent throughout this survey: the recent trends in Fr. and G. poetics (and in European poetics in general) are the theoretical expression of the poetics implicitly contained in the 19th-c. romantic and symbolist poetry.†

A. FRANCE. 1. G. Lanson, "Quelques mots sur l'explication de textes" in Methodes de l'histoire littéraire (1925), R. Vigneron, L'explication de textes . . . (1928).—2. P. Valéry, "Introduction à la méthode de Léonard de Vinci," "Avant-propos à la connaissance de la déesse" in Variété I, "Léonard et les philosophes," "Questions de poésie" in Variété III, "Discours sur l'esthétique" in Variété IV, "Poésie et pensée abstraite," "Première leçon du cours de poétique," "L'enseignement de la poétique au Collège de France" in Variété V; Cahiers, 29 v. to date (1957–); M. Bémol, Paul Valéry (1949), J. Hytier, La poétique de Valéry (1953).—3. H. Bergson, Essai sur les données immédiates de la conscience (4th ed., 1904), Le rire (1908); V. Jankélévitch, Bergson (1931), E. Fiser, Le symbole littéraire (1941).—4. J. Wahl, Traité de métaphysique (1953), Poésie, pensée, perception (1948); G. Bachelard, Lautréamont (1939), La psychanalyse du feu (1940), L'eau et les rêves (1942), L'air et les songes (1943), La terre et les rêveries du repos (1948), La poétique de l'espace (1957); J. P. Sartre, L'imaginaire (1940), Situations (3 v., 1947–49); G. Poulet, Études sur le temps humain (Edinburgh, 1949), La distance intérieure (1952; v. 2); J. Paulhan, Les fleurs de Tarbes ou la terreur dans les lettres (1945); M. Blanchot, Faux pas (1943), La part du feu (1949), L'espace littéraire (1955); M. Merleau-Ponty, "Le langage indirect et les voix du silence," Signes (1960); J. Starobinski, J. J. Rousseau: la transparence et l'obstacle (1958), L'oeil vivant (1961).

B. GERMANY AND RELATED SUBJECTS. 5. O. Walzel, Gehalt und Gestalt im Kunstwerk des Dichters (1923); R. Unger, Aufsätze zur Prinzipienlehre der Literaturgeschichte (2 v., 1923), Herder, Novalis, Kleist: Studien über die Entwicklung des Todesproblems (1923); E. Cassirer, Die Philosophie der symbolischen Formen (1924); H. Pongs, Das Wortkunstwerk (1926); W. Rehm, Der Todesgedanke in der deutschen Dichtung (1928); Auerbach; Curtius; F. Strich, Deutsche Klassik und Romantik (4th ed., 1949); M. Wehrli, Allgemeine Literaturwissenschaft (1951); K. Kerényi, Geistiger Weg Europas (1955).—6. F. Gundolf, Shakespeare und der deutsche Geist (1911); Goethe (1916), George (1920); M. Kommerell, Der Dichter als

† In Supplement, see also GENEVA SCHOOL; PHENOMENOLOGY; STRUCTURALISM.

Führer in der deutschen Klassik (1928), Geist und Buchstabe der Dichtung (1944); H. Rössner, George Kreis und Literaturwissenschaft (1938).—7. M. Heidegger, Erläuterungen zu Hölderlins Dichtung (1950), "Der Ursprung des Kunstwerkes," "Wozu Dichter . . ." in Holzwege (1950), ". . . dichterisch wohnt der Mensch," in Vorträge und Aufsätze (1954); E. Buddeberg, "Heidegger und die Dichtung," DVLG, 26 (1952); B. Alleman, Hölderlin und Heidegger (rev. ed. 1957).—8. Carteggio Croce-Vossler 1899-1949 (1951); L. Spitzer, Stilstudien (2 v., 1928), Romanische Stil und Literaturstudien (1931), Essays in Stylistics (1948); E. Staiger, Die Zeit als Einbildungskraft des Dichters (1939), Die Kunst der Interpretation (1955).

See also: A.A. G. Poulet, La métamorphose du cercle (1961), L'espace proustien (1963); J. Rousset, Forme et signification (1962). B.7. H. G. Gadamer, Wahrheit und Methode (1960); R. Ingarden, Das literarische Kunstwerk (2d ed., 1960).

Concerning the relationship between Marxism and poetic theory, see the Hungarian G. Lukács' effort at a comprehensive aesthetic, Die Eigenart des Ästhetischen (2 v., sec. 1 of his Ästhetik, 1963).

P. DE M.

ITALIAN. Poetic theory in 20th-c. Italy has been dominated by the overwhelming personality of Benedetto Croce (1866-1952), whose Estetica appeared in 1902. In polemical reaction to late 19th-c. positivism, and in the tradition of G. Vico and F. De Sanctis, Croce, an idealist philosopher of the Hegelian school, held that art is the first of the four forms of spiritual activity (art seeking the beautiful, philosophy the true, ethics the good, economy the useful), and can be defined as expression of intuition, whereas philosophy consists of logical thinking. Art materializes through several media and in different degrees, but is ultimately one, and poetry (or lyric) is only the name of its pure form in the literary medium, whether in verse or not. It is not the technique of a particular medium which gives origin to art, but, vice versa, the naive, free imagination ("fantasia") creates its own medium and technique; hence, language is expression, originally poetic, and the particular use of the language (= style) cannot be separated from the individual and singular experience or intuition it expresses. Image is the poetic nucleus of the work of art, the concrete manifestation of the intuition, and the word is the sensorial sign of the image. A collective language is originally made of images. The distinction between poetry and non-poetry (or plain "literature") is basic in Croce's thought and in his method of literary criticism, and it was brought to a focus in his definitive book of theory, La Poesia (1936, untranslated).

Croce's position was challenged by Giovanni Gentile (1875-1944), a "pure idealist" and the authoritative founder of attualismo. Gentile objected to Croce's emphasis on distinctions, and countered it with his emphasis on the basic unity of spiritual life. For him the poet, the logician, and the critic are essentially one in that the faculties which preside over their respective activities can be distinguished only from the outside, in techniques and methods, not from the inside—the inner "taste" that guides them all. Ultimately they all are pure modes of existence of the spirit, "pure acts."

Gentile has had a very limited influence on practical criticism, a more noticeable one on cultural historiography (for instance in the field of the Renaissance); Croce's impact in Italy has been all-pervasive both on theory and practice. The metaphysical foundations of his system have by now been challenged from several quarters, but the basic methodological aspect of his aesthetics has left very deep roots in all segments of It. culture: I refer to his disqualification, in the field of art, of "raw" sentiment (the source-material of art, not the actual content), of intellectualism (ideas are not found in art qua art), of moralism and utilitarianism (the rapport between the work of art and prevailing ethical standards or its practical functionality for its society is an extrinsic question, irrelevant to aesthetic judgment). In the last decades an articulate reaction to Croce has loomed ever larger, even though he is such a giant as to have overshadowed all other It. theorists. Nevertheless, all modern critical currents have been actively represented in Italy, from G. Pascoli's postromantic doctrine of the poet as a perennial child (the "fanciullino"), or G. D'Annunzio's decadent view of poetry as the verbal triumph of the "superman," to A. Tilgher's concept of art as amor vitae and representation of the impossible, E. Paci's and N. Abbagnano's existentialism, and G. Rensi's relativistic scepticism.

Formally speaking, radical Crocian attitudes seem consistent with the productive movement toward "pure" poetry known as Hermeticism, which during the Fascist years attracted most of the best talents by assuring an escape from trivial and undignified engagement through the initiation into a sophisticated expression as subjective, suggestive, and symbolic in its language as it was universal in its matter. But outside and against Crocian orientations (normally emphasizing the exclusive "ontological" approach to the intrinsic, aesthetic qualities of the work of art), one can see fully developed three main theoretical currents which correspond closely to their respective applications in literary criticism: (1) the emancipation of stylistic study, principally in the wake of Leo Spitzer (B. Terracini) but also on quite independent tracks (G. de Robertis, G. Devoto, M. Fubini, G. Contini), in a more or less close cooperation with modern philology and linguistic theory; (2) the stressing of the rapports between the work of art and the circumstances in which it found its natural genesis, from the psyche of the author and the vicissitudes of his life to the broader, social and political setting of his work (the most extreme example of this trend, but far from being the most productive, is the Marxist: cf. A. Gramsci, A. Banfi, C. Luporini); (3) the elaboration of the formal categories (implicitly regarded by Croce as nominalistic illusions or intellectualistic, pseudo-metaphysical intrusions), exemplified at best by the renewed interest in the Baroque (L. Anceschi). All this is in addition to the more common, though not more trivial, study of the works as part of a cultural, and specifically literary, tradition. See also FUTURISM, HERMETICISM, EXPRESSION, THEORY OF.

PRIMARY WORKS: B. Croce, 'La filosofia dello spirito': 1. Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale (1902), 2. Logica (1905), 3. Filosofia della pratica (1909), 4. Teoria e storia della storiografia (1917), all tr. D. Ainslie respectively in 1922², 1917, 1913, 1921, Breviario di estetica (1912), Nuovi saggi di estetica (1920), The Essence of Aesthetic, tr. Ainslie (1921), La poesia di Dante (1921), tr. Ainslie (1922), Poesia e non poesia (1923), European Lit. in the 19th C., tr. Ainslie (1924), Filosofia, poesia, storia (1951); G. Gentile, La filosofia dell'arte (1931); A. Tilgher, Estetica (1931), Studi di poetica (1934); G. Della Volpe, Fondamenti di una filosofia dell'espressione (1936); G. Calogero, Estetica, semantica, istorica (1947); U. Spirito, La vita come arte (1948); A. Gramsci, Letteratura e vita nazionale (1950); A. Gargiulo, Scritti d'estetica (1952); L. Pareyson, Estetica. Teoria della formatività (1954); L. Stefanini, Trattato di estetica (1955).

SECONDARY WORKS: S. Caramella, Storia del pensiero estetico e del gusto letterario in Italia (1924); G. Berton, Lingua e poesia. Saggi di critica letteraria (1937); M. Apollonio, Ermetismo (1945); A. Ruschioni, Sommario di storia dell'estetica letteraria (1952); L. Russo, La critica letteraria contemporanea (3 v., new ed. 1953); M. Petrucci, La poetica dell'ermetismo italiano (1955), Poesia pura e poesia esistenziale (1957); O. Macrí, Caratteri e figure della poesia italiana contemporanea (1958); A. Frattini and M. Camilucci, La giovane poesia italiana e straniera. Aspetti e problemi (1959); G. N. G. Orsini, B. Croce, Philosopher of Art and Literary Critic (1961); and for a detailed survey of the whole discipline, Momenti e problemi di storia dell'estetica, pt. 4 (Marzorati ser., 1961).

A.S.

SPANISH. The 20th-c. renaissance in Sp. letters is in large part due to the excellence of its lyric poets. Despite their marked individuality, they all seem to share one general theoretic aim: to adopt a new aesthetic in which contemporary European trends are harmoniously blended with the most valuable of their own poetic tradition. Such an attitude implies, of course, a blending of revolution and continuity, reassessment of the literary past and tacit acceptance of foreign artistic influences.

The first revolutionary impulse to revitalize languid Sp. poetry at the turn of the century was the cosmopolitan modernism introduced into peninsular literature mainly by the Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío. The influence of modernism was brief but decisive. However, major poets such as Antonio Machado and Juan Ramón Jiménez, despite their admiration for Darío himself, soon rejected its brilliant superficialities; Unamuno never could embrace its art-for-art's-sake doctrines; but still others (Villaespesa) were not ever able to break away from its exotic and facile charm.

Partly as a result of world crisis and partly as a Sp. counterpart of the various Europeanisms, in 1919 an aggressive avant-garde movement known as ultraism appeared in violent opposition to an outmoded modernism. Ultraism produced little or no poetry of value, and its exponents disbanded as a militant group in 1922. However, its theories of the rehabilitation of the poem and the suppression of all extraneous material not strictly lyric were highly beneficial. The ultraists advocated the absolute supremacy of image and metaphor. Their poems were often merely a stringing together of ingenious and overwrought metaphors. Sentimentalism was rejected and narrative anecdote eliminated. As in all postwar movements—and ultraism aspired to be a synthesis of all avant-garde tendencies—the poets recognized the limitations of logic and reacted strongly against such an interpretation of reality. Furthermore, ultraism recommended a stripped down syntax, certain new typographical arrangements, and the inclusion in poetry of objects typifying modern civilization. Although it is impossible to clearly establish priorities, at about the same time the Chilean poet Huidobro brought with him to Madrid, via Paris, still another ism, that of creationism. As the name implies, creationism affirmed an attitude of independence with relation to reality and nature. In order to create new realities in poetry, Huidobro sought to create rather than represent the object. What is really significant in all this avant-garde ferment is that now Spain was undergoing a similar artistic upheaval simultaneously with that of other European nations.

Such unrest and experimentation were fruitful as a preliminary for the emergence of a really important literary generation, that of 1927. Because of the complex nature of the various artistic doctrines which converge and intermingle in the individual work of these writers of 1927, we shall be content to point out here only a few general trends. Above all, these poets wished to create a poetry which was essentially pure and genuinely lyric. In this connection, the poetic theories of Jiménez were particularly influential in the decade 1920-1930. This influence was twofold: the example of his person and also of his work. He encouraged the younger writers and opened to them the pages of his own exclusive poetry reviews. At this time too his own poetry became more synthetic, lucid, and concentrated. As Juan Ramón evolved toward greater formal liberty, he also sought to rid his verse of all decorative elements which he considered impurities. A more intellectual concept of poetry had now replaced the sensuous, impressionistic, and vaguely romantic verse of former years. His complete dedication to literature, his constant striving for perfection in art, and his personal austerity became an ideal for the young poets. As early as 1916 he had written: "¡Inteligencia, dame/ el nombre exacto de las cosas!/. . . Que mi palabra sea/ la cosa misma, / creada por mi alma nuevamente." This dictum was accepted by the new generation of poets. To this general poetic orientation should be added the more intellectual and philosophical influence of Ortega y Gasset who rejected all frivolity in his thinking and writing. The intensified use of metaphor was a typical quality of these poets, and this is not surprising since many of them fell momentarily under the spell of Góngora, whose tercentenary was enthusiastically celebrated in 1927. This interest in the 17th-c. poet gave rise to a direction known as neogongorism, readily visible in some of the verse of this generation. Moreover, several Andalusian poets, the early Lorca and Alberti, for example, cultivated a neopopular style in which popular motifs were highly stylized and cast in traditional forms such as the ballad. Still another new poetic influence can be traced to Fr. surrealism, but it is difficult to clearly determine any direct contact of the Sp. poets with the initiators of the movement in France. The Sp. writers, among them Lorca, Alberti and Aleixandre, accepted certain new liberties afforded them and benefited from some expressive techniques of surrealism. However, Sp. surrealism is not orthodox, and the poets did not embrace the more irrational aspects of André Breton's theories of automatic writing, nor did they accept the dogmatic laws he advocated. Of this generation Guillén and Salinas did not write surrealist poetry. They both tended toward a more intellectualized and disciplined style. Juan Larrea was perhaps the most surrealist of the Sp. poets.

Poetic tradition was naturally disrupted in Spain following the Civil War. The poets of today, however, tend toward an expression which is more social, more "realistic" and committed than that of previous generations. They wish to be heard and understood. Their language is less metaphorical, more direct and conversational in tone. Free verse is the norm, and the purely aesthetic is to some degree sacrificed to other ends.

As an important correlative to 20th-c. Sp. poetics themselves, final mention should be made of two critics, Dámaso Alonso and Amado Alonso, who have made outstanding contributions to stylistics. Of the former, his Poesía española. Ensayo de métodos y límites estilísticos (1952) is of particular significance. The remarkable studies of Amado Alonso in the interpretation of literary texts are too numerous to quote, but in the posthumous and miscellaneous volume Materia y forma en poesía (1955) are included ample definitions of his theories and their application. Moreover, each has trained a number of very distinguished disciples who are publishing important studies in this field of criticism. For additional bibliographical information the pertinent sections of Helmut A. Hatzfeld, A Crit. Bibliog. of the New Stylistics (1953) and (with Y. Le Hir) Essai de bibliographie critique de stylistique française et romane (1955-1960) (1961) are useful.

J. Ortega y Gasset, La deshumanización del arte . . . (1925; Eng. tr. by H. Weyl, 1948); G. de Torre, Literaturas europeas de vanguardia (1925) and La aventura y el orden (1948); Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, ed. F. de Onís (1934, 1961); A. Machado, Juan de Mairena (2 v., 1942); J. López Morillas, "Antonio Machado's Temporal Interpretation of Poetry," JAAC, 6 (1947); P. Salinas, Literatura española. Siglo XX (1949); G. Díaz-Plaja, Modernismo frente a noventa y ocho (1951); D. Alonso, Poetas españoles contemporáneos (1952); Navarro; L. Cernuda, Estudios sobre poesía española contemporánea (1957); L. F. Vivanco, Introducción a la poesía española contemporánea (1957); J. R. Jiménez, Páginas escogidas (Prosa), ed. R. Gullón (1958); A. W. Phillips, "Sobre la poética de García Lorca," Revista Hispánica Moderna 24 (1958); P. Salinas, Ensayos de literatura hispánica (1958; pp. 290-395); Poesía española, ed. G. Diego (1959); J. L. Cano, Poesía española del siglo XX (1960); J. M. Castellet, Veinte años de poesía española, 1939-

1959 (1960); G. de Torre, "Contemp. Sp. Poetry," Texas Quarterly, 4 (1961); C. Zardoya, Poesía española contemporánea. Estudios temáticos y estilísticos (1961). See also bibliog. to CREATIONISM, MODERNISM, NEOGONGORISM, and ULTRAISM.

A.W.P.

SLAVIC. Rus. poetics in the first two decades were largely determined by the symbolist school. The study of versification, widely neglected in the second half of the 19th c., became the main point of interest. Whereas the leader of the symbolists, Valery Bryusov, tried to systematize and popularize the poetics of the Fr. symbolists and to adapt them to the special requirements of the Rus. language, the symbolist poet and prose writer Andrey Bely developed original theories in Rus. versification combined with a rather mystic philosophy trying to explain the phenomenon of creative artistic intuition. The most important point in his verse theories is the clear realization of the moment of pyrrhics in Rus. verse. He maintained that it should be possible to characterize single poets by the distribution of pyrrhics in their poems. From graphs based on tables of pyrrhic frequency he obtained geometrical figures which varied with every poet and thus represented the starting point of their characterization. The sound pattern of each poem was closely examined; in fact, sound became sometimes more important than contents (e.g. in poets like Balmont and Blok). Very soon sound became a kind of a symbol out of which a rather vague ideology was not difficult to develop. The theoretical discussion of poetics as seen by the symbolists received valuable contributions in the articles of the outstanding poet Innokenty Annensky (e.g. in his essay "Balmont—lyrik" in Kniga otrazheniy 1, pp. 169–213). He developed the idea of a general "lyrical ego," which explains why everyone has the same subconscious emotional reaction to the given form of poem.

The poetical school which followed the symbolists, the acmeists, preserved the stress on form, but denied its symbolic meaning. In their general attitude to poetry they adopted to a certain degree the views of the Fr. Parnassiens, but of course the polemical tendency against the Rus. symbolists and the excellent knowledge of their poetry colored their theoretical writings. Very important are the essays of Osip Mandelstam and Nikolay Gumilyov, published for the most part in the review Apollón. In explaining their discrepancies with the symbolists they gave many valuable contributions to the theoretical understanding of Rus. verse.

The occasionally exaggerated demands of the Rus. futurists, who followed the acmeists, culminated in the work of Velimir Khlebnikov who inaugurated a kind of mysticism and mythology of words: he tried to reduce Rus. vocabulary to a number of ideologically valued roots which when varied and ramified by means of prefixes, infixes, and suffixes, helped him to form a kind of poetic language which did not follow logical but "translogical" (zaimnyy) associations. Basic ideas were originally expressed in basic sounds; poetry should help to restore this correspondence of sound and meaning which has been destroyed by common speech. A rebirth of language as such was expected from the new poetry.

The structuralists (a better word than the usual "formalists") continued to stress the poetic "word as such" and the detailed analysis of the poetic text. Important are Osip Brik's articles about sound repetitions in poems (e.g. "Zvukovye povtory," Poetika, 1919), Roman Jakobson's analysis of Khlebnikov's poetry (Noveyshaya russkaya poeziya, 1921) and the very valuable book by Boris Eichenbaum Melodika stikha (1921). The distinction Eichenbaum makes between the songlike and the rhetoric diction in poetry proved to be a consequential step in Rus. poetics. The structuralists described poetic language as a special device to make us feel the word in its double quality: as a label designating a certain object and as a sound and sense pattern having a weight and an essence of its own. The result of the interest in the structure of poetic works were several excellent and conclusive theoretical works giving a complete system of Rus. versification: Yuri Tynyanov tried to establish the specific quality of the poetic speech in Problema stikhotvornogo yazyka (1924); Boris Tomashevsky gave a comprehensive presentation of Rus. metrics (Russkoe stikhoslozhenie, 1923); and Viktor Zhirmunsky discussed exhaustively the composition of lyric poems and the different aspects of rhyme (Kompozitsiya liricheskikh stikhotvoreniy, 1921 and Rifma, ee istoriya i teoriya, 1923). Soviet poetics did not add anything new to the discussion of technical questions; but there are some valuable works about the language of individual poets strongly influenced by the structuralists, e.g. Viktor Vinogradov's impressive Yazyk Pushkina (1935). "Formalism" is not accepted officially in Soviet Russia.

In other Slavic countries, the main influence was that of Fr. symbolist poetics during the first two decades of the 20th c. Afterwards structuralism took firm hold only in Czechoslovakia. One of its principal champions in Russia, Roman Jakobson, went to Prague in 1920 and applied the structuralist methods to Czech verse, comparing it in part with Rus. verse (O chéshskom stikhé preimúshchstvuennno v sopostavlénii s rússkim, 1923). The works of Jan Mukařovský, especially his study of the poetry of K. H. Mácha, present one of the best analyses in Slavic poetics. In Poland structuralism was accepted and applied to Polish verse by Manfred Kridl and Franciszek Siudecki. But on the whole the strictly historical approach still prevails. This has resulted in some excellent works about the development of Polish verse, as e.g., Maria Dłuska's Studia z historii i teorii wersyfikacji (1948-50) or the encyclopaedia of poetics edited by Maria Renata Mayenowa (Poetyka, Zarys encyklopedyczny, 1956-57). In Yugoslavia the special qualities of the Serbian, the Croatian and the Slovenian languages, above all the musical accent, account for the long disputes between the "syllabists" and the "tonists" in the beginning of this century (and earlier). These were not very productive. A consistent poetics of the South Slavic languages began to develop when Roman Jakobson (using the Serbian popular songs), Kiril Taranovski (using the popular as well as the literary poetic language) and A. Isáchenko (on the basis of the Slovenian language) began to apply the methods of the Rus. "formalists" and the linguistic school of Prague. They clearly showed that all prosodic elements play an important part in shaping this specific verse: the stress, the musical pitch and the length and number of syllables. See also RUSSIAN FORMALISM.

A. Bely, Simvolizm (1910) and Lug Zelony (1910); V. Bryusov, Kratky kurs nauki o stikhe (1919; a brief introd. to versification) and Osnovy stikhovedeniya (1924; the basic concepts of versific.); B. Eichenbaum, Lermontov (1924; an exemplary application of poetic theories); R. Jakobson, Zhhlady českeho verše (1926; basic concepts of Czech verse); V. Khlebnikov, Sobranie proizvedeniy (1928-33); F. Siudecki, "Sprawy wersyfikacji polskiej," Wiadomości Literackie (1934; basic concepts of Polish verse); K. W. Zawodziński, Zarys wersyfikacji polskiej I (1936; same); M. Kridl, Wstęp do badań nad dziełem literackim (Z zagadnień poetyki I) (1936; a crit. survey of lit. theories); J. Mukařovský, Kapitoly z české poetiky (3 v., 1941; an application of structuralist theories and a discussion of basic concepts of poetics); K. Taranovski, Ruski dvodelni ritmovi (1953; an exhaustive discussion of the Rus. 2-foot meters) and Principi srpsko-hrvatske versifikacije (1954); R. Wellek, "Modern Czech Crit. and Lit. Scholarship," Harvard Slavic Studies, 2 (1954); B. O. Unbegaun, Rus. Versification (1956). v.s.

MODERNISMO. The movement in Hispanic letters which began in the 1880's in Sp. America, blending Sp., Fr., and other foreign influences in the creation of a new poetic diction. The area's relative stability during the last quarter of the 19th c. made possible this first widespread literary movement of the Southern countries, and marked their cultural maturity. Literature, previously composed in great haste and for a political purpose, now became an art form. Old poetic forms such as the romance octosyllable, the hendecasyllable, tetrasyllable, the alexandrine, monorhyme, and the classic Greco-Latin hexameter were revived and polished. New meters of 10, 11, 12, 15, or more syllables, and new metric combinations, were widely used and gave a new fluidity to poetic expression. The result was a complete renovation of metrical resources. Spritely metaphors, elegant musicality, linguistic impressionism, and synesthesia (q.v.) were also characteristic of the modernist style. The clichés of romanticism were zealously avoided by the new writers, and exotic gallicisms were deliberately and judiciously employed to bring zest and flavor both to poetry and to prose. Syntax was simplified, difficult inversions avoided, and language, though overly ornate in many early modernist writings, was gradually made more crystalline and more harmonious.

M. blended romanticism, Fr. symbolism and Parnassianism in its strong Sp. am. crucible. The Orient, classic and Nordic mythology, Sp. literature of the pre-Golden and Golden Ages, and the United States were also sources of inspiration, as were the traditions of the Am. peoples and the Am. earth. The skillful fusion of all these resources resulted in a cosmopolitan perspective, a new concinnity of language, and a new poetic diction which were the main contributions of m. to Western literature.

The initiators of m. were Gutiérrez Nájera of Mexico, José Asunción Silva of Colombia, Julián del Casal and José Martí of Cuba. Martí was a unique figure whose life, speeches, and writings exemplified both fine literature and political action. The most famous modernist was Rubén Darío of Nicaragua, whose influence carried the new movement to Spain. Among the other modernists were José Enrique Rodó of Uruguay, Amado Nervo and Enrique González Martínez of Mexico, José Santos Chocano of Peru, Leopoldo Lugones of Argentina, and the Machado brothers of Spain. Hispanic literature entered the gates of m. with Rubén Darío and left them in the poetry of Juan Ramón Jiménez of Spain—so writes one of the best historians of the movement, Federico de Onís.

Despite their lack of a keen social sense, the modernist writers established a feeling of spiritual and cultural kinship among themselves and among their nations. On the other hand, m. erected a beautiful literary façade behind which lay an economic and a political shambles. The subsequent literature of the Mexican Revolution and other more recent writings destroyed the façade and exposed the shambles.

ANTHOLOGIES: An Anthol. of the Modernista Movement in Sp. America, ed. A. Coester (1924); Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, ed. F. de Onís (1934, 1961; contains excellent crit. essays); Poetas modernistas hispanoamericanos, ed. C. García Prada (1956); Swan, Cygnets and Owl, tr. M. E. Johnson (1956); Antología crítica del modernismo hispanoamericano, ed. R. Silva Castro (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: I. Goldberg, Studies in Sp. Am. Lit. (1920); P. Henríquez-Ureña, La versificación irregular en la poesía castellana (1920) and Lit. Currents in Hispanic America (1945); J. R. Jiménez, "El modernismo poético en España e Hispanoamérica," Revista de América (April 1946); G. Díaz-Plaja, Modernismo frente a noventa y ocho (1951); M. Henríquez-Ureña, Breve historia del modernismo (1954, 2d ed., 1962; best general survey); R. A. Arrieta, Introducción al modernismo literario (1956); Navarro. J.A.C.

MODULATION. See METRICAL VARIATIONS.

MOLOSSUS. In classical prosody, a metrical foot consisting of 3 long syllables (— — —). It is found very rarely as an independent foot and never in a connected series. Sometimes it replaces an Ionic (q.v.) a minore by the contraction of the first 2 short syllables, and less often an Ionic a maiore or a choriamb (q.v.). —Dale; Koster; Crusius. P.S.C.

MONGOLIAN POETRY. The chief source of early Mo. poetry is an imperial chronicle of Genghis Khan's house, the Secret History of the Mongols (A.D. 1240), which contains many rough-hewn alliterated verses of irregular length, and of no set pattern of repetition for the initial alliterating syllables. Some later historical chronicles of the 17th c., as the Erdeni-yin Tobči (Jewelled Summary), contain sophisticated and polished quatrains of even length and fixed form, particularly at points of direct discourse in the narrative.

The bulk of native literary expression is in the form of üliger's, orally transmitted epic stories in verse, which may reach 20,000 verses in length, and are recited from memory by bards. They relate the adventures of real or legendary heroes and villains, as Genghis Khan, Erintsen Mergen, Gesser Khan, and Janggar. These heroes struggle against the many-headed manggus, who is defeated in the end. The internal structure of these poems is quite stylized and may be diagrammed as a series of rounds between the hero and his adversary.

Mo. verse is alliterative (although rhyme is found in a few instances, such as the Sino-Mo. inscription of 1362). This alliteration chiefly occurs on the initial syllable (the entire syllable, and not just the first phoneme), but internal alliteration is also found. In epic poetry, alliteration is in couplets or is irregular, and in lyric poetry (here used in the strict sense of the word, "composed for the lyre," hence, in stanzas), it is in quatrains. The best-styled verse has 7 to 8 syllables with 3 or 4 internal stresses, but this is only a general guide to its construction. One may also encounter in texts the so-called graphic alliteration, by which some letters of identical shape in the Mongolian script (as t/d, o/u) may alliterate (cf. Eng. "eye-rhyme").

The characteristic feature of form is parallelism, the same idea reiterated in slightly different words in the succeeding verses. This usage is very similar to the Hebraic parallelism made familiar by the Old Testament Psalms. The chief theme of Mo. poetry has been the great epic legends, with their elaborate descriptions of heroic deeds, royal palaces and maidenly beauty. There are also shorter poems with love themes, nature themes, and religious themes.

One of the finest poems in Mo. is the Lament of Toghon Temür, six well-polished stanzas uttered by that ruler when he was driven from Khubilai's palace and the throne of China in 1368. In bemoaning the loss of that residence, he draws on an accretion of Mo. legends which were likewise used by Marco Polo in his description. This account was later taken by Purchas for his travel book, whence it filtered through Coleridge's subconscious to emerge as Kubla Khan.

As a general sample of Mo. verse, the following stanzas may be cited. The free translation accompanying employs both initial alliteration as well as end rhyme to convey the poetical nature of the original, although rhyme is not present there. The parallelism between the stanzas will be evident.

dobo dēre urgasan dolōn zuilin tsetseg bi;
dolōn zuilin tanarta domgin dü ailadخان bi.

namag dēre urgasan
naiman zuilin tsetseg bi;
naiman zuilin tanarta nadmīn dü ailadخان bi.

Sitting in their hillside bowers (are)
Seven sorts of hillside flowers;
Seven sorts of stories, too,
Soon I'll say in song to you.

Garlands of the gloomy swamp,
Grow eight flowers in their pomp;
Games and gladness, eight kinds too,
Give I gladly now to you.

N. Poppe, Khalkha-mongol'skii geroičeskii épos (The Heroic Epic of the Khalkha Mongols, 1937), Mongolische Volksdichtung (1955) and "Der Parallelismus in der epischen Dichtung der Mongolen," Ural-Altäische Jahrbücher, 30 (1958); K. Grønbech, "Specimens of Mo. Poetry," The Music of the Mongols (1943); P. Pelliot, Hist. secrète des Mongols (1949); Damdinsüren, Monggol uran jokiyal-un degeji jagun bilig orusibai (One Hundred Extracts from Mo. Lit., 1959); J. R. Krueger, "Poetical Passages in the Erdeni-yin Tobči, a Mo. Chronicle of the Year 1662 by Sagang Sečen," Central Asiatic Studies, 7 (1961). J.KRU.

MONK'S TALE STANZA. A stanza composed of 8 lines of iambic pentameter, rhyming ababbcb, used by Chaucer in An A.B.C., The Monk's Tale (in The Canterbury Tales), and a few other short poems. The stanza is, in all certainty, one of the Fr. ballade stanzas. It is, however, not used with distinction in The Monk's Tale, which suffers from excessive end-stopping and rhythmic monotony. The stanza had some popularity in the 15th c., but its major importance is as a possible inspiration of the Spenserian stanza (q.v.), which is achieved by the simple addition of an alexandrine line which duplicates the final rhyme of the stanza.

MONODY. Originally in Gr. lyric poetry an ode sung by a single voice, e.g., by one of the characters in a tragedy. It came to be associated with the lamentation of a single mourner, and hence became a dirge (q.v.) or a funeral song. In metrical form the strophes are repeated without variation. In Eng. poetry, Milton referred to his Lycidas as a m., as the epigraph of the poem indicates. Matthew Arnold applied the term to his elegy on A. H. Clough: Thyrsis, A. M. R.A.H.

MONOLOGUE. The word "m." is used in several distinct senses all of which have in common the conception of one person speaking alone, who may or may not have an audience. The meaning of the term for poetry is elucidated by its use entirely apart from any art form, where it means simply "the prolonged speech of an individual." In colloquial usage the word often has a prejudicial sense, as a "m." that prevents freedom of conversation. In its more general literary sense it signifies any prolonged utterance in direct speech. There may, for example, be monologues within novels, plays, or poems. It is even correct to describe a work of great length as a m. if it is couched in a framework of direct address. But the speaker should preferably be the principal character. Meditations may in this sense also be called monologues. The common use stresses speech as well as the individual speaking; words uttered constitute a purer form of m. than those merely thought or written. The epistle is not a m., since it is imagined as read, not spoken.

Despite its limitation to a single speaker, the m. naturally assumes a dramatic character. For vocalization itself craves an object—one or many persons to constitute an audience. Thus the audience as well as the speaker becomes a part of the total area of imagination. In Chekhov's play, Tobacco, the speaker addresses the theatre audience believing it to be a jury sitting in judgment on the morality of his actions. This unusual play becomes a m. on two accounts: because the dramatist imagines his speaker and because the speaker imagines his audience. The m. requires not only a single speaker but an advanced degree of impersonation.

The soliloquy of theatrical tradition becomes a form of m. when sufficiently prolonged. The word applies equally to the soliloquy that is an interior debate, as Hamlet's speech, "To be or not to be," or Falstaff's direct address on honor, delivered downstage to the audience. The m. may be either heard or overheard. Many of the outstanding passages of dramatic poetry are in this form. The overheard m., or the speaker's talking to himself, is a favorite vehicle for self-expression and subjective utterance. Passages of this nature introduce many plays, as Marlowe's Doctor Faustus, Goethe's Faust, and Byron's Manfred. Not only in this theatrical form but in nondramatic poetry it becomes a favorite device of the romantic poets. But the origins of m. are too ancient to be sketched in more than conjecture. As the germ of drama, it may well precede even the dialogue. A lament may be regarded as a tragic form of m.; a clownish harangue, a comic form. In biblical literature the poetic m., usually embedded in larger forms, is brought to a high degree of perfection. Specimens are The Song of Deborah, The Song of Hannah, and Jeremiah's lament over Jerusalem. From biblical poetry comes also the soliloquy of the personified city. A variety of m. is the prayer, where the devotee addresses the deity who hears but deigns no reply.

Although the m. as a distinct literary form is inconspicuous in early Gr. poetry, the art is brought to refined development within the drama, epic, and ode. Long speeches in highly cultivated rhetoric appear in most of the longer literary forms. On the stage the convention of a colloquy between a single actor and the chorus considerably reduces the tendency to monologue, but impressive achievements of this nature are nevertheless found, as in Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound. M. was prominent in miming, though dialogue enjoyed greater popularity. Admirable examples are found among the idyls, especially those of Theocritus. The classical shepherd is by tradition fond of declamation; pathos discourages question or conversation. Notable instances of m. are found among the poems of Ovid and Propertius.

The subjectivity prevalent in Germanic literature favored m. Some of the finest Anglo-Saxon poems, as The Wanderer, The Seafarer, and The Wife's Lament, afford good examples. Christian devotional literature abounds in such verse, as in poems where the Virgin addresses the Cross, or where, similarly, the Soul addresses the Body. An advance toward the dramatic appears in poetry of the later Middle Ages and early Renaissance, where the formula of "the complaint," or "the address," appears. This becomes happily conspicuous among the Scotch Chaucerians, notably Dunbar, Henryson, and Lyndsay, as well as in the work of John Skelton. Imitations of the Horatian or Ovidian epistle aid the rise of the more dramatic forms of address. This development extends throughout the 16th c., from Wyatt through The Mirror for Magistrates, and the work of George Gascoigne to the more refined art of Raleigh and Drayton. It offers an important contribution to the perfection of Elizabethan dramatic verse. M. appears in all periods of Eng. literature, though in some more abundantly than in others. Robert Burns made important contributions to the form partly through his familiarity with the Scottish tradition. Sidney Smith's Imaginary Addresses represent an admirable development in humorous verse.

In instances where the speaker is strictly identified with the poet, as in much romantic verse, the absence of impersonation vitiates the achievement of m. in the more usual sense of the word. The highest form of m. is dramatic and is best illustrated by the dramatic monologues of Robert Browning. His works in this kind show two contrasting influences: those in stanzaic forms, which are in the majority, betray inspiration from the popular ballad that often employs a single imaginary speaker; those in couplets or in blank verse derive most clearly from the stage; they may be described as drama in miniature. Browning's dramatic monologues may also be regarded as closet dramas where only one person speaks. Such pieces as My Last Duchess may be imagined as scenes with a crowded stage and only one speaker. So powerful are Browning's dramatic monologues that his discoveries in the genre surpass those in the realm of the poetic style.

Some of the most important verse in Eng. since Browning plays variations upon his development of the m. Many of Thomas Hardy's, Rudyard Kipling's, and Ezra Pound's works follow Browning's use closely; T. S. Eliot's The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock is a m. addressed in vacuo; several of E. A. Robinson's finest poems, as Toussaint L'Ouverture, are addressed to imaginary hearers. An interesting variation is seen in Robinson's Rembrandt to Rembrandt, his own favorite among his poems, where one phase of the painter's soul is imagined as conversing with another in his mirror. Conrad Aiken, Edgar Lee Masters, and Robert Frost have contributed further variations.

The m. becomes an especially enlivening form for poetry in any literature tending to neglect the vital relations of poetry to the spoken voice. With Browning as a pathfinder, it has assumed great value for Eng. verse of the 20th c., as this drastically divorces itself from the comparatively bookish diction of Tennyson and Swinburne. But it may safely be concluded that much of the world's finest poetry has in all ages been in the m. form.—I. B. Sessions, "The Dramatic M.," PMLA, 62 (1947); B. W. Fuson, Browning and his Eng. Predecessors in the Dramatic M. (1948); R. Langbaum, The Poetry of Experience (1957).

H.W.W.

MONOMETER. A line consisting of one meter, either a dipody or foot. In classical iambic, trochaic, and anapaestic verse the metron is a dipody (pair of feet). As used by Eng. prosodists, "meter" is synonymous with foot. The Eng. monometer (a 1-stress line), therefore, consists of 1 foot. Probably the most famous examples in Eng. poetry are by Herrick, The Bridegroom; Upon his Departure Hence:

Thus I
Passe by
And die:
As one, . . .

R.O.E.

MONORHyme refers to a passage in a poem, to a strophe, or to an entire poem in which all lines have the same end rhyme. It is often used capriciously as an artificial device for producing satirical or comical effects, or even as a mnemotechnical aid. Aside from this it occurs in various languages as a component part of certain meters and is, in this instance, purely conventional. It is fairly frequent in the Romance and Slavic languages where it may be applied with greater ease as in German or in Eng. It occurs in medieval L. poetry; thus, in the poems of Commodian, in a psalm by St. Augustine consisting of 288 lines all ending in -e or -ae (tirade rhyme), in the sequences of Notker (echoing the -a of the Al-leluja), in the Carmen Mutinense, and in the poems of Gottschalk. It has also been used by the goliards in strophes of four 13-syllable lines (Vagantenstrophe). In Old Fr. m. appears in laisses of varying length in the medieval Alexander Romances while, later, it is restricted to quatrains and tercets which, in turn, were imitated in Spain (the cuaderna via as practiced by Berceo and the tercetos of Pedro de Veragüe's Doctrina cristiana). In modern Fr. it has been employed by Voltaire, Lefranc de Pompignan, and Théophile Gautier. German examples of m. (gehäufter Reim) are rare and so are Eng. In Arabic poetry m. is the rule, and there exists a mystical poem of 700 lines with the same end rhyme. In Welsh poetry, likewise, m. is functional. It appears in the awdl (ode) and is sometimes used to link a chain of englynion (gosteg o englynion). T.F.

MONOSTICH. (a) A single line of verse; (b) a poem one line long (cf. Anthologia Palatina, 11. 312). MONOSTROPHIC. (a) A poem one strophe or stanza long; (b) a poem in which all the strophes or stanzas have the same metrical form.

MORA (L. "delay" but mora temporis "space of time." The Gr. equivalent is chronos, literally "time.") Term used to denote the duration of a short syllable, which was the time-unit of Gr. and L. quantitative verse. The normal or "disemic" principle of classical metric was to regard a long syllable as equivalent to 2 morae, while rhythmic theory distinguished "trisemes," "tetrasemes," and "pentasemes" (conventionally indicated in modern times by L or J, U, and W) for syllables of the length of 3, 4, and 5 morae respectively. See CLASSICAL PROSODY, DISEMIC, and TRISEMIC.

R.J.G.

MORAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

MORALITY PLAYS. The m.p. is a dramatized allegory. This is a useful definition, since it enables us to discriminate between the morality proper and the multitude of other plays, both medieval and modern, that introduce allegory and allegorical characters. Allegory was common to medieval literature of all kinds. In the m.p. emphasis was placed on those allegorical figments that expressed the fate of man on earth. Life was compared to a journey: we have the motif of the pilgrimage of the life of man; to an enterprise ending in death: we have the Dance of Death; to a battle between the forces of evil: we have the psychomachia—the warfare between the seven deadly sins, assisted by various vices, and the four cardinal and the three theological virtues.

The most important idea, the one that lies back of the earliest m.p., is man's achievement of salvation. Man, conceived in sin, is obliged by his corrupted nature to plunge into sin. In order to be saved, he must repent, believe, and submit himself to divine mercy. These facts determine the essence of the m.p. as a dramatic genre. Man in the generalized form of Mankind, Everyman, Homo, or Humanum Genus behaves positively and objectively, suddenly and immediately without inward struggle. Temptation beckons him and he becomes a sinner. Later Conscience, Conviction of Sin or Repentance comes to him, and again, since abstractions cannot feel, he follows these agents without hesitation.

There was an extensive development of the m.p. in France and to a lesser degree in Germany, Spain, and elsewhere, but, so far as one can see, the perfectly generalized career of man on earth appears first in England and forms the salient characteristic of Eng. moral plays.

The crisis in the full-scope moralities is the unexpected arrival of Death, and the Dance of Death epitomizes this aspect of morality. It had impersonation and dialogue and needed only event, or the experience of an individual, to make it a complete m.p. Two Eng. plays border on the Dance of Death: The Pride of Life, from an imperfect Dublin manuscript and going back probably to the end of the 14th c., and Everyman, printed by Pynson in 1509, but so primitive and pure in its conception as to suggest great age. The former actually has no provision for salvation. One manuscript contains three full-scope moralities all belonging to the 15th c.: The Castle of Perseverance, dated by W. K. Smart about 1405 and the most elaborate and learned of all early moralities, Mankind, a play badly degenerated and vulgarized by ignorant rural players and possibly written early in the 15th c., and Mind, Will and Understanding, a later play probably from London and dramatizing quite generally the faculties of the human mind. Other early plays of this same complete generality are Nature (ca. 1530) by Henry Medwall, The Nature of the Four Elements (ca. 1519), Hyckescorner (pr. ca. 1512), and Mundus et Infans (pr. 1522). There are others of this kind, and the mode of complete generality was never lost, but in practice the way to find new subjects was specialization—childhood instead of the whole of human life, man in particular situations and subjected to special temptations, trades, professions, and social classes instead of man in general.

What happened may be described as a flood of m.p. of every conceivable sort, a flood that continued until the 17th c. We may mention Gentleness and Nobility by John Rastell, Magnificence by John Skeleton, All for Money by T. Lupton, Lusty Juventus by R. Wever, The Interlude of Youth (anonymous), The Longer Thou Livest, the More Fool Thou Art by W. Wager, The Tide Tarriest No Man by George Wapull, and The Conflict of Conscience by Nathaniel Woodes. Among the Elizabethan m.p. are Robert Wilson's The Three Lords and Three Ladies of London, the excellent anonymous play A Knack to Know a Knave, Marlowe's Dr. Faustus, Dekker's Old Fortunatus, and Jonson's The Staple of News. The titles will suggest the range but not the numbers. These plays are successes, but, in point of fact, the m.p. underwent great degeneration in its later life. Allegory was introduced everywhere, as also the Devil and the Vice, not because these things were needed, but because the popular audiences of the time demanded them.

Stylistically m.p. are uncertain and poor. The Pride of Life is in simple quatrains, Everyman in couplets of long lines suggestive of tumbling measure, Mankind has worse lines of the same sort with varied and ill-defined stanzas. The Castle of Perseverance is syllabic in form and better set up, with elaborate and well-constructed stanzas. Wisdom again is badly mixed, but seems to prefer the Chester rhyme-scheme. All these are medieval. The latter m.p. reflect the mixture of new forms with old that characterizes dramatic style during the first three-quarters of the 16th c.

L. Petit de Julleville, Répertoire du Théâtre comique (1886); W. R. Mackenzie, The Eng. Moralities (1904); C. F. Tucker Brooke, The Tudor Drama (1912); W. K. Smart, Some Eng. and L. Sources and Parallels for the Morality of Wisdom (1912) and articles in learned journals; H. Craig, Eng. Religious Drama of the Middle Ages (1955); D. M. Bevington, From Mankind to Marlowe (1962). H.C.

MOSAIC RHYME has at least one rhyme-fellow made out of more than one word, as in the following from Whittier's Barclay of Ury: master / passed her, save us / Gustavus, pray thee / slay thee, greet me / meet me. A fair proportion of feminine rhymes are of this kind. Browning who was partial to the device has 16 out of a possible 37 in A Grammarian's Funeral, including such unconventional ones as: fabric / dab brick, far gain / bargain, all meant / installment, failure / pale lure, soon hit / unit, loosened / dew send. A.M.C.

MOTE. A Sp. poem consisting of a single line or 2 lines, rarely more, containing a complete thought. Usually, but not always, this thought is glossed in verse, the whole composition then being called either mote or glosa, occasionally villancico or letra. One m. may be glossed by several poets or by the same poet in several versions. The m. was particularly popular in the 15th c.—Navarro. D.C.C.

MOZARABIC LYRICS. See SPANISH POETRY.

MULTIPLE OR POLYSYLLABIC RHYME. Also known as triple rhyme and, rarely, quadruple rhyme. Correspondence of more than 2 syllables in rhyming position (nascitur / pascitur) is a feature of medieval L. and other Romance verse, but it never established itself strongly, except for special effects, in less heavily polysyllabic languages like Eng. Sidney mentions sdrucchiola (triple rhyme) in the Defence of Poesie, and has virtuoso examples of it in the Arcadia, but it is chiefly used for comic effects, as by Byron in Don Juan and by Gilbert in his ballads. G.T.H.

MÜNCHENER DICHTERKREIS. A circle of German poets (E. Geibel, P. Heyse, H. Lingg, M. Greif, W. Herz, F. Bodenstedt, Graf von Schack et al.) writing during the middle of the 19th c., who were invited by Maximilian II, King of Bavaria, to take residence at his court in Munich. In imitation of the Duke of Weimar, Maximilian wanted to enable these poets to devote all their time to literary activities.

This group first came together, under the guidance of E. Geibel, in the literary club "Das Krokodil," founded in 1856 by P. Heyse after the model of the Berlin club "Der Tunnel über die Spree." In 1862 Geibel edited the Münchener Dichterbuch, which was to be authoritative in matters of artistic taste. The poetic genres represented here were mainly "Lied," ballads, sententious lyric poetry, and verse tales. Geibel instructed his associates in ways to achieve a superficial flawlessness of diction, stanza form, and rhyme scheme. He was opposed to irregular and unusual sentence structure and hyperbolic metaphors. Geibel confused strict precision in language with aesthetic beauty. Important motifs in the works of the M.D. are complaints against the transience of all life, loneliness, and isolation; predominant are the atmosphere of autumn and the longing for peace and rest. All of these poets were epigones. After the death of Maximilian (1864) the circle lost its impetus. In 1882 Heyse made an attempt to revive the circle when he published Das neue Münchener Dichterbuch, a collection artistically even more fragile than the first. It was published at a time when new literary movements were emerging, and had nothing in common with the new aesthetic principles of works published in the same year: Ibsen's Enemy of the People, Nietzsche's Fröhliche Wissenschaft, and the Hart brothers' Kritische Waffengänge. In 1883 "Das Krokodil" had its last meeting.—F. Burwick, "Die Kunsttheorie des M.D." (diss. Greifswald, 1932); W. Sieber, "Der M.D. und die Romantik" (diss. Bern, 1937); L. Ferrari, "Paul Heyse und die literarischen Strömungen seiner Zeit" (diss. Bonn, 1939); E. Petzel and W. Kohlschmidt, "M.D.," Reallexikon, 2d ed., II; F. Martini, Deutsche Literatur im bürgerlichen Realismus 1848–1898 (1962).

E.L.

MUSE. One of the nine Gr. goddesses who preside over poetry, song, and the arts, traditionally invoked by poets to grant them inspiration. ("Sing, Goddess, the wrath of Achilles, Peleus' son . . ." Homer, Iliad 1.1). At first indefinite in number, the M., daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne (goddess of memory), were first celebrated in Thrace near Mt. Olympus and Pieria. Hence that peak was regarded as their home and the Pierian Spring as the fountain of learning. Probably before Homer's time their worship had spread southward to Helicon and thence to Delphi; it eventually became a common feature of Gr. religious culture. By the 3d c. B.C. the festival of the Heliconian Muses at Thespai was patronized by Athens and the important guild of artists of Dionysus; here all the poetic and musical talent of Greece was consecrated. Elsewhere, observance of the M. became attached to the worship of Apollo.

The attribution of particular arts to each M. is a late development, and there is some duplication of influence. The M. are: Calliope (epic or heroic poetry); Clio (history, lyre-playing); Erato (love poetry, hymns, lyre-playing, pantomime); Euterpe (tragedy, flute-playing, lyric poetry); Melpomene (tragedy, lyre-playing); Polymnia or Polyhymnia (hymns, pantomime, religious dancing); Terpsichore (choral dancing and singing, flute-playing); Thalia (comedy); and Urania (astronomy, i.e., cosmological poetry).

With the recovery of classical writings in the later Middle Ages the tradition of invoking the Muse or Muses was revived. In Dante (where Beatrice herself fulfills the Muse's role), there are references to the Muses of antiquity (Inferno 2.7f.; 32.10f.; Paradiso 2.8; 18.82f.). Milton invokes the pagan M. but transforms her into a specifically Christian inspiring power: "Descend from Heaven, Urania, by that name / If rightly thou art called . . . / . . . for thou / Nor of the Muses nine, nor on the top / Of old Olympus dwell'st, but heavenly-born . . . / Thou with Eternal Wisdom didst converse." (Paradise Lost 7.1ff.).

For other Renaissance poets, however, the M. of antiquity could be accepted without relinquishing their pagan attributes. Thus Spenser commences The Faerie Queene: "Me, all too meane, the sacred Muse areeds / To blazen broad amongst her learned throng: / Fierce warres and faithfull loues shall moralize my song." (1.7–9). The unnamed "sacred Muse" is either Clio (history) or Calliope (epic). The Petrarchan love poets, too, invoked their inspiring spirit: "Fool said my muse to me, look in thy heart and write" (Sidney, Astrophel and Stella, 1.14). The beloved herself sometimes assumed the role of M. The tradition continues into modern times of invoking or referring to the Muse or Muses for inspiratory power (cf. Thomas Gray, The Progress of Poesy). For a provocative discussion of poetic homage to the M. from ancient to modern times see Robert Graves, The White Goddess (3d ed., 1958).—L. R. Farnell, The Cults of the Gr. States, V (1909); G. Murray, The Cl. Tradition in Poetry (1927); G. Highet, The Cl. Trad. (1949).

D.H.

MUSIC AND POETRY undoubtedly arose in common historical sources of primitive prayer, working chants and the like, and notwithstanding the diversive development of literature and music as human institutions, the histories of both have remained in many ways mutually contingent. It has been frequently observed that more or less primitive oral traditions make no conceptual differentiation between narrative or lyric texts and the melodies and/or accompaniments to which they are sung. Even the sophisticated aesthetic speculations of classical antiquity, however, blended together in the notion of mousike those activities which we should today distinguish as music, poetry, and dance. And while we know that throughout classic times textless, instrumental music continued to develop its own conventions, it was only rational music, given meaning by the text sung to its melody, that could serve as a subject fit for philosophical speculation. A powerful additional bond between text and melody in actual practice was effected by the fact that a common over-all rhythm governed both of them. (A modern reader might see this most clearly in the testimony of the musical notation of the ancient world, which consisted of pitch indication alone, the durations and stressed groupings of notes being generally determined by the prosody of the text). As long as the meter of poetry retained its significance in what we should call today a musical sense, the monistic character of mousike remained unthreatened. But as soon as poetic conventions of a purely schematic type could allow literary conceptions of poetry to replace more fundamentally phonic ones, a fracturing of the united notion of mousike could occur. What was properly the meter, the governing principle of poetic construction, became something independent of sound alone; and where the quantitative prosody of Gr. was forced onto the unyielding sound structure of L., for example, word stress had generally to be ignored in the metrical scheme, which latter tended more and more to become a purely graphematic arrangement.

It was by no means the case, however, that with the decline of the classic world, poetry and music as we would distinguish them proceeded to develop as separate and independent arts. It must be remembered that the growth of instrumental music was a long and gradual one, that it was not until late in the 16th c. that instrumental and vocal music became independent practices to any degree at all. It was only after instrumental compositions grew beyond their prior status of being merely versions of either vocal settings or of dances, that pure instrumental sounds could serve as the pure type of music in the abstract, as we know it today. And it was only with the development, during the Renaissance and after, of forms of lyric poetry completely divorced from either the intention or effect of song, that any concept of "the music of poetry" might emerge. Such a notion, describing the operation of the nontonal but merely linguistic sounds of poetry, thus relates those sounds to the tones of modern, abstract music. Both, it is generally felt, move to affect a listener in some sub-rational fashion, just as both are in some way involved with the communication of feeling rather than of knowledge.

In general, a number of phases might be distinguished in the relationship between music and poetry in the Occident. In the first of these periods, the two are completely identified, as in pre-Attic epochs, in Germanic languages up to about the 9th c., and in pre-literary folk traditions up through modern times. Here poet and composer are the same person, and they practice one craft, even after (as in fact actually occurred) the poet ceases to be the sole performer as well. It will be noted that, at such a stage, the one human occupation which might involve the production of melodies without texts would be dancing. But social rituals invariably operated to unite most occasions for dancing and singing.

A second stage could be said to emerge during the Attic period of antiquity, during which both music and poetry began to flourish individually. Scientific and philosophic interest in the nature of pure sound, on the one hand, and literary (i.e., linguistic and mythical) criticism of poetic style, on the other, urged a gradual conceptual differentiation between the two disciplines. And it might be guessed that the attacks on textless music (for being irrational) of Plato, Aristotle, Aris-toxenus and others were certainly directed at actual instrumental musical practices. Most important of all, however, in the incipient bifurcation of lêxis and mêlos, was the gradual development, during the classic period, of purely literary conventions, and the replacement, by readers, of audiences in the stricter sense. This whole second stage in the development of music and poetry was marked by unequal growth in the two, however; and it seems to have been the former that, surging ahead, forced the cleavage between them.

But it was for many centuries that music in the West followed in the footsteps of its sister art, unable quite to develop independently. With the fall of the Roman world, both music and poetry were to be found primarily in the liturgy of the church, and in the earliest vernacular narratives. The latter represent, of course, the earliest unified musico-poetic stage. Scop, minstrel and bard were all poet-musicians whose muses might be concretely identified both in their musical instruments and in their "word-hoards," their linguistic stocks in trade. But the subsequent development of both music and verse fell under the guidance of the church, which at once could control access to the practices of antiquity, and could itself establish and preserve linguistic and musical conventions. After the codification of the musical liturgy by Gregory I at the end of the 6th c., we may distinguish a third phase of musico-poetic history. Here it is that the development of music eventually permits it to compete with poetry for independence; it is during the period from 900-1400 in particular that theoretical and practical problems of music alone give gradual rise to a craft and a concern quite distinct from that of the writer. It is meaningful, throughout the Middle Ages, to speak of the task of the composer as that of setting a pre-existent text to music. To this extent, word and tone are still inextricably involved, but musical and poetic invention have become separated as matters of technique.

It is in the troping of "original" fragments of music into the codified plain-chant of the liturgy that the earliest instances of such musical invention may be observed. It must be remembered, however, that the additional musical material always accompanied some newly composed bit of Latin, inserted between words of the canonical text. While it is in these tropes and sequences that early examples of actual composition may be identified, it is only with the beginnings of polyphony in the 10th c. or thereabouts, and the subsequent development of the typical intricacies of Western music both within the church and outside of it, that purely musical exigencies began to cause composers to neglect, and even to subvert, formal and structural elements of the text. By the beginning of the 13th c., the establishment of polyphonic music in the uses of the church was complete, and was accompanied by the utilization of adjunct instruments, and by the first appearance of identifiable composers who signed their compositions. During the period from 1100 to 1450, however, it is primarily in the domain of the secular lyric that anything of the earlier phases of unification may be observed. The L. conductus, the troubadour canzo and vers, the Northern chanson, rondeau, virelai and ballade, the bar and leich of the Minnesinger, were all musico-poetic forms, and their authors were also their composers. It is significant that the music here was in most cases monodic (i.e., it consisted of a single melodic line), and also that the occasional instrumental preludes (only possibly were there rudimentary accompaniments) that preceded the singing of a troubadour or trouvère song were invariably performed by a jongleur servant of the poet himself. But this period of unified activity was accompanied by such diverse institutions as the spread of the early polyphonic motet, which often had as many texts as there were musical parts: a sacred L. text in the tenor, and a Fr. hymn and a bawdy drinking song in the upper voices frequently occurred together. It was into the polyphonic tradition, ultimately, that the monodic, courtly secular lyric was absorbed, and perhaps the last truly great poet-composer of this epoch was Guillaume de Machaut (1300-77), who flourished during the musical era of the "ars nova." It was during this period that the technical concerns and advances of composers and theorists grew to involve the text less and less, and moved music more and more towards autonomy.

In the Renaissance, finally, a kind of historical irony emerges with the observable development of an ideological concern for the reunification of music and poetry, coexistent with the spread and refinement of just those elements of musical practice which best operated to prevent that reunification from permanently taking hold. The 16th c. saw the rise of instrumental music in its own right, the beginnings of virtuoso performance, and the institutionalization of concern with harmony in the modern sense, for example. But it also produced the neoclassic aesthetic of such groups as the Camerata in Florence and the Pléiade (q.v.) in France, both openly committed to an ideal identification of text and melody, based on the practices of antiquity as they understood them. Corresponding to the attempts of many writers and critics to establish classical scansion as the governing prosodic principles for the poetry of their respective modern languages, there arose in the later 16th c. a concerted interest in the purification of music, in restoring the importance of the text, and in reclaiming for vocal music, at any rate, a truly expressive function that had been lost early in the development of "modern" polyphony. This sort of argument led, within Jean-Antoine Baïff's circle in France, to experiments in the so-called musique mesurée, or vocal settings designed to point up a quantitative scansion for their Fr. texts. The It. circle who met at the house of the Count Bardi, however, produced a lasting influence on the music of the following centuries in the invention of recitative.

With the beginning of the baroque era, we may distinguish another phase of musico-poetic relations in which the two arts are adjudged to have a complementary relationship to each other: music might be said to have stood to poetry as feeling to knowledge, or, as Hobbes put it, "as Fancy to Judgement." It was this sort of distinction that prevailed throughout the 17th and earlier 18th c., during which period the status of both music and poetry as utterly independent practices remained unchanged. The growth of opera, of course, provided an area in which the two might be mutually effective. But the general trend of baroque music was toward a kind of technical standardization, treating the human voice as an instrument, etc. and the achievements of poetry remained in an intellectual domain.

Most 18th-c. aestheticians would have wanted to distinguish between the instruction and embellishment whose purposes were respectively served by the cognitive and ornamental elements in poetry alone. Alexander Pope could insist in An Essay on Criticism (1709) that, in any poem, "The sound must seem an Echo to the sense"; but this same author could, a few lines earlier, condemn all those who "to Church repair, / Not for the doctrine, but the music there." In general, a neoclassic aesthetic that could so sharply distinguish between "music" and "sense" could not help but trivialize the importance and power of the first with respect to that of the second. And similarly but conversely, a romanticism that sought to reject what it considered the artificialities of the preceding century and a half could almost not help but celebrate music and feeling at some expense of language and thought. What might have been an attempt to blur a previous epoch's distinctions only managed to cut their lines more deeply.

Since the 18th c., both opera and "art-song" have flourished as legitimate genres, but by and large, the relationship between music and poetry (as a branch of literature) has remained very much the same. It has been observed that the romantic era, with its prescriptions of emotional experience for poetry, actually maintained the conceptual dualism of the previous epoch while trying in practice to destroy it. Even as "pure" instrumental music became more literary and "programmatic," poetry sought to develop, in its texture, a music of its own. For literature, generally, music has continued to invoke the Irrational, just as musicians have, on the whole, turned to literary underpinnings (in titles, covert myths and programs, epigraphs, etc.—aside from actual sung texts) for a basis of emotional content.

De la musique avant toute chose,
Et pour cela préfère l'Impair
Plus vague et plus soluble dans l'air . . .

Paul Verlaine's aesthetic manifesto, in urging a commitment to the priority of sound over sense, is enjoining a more general rejection of knowledge for the sake of feeling. And this peculiar notion of sound, the "music of poetry" continues to represent today the significant characteristic of music in its relation to literature: namely, that the power of music to affect a hearer remains a model for the potential effectiveness of poetry, if only because the workings of the former seem to be so much more mysterious than those of the latter. See LYRIC, SONG.

S. Lanier, The Science of Eng. Verse (1880); J. B. Beck, Die Melodien der Troubadours (1908); P. Aubry, Trouvères et Troubadours (1909); R. Noble, Shakespeare's Use of Song (1923); J. M. Gibbon, Melody and the Lyric (1930); T. S. Eliot, The Music of Poetry (1942); G. Reese, Music in the Middle Ages (1940) and Music in the Renaissance (1954); C. Sachs, The Rise of Music in the Ancient World (1943) and The Commonwealth of Art (1946); B. Pattison, Music and Poetry of the Eng. Ren. (1948); Source Readings in Music Hist., ed. O. Strunk (1950); W. Mellers, Music and Society (2d ed., 1950); J. S. Manifold, The Music in Eng. Drama (1955); A. Einstein, Essays on Music (1956); B. Nettl, Music in Primitive Culture (1956); J. Hollander, "The Music of Poetry," JAAC, 15 (1956) and The Untuning of the Sky: Ideas of Music in Eng. Poetry, 1500-1700 (1961); Sound and Poetry, ed. N. Frye (1957); J. Stevens, Music and Poetry in the Early Tudor Court (1961); F. W. Sternfeld, Music in Shakespearean Tragedy (1963). J.H.

MUWASHSHAH (muwashshahah). See ARABIC POETRY (Spanish-Arabic section).

MYSTERY AND MIRACLE PLAYS. In American and continental usage the term mystery refers to plays based on the Bible, in particular those parts of the Scripture that tell the story of man's Creation, Fall and Redemption, and miracle refers to plays that treat the lives and martyrdoms of saints. The former, which are the earlier, appeared as additions to the services of the liturgical year. Each period of the year had its own special readings, called lectiones, and a good deal of the Scripture read was dramatized, bit by bit, from the 9th to the 16th c. Mystery p. did not grow from one stem in one place, but were varied both in location and degree of development, in spite of occasional imitation and borrowing. In some locales the early or middle forms remained almost unchanged for centuries; in others extensive dramas in the vernacular were built up.

Mysteries began in what are called tropes, which were additions to the regular services, and began to appear during a musical and artistic renaissance in the 9th c. It happened that one of these tropes, the Quem quaeritis trope representing the visit of the Three Marys to the sepulchre of Christ, contained the three fundamental elements of drama, namely, impersonation, dialogue, and event. The fact that these elements were present in the Quem quaeritis trope caused it to grow by incremental additions into a complete drama of the Resurrection. The main additions were the visit of the disciples Peter and John to the tomb, the appearance of Jesus to Mary Magdalen in the Garden, the Journey of Cleophas and Luke to Emmaus, followed by the Incredulity of Thomas, and two secular elements, the Ointment Seller and Pilate's Setting of the Watch. This growth occupied about two centuries, and during that time the dramatizing habit had so asserted itself within the liturgy that little L. plays, so-called dramatic offices, had made their appearance at Christmastide in the form of Nativity plays, including ultimately the Messianic prophets (Ordo prophetarum), the Shepherds (Pastores), the Magi, which introduced Herod, the villain of the piece, the Flight into Egypt, the Slaughter of the Innocents, and the Death of Herod. It is also possible that the so-called eschatological plays, Antichrist and Judgment Day, which had originated in Advent, were in some places united with the Christmas-Epiphany cycle. In addition to these there were many plays on special subjects originating at special festivals. Some of these were no doubt absorbed in larger units, although some of them, such as the Conversion of St. Paul and the play of the Wise and the Foolish Virgins, led independent existences throughout the period. The story of the Passion seems to have been dramatized toward the end of the 12th c. as an appropriate introduction to the already highly developed play of the Resurrection, and, when it did appear, its dramatic interest was so great that it assumed a central position. Indeed, the common popular name for mystery

MYSTERY AND MIRACLE PLAYS

p. on the continent of Europe became Passion plays (q.v.).

The Latin drama of the church was fairly complete in its treatment of religious themes by the year 1200. The records are almost nil, but we know from the results what happened in the 13th c. Most of the plays were translated into modern languages, and they left the church and appeared in the churchyard or in the street. They seem moreover to be no longer in the hands of the clergy but in those of the laity, probably in the care of ecclesiastical and (later) secular guilds. However, the transitional period is obscure.

The establishment of the feast of Corpus Christi in the early 14th c. was an event of great importance to the mystery p. The directions for the celebration of the feast called for a procession, and each ecclesiastical district was allowed to decide what the features of the procession should be. At some place, we do not know where, a brilliant idea was evolved. The mystery p. were already in the hands of the people, and the Easter and Christmas plays were highly developed. The idea was not only to transfer the plays to the new feast of Corpus Christi sixty days after Easter, when the weather would be good, but to arrange them chronologically. The result was a processional drama that extended from the Creation to Doomsday. This great play did not appear everywhere. Examples are preserved from Germany, Spain, the Low Countries, and England, particularly the north and east of England. An alternative common in France, Germany, and parts of England was continued separation of the Christmas and Easter groups, the latter of which grew to great proportions. The result was the great German Passion plays of Frankfurt, Alsfeld, Heidelberg, Eger, Innsbruck, and Künzelsau; the Fr. plays of Arras, Troyes, and Valenciennes; the great redactions by Jean Michel and Arnoul Greban and many others; and numerous cycles in Provence, Italy, and elsewhere.

The plays of London and the south of England were in the continental form, but they are all lost except one great, but possibly not representative, cycle in the ancient Cornish language. What we have are rather ample remains of the Corpus Christi plays and numerous records of lost plays of that kind. We have the great and almost complete cycle from York and that from Wakefield (Towneley), originally identical with the York cycle. There are also the Chester plays, preserved in five late manuscripts, the simplest of all the cycles, and a cycle called mistakenly Ludus Coventriae, now frequently designated as the Hegge plays. This cycle is complete, theologically very learned, and possibly is a Corpus Christi play from Lincoln. Besides these, there are several single plays and fragments of lost cycles.

The records of the Corpus Christi play have been so abundantly preserved that there is an idea abroad that all mystery p. were composed and acted after the Corpus Christi model, but, in point of fact, the variety was very great. Not only were there many independent single plays, like the Conversion of St. Paul or the Play of St. Mary Magdalen; but the whole body of plays from London, the south of England, and no doubt elsewhere were passion plays like those prevailing on the continent. Such plays were acted on fixed stages with conventional treatment of time and space, whereas the Corpus Christi plays were played as single scenes on pageant wagons drawn in chronological order to fixed places or "stations" about the cities where a Corpus Christi play was maintained. The decay and abandonment of the mystery p. came about gradually through the influence of Protestantism and the change of public manners and tastes brought on by the Renaissance. The end in England was in the later 16th c., but they lived on in a few places on the continent, such as Oberammergau, until modern times.

The earliest Eng. mystery p. were in rhymed couplets and quatrains and in rime couée (aa'b³aaa'b³), which were the forms current in L. and Fr. poetry of the 11th and 12th c. They were well suited to simple scriptural themes. Mainly out of these elements Middle Eng. poetry built stanzas of considerable variety and complexity, and the mysteries were often revised in these forms. The Chester plays, however, were written in a ballad stanza to which they usually adhered through many redactions.

MIRACLE PLAYS. In Am. and Continental usage the term "miracle p." is applied to medieval dramas that treat of the lives and martyrdoms of saints and of their intercessory functions. In Great Britain this term is sometimes applied to both saints' plays and those derived from the Bible. The difference in origin between the two kinds is negligible; both grew out of an expansion of the church services beginning in the 9th c. The lives and deeds of the saints were precisely as sacred and important as were those of patriarchs, prophets, and disciples. There was, however, a significant dramatic difference between miracle and mystery plays. The subjects of the latter were dictated and largely controlled by the services of the liturgical year, but the former had much greater range of plot and situation and greater freedom of choice, so that, as pointed out by Manly, miracle plays must have had important influences in the creation of the secular plays of the Tudors. Only four L. miracle p. are preserved. All deal with St. Nicholas and are clearly derived from the liturgy of his feast (Dec. 6). They are usually dated in the 11th or 12th c. St. Nicholas was the patron saint of boys in school, and the play must have been widely distributed. We know that there must have been other L. saints' plays at an early date. There was such a play of St. Catherine performed at Dunstable at the end of the 11th or the beginning of the 12th c., and William Fitzstephen (fl. 1170-86) in his life of Thomas Becket declares that in his times plays dealing with the miracles of holy saints and confessors were regularly enacted in London. There are other evidences, but England and other Protestant countries have so swept away texts and records that one has to make a beginning in France.

There are two purely vernacular miracle p. that seem to have special significance: Le Jeu de Saint Nicolas by Jean Bodel of Arras, which develops in spirited fashion the theme of one of the L. plays on St. Nicholas, and Le Miracle de Théophile by Rutebeuf, which belongs to the 13th c. It details a miracle of salvation by the Blessed Virgin Mary and, so far as we know, may be the first miracle de Notre Dame. The fashion at any rate took hold in France, and the great 14th-c. manuscript (Bibl. Nat. 218 and 219) contains no less than forty Miracles de Notre Dame par personages, highly developed and drawn from a wide area of subjects. There are many other miracles of Notre Dame, and the 14th and 15th c. filled France with miracle p., which appeared, too, in other countries—Germany, Spain, England, Scotland, Holland, and elsewhere, but not nearly so plentifully as in France.

The Reform in England did an almost complete job of destruction. Records show lost miracle p. on many subjects: St. Catherine at Coventry, St. Nicholas at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Aberdeen, St. Andrew in Scotland and at Braintree in Essex, St. Christina at Bethersden in Kent, St. Clotilda at Windsor, St. Margaret and St. Lucy in Southwark, St. Thomas Becket at King's Lynn, and many others. In point of fact only one complete miracle p. has been preserved, the so-called Croxton Play of the Sacrament, a rather crude and nontypical example. There were so many Croxtons in the Midlands that one does not know which of them was the home of our only miracle p. in Eng. There is also preserved the role of the principal actor in another miracle p. It bears the name of the leading actor and is called Dux Moraud.

There is, however, a play The Life of St. Meriasek in the ancient Cornish language which enables one to form an idea of the common run of popular miracle p. It is a long play in two parts probably acted, like the Origo Mundi, in a circular earthen amphitheatre. St. Meriasek was venerated in Brittany, Cornwall, and Wales, where the Cymric dialect of Celtic was the language. He was the son of the Duke of Brittany, carefully reared and given every opportunity, including a brilliant marriage, but he renounced the world for the service of God. He performed his first miracle; then sailed for Cornwall, where he tamed a wolf and built his hermitage, both by miraculous means. His great miracle, however, was the routing of robbers and pagans. The second part is located in Rome, where he performed other miracles and became a bishop. Both parts end with an invitation to the audience to drink and dance.

The remains of Eng. miracle p. are so meager as to afford little material for the determination of poetic form and style. That many of them were exciting dramas there can be no doubt. If one may judge from Fr. miracle p., one would say that the early forms were probably in simple measures and that, as time went on, the plays were written in more and more elaborate stanzas.

L. Petit de Julleville, Les Mystères (2 v., 1886); W. Creizenach, Gesch. des neueren Dramas (esp. I, 1893); E. K. Chambers, The Mediaeval Stage (2 v., 1903); G. R. Coffman, A New Theory Concerning the Origin of the Miracle Play (1911) and articles in learned jour.; J. M. Manly, "Miracle P. in Mediaeval England," Royal Soc. of Lit., Trans., ser. 3, 7 (1927); K. Young, The Drama of the Medieval Church (2 v., 1933); H. C. Gardiner, Mysteries' End (1946); A. P. Rossiter, Eng. Drama from Early Times to the Elizabethans (1950); H. Craig, Eng. Religious Drama of the MA (1955); E. Prosser, Drama and Religion in the Eng. Mystery Plays (1961); A. Williams, The Drama of Medieval England (1961). H.C.

MYTH† may be defined as a story or a complex of story elements taken as expressing, and therefore as implicitly symbolizing, certain deep-lying aspects of human and transhuman existence. This definition is framed in such a way as to avoid two contrary and one-sided views of the matter. The one, represented by Cassirer, treats myth as primarily a kind of perspective, and in this vein Cassirer speaks of "transposing the Kantian principle"—that all knowledge involves, at the instant of its reception, a synthesizing activity of the mind—"into the key of myth." Evidently m. here becomes synonymous with the mythopoeic mode of consciousness; it is simply a basic way of envisaging experience, and carries no necessary connotation of storytelling. At the opposite extreme stands the view that m. is merely story. In its popular form this gives rise to the colloquial use of the term "m." to mean a tale that is not according to the facts, and the adjective "mythical" as a synonym for "false." A more reflective development of the same general attitude finds expression in Chase's view that "myth is literature and must be considered as an aesthetic creation of the human imagination"; in other words, that the earliest mythologizers were individual poets—which is to say "makers," or storytellers—constructing out of their especially active imaginations tall tales characterized by a peculiar complication "of brilliant excitement, of the terrific play of the forces natural and human," and eventuating in some deeply desired and socially sharable feeling of reconciliation among those forces. As distinguished from Cassirer's position our proposed definition includes the idea of narrative as an essential part of the meaning of m.; but as distinguished from Chase's position it insists that the original sources of such storytelling lie somehow below or beyond the conscious inventions of individual poets, and that the stories themselves thus serve as partly unconscious vehicles for meanings that have something to do with the inner nature of the universe and of human life.

† In Supplement, see also MYTH CRITICISM.

The partial validity of each of the views mentioned, as well as the variable relationships between m. and poetry, become more evident when we distinguish between the two main senses of m.—as mythopoeia and as mythology. Friedrich Max Müller (The Science of Religion, II, 1864) has proposed that the adjective "mythic" be employed for the first meaning, where no clear-cut ideas of true and false have yet emerged, and "mythical" for the second, where some degree of deliberate fable-making is implied.

Giambattista Vico (La Scienza nuova, 1725) was the first important writer to emphasize that primitive thought is essentially poetic, in that the endowment of inanimate objects with life, will, and emotion is at once the natural tendency of primitive man and the most sublime task of poetry—a point of view carried on with various modifications by Herder (1744–1803) and by Shelley (A Defence of Poetry, 1821). The word "mythopoeia" has come into vogue as designating the human outlook and forms of expression most characteristic of that early stage of culture when language is still largely ritualistic and prelogical in character. Each of these two aspects of the character of primitive language has a decisive bearing upon the formation of both m. and poetry. The relation of ritual to the rhythmic and eventually the metric element in poetry needs no demonstration. The ritualistic basis of m. has been emphasized by a number of anthropologists and classical scholars during the last few decades, notably in such works as: Jane Harrison, Themis (1912), Francis M. Cornford, The Origins of Attic Comedy (1914),

A. B. Cook, Zeus (1914), S. H. Hooke, ed., Myth and Ritual (1933), Lord Raglan, The Hero (1937), and Theodore H. Gaster, Thespis (1950). Harrison cites an ancient Gr. definition of m. as "ta legomena epi tois dromenois" (the things that are spoken in ritual acts). The reason why ritual tends to engender m. becomes more evident when we consider that genuine ritual is celebrative and therefore participative. Seasonal ritual (as Gaster has shown with respect to the ancient Near East) expresses something of the worshippers' joyful sense of the coming of spring, or of the summer solstice, or of the gathering of grain, and at such times the worshippers feel themselves to be participating in the great rhythmic movement of nature. Dance and song are the natural expressions of such participation, and the words of the song tend to describe or to address or to enact the personified forces that are being celebrated. From description to address it is an easy step in a culture which does not sharply distinguish between person and thing nor between adjective and noun. When the ancient Canaanites described a storm, "Baal opens a rift in the clouds and gives forth his holy voice," they probably got as close to a naturalistic description as their language would allow them to go; the metaphors that make the description possible are such that Baal is envisaged not as an abstraction but as a superhuman operator, to be addressed and to be ritually enacted. Where a set of linguistic habits is such that virtually no distinction is made between the literal and the figurative there is likely to be just as little distinction between the descriptive and the fanciful. Such psychic and linguistic amalgams are one of the most important factors in the genesis and early growth of m.

The role of metaphor in primitive language is a second factor joining poetry and m. Our reference here must be to primary, or radical metaphor. Metaphor in the familiar sense of "the transference of a name from the thing which it properly denotes to some other thing" (Aristotle, Poetics) is rhetorical, not primary, for it is possible only where certain terms with fixed meanings are already available as starting-points; it is, therefore, more characteristic of the post-mythological and sophisticated than of the primitive phase of m. There is a prior semantic activity which operates, perhaps preconsciously, by fusing certain raw elements of experience—qualities, relationships, capabilities, emotional colorings, and whatever else—into a unity of reference which some symbol is taken to represent. Thus in Vedic Sanskrit the word agni meant fire in its various culturally important aspects: fire as lord of the sacred hearth, fire as "the spoon-mouthed one" which receives the oblation of sanctified butter from a spoon or ladle, fire as the messenger which crackles and leaps as it bears this offering to the gods on high, fire as the dispeller of darkness and hence of evil, fire which punishes evil-doers by its burning heat, fire as the generative urge in the loins of animals, and Lord Agni as a member of the Vedic pantheon. The hymns addressed to Agni in the Rig-Veda are thus able to designate the god with a connotative fullness appropriate to poetry, while they also stir up mythic inquiries by suggesting relations between some of these traits and others. Again, in the ceremony of the Night Chant practiced by the Navajo Indians the giant corn plant growing at the Red Rock House and the giant squash vine growing at the Blue Water House are employed as symbols of the masculine and feminine principles respectively, as symbols of food and therefore of plenty, as magically efficacious healing devices, and hence (through the idea of regeneration implicit in each of these aspects) as symbols of man's aspiration to spiritual rebirth. Such symbols have on the one hand a richness of reference, not overexplicit, that makes them suitable materials for poetry; while on the other hand the jostling of different and sometimes incongruous meanings may stimulate the invention of mythic tales to comment upon and partly explain how those meanings are related.

In recent years, particularly through the researches of Dr. Carl G. Jung at his school, a promising line of inquiry has been developed into the collective psychology underlying primary myth-formation. Jung postulates a "collective unconscious" which consists of "primordial images" or "archetypes"—i.e., trans-individual ideas with a strong feeling-tone and with a tendency to find expression in characteristic imagistic forms. The Divine Father, the Earth Mother, the World Tree, the satyr or centaur or other man-animal monster, the descent into Hell, the Purgatorial stair, the washing away of sin, the castle of attainment, the culture-hero such as Prometheus bringing fire or other basic gift to mankind, the treacherous betrayal of the hero, the sacrificial death of the god, the god in disguise or the prince under enchantment—these and many other archetypal ideas serve as persistently recurrent themes in human thought. Since they have furnished story elements to the literature of widely different cultures, Jung and Kerenyi have employed Herder's word mythologem to designate this aspect of them. Jung holds that they are buried deep in man's psyche, below the suppressed or inchoate memories belonging to the individual, and that the libido has recourse to them "when it becomes freed from the personal-infantile form of transference."

The epic poet's invocation of the Muse would represent, in one aspect, the poet's desire to free himself from the "personal-infantile" type of thinking through being borne along by the more deeply expressive power of archetypal thought patterns.

The emergence of a definite mythology, recognized as such, represents on the whole a later and more sophisticated stage of human thought, when the primitive mythopoeic way of envisioning the world has been largely replaced by definite conceptions and a greater reliance upon reasoning, with the result that the older mythic stories have become materials to be embellished, recontextualized, and often reinterpreted by the poet's conscious art. The Iliad and the Odyssey represent two early phases of the development of mythological out of mythopoeic thought. While they contain many traces of an earlier mythopoeic attitude and of a ritual stylization (which the practice of minstrelsy in Homer's time doubtless did much to preserve), yet the voice and genius of an individual poet are unmistakably present, selecting and regrouping and articulating the older stories according to a freshly conceived design. Aeschylus' Oresteia, Virgil's Aeneid, Dante's Commedia, Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Tempest, and Milton's Paradise Lost, represent in different perspectives the zenith of literary exploitation of mythology. The mythic ideas of the emergence of divinely sanctioned Gr. law out of tribal vendetta, of the destined founding of Rome, of the faery life of the Eng. countryside, of Neoplatonic hierarchies, and of Christian eschatology are here deliberately reconceived and reformulated through the imaginatively constructed medium of the poem. Yet some degree of positive belief is still operative in each of these works, giving spiritual force to the presentation and integrating without too much apparent artifice the diverse particulars. As the attitude towards mythology becomes more overtly sophisticated—e.g., in Ovid's Metamorphoses, Goethe's Faust, and Eliot's The Waste Land—the problem of finding a stable unifying philosophy by which to interpret a given subject matter becomes of increasing concern to the poet (cf. PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY).

The spiritual problems of the poet in contemporary society arise in part out of the lack of myths which can be felt warmly, envisaged in concrete and contemporary imagery, and shared with a wide body of responsive readers. Consequently, since the time of Herder there has been a gradually increasing insistence upon the need of what Friedrich Schlegel (Gespräch über die Poesie, 1800) calls "the mother-soil of myth." Unlike Herder, who urged the revival of Teutonic mythology as a rich mine of folk imagination available to German poets, Schlegel looked toward a new and more comprehensive mythology which would combine and blend folk elements with the idealistic philosophy of Fichte and Schelling, the pantheism of Spinoza, and the sacred writings of ancient India, thus achieving a "hieroglyphical expression" of nature conceived as a system of correspondences and symbols. However, Herder was careful to warn (what every good poet knows) that the m. must be related to the poem organically, not by way of a conscious effort to plug a gap. In other words, m. in poetry is not to be conceived merely as a narrative structure, but should enter into the very life-blood of the poem—that is, into its very mode of envisaging and formulating its materials. Accordingly, Friar and Brinnin declare that "the use of metaphorical and symbolist devices has grown out of the modern poet's search for a mythology which might offer him some concrete body for metaphor and metaphysic." Thus in St.-John Perse's Anabasis the mythic sense of race, of rootage in the soil, of space as the area in which man moves and settles, of matter as the quarry of his building stones, of time as the cycle of seasons shot through with a firm line of communal action in the erection of cities, all conduces to an archetypal image, concretely and movingly envisaged, of the human caravan as massively operative in man's collective prehistory. Rilke's reenvisagement of the Christian mythos ("Every angel is ringed with terror"), Yeats's gradual construction of a highly individual but nonetheless powerfully expressive mythology out of the marriage of Ir. folklore with gnostic theosophy, and Eliot's synthesis of anthropology, Christian mysticism, and Gr. and Hindu metaphysics are further outstanding examples of the poetic revitalization of m. and the fresh exploration of the philosophical and religious possibilities of mythic experience through the medium of poetry in our time.

G. Vico, The New Science (1725; Eng. tr. 1948); T. S. Eliot, "Ulysses, Order, and M.," The Dial, Nov. 1923; E. Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, II, "Mythical Thought" (1923–29; Eng. tr. 1955) and Language and M. (Eng. tr. 1946); F. C. Prescott, Poetry and M. (1927); St.-J. Perse, Anabasis (Eng. tr. by T. S. Eliot, 1930); H. Rosenberg, "M. and Poem," The Symposium, 2 (April 1931); D. Bush, Mythology and the Renaissance Tradition in Eng. Poetry (1932) and Mythology and the Romantic Trad. in Eng. Poetry (1937); M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934) and Studies of Type-Images in Poetry, Religion, and Philosophy (1951); Langer, ch. 7; M. Schorer, William Blake (1946; esp. ch. 2); P. Ure, Towards a Mythology: Studies in the Poetry of W. B. Yeats (1946); J. Campbell, The Hero with a Thousand Faces (1949); R. Chase, Quest for M. (1949); E. Drew, T. S. Eliot: The Design of his Poetry (1949); T. H. Gaster, Thespis: Ritual, M. and Drama in the Ancient Near East (1950); K. Friar and M. Brinnin, "M. and Metaphysics," pp. 421–443 of Modern Poetry, ed. by the same (1951); A. W. Watts, M. and Ritual in Christianity (1954); H. Weisinger, Tragedy and the Paradox of the Fortunate Fall (1954); Wheelwright, chs. 7–10; M.: A Symposium, ed. T. A. Sebeok (1955; separate issue of JAF, v. 68, no. 270); Frye; K. Burke, "Myth, Poetry and Philosophy," JAF, 73 (1960); Myth and Mythmaking, ed. H. A. Murray (1960); M. and Symbol, ed. B. Slote (1963). See also J. Campbell, The Masks of God (1959–68); M. Eliade, The Sacred and the Profane (1959) and M. and Reality (1963); R. Y. Hathorne, Tragedy, M. and Mystery (1962).

P.W.

MYTHOPOEIA. See MYTH.

N

NAGAUTA. See JAPANESE POETRY.

NAIVE-SENTIMENTAL. Poetic antinomy devised by Friedrich Schiller in an essay "Ueber naive und sentimentalische Dichtung" (1795–96), primarily designed to define the poet's relationship to nature. Schiller divides all poets into two classes: The naive poets (Homer, Shakespeare, Goethe) who strive, as best they may, to project nature as they embody it, and the sentimental poets (Schiller himself and most poets associated with classicism, q.v.) who have lost contact with nature and attempt to portray it as a sought-for ideal. The naive poets create by instinct since they must only express themselves to express nature—they are realists since they embody and produce reality. Sentimental poets, on the other hand, create formally since they strive to reproduce that ideal of nature which lies beyond them—they are hence idealists. Since nature is particularized in the form of the naive poet, the conception of nature which he can express is limited: he cannot transcend himself. The poetic possibilities of the sentimental poet are, by contrast, infinite since he continues to seek nature which he does not experience—but in that last condition lies his limitation. An overcoming of the boundaries with which the naive and sentimental poetic visions are beset is most nearly accomplished by the poetic genius. For, though he may be, by virtue of his emotions and beliefs, a sentimental poet, he is naive by virtue of his genius. He is best able to create that full vision of nature which only a simultaneous possession of naive instinct and sentimental control of form could procure.

It was Schiller's vision of the poetic genius and his definition of the "naive" which became, more than his justification of the sentimental poet, a leading concept in 19th c. thought. The poetics of German romanticism (q.v.) some aspects of Eng. romantic criticism (notably Coleridge's Lectures on Poesy and Art), Nietzsche's Apollonian-Dionysian antinomy (q.v.), Thomas Mann's thinking on the creative process, and German literary historiography to the present day are all, to a measure, indebted to this concept.—U. Gaede, Schillers Abhandlung ueber naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1899); H. Meng, Schillers Abhandlung ueber naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1936); F. Schiller, Ueber n.u.s.D., ed. W. F. Maitland (1951). W.B.F.

NARRATIVE POETRY. A n. poem is one that tells a story. The two basic types are epic and ballad. Although metrical romance is often considered as a third basic type, it is probably rightly to be thought of as a kind of epic, because it shares important recurrent themes with epic and presents them in the same narrative manner. Both epic and ballad have a long history as oral literature before they are recorded and literary forms of each emerge. The history of their literary forms is a matter of record; the origin of oral epic and of ballad is undoubtedly to be sought in the prehistoric past.

Story telling in verse form is sometimes thought to have its beginning in the chanting of myth relating to ritual. Vestiges of this earlier mythic connection of n. poetry can be seen in: (a) the very fact that the story is told in verse, not in prose; for the rhythms of verse are associated with "magic" effectiveness (not, as is often stated, because verse is easier to remember than prose!); (b) the pervasiveness of alliterative and assonantal techniques in epic, which are also associated with incantation; (c) the structure of the commonest stories, which coincides with the structure of myths; (d) the association of the singing of epic with religious festivals; and (e) the tradition that the bard is a seer.

In answer to the question of why a story should be told in verse, and in sung verse, at that (since both epic and ballad were originally sung or chanted), it is often said that the verse serves a purely mnemonic purpose; the story in verse is easier to remember than that in prose. Actually there is little or no basis for this conclusion. Studies of oral poetry that have appeared in this century and research still in progress show clearly that oral n. poetry is not memorized textually, that, indeed, its style has evolved to make a kind of "improvisation" rather than memorization possible. Moreover, the oral transmission of the tale indicates that prose can be handed on with as great ease as poetry and with almost as great, perhaps even greater, fidelity. It seems more likely that the story sung in verse had a magical purpose and was in some way connected with ritual. Such an origin would explain the pervasiveness of repetitions of sounds (alliteration and assonance) in n. as well as in all other kinds of oral poetry; for such phonetic characteristics are essential to the effectiveness of incantations. This technique later loses its overt magical function, but is preserved first as a device to aid in composition, and later as a convention.

The teller, singer, or poet would have been a kind of magician, a mediator between the other world and this world, a specially marked individual, inspired by the "muses." The listeners would be participants in the rite, sharing both individually and as a group in the benefits to be gained from the ritual myth. Such an origin would also then explain the position of the "bard" in society. It would, moreover, make reasonable the persistence of certain story patterns and details as well as provide a residual or vestigial meaning for them in later epic and ballad.

It seems probable that epic and ballad are both cognate in ritual, rather than, as has been often thought, that the one originated from the other. The ballad would represent the joining of the narrative with the dance; whereas the epic would be the joining of the narrative with incantation. In the drama one would see the survival of the three elements of ritual still in conjunction, namely, n. myth, music in its two aspects of chant and dance, and pantomime, the acting out of the myth either directly or in symbols.

There was perhaps a differentiation in performance between original epic and ballad. Epic would have been performed by an individual as priest or magician; ballad would have been performed by a dancing and singing group of devotees with a choral leader who sang the burden of the tale, while the dancing chorus came in with a refrain. Whether the myth became attached first to the incantation or first to the dance song may be a moot point, but it would seem that we should think of the myth, or n., as being joined to two already existent forms, that is, incantation and dance song, rather than of short forms becoming long or long forms being split into shorter ones.

The commonest form for epic poetry is stichic, nonstanzaic sequence of verses. N. poetry, like all poetry, was originally sung or at the very least chanted in a kind of recitative. It was usually accompanied by a musical instrument, the function of which was to maintain the rhythm of the line and of composition, although in the earliest period it may well be conjectured that the musical accompaniment was also associated with magic. There were, nevertheless, elements sometimes present that led in the direction of stanzaic form. One of these was the tendency to join lines in couplets, a natural result of syntactic parallelism on the one hand and of antiphonal singing, where it existed, on the other. The melodic patterns reflect this tendency as well, because in such couplets the real cadence comes only at the end of the second line. Since the parallelism is not only syntactic but often phonological as well, the linking of lines may go beyond the couplet. In those languages in which morphology and syntax conspire to make a series of lines ending in rhyme, there develops a convention of maintaining this rhyme as long as the singer is able. Albanian epic tradition follows this pattern. It is entirely possible that this practice is the cause of the laissez of the chansons de geste with their assonantal verse endings.

Yet it may be doubted that this tendency ever led to the development of a true stanza. The origin of the stanzaic form of the ballad must, I think, be sought elsewhere. Stanzaic form presupposes a more complex musical structure with a final melodic cadence coming after three or four lines of verse. Moreover, it may very well, as the derivation of the word "ballad" itself implies [OF ballade, a dancing song], have been associated with the dance. On the whole this form is less suited to extended n. than is the nonstanzaic. It is closer to the pantomime of ritual and to the choral ode of drama.

Once the myth is incorporated into epic and ballad, there is great possibility for exchange of subject matter from one to the other, and also, in most languages, even for exchange of some of the formulas, provided the metrics allow. Epic and ballad are then from the beginning two aspects of the same n. ritual impulse.

Probably the most significant shift in the history of n. poetry, second only to the creation of the myth itself and its joining to song, took place when the mythic and overtly magical content was transformed into stories of human beings told for no ostensible magic purpose, but to honor or remember great men. We might explain this by saying that the god of the myth becomes a divine king and the king then loses his divinity and becomes a human hero. The framework or structure of the myth remains but its meaning is reinterpreted on a human level. Conflicts with supernatural beings by supernatural beings become conflicts with supernatural beings by human heroes, and then the opponents of the heroes become the tribal and later the national enemy. This is not to argue that the hero is a "faded god," but that the hero has taken the place of the god in the story and the story has been modified to suit him, and he, in turn, acquires some of the characteristics of his predecessor. Epic is not born in a heroic age but rather in such an age it is clothed in a new garment.

It may be supposed that when divine kings, demigods, and finally mortal heroes replaced the gods of the myth, the stories too took on the aspect of human events unrolling in the real world. The secularization of epic leads to that branch known as heroic poetry. The story is told for its own sake and becomes a vehicle for moral and ethical teaching by example. The perseverance of the hero, his defense of his own prestige, his fighting for a cause, in short all those ideals that we commonly group under the concept "heroic" become of primary importance. Here stand the epic of Gilgamesh, the Iliad, the Odyssey, Roland, Beowulf, and so on. The fantastic element in these epics serves to emphasize the superior qualities of the hero.

There is a possibility that the change just outlined, from ritual myth to history with real heroes as dramatis personae, is aided by a concurrent development of n. poetry from a related yet distinctly different source. Myths of origins would be related to ritual myths but their purpose would be the gaining of power by incantation over the thing or person whose origin is told. No ritual drama is involved; the ritual is restricted to the incantation itself. The best examples of these myths of origins are to be found in Finnish epic lore. In order to gain control over an iron axe which has caused a wound, one chants the myth of the origin of iron. The singer of the myth is a magician. When the thing to be controlled is the spirit of a dead man, potentially a hostile force, his origin and deeds and perhaps also his death and vengeance may be sung. Epic has a close connection with the cult of the dead and with another poetic form, the lament (q.v.).

If the emphasis on the hero who has taken the place of the god in mythic material leads in a warlike society to what we call heroic epic, the stressing of the element of fantastic adventure and of the "love interest" leads to what is later termed "romance." These romantic and supernatural elements become the focus of the story and the tale is merely a series of strange adventures told for their own sake as entertainment. Some of the later chansons de geste, as Huon de Bordeaux, and the Gr. metrical romances, fall into this category. Both heroic elements and romance are found in the oral epic of the Yugoslavs, for example, not as separate genres sung by different singers to different audiences, but in the repertoires of all singers for all audiences.

There seem to have been four main periods when oral n. poetry was recorded: (1) ca. 2000 B.C. in Sumer, Egypt, and generally in the Middle and Near East; (2) ca. 1000-400 B.C. in Babylon, Greece, and Palestine; (3) the Middle Ages in Europe; and (4) modern times, beginning about 1750 and coming down to the present day. The best known monuments of n. poetry from the earliest period are the Creation Epic and the Epic of Gilgamesh, preserved most fully in Akkadian texts, but known also from Sumer where they were probably original. The second period of the recording of oral texts yielded the Homeric poems, Hesiod, and the Cyclic epics in Gr. and parts of the Old Testament in Hebrew. In the case of the first period we are not sure whether the texts belong to oral or written literature (although very probably the former); it is just possible that written poetry developed this early. On the other hand, we know that an authentic written tradition of n. poetry eventually emerged in Gr., following the model of the recorded oral material, but no longer part of a living oral poetry.

Our earliest truly written n. texts of any length are the n. odes of Pindar. His choral odes from the early 5th c. B.C. are n. in that they recount a myth or myths associated with the athletic victory they celebrate. Pindar's Fourth Pythian tells the story of Jason and the Argonauts and is our earliest full form of that tale. With Pindar should also be mentioned Stesichorus, Simonides of Ceos, and Bacchylides. Our earliest written epic, the Argonautica of Apollonius of Rhodes, had to await the scholarly interests of the Alexandrian period. Apollonius' poem in four books totals 5,834 lines in an age that preferred shorter poems. In fact, he quarreled bitterly with his older contemporary, Callimachus, who is reported to have said that a long book is a great evil. Callimachus (b. ca. 330 B.C.) wrote short epics, epyllia, which form a separate division of n. poetry. Two of his epyllia have echoes in Roman times; Hecale, which tells how Hecale entertains Theseus on his way to kill the bull of Marathon, is like the story told by Ovid of Philemon and Baucis; and The Lock of Berenice, which we know from Catullus' version of it (the original is lost). Callimachus also wrote a work in elegiac meter in four books entitled Aetia, a series of narratives concerning the origin of customs and of legends, in form not unlike Ovid's Metamorphoses. Theocritus, too, a younger contemporary of Callimachus, wrote epyllia, such as Helen, Hylas, The Infant Heracles, and The Dioscuri. The epyllion, with its tendency to satire and mock heroic, will continue to cross our path in later centuries.

The written literary tradition thus established in Greece continued through Roman and medieval times to our own day, now and then meeting with a native vernacular oral tradition. Eventually it cast all these into the background, triumphing over and assimilating unto itself local or tribal subjects. Thus, while there was probably a native Italic oral tradition of n. poetry in the Saturnian verse, into which Livius Andronicus translated the Odyssey in the 3d c. B.C. and in which Naevius wrote his Bellum Punicum, the first L. epic, none of these oral poems seems to have been written down or to have survived. For Ennius, the next epic writer in line after Naevius, in his Annales borrows the hexameter from the Greeks, and henceforth the "matter of Rome" is native merchandise carried in foreign bottoms.

Rome has bequeathed to us the first historical epic in Naevius' Bellum Punicum and Ennius' Annales. Virgil's Aeneid, though dealing with early Roman legend and based on the Homeric model, is filled with historical overtones and in Book 6 presents us with a brief panorama of Roman history.

Ovid's Metamorphoses in hexameters goes back to the same structural frame as Callimachus' Aetia, relating one after another, a series of tales of transformations, something like a strong of epyllia. Virgil's Aeneid and Ovid's Metamorphoses were the most lasting and influential of the n. poems of the Augustan period in Rome. The Empire boasted of Lucan (Bellum Civile), Statius (Thebais and Achilleis), Valerius Flaccus (Argonautica), and Silius Italicus (Punica). Claudian's De Raptu Proserpinae comes after some break in time (late 4th c.) and marks the close of classical L. epic. Lucan's fierce poem distorts history for partisan purposes and disdains the divine machinery of previous epic. In the Silver Age, epic preferences were divided. But the tradition ends with a return to myth in Claudian's poem.

Several centuries elapse before we find Greek epic poetry again in Quintus Smyrnaeus' Post-homerica (ca. A.D. 400), Nonnus' Dionysiaca (ca. A.D. 420), Tryphiodorus' Taking of Troy (ca. 470), Colluthus' Rape of Helen (ca. 490), and an anonymous Argonautica in a collection called Orphica (ca. 400). In the middle of the 6th c. Musaeus wrote the last of classical Greek n. poems, Hero and Leander. As striking as the long period of time, from the 3d c. B.C. to the 5th c. of our era, during which epic poetry seems to have been written in Gr. is that the poems which we have or know about are concerned with the ancient pagan myths and legends. Unlike Roman n. poetry, that of ancient Greece never turned to history for its subjects.

THE MIDDLE AGES. L. n. poetry did not die out after the classical period. The tradition of Virgil and Ovid was transformed to some extent by Christianity, or, perhaps better, accepted Christianity. The Gospel story was told in L. hexameters in Juvenius' Evangeliorum Libri (ca. 330) some sixty-five years before the poem of Claudian (ca. 395). Juvenius' poem contained more than 3,000 lines. In the first half of the 5th c. Sedulius wrote a Paschal Poem in five books. Both these poems of the Christian story became well known in the Middle Ages. At the end of the 5th c. Dracontius treated the Creation in his poem In Praise of God; and in the 6th c. Arator wrote a poem on Acts. Thus in these centuries at the dawn of the Middle Ages a Christian n. poetry came into being in the literary tradition of Virgil and in dactylic hexameters (or in other cases in elegiac couplets). These were significant moments; for the new mythology of Christianity was replacing paganism in paganism's literary forms.

We are not surprised to find hagiographic works in verse as well as in prose, although prose antedates verse in this genre. Early in the 8th c. Bede wrote lives of St. Cuthbert in both prose and verse, and the following century saw a number of such lives. Milo of St. Amand (ca. 810-71) wrote a versified life of St. Amandus in 2,000 lines, and Heiric of Auxerre did a life of St. Germanus in 3,400 lines.

Historical poems in L. verse also appeared in the Carolingian period. The Saxon Poet's verse annals of Charlemagne reach nearly 3,000 hexameters and elegiac couplets, and the monk Abbo of St. Germain wrote two books of L. epic (ca. 900) on the Norman attack on Paris in 885-86. Ermoldus Nigellus had celebrated the deeds of Louis the Pious (ca. 826) in something like 2,500 lines of elegiac couplets.

The saints' lives may be regarded as continuations of the tradition of songs about the gods as well as songs about heroes. At about this same time, in the early Middle Ages, there began to appear another vastly important branch of n. poetry, romance; and it is to be noted that, like the saint's life and chronicles or annals, the romance can be either in verse or in prose, or in both. Prose romance seems to antedate versified romance in our manuscripts. The Pseudo-Callisthenes Gr. original of the Alexander Romance seems to belong to the 2d c. of our era, and was translated into L. by Julius Valerius in the 3d c., but the verse tales are much later. The earliest apparently to be found in L. belongs to the 13th c. (1236, Alexandreis by Quilichinus of Spoleto) and the earliest vernacular poem in the West is a fragmentary Prov. octosyllabic text attributed to Albéric of Besançon of the late 11th c. The L. prose of Dictys Cretensis goes back to the 4th c. and that of Dares perhaps to around 500. But the first L. poem to come to our notice is in the 12th c. (Simon Chèvre d'Or's poem in leonine elegiacs in the middle of the century, and Joseph of Exeter's De Bello Trojano in 1187-88)—the same century in which there appeared Joannes Tzetzes' Gr. hexameter poem Iliaca, and also the first poem in the vernacular, the famous 30,000 line Roman de Troie of Benoit de Sainte-More (ca. 1184).

If we turn to a consideration of n. poetry in Byzantium, or in the Gr. East, we find a somewhat similar situation. Nonnus, who had written the Dionysiaca in ca. 420, had also produced a Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John in dactylic hexameters. Saints' lives, however, in the East seem to be almost entirely in prose. The verse autobiography of Gregory Nazianzus (ca. 329-ca. 89) appears to be sui generis, in his own day at least. Historical poems in Gr. are found beginning in the 7th c. with George Pisida, who wrote a description of the campaigns of the Emperor Heraclius against the Persians, another on further exploits of the emperor, and still another on the attack of the Avars on Constantinople in 626. There are but a few scattered poems from then until the 12th c., when the verse chronicle of Constantine Manasses was written and another Constantine, Stilbes, composed two poems on two fires in Constantinople in 1197 and 1198!

In the field of romance we do not encounter metrical tales until the 12th c. when we find fragments of the Loves of Aristander and Callithea by the chronicler Constantine Manasses. Early in the same century Prodrômus wrote a long poem on Rhodanphe and Dosicles. In the 13th c. the famous and anonymous Belthandros and Chrysantza appears.

Allegory as a literary form (not merely the rhetorical trope) seems to have appeared comparatively early in n. poetry. Examples of personification are, of course, to be found in Ovid and Virgil and other L. poets, but probably the first full dress allegory is the Psychomachia of Prudentius (A.D. 348-ca. 410), which depicts a battle of the virtues and vices. Thus allegory entered the service of morality and religion. Not only was the mythic battle of prehistory, refined by the heroic and by the historic, easily adaptable, as we have seen, but also the other basic mythic material, that of the journey, could easily be suited to Christian concepts, as had already been done in saints' lives and in apocryphal tales. The supreme example of religious allegory, Dante's Divine Comedy, is structurally a journey into the other world and a return after the gaining of knowledge. The cult of courtly love (q.v.), a kind of secular religion, led allegory captive and produced the "allegories of love" of which the Roman de la Rose, begun about 1230 by Guillaume de Lorris and completed about 1270 by Jean de Meun, is the best known instance.

Oral epic for the first time since the 8th c. B.C. began again to be written down, now in the vernaculars of the West as well as in Middle Gr. Only one poem in the latter can probably be classed as oral, the Digenis Akritas. The hero belongs to the 8th or 9th c. (or possibly the 10th), but the earliest Gr. manuscript is probably of the 14th c. Grégoire refers the formation of the epic to the 10th c. and the Rus. version of it to the 12th. In Old Sp. the Cid is said to have been composed about 1140 about a hero, Don Rodrigo Díaz, who died in 1099. Our unique manuscript of the poem is actually dated 1307. The thirty odd separate poems in the ON collection entitled the Elder Edda are thought to have been written down in the 12th c.; they are mythological and heroic in character. The Anglo-Saxon Beowulf has been assigned to the middle of the 8th c., but its only manuscript dates from about the year 1000. There are somewhere around a hundred chansons de geste. The earliest is the famed Chanson de Roland, referring to the battle of Roncevaux in 778, and earliest preserved is the Oxford manuscript of about 1170. The oldest German poem is a fragment of the Lay of Hildebrand in Old High German of ca. 800. Surely the best known of the Middle High German epics is the Nibelungenlied, which seems to belong to the early part of the 13th c.

The question as to whether these vernacular poems are oral or written is still being debated. In those cases where there are a number of varying manuscripts over a period of time there is a possibility that some are oral and some written. At any rate it seems very probable that written versions, imitating the oral vernacular songs, appear at least as early as the 14th c. and probably earlier. In German and in OF the appearance of rhyme and the rewriting of some of the stories in rhymed rather than alliterative or assonantal verse seems to indicate a new formal tradition, generally associated with writing, coming into existence.

Contemporary with the vernacular epics and the whole group they represent is another body of n. poems in the vernacular on religious subjects. Thus, in Anglo-Saxon there are poems on Genesis, Exodus, Daniel, Christ, and Andreas, all of which are assigned dates close to that of Beowulf. Some of these poems are ascribed to Caedmon, others to Cynewulf, others are of unknown authorship. In Old High German there is a Liber Evangeliorum (Book of the Gospels) by Otfrid of Weissenburg in the 9th c., and about 830, the Heliand recounts the life of Christ. In other words both religious and secular "epic" are written in vernacular (one might also say "oral") style during this period. Somewhat earlier, it will be remembered, L. was the language (except for Gr. in the East) used for the metrical religious narratives including saints' lives. When history appears in verse in the West it is in L., the language of learning.

In the case of the medieval romances, it may be that some are oral and some written, although it is generally assumed, perhaps correctly, that they are written. Besides the material on Troy and Alexander, that on Arthur and his knights is the most widespread (see MEDIEVAL ROMANCE).

In the 14th c., at the end of the Middle Ages, there appear in England, contemporary or slightly later than Dante in Italy, other n. poems that are neither epic nor romance. One of them, The Vision of Piers Plowman, is allegory, and is written in three versions in alliterative verse. Part of it was long attributed to William Langland (ca. 1332-ca. 1400). It is a kind of frame story, in the conceit of a dream. The author says that he went walking and sat down and fell asleep beside a brook, and then he dreamed a succession of things, including the Vision of the Field of Folk, Holy Church, and Lady Meed, and the Vision of the Seven Deadly Sins. Another Eng. poet to grace the 14th c. n. scene is, of course, Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1343-1400), whose Canterbury Tales is perhaps the most famous frame n. in Eng. literature. Here allegory bows to realism as the first person convention does to the proper third person of n.

Elsewhere than in England in the 14th c. n. poetry was also practiced. In Italy this is the century not only of Dante, but also of Petrarch and Boccaccio. We may think of Petrarch chiefly as a writer of sonnets, but he fancied himself also as an epic poet; his Africa, on the theme of Scipio Africanus and Roman history, is in L., it will be noted, not It. Boccaccio is known best for prose n. in the frame tradition, in his Decameron, but his metrical romance Filostrato, on the story of Troilus and Criseida, drew from the Trojan romance and influenced Chaucer in his n. of Troilus and Criseyde. He also wrote Teseida (the story of Arcita and Palemone) in ottava rima. Metrical romance was also being cultivated in Gr., as evidenced by Callimachus and Chrysorrhoe, which probably belongs to the 14th c.

THE RENAISSANCE. The great Renaissance tradition of epic poetry begins with Matteo Maria Boiardo (1441-94) and continues with Ludovico Ariosto (1474-1533) in Italy. Boiardo is famous for his Orlando Innamorato, an unfinished epic, or perhaps more properly romance, with Roland, the hero of the OF chanson, as its principal figure. Ariosto's even more famous Orlando Furioso picked up the same theme and completed Boiardo's story. The hero in both these poems is in name only the hero of the older epic; he is in them rather the hero of romance. The older kind of epic might well have died in Italy had it not been for an even greater poet of the following century, that of the "high Renaissance," namely Torquato Tasso (1544-95), who combined the more classical idea of the heroic epic, as it was known in those days from ancient models, with the romance. The result was his Gerusalemme Liberata (Jerusalem Delivered). For the heroic part of this epic, as distinguished from its romantic part, Tasso turned to the history of the first crusade, to the fairly distant past, therefore; on the other hand the two chief 16th-c. epics of the Iberian peninsula, La Araucana, by Alonso de Ercilla y Zúñiga (1533-94) in Spain, and Os Lusíadas by Luis de Camoëns (1524-80) in Portugal treated more recent history. The former deals with the conquest of South America (the Araucanians being a tribe of South American Indians in central Chile) by the Spaniards, and the latter with the voyaging to India by Vasco da Gama in 1497-99. One might say that for the first time since Virgil's day one had again a really national epic. 16th-c. France was not much given to epic, although mention should be made of Pierre de Ronsard's (1524-85) La Franciade, unfinished but published in 1572. The theme was obviously national here too, and the return to the decasyllables of early medieval times was an archaism not in keeping with a new age. All three of these epics, in France, Spain, and Portugal, were historical, national, and classical, looking backward to Virgil and to classical mythology, and not, as Tasso, toward romance. There was in France another epic poet in the 16th c., a Huguenot, Guillaume de Salluste du Bartas (1544-90), who turned, or returned, to one of the most ancient of subjects for epic, namely the creation of the world. In 1578 he published La Sepmaine, a poem very popular in its day not only in France but also in England. With his Judith (1573) he was employing a theme well liked in Renaissance painting.

With Du Bartas, indeed, we are carried in two directions; one is toward England and ultimately to Milton, the other is toward Dalmatia and to the figure of Marko Marulić (1450-1524) of Split, the "father" of Croatian literature. He was not a Protestant, but he also wrote a Juditha in his native Croatian, in 1501, which went into three editions during his lifetime (1521, 1522, 1523). Like Du Bartas, Marulić did not approve of the pagan themes and settings, and his L. epic Davidijada returns to biblical stories rather than to classical antiquity. It is worthy of note that n. poetry was flourishing also in Dalmatia during the 16th c. under the influence of the It. Renaissance. On the island of Hvar the poet Petar Hektorović wrote a n. poem telling of a fishing expedition, Ribanje i ribarsko prigovaranje (1555), partly in imitation of It. models of "fishing pastorals" (fishermen and nymphs instead of shepherds and nymphs), but completely realistic, sans nymphs. It included, however, the singing of folk songs, some of them n. ballads. A friend of Hektorović's in Dubrovnik, Mavro Vetranic (1482-1576) wrote an unfinished philosophical-allegorical epic entitled The Pilgrim, picturing man as a traveler through the three conditions of sin, repentance, and perfection. Petar Zoranić (1508-?1569) of Zadar on the Dalmatian coast wrote a pastoral romance in verse and prose entitled Planine, "The Mountains" (1536, published 1569) in which a shepherd named Zoran goes to the mountains to find herbs to cure him of love-sickness. Among other adventures he encounters a mountain spirit named Croatia, who complains of the lack of interest in the Croatian tongue. This national theme appears again in the later work of two other poets of Zadar, Brno Krnarutić (1520-72) and Juraj Baraković (1548-1628). Krnarutić's fame comes from his epic on a contemporary theme, The Capture of the City of Sziget, which fell to the Turks in 1566 after a heroic defense by Nikola Zrinski. And Juraj Baraković published in 1614 his Vila Slovinska, devoted to the past and contemporary history of Zadar. It is in the early 17th c. that Dalmatia produces her Tasso, in the person of Ivan Gundulić (1588-1638) of Dubrovnik, whose unfinished epic Osman follows Tasso's theory of the combining of the classical heroic with the romantic, with this difference, however, that Gundulić chose a theme from contemporary Balkan history, in the spirit of Christendom's crusade against the Turks with the Polish prince as its heroic champion.

Although the pastoral (q.v.) romance has its roots deep in the past with the idylls of Theocritus and Bion and their descendants (for example, in the Eclogues of Virgil) and although one can find examples in the 15th c. such as Boccaccio's Ameto, in prose and verse, it is common to date pastoral romance from the publication of J. Sannazaro's Arcadia in 1504, also a work combining verse and prose. The pastoral romance is distinguished by the fact that its protagonists are shepherds, its background and scenery are the countryside where shepherds and shepherdesses tend their flocks, and its adventures are in keeping with its protagonists in love. All is ideal and paradisiacal. The limitations of such a form are obvious and its possibilities were exhausted in England actually by the end of the 17th c. The pastoral impulse went elsewhere, into pastoral drama, lyric, and even into the novel.

Eng. n. poetry other than pastoral of the 15th and 16th c. follows patterns well established on the continent. The prolific John Lydgate's The Fall of Princes (36,000 lines), for example, is a translation of Boccaccio's De Casibus Virorum Illustrium, and his Troy Book (1412) was a translation of Guido. Hawes' Pastime of Pleasure (1509) was an allegory, a pilgrimage of the soul of the active man. In the same century Spenser's Faerie Queene indulged in the allegory of courtly love; and we have at least two historical narratives in Edward Hall's Chronicle and Samuel Daniel's (1562-1619) Civil Wars (1595). With Michael Drayton it is abundantly clear that we are in a period when forms shorter than the older epic and romance have become attractive. Once again we see appearing what we might call the Ovidian collection of epyllia, that is, Drayton's England's Heroical Epistles (1597).

And at the fairs and in the streets of London and throughout the cities of the British Isles appeared in ever greater numbers the cheap broadsides with their n. ballads. In 1520 Robin Hood was being sold at Oxford in broadsides. Our oldest copy of Chevy Chase is in a manuscript of ca. 1559. The earliest collection of broadsides comes from the first two decades of the 17th c., and the Percy Folio Manuscript of ballads and broadsides is dated about 1650. But it is to the 18th c. that one must turn for the real history of ballad collecting and publishing.

THE 17TH AND 18TH C. TO ROMANTICISM. It has already been seen that the activity in n. poetry in the 16th c. was ebullient, and it welled over into the next. The world was changing, however, in the 17th c., and as the century wore on n. poetry, with certain notable exceptions, gave place to occasional poems and especially to satire. This state of things lasted actually until after the middle of the 18th c., when romanticism brought n. poetry as such back into favor. In Italy and Germany this intermediate period was especially barren. France presents us with some interesting exceptions. We find Nicolas Boileau's Le Lutrin (lectern) a mock epic, written in 1673-83; some of the Fables of La Fontaine (1621-95) are n. poetry; but more important, two works, one in the 17th c., Fénelon's "prose poem" Télémaque (1699), which tells the tale of Odysseus' son in search of his father and his adventures, and the other in the 18th, Voltaire's Henriade (1728), a national epic on the religious wars. Actually both these works, one from ancient story and the other from recent history, are used by their authors as platforms from which to expound their educational, social, or political views. In parts they tend to be tracts, or to be mere rhetoric. It almost seems that epic, and, as we shall soon see, the short n. forms, move easily in the direction of satire. The story is amusing, or biting, or formally perfect; it has lost its lure as a story for entertainment.

At the close of the 16th c. in England we might note two links with the past. Christopher Marlowe (1564-93) wrote a poem on Hero and Leander (1593), completed and published by George Chapman in 1598. By it we are reminded of Musaeus' epyllion that marked the end of the ancient Gr. epic tradition. And Abraham Cowley (1618-67) wrote a Davideis (1656) which remained unfinished, a biblical epic in Virgilian style. This was a different task from the Davidijada of Marko Marulić mentioned above, which was a more or less direct paraphrase of the biblical story.

But the picture in the 17th c. is dominated by John Milton and his Paradise Lost (1667). Milton went back to the wellsprings of epic for his subject, to religious myth, to the creation, to the war of the gods. He thought to fashion a new hero in Adam, and thus misjudged the tradition of the heroic. Yet his magnificent poem stands as perhaps the last great epic in Western literature. There are examples of the genre later, but they are either tours de force or weak in their concept of the hero, as in the Victorian epic.

When the other great poets of these centuries, whose chief fields were either drama or satire, turned to n., it was to translation rather than to original creation, yet their translations became classics. Such are the renderings by John Dryden of Ovid, Virgil, Chaucer, and Boccaccio; that of the Homeric poems by Alexander Pope (1688-1744) and by William Cowper (1731-1800). The best of all translations of Homer, however, in this early period was that of George Chapman (1559-1634).

ROMANTICISM. A new interest in n. poetry began to grow from about the middle of the 18th c., no longer a neoclassical movement (which seemed pretty well exhausted), but a movement in the direction of the songs of the common people. This was, of course, in keeping with the times. The opening gun of this new interest in n. might be said to be the publication in 1765 by Thomas Percy of his Reliques of Ancient Eng. Poetry. In this the term "Ballad" was limited to those songs which described action, and the term "Song" was used for those which expressed a sentiment. Actually the publication of Percy's book was preceded by a few years by the "hoaxes" of James Macpherson (1736-96), Fragments of Ancient Poetry collected in the Highlands of Scotland (1760), Fingal, an Ancient Epic Poem in Six Books, together with Several Other Poems composed by Ossian, the Son of Fingal, translated from the Gaelic Language (1761), Temora (1763) and The Works of Ossian (1765).

From the point of view of n. poetry and aside from the question of the value of their content, these two books or groups of books exerted influence in three important directions. First, they encouraged through the work of men like Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744-1803) and the brothers Grimm, Jakob and Wilhelm, the collecting and studying of folk ballads and folk epic song throughout Europe. Secondly, they led to the unearthing, publication, and scholarly investigation of medieval manuscripts of epic which were revived during the 19th c. Thirdly, they inspired written ballads in a literary tradition. To these three influences it might be added that they played no small role in the beginning of the romantic movement in general with its theories about the origins, transmission, and composition of poetry, with its new view of the world and of the past, and the revival of some of the themes of epic from antiquity retold in the romantic spirit.

Of the first of these something has been said in the article on oral poetry. Of the second there has been some treatment both in that article and in this. It is of the third that we must speak further here.

Burns and Scott would seem to be the best examples of the impact of the ballad on written n. poetry. They both knew the popular form from an early age. Robert Burns (1759-96) is more given to lyric, but in such poems as Tam o'Shanter he exhibited his skill with the ballad spirit. N. was more serious a matter for Sir Walter Scott (1771-1834), whose Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802-03), a collection of the ballads of Scotland, prepared him well for his own The Lay of the Last Minstrel, Marmion, and The Lady of the Lake.

Scott's instinct for story, a true n. instinct, expressed itself more genuinely perhaps in his novels, the real successors of epic. Scott is a more veritable follower of the n. genius in Western literature than many another, for the story interests him above all.

And this is the fate of n. poetry after 1750. William Wordsworth (1770-1850) turns to the common folk and tells stories of local events, as in Goody Blake and Harry Gill, but it is a self-conscious attempt. Michael is more sentimental than the popular ballads, although it has something of their spirit in that the kind of change that comes over Luke in the evil cities of men is not untypical. In Laodamia Wordsworth is consciously telling a tale from the past, a tale that touches the heart of epic mythic origins, and one that he retells with perfection. It is not his fault but that of the moment of intellectual history that the perfection of the poet in his craft is more significant than the story of Laodamia. We might, I suppose, call The Prelude n., but the first person in ballad is pure convention, and to concentrate upon it as the real subject of the tale is contrary to the objectivity of traditional story poetry. True, there are famous examples in epic where a character, as, for example, Odysseus in the Odyssey, tells a long tale in the first person, but Odysseus is not Homer. In Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834), whose The Rime of the Ancient Mariner is surely one of the best known n. poems of this period, together with his unfinished, and somewhat less known Christabel, we find an artistic sense of and feeling for the ballad situation and an uncanny ability effectively to present weird tales. The ballad manner and the traditional phrasing are lacking, of course, and the intensity of the poet lends an air of its own. The style here, too, and the poet are what count rather than the story.

And what should we say of George Gordon, Lord Byron (1788-1824) and n. poetry? He is closest to story telling in his oriental tales, in The Giaour, for example. Here is story telling for its own pleasure. Beppo is good n. but also an excellent illustration of the use of n. for satire. The Romans were past masters of this genre. In Don Juan the story is but a vehicle for all the views of the poet. And Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, while ironically enough it takes us back to the tale of a journey, so basic to n. myth, is only veiled autobiography. Perhaps it is truly n. only in its digressions. John Keats (1795-1821) is objective enough to be a master of n., and some might say that his perfection of style serves the n. rather than that the n. serves the style. This certainly seems true for The Eve of Saint Agnes and for Lamia. Whether he could have sustained this balance to complete the longer epic is doubtful perhaps, to judge from the fate of Hyperion.

FROM THE VICTORIAN AGE TO THE PRESENT. N. poetry comes more into its own in the Victorian Age, when writers had greater interest in the story and less in form. It should be sufficient to name the more famous poets and their equally famous works. Alfred, Lord Tennyson's (1809-92) Idylls of the King takes us back to the romances of chivalry, and, indeed, it is a revival of old subjects that faces us. Thomas Babington, Lord Macaulay (1800-59) in his Lays of Ancient Rome went even further back than Tennyson, to early Roman times. Matthew Arnold (1822-88) follows fashion in his interest in oriental tales, and his Sohrab and Rustum drew from ancient Persian history and epic, which lies a bit uneasy in its 19th-c. sentimental cradle. And, finally, William Morris (1834-96) reminds one of Scott in the earlier part of the century; he too had a real instinct for n. and a sense of story telling of the past, as can be seen from his saga translations, for example. His Jason is probably our last telling of the tale of the Argonauts. The Earthly Paradise not only returns us to Gr. myth in some of its tales and emphasizes as well the mythic tales of the Scandinavians, but also takes us back to the frame story. And the story for the frame is an ancient mythic one of wanderings. We have thus returned to the beginning of our account. The date was 1866-70, nearly a hundred years ago.

There has been some n. since then, of course, but our own age has felt that the genius of poetry was lyric, or fashionably dramatic. It has scorned n. poetry in general and sought its stories for entertainment, instruction, or artistic edification in the novel. When poetry is thought of as form and ecstasy, then n. poetry is an anomaly. Rudyard Kipling's (1865-1936) ballads took the fancy of a generation, John Masefield (b. 1878) had a real talent for n., and many will remember his The Everlasting Mercy (1911) and The Widow in the Bye Street (1912). Stephen Vincent Benet's (1898-1943) John Brown's Body (1928) is an interesting almost-epic experiment in n.

Ten years later (1938) in Greece and in Gr. there was published the n. poem that ends our own tale, The Odyssey, a Modern Sequel, by Nikos Kazantzakis; the translation into Eng. of this poem, which narrates the further wanderings and adventures of Odysseus, appeared in 1958.

W. P. Ker, Epic and Romance (2d ed., 1908) and Form and Style in Poetry (1928); G. H. Gerould, The Ballad of Tradition (1932); Chadwick; Lewis; W. J. Entwistle, European Balladry (1939); D. Bush, Eng. Lit. in the Earlier 17th C., 1600-1660 (1945; 2d ed., 1962); E. K. Chambers, Eng. Lit. at the Close of the Middle Ages (1945; especially chap. 3, "Popular N. Poetry and the Ballad"); C. M. Bowra, From Virgil to Milton (1948) and Heroic Poetry (1952); E.M.W. Tillyard, The Eng. Epic and Its Background (1954); R. Poggioli, "The Oaten Flute," Harvard Library Bulletin, 11 (1957); K. Kroeber, Romantic N. Art (1961).

A.B.L.

For further consideration of the epic in the various literatures, see the articles on ASSYRO-BABYLONIAN POETRY, ENG., FINNISH, GR., INDIAN, L., OLD NORSE, etc. Consult also EPIC THEORY, ORAL POETRY, CHANSONS DE GESTE, and refer to such bibliographic titles as: E. W. Hopkins, The Great Epic of India (1901; the Mahābhārata; also some discussion of the Rāmāyana); L. Abercrombie, The Epic (1914); R. Heinze, Virgils epische Technik (3d ed., 1915); H. V. Routh, God, Man, and Epic Poetry (2 v., 1927); W. W. Lawrence, Beowulf and Epic Tradition (1928); J. M. Parry, L'Épithète traditionnelle dans Homère (1928) and "Traditional Metaphor in Homer," CP, 28 (1933); C. M. Bowra, Tradition and Design in the Iliad (1930); R. Menéndez Pidal, Historia y epopeya (1934) and La epopeya castellana a través de la literatura española (1945); C. S. Lewis, A Preface to Paradise Lost (1942); E. Mudrak, Die nordische Heldensage (1943); D. Knight, Pope and the Heroic Tradition (1951); U. Leo, Torquato Tasso (1951); Auerbach; Curtius; G. R. Levy, The Sword from the Rock (1953); A. Heusler, Nibelungensage und Nibelungenlied (5th ed., 1955); C. Whitman, Homer and the Homeric Tradition (1958); R. W. Chambers, Beowulf: An Introd. (3d ed., 1959); A. B. Lord, The Singer of Tales (1961); G. S. Kirk, The Songs of Homer (1962); T. M. Greene, The Descent from Heaven: A Study in Epic Continuity (1963).

NATURALISM. In applying this much-maligned term to poetry, we must beware of following Georg Brandes (Naturalism in 19th C. Eng. Literature) and Stopford Brooks (Naturalism in Eng. Poetry), who use it much in the same sense in which we use the word "romanticism." Unlike realism, which is the artistic expression of an attitude toward reality common to numerous individuals in many different ages, n. is the aesthetic correlate of a philosophical doctrine that has its place in 19th-c. history. It is a movement, and not merely a way of looking at things. Based on a stringent disbelief in teleological explanations, philosophical n. considers natural causes to be responsible for all movements of mind and matter (determinism). In art, this materialistic attitude finds its most poignant expression in the works of Émile Zola, whose Le Roman Experimental (1880)—which is based on Claude Bernard's Introduction à l'Étude de la Médecine Experimentale of 1865—forms the keystone of naturalistic aesthetics. In this treatise, Zola urges the writer to imitate the scientist by observing reality (the how) without inquiring into its ultimate causes (the why). He charges him with establishing an inner and outer milieu, into which the characters, whose behavior he wants to observe, are to be placed. Underlying this experimental method, we recognize a humanitarian desire to change the existing social conditions; hence the close relation between n. and socialism.

Ample space being required for the environmental experiment, the naturalists preferred the dramatic and novelistic genres to that of lyric poetry. Nevertheless, Émile Zola attempted to formulate a naturalistic theory of poetry when he reviewed the Fr. poetry of his own century in an essay entitled "Les Poètes Contemporains" (1878). In François Coppée and Sully Prudhomme he thought to have discovered the forerunners of a school of poetry capable of creating that langue nouvelle which was to be the true expression of the scientific age. No such development took place, however, since none of Zola's contemporaries dared to cast aside all poetic conventions, as the master had demanded.

It was only in its application to German literature of the 1880's that the term "n." was used to designate a specific school of poetry. In his preface to the anthology Dichtercharaktere (1884), Karl Henckell defined the new poetry as "a characteristically embodied image of all the suffering, longing, striving and struggling of our time." Only gradually, German naturalistic poetry succeeded in ridding itself of the humanitarian and nationalistic pathos which marks its early stages. This emancipation was completed by Arno Holz who, apart from Richard Dehmel, is the only genuine poet among the German naturalists. In Die Kunst, ihr Wesen und ihre Gesetze (1890), he argued that the greater a work of art the greater its tendency "wieder Natur zu sein" (to turn back into nature). In order to facilitate this process of retransformation, Holz introduced the Sekundenstil (a photographically minute reproduction of each phase in a given development). While the Sekundenstil technique remains more or less restricted to prose, poetry was to achieve a similar purpose by a voluntary renunciation of such formal devices (rhyme, stanzaic pattern, set meter) as stand in the way of an accurate transcription of reality. In advocating a form that was to be the direct expression of subject matter, Holz developed what he called a consistent naturalism in poetry. Formally described in Revolution der Lyrik (1899), the new style was put to the test in Phantasia, a collection of verse which contains N.'s maturest poetry. In its preoccupation with mood, however, Phantasia clearly foreshadows the end of n., a development which Hermann Bahr had foreseen as early as 1891. And already at the turn of the century, the predominant style was to be that of impressionism (q.v.).—N. M. Thompson, "Arno Holz and the Origins of the New Poetry," Washington Univ. Studies, 8 (1920); F. Doucet, L'Esthétique de Zola et son application à la critique (1923); H. Röhl, Der deutsche Naturalismus (1927); R. Leppla, "Naturalismus" in Reallexikon, 11; R. König, Die naturalistische Aesthetik (1931); K. Turley, Arno Holz (1935); M. Cowley, "Not Men—A Natural History of Am. N.," KR, 9 (1941; deals mostly with fiction); R. Hamann and J. Hermand, Naturalismus (1959); Literarische Manifeste des Naturalismus 1880–1892, ed. E. Rupprecht (1962). U.W.

NATURE. To deal with n. in poetry is, in some sense, to deal with nearly the whole task of poetry. For poetry is, to paraphrase John Dryden, the "image of nature." All theories of poetry have made some allowance for both terms ("image"—a thing in itself, a construct; "nature"—what the poem imitates or speaks about), however much a given theory may stress some peculiar aspect of the many interconnections. Hence, n., both as subject and as involved in poetic theory, is central in poetry.

It is symptomatic of our times, semanticism being in some measure a product of the Cartesian division and romantic doubts about n., that "nature" is so often thought of by modern writers as primarily an ambiguous word. But the situation is not quite so desperate as might appear from the articles of Lovejoy and Wilson ("Nature as Aesthetic Norm," Essays in the History of Ideas, 1948; and "Some Meanings of 'Nature' in Renaissance Literary Theory," JHI, 2 (1941), respectively). For the galaxy of meanings there adduced do have a center—reality, manifested in this way or that—and the crucial differences in meaning are more ontological than semantic.

Man has puzzled much about his relation to n. throughout the history of thought. People have felt that man is in, but not of, n.; or of, but not quite in, n.; or, in any case, that he is a very special part of n. (astronomically speaking, man is the astronomer). And from the earlier semireligious, semimaterialistic speculations about the n. of things, literature and men's views about n. have been mutually though not exclusively causative, and considerably complicated.

NATURE IN POETRY. In Homer, n., though mythic and under the sway of supernatural beings, is a large, solid, brilliantly lighted world of objects, and every episode is presented in detail, forcibly, with precision (Erich Auerbach, Mimesis, pp. 1-20). Life and n. are accepted, and presented, in their own right. In the Old Testament, n. is rigorously subordinated to God, and details are given, never for their own sake, but for the sake of religious truth. They may be simple exterior parts of the story briefly, sometimes naively, put forward (the bear and the children, the direct account of events in Kings and Chronicles, important because Jewish history is uniquely sealed by God), or they may have supernaturally illumined potency (the burning bush, the deep where the fish takes Jonah), or may be poetically magnificent responses to God and created beauty (the Psalms, the Song of Solomon). In Job, a n. apparently indifferent to man's moral purposes is explored with agonizing brilliance, the resolution remaining in the inscrutable will of the Deity.

In Gr. thought and literature, n. becomes many things: god-haunted, a goddess herself, a demiurge, a Heraclitean flux, an unreal world of appearances, an unceasing and godless play of atoms. She usually, however, keeps a more substantial independence (even when conceived as unreal) than in Jewish ontology, because the Jews, unlike the Greeks, think of n. as created. God is supreme reality and fact. Heraclitus, whose philosophical fragments are great poetry, sees the world as change, and transformation, and flux (though he apparently also accepts a divine order behind the flux), and the idea of n. as flux has influenced poets from the Ovid of the Metamorphoses through Gerard Manley Hopkins and T. S. Eliot in the Four Quartets. In Sophocles' Oedipus, as in other plays and poems, man and n. are joint heirs of weal and of woe; the plague, caused by Oedipus' wicked deeds, falls on land and people alike: n. is subject to the (partially unknowable) moral order.

Parmenides and Plato, in their different ways, found the world to be delusive (how much their conclusions come from the technical arguments regarding motion and concepts respectively, and how much from religious insight must remain an open question). Platonic scholars and literary critics still disagree whether Plato finally rejects poetry and poets, but it is clear enough that he does reject most poetry from the ideal kingdom, as appertaining to the lesser world. But the idea of n. as appearances, with its subsidiary idea of the ladder of reality, is among the most telling ideas in history, in poetry and criticism as in religion and ethics. It comes through Plotinus and the Neoplatonists and Christian theology, and is a Renaissance commonplace, however powerful the contrary impulse to accept, explore, and control a thoroughly real natural world. It informs Sidney's great sonnet, "Leave me, O love, that reachest but to dust," and Spenser's four Hymns, and reappears, in moods and with differences, in Wordsworth's Peele Castle ("the light that never was on sea or land") and Shelley's Hymn to Intellectual Beauty, however far some of these manifestations may be from Plato or Socrates or Parmenides.

But n. is not only the world-view which a poet assumes or wrestles with: it was, and is, place—the rocks, streams, hills that men can admire, live among, or fancifully rearrange. In the pastorals of Theocritus and Virgil, a gentle, special world is selected from n. to serve as a counterpoise of spirit for man's hectic life in courts and cities and to serve the perpetually recurring theme of (and need for) innocence and freshness. But the genre is no simple one, and it grows: it includes elegy, disguised autobiography, battles of wit, half-mocking or tender praises of love; it can deepen to allegory, drama, passion, and prophecy. A somewhat parallel and, later, overlapping tradition is found in the shepherds' plays of the Middle Ages. The tradition is rediscovered in the Renaissance and developed by such writers as Politian, Mantuan, Sannazaro, the Pléiade, Tasso, Guarini, and Spenser. It takes various forms: (1) the pastoral novel of Sidney, Honoré d'Urfé, and others; (2) the pastoral play or masque (Fletcher and Jonson, as well as the Shakespeare of As You Like It and scenes from The Winter's Tale and The Tempest); (3) the more common pastoral eclogues. The tradition culminates, but does not end, in Lycidas. In pastoral, n. is refined, humanized, decorated, elaborated, simplified, yet this recreated n. can have, as in Virgil and Milton, a deeply natural and quickening power of its own. "Pathetic fallacy" and "decoration" alike are far too crude to describe the dense reality and interplay between man, n., and God in Lycidas.

The Georgics of Virgil (which are founded largely on the poems of Hesiod) show n. in a special view. In one sense a technical manual of agriculture, they nonetheless show forth a deeply humanized n., impregnated by civilization, by man's rational and earnest cultivation, that in turn gives to man rootedness and stability and pious accord with the past. In the Aeneid, n. keeps the qualities of the Georgics, but deepened, made more dignified and pious, stately. The epic simile presumes man's separation from the natural world, the orderliness of n., and dignifies man and natural world alike.

N. can be for the Greeks and Romans a goddess, and remains so for centuries, at least in literature. Even Lucretius, whose materialism is stubborn and basic, hymns Venus, the creative power of n., in verse that becomes religious in quality, and achieves a poetic naturalism whose closest modern parallel is perhaps some of the philosophic prose of George Santayana. "Natura" (or "Physis") as a generative and intervening goddess, appears in poetry from Ovid's Metamorphoses, through Claudian and the Orphic hymns of the 3d and 4th c., down through such medieval writers as Bernard Silvestris of Tours (De universate mundi, 1145-53) and Alan of Lille (De planctu naturae, and Anticlaudianus de Antirufino, 1182 or 1183). In the process of partially Christianizing the pagan goddess, there derives a new poetic genre, the philosophical-theological epic, in which the Christian view of the world provides the end and frame for the story, but various pagan or semipagan deities and demigods are the actors. This tradition worked against obstacles, in part because of the multiple Christian attitudes toward n.: n. is created, hence good; n. is fallen, hence evil, especially so as involved in sensuality (here Manichean and Platonic pressures are felt). As innocent or as redeemed, n. can be lovely and holy. In the Middle Ages (and of course the Middle Ages are not entirely Christian), various Christian attitudes to n. appear, especially in the complex tradition of courtly love (C. S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love; Denis de Rougemont, Love in the Western World; M. C. D'Arcy, The Mind and Heart of Love). In the two parts of the 14th-c. Romance of the Rose there are two "natures," both quite medieval, incorrigibly different. In the first part, by Guillaume de Lorris, n. is gardenlike and delicate of bloom; in Jean de Meun's second part n. means rank and sprawling sensuality.

The n. in the literature of the semi-Christian and courtly world of the Middle Ages is different in kind and emphasis from the n. found in poems of the semi-Christian and courtly world of Old Eng. In the latter, the most successful natural descriptions, in poems like Beowulf, The Wanderer, and The Seafarer, are of the bleak and great and spare: the bitter sea of exile, the fens and fastnesses where demons walk, a great and lonely funeral pyre. But in the medieval Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, n. is magnificent, various, and brilliantly colored, even when expressive of grim fears; and in the Pearl, as in many medieval carols and lyrics, the loveliness of the landscape is dipped in supernatural hues. N. is selective, holy. Chaucer is a master of natural description, n. in many moods and features: symbolically black rocks, the delicacy of Love's gardens (a delicacy paralleled in Fr. n. poets: Deschamps, Machaut, Froissart), the natural and vigorous earth the pilgrims travel over, the invented and phantasmagoric landscape (or airscape) of The House of Fame, and the world of many spheres rising toward God (the Knight's Tale; Troilus and Criseyde). He learned much, borrowed much, and transformed much from Dante, who, though his greatest poem is almost entirely set in supernatural, has perhaps the most exact eye for physical detail of any poet. Light in the Paradiso becomes the most eloquent of all literary symbols (for mind is there illumined by the supernatural); yet he uses similes with a businesslike attention to the point of the resemblance that presumes the genuine importance of the intellect in its own capacity and the Thomistic reliance on the senses, the plainly visible.

The great poets of the Eng. Renaissance—Shakespeare, Spenser, Milton—share some fruitful, if tangled, assumptions about n.: that n. is created, hierarchical, symbolic, full of personal-social-physical-theological correspondences, struck with sin, powerfully threatened, and these assumptions appear whether they write of real or imaginary or metaphysical fields (Agincourt or the Bower of Acrasia or the Garden of Eden). One of their great motifs is the overthrow of n., physical n. being stubbornly involved in the moral world; and the supreme correspondences of man and nature are expressed in King Lear.

The medieval tradition of meditation on the features of the world (as image of God's glory, or symbols of temporal vanity, or to express the coinherence of the church and the mystical life) is kept alive in the devotional poetry of Southwell, Donne, Herbert, Vaughan, Crashaw and (in fragments such as the beginning of Religio Laici) in Dryden. In general, Dryden keeps the theory of a symbolical and hierarchical world, but relaxes the practice, except in moments and in the semi-Miltonic Absalom and Achitophel. For Pope, the more traditional view has faded. N. exists to serve philosophical argument, for primitivistic sentimentalizing, for faint pastoral or fainter Christian pastoral, but he speaks with power and pungently naturalistic detail when he deals with bugs, worms, toads, chicks in satiric attack or when he sees, in the bitterness and magnitude of the Dunciad's close, the wreck of a former world. In Voltaire, n. exists almost exclusively for argument (even Candide's garden to be cultivated is as much an example as an exception), to "prove" the existence of the deistic God by its noble and orderly design or to "disprove" Christian providence by its cataclysmic and meaningless evils.

Shaftesburian and Rousseauistic optimistic benevolism and antirational associationism (n. conceived as innately good and sponsoring social as well as sentimental feeling) rules much of the 18th and to some degree the 19th c., even though Miltonic diction for describing a well imagined literary nature has its influence too, and the long standing epideictic tradition (poetry as praise of God through praise of the natural creation) shows attractively in Thomson's The Seasons, magnificently in Smart's A Song for David, and deistically and thinly in Addison's Hymn. Gray and Collins and Blake achieve some unique and beautiful effects of natural description.

The theory of "general nature," as expressed by Rapin and Boileau and vividly by Johnson when he advises against numbering the streaks of the tulip, is never completely obeyed by its proponents, but Blake condemns the idea ("To Generalize is to be an Idiot"—itself a generalization!) and seeks knowledge inhering in and through particular images of the poetic vision, achieving thereby some very profound and some densely obscure images. Wordsworth has some excellent passages of particular description, but his landscapes are more apt to be generalized, important for their effect on the soul or their correlate philosophical and religious meaning. His poetic theory insists more on the general than the particular. In Goethe, n. shows range, but not a return to the Renaissance. Whether serving as a mirror for the sorrows of a young poet, or as the ground for man's reclamation in the second part of Faust, it is essentially passive and, by romantic projection and by engineering, bears man's stamp.

Wordsworth and Coleridge, however much they differ in specific poetic ideas, are very seriously puzzled about n. Earlier poets widely believed in, or simply assumed, spiritual power in or behind n.; they frequently gave n. human qualities without embarrassment (they had rhetorical terms, prosopopoeia or personification, for such devices). Coleridge, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats were at once more passionate and more uncertain about physical n. The term "pathetic fallacy" is, significantly, a 19th-c. invention. The question of projection vs. perception was perhaps the most agonizing that these poets dealt with, and they strongly feared the negative conclusion (that men merely read meaning into a deterministic and meaningless world). All of them have, like the Victorians after them, their moments of great doubt. They also have their great moments of vision. Wordsworth perhaps came off best in the struggle, largely by strength of character and a certain instinctive distrust of philosophical speculation. In the latter part of the century, the problem was intensified by the Darwinian concept of n. as blindly evolving, "red in tooth and claw."

In the Fr. poetry of the 19th c., this reduced view of n. appears in at least three different ways: the praise of n. as admirably alien from man; the re-creation of a "Parnassian" n. from refined natural elements; the belated, personal, and desperate attempt of the symbolists to achieve medieval views of analogy by a desperate leap of the "angelical imagination" (a phrase Tate uses in speaking of Poe, the hero of the symbolists). The first and second ways combine beautifully in such a poem as de Lisle's Les Eléphants, the second and third ways magnificently in the poems of Baudelaire with their queer mixture of romantic charlatanism and a revived and deadly sense of sin (inherited in some part from the meditative and powerful Jansenism of Racine). And in passages of such poems as De Vigny's La Maison du Berger or La Mort du Loup (as in Tennyson's In Memoriam), there is a rediscovery of the meditative tradition, only drawing strength and profundity from doubt rather than faith, "questioning all with inquietude" (as De Vigny says in another context).

The typical n. of 20th-c. poetry is that of Eliot's The Waste Land and Crane's The Bridge, where the natural—and human—world is conceived of as shattered, fragmentary, painful. Eliot's poem attempts to express this confusion: Crane's does express the confusion in the very failure of his attempt to unify American experience (but achieves much coherence within the partially broken frame). Stevens broods freshly the projection-perception puzzle, with faint hope, ironic irresolution, loud and deliberately literary creations of an elegant or amusing n., or with the starkest vision of a world devoid of meaning except for the motion of naked particularity. In Valéry, n. is presented with an almost pitiless brilliance of detail and a highly subtle ambivalence of feeling and belief. Auden handles natural imagery imitatively (i.e., of the n. of OE poetry) or with journalistic aplomb or so as to express the oddness of particularity. Less commonly and more seriously, he offers redemptive glimpses of supernature through n. or celebrates n. lyrically. Yeats in a curious way bridges the chasm: his natural imagery is magical, hieroglyphic, wavers; or it is solid and Ir.: it can serve for savage espousal of the harshest naturalism or for images that beget images of supernature. R. P. Warren is bold with the pathetic fallacy and attains a genuine nightmarish intensity at times, at rare times a beauty of light and color, but he seems to feel the fallacy as fallacy and commits it stridently. In much minor poetry, n. is interior, contrivedly Freudian, uglily symptomatic, or academically tentative. In some of the best free verse (for instance, in much of H. D.'s and W. C. Williams'), the very line shape expresses the fragmentation of n., but seen with a fresh, loving, and particular eye. Some poets, such as St.-John Perse and Dylan Thomas in some moods attempt in the Whitman tradition to make n. paradise by dithyrambic lyricism, and by harmonizing conscious and unconscious meanings of natural symbols. Allen Tate in Ode to the Confederate Dead presents in great bitterness an alien and deadly n. which undoes man's best hopes and visions. In his later poem The Swimmers (actually one section of a long uncompleted poem) he approaches older views of n. (and the work of such modern, traditional poets as Edwin Muir and Robert Bridges). N. in that poem serves him for symbols of moral and psychological depth, but is also the place where the action occurs and has the wholeness and resonance of places of boyhood remembered and, though distinct from man, is, like man, under the aegis, the brooding presence of the moral law. Two younger distinguished poets, Robert Lowell and Anne Sexton, present n. brilliantly, almost solipsistically, yet focusing moral and religious as well as personal problems.

NATURE IN CRITICISM. Critical theory, from Plato on, has almost always centered in ideas of n. Platonic theories of the world and the "image" have influenced criticism as well as poetry, despite Plato's (at least partial) rejection of poetry as an imitation of the world of appearances and as baneful in moral influence. Modern "Platonic" theories (those of the Abbé Bremond, Wallace Fowlie, to some degree those of Maritain) conceive of art as imitating or somehow partaking of, at least by analogy, the transcendent world, a privilege reserved in Plato for the trained and morally good philosopher. The doctrine in Ion of the poet as inspired seems to be ironic, but it has extended a major influence, not ironic.

The central theory of criticism has been, however, the Aristotelian, whose primary concept is poetry as the imitation of n. In this theory n. enters into both terms, since the imitation is not only of n. (man's n. primarily), but is natural (according to nature), since it is natural for men to delight in imitation and to respond with moral sympathy to the joys and terrors of men not too unlike themselves. As developed by the rhetoricians Cicero and Quintilian, who insist on the propriety of the three styles, high, middle, and low, to various subject matter, and reinterpreted by Renaissance critics (who yoke, with some violence, Horace's Art of Poetry to Aristotle's Poetics), the theory has been the Western critical tradition, and its major concepts—imitation and propriety—though rejected in most modern theory, are still unavoidably used in most criticism.

In this theory, "n." means the subject of imitation; the foundation of accords between emotion, idea, and subject; and the poet's in-born talent ("n." as opposed to "art," "art" meaning the cultivation of one's powers by judgment and practice). The consistency and intelligibility of n. is the ground for the "rules." The theory of the rules is often misunderstood, however sensibly they were or were not applied. Dryden puts the case clearly: there is only one primary rule, as certain as reason itself—that good poetry should be in accordance with n., both as an imitation (that is, poems should have verisimilitude) and as something made (poems should be in accord with the moral and aesthetic law and permanent human n.—else they cannot long please). All other rules are secondary and uncertain, and therefore judgment, tradition, mediation, and good sense are permanent essentials of criticism, which is not an exact science.

In the last two centuries, the ideals of imitation and propriety have been widely replaced by the Coleridgean ideals of imagination and organic form (which Coleridge derived from such Germans as Herder and Schelling). In this view, poetry is like n. rather than an image of it or proper to it. Poems and physical n. are, according to Coleridge, created by different but analogous acts of human imagination. But the newer theory sometimes conceals the old. The notion of literature as a proper imitation of nature is a hardy plant, and critics nowadays (sometimes in the teeth of their theories) let us know what poetry does or should represent: the organic biological essence of life (Susanne Langer); the harmonizing of emotions (the earlier I. A. Richards); God by analogy and intuition (Wallace Fowlie); the poet's soul (many); the mobile flow of free personality (Herbert Read); Jungian archetypes (Elizabeth Drew); the "tough" ambiguous uncertainty of life (Cleanth Brooks); the particulars in which reside all truth (W. C. Williams and Ezra Pound). In some versions of the notion of organic form (e.g., Herbert Read's), organic form is the chief good because it better fits (is more proper to) the idea of natural evolution than are older theories. Or it is sometimes argued, in flamboyant self-contradiction, that a dynamic, nonmimetic theory is proper to the modern notion of a purposeless n., since value must come from within the human mind rather than from n. Croce's theory of expression is based, explicitly, on the idea of a coherent and permanent human n., and the looser forms of expressionism tacitly or explicitly assume that poetry should imitate, be like, the chaotic and meaningless flux that is reality (n.).

C. V. Deane, Aspects of 18th C. N. Poetry (1935); L. Welch, Imagination and Human N. (1935); J. W. Beach, The Concept of N. in 19th-C Poetry (1936); M. J. Adler, Art and Prudence (1937); H. McCarron, S.J., Realization: a Philos. of Poetry (1937); K. E. Gilbert and H. Kuhn, A Hist. of Aesthetics (1939); T. Spencer, Shakespeare and the N. of Man (1942)

NAVAHO POETRY.

H. Trowbridge, "The Place of Rules in Dryden's Criticism," MP, 44 (1946); W. V. O'Connor, "N. and the Anti-Poetic in Modern Poetry," JAAC, 5 (1946); H. Read, Form in Modern Poetry (1948); N. MacLean, "From Action to Image," in Crane, Critics; Curtius; L. L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954); Wellek; R. Tuve, Images and Themes in Five Poems by Milton (1957); R. Langbaum, "The New N. Poetry," A Sch., 28 (1959); C. S. Lewis, Studies in Words (1960); P. Van Tieghem, Le Sentiment de la n. dans le prérromantisme européen (1960); D. B. Wilson, Ronsard, Poet of Nature (1961); P. Ramsey, The Lively and the Just (1962). P.R.

NAVAHO POETRY. See AMERICAN INDIAN POETRY. NORTH AMERICA.

NEAR RHYME. The repetition in accented syllables of the final consonant-sound without correspondence of the preceding vowel- or consonant-sounds, and either with or without "feminine" unaccented syllables following (which should be largely identical). E.g., grope-cup, maze-coze, drunkard-conquered. It is a special case of CONSONANCE (q.v.), and is called by such various names as slant rhyme, half rhyme (also applied to rich consonance), oblique rhyme, para-rhyme. An old device in Icelandic, Ir., and Welsh verse, n.r. appears to have been deliberately used in Eng. first by Vaughan, who was influenced by Welsh practice. Both internally and at line ends such inexact echoes can be found occasionally in all poetry, especially in ballad, folk, and popular song. Swift rhymed "justice" with "hostess," Emily Dickinson "port" with "chart," Osbert Sitwell "war" with "armchair" (which last have no true echo in Standard British Eng.). But no major poet in Eng. had used n.r. consistently until Hopkins and Yeats. Hopkins knew George P. March's work in Icelandic and himself studied the Welsh. Yeats, although not a student of Ir., knew of Ir. metrics through Kuno Meyer and others. Once considered an oddity in the work of such poets as Emerson and Emily Dickinson, n.r. is now accepted and used by nearly all 20th-c. poets, not to supplant perfect rhyme but to supplement it, so as to provide a greater range and freedom for the poet. The Am. poet Trumbull Stickney uses n.r. systematically intertwined with regular rhyme in Mnemosyne. For examples of n.r. in modern poetry, see Hopkins, Yeats, Ransom, Eliot, Owen, Tate, Wylie, and Auden.—G. P. March, Lectures on the Eng. Language (1859; anticipates modern borrowing and experimentation); K. Meyer, A Primer of Ir. Metrics (1909); E. Rickert, New Methods for the Study of Lit. (1927); T. W. Herbert, "Near-Rimes and Paraphones," SR, 14 (1937); G. Symes, "A Note on Rhyme," Eng., 7 (1949).

S.L.M.; U.K.G.

NEGRO POETRY. AFRICAN.† Traditional Afr. Negro poetry cannot be labeled as poetry in the strict sense of the term, and therefore is often called rhythmic prose. This terminology originates in the fact that the people of Africa themselves designated poetry as "chant," much as the Greek and Romans called a poem an "ode," or "carmen" or "cantus." Because of recent studies of the languages of Senegal, of the Bantu, Peulh, Dahomey, and Ruanda, it is now known that the chants and dances at religious, social, and domestic ceremonies were actually poems. The following Bayeke chant is a typical example:

Nabula kusekula
Mulume walala ni nzala
Mabulanda, mayo
Mulume walala ni nzalael

I have not milled (the maize)
My husband went to sleep hungry
Yes, this is very sad, O mother
My husband criticized me,
My husband went to bed hungry!

Afr. authors have asserted that "a poem is any work of art" (Léopold Sédar-Senghor) or a poem is "words pleasing to the heart and ear" (a Peulh proverb). However, the content of Afr. traditional poetry was originally quite clearly defined, comprising the unwritten history of clans, families, and tribes, and expressing conquests, defeats in battles, the praise of ancestors and chiefs, the description of social and family life, religious beliefs, and the explanation of the phenomena of nature. Other common types were occupational songs to accompany canoe-paddling, milling of rice, marching, nursing of children; also funeral songs, marriage or death songs, chants of witch doctors or soothsayers, and the like. Traditionally the poet composes his verses ex tempore, at times varying the conventional materials with topical references. Many chants, however, were memorized and carried from generation to generation for centuries.

Imagery and rhythm are the two basic characteristics of Afr. traditional poetry. Few abstract poems exist, for the Afr. Negro poet stresses the concrete aspect of life. In contrast to Indo-European languages, where a logical syntax is used, the Afr. Negro uses an intuitive syntax. The principle of both traditional and contemporary Afr. Negro poetry is essentially rhythm combined with the word; this is eventually combined with music and the dance. The poetic line is normally quantitative—an alternation of short and long syllables with accentual emphasis on specific syllables. In the regular traditional poem each verse has the same number of accents, while in contemporary poetry this is no longer the case.

† In Supplement, see also AFRICAN POETRY: VERNACULAR, ENG., FR., PORT.

It is impossible in the present brief survey to treat even the most outstanding examples of traditional Afr. poetry. One must bear in mind that there is not one Afr. literature but many: Yoruba, Malinke, Zulu, Bantu, to mention but a few. South of the Sahara, more than 600 languages are spoken, not including dialects and secret languages which raise the number to about 3,000. We know that each Court had its poet; the profession of the poet was taken over by the son from the father; each tribe had its "griot" (professional poet); chants or poems were numbered chronologically; about 200 dynastic traditional poetic chants are recorded. For adequate discussion of the material, the reader is referred to the bibliography.

Turning to contemporary Afr. Negro poetry, we see a tragic conflict between tradition and progress in the attempt to create a specifically Afr. poetic style. Many Afr. poets live abroad, and those who have adopted the language of their new homeland are no longer truly "African" because they have tried to find a synthesis between Africa and Europe. Their poems, written in Fr. or Eng., have lost much of their Afr. character. On the other hand, the native Afr. poet cannot find a large audience for his work, for if he writes in his own Afr. language, he is understood by a small circle of readers only. Destroyed tradition cannot be revived, and the Afr. Negro poet has yet to establish a specific Afr. style and language in which he can create an authentically "African" poetry.

Many contemporary Afr. poets emphasize political themes. Among them are David Diop (Senegal, 1927-), Bernard Dadié (Ivory Coast, 1923-), J. R. Jolobe (Indwe, S. A., 1902-), Dennis C. Osadebay (Nigeria, 1911-), Theko Bereng (Basuto, 1900-). Their poems express protest against colonialism and the disregard of tradition. There are relatively few lyrical poets in the manner of Léopold Sédar-Senghor (Senegal, 1906-) who is undoubtedly the most lyrical of the contemporary Afr. poets as his Chants pour Naett and Chants d'Ombre show. Aimé Césaire (born in Martinique, 1913; now living in Paris) is considered an Afr. poet with a knowledge of the Fr. language almost unsurpassed even by Fr. poets. His style shows surrealist elements borrowing from traditional Afr. chants, ancestral myths, magic and ancient rites. In his poems Soleil Cou Coupé, Batouque and many others, he combines surrealism with a kind of esoteric and intellectual word game, developing in many of his poems into a revolutionary message. Another lyrical poet is Efua Sutherland.

A number of literary reviews have appeared in the past years. The most important ones are: La voix du Congolais (Elisabethville), Jeune Afrique (Elisabethville), La revue du monde noir (Paris), Présence Africaine (Paris and Dakar), Makerere (Uganda), University Herald (Nigeria), African Drum (Johannesburg), Black Orpheus (Nigeria), Odu (Nigeria), Africa South (Johannesburg and London), West African Review (London) and African Affairs (London) contain occasional literary essays and poems.

Afr. Negro poetry has undergone many transformations: colonization, expatriation, the consequences of being uprooted, a metamorphosis of spiritual and intellectual concepts following the meeting of Africa with the West. There is no doubt that a truly Afr. Negro poetry in at least some of the Afr. countries will emerge when the many errors and insecurities of style are overcome.

ANTHOLOGIES: Anthologie aus der Suaheli Lit., ed. C. G. Büttner (1894); Les Chants et les contes des Ba-rongas, ed. H. A. Junod (1897); Myths and Legends of the Bantu, ed. A. Werner (1933); Anthol. nègre, ed. B. Cendrars (1947); Les plus beaux écrits de l'Union Française et du Maghreb (1947) and Anthol. de la nouvelle poésie nègre et Malgache (1948), both ed. L. Sédar-Senghor; Poètes d'expression fr. 1900-1945, ed. L. G. Damas (1947); Chansons d'ébène en langue d'ivoire (n.d.) and Poètes et conteurs noirs (1948), both ed. O. de Bouveignes; Le Monde noir, ed. T. Monod (1950); Anth. of W. Afr. Verse, ed. O. Bassir (1957); Voices of Ghana, ed. H. Swanzy (1958); Yoruba Poetry, ed. and tr. B. Gbadamosi and U. Beier (1959); Afr. Voices, ed. P. Rutherford (1960); An Afr. Treasury, ed. L. Hughes (1960); Schwarzer Orpheus, ed. J. Jahn (4th ed., 1960). See also Antologia da poesia negra de expressão portuguesa, ed. M. Andrade (1962); Modern Poetry from Africa, ed. G. Moore and U. Beier (1963); Poems from Black Africa, ed. L. Hughes (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: H. Grégoire, De la lit. des nègres (1808); P. Cultur, Histoire du Sénégal du XVe s. à 1870 (1910); C. Meinhof, Die Dichtung der Afrikaner (1911); J. Roscoe, The Baganda (1911); E. Hurel, La Poésie chez les primitifs (1922); R. S. Rattray, Religion and Art in Ashanti (1927); Chadwick; M. J. Herskovits, Dahomey (1935); W. D. Hambly, Source Book for Afr. Anthropology (1937); H. Baumann and D. Westermann, Les Peuples et les civilisations de l'Afrique (1948); L. Homburger, The Negro-Afr. Languages (1949); L. Frobenius, Kulturgegeschichte Afrikas (1954); J. Jahn, Muntu: An Outline of Neo-Afr. Culture, tr. M. Grene (1961); L. Harries, Swahili

NEGRO POETRY

Poetry (1962); B. W. Andrzejewski and I. M. Lewis, Somali Poetry (1964). M.K.O.-J.

AMERICAN (U.S.).† A sudden burst of poetic expression in Harlem in the 1920's produced "more confident self-expression" by Negro Americans, according to one observer, than the centuries that preceded.

The poets of the Harlem Renaissance were born nearly 200 years after the first Am. Negro poet, Lucy Terry, the slave girl whose semi-literate Bars Fight is a verse account of an Indian raid on old Deerfield in 1746. The second important Am. Negro poet is Phillis Wheatley, who was born in Senegal, West Africa, sold into slavery in early childhood and brought to Boston in 1761. A Poem by Phillis, a Negro girl in Boston, on the death of the Reverend George Whitefield, published when she was just seventeen, heralded the beginning of a unique writing career, culminating in Poems Religious and Moral, published in 1773 in England, where she had gone for her health. Lucy Terry and Phillis Wheatley, along with such other Am. Negroes as Jupiter Hammon and George Moses Horton, belong to a tradition of writers in bondage which goes back to Aesop and Terence.

Marked changes in the pattern of slavery in the United States followed the Revolutionary War. Laws were passed in the slave states making it a crime to teach a slave to read and write. Formal poetry by Negroes, it needs scarcely be said, suffered. Except for such writings in Fr. by free men of color in Louisiana as were collected in the anthology Les Celles (1845), and a few scattered lyrics by Horton and Frances E. W. Harper elsewhere, the richest self-expression by Negroes in the 19th c. was not written. It consisted of spirituals, seculars, narrative poems, proverbs, and aphorisms, animal tales and the like.

About 120 years after Phillis Wheatley, Paul Laurence Dunbar greeted the 20th c. with several volumes of lyrics, including such representative poems as Dawn, Little Brown Baby, When Malindy Sings, and Compensation, together with scores of others which, more than half a century later, have a host of admirers to whom they remain fresh and poignant. His Collected Poems (1913), have never been out of print. A strong sense of melody and rhythm was a feature of Dunbar's poetry, as it has been of nearly all the Negro poets of the United States. Dunbar's delightful country folk, his broad, often humorous, dialect failed to create a tradition, however. Later Negro poets have held that the effective use of dialect in poetry is limited to humor and pathos. Accordingly, most of them have abandoned it. The colloquial speech used now and then by poets like Langston Hughes and Sterling A. Brown is something else.

A contemporary of Dunbar's was James Weldon Johnson, but Johnson's God's Trombones, a collection of folk sermons in verse and his most important poetic achievement, was not completed until late in his career. Meanwhile William Stanley Braithwaite, best known for his series of annual Anthologies of Magazine Verse (1913 to 1929), published two volumes of his own lyrics (1904 and 1908), neither of them recognizable in any way as "Negro poetry." Selected editions of Johnson's and Braithwaite's poems were published in 1930 and 1948 respectively. Angelina W. Grimke, Anne Spencer, Georgia Douglas Johnson and Jessie Redmond Fauset are women whose poems appeared here and there before the Harlem poets arrived. Miss Grimke's The Black Finger, Miss Spencer's Letter to My Sister, Miss Johnson's The Heart of a Woman, and Miss Fauset's Enigma are typical. Fenton Johnson, their contemporary, is remembered best for free-verse vignettes like The Banjo Player, Aunt Jane Allen, and The Scarlet Woman. Three small volumes of his poetry came out between 1914 and 1916.

With the arrival of Claude McKay in the United States Negro poetry welcomed its strongest voice since Dunbar. Born in Jamaica, B.W.I., McKay published his first book, Songs of Jamaica, at the age of nineteen. Constab Ballads, also written in West Indian dialect, followed about a year later, and presently the young McKay migrated to the United States to attend Tuskegee Institute and, later, Kansas State University as a student of Agriculture. Two years of this was enough for him. He moved on to New York and began contributing verse to American magazines. McKay went to Europe in 1919 and published in London his slight but appealing collection Spring in New Hampshire (1920). On returning to America he became associated with Max Eastman in the editing of the Liberator. Harlem Shadows, the book by which he became widely known to poetry lovers, and which touched off much subsequent literary activity in Harlem, came out in 1922. The Tropics in New York and the famous sonnet If We Must Die represent McKay's range as well as his special quality. Attention was drawn to the universality of the latter poem when Winston Churchill quoted it as the conclusion to his speech before the joint Houses of Congress prior to the entrance of the United States into World War II:

If we must die, O let us nobly die,
So that our precious blood may not be shed
In vain; then even the monsters we defy
Shall be constrained to honor us though dead!

* * * * *

† In Supplement, see also BLACK POETRY, RECENT (U.S.); HARLEM RENAISSANCE.

Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,
Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back!

The poems of Langston Hughes, meanwhile, had been attracting attention in the Crisis, a magazine which had since 1911 welcomed contributions by Negro poets. Hughes quickly identified himself as a distinctive new voice. His The Negro Speaks of Rivers appeared soon after his graduation from high school in 1920 and was reprinted far and wide. The first collection of his poems was The Weary Blues (1926), but no less than half a dozen volumes have followed, all of them marked by an ease of expression and a naturalness of feeling that make them seem effortless. Hughes's art can be likened to that of Jelly Roll Morton and the creators of jazz. His sources are street music. His language is Harlemese. In his way he is an Am. original.

Countee Cullen, another of the poets who helped to create the mood of the 1920's in Negro poetry, was quite different. Educated in New York City, he adopted the standard models, from John Keats to Edna St. Vincent Millay. But the ideas that went into Cullen's sonnets and quatrains were something new in Am. poetry. His long poem Color, for example, which gave its title to his first book (published in 1925 while Cullen was still an undergraduate at New York University), is the poet's treatment of the problem of race prejudice as he saw and experienced it. His Heritage shows him seeking a nostalgic link with the Africa of his dark forebears. His Incident tells how the color problem startled an impressionable child. All these are included in On These I Stand (1947). Jean Toomer's small output belongs to this same period. His Cane (1924), like Sterling Brown's Southern Road a decade later, highlighted significant folk values.

Four Negro poets have received critical attention since the Harlem period. Margaret Walker won the Yale University Younger Poets award in 1942 with her volume For My People, the title poem of which has become a favorite of Negro speakers and readers. Her Molly Means has become popular with verse choirs. Gwendolyn Brooks's first book was A Street in Bronzeville (1945). Her Annie Allen, which followed in 1949, was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for poetry, the first time this honor had been given to any Negro writer. She has since published fiction as well as poetry for children. Owen Dodson's Powerful Long Ladder (1946), gets its idiom more from the New Poetry of our time than from Negro folk sources, and probably for this reason is less known among Negro readers than his sensitive novel Boy at the Window (1951). The two books of Melvin B. Tolson's poetry also represent two attitudes toward his material. Rendezvous with America (1944), shows the influence of Langston Hughes and Negro folk sources. His Libretto for the Republic of Liberia (1953), while treating a Negro theme, is an exercise in poetics better understood by New Critics than by readers accustomed to traditional forms, folk or otherwise. Nevertheless it won him honors from the government of Liberia. A collection of Robert E. Hayden's poems appeared in England in 1962 under the title Ballad of Remembrance. Other young poets whose reputations at that time rested mainly on appearances in anthologies and periodicals included Moses Carl Holman, Gloria Oden, and LeRoi Jones.

ANTHOLOGIES: Carolling Dusk, ed. C. Cullen (1927); The Book of Am. Negro Poetry, ed. J. W. Johnson (2d ed., 1931); Negro Poets and Their Poems, ed. R. T. Kerlin (1935); Golden Slippers, ed. A. Bontemps (1941); The Negro Caravan, ed. S. A. Brown (1941); The Poetry of the Negro, 1746-1949 (1949) and The Book of Negro Folklore (1958), both ed. L. Hughes and A. Bontemps; Am. Negro Poetry, ed. A. Bontemps (1963); New Negro Poets, U.S.A., ed. L. Hughes (1964).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: B. G. Brawley, The Negro in Lit. and Art in the U.S. (1918), Early Negro Am. Writers (1935) and The Negro Genius (1937); V. Loggins, The Negro Author (1931); S. A. Brown, Negro Poetry and Drama (1937; essential introductory statement; some attention to origins and folk sources); J. S. Redding, To Make a Poet Black (1939; a closer look at the work of representative Negro poets); J. Wagner, Les poètes nègres des Etats-Unis: Le sentiment racial et religieux dans la poésie de P. L. Dunbar à L. Hughes (1963).

A.B.

NEOCLASSICAL POETICS. From about 1650 to about 1800, development of interest and activity in "poetics"—in discussion, within the general province of criticism, of the nature and value specifically of poets and poetry—was rapid and widespread. It was not, however, the development of a single, harmonious system of principles and doctrines. Sometimes, for example, theories were developed around questions primarily of "art" (as by Boileau, Rapin, Le Bossu, Dryden, Gottsched, and Lessing), while sometimes "nature" was of primary importance (as for Johnson, Edward Young, Rousseau, and Herder); sometimes, again, questions of the ends or effects of poetry were primary (as for Boileau, Rapin, Dryden, Addison, and Johnson)—and this was the orientation most characteristic of the period—while sometimes heavy emphasis was placed on the powers and habits of poets (as by Bouhours, Joseph Warton, and Young). Moreover, within each of these broad and overlapping divisions, and others like them, the specific doctrines and methods of reasoning were various. It is possible, nevertheless, to describe in very general terms (1) some of the different kinds of discussion and inquiry characteristic of the period and (2) some of the principal shifts and developments in dominant interest, emphasis, and orientation.

1. In the sense of discussions designed specifically to state the nature, problems, and excellence of poetry, neocl. poetics took two principal forms: "technical" and "qualitative"; the distinction between them turns on the special kind of question and poetic phenomenon with which each was primarily concerned. The "technical" poetics—deriving its problems and terms mainly from Horace and Aristotle (but largely in interpretations which blurred their radical differences) and from Renaissance and 17th-c. critics who combined "Horatian" and "Aristotelian" doctrines with elements especially from Cicero, Quintilian, and certain Neoplatonists—is found, to list a few characteristic examples, in works like Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668) and Preface to Troilus and Cressida (1679), Fielding's Preface to Joseph Andrews (1742), Boileau's L'Art poétique (1674), Rapin's Réflexions sur la poétique d'Aristote (1674), Voltaire's Preface (and accompanying letters) to the 1730 edition of his Oedipe, Ignacio Luzán's Poética (1737), Gottsched's Versuch einer kritischen Dichtkunst (1730), Lessing's Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1767–69), Gravina's Ragion poetica (1708), and his Della tragedia (1715), Metastasio's Estratto dell'arte poetica d'Aristotile (1782), and numerous others. Its principal task was to answer questions of artistry and poetic construction, viewed largely in terms of the ends and means appropriate to the different species of writing; and it did this mainly by a process of deducing "rules" and "beauties" from considerations of the "art" of poetry, the powers and practices of poets, and the needs and demands of audiences.

The "qualitative" poetics—deriving from the tradition represented by Demetrius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Quintilian, Cicero, and especially "Longinus"—is found in such works as Dryden's "Preface to the Fables" (1700), Pope's "Preface to the Iliad" (1715), many of Johnson's Rambler papers on poetic topics (1750–52), parts of Voltaire's "Discours sur la tragédie" (1731), Bodmer's Critische Abhandlung von dem Wunderbaren in der Poesie (1740), J. E. Schlegel's Vergleichung Shakespears und Andreas Gryphs (1741), and Pietro Calepio's Paragone della poesia tragica d'Italia con quella di Francia (1732). It sought its principles, characteristically, in the demands and responses of the audience and the practices and powers of the poet; its task, however, was to answer questions not of specific form and technique but rather of the qualities and values which characterize poetry in general or distinguish one writer or work from another, either ignoring questions of species and established styles or subordinating them to broader considerations of matter and manner, thought, mind, expression, and the like.

With the major developments in and between these two principal modes of poetics—and often, in given discussions, inseparable from them—arose also two special kinds of inquiry in general criticism and aesthetics. On the one hand, historians and critics began increasingly to examine the special rhetorical circumstances, environmental causes, and historical setting of an author's production—his gifts, education, life, audience, geographic location, climate, nationality, language, and the spirit or condition of his age—thus providing, in general, a variety of explanations and justifications of the peculiar forms and qualities of the works of poets in different social conditions, ages, and nations. This kind of discussion is found in such early works as François Ogier's Preface to Schélandre's Tyr et Sidon (1628), parts (e.g., 2.1) of D'Aubignac's Pratique du théâtre (1657), Saint-Evremond's De la tragédie ancienne et moderne (1672)—and many other contributions to the ancients-moderns controversy—Temple's essays "Upon Poetry" and "Upon Ancient and Modern Learning" (1690), Dryden's "Origin and Progress of Satire" (1693), and passages (e.g., 1.118–23; 2.394–407) of Pope's Essay on Criticism (1711); more fully developed in such later works as Voltaire's Essay upon Epic Poetry (1727), Thomas Blackwell's Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer (1735), Johnson's "Preface to Shakespeare" (1765) and parts of his Lives of the Poets (1779–81), Thomas Warton's History of English Poetry (1774–81), Herder's "Briefwechsel über Ossian und die lieder alter Völker" and his essay on "Shakespeare" (1773), Gravina's Ragion poetica (in part), F. X. Quadrio's Della storia della ragione d'ogni poesia (1739–52), Vico's Principii d'una scienza nuova (1744); and in general in the various apologies for "runic," "oriental" (especially the Hebrew), "primitive," and "gothic" poets and poetry, as in the works of Lowth, Hurd, Blair, Hamann, Herder, and Melchiorre Cesarotti.

On the other hand, philosophers and critics began increasingly to explore the bases of all the arts, in "scientific" and "philosophical" analyses of human nature, the mind, works of art, and the properties of the world. This kind of discussion is exemplified by Dryden's "Parallel betwixt Poetry and Painting" (1695), Shaftesbury's The Moralists (1709), Addison's Spectator papers on "the pleasures of the imagination" (1712), Bouhours's La manière de bien penser dans les ouvrages de l'esprit (1687), Du Bos's Réflexions critiques sur la poésie et sur la peinture (1719), Batteux's Beaux arts réduits à un même principe (1746), Arteaga's Investigaciones filosóficas sobre la Belleza Ideal (1789), Muratori's Riflessioni sopra il buon gusto nelle scienze e nelle arti (1708), Giuseppe Spalletti's Saggio sopra la bellezza (1765), Baumgarten's Aesthetica (1750-58), Lessing's Laokoon (1766), among many others.

In spite of the different objects, purposes, and methods represented in these various discussions, more or less common use was made of a body of critical concepts and distinctions which, in a general way, may be described as "neocl." There were, in the first place, those familiar general analytical and descriptive devices having reference to the various species or types of composition and their rules and principles of subject matter, structure, and style: terms and distinctions such as tragedy, comedy, epic, satire, ode, epigram, epistle, pastoral; matter and manner, argument and design, thought and expression; invention, arrangement or disposition, and expression; thought and passion, fable, manners, and sentiments; the elevated, the middle, and the low styles. In the second place, there were those still more general concepts and oppositions of concepts having reference not to specific kinds or elements of poems but to the bases, circumstances, causes, subjects, ends, effects, and qualities of literature as a whole: nature and art, pleasure and instruction, invention and judgment, imagination and reason, originality and the imitation of models, the imitation of nature and fanciful invention, general nature and particular nature, men of taste and the common reader, simplicity and refinement, the just and the lively, truth and novelty, the regular and the irregular, the sublime and the beautiful, the picturesque, the ridiculous, and many others. These are not, of course, examples of doctrine or, in any simple sense, of "neocl. tastes" in poetry, but rather of a highly amorphous body of "commonplaces" in terms of which doctrines were stated or tastes defined. Nevertheless, not only do they differ, as a whole, from those especially characteristic of earlier and later periods, but also they derive mainly from a common critical tradition which had its origins in the rhetoric of Alexandrian Greece and the Rome of Horace, Cicero, and Quintilian; and in these common conceptual materials a general continuity in poetic theory and criticism did exist throughout the neocl. period (See R. S. Crane, in UTQ [22 [1953], 376-91).

2. It was, however, a continuity of terms and distinctions, not a static unity of principles or doctrines, and one of the important developments in the poetic theories of the period involved a basic shift of emphasis in first principles from one side to the other of the most general and inclusive conceptual opposition in ancient criticism—from "art" to "nature." In many cases, this shift began with an inclination—often motivated by nationalism or religion—to defend poems and poets that presumably did not meet the "artistic" standards set by the admired Gr. and Roman critics and models, according to common 17th-c. and earlier interpretations of those critics and models. The significance of this inclination was in part its stimulation of fresh inquiries into poets' environmental conditions, especially into differences among audiences, as well as into general audience psychology and the ends and means of poetry. Those familiar controversies, for example, regarding "marvelous" and "probable" subject matters, or "true" and "false" wit, or the propriety or possibility of portraying Christian martyrs and the subject of love in tragedy, or the three unities, or the use of rhyme in tragedy and epic, turned upon freshly stated questions of what a given audience or society would or would not accept, of the real substance and structure of the nature imitated (or in general the subject matter expressed) in different kinds of poems, and of what, after all, poetry is supposed to accomplish. Such inquiries were accompanied and followed by those familiar qualitative reappraisals and rediscoveries of the works of poets (e.g., Shakespeare, Homer, "Ossian") who revealed more "imagination" than "reason" or "learning," more "liveliness" than "justness," more "invention" than imitation of proper models. Out of this general process of reexamining established rules and criteria arose, among other things, the compelling question—going quite beyond the issue of a poet's relative "rationality," "correctness," or "judgment"—of the necessity or reliability, for actually achieving the ends of poetry, of any rules based merely on the practices of past poets. As a result, critics tended more and more to look for the true laws and ideals of poetry (in its various forms and qualities) in laws and ideals of nature instead of in the established precepts and models of the art. From the beginning, of course, the importance of "nature," in one or another of its senses, was never disputed, but for writers like Rapin, Le Bossu, Dryden, Gildon, Dennis, Luzán, Gottsched, G. M. Crescimbeni, and Gravina the major concern was the rules and standards of the art, especially as based on what the great poets had done and on the principles and doctrines of great critics who had based their systems on the practices of the poets, whereas for later writers like Diderot, Rousseau, Johnson, Young, Burke, Kames, Reynolds, Baretti, Beccaria, Hamann, and Herder, the major concern was some ideal or universal kind or aspect of nature—human, “external,” or divine—to which “rules” could be subordinated or in terms of which “art” itself could be defined. Commonly, the example of models of the past which clearly reflected the prior example of nature continued to be maintained as relevant to poetic theory; but explaining the “beauties” and effects of great works in relation primarily to their “natural causes” had become increasingly popular early in the 18th c. (e.g., with Addison, Du Bos, and Fontenelle), and after the middle of the century some writers—e.g., Burke, on the Sublime and Beautiful (1757), Lord Kames, in his Elements of Criticism (1762), and Beccaria, in his Ricerche intorno alla natura dello stile (1770)—sought to reject the guidance not only of established rules of the art but also of all past models (“natural” or “artificial,” primitive or refined, ancient or modern, “oriental” or “Hellenic,” “vulgar” or “classical”), in favor of direct investigation of natural phenomena; by the close of the century the attempt to establish the true principles of poetic subject matter, structure, and style in “nature” was a very popular activity.

A second development in the period, occurring for the most part concomitantly with this shift of emphasis from art to nature, entailed increasing concern with questions of the powers and habits of the poet as means to the ends, or cause of the effects, of poetry. From the beginning the poet had been required to possess both genius or imagination and judgment or learning (both “nature” and “art”). Moreover, nearly all the great critics of antiquity had made allowance for the spontaneous, for divine inspiration, or for the natural, untutored “original,” and by the last quarter of the 17th c. some critics—e.g., Bouhours, in his Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène (1671) and Temple, in his essay “Upon Poetry”—had begun to refurbish these old principles. Even without invocation of such a concept as the “je ne sais quoi” (q.v.), the desire to explain or defend the obvious differences in the poetry of different ages and nations led to inquiry into the effects of climate, terrain, political organization, and accidents of history on the mind and practice of the poet, or into the inherent differences of poetic mentality and habits of different races, nations, and languages, especially at different stages of development, or into different bona fide kinds and uses of genius that could be looked at as potentially common to all races, ages, and societies. It all amounted to a significant increase in attention given to questions of the poet's mind and conduct; whereas in the earlier years the poet himself had been subordinated, in a general way, to considerations of the “art” of poetry and the audience, at the close of the 18th c. most poetic theorists did not hesitate to give a central position to the man who produces the poems. It remained, however, the position largely of writer of poetry—of responsibility for certain subject matters, arrangements, styles, and qualities of composition—and to most neocl. critics poetry was significant primarily for its effects upon an audience, not (in any independent sense) for its “sources” in the poetic mind.

Audiences differ, however, and a third important development involved a change in dominant principles of audience appeal; it was scarcely an even and complete alteration of values, but in general by the middle of the 18th c., poetic theorists were willing to reject not only specific preestablished rules of poetry but also the common conceptions of the “proper” audience in terms of which they had frequently been justified. In the earlier years, the dominant concern tended to be either with the accidental but legitimate demands and needs of various kinds of spectators and readers existing in a given society (as for Corneille or Sir Robert Howard) or with the demands of a special man of taste, virtue, or judgment (as for Chapelain, Racine, Voltaire, Dryden, Dennis, Addison, Muratori, Forner); in the later years, it tended to be with the requirements of “general humanity” (as for Johnson) or with the automatic responses of an essential or “natural” human being (as for Burke, Reid, Dugald Stewart, Beccaria, Rousseau). The first basis for such a development lay in the special character of many of the “historical” and comparative inquiries which appeared early in the period. In order, for example, to explain adequately the different subjects and styles of different societies and ages, it was frequently thought to be necessary not only to recognize an author's “rhetorical circumstances” (gifts, education, and special audience demands) but also to assume, at least tacitly, the existence of either a basic humanity, in both the poet and his readers, upon which differences of climate and terrain or social structure could act as differentiating causes (as for Bouhours and Fontenelle), or an ideal of humanity or society from or toward which different societies moved (as for Vico), or some combination of these (as for Shaftesbury); and such inquiries were frequently deliberate attempts to defend works which seemed to violate rules and criteria held to be established in part through analysis of different kinds of readers or through the demands of the “most judicious.” Moreover, with the publication of Boileau's translation of Longinus in 1674 and his Réflexions on the treatise in 1693, attention was directed to a critical document, however poorly understood, in which, in relation to the art of sublimity, special differences of audiences are not emphasized. This influence, in turn, was supplemented especially by the increasing amount of theorizing concerning the universal principles of aesthetic response, and by the end of the 18th c. a sort of general "universalizing" of the audience, though in a variety of senses, had taken place.

The growing popularity of Longinus is related to another development, of greater significance for the whole of European criticism: a general shift in dominant interest away from genres and established techniques to general qualities of art and nature—in short, a shift from technical to qualitative poetics. There was no need, in Longinus' analysis of the art of sublimity, for distinctions of poetic genres or special forms of discourse; the quality of sublimity was sought in all forms, and in both prose and verse. However, since early neocl. writers (e.g., Boileau, Dryden, Dennis) tended to work the Longinian terms and doctrines into systems in which distinctions of genre were still important, it is doubtful whether the new popularity of Longinus could alone have brought about the growing vogue of qualitative poetics, and this development, too, was stimulated both by the increasing practice of comparing the poets and poetry of different ages and nations and by the many "philosophical" inquiries concerning the universal bases of the arts. In any case, by the last quarter of the 18th c., concern with poetic genres and types of composition had given way, with few important exceptions (notably in Lessing), to a dominant interest in general qualities or in formal distinctions (e.g., tragedy and epic) translated into qualitative distinctions (e.g., the pathetic or the heroic), by means of which poets and poems could be described and evaluated, comparatively and individually. Thus whereas in the early years (as by Boileau and Dennis, among others) poetic faculties and types of learning, for example, were sometimes systematically adjusted to different species of poems, in the later years (as by Young, Bodmer and Breitingen, and Muratori) such adjustments were made, if at all, to very general qualities of subject matter, mind, and manner. Similarly, whereas in the early years (as by Rapin and Dryden) audiences were sometimes differentiated in part on the basis of their demand for different species or styles, in the later years (as by Beaumarchais, Hume, Goldsmith) they were differentiated, if at all, on the basis of their demand for or response to general qualities of subject matter and expression.

Finally, in most of the earlier examples of qualitative poetics—notably in Boileau, Dryden, and Muratori—the emphasis tended to be on qualities (e.g., wit and judgment, regularity and irregularity) referring to the matter and manner of works conceived at least in part as the products of art (and often related to models of the past upon which "specific" rules had been based), whereas in the later examples—notably in Johnson, Herder, and Pagano—the qualities (e.g., the sublime and the beautiful, "truth" and novelty) tended to be drawn consciously and more directly from some view of nature, as related to the mind of the poet, the properties of the universe, or the response of the audience. No radically new terminology was necessary for this development, of course, since the issues of "art" and "nature" had always been present in both technical and qualitative poetics, in the works, for example, of both Horace and Longinus, and since the qualitative terms, whatever their original significance, received their special meanings from the immediate "natural" or "artificial" frameworks in which they were employed.

Nor was any major revolution necessary against the characteristic neocl. orientation toward the demands, needs, and responses of the audience. Nevertheless, when the emphasis came to be placed on the natural responses or needs of a "universal" human being instead of the demands of specially differentiated kinds of readers, it was relatively easy for the poet also to be viewed "universally" in terms of natural response and conduct, and with the general increase of interest in the mind of the poet and the rise of a mode of qualitative poetics whose values and ideals often had reference especially to poetic mentality, transition was easy to the period we call "romantic," in which "poetry" (as a superior quality of thought and expression) could be distinguished from "poems," and in which the main controlling reference in poetics was no longer the audience but the psychology and moral nature of the poet.

SOME ADDITIONAL PRIMARY WORKS: J. Dryden, Essay of Heroic Plays (1672); T. Hobbes, "Preface to Homer's Odysseys" (1675); T. Rymer, A Short View of Tragedy (1693); Dryden, Dedication of the Aeneis (1697); J. Dennis, Grounds of Crit. in Poetry (1704); A. A. Cooper (Third Earl of Shaftesbury), Soliloquy; or Advice to an Author (1710); J. Trapp, Praelectiones poeticæ (1711–15); C. Gildon, Complete Art of Poetry (1718); J. Spence, Essay on Mr. Pope's Odyssey (1726–27); R. Lowth, De sacra poesi Hebraeorum praelectiones (1753); T. Warton, Observations on the Fairy Queen (1754, 62); J. Warton, Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope (1756, 82); O. Goldsmith, Present State of Polite Learning in Europe (1759); E. Young, Conjectures on Original Composition (1759); R. Hurd, Letters on Chiv- alry and Romance (1762); H. Blair, Crit. Dissertation on the Poems of Ossian (1763); Hurd, "The Idea of Universal Poetry" (1765); R. Wood, Essay on the Original Genius and Writings of Homer (1769); J. Reynolds, Discourses (1769-90); P. Stockdale, Inquiry into the Nature and Genuine Laws of Poetry (1778); Blair, Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres (1783).—P. Corneille, Discours and Examens (1660); J.-B. Poquelin (Molière), Préface de Tartuffe (1664); J. Racine, Préfaces (1664-91); C. M. Saint-Denis (Saint-Evremond), Sur les caractères des tragédies (1672); R. le Bossu, Traité du poème épique (1675); Saint-Evremond, Sur les poèmes des anciens (1685); B. B. de Fontenelle, Digression sur les anciens et les modernes (1688); C. Perrault, Parallèles des anciens et des modernes (1688-97); J.-B. Bossuet, Maximes et réflexions sur la comédie (1694); F. M. Arouet (Voltaire), Vie de Molière (1739); "Dissertation sur la tragédie ancienne et moderne" (in Sémiramis; 1748); G.-L. Leclerc (Comte de Buffon), Discours sur le style (1753); D. Diderot, Discours sur la poésie dramatique (1758); J.-J. Rousseau, Lettre à D'Alembert sur les spectacles (1758); Voltaire, Commentaires sur Corneille (1764).—B. J. Feijóo, Teatro crítico universal (1724-41); A. de Montiano y Luyando, Discursos sobre las tragedias españolas (1750-53); N. F. de Moratín, Desengaños al teatro español (1762); F. Nieto de Molina, Los críticos de Madrid, en defensa de las comedias antiguas y en contra de las modernas (1768); A. de Capmany, Filosofía de la elocuencia (1777); V. de los Ríos, Análisis del Quijote (1780); J. P. Forner, El asno erudito (1782); T. de Iriarte, Fábulas literarias (1782); Forner, Oración apologética por la España y su mérito literario (1786); M. J. Quintana, Las reglas del drama (1791); S. Barbero, Principios de retórica y poética (1805).—G. M. Crescimbeni, Della volgar poesia (1700); L. A. Muratori, Della perfetta poesia italiana (1706); G. C. Beccelli, Della novella poesia, cioè del vero genere e particolare bellezze della poesia ital. (1732); S. Bettinelli, Lettere Virgiliane (1757); G. Gozzi, Giudizio degli antichi poeti sopra le moderne censure di Dante (1758); M. Cesarotti, Ragionamento sopra il diletto della tragedia (1762); G. Baretti, La frusta letteraria (1763-65); M. Zanotti, Dell'arte poetica (1768); G. Tiraboschi, Storia della lett. ital. (1772-82); G. Parini, Sui principi di belle lettere (1773-75); C. Goldoni, Memoirs (1783-87); M. Pagano, Sull'origine e natura della poesia (1783); V. Alfieri, Del principe e delle lettere (1788).—J. J. Bodmer and J. J. Breitinger, Von dem Einfluss und Gebrauche der Einbildungskraft (1727); J. C. Gottsched, Ausführliche Redekunst (1736); Breitinger, Critische Abhandlung von der Natur, den Absichten und dem Gebrauche der Gleichnisse (1740); Critische Dichtkunst (1740); Bodmer, Critische Betrachtung über die poetischen Gemälde der Dichter (1741); Critische Briefe (1746); J. G. Hamann, Kreuzzüge des Philologen (1762); H. W. von Gerstenberg, Briefe über Merkwürdigkeiten der Lit. (1766-67); J. G. Sulzer, Allgemeine Theorie der schönen Künste (1771-74); J. G. Herder, Vom Geist der Ebräischen Poesie (1783).

SECONDARY WORKS: J. G. Robertson, Studies in the Genesis of Romantic Theory in the 18th C. (1923); Crane, Critics; Wellek, I.; J. W. Draper, 18th C. Eng. Aesthetics: A Bibliog. (1931); S. H. Monk, The Sublime (1935); CBEL, II; R. Wellek, The Rise of Eng. Lit. Hist. (1941); J. W. H. Atkins, Eng. Lit. Crit.: 17th and 18th C. (1951); A. Bosker, Lit. Crit. in the Age of Johnson (2d ed., Groningen, 1953); R. S. Crane, "Eng. Neo-Classical Crit.," in Shipley and "On Writing the Hist. of Eng. Crit., 1650-1800," URQ, 22 (1953).—Bray; G. Lanson, Manuel bibliographique de la litt. fr. moderne, XVI^e au XIX^e s. (new ed., 1921); A Crit. Bibliog. of Fr. Lit., ed. D. C. Cabeen (iv, 1951).—F. Fernández y González, Historia de la crítica literaria en España . . . (5 v., 1867); M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Hist. de las ideas estéticas en España (2d ed., 9 v., unfinished, 1890-1912); J. Hurtado and A. González-Palencia, Hist. de la lit. española (6th ed., 1949).—B. Croce, Estetica (1902, Eng. tr. D. Ainslie [1921]); H. Quigley, Italy and the Rise of a New School of Crit. in the 18th C. (1923); Storia letteraria d'Italia (13 v., 1929-35; Il Seicento by A. Belloni [1929]; Il Settecento by G. Natali [3d ed., 2 v., 1950]); M. Fubini, Dal Muratori al Baretti (1946); "Arcadia e illuminismo," Questioni e correnti di storia letteraria (v. III of Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di lett. ital., ed. A. Momigliano [1949]).—E. Grucker, Hist. des doctrines litt. et esthétiques en Allemagne (1883); K. Borinski, Die Antike in Poetik und Kunsttheorie . . . (2 v., 1914-23); Annalen der deutschen Lit., ed. H. O. Burger (1952); O. Olzien, Bibliog. zur deutschen Lit. (1953; 1955; suppls. to the Burger, Annalen). R.M.

NEOCLASSICISM. See CLASSICISM.

NEOGONGORISM. Hispanic ultraism (q.v.) led the young writers of Spain and Sp. America toward a new gongorism in which the attempt to create striking metaphors was intrinsic. García Lorca, Jorge Guillén, Gerardo Diego and Rafael Alberti of Spain all loudly espoused the poetic genius of Góngora in speech and writing. The revival of interest in the classic Góngora, blended with 20th c. literary tendencies, and fused onto the rock of popular language and tradition, provided the keynotes of Hispanic poetry of the post-war era. Lorca, quoting Góngora, pointed out that the only thing which could give a kind of immortality to a poem was "a chain of images."—Antología poética en honor de Góngora, desde Lope de Vega a Rubén Darío, ed. G. Diego (1927). J.A.C.

NEO-HUMANISM. A movement in Am. criticism which had greatest impact in the years 1915–33. Neo-h. had no direct relationship to Renaissance humanism or to other expressions of humanism in letters and philosophy, except to emphasize human dignity, moral strenuousness, and exercise of the will and reason. Primarily, neo-h. defended conservative ethical, political, and aesthetic standards against 19th-c. romantics, liberals, and empiricists and their 20th-c. counterparts. Irving Babbitt (1865–1933) in Literature and the Am. College (1908) formulated its program which remained essentially unchanged; and Paul Elmer More (1864–1937) was his associate.

Despite their emphasis upon reason, the neo-humanists felt that ultimately intuition was the source of philosophical truth. Certain permanent, distinctively "human" qualities, they said, could be ascertained by looking within; they thus took over the neoclassic concept of ethical and aesthetic universals. They not only repudiated all formal philosophies based upon nature, like those of Dewey, James, and Bergson, but the romantic nature-worship of 19th-c. poets like Wordsworth, Coleridge, Emerson, Goethe, Byron, Meredith, and Whitman. They also condemned a negative approach to nature like that of Thomas Hardy. To ethical emphasis in these and other writers, the neo-humanists were, however, sympathetic; and they tended to judge literature by ethical rather than by aesthetic criteria. Drawing heavily on Christian moral tradition while opposing Christian dogma and formal theology, the neo-humanists pictured man in a continuing, dualistic struggle between lower and higher impulses, between expansive natural desires and the "inner check" or "will to refrain." At the end of his life, Paul Elmer More came to feel that the absolute nature of the values he had embraced required the additional sanction of revealed religion.

The neo-humanists owed much to Matthew Arnold. They distrusted his liberal bias in politics and religion, and they sometimes thought he was too subjective in his judgments; but on the whole they regarded him as their chief 19th-c. precursor. His condemnation of the romantics, his ethical view of literature, his conviction that the "best self" (compare More's "inner check") must prevail over the "ordinary self," his view of man as discontinuous with nature, and his belief in an intellectual aristocracy (a "saving remnant")—all ally him with the neo-humanists.

In literature, the neo-humanists were hostile to the concept of original genius, particularly in the work of Rousseau and of 19th-c. writers. In his best book, Rousseau and Romanticism (1919), Babbitt flayed Rousseau and the romantic poets for their primitivism, optimism, and uncontrolled emotionalism. As classicists, the neo-humanists stressed the rational rather than the emotional in art and life; perfection of form rather than experimentalism; serenity, order and repose rather than manifestations of undisciplined creative energy. In emphasizing the need for selection of detail, they were hostile to realism in poetry and fiction. In The Genteel Tradition at Bay (1931) George Santayana judged neo-h. to be a survival from the genteel tradition in Am. culture; in the aversion of neo-humanists to literary realism, in their squeamishness about sexual experience, in their emphasis upon the identity of the good, the true and the beautiful, and in their moralism they perhaps deserved Santayana's criticism. The neo-humanists, however, repudiated genteel idealism and optimism. In Babbitt's Democracy and Leadership (1924) and More's Aristocracy and Justice (1915), anti-democratic, antihumanitarian, and anti-individualistic tendencies of the movement are evident.

From the beginning of World War I until about 1924, Stuart P. Sherman (1881–1926) was chief spokesman for neo-h. After his defection to modernism in 1924 as first editor of New York Herald Tribune "Books" and his accidental death in 1926, the chief popular and academic publicist for the movement was Norman Foerster (1887–) in American Criticism (1928), Toward Standards (1930), and the anthology he edited, Humanism and America (1930). The attack upon the neo-humanists was represented in another anthology edited by C. Hartley Grattan, The Critique of Humanism (1930). With the publication of these anthologies and with Babbitt's death in 1933, the movement had spent its force. The principal issues in "the great critical debate" between neo-humanists and their liberal and radical opponents in the 1920's and early 1930's were the extent of the artist's freedom to create without restriction, the relationship between the absolute and the relative, and the relevance of philosophic naturalism to the spiritual life.

For lasting significance in criticism and aesthetics, the neo-humanists were too negative, too concerned with the ethical, too inflexible in applying their formulas, and too unsympathetic to modern literature. In insisting upon standards for literary judgment when criticism had become largely impressionistic, in challenging the frequently deterministic implications of modern naturalism, and in emphasizing—like Pound and Eliot later—the philosophical inadequacies of romanticism, they had an important and beneficial influence. More's critical instincts were sounder than Babbitt's, and at his best he achieved Arnold's fusion of discriminating sensibility with moral insight. In the Shelburne Essays—the chief contribution to literature by the neo-humanists—More exposed incisively the ideological weaknesses, in particular, of the Eng. Victorian and romantic poets. From the neo-humanists, Eliot in part developed his conservative and classical bias, though he repudiated their aesthetic insensitivity and their rejection of formal Christianity. Either directly or through Eliot, other critics and poets like the Southern Agrarians (Ransom, Tate, Warren, Donald Davidson) and Yvor Winters were influenced to adopt conservative moral, aesthetic and religious standards.

See books by and about writers mentioned. Also the following: L. J. A. Mercier, Le Mouvement humaniste aux Etats-Unis (1928), The Challenge of Humanism (1933); I'll Take My Stand, the South and the Agrarian Trad. by Twelve Southerners (Ransom, Tate et al; 1930); T. S. Eliot, "The Humanism of Irving Babbitt," and "Second Thoughts on Humanism," Selected Essays (1932, 1950); L. Lewisohn, Expression in America (1932); Lit. Opinion in America, ed. M. D. Zabel (1937, 2d ed., 1951); R. Shafer, Paul Elmer More and Am. Crit. (1938); E. Wilson, The Triple Thinkers (1938); R. P. Blackmur, "Humanism and the Symbolic Imagination," Southern Review, 7 (1941); A. Kazin, On Native Grounds (1942); J. P. Pritchard, Return to the Fountains (1942) and Crit. in America (1956); Y. Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947); R. E. Spiller, "The Battle of the Books," A Lit. Hist. of the U.S., ed. R. E. Spiller et al., II (1949); W. V. O'Connor, An Age of Crit., 1900-1950 (1952); The Development of Am. Lit. Crit., ed. F. Stovall (1954), pp. 159-98; The Achievement of Am. Crit., ed. C. A. Brown (1954); F. J. Hoffman, The Twenties (1955); J. H. Raleigh, Matthew Arnold and Am. Culture (1957); A. Warren, "The 'New Humanism' Twenty Years After," Modern Age (1959); A. H. Dakin, Paul Elmer More (1960); Sutton.

F.P.W.MC.D.

NEOPLATONISM. See PLATONISM AND POETRY.

NEOTERICI (L. "the new ones"). The name given by Cicero to the coterie of "new poets" of his age who took their inspiration and models from the Gr. Alexandrians. Catullus is the most famous, but others whose work survives in fragments are Calvus, Cinna, Cornificius, Furius Bibaculus, and Tigidas. Diomedes and Terentianus Maurus, grammarians, cite another group of n. who flourished during the reign of Hadrian. Their verse was characterized by tricks of meter, scansion, and syntax with variety and cleverness at a premium.—A. Baehrens, Fragmenta Poetarum Romanorum (1886); C. L. Neudling, A Prosopography to Catullus (1957); K. Quinn, The Catullan Revolution (1959).

R.A.H.

NEO-THOMISM AND POETRY. For the neo-Thomist, poetry is essentially the artistic realization of a unique form of knowledge. St. Thomas Aquinas conceded this vestigially when he wrote that poetic knowledge or "poetica scientia" cannot be seized by but must beguile the reason by certain similitudes ("quibusdem similitudinibus"). Because of the paucity of allusion to poetry in St. Thomas' writings, it has remained the lot of such contemporary Thomists as Maurice de Wulf, Thomas Gilby, John Duffy, Eric Gill, E. I. Watkin and, particularly, Jacques Maritain to formulate more fully the meaning of poetry in the Scholastic tradition.

Maritain, for example, has written that poetry originates, according to a recent paraphrase, in a moment of "subjective communion with objective reality" (W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., and C. Brooks, Literary Criticism, A Short History, 1957, p. 753). Maritain explains that such a communion brings into existence in the poet a true and existential knowledge of the object he is contemplating. This "poetic knowledge" is intuitive rather than discursive, experiential and connatural rather than conceptual, originating in "intuitions of sense." Gilby has noted that poetic knowledge is actually capable of being acquired only when "intelligence" is "united with sense" (Poetic Experience, 1933, p. 17). In brief, the generative power of poetry is inherent in poetic knowledge. As Maritain has written, poetic knowledge is "the intrinsic moment from which creation emanates" (The Range of Reason, 1952, p. 18). Such knowledge, by nature inexpressible in concepts or judgments, demands, in the case of a true poet, to "take form in a poem."

To make possible the conversion of poetic knowledge into the completed poem, Maritain claims that the poet must be actuated by an inspiration, "a creative impulse transcending the limits of reason and employing as it elevates every rational energy of art" (Art and Scholasticism, 1927, p. 54). Inspiration in turn actuates the all-important creative intuition, "the incitation to create," which immediately begins to reshape the sense-intuitions constituting poetic knowledge into the first, primitive forms of the yet-to-be-perfected poem. The process of art, which is the process of making or productive action (factibile), originates when the creative intuition starts to operate, when the creative idea of the poet catalyzes and transfigures poetic knowledge into new and artistically beautiful forms. What results in the finished poem, therefore, is both a simultaneous and integrated revelation of objective reality (intuitively apprehended and artistically re-created) together with something of the creative subjectivity of the poet himself. The poem thus becomes both "an obscure grasping of the real" as well as "an obscure grasping of the soul of the poet" (Maritain, The Situation of Poetry, 1955, p. 84).

True poetry, according to Maritain, is thus characterized by a spirit of "transfigurative realism," which is opposed to representationalism and naturalism on the one hand and non-representationalism and suprematism on the other. Maurice de Wulf notes that it springs from a need "to interpret and dominate reality" (Art and Beauty, 1950, p. 30). Such transfigurative realism implies that there is a fusion in the poem of the poet's subjectivity together with the reality whose existence he has intuitively shared, known and re-created. Since the poet's knowledge of reality is inextricably involved with himself, his poetry becomes a vision of himself in things, as it were. In this regard, Duffy has stated that the poet's contemplation of a poem is one of "complete penetration" even "while the poem is being created" (A Philosophy of Poetry Based on Thomistic Principles, 1945, p. 217). Similarly, E. I. Watkin has written that "the artist's personality largely determines what significant forms he shall see in nature and shall display, and under what aspect he shall see and display them" (A Philosophy of Form, 1935, p. 350).

The signally important term in the Thomistic theory of poetry as Maritain has interpreted it is the creative intuition, which is the indispensable link between the acquisition of poetic knowledge and the actual exercise of the virtue of art in the making of a poem. Creative intuition makes poetic expression possible by releasing and shaping poetic knowledge for artistic ends. It locates the source of poetry in the intellect's intuitive activity and determines, by its presence or absence in a poem, whether a poem is genuine or pastiche. Although poetic knowledge and inspiration are important to the poetic process, it is the creative intuition "to which the entire work to be engendered in beauty, in its perfect singularity as a kind of unique cosmos, is appendent" (Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry, 1953, pp. 59-60). By identifying the creative intuition as "the first ontological root of the artistic activity," Maritain is able to give a final definition of poetry as a "divination of the spiritual in the things of sense, which will also express itself in the things of sense" (Art and Scholasticism, p. 75).—J. Maritain, Art and Poetry (1945), Art and Faith (with J. Cocco, 1948); R. W. Rauch, "Esthetic of Maritain," Thought, 6 (1931); Gilbert and Kuhn; E. Gill, Autobiography (1941); G. A. McCauliff, "Intuition in Christian Lit.," Ren., 3 (1951); S. J. Hazo, "An Analysis of the Aesthetic of J. Maritain" (unpubl. diss., Univ. of Pgh., 1957); F. J. Kovach, Die Ästhetik des Thomas von Aquin (1961).

S.H.

NEW CRITICISM. The n.c. is perhaps not susceptible of a formal definition, for "new" in this context is not much more than a vague pointer. When John Crowe Ransom published The New Criticism in 1941 he apparently meant no more than to designate the criticism then current. (Either he was not aware of, or not concerned with, the fact that Joel E. Spingarn had already preempted the term in a different connection—in an address delivered at Columbia University in 1910.) The critics with whom Ransom was primarily concerned were I. A. Richards, William Empson, T. S. Eliot, and Yvor Winters. But Ransom's book was a sustained, though respectful, attack upon these four figures; and the critic that he desired to see, an "ontological critic," was conspicuous by his absence from the modern scene. The book closed with an invitation for him to appear. Ransom showed himself fully aware of the sharp differences in assumptions and method that separated the modern critics whom he discussed, and he did not insist upon such traits as they held in common. Yet with the publication of his book, "the n.c." as the name of a species gained immediate currency, and has been used constantly, if not very responsibly, ever since.

There are doubtless reasons for this phenomenon. The increased critical activity in our time has brought about the need for a term that would characterize a kind of literary interest which, though difficult to define, seems to many people clearly to exist. Certain polemicists have seized upon the term with joy, content with allowing it to mean no more than "that criticism that I don't like." On the other hand, critics like Allen Tate, R. P. Blackmur, Kenneth Burke—not to mention those discussed in The New Criticism—have resisted acceptance of the term and would have great difficulty in recognizing themselves as the members of a guild.

One aspect of the n.c. which is often seized upon as central is the "close reading" of poetry, and certainly a concern for nuances of words and shades of meaning has characterized much of modern criticism. But "close reading" as such is a superficial trait. The Fr. explica- tion de texte involves close reading but few would call it "n.c." Much will depend upon what one intends to do with a text and upon what he regards as an adequate reading of it. The application of semantics to literary study, a development which owes most to men like I. A. Richards and William Empson, has indeed been very important. Yet the early Richards' affective bias and Empson's inveterate psychologizing about both writer and reader run quite counter to the antiexpressionistic tendencies of a T. S. Eliot, for example, or to the insistence on a cognitive criticism by other "new critics."

Other foci of interest have to be taken into account. An important one has been a concern with a specifically literary criticism as distinguished from a study of sources or of social backgrounds or of the history of ideas or of the political and social effects of literature. The n.c. has tended to explore the structure of the work rather than the mind and personality of the artist or the reactions of his various readers. No one is forgetting (though the critics in question have frequently been accused of forgetting) that literary works are written by human beings, and may exert all sorts of effects upon the human beings who read them. But the "new critics" have characteristically attempted to deal with the literary object itself rather than with its origins and effects—to give a formal rather than a genetic or affective account of literature.

In this connection one may recall that a number of years ago I. A. Richards argued that we needed a spell of purer criticism before we returned to the problems of the interrelation of man's various activities. The "new critics" may be said to have undertaken seriously this purification of literary criticism though surely at the risk of being blamed for having cut literature off from life. The related charge that the n.c. represents a revival of the doctrine of art for art's sake runs into complications when one notices how many of this group have a definite religious position. (Perhaps because they do, they have found it the easier to reject Matthew Arnold's attempt to have poetry assume the duties of religion. They have attempted to distinguish art from religion and morality rather than to make art a substitute for religion and morality.)

Another aspect of the n.c. is to be seen in its resolute attempt to set up an organic theory of literature. One of the few things which these critics do have in common is a profound distrust of the old dualism of form and content, and a real sense of the failure of an ornamentalist rhetoric to do justice to the interpenetration of the form and matter achieved in a really well-written work. These critics, then, have attempted to take the full context into account and to see each individual word of a work, not only as contributing to the context, but as deriving its exact meaning from its place in the context. Hence the development of terms like irony, plurisignation, ambiguity, etc., to indicate the richness and complication of meanings developed in a poetic context.

The concern of the new critics with the structure of a work including the intricacies of structure has led to a number of attacks upon this criticism as being too narrowly concerned with the verbal medium. This was the gist of the attack by the University of Chicago critics some years ago in their volume Critics and Criticism; and also, more moderately, of Francis Fergusson in his The Idea of a Theater (1949). Such critics, remembering their Aristotle, would find the soul of a work in its "plot" or "action," and not in the words which they regard as merely the means for exhibiting that action. But this conception of the "verbal medium" seems to deny the organic theory of art—at least as it is interpreted by the "new critics." The kind of distinction proposed seems to reintroduce the old dualism, this time between a nonlinguistic meaning and words as mere husks of meaning. The new critics would refuse to admit any divorce of words from action in any such sense. For they are interested in words as nodes of meaning, and literary form is for them the very organization of meaning.

Here follows a very brief selected bibliography. The works are of varying merit. Some are cited because they represent typical responses to the n.c.: J. C. Ransom, The N.C. (1941); S. Hyman, The Armed Vision (1948); A. Tate, On the Limits of Poetry (1948); W. Elton, A Glossary of the N.C. (rev. ed., 1949); Critiques and Essays in Crit., 1920-1948, ed. R. W. Stallman (1949; extensive bibliog.); D. Daiches, Crit. Approaches to Lit. (1956); Krieger; J. P. Pritchard, Crit. in America (1956); Wellek and Warren, 2d ed.; Wimsatt and Brooks; R. Foster, The New Romantics, a Reappraisal of the N.C. (1962).

C.B.

NEW HUMANISM. See NEO-HUMANISM.

NEW NORSE. A Norwegian language norm constructed by Ivar Aasen (1813-96) from the less adulterated rustic dialects in order to give his country a language directly descended from ON and to provide the rural population, constrained by Dano-Norwegian, with a natural medium of literary expression. In a modest way Aasen proved the poetic viability of his landsmaal (now called nynorsk—New Norse). Formally notable is Haraldshaugen (The Mound of King Harold), in which he achieved a masterly recreation, with addition of end rhyme, of the ON alliterative measure fornyrðislag (q.v.). Of later poets who helped to create the national N.N. poetry envisaged by Aasen may be mentioned Aasmund Vinje, Arne Garborg, and Olav Aukrust, who demonstrated the remarkable power and rich melody of the new medium. In present-day Norway, N.N. enjoys the same official status as the bokmål, a misnomer ("literary language") for Dano-Norwegian.—H. Bourgeois, "Une Langue nouvelle: La 'Landsmaal' norvégienne," Revue de linguistique et de philologie comparée, 43 (1910); I. Lillehei, "Landsmaal and the Language Movement in Norway," JEGP, 13 (1914); O. J. Følness, National Romanticism in Norway (1933). S.L.

NEW ZEALAND POETRY. New Zealand's small and recent literature shows greater diversity and development in poetry than in any other form. Although it is essentially true that this poetry did not begin to mature till after World War I, it began to exist over a century ago. The early settlers were often cultured men, and some wrote verse, like Alfred Domett's Maori epic Ranolf and Amohia (1872), which imitates the more popular romantic and Victorian poets.

A tradition of vernacular rhyming survived in local laureates like John Barr of Craigilee; but the country inherited little that was validly traditional. "Serious" verse, such as that of the journalist and politician Thomas Bracken, was fluent and undistinguished; and the real sense of historic events—exploration, settlement, Maori wars, gold rushes—remained unexpressed. Even when the colonists wrote best, on the country's impressive landscapes, the work was often false-colored by nostalgia for their Eng. "Home."

The 1890's brought modest prosperity, and second-generation settlers became conscious of themselves as a people. William Pember Reeves, Parliamentarian and reformer, spoke in easy and popular verse for the idea of N.Z. as "social laboratory"; the work of Jessie Mackay and Blanche Baughan showed a stronger and more genuine talent. But, on the whole, the anxious desire for a distinctive national literature did not begin to be realized for another generation.

Early 20th-c. writers shared the mediocrity of contemporary Eng. poets who were often their models; but, like certain of the Eng. "Georgians," some achieved significant poetry without radical innovations of manner—Arnold Wall, Alan Mulgan, J. C. Beaglehole, and, even more, Ursula Bethell and Eileen Duggan. Walter D'Arcy Creswell and R. A. K. Mason. Ursula Bethell described the Canterbury scene with virtuosity and an intense contemplative affection. Eileen Duggan has evolved independently the concrete and energetic idiom of her later poems. Creswell and Mason both strike out attitudes toward their country; Creswell's, more highly mannered, expresses the ambivalent emotion of a kind of exasperated love affair; Mason's is that of a Roman stoic, looking on the brevity of life and the fall of empires.

Although many of the poems collected in Kowhai Gold (1930) were still feeble, changes had begun in the 1920's. It is only roughly true to think that the achievements of modern N.Z. poetry began in the 1930's, and to connect them with the depression, political ferment, social anger, and the conscious experience of a growing community finding its place in a disturbed world. N.Z. poets came abreast of European writers—not only the younger Eng. poets (Auden, MacNeice, etc.) with whom they seemed to have most in common, but older masters like Eliot, Pound, or Rilke. It was, however, a transformation rather than a revolution. The whole process can be seen in the work of the versatile "Robin Hyde" (Iris Wilkinson), which develops from late romantic aestheticism to a contemporary idiom; another kind of example is the accomplished traditional verse of J. R. Hervey and Basil Dowl- ing.

The mature work of older poets overlapped with that of younger men, particularly A. R. D. Fairburn, Allen Curnow, Denis Glover, and Charles Brasch. In expression they can be both tough and sensitive, romantic and ironic, as can be seen in a long sequence like Fairburn's Dominion or a short lyric like Brasch's A View of Rangitoto. They have a developed awareness of their own country as well as of the general human situation, most clearly voiced by Curnow, who sees his country's history as a continuing reality in time:

All in that strange sea-dimension
Where Time and Island cross.

At the end of this period it could be seen that N.Z. poetry was coming of age: this is marked by the appearance in 1940 of McCormick's study and M. H. Holcroft's essays (see bibliography), and a few years later, of Curnow's anthology and the first issues of Brasch's periodical, Landfall.

These expressed, among other things, a myth of N.Z. as an island place, distinct in space and time, enigmatic, even hostile, in which the writer could see reflected his own situation, and in discovering which he discovered himself. A body of symbols reflecting this understanding—island, ocean, beach, mountain, "bush"—has arisen naturally and become common to nearly all N.Z. writers, e.g., Ursula

Bethell's The Long Harbour, Creswell's Lyttelton Harbour, Curnow's At Dead Low Water, Fairburn's Letter to a Friend in the Wilderness. The type-figure of the solitary, the unattached man (Mason's swagman, or Glover's Harry or Arawata Bill) links this mental landscape with some significant N.Z. fiction.

Among the most recent poets, there has been a conscious and sometimes factitious reaction against this "myth of insularity." In practice this means that certain writers have widened their range of reference to include more of the urban scene and to accept the influence, e.g., of Baudelaire, Hart Crane, Robert Lowell, or Dylan Thomas. A similar indication is the growing tendency toward the longer poem or sequence, as in Alistair Campbell's Elegy, Keith Sinclair's Ballad of Half-Moon Bay, or Pat Wilson's Staying at Ballisodare. Yet this newer work often represents an extension, rather than an extinction of the island-myth and what it signifies, as can be seen also in the poetry of Kendrick Smithyman, Mary Stanley, Ruth Dallas, and others whose work is represented in Louis Johnson's annual anthology. Most of all it appears with varied range and tone in James K. Baxter, who combines the attitudes of the poète maudit (q.v.) and the bard.

Despite its limited public, N.Z. poetry has been quite liberally published in recent years; and few poets are exempt from the danger of sometimes publishing below themselves. Opportunities for extended criticism are few, and it seems that N.Z. poetry has reached the stage where criticism—and self-criticism—is what it most needs. The writers of the last thirty years have at least produced a body of work upon which such criticism can properly operate.

ANTHOLOGIES: N.Z. Verse, ed. W. F. Alexander and A. E. Currie (1906), rev. but without preface as A Treasury of N.Z. Verse (1926); Kowhai Gold, ed. Q. Pope (1930); Lyric Poems of N.Z., 1928-42, ed. C. A. Marris (n.d.); A Book of N.Z. Verse, 1923-45, ed. A. Curnow (1945; rev. ed. 1950; an important anthol. with preface); N.Z. Poetry Yearbook, ed. L. Johnson (1951-); An Anthol. of N.Z. Verse, ed. R. M. Chapman and J. Bennett (1956; comprehensive and up-to-date); Penguin Book of N.Z. Verse, ed. A. Curnow (1959).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. H. McCormick, Letters and Art in N.Z. (1940); M. H. Holcroft, The Deepening Stream (1940), The Waiting Hills (1943), Encircling Seas (1946, collected as Discovered Isles, 1951); J. C. Reid, Creative Writing in N.Z. (1946, two brief but informative chapters on poetry); J. K. Baxter, Recent Trends in N.Z. Poetry (1951) and The Fire and the Anvil (1955); E. H. McCormick, N.Z. Lit., a Survey (1959; "based on Letters and Art in N.Z.").

M.K.J.

NIBELUNGEN STANZA, Nibelungenstrophe, Kürenbergstrophe. The most important stanza of Middle High German epic poetry, it is named from its use in the Nibelungenlied, although its earliest recorded use is by Der von Kürenberg (fl. 1150-70). It is composed of 2 pairs of lines (Langzeilen). For a long time Heusler's somewhat conjectural analysis of the N. stanza was accepted as authentic: A line consists of 2 hemistichs (Kurzzeilen), of which the first usually contains 4 stresses, the third and fourth stresses occurring in the same word (klingende Kadenz), while in the second hemistich the fourth stress is replaced by a metrical pause (stumpfe Kadenz) except for the last hemistich of the stanza which has 4 stressed syllables. Thus, ending with a full cadence, the stanza has the character of a distinct formal unit. Its basic scheme is as follows:

— / — / — \ — / — / — / —
— / — — \ — / — / — / —
— / — / — \ — / — / — / —
— / — / — \ — / — / — / —

The rhyme scheme for hemistichs 2, 4, 6, 8 is aabb; caesural rhyme occurs occasionally. Modern prosodists (Thomas, Glier) confine themselves to a purely and cautiously descriptive formula according to which hemistichs 1 to 7 contain three stresses each, the eighth 4, and 1, 3, 5, 7 as a rule have feminine and 2, 4, 6, 8 show masculine endings. The use of the N. stanza has continued over the centuries in many variants, e.g., among the Meistersinger (q.v.) as "Hönweis," in the church hymn (P. Gerard, O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden), and in the modern worldly Lied, especially among the romanticists (L. Uhland, Des Sängers Fluch), even in the drama (Z. Werner, Die Söhne des Thals, (1803).—A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgesch. (3 v., 1925-29) and Nibelungensage und Nibelungenlied (4th ed., 1944); P. Habermann, "N. Strophe," Reallexikon, II; F. Panzer, Das Nibelungenlied (1955); U. Pretzel and H. Thomas, "Dt. Verskunst, mit einem Beitrag über altdt. Strophik von H. Thomas," Dt. Philologie im Aufriss, ed. W. Stammer, III (1957); O. Paul and I. Glier, Dt. Metrik (4th ed., 1961).

U.K.G.

NICARAGUAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

NIL VOLENTIBUS ARDUUM (Nothing is Difficult to the Willing). A society of Dutch poets, founded at Amsterdam in 1669 by Lodewijk Meyer, Andries Pels, and others. The major concern of the society was the establishment of Fr. neoclassical artistic principles in Dutch dramatic poetry. The members of the N.V.A. interpreted these principles so strictly that they condemned not only the decadent and sensational drama of Jan Voß and Blasius but also the earlier classical drama of Hooft and Vondel, since regarded as one of the high points of Dutch poetry. Like its earlier counterpart, Samuel Coster's Duytsche Academie, N.V.A. also exerted its influence by giving courses in grammar and philosophy. The writings of its members include Andries Pels' Horatius' Dichtkunst op onze tijden en zeden gepast (Horace's Art of Poetry revised to fit our times and customs, 1677). In 1681, after the death of Meyer and Pels, the society began to decline in influence.—A. J. Kronenberg, Het kunstgenootschap N.V.A. (1875); J. Bauwens, La Tragédie française et le théâtre hollandais au XVII^e s. (1921). F.J.W.

NŌ. This relatively short Japanese dramatic form, employing poetry, prose, patterned movement, dance, and music, was perfected in the 14th c. Adapting with some variations, the traditional syllabic fives and sevens, the poetry is highly allusive and elevated. Such elevated richness, the religious subjects, and the slow tempo of most nō create a drama akin to the Gr., which it further resembles in its use of traditional materials, masks, male performers, and a chorus (that takes no part in the action).

Nō has broadly and rapidly influenced Western drama, nondramatic poetry, and literary criticism since Ezra Pound first received (1914), studied, revised, and published (1916) Ernest Fenollosa's notes and rude translations. Pound felt that nō showed how to write a long Vorticist (i.e., imagist) poem, since he saw in it a technique by which crucial images unified whole plays or passages. He utilized both allusions to nō and this technique of "Unity of Image" in the Cantos by employing certain recurring, archetypal images—e.g., light, the literary journey, and the heavenly visitor to earth—to unify his poem. Often these images take on an additional oriental dimension, since the heavenly visitor to earth may be the central character of the nō Hagoromo as well as Diana; or it may be the Sino-Japanese character for "brightness" combined with other imagery of light.

Pound had discussed his interests with Yeats, who became so absorbed that he completely reshaped his later dramaturgy in the image of nō. On this Japanese model, he fashioned an "aristocratic form" employing a bare stage, masks, dance, a few rhythmic instruments, a chorus not part of the action, and other characteristics of nō. Some of his "Noh plays," as he called them, have elements borrowed from specific nō: e.g., the blue cloth centrally onstage in At the Hawk's Well is modeled on the brocade cloak of Aoi no Ue; and Words

Upon the Window-Pane and The Dreaming of the Bones borrow the Nishikigi motif of unmarried ghostly lovers from a distant past. Yeats seems to have come upon the idea of a unifying-image technique in nō independently of Pound, using it to give coherence to such plays as The Only Jealousy of Emer, Calvary, and A Full Moon in March, through dramatic focus on an object onstage (Cuchulain's body, Christ hanging on the cross) or an imagistic pattern (of moon and cat's eyes). The importance of nō to Yeats can be measured by his use of it to form a new poetic drama, by his use of images and techniques related to it in his nondramatic poems, and by his statement that the Japanese dramatists were more like modern Western man than either Shakespeare or Corneille.

Yeats's enthusiasms, the Fenollosa-Pound adaptations, Arthur Waley's translations and commentaries, and the monumental studies of Noel Peri, Cinq Nō (1929) and Le Nō (1944) have influenced many other playwrights, especially those concerned with the poetic or semiprivate theatre. Yeats induced his friend T. Sturge Moore to write "Noh plays," and such others as Gordon Bottomley and Laurence Binyon soon followed. In Germany, Berthold Brecht conceived his two didactic plays, Der Jasager and Der Neinsager, in the light of Waley's translation of Tanikō; and in France, Paul Claudel, who had seen nō performed in Japan, borrowed techniques for his marionette plays. Similarly, Thornton Wilder modeled the bare-stage technique of Our Town in part upon nō and has adapted the waki (deuteragonist) and the chorus of nō into a raisonneur for many plays. Such other, lesser known writers as S. Foster Damon and Paul Goodman have written plays modeled on nō, and Stark Young's Flower in Drama uses earlier ideas about nō as anti-naturalistic dramatic criteria. If haiku (q.v.) has influenced more Western poets than any Japanese or other non-European form in this century, the nō may be credited with having produced a larger amount of first-rate literature, especially in Eng., through its influence upon dramatists and poets. See also JAPANESE POETRY.—W. B. Yeats, Intro. to Certain Noble Plays of Japan (1916); A. Nicoll, World Drama (1949); D. Keene, Japanese Lit. (1953); E. Miner, The Japanese Tradition in British and Am. Lit. (1958). E.M.

NONSENSE VERSE is, quite simply, a type of verse which does not make sense. Although seemingly obvious, the point is worth making because to most people, including the compilers of many so-called nonsense anthologies, any verse which relates an absurd or improbable story, or makes extensive use of exaggenerated parody, far-fetched rhymes and neologisms, is nonsense. Yet, a great deal of this kind of verse depends for its effect not on the reader's willingness to accept it as n. but on a recognition of the writer's ingenuity. This is especially true of many so-called n. limericks, whose appeal lies not so much in their subject matter as in the dexterity of the writer in finding suitable rhymes for the most improbable words. Such a limerick as this cannot rightly be called n.:

There was a sculptor named Phidias Whose statues were perfectly hideous;
He made Aphrodite
Without any nightie
And shocked the ultra-fastidious.

Similarly, parody cannot be called n., because its appeal lies in the writer's ingenuity, in his ability to suggest by means of distorted exaggeration the writer he is parodying. For all its absurdity, a poem such as Cuthbert Bede's In Immemorial is not really n.:

We seek to know, and knowing seek;
We seek, we know, and every sense
Is trembling with the great intense,
And vibrating to what we speak.

We ask too much, we seek too oft;
We know enough and should no more;
And yet we skim through Fancy's lore
And look to earth and not aloft.

Perhaps closer to n. are those verses which invert the natural order of things, but it is doubtful whether they are really pure n. The very consistency of the inversion suggests that behind the poem lies a rational intellect displaying its skill in a systematic reversal of the expected. The following anonymous poem is typical:

'Tis midnight and the setting sun
Is slowly rising in the west.
The rapid rivers slowly run.
The frog is on his downy nest.
The pensive goat and sportive cow
Hilarious, leap from bough to bough.

This is not really a n. world: it is simply an inversion of the normal one, and our appreciation is the result of recognizing the deviations from the familiar. Similarly, a poem such as Thackeray's The Sorrows of Werther, included in Carolyn Wells's nonsense anthology, is not pure n. either, because here again the effect depends on our recognition of how normal people behave and noting the way Werther and Charlotte contradict the expected:

Werther had a love for Charlotte
Such as words could never utter;

Would you know how first he met her?
She was cutting bread and butter.

Charlotte was a married lady,
And a moral man was Werther,
And for all the wealth of Indies
Would do nothing for to hurt her.

So he sigh'd and pined and ogled
And his passion boil'd and bubbled,
Till he blew his silly brains out
And was no more by it troubled.

Charlotte having seen his body
Borne before her on a shutter,
Like a well-conducted person
Went on cutting bread and butter.

None of these verses can properly be called n., because appreciation depends not on a willingness to accept the irrational laws of topsy-turvydom so much as a recognition of the writer's ingenuity or clear-headed common sense. Pure n. is entirely dependent on the rejection of what most people consider logical or even normal and an acceptance of the conventions of a completely different universe.

This fact is convincingly demonstrated in the limericks of Edward Lear. In his verses the Old Men and Old Women persist in a behavior so palpably absurd that it outrages the sensibilities of all those proper and sensible people whom Lear refers to quite simply as "They." Such is the case concerning the

. . . Old Man in a Garden
Who always begged everyone's pardon,
When they asked him, What for?
He replied, "You're a bore!
And I trust you'll get out of my garden."

In this instance "They" were apparently sent about their business, but quite frequently "They" make life extremely unpleasant for the eccentrics. The Old Man of Montrose, "who walked on the tips of his toes," was told that his behavior was not at all "pleasant" and that he was "a stupid Old Man of Montrose"; and "They" even went to the extreme of "smashing" the Man of Whitehaven, whose only sin was to dance with a raven. N. simply cannot exist in the world of common sense and the Old Person of Basing who . . . purchased a steed

Which he rode at full speed
And escaped from the people of Basing did indeed show "a presence of mind that was amazing," for he realized that freedom for pure n. could only be obtained in a place where the conventions of common sense were completely disregarded.

The world of pure n. is an autonomous world, a world which operates according to its own laws and into which sane people can never really penetrate. It is true that we can make some sense out of Lewis Carroll's "Jabberwocky," but it is doubtful whether we could manage without Humpty Dumpty's gloss in chapter 5 of Through the Looking Glass. Consider the opening four lines for example:

'Twas brillig and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
And mimsy were the borogroves
And the mome raths outrabe.

It may be that we do not need to be told that "slithy" is a "portmanteau" word derived from "lithe" and "slimy," or that "gyre" means "to go round and round like a gyroscope," but certainly, without Humpty Dumpty telling us that "toves" are "something like badgers . . . something like lizards . . . something like corkscrews," or that a "rath" is "a sort of green pig," we would be at a loss to account for their appearance. Although by exercising our ingenuity we can make some sense of Carroll's coinages and even arrive at an approximate meaning of the poem, we cannot go further. The Jabberwocky world remains a rather forbidding place where strange creatures move and behave in an incomprehensible way, and even though the Jabberwock is slain in a most appalling manner we remain quite unmoved by his death, because he bears so little resemblance to anything which is even remotely familiar.

It is one of the characteristics of pure n. that the most violent things can happen without evoking in us the slightest compassion or sympathy, as in this limerick of Lear's, for example:

There was an Old Man who screamed out Whenever they knocked him about
So they took off his boots, and fed him on fruits
And continued to knock him about.

The idea of an old man being subjected to such barbarous treatment is discomforting, no matter how flippantly it is expressed. Yet, in this limerick there is not the faintest assault on our sensibilities. However, if for the third line we substitute, "So they averted their eyes and stifled his cries," the result, although not profoundly moving, at least causes us some emotional unease. The reason for the change of effect lies in the substitution of a logical statement for a blatantly illogical one, which focuses the reader's attention on certain elements natural to such a situation—the inability of the knockers about to look at the old man and the necessity they feel for stifling his cries—rather than to the irrelevant taking off of the Old Man's boots and the feeding him fruits.

It is not simply that our sympathy is diverted by the illogical behavior of Lear's knockers-about; we are drawn even further from emotional participation by the writer's choice of two objects, "boots" and "fruits," which carry no emotional significance at all. These two words are, in Coleridgean terms, "fixities and definites" and the poem as a whole is evidently the product of the Fancy. "The Fancy," wrote Coleridge, "... has no other counters to play with, but fixities and definites. The Fancy is indeed no other than a mode of Memory emancipated from the order of time and space; while it is blended with and modified by that empirical phenomenon of the will, which we express by the word CHOICE. But equally with the ordinary memory the Fancy must receive all its material ready made from the law of association." Change "association" to "dissociation" and this is a remarkably just description of the process behind the making of a poem of pure n. All pure n. adopts a similar technique, for it is only by concentrating our attention on "fixed" and "definite" irrelevancies that we can exclude the emotions and so avoid the reader's sympathetic involvement with the events in the poem.

This theory is confirmed by the emphasis on precision and regularity in n. verse. We are reminded in The Walrus and the Carpenter, for example, that it would take "Seven maids with seven mops," sweeping for "half a year" to clear away the sand from the beach where the oysters dwell, and the Old Person whose habits "induced him to feed upon rabbits" actually ate eighteen before he turned green. The meticulous regularity of the rhythms of n. verse is another way in which we are reminded of the "fixed" and "definite" nature of the n. world, and of course the fact that so many writers of n. have felt it necessary to support their writing with precise line-drawings so as to indicate the character and appearance of their creations, is still another way by which these writers direct our attention to definite things and keep our imagination and sympathy from intruding.

In some n. verse, however, we see beyond the "fixities and definites" to an emotional reality which transcends the n. Such poems owe more to Coleridge's Imagination than Fancy. Coleridge maintained that the ideal poet "... diffuses a tone and spirit of unity, that blends, and (as it were) fuses each into each, by that synthetic and magical power, to which we have exclusively appropriated the name of imagination. This power, first put in action by the will and understanding, and retained under their irremissive, though gentle and unnoticed control (laxis effertur habenis) reveals itself in the balance or reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities . . . and while it blends and harmonises the natural and the artificial, still subordinates art to nature, the manner to the matter; and our admiration of the poet to our sympathy with the poetry."

This definition of what Coleridge considers as the highest kind of poetical activity, also describes quite accurately such a poem as Lear's The Dong with the Luminous Nose. Here, in contrast to, say, Lewis Carroll's The Walrus and the Carpenter, Lear does indeed "blend" the "natural and the artificial," for he subordinates his ingenuity to the sympathetic portrayal of the "natural" behavior of the forsaken Dong, and while we admire the poet's technical virtuosity we also feel "sympathy" for this unfortunate creature, jilted by his Jumbly girl and ever in search of her.

The essential difference between The Dong with the Luminous Nose and The Walrus and the Carpenter is that behind Lear's poem we can sense the personality of the poet. Lear was himself a pathetically ugly, restless wanderer who traveled extensively, evidently seeking some kind of repose, and although Carroll, too, was a timid, unhappy man, he did not subconsciously dramatize his predicament as Lear seems to have done. In Carroll's n. world, particularly in the "Alice" stories, the emotions are rigorously excluded and the particulars are presented with an unequivocal precision. On the other hand, Lear, in the "Dong" poem, presents a world of evocative vagueness, similar to that of the Gothic imagination:

When awful darkness and silence reign
Over the great Gromboolian plain,
Through the long, long wintry nights;—
When the angry breakers roar
As they beat on the rocky shore;—
When storm-clouds brood on the towering heights
Of the hills of the Chankly Bore:—
Then, through the vast and gloomy dark,
There moves what seems a fiery spark,
A lonely spark with silvery rays
Piercing the coal-black night,—
A meteor strange and bright:—
Hither and thither the vision strays,
A single lurid light.

The Dong with the Luminous Nose does, in fact, evoke a natural, sympathetic response, which makes one hesitate to call it n.

Possibly, Lear's poem has as much right to be called surrealist as n. Certainly, the line between n. verse and surrealism (q.v.) is often difficult to distinguish. Influenced by Freudian theories of the unconscious, by the ideal of free association, by Jungian concepts of the archetypal, or perhaps just out of boredom with existing poetic modes, many artists in the 20th c. have produced poetry very similar to n. Such poetry, however, is based on a serious theory of poetic communication. As Sir Herbert Read remarked in an essay occasioned by the London Surrealist Exhibition of 1936, "surrealism is . . . the romantic principle in art" and takes its form and substance from the individual unconscious of the creator; therefore such a poem as the following, which many people might regard as n., has an emotional quality suggesting the workings of the Coleridgean imagination:

du dubon dubonnet
the snake laughs brightly rumble rumble rumble in the infinite womb of dreams
i in my isolation
asking the way

Here, the opening line recalls the signs that flash past in the Paris metro, and once we recognize this, most of the other details of the poem fall into place. The actual meaning of the poem may still be obscure, but at least the reader is able to discern the controlling image which holds the poem together. It should be noted, however, that in so far as surrealism is a formal program for the exploitation of the unconscious—an idea emphasized by surrealism's chief theoretician, André Breton, in his First Surrealist Manifesto (1924)—it differs from n., which is opposed to all programs.

N. then, occupies the narrow ground between wit and humor on the one hand, and surrealism on the other. Although at first sight it has the appearance of being a fairly prolific genre, there is surprisingly little true n. verse. Pure n. is completely negative in its effect. The poet must avoid the temptation to turn an amusing phrase or relate a recognizably humorous anecdote, and he must be equally cautious of allowing his imagination to intrude. It is essentially a poetry of escape, a conscious refusal to communicate anything which could be considered positive, a form which demands unceasing control and a disposition more cerebral than emotional. Hence, it is not surprising that the two most successful n. writers in Eng. were not poets at all, but men engaged in work which demanded precision and exactness—Lear, a professional illustrator of scientific books of natural history, and Carroll, a professor of mathematics.

G. K. Chesterton, The Defendant (1902); A N. Anthol., ed. C. Wells (1903); E. Cammaerts, The Poetry of N. (1925); L. Reed, The Complete Limerick Book (1925); A. L. Huxley, Essays New and Old (1927); C. L. Dodgson, The Complete Works of Lewis Carroll, illustrated by J. Tenniel (1936); Surrealism, ed. H. Read (1936); E. Partridge, Here, There and Everywhere (1950); E. Lear, The Complete N. of Edward Lear, ed. and introd. H. Jackson (1951); E. Sewell, The Field of N. (1952); G. Orwell, Shooting an Elephant (1954).

See also the discussion of the German Christian Morgenstern as an intermediate figure between Carroll and Lear and the surrealists in L. W. Forster, Poetry of Significant N. (1962).

J.M.M.

NORSE PROSODY. See OLD GERMANIC PROSODY.

NORSKE SELSKAB, DET (The Norwegian Society). A social-literary club (1772-1812) of Norwegian students, teachers, and writers resident in Copenhagen. It carried on the inheritance from Fr. neoclassicism and Eng. empiricism and opposed Klopstockianism and its Danish adherents. Some poets associated with it were Johan Nordahl Brun (1745-1816), Claus Frimann (1746-1829), Thomas Rosing de Stockfleth (1743-1808), Johan Herman Wessel (1742-85), and Jens Zetlitz (1761-1821). The poetic endeavors of the members comprised most neoclassical genres, from heroic drama and fables in verse to elegy and epigram. Worthy of note as Norway's first national-historical play is Brun's Einar Tambskielver (1772). By the emphasis it placed on the use of Norwegian subject matter in poetry and on a national manner of treatment, the society laid the foundations for the literary renaissance that came with Henrik Wergeland. —F. Bull, Fra Holberg til Nordal Brun (1916); A. H. Winsnes, Det norske Selskab, 1772-1812 (1924).

S.L.

NORWEGIAN POETRY. At the height of the Middle Ages (ca. 1250), when the tradition of ON poetry (q.v.) had ceased to inspire any major literary activity, the vogue of versified Fr. romances and troubadour poetry overshadowed any individual creations in the vernacular. The chief original poetic monuments of the age are the folk ballads, which employed a new, nonalliterative style derived from troubadour verse. In spirit and form they are close to the Eng. and Scotch ballads, with their hero worship and dramatic narrative. A ballad of a special kind is Draumkvæde (The Dream Ballad), a superb example of visionary poetry unique in Scandinavian literature. The poem, whose narrator-dreamer visits the "other world" and attends a Last Judgment reminiscent of Ragnarok, is notable for its perfect synthesis of the pagan and Christian traditions.

The first known poet of significance to Norway was the Dane Anders Arrebo (See DANISH POETRY), who was for a time bishop of Trondheim; the epic narrative of his Hexaëmeron is interspersed with passages describing Northern Norway. Petter Dass (1647-1707), the first Norw. poet of stature, continued Arrebo's topographical poetry in Nordlands Trompet (The Trumpet of Nordland, ca. 1700; pr. 1739) in a meter and style strictly his own. His religious poetry embraces versifications of Biblical stories as well as paraphrases of Luther's Catechism. The verse of Dass is in feeling and tone close to folk poetry.

With Ludvig Holberg (See DANISH POETRY) a Norw. writer attained European dimensions. Holberg (1684-1750), who spent most of his mature years in Denmark and wrote his comedies and satires largely about Danish conditions, is significant for Norw. literature mainly because of his brilliant example. Still Danish subjects, his countrymen drew faith in their creative talent from this example and, besides, derived from it an enduring conception of poetry as criticism of life. The first ambition of Norw. poets, however, was misdirected; the poetic tragedy in neoclassical Fr. style which they endeavored to create in the 1770's was not a success. The only memorable result was the delightful tragic parody Kierlighed uden Strømper (Love Without Stockings, 1772) by Johan Herman Wessel (1742-85), a successor to Holberg whose elegant ironical satire, embodied in graceful alexandrines, put an end to the imitation of It. opera and Fr. tragedy. Wessel also wrote some excellent comic narratives, like Smeden og Bageren (The Blacksmith and the Baker), in which conversational passages in free rhythm vary with epigrammatic couplets. The second principal genre practiced by the poets of this period—most of whom, like Wessel, belonged to Det norske Selskab, q.v. (The Norw. Society)—was the descriptive poem, composed in an individual and national spirit. Claus Frimann (1746-1829) evoked in simple, fresh language the life of peasant and fisherman. Hornelen, a descriptive poem by his brother Peder Harboe Frimann (1759-1839), deviated from earlier nature poetry both in its subject, a stark wild mountain, and in its unconventional style. Edvard Storm (1749-94) wrote some truly original nature lyrics in dialect, Dølevisor (Dalesmen's Songs), which express to perfection the spirit of the Norw. seasons.

Whereas in Denmark and Sweden romanticism had already produced a great poetry by the first and second decade of the 19th c. respectively, Norway experienced a similar awakening only in the 1830's and 1840's. The manner of this awakening was determined by the persisting cultural dominance of Denmark, despite the political independence which Norway had gained in 1814. The 1830's precipitated a "culture feud," the issue of which was whether to follow the ideas of the Danish romanticism or to disregard the "400 years of darkness" and create a literature on purely native grounds. Also involved was the question of what formal principles should guide the new poetry. Henrik Arnold Wergeland (1808-45), leader of the Patriots, was a man of supreme gifts and inexhaustible energies; his activities ranged from those of political editor, orator, and popular educator to those of satirical farceur, heaven-storming dramatist, and sublime lyricist. A born genius to whom poetry meant rapture and accordingly tended to create its own free design, he contrasted diametrically with the leader of the Intelligentsia Party, Johan Sebastian Welhaven (1807-73), a poet of quiet reflection who, following the Danish poet-critic J. L. Heiberg, emphasized the necessity of a chiseled form. The traditions established by these two men have thenceforth coexisted in Norw. poetry, although by 1900 they tended to interweave.

Wergeland defies classification. In some ways he fulfilled the era of Enlightenment ushered in by Holberg; but he was also Norway's first great romantic poet. His philosophical rationalism, suffused with a mystical pantheism similar to Shelley's, was expressed in Skabelsen, Mennesket og Messias (Creation, Man, and Messiah, 1830), an enormous lyrical drama which he himself called an "epic of humanity." Its publication caused an attack by Welhaven, who criticized the poem for its inflated imagery and lack of form. Subsequently, Welhaven wrote Norges Dæmring (The Dawn of Norway, 1834), a series of sonnets in epigrammatic style exposing not only Wergeland's artistic deficiencies, but also the uncritical cultural nationalism of the Patriots. Wergeland's achievement as a narrative and lyric poet, however, is impressive. His best narratives are Jøden (The Jew, 1842), Jødinden (The Jewess, 1844), and Den engelske Lods (The Eng. Pilot, 1844). A poem sui generis is Jan van Huysums Blomsterstykke (Jan van Huysum's Flowerpiece, 1840), a sensitively imaginative interpretation of a work of art in story form. Among shorter lyrics, Til min Gyldenlak (To My Wallflower) and Til Foraaret (To Spring) are supreme.

Only in the 1840's did Norw. literature develop a romanticism of the kind initiated in Denmark by Oehlenschläger. This romanticism defined itself largely by a diligent search for the values hidden in the folk culture. An important step in this search was the recording of the native ballads, a work begun by Jørgen Moe (1813-82) and continued by M. B. Landstad (1802-80), whose collection Norske Folkeviser (Norw. Folk Ballads, 1853) exerted a broad influence on poetry. The New Norse (q.v.) movement, originated by Ivar Aasen (1813-96) as a means of giving the rural population its own literary medium, was another manifestation of National Romanticism. Of the more important poets, Welhaven was in his later phase a National Romantic: his poetry of personal reminiscence was broadened to embrace the entire country and its historical past, which he celebrated in the tone of ballad or romance. In his nature poems he introduced fairies and trolls to suggest an authentic native atmosphere.

National Romanticism reached its climax with Ibsen and Bjørnson, beside Wergeland the greatest Norw. poets of the 19th c. Together with them may be mentioned the New Norse writer Aasmund Vinje (1818-70), unique both as poet and critic. The two decades from 1850 to 1870 were a transition period in which realism and romanticism coexisted, a fact clearly exemplified by Vinje, a Norw. Heine whose double vision shuttled him back and forth between sublime pathos and sardonic irony. To his romantic output belongs the first authentic lyricism of the Norw. mountains, at the same time intimate and magnificently grand. Henrik Ibsen (1828-1906) carried on the Welhaven tradition in Norw. literature, both in his National-Romantic and in his satirical poetry. But despite influences, among which Heine was another, everything Ibsen wrote is impregnated with an individual style. His concentrated, even laconic, lyric verse is singularly powerful, conveying its meaning, often symbolic, with a minimum of imagery. Ibsen's chief poetic contribution to National Romanticism was the drama Gildet paa Solhaug (The Feast at Solhaug, 1856), a historical idyll metrically and stylistically influenced by the ballad. With Kjærlighedens Komedie (The Comedy of Love, 1862), which from a Kierkegaardian point of view satirized bourgeois materialism, a realistic period began. The poetry, in skipping iambic pentameters with varying rhyme, abounds in caricature and paradox. Brand (1866), more somber in mood, is an impressive dramatic statement of Ibsen's central theme, the "contradiction between aspiration and ability, between will and possibility." In this play, as in Peer Gynt (1867), the satirist in Ibsen became fused with the National Romantic. For at the same time as they scathingly satirized the Norw. national character, they cast a romantic glamor over the Norw. landscape—with its lakes and rivers, its fabled fjords and mountain peaks. In Peer Gynt, moreover, Ibsen succeeded in portraying dramatic symbols which have universal as well as national significance. The major theme—the fanciful, self-indulgent man ultimately saved, if saved at all, through a noble woman's love—recalls both the Divine Comedy and Faust, a fact which suggests the scope and depth of Ibsen's vision. Formally, also, Peer Gynt is superior to Brand.

Whereas in Brand iambic knittelvers (q.v.) determines the movement throughout, in Peer Gynt the predominantly trochaic rhythm alternates with anapaestic parts where a more conversational effect was desired. Ibsen amply demonstrated in his plays, especially in Peer Gynt, the effectiveness of the Norw. language as a poetic-dramatic medium, capable of infinite variations of rhythm and melody. As such a medium, Norw. seems to possess greater expressiveness than either Danish, whose verbal music is subdued and rhythm unemphatic, or Swedish, whose rich sonority and surging rhythm may prevent dramatic transparency.

Whereas Ibsen focused his attention on the individual and at times represented attitudes which approach l'art pour l'art and anarchism, Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson (1832-1910), who considered himself literary heir to Wergeland, was concerned with the individual's duty toward society and the world. His saga dramas, Halte-Hulda (Lame Hulda, 1858), Kong Sverre (1861), and Sigurd Slembe (1862), were deliberately undertaken in order to give his country a national gallery of dramatic heroes to match those of other European countries, an ambition which accorded with the National-Romantic program. Dramatically, these plays were not successful; their chief merits are historical verisimilitude and a saga tone. It was as narrative and lyric poet that Bjørnson excelled. Arnljot Gelline (1870), his greatest narrative poem, is a cycle of 15 romances in various measures in the style of Oehlenschläger's Helge, Tegnér's Frithiofs saga, and Runeberg's Kung Fjalar. The imagery is profusely rich, the diction colloquial and varied; and the meter, mostly trochaic and dactylic, is skillfully attuned to the changing moods. As a lyric poet Bjørnson bears comparison with the best European masters. Notable is the influence of classical sculpture, the effects of which are clearly perceptible, for example, in Olav Trygvason and Bergljot (in Digte og Sange, 1870); within a few dramatically tense scenes these poems present an entire tragic action. Worthy of special mention is Salme II, a magnificent hymn to ever resurgent life which both intellectually and technically marks the high-point of his lyricism.

When, after the prosaic 1870's and 1880's, poetry again appeared, it sounded a more personal note, often produced by an intimate fusion of individualism and nature mysticism; and the poets moved as much in the realm of fantasy as in actuality. Fr. symbolism—largely as mediated by Swedish and Danish neoromantic poetry—Nietzsche, and the painting of Edvard Munch were the principal sources of inspiration. The most important exponents of fin de siècle moods were Vilhelm Krag (1871-1933) and Sigbjørn Obstfelder (1866-1900), the former expressing a rather conventional melancholy, the latter celebrating the wondrous mystery of life in a highly original form characterized by repetitions, abrupt transitions, pauses, and incompleteness. A contrasting temperament was that of Nils Collett Vogt (1864-1937), a radical child of the 1880's who, however, attained poetic maturity only with the collection Fra vaar til høst (From Spring to Fall) published in 1894. Here, in the spirit of Swinburne, he sang dithyrambs in praise of an individualistic classical paganism. In his later work Vogt followed the Wergeland-Bjørnson tradition, both formally and intellectually. Also New Norse poetry had a revival in the 1890's, through the work of Arne Garborg (1851-1924) and Per Sivle (1857-1904). Although best known as a naturalistic novelist, Garborg gave in Haugtussa (The Hill Innocent) and I Helheim (In Hel's Home) a unique expression to the contemporary need for a religious conception of life. Both poems evoke uncannily the dark forces in man and nature. Neoromantic in inspiration is also the poetry of Knut Hamsun (1859-1952) and Hans E. Kinck (1865-1926), both best known as novelists. Det vilde Kor (The Wild Chorus, 1904) showed Hamsun as a supreme lyricist, ranging in tone from the personal mood of mystical recollection in Skjærgaardsø to the national chords of his anniversary salute to Bjørnson (Bjørnson paa hans 70-Aars Fødselsdag). Kinck's dramatic poem Driftekaren (The Drover, 1908) in unmusical but richly textured verse explores the division the poet discerned in the Norw. folk psyche, torn between conventional rationalism and imaginative vision.

About 1910 a lyric breakthrough came about in Norway, largely due to Hermann Wildenvey (b. 1886) and Olaf Bull (1883-1933). Inspired by Hamsun's Det vilde Kor, Wildenvey brought a new spirit as well as a new rhythm and style into poetry. A fresh paganism animates his seductive erotic lyrics in Nyinger (Bonfires, 1907); pantheism pervades his regional nature poetry. His verse is identified by the anapaestic, "billowy" line, which lends itself to conversational, but highly melodious, effects. His diction, compounded of elements from Bible and folk song as well as from jargon and slang, is arresting and brilliantly original. Undoubtedly the greatest Norw. lyricist in this century, Bull was Wildenvey's opposite both in temperament and formal talent. Symbolist in conception, his work is profoundly personal, centered on the tensions of inner experience. Usually starting with a minimum of observation, the poems are given substance by a powerful visionary imagination and provided with philosophical perspective by a mind schooled in Bergson and in modern science.

Especially notable, both for its intellectual scope and its imaginative transmutation of scientific abstractions, is the grandiose cosmic fantasy Ignis Ardens (1929), an artistic synthesis of the evolution of life on a Bergsonian basis.

New Norse poetry found worthy exponents in Olav Aukrust (1883-1929) and Tore Ørjasæter (b. 1886), in whose works religious and philosophical problems are treated in a national spirit and in a form deriving from the Edda and the ballad. Aukrust masterfully demonstrated the technical possibilities of NN, especially for the expression of elemental passion and grotesque humor. In these areas the power of NN, with its wide range of vowels and diphthongs and its strong rhythm, comes close to that of Swedish. The few lines below from Aukrust's principal work Himmelvarden (The Cairn Against the Sky, 1916) will suggest the kind of expressiveness the language possesses:

Grøne havmerri skumblaut ris,
fræuden voggar
og velt um lenderne,— kvart eit andlit vert bleikt som is, og stormflod-fjelli stig inn på strenderne.
Skume dagen vert svart som natti, og eldingregn gjennom myrkret susar. . . .

Look at the sea horse, green-soaked, rise!
The surf rocks
And breaks about its flanks,—
Every face becomes pale as ice,
And the storm-ridden flood mounts on the banks.
Dusky day turns black as night, And lightning rain whizzes through the dark. . . .

In the 1920's, a rich period in Norw. literature, two intellectual currents clashed—a liberal conservatism of Christian inspiration and a radical socialism allied with psychoanalysis. The above NN poets represented the former; a leading radical was Arnulf Øverland (b. 1889), whose great powers, evidenced in Brød og vin (Bread and Wine, 1919), were called forth by World War I. Much of his poetry is inspired by a religious devotion to the ideal of socialism, interpreted humanistically, often in biblical symbols. Øverland's suppressed fire, truncated poetic form, and monumental use of simple unadorned words mark him as the latest great Norw. poet in the Welhaven-Ibsen tradition. The best work of Nordahl Grieg (1902-43) and Gunnar Reiss-Andersen (b. 1896) belongs to the 1930's and later. In his ceaseless activity reminiscent of Wergeland, Grieg wrote chiefly socially oriented patriotic poetry, in a style of impassioned magniloquence. His greatest success was Krigsdikter (War Poems, 1945), where his rhetorical pathos was poetically justified. Reiss-Andersen, whose sheer formal talent has no equal in Norw. poetry, combines sensitivity to the everyday idyll with a broad social awareness. Remarkable for its imaginative scope, rhythmical virtuosity, and colorful imagery is Norsk freske (Norw. Frieze), written in Swedish exile during the German occupation. Two other poets, Emil Boyson (b. 1899) and Rolf Jacobsen (b. 1907), were significant as fore-runners of poetic modernism in Norway. Jacobsen created an objective poetry, characterized by free verse and technical imagery, through which he rendered the life of the modern city.

Of the poets who came to maturity in the 1940's, Inger Hagerup (b. 1905) has produced condensed love lyrics reminiscent of Øverland; André Bjerke (b. 1918) composes highly finished verse of elegant sensuousness; and Claes Gill (b. 1910) writes reflective poetry in the surrealist manner. Notable is a group of vers librists strongly influenced by modern Am. and Eng. poetry. Of these, Per Arneberg (b. 1901), whose work shows a deep affinity with Whitman's lyricism, has rendered Song of Myself into Norw.; Paal Brekke (b. 1923), the most self-consciously modernistic poet, has translated The Waste Land by T. S. Eliot. NN poetry, fairly represented by the enraptured and musical verse of Tormod Skagestad (b. 1920), remained strongly imbued with National Romanticism. The 1950's witnessed a debate between the traditionalists—headed by Arnulf Øverland, the uncrowned poet laureate—and the modernists. The latter looked either, like Erling Christie (b. 1928), to T. S. Eliot or, like Carl Keilhau (1919-57), to Rilke and modern Danish poets. Of great significance to the movement has been Tarjei Vesaas' adherence to modernism in his lyric production, which has maintained a steady flow from 1946 on; in adopting this style, Vesaas (b. 1897), who is the leading writer of fiction in NN, has shown that a tenacious traditionalism is not necessarily part of the NN poetic idiom. Other modernists are Astrid Hjertenæs Andersen (b. 1915), Harald Sverdrup (b. 1923), and Gunvor Hofmo (b. 1921); of the youngest generation of poets, Per Bronken and Stein Mehren show unusual promise. The great number, besides, of excellent traditional poets will guarantee the future continuance of the two Norw. poetic traditions, those of Wergeland and Welhaven. Also, undoubtedly, satire will continue to hold an important place, as will national and religious pathos, all elements which have been present in Norw. poetry from its very beginning.

WORKS AND ANTHOLOGIES: B. Bjørnson, Arnljot Gelline, tr. W. W. Payne (1917; annotated); H. Ibsen, Peer Gynt, tr. W. and C.

Archer (1923); The Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse, ed. E. W. Gosse and W. A. Craigie (1925); Anthol. of Norw. Lyrics, tr. C. W. Stork (1942); Eagle Wings: Poetry by Bjørnson, Ibsen and Wergeland, tr. A. G. Dehly (1943); Norsk litt. gjennom 1000 år, ed. E. and V. Skard (3 v., 1948); Modern Norw. Poems, tr. I. Allwood (1949); Norsk lyrikk gjennom tusen år, ed. C. Kent (2d ed., by E. Kielland, 2 v., 1950; a compreh. anthol.); 20th C. Scandinavian Poetry, ed. M. Allwood (1950); P. Dass, The Trumpet of Nordland, tr. T. Jorgenson (1954); Den unge lyrikken 1939-1954, ed. P. Brekke (1956).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. W. Gosse, Northern Studies (1890); P. H. Wicksteed, Four Lectures on Ibsen (1892); I. Grøndal and O. Raknes, Chapters in Norw. Lit. (1923); K. Elster, "Three Lyric Poets of Norway," ASR, 13 (1925); H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Lit. from Brandes to Our Own Day, tr. I. Anderson (1929); F. Bull, "Bjørnsons lyrikk," Streiftog i norsk litt. (1931); T. Jorgenson, Hist. of Norw. Lit. (1933); K. Elster, Illustrert norsk litteraturh. (2d ed., 2 v., 1934-35; an illuminating crit. hist.); F. Bull, Henrik Ibsens Peer Gynt (1947); H. Schneider, Gesch. der norwegischen und isländischen Lit. (1948); E. Bredsdorff et al., An Introd. to Scandinavian Lit. (1951; a useful short survey); J. Lescoffier, Hist. de la litt. norvégienne (1952); F. Bull et al., Norsk litteraturh. (6 v., 1924-55; standard lit. hist.); H. Beyer, A Hist. of Norw. Lit., ed. and tr. E. Haugen (1956; best survey in Eng.); G. C. Schoofield, "The Recent Scandinavian Lyric," BA, 36 (1962). S.L.

NOVAS RIMADAS (in the plural, even for a single composition). A Prov. nonlyric poem, ordinarily written in octosyllabic rhymed couplets. Both narrative and didactic poems are so named, though the original meaning of the word was surely "tale," like the modern Fr. nouvelle and other words of similar derivation.—J. Anglade, Hist. sommaire de la litt. méridionale (1921). F.M.C.

NUMBER(S). (a) The prosodical meters of both classic and modern poetry; hence, (b) poems, lines, strophes, etc. As originally applied to quantitatively scanned poetry, the notion of "numbers" involved the idea of metrical proportion, and was thus linked to the proportions of musical harmonies (and, in the Middle Ages, of musical rhythm). In the Renaissance, "numbers" simply means poetry in general, although the extension to music and musical compositions may also be invoked, as in "In full harmonic number joined . . ." (Milton, Paradise Lost 4. 687); the most general sense of musico-mathematical proportion is preserved in such commonplace references to Plato as one affirming that he held that "the mynd was made of certaine harmonie and musically numbers" (E. K., Gloss to Spenser's Shepheardes Calender "October" 27). Ing argues for an Elizabethan distinction between "number," or mere syllable-count, and "numbers," used in its traditional sense for quantitative prosody.—St. Augustine, De Musica; Elizabethan Crit. Essays, ed. G. G. Smith (1904); C. M. Ing, Elizabethan Lyrics (1951). J.H.

NURSERY RHYMES. A nursery rhyme may be defined as a rhyme or verse preserved in the world of children. Examples are:

Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall,
Humpty Dumpty had a great fall—
All the King's horses and all the King's men Couldn't put Humpty Dumpty together again.

Rain, rain, go away,
Come again another day.

The origins of the r. are manifold, but except for lullabies and those verses which accompany infant games ("This little piggy") very few originated in the nursery. Material from adult life was introduced to children either for reason or by accident, often simply because of its memorability; that material which proved popular with the children survived, and with surprisingly little alteration, despite the fact that some of it disappeared from print for two centuries at a time.

Peter Opie estimates that at least one-fourth, and probably one-half, of the r. known to Eng.-speaking children today are more than 200 years old. It is impossible to be precise about the age of most of the verses. "White bird featherless" appears in L. in the 10th c.; "Two legs sat upon three legs" in Bede, "Thirty days hath September" in Fr. in the 13th c., "Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John" in German in the 15th c.; but it is likely that these r. existed many, perhaps hundreds, of years before they were set down. References in Gr., Roman, and Oriental literatures would indicate that children's games and verses analogous to ours were known in these cultures, and some scholars believe that some "classic" r. (e.g., "Buck, buck," "Humpty Dumpty") are thousands of years old. The theory would be supported by the prevalence of a number of the r. or their analogues throughout Europe. One cannot of course ignore the likelihood that many were carried from country to country by armies, travelers, missionaries, and, in latter days, translators; many Eng. r. have been translated into Hindustani, Malayan, Russian, etc. But the possibility exists that some of the lore came down in an unbroken line from the ancient world.

It is possible to trace the sources (or define the types) of many of the later r.—those of the last 300 years. Some of these sources are: (1) Songs. These include ballads and folk songs ("One misty moisty morning"); drinking songs ("I've got sixpence"); war songs ("The King of France went up the hill"); songs from plays ("There was a jolly miller"—but probably this song existed before it was incorporated in Love in a Village); romantic lyrics ("Where are you going, my pretty maid?"); popular songs of recent date ("Where, o where has my little dog gone?"); lullabies proper ("Rockabye, baby"). (2) Street cries ("Hot Cross Buns"). (3) Riddles ("Little Nancy Etticoat"). (4) Proverbs ("Needles and Pins"). (5) Custom and ritual ("London Bridge"). (6) Religious and anti-religious matter ("Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John," "Good morning, Father Francis"). (7) R. about historical personages ("Lucy Locket," Robin Hood rhymes). (8) Poems by recent authors ("Twinkle, twinkle, little star," by Jane Taylor). (9) Words accompanying games ("Here we go round the mulberry bush"). (10) Counting out r., many of which seem to have derived from old Celtic numbers preserved among primitive people in England and still used for counting sheep, fish, stitches in knitting, etc. ("Eena, meena, mina moe," "One-ery, two-ery," and originally "Hickory Dickory Dock"). The above classifications are rough and do not account for all the r.; they will serve, however, to show from what a variety of sources the lore of the nursery is culled.

The first published collection of nursery songs was Tommy Thumb's Pretty Song Book (1744); there is a single extant copy of the second of its two volumes, containing about 40 songs, in the British Museum. In ca. 1765 appeared Mother Goose's Melody, or Sonnets for the Cradle; in 1784 came Gammer Gurton's Garland. In America, in 1719, appeared Songs for the Nursery, or Mother Goose's Melodies for Children; no copies are extant. There is a story that the printer named the book after his mother-in-law, née Elizabeth Goose. The r. are usually called "Mother Goose R." in America, but the origin of "Mother Goose" seems to be Fr. The term "Nursery R." was not used in England until the 19th c.; before that they were "Tommy Thumb's songs." During the past century and a half hundreds of collections of the r. have been issued.

The first scholar to concern himself with the material was James Orchard Halliwell, whose collection of 300 r., most of them still popular today, was published by the Percy Society in 1842. His work has been superseded by that of Iona and Peter Opie, whose Oxford Dictionary of Nursery R. contains 550 entries, with many variants, important notes, and a valuable introduction.

During the 20th c., scholars and other interested persons have proffered various theories concerning the r. One of these, the historical theory, tries to identify the "real personages" of the verses: e.g., Old King Cole is a British king of the 3d c.—or the father of St. Helena—or the father of Finn McCool; Georgie Porgie is George I.—or the Duke of Buckingham; the Queen the pussy-cat went to see is Elizabeth I. Although some of these "identifications" must be described as wild surmise, there is evidence for the historicity of a number of the characters: Elise Marley was a famous alewife, Lucy Locket and Kitty Fisher courtesans of the time of Charles I., and Jack Horner probably a steward of the Abbot of Glastonbury, whose "plum" was a deed to valuable property still in the Horner family.

Henry Bett believes that the r. (as well as many children's tales and games) reflect nature myths ("Jack and Jill" is about the tides), custom ("London Bridge" echoes the old rite of human sacrifice necessary to appease the water over which a bridge was built), and history ("John Ball"). James Joyce owned a copy of Dr. Bett's book and apparently found much to agree with in it. Joyce's Finnegans Wake contains a multitude of references to about 70 rhymes; the author uses them to reinforce his concept of ever recurrent motifs in human existence; he sees the r. as embodying myths which express the experiences of the human race. In this use of the r. Joyce illustrates what may be called the psychoanalytic theory, a theory recently put forth (not specifically about nursery r., but about folk material in general) by Joseph Campbell, in The Hero with a Thousand Faces.

J. O. Halliwell, The Nursery R. of England (1842); H. C. Bolton, The Counting Out R. of Children (1888); L. Eckenstein, Comparative Studies in Nursery R. (1906); H. Bett, Nursery R. and Tales (1924); D. E. Marvin, Historic Child R. (1930); V. Sackville-West, Nursery R. (1947); I. and P. Opie, The Oxford Dict. of Nursery R. (rev. ed., 1952; best general survey) and The Oxford Nursery R. Book (1955); P. Opie, "Nursery R.," in Cassell's; M. P. Worthington, "Nursery R. in Joyce's Finnegans Wake," JAF, 70 (1957); P. H. Evans, Rimbles (1961). M.P.W.

OBJECTIVE CORRELATIVE. T. S. Eliot introduced the term "o.c." into modern literary criticism in the essay "Hamlet and His Problems" (1919; The Sacred Wood, 1920). Hamlet is an "artistic failure," according to Eliot, chiefly because its central character "is dominated by an emotion which is inexpressible, because it is in excess of the facts as they appear." "The only way of expressing emotion in the form of art is by finding an 'objective correlative' in other words, a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events which shall be the formula of that particular emotion; such that when the external facts, which must terminate in sensory experience, are given, the emotion is immediately evoked." Shakespeare has failed to provide Hamlet with any such o.c.

Since Eliot introduced the term, it has doubtless been more often discussed than used; it may well be one of those "notorious phrases which," he said in 1956, speaking of his own literary criticism, "have had a truly embarrassing success in the world." In any case, Eliot's argument bristles with difficulties (due to loose writing given an air of precision by such mathematical expressions as "formula" and "equivalent" [Unger]). Let us agree, with Eliot, that disgust is a part of Hamlet's state of mind. To what, then, does the term "o.c." apply? To Hamlet's gross language in 3.4 and elsewhere, which in a simple sense "expresses" that disgust? Or, as Eliot oddly implies, to Gertrude and her misdeeds (the inadequate "equivalent" for Hamlet's disgust)? Eliot appears to confound the expression of an emotion with the occasion of that emotion. Again, who is being thought of as "expressing" emotion, Hamlet, or Shakespeare, or both? Or again, how can we say that an emotion is inexpressible merely because it is excessive in relation to its occasion (if it is)? Finally, what is the relation between "expression," "communication," and "evocation" as Eliot understands them? One concludes that Eliot here uses the term "expression" in a special sense, according to which a state of mind which is inadequately accounted for is inadequately expressed; it fails to engage fully the audience's sympathies, and has therefore not been successfully turned into "the form of art."

The concept of the o.c. has been traced variously to Washington Allston (Wellek), Santayana (McElderry), Pound (Praz), and Poe (Winters). Allston (Lectures on Art, 1850) uses the phrase itself in a discussion, in terms reminiscent of Emerson, of the relation between the mind and the external world: "the mind . . . needs . . . , as the condition of its manifestation, its objective correlative"—the external world, objects in which bear a "pre-determined" relationship to ideas "preexisting" in the mind and cooperate in the realization of the mind's potentiality for "pleasurable emotion." Here Allston is speaking of the mind in general, but later, in discussing the distinctive qualities of the artist, he defines one of them, originality, as "the power of presenting to another the precise images or emotions as they existed in himself." The implication of Allston's remarks is that one, at least, of the functions of art is the expression and communication of emotion. Santayana (Poetry and Religion, 1900) takes a similar position, but adds to the notion of expression that of evocation: "The poet's art is to a great extent the art of intensifying emotions by assembling the scattered objects that naturally arouse them." By uniting "disparate things having a common overtone of feeling," the poet evokes that feeling. He seeks or invents "correlative objects" for the expression of feeling, though, according to Santayana, "expression" is a misleading term, implying as it does that something already experienced and/or otherwise known is "expressed," while the fact is that the very act of expression itself may so modify the feeling expressed as in effect to constitute the invention of a totally new feeling. Praz believes that "Pound's idea of poetry . . . [The Spirit of Romance, 1910] as of 'a sort of inspired mathematics, which gives us equations, not for abstract figures, triangles, spheres, and the like, but equations for the human emotions,' may be said to be the starting point of Eliot's theory of the 'objective correlative.'" Winters agrees with Praz's estimate of the importance of Pound's influence, but asserts that "this particular theory is at least as old as Poe and is more likely older, and Poe states it much more nearly in Eliot's terms." He then quotes the passage, from the essay on Hawthorne, in which Poe sets forth the doctrine of the single "preconceived effect."

Overlooking possible difficulties in the theory of literature apparently implied by the o.c., Matthiessen finds its importance in its apparent insistence on definiteness and particularity of language and situation; and indeed its original use by Eliot and its subsequent vogue are doubtless related to the passion for the concrete and definite exemplified by Imagism and are part of the 20th-c. reaction against Shelleyan and late Victorian vaguenesses. Matthiessen refers to the passage in which the concept is enunciated as "a locus classicus of criticism" and finds in it "the exact clue to the triumph of Samson Agonistes," in which, presumably, Milton has successfully "expressed" his own emotions "in the form of art" by depersonalizing and objectifying them in the story of Samson, their perfect o.c.

Other critics, however, have found the concept more or less unsatisfactory. In some doubt as to the meaning of the phrase, Wellek is content to keep it "as a convenient word for the symbolic structure of a work of art," but only, it would appear, at the expense of the notion that the o.c. is a deliberately sought device for the expression and evocation of a state of mind. Winters concludes that "the idea of the objective correlative is this: that the poet starts with an emotion and after casting about finds objective data which he believes can be used to embody it; nothing more." As a rationalist, Winters objects to the concept on the ground that it implies the priority and primacy of emotion in literary composition. Vivas, who infers that the concept was "devised to explain how the poem expresses the poet's emotion," believes that it assumes a "dubious psychology" and an untenable literary theory; that Eliot implies that poems are composed exclusively of objectifications of emotions and feelings; and finally that it is hardly possible that any given concrete object or set of circumstances will express for the poet and arouse in the reader precisely the same "particular emotion."

T. S. Eliot, "Hamlet and His Problems" (1919), in The Sacred Wood (1920); F. O. Matthiessen, The Achievement of T. S. Eliot (1935, 1947); M. Praz, "T. S. Eliot and Dante," The Southern Rev., 2 (1937); J. T. Shipley, "O.C.," Dict. of World Lit. (1943); Y. Winters, The Anatomy of Nonsense (1943); E. Vivas, "The O.C. of T. S. Eliot," The Am. Bookman, 1 (1944); The Critic's Notebook, ed. R. W. Stallman (1950); R. Wellek, "The Crit. of T. S. Eliot," SR, 64 (1956); B. R. McElderry, Jr., "Santayana and Eliot's 'O.C.,'" Boston Univ. Studies in Eng., 3 (1957). J.D.K.

OBJECTIVISM. A term used to describe a mode of writing, particularly the writing of verse. It recognizes the poem, apart from its meaning, to be an object to be dealt with as such. O. looks at the poem with a special eye to its structural aspect, how it has been constructed. The term originated in 1931 with a small group of poets calling themselves "The Objectivists," who used it to signalize their work: George Oppen, Louis Zukofsky, Charles Reznikoff, Lorine Niedecker and W. C. Williams. Individually they published several books and together, in 1932, An "Objectivists" Anthology. The movement, never widely accepted, was early abandoned. It arose as an aftermath of imagism (q.v.), which the Objectivists felt was not specific enough, and applied to any image that might be conceived. O. concerned itself with an image more particularized yet broadened in its significance. The mind rather than the unsupported eye entered the picture. W.C.W.

OBJECTIVITY. See SUBJECTIVITY AND OBJECTIVITY.

OBLIQUE RHYME. See NEAR RHYME.

OBSCURITY. Almost invariably the critics and historians of modern poetry have observed that it is as a body of poetry more obscure than the poetry of earlier periods—and have then proceeded to give reasons for this phenomenon. At least two critics, F. W. Dupee and John Crowe Ransom, see o. as largely a matter of deliberate intention. Dupee says that neo-classical poetry, for example, exhibits "a peculiarly brilliant and aggressive clarity," that this is a "stylistic feature of the school of Pope," and that modern poetry, on the other hand, is aggressively obscure and difficult. No single poet is to be held responsible for this; o. and difficulty are characteristics of "a general style." Dupee adds that this style is the poets' way of implying a negative judgment on the complexities of modern life, on the relatively inaccessible sciences, on the multiple beliefs we are asked to discriminate among, on the separation of art from everyday life, and so on. The poets' private myths, allusiveness, and ambiguity are their way of saying nay to a world they do not approve of. Ransom's theory is somewhat similar to this. He holds that in our post-Renaissance era knowledge has become more and more narrow and intensified, especially in the realms of science and applied science. In the process, poetry has lost a good deal of its power and prestige. "The poets," Ransom says, "are in the spirit of their time. On the one hand, they have been pushed out of their old attachments, whereby they used to make themselves useful to public causes, by the specialists who did not want the respective causes to be branded with amateurism. On the other hand, they were moved by a universal tendency into their own appropriate kind of specialization, which can be, as they have been at pains to show, as formidable as any other." Ransom's point, of course, is that modern poets have played down poetry-as-communication or as message and concentrated on exploiting poetry as medium.

Both of the above theories participate in the conception of the poet as alienated from his society, a conception that has given rise to many articles and books. Delmore Schwartz and William York Tindall have made interesting contributions to this literature. Schwartz says that as early as the 17th c. there was "a break between intellect and sensibility [what is commonly called the "dissociation of sensibility"]"; the intellect finds unreasonable what the sensibility and the imagination cannot help but accept." There was a general suspicion of language used for emotional and imaginative purposes—for myths. Science and applied science made tremendous strides, thereby greatly increasing the industrialization of society. An unfortunate consequence of this, Schwartz says, is that there was little or no room left for the cultivated man. Poetry as a part of culture became more and more autonomous, and therefore more and more self-regarding and specialized, the poets writing for themselves or for small coteries. Tindall sees the exile of the poet as a break with the middle class. "Accustomed to expressing feelings and ideas shared with their literate audience, poets slowly realized their disinclination or inability to express feelings so much coarser than their own. About the middle of the century Baudelaire looked out of his window and was filled with the 'immense nausea of billboards.' The rest follows from this." The poets tend to write not about public matters but about themselves, and to write for others equally sensitive. Randall Jarrell has described the way in which many modern poets regard their medium as: "very interesting language, a great emphasis on connotation, texture; extreme intensity, forced emotion—violence; a good deal of obscurity; emphasis on sensation, perceptual nuances; emphasis on details, on the part rather than on the whole; experimental or novel qualities of some sort; a tendency toward external formlessness and internal disorganization—these are justified, generally, as the disorganization required to express a disorganized age, or alternatively, as new-discovered and more complex types of organization; and extremely personal style—refine your singularities; lack of restraint—all tendencies are forced to their limits; there is a good deal of emphasis on the unconscious, dream-structure, the thoroughly subjective." This statement is probably most appropriate as a description of the more willful modern poets. Yet if it is taken as a slightly exaggerated statement it can stand as a description of the way the medium of poetry has been employed by modern poets.

There is undoubtedly a good deal of truth in these various theories, but perhaps all of them put a little too much emphasis on the poet's choosing to write obscurely, and not enough emphasis on the factors in modern culture that make at least a certain degree of o. inevitable. R. P. Blackmur says this about poetry in ages prior to the 20th c.: "The artist's task was principally to express the continuity of his culture and the turbulence that underlay it. That is perhaps why we find the history of criticism so much concerned with matters of decorum: that is to say, with conformity, elegance, rhetoric, or metrics: matters not now commonly found or considered in our reviews." Of the major imaginative works of our own time, he says this: "Those who seem to be the chief writers of our time have found their subjects in attempting to dramatize at once both the culture and the turbulence it was meant to control, and in doing so they have had poetically to create—as it happens, to re-create—the terms, the very symbolic substance, of the culture as they went along." One may illustrate Blackmur's comment by references to the cultural "history" that Yeats wrote as background for his poetry, the myths that Eliot used in order to dramatize his vision of a modern waste-land, or the theory of aesthetics that Stevens worked out both in the writing and in the justifying of his poetry. (The same sort of thing could be said about Joyce or Mann.) As Blackmur puts it, the modern poets must create or re-create their very symbolic structures. Perhaps one should qualify this, by saying that the remarks pertain especially to "major" poets, to those who create coherent and self-defined mythic visions. These poets have felt and suffered from what Marc Friedlander calls a loss of the "common store"—"the loss of a frame of traditional values in which the artist and his audience move easily and with confidence." We no longer have the classical myths which were understood by poets and audiences down into the Victorian world, and even our Christian myths (the Bible, legends of saints, etc.) are available only to certain groups. Nor can it be assumed that any two "educated" men know the same facts or believe in the same values. "The elimination of obscurity in our literature waits upon the reconstitution of the audience of which the poet may feel a part, upon the creation of a common store of reference, familiarity with which would be shared by all who might properly be called educated."

J. C. Ransom, "Poets Without Laurels," The World's Body (1938); R. Jarrell, Preface to "The Rage for the Lost Penny," Five Young Am. Poets (1940); D. Schwartz, "The Isolation of Modern Poetry," KR, 3 (1941); W. Y. Tindall, "Exiles: Rimbaud to Joyce," Am. Scholar, 14 (1945); F. W. Dupee, "Difficulty as Style," ibid.; M. Friedlander, "Poetry and the Common Store," ibid.; W. Van O'Connor, "Forms of O.," Sense and Sensibility in Modern Poetry (1948);

A. Tate, "Understanding Modern Poetry," On the Limits of Poetry (1948); R. P. Blackmur, "A Burden for Critics," Lectures in Crit. (1949); J. Press, The Chequer'd Shade: Reflections on O. in Poetry (1958; systematic and comprehensive). W.V.O'C.

OCCASIONAL VERSE. Any poem, light or serious, good or bad, written for a special occasion and with a special purpose, as, for example, the memorial pieces in honor of Edward King, among which Lycidas was one; the birthday odes expected of a poet laureate; tributes to a poet placed at the beginning of his volume particularly in the 16th and 17th c.; epithalamia, such as those by Spenser and Donne; funeral elegies, respectful or ironic; sonnets or odes memorializing some state occasion or historic event; or the prologues and epilogues to 17th- and 18th-c. plays. O.v. is public poetry and has a practical social function to perform.

Certain modern poets, e.g., W. B. Yeats, Ezra Pound, William Carlos Williams, have written a good deal of o.v. Some modern occasional poems are Hardy's On an Invitation to the United States, Yeats's Easter, 1916, and Auden's September 1, 1939. A characteristic brief example is Yeats's epigram On Those that Hated 'The Playboy of the Western World,' 1907:

Once, when midnight smote the air,
Eunuchs ran through Hell and met
On every crowded street to stare Upon great Juan riding by:
Even like these to rail and sweat
Staring upon his sinewy thigh.

A.J.M.S.

OCTAMETER. A line of 8 measures or feet, rare in classical poetry (see OCTONARIUS); rarer still in Eng., though Poe claimed some lines of The Raven were in o. acatalectic. The most noteworthy, if not the only true, example in Eng. is found in Swinburne's March, from Poems and Ballads. OCTASTICH. A group or stanza of 8 lines; also an huitain (q.v.), a poem of 8 lines.

OCTAVE, octet. A group of 8 lines, either a stanza (ottava rima, Monk's Tale stanza, qq.v.) or part of a stanza, as the first 8 lines of a sonnet (usually rhyming abbaabba) are called the octave, or octet. "I Have finished the First Canto, a long one, of about 180 octaves," Byron, Letter to Murray.

R.O.E.

OCTONARIUS (L. "of 8 each"). The Roman equivalent of the Gr. acatalectic tetrameter. Whereas the latter was divided into four complete pairs of feet or dipodies, the iambic, trochaic, and anapaestic octonarius of early Roman drama were each regarded as composed of 8 complete feet.—W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); Crusius. R.J.G.

OCTOSÍLABO. See OCTOSYLLABIC VERSE.

OCTOSYLLABIC VERSE. Tetrameter verse in iambs or trochees, with variants limited to prevent "tumbling verse." It forms the structural line of several stanzas (long meter, In Memoriam stanza, etc.) but is more commonly associated with couplets. Byron's reference to "the fatal facility of the octo-syllabic meter" recognizes the danger of sing-song monotony, a danger offset, however, by the feeling of rapid movement inherent in the pattern which makes it an excellent medium for narrative verse. In the hands of a skilled craftsman monotony is not difficult to avoid, as is evident in Milton's Il Penseroso:

Come, pensive Nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain,
Flowing with majestic train,
And sable stole of cypress lawn
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Come; but keep thy wonted state,
With even step, and musing gait . . .

The o. couplet derived from late medieval Fr. poetry (with a fusion of L. verse elements) in the chronicles, romances, and legends of the 12th c. (Wace, Roman de Brut); the romance of manners, lais, and dits in the 13th c. strengthened its position. In the course of time its association with verse essentially frivolous or gay marked its use in France, and even as late as the 18th c. Le Sage, Peron, and Voltaire employed it thus for popular appeal. The form (normally in varied rhyme schemes rather than couplets) reached Spain in the 14th c. (Ruiz, Libro de Buen Amor) from the Prov. troubadours by way of Galician-Portuguese sources, and strengthened a native tendency toward it in earlier Sp. poetry. By the 15th c. it was firmly established through collections of courtly lyrics (e.g., Cancionero de Baena), and since that time has come to be "the national meter par excellence."

In England the influence of Fr. o. verse in the 12th and 13th c. (through Anglo-Norman poets like Gaimar, Wace, Benoit) led to refinement on the common accentual 4-stress Anglo-Saxon structure for narratives, with evidence of growing syllabic regularity as the couplet developed through a flexible use in Chaucer (The Boke of the Duchesse, etc.), monotonous regularity in Gower (Confessio Amantis), and so to miracle and morality plays and a lessening Elizabethan use. The vehicle next of shorter poems, descriptive or philosophical, by Jonson, Milton, Dyer, Parnell, Gay, Swift, Collins, and others, its most notable 17th-c. narrative use was in the, widely imitated Hudibras of Samuel Butler (1612-80), the individuality of whose jogging satiric verse with its ingenious rhymes has distinguished it as "Hudibrastic verse" (q.v.). Serious or whimsical narrative was again written in the form as Burns, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, but especially Byron, Scott, and later, Morris, brought the couplet to its height in the 19th c. Other more varied patterns have tended to overshadow if not to replace the o. couplet in modern poetry, although an occasional distinctive use will be found, as in Edna St. Vincent Millay's popular Renaissance.—Saintsbury, Prosody; Schipper; Hamer; E. N. S. Thompson, "The O. Couplet," PQ, 18 (1939); D. C. Clarke, "The Sp. Octosyllable," HR, 10 (1942); J. Saavedra Molina, El octosílabo castellano (1945); M. D. Legge, Anglo-Norman Lit. and Its Background (1964). L.J.Z.

ODE (Gr. aeidein "to sing," "to chant"). In modern usage the name for the most formal, ceremonious, and complexly organized form of lyric poetry, usually of considerable length. It is frequently the vehicle for public utterance on state occasions, as, for example, a ruler's birthday, accession, funeral, the unveiling or dedication of some imposing memorial or public work. The o. as it has evolved in contemporary literatures generally shows a dual inheritance from classic sources, combining the reflective or philosophic character of the Horatian o. with the occasional character of the Pindaric o. (e.g., Tennyson's Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington). Frequently elaborate and complex stanzas are used, based ultimately upon either the triadic structure of the Pindaric o. or upon imitations of or developments from it, combining great variety in length of line with ingenious rhyme schemes. The serious tone of the o. not only calls for the use of a heightened diction and enrichment by poetic device, but thus lays it open, more readily than any other lyric form, to burlesque. A third form of the modern o., the Anacreontic, is descended from the 16th-c. discovery of a group of some sixty poems, all credited to Anacreon, although the Gr. originals now appear to span a full thousand years. In general the lines are short and, in comparison with the Pindaric o., the forms simple, with the subjects being love or drinking, as in the 18th-c. song "To Anacreon in Heaven," whose tune has been appropriated for "The Star-Spangled Banner."

In Gr. literature, the odes of Pindar (522-442 B.C.) were designed for choric song and dance. The words, the sole surviving element of the total Pindaric experience, reflect the demands of the other two arts. A strophe, a complex metrical structure whose length and pattern of irregular lines varies from ode to ode, reflects a dance pattern, which is then repeated exactly in an antistrophe, the pattern being closed by an epode, or third section, of differing length and structure. Length of the o. itself (surviving examples range from fragments to nearly 300 lines) is achieved through exact metrical repetition of the original triadic pattern. These odes, written for performance in a Dionysiac theatre or perhaps in the Agora to celebrate athletic victories, frequently appear incoherent through the brilliance of imagery, abrupt shifts in subject matter, and apparent disorder of form within the individual sections. Modern criticism has answered such objections, which date from the time of Pindar himself and range through Gr. and L. to modern times, by discerning dominating images, emotional relationships between subjects, and complex metrical organization. The tone of the odes is emotional, exalted, intense, and the subject matter whatever divine myths can be adduced to the occasion being celebrated. In L. literature, the characteristic o. is associated with Horace (65-8 B.C.), who derived his forms not from Pindar but from less elaborate Gr. lyrics, through Alcaeus and Sappho. The Horatian o. is stanzaic and regular, based upon a limited number of metrical variations (Alcaics, Sapphics, etc.). It is personal rather than public, general rather than occasional, tranquil rather than intense, contemplative rather than brilliant, and intended for the reader in his library rather than for the spectator in the theatre.

Throughout Europe the history of the o. commences with the rediscovery of the classic forms. The humanistic o. of the 15th and earlier 16th c. shows the adaptation of old meters to new subjects by Fiefelfo, in both Gr. and L., and by Campano, Pontano, and Flaminio in neo-Latin. The example of the humanistic o. and the publication in 1513 of the Aldine edition of Pindar were the strongest influences upon the vernacular o. In Italy, tentative Pindaric experiments were made by Trissino, Alamanni, and Minturno, without establishing the o. as a new genre. More successful were the attempts in France by members of the Pléiade, where, after minor trials of the new form by others, Pierre de Ronsard in 1550 published The First Four Books of the Odes with stylistic imitations of Horace, Anacreon, and (in the first book) Pindar. Influenced by Ronsard, Bernardo Tasso and Gabriele Chiabrera later in the century succeeded in popularizing the form in Italy, where it has been used successfully by, among others, Manzoni, Leopardi (in his Odi canzone), Carducci (Odi barbare, 1877), and D'Annunzio (Odi navale, 1892). In France, the example of Ronsard was widely followed, notably by Boileau in the 17th c., and by Voltaire and others in formal, occasional verse in the 18th. The romantic period lent a more personal note to both form and subject matter, notably in the work of Lamartine, Musset, and Victor Hugo. Later, highly personal treatments of the genre may be found in Verlaine's Odes en son honneur, 1893, and Valéry's Odes, 1920.

The o. became characteristically German only with the work of G. R. Weckherlin (Oden und Gesänge, 1618-19), who, as court poet at Stuttgart, attempted to purify and refashion German letters according to foreign models. In the middle of the next century Klopstock modified the classic models by use of free rhythms, grand abstract subjects, and a heavy influence from the Lutheran psalms. Later Goethe and Schiller returned to classical models and feeling, as in Schiller's Ode to Joy, used in the final movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. At the turn of the century Hölderlin in his complex, mystical, unrhymed odes united classic themes with the characteristic resources of the German language. Since Hölderlin, few noteworthy odes have been written in German, with the possible exception of those of Rudolph Alexander Schröder (Deutsche Oden, 1912).

The few attempts at domesticating the o. in 16th c. England were largely unsuccessful, although there is probably some influence of the classical o. upon Spenser's Prothalamion and Epithalamion. In 1629 appeared the first great imitation of Pindar in Eng., Ben Jonson's Ode on the Death of Sir H. Morison, with the strophe, antistrophe, and epode of the classical model indicated by the Eng. terms "turn," "counter-turn," and "stand." In the same year began the composition of Milton's great o., On the Morning of Christ's Nativity, in regular stanzaic form. The genre, however, attained great popularity in Eng. only with the publication of Abraham Cowley's Pindarique Odes in 1656, in which he attempted, like Ronsard and Weckherlin before him, to make available to his own language the spirit and tone of Pindar rather than to furnish an exact transcription of his manner. With Dryden began the great formal odes of the 18th c.: Alexander's Feast, Ode to the Memory of Mrs. Anne Killigrew, and, marking the reunion of formal verse and music, the Song for St. Cecilia's Day (1687). For the 18th c. the o. was the perfect means of expressing the sublime, whether approached through the allegorical, the descriptive, or through terror, as in Gray's The Bard. In the mid-18th c., the odes of Collins and Gray used less elaborate devices and more romantic themes. The true romantic o. in Eng. literature begins with Coleridge's Dejection: An Ode (1802) and Wordsworth's Ode on Intimations of Immortality (written 1802-4, publ. 1815). Wordsworth's Ode, with its varied line lengths, complex rhyme scheme, and stanzas of varying length and pattern, has been called the greatest Eng. Pindaric o.:

The rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the rose;
The moon doth with delight Look round her when the heavens are bare;
Waters on a starry night
Are beautiful and fair;
The sunshine is a glorious birth;
But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath past away a glory from the earth.

Of the other major romantic poets, Shelley wrote the Ode to the West Wind, and Keats wrote the Ode on a Grecian Urn, Ode to a Nightingale, and Ode to Autumn, probably the most brilliant group of odes in the language. Since the romantic period, with the exception of a few brilliant, isolated examples, such as Tennyson's Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, the formal Pindaric o. has been neither a popular nor a really successful genre in Eng. Among modern poets, the personal o. in the Horatian manner has been revived with some success, notably by Allen Tate (Ode to the Confederate Dead) and W. H. Auden (In Memory of W. B. Yeats, To Limestone).

G. Carducci, "Dello svolgimento dell'ode in Italia," Opere, xvi (1905); R. Shafer, The Eng. O. to 1660 (1918); K. Viëtor, Gesch. der deutschen O. (1923); A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, Dithyramb, Tragedy and Comedy (1927); F. Neri, "O," Enciclopedia italiana; Bowra; G. N. Shuster, The Eng. O. from Milton to Keats (1940); G. Highet, The Cl. Tradition (1949); Annalen der deutschen Literatur, ed. H. O. Burger (1952); N. Maclean, "From Action to Image: Theories of the Lyric in the 18th C.," in Crane, Critics; C. Maddison, Apollo and the Nine: A Hist. of the O. (1960); N. E. Collinge, The Structure of Horace's Odes (1961); G. Thomson, Gr. Lyric Metre (rev. ed., 1961); S. Commager, The Odes of Horace: A Crit. Study (1962). S.F.F.

ODL (rhyme). Both end rhyme and internal rhyme are features of Welsh poetry from the beginning (6th c.), and cynghanedd (q.v.) involves internal rhyming. Repetition of final unstressed vowels together with the consonants which follow them is adequate in Welsh verse (father/sister), for all vowels are distinct, stress accent is not very strong, and the rhyming of final syllables was established before the shift of accent from final to penultimate syllables. Rhyming of stressed with unstressed syllables (stick/ecclesiastic) is common in Welsh, and in some meters (englyn and cywydd) is obligatory. There are two kinds of partial rhyme in Welsh: (a) "Ir." rhyme, as in Gaelic, where only the vowels correspond, and the consonants following them need only to belong to the same phonetic group; (b) proest, where the consonants following the vowel correspond exactly, and the vowels (or diphthongs) are only of the same length (an, in, on). Nostalgia, or a sense of loss or incompleteness can be very effectively conveyed thus. Wilfred Owen made much use of proest in Eng.—Morris-Jones; Parry.

D.M.L.

OLD GERMANIC PROSODY. The Teutonic peoples of the early Middle Ages had a remarkably homogeneous prosodic system, specimens of which have survived in runic inscriptions and poetic manuscripts. The majority of these are in the Old English (OE) and Old Norse (ON) languages, but enough survives also of the Old Saxon (OS) and Old High German (OHG) poetic documents to allow some generalizations about a large corpus of poetry.

No matter what its theme or place of origin, and in spite of the comparatively late time at which most of it was copied into written form, Old Germanic (OGc.) poetry is highly formulaic and formalistic, so that its techniques are comparable from century to century and from one linguistic area to another. The material versified is of many kinds: legal texts, mnemonic lists of rulers and peoples, heroic epics and religious narratives, reflective or elegiac lyrics, sober collections of maxims, encomiastic pieces, and others besides, including a variety of satirical and erotic verses.

The most important key to the governing style of OGc. poetic composition is the fact that the poetry was so largely an oral phenomenon prior to the introduction of Christianity and the Latin alphabet into the Gc. area. That is, oral composition upon traditional themes helped create and perpetuate a leisurely, formulaic, periphrastic, and repetitious style, with considerable freedom in syntax, and an elaborate poetic diction in which the kenning (q.v.) is a conspicuous feature. This flow of verse (spoken, chanted, or sung) is rhythmically organized into a series of short, metrically independent phrases or verses. The verses contain 2 stressed syllables which are long in quantity, and differing numbers of syllables in addition which are relatively unstressed and may be long or short in quantity. A "resolved stress" sometimes occurs when two short syllables, only the first of which is accented, replace a single long accented syllable. The quantitative and accentual unit thus formed will resemble one of five metrical

"types"—patterns of long and short, stressed and unstressed syllables—analytically described by Eduard Sievers (see below) as common to all OGc. verse; a detailed examination of these basic patterns would be beyond the scope of this survey. Finally, this independent basic verse or metrical unit is linked to another by the rhyming of initial sounds in some, not all, of the stressed syllables, and the verse-pairs so created are centrally divided by a pause. In modern editions of the poetry these verse-pairs are printed as a single typographical line. The alliteration within the verse-pairs is systematic, not occasional or ornamental. As a rule, each initial consonantal sound rhymes with itself only; any vowel or diphthong rhymes with itself or with any other vowel or diphthong. Thus an alliterative meter (q.v.), ordering and emphasizing what would be the normal spoken accents of successive phrases, is the conservative foundation upon which most OGc. poetry is built. Side by side with this complex poetic form there may well have existed similar but less exacting popular meters which are now lost beyond hope of recovery. But the written records, faulty as they often are, display a poetic tradition which is at best superb, perhaps especially in the epic recitative of long narrative poems, where with vigorous stresses and sonorous vowel music the linked verses flow, wheel, and clash by turns, moving with a magisterial deliberation proper to the art of the court singer, or, to give him his Anglo-Saxon name, the scop (q.v.). This is an oral poetry not merely in the circumstances of its origins, but also in the sense that it must be heard aloud if justice is to be done to its essential nature.

A passage from the OE Beowulf (205-16) will demonstrate the structure and illustrate some of the stylistic features just described. In this and the following examples, marks of vowel quantity are ignored and secondary stresses are also left unmarked.

Hæfde se góða Géata léoda cémpan gecórone pára þe he cénoste findan mihte; fiftyrna súm súndwudu sóhte, sécg wísade, lágucraeftig món lándgemýrcu.
Fýrst fórd gewat; flóta was on ýðum, bát under béorge. Béornas géarwe on stéfn stígon,— stréamas wúndon, súnd wið sánde; sécgas báron on béarm nácan béorhte frátwe, gúðsearo géatolic; gúman út scufon, wéras on wílsið wúdu búndenne.

The hero had chosen fighters from the men of the Geats, the boldest he could find; he and fourteen others went to the sea-wood [i.e., ship]; the man skilled in the craft of the sea showed the way to the shore. The time came that the vessel was in the waves at the foot of the cliff. Ready warriors climbed aboard; currents eddied, sea against sand; men brought bright treasure and splendid war-gear into the ship's bosom; mariners pushed off the trim craft on the journey they eagerly sought.

The same basic metrical structure and stylistic manner are evident in the OS Heliand (2005-2012):

Wérod bliðode,
wárun thar an lúston líudi atsámne, gúmon gládmodie. Géngun ámbahtman, skénkeon mid scálun, drogún skírianne wín mid órcun endi mid álofatun; was thar érló dróm
fágar an fléttea.

The troop was in good spirits; people there were happy together; men were cheerful. Servants went around with pitchers; they poured clear wine with cups and vessels; there was a splendid revel of heroes in the hall.

An equally pronounced repetitive and periphrastic style will be noted in the OHG Hildebrandlied (63-68):

Do létun se érist áscim scrítan, scárpen scúrim, dat in dem sciltim stónt.
Do stópun tosamane, stáimbort chlúbun, héuwun hármlico húitte scilti, únti im iro líntun lúttilo wúrtun, giwigan miti wábnun.

Then first they let fly spears, sharp weapons, so that they stuck in the shields. Then they strode together, split the bucklers, hacked grimly at the bright linden shields until they were cut to bits, destroyed by weapons.

ON verse bears a strong family resemblance to other Gc. national poetry, especially in the narrative stanza known as fornyrðislag (old lore meter); but in this example, chosen from the Darðarljóð, it will be noted that the stanzaic form itself (one of several common in ON verse) contrasts with the stichic or non-stanzaic poetry of other Gc. traditions:

Víndum, víndum véf dárðarðar, þars vé váða vígra mánnar;
látum éigi líf hans fárask;
éigu válkýrjur váls um kósti.

We weave, we weave the web of the spear, while the brave warrior's standard advances; we shall not let him lose his life; only the valkyries may decide who shall be slain.

The ON stanza, concentrating as it does upon one verse paragraph at a time, lends itself to a less relaxed and flexible style, and easily achieves a greater intensity than will be found, for instance, in OE epic verse. During the 9th c. and afterward in Norway and Iceland, this concentration, accompanied by an elaboration of kenningar, developed into the extraordinary complexity and artifice of the skaldic stanzas, as in the court measure or dróttkvætt (q.v.).

It remains to be said that some technical aspects of OGc. prosody are still disputed even after many decades of study. At present little is known about the partnership of the verse with the vocal and instrumental music which must have been associated with it in early times. Contradictory theories about the exact scansion of the verse itself—for example, the arrangement of strong and subordinate stresses, the scansion of certain expanded verses, and the use of pauses or rests within the verse-pairs—continue to be advanced, and cannot be discussed in a short space; a few important and suggestive works are listed below. However, the student who has made a beginning at the languages themselves will find that he can read the verse with pleasure if he is careful to observe and reproduce aloud whenever he can the rhetorical intention of the poet-singer, who based his art upon the natural (that is, the logical and grammatical) patterns of stress in Gc. speech rhythms.

E. Sievers, Altgermanische Metrik (1893) and Zur Rhythmik des germanischen Alliterationsverses (anastatic reprint, N.Y., 1909); A. Heusler, Die altgermanische Dichtung (1923); J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of Beowulf (1942); M. Daunt, "OE Verse and Speech Rhythm," Philological Soc., Transactions, 1946 (1947); P. F. Baum, "The Meter of the Beowulf," MP, 46 (1948-9); F. P. Magoun, Jr., "Oral-Formulaic Character of Anglo-Saxon Narrative Poetry," Speculum, 28 (1953); W. P. Lehmann, The Development of Gc. Verse Forms (1956); J. C. Pope, OE Versification (mimeographed ed., Yale Univ., 1957); A. J. Bliss, The Metre of Beowulf (1958) and An Introd. to OE Metre (1962). J.B.B.

OLD NORSE POETRY. The term "Old Norse" (ON) is here used in its broad sense of "Old Scandinavian" (norðenn), with particular reference to Norway and Iceland.

The creative poetic genius of the early Scandinavians, more specifically of the Norwegians and the Icelanders, found a lasting expression in two main branches of poetry: The Eddic Poems and the Skaldic or Court Poetry, both of which are rooted deep in the cultural soil of ancient Scandinavia and embody age-old Germanic traditions as well. The bulk of the Eddic Poems, 29 out of the 34 usually included in the Elder or Poetic Edda, are preserved in the precious 13th c. Icelandic manuscript Codex Regius (Konungsbók) in the Royal Library at Copenhagen. All that we know for certain about its history is that it came into the possession of the learned humanist and antiquarian, Bishop Brynjólfur Sveinsson of Skálholt, in 1643. He ascribed the collection to Sæmundur Sigfússon the Learned (1056-1133), and gave it the title of Sæmundar Edda, although the designation Elder or Poetic Edda later gained currency. It should be added that there is no reason to believe that Sæmundur the Learned, whatever else he may have written, had any connection with this priceless manuscript. The title Edda was, however, correctly applied to Snorri Sturluson's famed handbook for poets, briefly considered below. Various theories have been advanced concerning the meaning of the word "Edda," the most plausible of which is the explanation, originally suggested by Eiríkr Magnússon, that it means "The Book of Oddi," linking it to the long-time intellectual and cultural center by that name in southern Iceland.

The Eddic Poems have, as already indicated, their roots deep in ancient Germanic and Scandinavian soil. Their authors and compiler are unknown to us, although some ingenious conjectures have been made concerning the authorship of several of these poems. Their date of composition is also a matter of conjecture among specialists in the field. On the basis of the available evidence, they appear, generally speaking, to have been composed between 800 and 1100, while most of them were probably put into writing between 1150 and 1250. Limitation of space excludes extended discussion of the much-debated question of the home of the Eddic Poems. Iceland, Norway, and the Western Islands all have had their advocates, and the specialists still continue to disagree on the point. Professor Jón Helgason of the University of Copenhagen has succinctly summed up the whole matter: "Clear and definite answers to the age and home of each individual poem are not available and will not be forthcoming. The only absolutely certain fact is that the poems have come down to us in Icelandic manuscripts, the most important of which are from the 13th century. The burden of proof rests on the one who wishes to seek their origin in remote ancient times or distant regions" ("Norges og Islands digtning," Nordisk Kultur VIII B, 1952, p. 69).

The 34 poems included in the Poetic Edda cover a wide range in terms of subject matter, mood, and style. They encompass such diverse productions as the majestic Völuspá (The Sibyl's Vision), with its "magnificent panorama of the course of the world"; the gnomic Hávamál (The Sayings of the High One) graphically expressing the practical wisdom of the Norse race; Þrymskviða (The Lay of Thrym), a rollicking ballad, describing in a striking fashion Thor's recovery of his missing hammer; and a memorable cycle of heroic poems containing a Northern version of the Nibelung story. As befits the elevated theme of many of the Eddic Poems they are composed in a simple but dignified meter. In common with other early Germanic poetry, the meter is based on alliteration. The three principal verse forms are fornyrðislag (Old Meter), ljóðaháttir (Song Measure), and málaháttir (Speech Measure), all of which are explained more fully in individual entries. The significance and general character of the Eddic Poems are excellently summarized by Professor Lee M. Hollander in the opening words of the introduction to his translation of The Poetic Edda (1928, p. vii): "What the Vedas are for India, and the Homeric poems for the Greek world, that the Edda signifies for the Teutonic race: it is a repository, in poetic form, of the mythology and much of their heroic lore, bodying forth the ethical views and the cultural life of the North during Heathen times."

The Skaldic or Court Poetry flourished simultaneously with the Eddic Poems from the 10th to the 13th c., but they differ fundamentally from the Edda in subject matter and metrical form. In contrast to the Eddic Poems, with their relative variety of themes, the Skaldic Poems, of which a very large number has been preserved, consist primarily of praise of kings and other chieftains by poets (skalds), attached to their courts. Again, in contrast to the simple meters of the Eddic Poems, the Skaldic Poetry is characterized by an intricate, alliterated verse form, the most common being dróttkvætt (dróttkvæðr háttir) [q.v.] as well as by a specific poetic diction abounding in metaphorical descriptive terms (kennings). The more elaborate of these Skaldic Poems are known as drápa (q.v.). Despite the pictorial quality and the sonorous effect of these poems, generally they have much greater historical than artistic value.

The names of a great many of the court poets, as well as their life stories in varying detail, are known to us. The earliest of them were Norwegian, of whom the following are the most important: Bragi Boddason the Old, of the first half of the 9th c., whose Ragnarsdrápa is the pioneer poem in that genre; Þjóðólfr of Hvin and Þorbjörn Hornklofi, both of whom were members of the court of King Harold Fairhair (ca. 860-933); and Eyvindr Finnsson skáldaspillir (ca. 910-ca. 990), the leading Norwegian court poet who has immortalized King Haakon the Good in his famous Hákonarmál.

From the 10th c. and on, the Icelanders monopolized and elaborated the art of Skaldic Poetry. Prominent among such Icelandic poets were: Kormákr Ögmundarson (ca. 935–ca. 970), the foremost love poet among the Icelandic skalds; Hallfreðr Óttarson (970–1007), attached to the court of King Olaf Tryggvason and the first Icel. court poet to deal with Christian themes; and Sighvatr Þórðarson, the court poet and devoted friend of King Olaf Haraldsson (Saint Olaf). The greatest of these Icel. skalds, however, was Egill Skallagrímsson (900–983), whose rugged viking character, robust intellect, and poetic genius are memorably revealed in his Sonatorrek (Sons' Lament), an impressive elegy commemorating his two sons. The kviðuháttir (q.v.) verse form harmonizes well with the tragic theme.

The Skaldic Poetry, in all its aspects, is brilliantly interpreted and illuminated in the Prose or Younger Edda by Snorri Sturluson (1178–1241), indeed a remarkable ars poetica of its kind.

When the Court Poetry, for various reasons, went out of general favor at the close of the 13th c., Icel. poets began writing poems on religious subjects in elevated Eddic meters or more frequently in Skaldic verse forms. The most noteworthy among the earlier poems of this type was Sólarljóð (Lay of the Sun), by an unknown author, from about 1200. A vision poem, composed in the resonant ljóðaháttir, it is highly didactic in theme, but marked by uncommon descriptive power and imaginative quality. Akin in theme and spirit, and occupying a prominent place in ON literature of the period, is the Norwegian vision poem, Draumkvædet (The Dream Vision), originally composed around the year 1200, but handed down in oral form until the 19th c. The most outstanding literary production of the 14th c. was the sacred poem Lilja (The Lily), by the Icel. monk Eysteinn Asgrímsson (d. 1361). Written in the sonorous hrynhenda form (q.v.), it is an eloquent and masterfully constructed interpretation of medieval religious teachings.

Dance-songs of foreign origin were common in Iceland during the 12th and 13th c., but are now largely lost. They gradually developed into a new kind of poetry, the rimur (q.v.), which arose in the 14th c. and enjoyed great popularity into the 19th c., and even to this day have their admirers. Generally speaking, the cultural and linguistic importance of the rimur is, however, much greater than their literary significance.

ANTHOLOGIES: Den norsk-islandske Skjalde-digtning, ed. F. Jónsson (4 v., 1912–15); Anglo-Saxon and Norse Poems, ed. and tr. N. Kershaw (1922); Rimur fyrir 1600, ed. B. K. Þórólfsson (1934); O.N. Poems (1936) and The Skalds (1945), both tr. L. M. Hollander; Eddic Lays, ed. F. T. Wood (1940); A Pageant of Old Scandinavia, ed. H. G. Leach (1946); Icel. Christian Classics, tr. C. V. Pilcher (1950); Sýnisbók islenskra rimna, ed. W. A. Craigie (3 v., 1953; specimens of Icel. rimur).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. Mogk, Gesch. der norwegisch-isländischen Lit. (2d ed., 1904); W. P. Ker, Epic and Romance (1908); F. Jónsson, Den oldnorske og oldislandske Litteraturs Historie (2d ed., 3 v., 1920–24); R. Meissner, Die Kenningar der Skalden (1921); The Hávamál, ed. and tr. D. E. Martin Clarke (1923); F. Paasche, Norsk Litteratur-historie, 1 (1924); E. Noreen, Den Norsk-Islandske Poesien (1926); The Poetic Edda, tr. H. A. Bellows (1923) and tr. L. M. Hollander (1928, rev. ed., 1962); The Prose Edda, tr. A. G. Brodeur (1929); B. Nerman, The Poetic Edda in the Light of Archaeology (1931); H. Hermannsson, Old Icel. Lit. (1933); B. S. Phillpotts, Edda and Saga (1931); J. Helgason, Norrøn Litteraturhistorie (1934); M. Schlauch, Romance in Iceland (1934); W. A. Craigie, The Art of Poetry in Iceland (1937); R. Beck, "Icel. Lit.," Ency. of Lit., ed. J. T. Shipley (2 v., 1946); E. Ól. Sveinsson, The Age of the Sturlungs, tr. J. S. Hannesson (1953); G. Turville-Petre, Origins of Icel. Lit. (1953); S. Einarsson, A Hist. of Icel. Lit. (1957); E. Ól. Sveinsson, Is-lenzkar Bókmenntir i Fornöld (1962). R.B.

OMAR KHAYYAM QUATRAIN (or Rubáiyát stanza; from Persian rubāʿī, quatrain). A stanza of 4 decasyllabic lines rhyming aaba (rarely aaaa). The name comes from Edward FitzGerald's Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, which is a loose adaptation of the Persian original (see PERSIAN POETRY), employing the same rhyme scheme but lacking the subtle rhythm: "I sometimes think that never blows so red / The Rose as where some buried Caesar bled; / That every Hyacinth the Garden wears / Dropt in its Lap from some once lovely Head." By leaving the third line blank FitzGerald avoids much of the monotony of the quatrain stanza. Swinburne's imitation, in Laus Veneris, links third lines in pairs. FitzGerald usually employs enjambment in the initial couplet, and his stanzas frequently have a sententious effect. R.O.E.

ONOMATOPOEIA. Strictly, o. refers to the formation or use of words which imitate sounds, such as hiss, snap, buzz, clash, murmur. Broadly, the term refers to combinations of words in which any correspondence is felt between sound and sense, whether of sound, of motion, or of mood. In Tennyson's

The moan of doves in immemorial elms
And murmuring of innumerable bees, only moan and murmuring are strictly onomatopoeic, but their reinforcement by the repeated m's, n's, and r's of immemorial, innumerable, and elms makes the whole passage onomatopoeitic in the broader sense.

Whether sounds of themselves can suggest meaning has been much disputed. Riding and Graves in A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1928) point out that the suggestiveness of Tennyson's lines is lost if their sounds are reproduced in a line of different meaning: "More ordure never will renew our midden's pure manure." Experimental evidence, however, indicates that sounds do have limited capacity for suggesting meaning; e.g. agreement will be almost universal as to which of the nonsense words taketa or naluma should go with a curved diagram and which with an angular one (W. Kohler, Gestalt Psychology, 1947). Undoubtedly this capacity has been often exaggerated and many purely fanciful correspondences discovered. Pope's dictum that "the sound must seem an echo to the sense" seems a reasonable view, since an echo comes after rather than before the event it accompanies. Most readers would agree that Tennyson's lines are more appropriate to their meaning than the following revision:

The moan of doves in stately ancient oaks
And quiet murmuring of countless bees.

The importance of o. to poetry has also been much disputed, some considering it the crowning technical achievement of the poet, others decrying it as a technical bauble quite removed from the essential nature of poetry. The historical record indicates that great poetry has existed without it, but that great poets in all languages have sought it. In Virgil's "Quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum" has been heard the gallop of a horse, and in Ennius's "At tuba terribili sonitu taratantara dixit" the sound of a trumpet. See also SOUND IN POETRY.—G. R. Stewart, The Technique of Eng. Verse (1930); L. P. Wilkinson, "O. and the Sceptics," cq. 36 (1942); N. C. Stageberg and W. L. Anderson, Poetry as Experience (1952); C. R. Woodring, "O. and Other Sounds in Poetry," ce. 14 (1953). L.P.

ORAL POETRY is poetry composed in oral performance by people who cannot read or write. It is synonymous with traditional and folk poetry, the latter term being an unfortunate product of German romanticism, and better by translation of "popular." This definition excludes verse composed for oral presentation, as well as verse that is pure improvisation outside of traditional patterns. All o. poetry is sung or, at the very least, chanted, and can be divided into three general classifications: ritual, lyric, and narrative. The origins of o. poetry are those of poetry itself. As literacy spreads throughout the world at a now rapid pace, o. poetry seems destined in time to disappear.

The two main types of o. narrative poetry, in fact of all narrative poetry (q.v.) both o. and written, are epic and ballad. The former is stichic, the same metric line being repeated for the entire song; whereas the latter, the ballad, is stanzaic. This seems to be the most reliable distinction between the two forms. All other points of difference between them probably stem from the different manners in which they are performed. The epic tends to longer songs because of the rapidity of telling; whereas the ballad tends to be shorter since the stanza is usually a slower method of narration and an audience runs quickly out of patience.

The nonnarrative types of o. poetry include (a) the incantation or charm, (b) the love song, (c) the lament, (d) the wedding ritual songs, and (e) other ritual songs for special festivals. Indeed all these types, including the love song, are ritual in origin and in ultimate purpose.

The most distinctive characteristic of o. poetry is its fluidity of text. While this is best seen in long epic songs, where the length renders impossible exact memorization from frequent repetition, it is discernible also with shorter poems. In them, however, the text becomes more stable in the hands of a single singer in direct proportion to the number of times that it is sung. Such stability is the result of habit and does not arise from any idea that there is a single unalterable text. In the case of magic incantations (and they would belong in the category of o. poetry if they were in verse), the exact reproduction of a text would seem sometimes to be necessary to make the magic effective; but our evidence here should be reviewed with care, because it may be that only certain alliterations or assonances rather than certain words and phrases must be repeated. When illiterate people inform us that a text must be repeated exactly word for word, we know from a comparison of performances that they mean essential characteristic for essential characteristic; for their concept of a word is different from ours.

Fluidity of text, or, to put it in reverse, the absence of a single fixed text, arises from the technique of o. composition, which the poet learns over many years, no matter which genre of verse is in question. It is a technique of improvisation by means of "formulas," phrases which say what the poet wants and needs to say, fitted to the varying metrical conditions of his tradition. These "stereotyped" phrases have often been thought of as the building blocks from which the poets construct their lines. Actually, they are probably not so stereotyped as was at first thought. For one thing, the "formulas" pervade the poetry; every line and every part of a line in o. poetry is "formulaic."

It is not a question of merely a comparatively few noun-epithet combinations or frequently used metrical units for introducing speeches; everything in the style is in the category of formula. The most often used phrases, the ones that a singer or poet hears most frequently when he is learning and therefore learns first, establish the patterns for the poetry, its characteristic syntactic, rhythmic, metric, and acoustic molds and configurations. In time the individual practitioner of the art can form new phrases, create formulas, by analogy with the old as needed. When he actually has become proficient in thinking in the traditional patterns, including the traditional phrases and everything else like them, he is a full-fledged singer of o. poetry. He composes naturally in the forms of his tradition, unconsciously, and often at very rapid speed.

Even as the formulas and their basic patterns make composing of lines possible in fast performance, so the associative use of parallelism in sound, syntax, and rhythm aids the o. poet in moving from one line to another. A line suggests what is to follow it. At times the complexity of structural interconnections between verses in o. style is so great that it seems that man could have attained it only with the aid of writing. Such a conclusion has an almost ironic flavor; for the truth probably is that these intricate architectonics of expression were developed first in o. verse, thus establishing from very archaic times the techniques which man with writing inherited and then believed himself to have "invented" with the stylus, the quill, and the pen.

O. poetry is of necessity paratactic. Its style has been called an "adding" style, because the majority of its lines could terminate in a period, insofar as their syntax is concerned; instead, however, another idea is "added" to what precedes, and so on for line after line. A comparatively small percentage of necessary run-on lines is, therefore, another distinctive and symptomatic feature of o. style.

What has been said above is applicable to all o. verse, albeit in varying degrees, whether it be ritual, lyric, or narrative. Meaning is conveyed by the sounds, rhythms, and figurative patterns of the words as well as by their conventional denotation and their connotation. The purpose of ritual is fulfilled, its magic is made effective, by these meanings. The same can be said for lyric verse. But o. narrative poetry, be it ballad or epic, has a story to tell, and the fact that the tale is being told in o. traditional verse imparts to its form certain necessary characteristics and may even be said to have some bearing on the kind of story chosen to be thus related.

Because there is no fixed text, o. narrative is not, cannot be, memorized, and is in constant flux, both in regard to its text and in respect to its story. Although there are many repeated incidents, scenes, and stock descriptions, these remain themselves ever flexible, susceptible to expansion or contraction; a journey may be related briefly or with copious details, the description of armor may occupy one line or a hundred, and still be termed the same "theme," as such repeated incidents and descriptions are called. Each theme has a minimum core, not in terms of lines or parts of lines, but in terms of essential ideas. Its outward form is ever changing; its essence remains. The theme is multiform, and has existence only in its multiforms. Habit and frequent use may set its form in the practice of a single singer to some degree of stability, but no given form is sacrosanct. Themes are useful, even as the "formulas," in any song in which the incident or description may belong. The journey framework may be employed in any number of stories; the assembly of men or of gods is common to many tales in song. In learning a song the singer needs only to remember the proper names of people and places and the sequence of events; he has no necessity to memorize, even were there a fixed text available, because he has the building blocks and the techniques for rapid-fire composition.

The configuration of themes that form a song in o. tradition is similar to the single theme in its fluidity. Like the themes that make it up, the song may be long or short according to the desires of the singer at the moment of performance. It may be ornamented to a greater or less degree. It, too, has multiforms. They are usually called variants, or versions. Probably the term "multiform" is better, more accurate, because both "variant" and "version" carry greater implication of an "original" that has undergone some kind of change resulting in the text before us. These terms arose from the belief that a well-defined and well-made original, a fixed text, became changed and "corrupted" through the faults of o. transmission and that lapses of memory and imperfections of memory gave opportunity for addition of new material or substitution of new incidents. Such "oral transmission" surely has taken place, in later stages of ballad tradition especially, and in a tradition after the initial recording period when fixed texts, or for example, broadside ballads, were available to be memorized, well or badly, and "corrupted." But this is not pure o. transmission, particularly in the epic forms. Pure o. transmission involves not memorization but recomposition; it does not consider any text, i.e., any performance, as an "original" or in any way fixed. It results in a retelling, not in a reproduction. Each performance, or multiform, has its own validity and is unique, whether it be a "good" or a "bad" performance of the song.

In o. poetry one can, and must, distinguish three meanings of the word "song," especially in the narrative forms, but also in ritual and lyric as well. The first is that of any performance; for, as we have just said, each performance is unique and valid in its own right. The second might be called that of the specific subject matter; e.g., the song of the capture of Bagdad by Sultan Selim. Combining the first and the second meanings, one can say with accuracy that there will be as many texts of the specific song as there are performances, whether they are recorded or not. This distinction between songs is not in the subtle sense of, let us say, interpretations of a play (with fixed text) by different actors, or by the same group of actors on different evenings. The divergencies are greater. The third meaning of "song" could be called the "generic." The story of the capture of Bagdad (the specific song) falls into the configuration of a number of stories dealing with the capture of cities, just as the Odyssey, for example, falls into the general category of songs recounting the return of the hero after long absence from home. The texts of this "song" would be very numerous, of course, and would reach back into the depths of human history.

The generic song is of considerable importance in o. poetic tradition. It is not merely a convenient method of classification. It represents rather the significant core of ideas in a song that survive reinterpretation and specific application to "history," a core held together by tensions from the past that give a meaning to the song not apparent on its surface, no matter how lowly or local any given performance may be. Because of this core one might say that each song in o. tradition has its "original" within it and even reflects the origin of the very genre to which it belongs.

In o. poetry the question of authorship is as complicated as the apparently simple problem of what constitutes a "song." Yet it is clear, to use the first of the three meanings of song, given above, that the performer, the folk singer, if you will, is the "author" of his particular performance. The performer is composer as well. One has, therefore, multiple authors, even as one has multiple texts, of any specific or generic song. But of any given text, there is but one author, its performer-composer. This is a different concept of multiple authorship from that historically employed in Homeric and other epic criticism since Wolf. This concept, furthermore, does not agree with the "communal" authorship put forth by scholars of the romantic period.

The date of any o. poem is, therefore, the date of the performance, or composition; that of the specific song would be the date on which some singer for the first time adapted existing themes and configurations to other specific people and events, that is to say, it would be the date of the first performance. The latter is ordinarily out of our grasp. The date of the generic song is lost in prehistory. And what has been said of date and authorship of an o. song can also be said about the date and authorship of any theme in the narrative poetry, and perhaps even of any formula or group of formulas. Each of these units has a life of its own as well as a life in any given song or context, and each has then a history of its own in addition to its history in the song. The author of any multiform of a theme (or of a formula) is the performer whom we see and hear, and its date is the date of our seeing and hearing. The analogy with language is especially cogent. Any phrase we use in ordinary speech is ours, but it has a history of its own outside of, but including, our own usage. The analogy is close because the language of o. poetry, formulaic though it be, is in fact an organic language, an organism of man's imaginative life.

The study of o. poetry as such is still very young and scholars are only now beginning to explore some of its problems. O. poetry long played an integral role in the life of human beings and social communities; its practice provided that spiritual activity necessary to man's existence; its bonds with everyday life were manifold and close. Its outlines and even a few of its deeper qualities are now becoming clear, as we can sift them from the crude ore of the transitional periods in which they were first recorded. As we come to know how o. poetry is composed and transmitted, we see new modes for its evaluation. And these modes lead us back to the symbols and meanings of poetry itself.

M. Parry, L'Épithète traditionnelle dans Homère (1928), Les Formules et la métrique d'Homère (1928) and "Studies in the Epic Technique of O. Verse Making, I: Homer and Homeric Style, II. The Homeric Language as the Language of an O. Poetry," HSCP, 41 (1930), 43 (1932); Chadwick; A. B. Lord, "Composition by Theme in Homer and South-slavic Epos," TPAPA, 82 (1951), "Homer's Originality: O. Dictated Texts," TPAPA, 84 (1953) and The Singer of Tales (1960); Wellek and Warren; C. M. Bowra, Heroic Poetry (1952); G. S. Kirk, The Songs of Homer (1962).

A.B.L.

ORGANISM. Critics as diverse as Aristotle, Longinus, Emerson, Henry James, Croce, Dewey, and Brooks have analogized artistic works to living things. However, the analogy has been most fully exploited by the German romantic critics and Coleridge, who were trying to formulate a "nonmechanistic" aesthetics and psychology of the creative process. The poem, they said, begins as a "seed" or "germ" in the creative imagination of the poet; its growth, primarily an unconscious process, consists in assimilating to itself foreign and diverse materials; its development and final form are self-determined; the result is an artistic work which in essence is like a living thing in that multiplicity and unity, the particular and the universal, content and form have coalesced and fused.

In contemporary criticism "organic," though widely used, has all but lost its metaphoric significance. The term is claimed by or attributed to critical systems which hold that the chief concern of criticism should be with the unity of the literary work. This stand is based on the conviction that artistic objects are complex integrated wholes which secure their aesthetic effects primarily as a consequence of their being such wholes. Thus it follows that the parts of an artistic whole have qualities, meanings, or effects which they would not have separately and that the most important excellence that can be attributed to any of the parts is to show that it is a necessary element of that whole. If all the distinguishable parts of a whole are essential and in the proper order and if the whole lacks no part necessary for its completeness, then the parts are "organically related" and the whole has "organic unity."

Despite disagreements over what is "true organicism," organicists are united in their opposition to form-content dualisms, to "ornamental" metaphor or any other separation of style and meaning, to any "mechanical" or "external" unity imposed by genre requirements or "rules," and to any criticism which treats the parts of a literary work as discrete elements and judges the value of these parts by separate aesthetic criteria. See also FORM.

C. Brooks, "The Poem as O.," Eng. Institute Annual (1941) and "Implications of an Organic Theory of Poetry," Lit. and Belief (EIE, 1958); S. C. Pepper, The Basis of Crit. in the Arts (1945); M. Weitz, Philos. of the Arts (1950); Abrams; W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "Explication as Crit.," The Verbal Icon (1954); R. H. Fogle, "Organic Form in Am. Crit., 1840-1870," The Development of Am. Lit. Crit., ed. F. Stovall (1955); H. Osborne, Aesthetics and Crit. (1955); E. Vivas, "What Is a Poem?" Creation and Discovery (1955); Krieger; R. H. Fogle, The Idea of Coleridge's Crit. (1962). F.G.

ORIGINALITY. In poetics, o. names a relational property indicating some degree of difference in matter or form that a new poem exhibits when it is compared with the total body of existing literature. Thus o. is opposed to the conventional and traditional; to plagiarism and imitation; to the hackneyed and the stereotyped. In a trivial sense, all poems are originals in that the peculiar combination of words that constitutes a particular poem did not exist before the poem was written. More importantly, o. has been attributed to a poem if it reflects novelty in diction, imagery, stanza form, or technical and structural devices; if it modifies an existing genre or establishes a new genre; if it treats of some facet of human life that had escaped literary treatment; if it describes something which could not be characterized as belonging to human life (Shakespeare's fairy lore); if it offers a new interpretation of human activity and destiny derived from philosophy, psychology, or some other science (compare Homer's treatment of Odysseus with that of Dante, Tennyson, and Joyce).

O. usually appears in systems of poetics as an aesthetic norm. Theorists from the beginning of criticism have disagreed as to whether o. is desirable and, if it is, to what extent it is desirable and in what aspects of a poem it should be reflected. Extreme positions have been defended. Coomaraswamy, speaking for a tradition that in Western poetics goes back to Plato, severely condemns the contemporary search for individuality and novelty: Eternal Truth does not change; the artist's function is to communicate Eternal Truth; any novelty in his work is therefore a defect. On the other hand, Edward Young, reacting to neoclassic recommendations to imitate the ancients, says, "We read Imitation with somewhat of his languor, who listens to a twice-told tale: Our spirits rouse at an Original; that is a perfect stranger, and all throng to learn what news from a foreign land. . . . All eminence, and distinction, lies out of the beaten road" (Conjectures on Original Composition, 1759). And in some versions of modern expressionist poetics o. is highly prized on the grounds that a poem should reflect a poet's unique personality or state of mind or his individual vision of reality. Most frequently, however, theorists have tried to recognize the claims of both tradition and individual talent, the original and the familiar, though not all theorists have given the same importance to both. Thus Coleridge recommends the reconciliation in a poem of "the sense of novelty and freshness, with old and familiar objects"; he says that his and Wordsworth's intention in Lyrical Ballads was to unite "the power of exciting the sympathy of the reader by a faithful adherence to the truth of nature, and the power of giving the interest of novelty by the modifying colors of imagination" (Biographia Literaria, ch. 14). Like Irving Babbitt, T. S. Eliot has attacked the modern tendency to recommend "the aggrandisement and exploitation of personality" in literature: "What is disastrous is that the writer should deliberately give rein to his 'individuality,' that he should even cultivate his differences from others; and that his readers should cherish the author of genius, not in spite of his deviations from the inherited wisdom of the race, but because of them." Eliot argues that a poet, under most circumstances, is successful only when writing within a tradition and that therefore his search for originality should be confined to producing "finer variations within a form." Thus the basic problem in evaluating a new poem is this: "Has this poet something to say, a little different from what anyone has said before, and has he found, not only a different way of saying it, but the different way of saying it which expresses the difference in what he is saying?" Finally, some systems of poetics reject o. as an aesthetic norm. Beardsley points out that since a poem can be original and good or original and bad, o. cannot be a valid standard, at least within the system of objective aesthetics that he is advocating. O. is a reason for admiring the poet and not his work.

I. Babbitt, "On Being Original," Lit. and the Am. College (1908) and "On Being Creative," On Being Creative and Other Essays (1932); J. L. Lowes, Convention and Revolt in Poetry (1919); L. P. Smith, Words and Idioms (1925); T. S. Eliot, After Strange Gods (1934) and On Poetry and Poets (1957), esp. "Johnson as Critic and Poet"; E. L. Mann, "The Problem of O. in Eng. Lit. Crit., 1750-1800," PQ, 18 (1939); A. K. Coomaraswamy, Why Exhibit Works of Art? (1943); M. C. Nahm, Aesthetic Experience and Its Presuppositions (1946) and The Artist as Creator (1956); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958). A.R.B.; F.G.

ORIYA POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

OTTAVA RIMA. A stanza of 8 iambic lines, rhyming abababcc. Its origin is obscure, being variously attributed to development from the ballade or the canzone (qq.v.) or to imitation of the Sicilian strambotto (q.v.). However, it was in use in the religious verse of late 13th-c. Italy, and it was given definitive artistic form by Boccaccio in his Teseida (1340-42) and his Filostrato (1339-40). Becoming almost immediately the dominant form of It. narrative verse, it was developed by Poliziano, Pulci, and Boiardo in the 15th c. and reached its apotheosis in the Orlando Furioso (1516) of Ludovico Ariosto, whose genius exploited its potentialities for richness, complexity, and variety of effect. Later in the same century, Tasso showed his mastery of the form. The poets of Renaissance Spain and Portugal followed It. example in adopting the form for narrative purposes.

Notable epics in o.r. are Arcilla's La Araucana in Sp. and Camões' Os Lusíadas in Portuguese.

Although the form was occasionally used by the Eng. Renaissance poets (e.g., Wyatt, Spenser, and Drayton), it was not until the romantic period that the form found a true Eng. master in Byron, whose translation of a portion of Pulci's Morgante Maggiore seems to have made him aware of the stanza's possibilities. He employed the stanza in Beppo, The Vision of Judgment, and, with greatest success, in Don Juan. Keats and Shelley also wrote poems in o.r.

The work of the great masters of the stanza—Ariosto and Byron—suggests that o.r. is most suited to work of a varied nature, blending serious, comic, and satiric attitudes and mingling narrative and discursive modes. Byron, referring to the work of Pulci, calls it "the half-serious rhyme" (Don Juan 4.6). Its accumulation of rhyme, reaching a precarious crescendo with the third repetition, prepares the reader for the neat summation, the acute observation, or the epigrammatic twist which comes with the final couplet:

And Julia's voice was lost, except in sighs,

Until too late for useful conversation;

The tears were gushing from her gentle eyes,

I wish, indeed, they had not had occasion;

But who, alas, can love, and then be wise?

Not that remorse did not oppose temptation:

A little still she strove, and much repented,

And whispering "I will ne'er consent"—consented.

(Byron, Don Juan 1.117)

Furthermore, the stanza is long enough to carry the thread of narrative but not so long that it becomes unmanageable.—Schipper; Hamer; V. Pernicone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," in Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di letteratura italiana, ed. A. Momigliano, II (1948); Wilkins; G. M. Ridenour, The Style of Don Juan (1960). F.J.W.; A.P.

OXYMORON (Gr. "pointedly foolish"). A figure of speech which combines two seemingly contradictory elements. It is a form of condensed paradox (q.v.): "O heavy lightness! serious vanity! / Mis-shapen chaos of well-seeming forms! / Feather of lead, bright smoke, cold fire, sick health!" (Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet 1.1). Although o. has been a recurrent device in poetry from the time of Horace ("concordia discors rerum"—the jarring harmony of things—Epistulae 1.12.19) to the time of Dylan Thomas, it is, par excellence, the rhetorical expression of the baroque era. Such poets as Marino in Italy, Góngora in Spain, Crashaw in England made it a primary vehicle of the 17th c. sensibility:

Welcome, all wonders in one sight!
Eternity shut in a span,
Summer in winter, day in night,
Heaven in earth, and God in man!

As the above quotation indicates, o. is particularly effective in evoking religious mysteries or other meanings which the poet feels to be beyond the reach of human sense. Its popularity in the late Renaissance owes something to the heightened religious concerns of that period and something to the revival of the habit of analogical thinking.

O., which reveals a compulsion to fuse all experience into a unity, should be carefully distinguished from antithesis (q.v.), which tends to divide and categorize elements of experience. Significantly, the latter figure, with its basis in rationality, dominates the poetry of the 18th c., a period which regarded the figures of the baroque poets as examples of "bad taste" or "false wit." But o. is not exclusively suited to religious poetry. Against Milton's use of the figure in Paradise Lost to evoke the unimaginable glories of God we may place the lines from Shakespeare quoted earlier, the stock Petrarchan figures for love's contradictions, and many passages in which Keats expresses the paradoxes of man's sensuous experience. See also CATACHRESIS, SYNAESTHESIA.—Lausberg; E. Mc Cann, "O. in Sp. Mystics and Eng. Metaphysical Writers," CL, 13 (1961). F.J.W.; A.P.

P

PAEAN (Gr. paian). The earliest mention of a p. is in Iliad 1.473, where, after the plague which Apollo had sent upon them, the Achaeans sought to propitiate the god with song. Apollo in his capacity as god of healing came to be invoked as Paian ("healer"), whence choral songs in his honor or in that of his sister Artemis were called "paeans." The p. as a literary form was employed by Pindar and others in the classical period of ancient Greece. As time went on, it might also be addressed to a successful general like Lysander or T. Quinctius Flamininus. The p. should be distinguished from the paeon (q.v.) which, however, has the same derivation.—A. Fairbanks, A Study of the Gr. P. (1900); Smyth; G. Norwood, Pindar (1945). R.J.G.

PAEON. A metrical unit consisting of 1 long and 3 short syllables: first p., — — — —; second p., — — — —; third, — — — —; fourth, — — — —. The first and the fourth p. are, in effect, cretics (— — —) by resolution of their last and first syllables respectively. The second and the third p., however, exist only in ancient metrical theory, and the fourth is quite rare. Paeonic verse, especially the first p., is found in Gr. poetry and more frequently in comedy than in tragedy. Cretics and paeons may occur in combination (cf. Aristophanes, Acharnians 210ff.). In Eng. poetry all four types have been used in combination with other kinds of feet. While the first and fourth p. are rare, the second and especially the third are not uncommon in modern accentual verse:

The appealing | of the Pásson | is tenderer |

in prayer apart"
(G. M. Hopkins, The Wreck of the Deutschland).

J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); Dale; Hamer; B. Ghiselin, "Paeonic Measures in Eng. Verse," MLN, 57 (1942). D.S.P.

PAINTING AND POETRY. See FINE ARTS AND POETRY.

PALILLOGY. See ANADIPLOSIS.

PALIMBACCHIUS. Also known as the anti-bacchius. A metrical unit in Gr. lyric poetry composed of 2 long syllables and 1 short one: — — —. It is the reverse (Gr. palin "back") of a bacchius (q.v.)—Dale; Koster. R.A.H.

PALINDROME (Gr. "running back again"). A word, sentence or verse which reads alike backward or forward. Its reputed inventor was Sotades, a lascivious poet of the 3d c. B.C., from whose name the palindromes are often referred to as Sotadics. There are no examples from the classical Gr. period. The best known p. in Gr. is "nipson anomemata me monan opsin" (wash my transgressions, not only my face), attributed to Gregory of Nazianzus and often inscribed on fonts in monasteries or churches. A familiar one is also the Latin "Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor." The following line by Camden illustrates a more refined type of p. in which each word reads alike backward or forward: "Odo tenet mulum, madidam mappam tenet Anna, Anna tenet mappam madidam, mulum tenet Odo." Palindromes were popular in Byzantine times. We possess a number of them written by the emperor Leo the Wise (10th c.). In 1802 Ambrose Pamperis published, in Vienna, a pamphlet containing 416 palindromic verses recounting some of the campaigns of Catherine the Great. Among the best known examples in Eng. are perhaps the following: "Madam, I'm Adam" and "Able was I ere I saw Elba," a saying attributed to Napoleon. Also called carcinoi, versus anacyclici, versus echoici.—K. Preisendanz, "Palindrom," A. Pauly, G. Wissowa, and W. Kroll, Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, xviii, 2 (1949). P.S.C.

PALINODE. Originally a term applied to a lyric by Stesichorus in which he recanted his earlier attack upon Helen as the baneful cause of the Trojan War. Hence, any poem or song of retraction. The p. as a theme, or a conceit, in literature has been common in love poetry since Ovid's Remedia Amoris, supposedly written to retract his Ars Amatoria. It appears in medieval literature in The Romance of the Rose and in the courtly love poetry. Chaucer uses it as a device throughout his poems and as the reason for his Legend of Good Women, written to retract the effect of Troilus and Criseyde.—Lewis. R.A.H.

PALINODIC. Originally in Gr. lyric poetry an arrangement of two metrically corresponding members (e.g., strophe and antistrophe) interrupted by another pair of similarly corresponding members. Thus the "stanzas" are arranged in the pattern abba, with ab the "ode" and ba the "palinode"; e.g., a is strophe, a, antistrophe, b and b the second strophe and antistrophe. The term is now used of any such arrangement in any poetry and may also be applied to single lines in such a pattern.—U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Sappho und Simonides (1913). R.A.H.

PANEGYRIC. A speech or poem in praise of an individual, institution or group. Originally p. was a rhetorical type belonging to the epideictic category of oratory. Its rules are given in the rhetorical works of Menander and Hermogenes and famous examples include the Panegyricus of Isocrates, the p. of Pliny the Younger on Trajan, and the eleven other XII Panegyrici Antici (4th c.). Much primitive poetry is p. in nature, consisting of the praises of heroes, armies, victories, states, etc. Pindar's odes have been loosely described as panegyrics. After the 3d c. B.C., p. was accepted as a formal poetic type and its rules were given in handbooks of poetry. It became popular during the decadence of classical poetry and like other such forms persisted until the Renaissance. Scaliger gives its rules in his Poetices Libri Septem (1561).

P. is almost indistinguishable from encomium, but according to Scaliger it tends to deal with present men and deeds, while encomium deals with the past. Among significant examples of p. poems are Sidonius' poems on the Emperors Avitus, Majorian, and Anthemius; Claudian's on Honorius and on the consulship of Probinus and Olybrius; the p. on the death of Celsus by Paulinus of Nola; Aldhelm's de Laudibus Virginum; and innumerable poems in praise of Mary, the cross, the martyrs, etc. In the Renaissance the tradition continued unabated with perhaps more emphasis on the praise of secular figures and institutions. One notable feature of p. is its tendency to develop toward epic, which it heavily influenced in the Renaissance.—T. Burges, Epideictic Lit. (1902); Chadwick. O.B.H.

PANJABI POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

PANTOUM. A poem of indeterminable length, composed of quatrains in which the second and fourth lines of each stanza serve as the first and third lines of the next, the process continuing through the last stanza. In this quatrain the first line of the poem also reappears as the last and, in some Eng. pantoums, the third line of the poem as the second. Thus, the p. begins and ends with the same line. Another distinct feature is that different themes must be developed concurrently in the p., one in the first 2 lines and the other in the last 2 lines of each quatrain, the 2 pairs of lines being connected only by their sound.

A distinct Malayan verse form (pantun, see MALAY POETRY), the p. was introduced into Western poetry by the Fr. orientalist Ernest Fouinet and was established by the practice of Victor Hugo in his Notes to Les Orientales. In Fr. the form was effectively used by Théodore de Banville, Louisa Siefert, Leconte de Lisle, and, with considerable variations, by Charles Baudelaire; in Eng. by Austin Dobson, Brander Matthews, and others. Despite its oriental origin and its relatively late Western adoption, the p. is often listed with the much older Fr. forms, such as rondeau, triolet, ballade, and villanelle (qq.v.).—Kastner; M. Grammont, Petit traité de versification française (7th ed., 1930); P. G. Brewster, "Metrical, Stanzaic, and Stylistic Resemblances between Malayan and Western Poetry," RLC, 32 (1958); finds European analogues of the p. in the German Schnaderhüpfel, the Russian chastushka, the Sp. copla, the Latvian and Lithuanian daina). A.P.

PARABASIS (Gr. "coming forward"). A choral performance, composed mainly in anapaestic tetrameters, in Old Gr. Comedy. During an intermission in the action the chorus, alone in the orchestra and out of character, came forward without their masks to face the audience and delivered, in song or recitative, views which the author felt strongly on various matters, such as politics, religion, etc. The parts of a complete p. were said to be introductory song (kommation), parabasis (properly so called), makron or pnigos (to be recited at one breath), strophe or ode (melos), epirrhema, antode or antistrophe, and antiepirrhema. Not all parts occur in every p.—J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); F. M. Cornford, The Origin of Gr. Comedy (1914); G. Norwood, Gr. Comedy (1931); Schmid and Stählin. R.A.H.

PARADOX. A statement which seems untrue but proves valid upon close inspection. E.g.: "The longest way round is the shortest way home;" or, "When my love swears that she is made of truth / I do believe her, though I know she lies" (Shakespeare, Sonnet 138). P. was recognized by ancient rhetoricians (Menander, Hermogenes, Cicero, Quintilian, etc.) as one of the standard figures. It was popular during the decadent period of Graeco-Roman literature in such forms as paradoxical encomium, controversiae, and suasoriae. During the Middle Ages paradoxical arguments were used to train students in rhetoric and for humor or irony in literature, as in the arguments against chastity in the Romance of the Rose. The most famous Renaissance example of sustained p. is The Praise of Folly by Erasmus; but because of the paradoxical nature of Christian values, p. abounds in both popular and esoteric literature of the later Middle Ages and Renaissance. In literature of the Renaissance, p. is handled with moderation and is merely one of several popular figures. However, during the baroque period, p. became a central poetic figure. It is particularly important in the prose and poetry of Donne. One of his earliest works is the prose collection Paradoxes and Problems; and the techniques of paradoxical argument developed in this collection are evident throughout his Songs and Sonnets and his sermons. Fondness for p. is evident in poetry of the later 17th c. and the 18th c. However, as in Dryden and Pope, it tends to be verbal p., reflected in the use of balance and antithesis in the heroic couplet, rather than paradoxical argument. Hazlitt called neoclassic poetry "the poetry of paradox" and contrasted it with what he felt was the far richer "poetry of imagination" written by the Elizabethans.

Both Friederich Schlegel and Thomas De Quincey argued that p. is a vital element in poetry, reflecting the paradoxical nature of the world which poetry imitates. DeQuincey wrote in the Autobiography, "... to speak in the mere simplicity of truth, so mysterious is human nature, and so little read by him who runs, that almost every weighty aspect of truth upon that theme will be found at first sight to be startling, or sometimes paradoxical. And so little need is there for chasing or courting paradox, that, on the contrary, he who is faithful to his own experiences will find all his efforts little enough to keep down the paradoxical air besieging much of what he knows to be the truth. No man needs to search for paradox in this world of ours. Let him simply confine himself to the truth, and he will find paradox growing everywhere under his hands as rank of weeds."

As a widely employed critical term, p. is peculiar to 20th-c. criticism. The rediscovery of Donne and Marvell undoubtedly played a part in its usage, as well as our general awareness of the need for the ironic mind. It is in Cleanth Brooks' The Well Wrought Urn that p. is most closely examined. Brooks says, in "The Language of Paradox," that p. is a form of indirection, and indirection is a general characteristic of poetic language and structure. Brooks brings a good deal of evidence to bear in support of his thesis, showing examples of p. in a poet like Wordsworth, whom one might expect to be a poet of simple, direct statement. An issue that he touches on but probably does not develop sufficiently is the difference between verbal paradoxes and paradoxical situations. Because he does not sufficiently stress this distinction, Brooks is sometimes accused of reducing poetry to "screaming paradoxes." Obviously, as his analysis of Wordsworth's Composed upon Westminster Bridge shows, Brooks does not insist merely on witty paradoxes. He is more concerned, and rightly so, to show that many interesting and good poems are written from insights that dramatically enlarge or in some way startlingly modify our commonplace conceptions and understandings, and these we call paradoxical. A good poet might, for example, take Eliot's p., "Liberty is a different sort of pain from prison," and make it into a full poem. Whether he kept Eliot's own verbal p. or chose to render the idea either by a series of examples or of simple direct statements would be of little significance. His poem would remain paradoxical.—Brooks and Warren; C. Brooks, "The Language of P.," The Well Wrought Urn (1947); R. Crane, "The Critical Monism of Cleanth Brooks," Critics and Crit. (1952); D. Daiches, "Poetry and P.," Crit. Approaches to Lit. (1956); H. K. Miller, "The Paradoxical Encomium . . .," MP, 53 (1956). w.v.o.C.

PARALEIPSIS. See APOSIOPESIS.

PARALLELISM (Gr. "side by side"). In poetry a state of correspondence between one phrase, line, or verse with another. P. seems to be the basic aesthetic principle of poetic utterance. According to B. R. Lewis, Creative Poetry (1931), primitive man, "if strongly aroused, and if his emotion was sustained, . . . must have repeated . . . the same sequence of sounds. . . ." Such repetitions as "Nyah eh wa, Nyah eh wa," of the Am. Indian, "Ha-ah, Ha-ah," of the New Zealander, "Wa-la-wa, Wa-la-wa," of the Beowulf poet, are parallel refrains of the most elemental, lyrical nature. Tense emotion, such as joy, grief, anger, longing, seems naturally to give rise to parallel utterance, and, doubtless, p. was the basic element of primitive poetry before such refinements as meter and rhyme were invented.

P. of clauses is the central principle of biblical verse, a fact not fully understood by the translators of the Authorized Version. The principle was rediscovered by Bishop Robert Lowth who called it parallelismus membrorum and noted several distinct varieties; in fact many structural types have been described, including especially those based on sameness, antithesis, and complement. But in the Bible there seems not only to have been structural and rhythmic p. but also p. on an interpretive level. Thus the significance of a figure may be understood by the envelope or stanzaic pattern formed by the relations of the members. Accordingly the Lord's Prayer might be printed:

Our Father which art in heaven:
Hallowed be thy name,
Thy Kingdom come,
Thy will be done,
In earth as it is in heaven.

Therein all the parallel clauses are connected with both the opening and closing, and the meaning becomes: "Hallowed be thy name in earth as it is in heaven; Thy kingdom come in earth as it is in heaven, etc.," thereby considerably enriching the interpretive value. This principle has been of some importance to modern biblical commentary.

Doubtless p. occurs in all languages in which there is poetry dealing with feelings of a religious or exalted nature or where strong emotion is expressed. But the poet who has certainly made the most use of this device in Eng. is Walt Whitman. G. W. Allen divides Whitman's devices into four main types: (1) Synonymous p., where the second line enforces the first by repeating the thought: "I too am not a bit tamed. I too am untranslatable. / I sound my barbaric yawp over the roofs of the world" (Song of Myself, Sec. 52). (There may or may not be repetition of the actual words). (2) Antithetical p., where the second line denies or contrasts the first. (3) Synthetic or cumulative p., where the second line, or several consecutive lines, supplements or completes the first. (4) Climactic p., or "ascending rhythm," where each successive line adds to its predecessor, usually taking words from it and completing it. However, as C. M. Lewis, The Foreign Sources of Modern Eng. Versification (1898) claims, there is "no modern poetry of any great importance in which this principle is the only determinant of form."—Bishop R. Lowth, Isaiah, a New Tr., with a Preliminary Dissertation (1778); C. A. Smith, Repetition and P. in Eng. Verse (1894); R. G. Moulton, The Lit. Study of the Bible (1895); G. W. Allen, Am. Prosody (1935).

R.O.E.

PARAPHRASE, HERESY OF. See HERESY OF PARAPHRASE.

PARARHYME. See NEAR RHYME.

PARNASSIANS. The "Parnassiens" were the group, or groups, of Fr. poets who were born about 1840 or 1850 and gravitated around Leconte de Lisle. They treated a number of nonpersonal themes taken from history, science, philosophy, nature, or contemporary life; but some were mainly lyricists. They respected and often followed their elders; used traditional verse forms; and regarded the cult of poetry as a religion. Le premier Parnasse contemporain (1866) was followed by other recueils in 1871 and 1876; but the works of individual "Parnassiens" covered the period from 1865 to the end of the century and represented the norm of Fr. poetry between the romantic era and the symbolists. Among recent critics, Souriau regards Leconte de Lisle as the "chef-d'orchestre" of the "école parnassienne"; in his view, the only true P. were this poet and his disciples Diérx and Heredia. But Ibrovac, Martino and Peyre have brought out the complexity of "Le Parnasse" and shown that the poets composing it did not for the most part echo Leconte de Lisle. A. Schaffer has developed these views and explained the great variety of attitudes and genres that existed.

The movement was initiated by Catulle Mendès and L.-X. de Ricard in the early 1860's and the P. first met in Lemerre's bookshop and in the salon of the Marquise de Ricard; later they foregathered in the salon of Mme Leconte de Lisle, whose formidable husband was regarded as an oracle. Of the fifty or more poets called Parnassian only a few can be mentioned here. Among the more independent, Albert Glatigny (1839-73) was a wit and virtuoso who took his cue from Banville. Sully-Prudhomme (1839-1907) explored the secrets of the inner life in verses as poignant as Heine's but without Heine's bitterness. He wrote philosophic poems, using a delicate imagery drawn from the natural sciences. François Coppée (1842–1908) described the life and problems of humble folk and, like Sully-Prudhomme, was sensitive to the writer's moral responsibilities. The followers of Leconte de Lisle respected traditional morals, but worshipped "Art." Gautier as well as Banville remained a potent influence. Léon Dierx (1838–1912) wrote tragic poems on historical themes and struck a note of despair. Jean Lahor (1840–1909) exhaled his melancholy in Buddhist verses. J.-M. de Heredia (1842–1905) drew inspiration from the Gr. myths, from the epigrams of the Gr. Anthology and from the L. poets. He was something of a scholar and palaeographer, but above all a finished artist. Most of his Trophées (1895) are sonnets, and he is the outstanding sonneteer of modern France. Anatole France (1844–1924) was more independent. Although a versatile neo-Hellenist, he was also, in his Poèmes dorés, an exquisite nature poet. Jules Lemaitre (1853–1914), the critic and literary historian, was also a delightful conteur and poet.

Though some of them underwent the influence of Ménard, the P. were not primarily Hellenists, nor were they as a whole impassive or impersonal. If they had anything in common, it was a love of precision, a devotion to formal beauty and the cult of rhyme; beyond that, in Henri Peyre's words, "un romantisme assagi et mitigé."

C. Mendès, La légende du Parnasse contemporain (1884); R. Canat, Une forme du mal du siècle. Du sentiment de la solitude morale chez les romantiques et les Parnassiens (1904) and La Renaissance de la Grèce antique (1911); M. Ibrovac, J. M. de Heredia: sa vie, son oeuvre (1923); T. Martel, Le Parnasse (1923); Martino; F. Desonay, Le rêve hellénique chez les poètes parnassiens (1928); E. Estève, Le Parnasse (1929); A. Therive, Le Parnasse (1929); A. Schaffer, Parnassus in France (1930) and The Genres of Parnassian Poetry (1944); M. Souriau, Hist. du Parnasse (1930); H.-M. Peyre, Louis Ménard (1822–1901) (1932) and Bibliog. critique de l'hellénisme en France de 1843 à 1870 (1932); F. Vincent, Les Parnassiens (1933); M. G. Rudler, Parnassiens, symbolistes et décadents (1938); Z. Rosenberg, La persistance du subjectivisme chez les poètes parnassiens (1939); A. Lytton Sells, "Heredia's Hellenism," MLR, 37 (1942); V. Errante, Parnassiani e simbolisti francesi (1953). A.L.S.

PARNASSUS. An 8,000 foot mountain in Phocis in Greece. On its slopes were the Castalian Spring (sacred to the Muses) and the Oracle of Delphi. It had two peaks, one sacred to Apollo and one to Dionysus. It was the traditional haunt of the Muses, q.v. (cf. Pro-pertius 3.13.54; Persius, Prologue to the Satires; Chaucer, Prologue to Franklin's Tale, etc.). References to P. abound in postclassical literature. Usually it stands by synecdoche for poetic achievement. In the 17th c. a genre of satirical criticism arose which may be called "Parnassus-literature" (e.g., Ragguagli di Parnaso, 1612; The Pilgrimage to Parnassus and The Returne from Parnassus, ca. 1600). See also PARNASSIANS. A.R.B.

PARODOS (Gr. "the way past"). The odes sung by the chorus in an ancient Gr. drama upon entering the orchestra for the first time. The word also means either of the two passageways between the spectators and the scene-building into the orchestra in an ancient Gr. theatre.—A. Pickard-Cambridge, The Dramatic Festivals of Athens (1953); M. Bieber, A Hist. of the Gr. and Roman Theater (2d ed., 1961). R.A.H.

PARODY (Gr. parōdia). DEFINITIONS. P. is as old as poetry itself. One fundamental distinction can be made between comic p., which is close to burlesque (q.v.), and literary or critical p., which follows more closely a given author's style or a particular work of art. In the broader sense p. and literary burlesque originated in classic drama where they expressed a basic impulse for emotional counterpoint to tragic themes. From Aristophanes to Shakespeare and into our time the comic interlude, with its ludicrous parallel of the main plot, has functioned as a parody—to provide a breather or the catharsis of laughter. It is, therefore, somewhat beside the point to regard all p. with suspicion or distrust. For, although a parasitic art and written at times with malice, p. is as fundamental to literature as is laughter to health.

Critical p. has been defined as the exaggerated imitation of a work of art. Like caricature it is based on distortion, bringing into bolder relief the salient features of a writer's style or habit of mind. It belongs to the genus satire (q.v.) and thus performs the double-edged task of reform and ridicule. Eccentricity, sentimentalism, pedantry, dullness, pompousness, and self-importance are among its major targets, and at its best it is a critical instrument of telling force because it approaches the subject from within rather than from without, and thus avoids the reproach of poets and creative writers that a critic is simply a disappointed artist. P. usually makes its point by employing a serious style to express an incongruous subject, thus disturbing the balance of form and matter. It keeps attention focused on the poem imitated with, in most cases, a deflationary intent.

The best p. surpasses mere imitation. It stands on its own feet, containing enough independent humor to be funny beyond aping of the original. The following brief example of modern p. will illustrate its insistence upon common sense and reality against what Mark Twain termed "girly-girly romance." Bret Harte's sequel to Whittier's sentimental ballad Maud Muller details the long connubial years of Mrs. Judge Jenkins and closes with a deft p. of the final familiar couplet by showing us the other half of the coin:

If of all words of tongue or pen
The saddest are 'It might have been,'

Sadder are these, we daily see,
'It is, but hadn't ought to be!'

There are as many different motives for p. as there are parodists. Sometimes, especially in the 18th-c. coffee houses, it was personal spite. More often the parodist employed the style of his original to poke fun at current follies or vices. He might have a social axe to grind or he might wish to expose a certain literary school or mannerism which has hardened into conventionality. Thus Cervantes dealt a classic blow to the fiction of knight-errantry and Fielding punctured the Richardsonian novel of sentiment in Joseph Andrews. A familiar example of the double-edged p. in verse is Lewis Carroll's Hiawatha's Photographing in which the rhythms of Longfellow are employed to poke fun at the then novel practise of the family photograph. J. C. Squire aped Gray's Elegy and at the same time aimed his p. at the Spoon River series of Masters; and E. B. White in A Classic Waits for Me has written a fine take-off on the Classics Club selection of best sellers in the rolling lines of Whitman.

HISTORY. P. was originally "a song sung beside," i.e., a comic imitation of a serious poem. The imitation may be of the actual words or of the manner; the comic effect may be achieved by applying high-flown language or meter to trivial themes or by some other form of incongruity or caricature. The instinct to burlesque any lofty or pompous performance is deep in our nature; but with us p. proper is a form of literary criticism which consists in heightening the characteristics of the thing imitated. Aristotle (Poetics 1448a12) attributes the origin of p. as an art to Hegemon of Thasos, because he used epic style to represent men not as superior to what they are in ordinary life but as inferior. Hegemon was, we are told, a comic poet of the 5th c. who was the first to introduce parodies into the theatre (Athenaeus 15.699a); he was reciting his p. of the Battle of the Giants in the theatre when the news arrived of the disaster in Sicily. Athenaeus elsewhere quotes Polemo as saying that p. was invented by the iambic poet Hipponax (6th c. B.C.), who had himself been the victim of caricature at the hands of the sculptors and painters; we have a few lines of his mock-heroic epic on the adventures of a glutton. Athenaeus also refers to Epicharmus and two poets of the Old Comedy, Cratinus and Hermippus. Much earlier than these was the pseudo-Homeric Margites, known to Archilochus (Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci, Archilochus fr. 117), which set forth in hexameters (with intermingled iambs) the story of a fool. We still have the Battle of the Frogs and Mice, which parodies Homer. Athenaeus has preserved a long passage by Matron setting forth in epic style an account of an Athenian banquet. The supreme parodist in antiquity was Aristophanes, who may be thought to have reached his highest level in the Frogs, where he parodies the styles of Aeschylus and Euripides. But almost every page of Aristophanes contains a touch of p. In later comedy this element dwindles. Plato imitates the styles of several prose writers with amusing effect; in the Symposium (194e-197e) he puts into Agathon's mouth a speech in the manner of Gorgias. Lucian has a good many touches of p. or burlesque, for example in Dialogue 20, the Judgment of Paris, where the comic effect is achieved by making the divine characters talk in the language of ordinary life.

Roman humor had a strong element of satire; the phlyax pots and the performances which they presumably illustrate must have appealed to the Romans. In L. comedy we find occasional burlesque of the tragic manner, e.g., in the prologues to the Amphitryon and the Rudens, the mad scene in the Menaechmi, and Pandalisca's mock-tragic outburst (Casina 621ff.)—passages which, whatever the original may have been, owe their effect to the language and the meter. A more delicate irony is shown in Syrus' mocking reply to the sententious words of Demea (Adelphoe 420ff.). Lucilius imitates the style of the Roman tragic poets, for example Pacuvius' unusual words and awkward compounds. The fourth poem of Catullus is closely parodied in Catalepton 10. Persius ridicules by imitation the styles of Pacuvius and other poets. Petronius (Satyricon 119-24) gives us a long hexameter poem on the Civil War, parts of which may be meant as a caricature of Lucan.

In its later days the Roman mime parodied the rites of the Christian church. During the later Middle Ages parodies of liturgy, well-known hymns, and even the Bible were popular. Renaissance authors, when not embroiled in the polemics of the Reformation, preferred to parody the classics or such "gothic" phenomena as romance and scholasticism—e.g., Boiardo's Morgante Maggiore, Cervantes' Don Quixote (p. of romance); Giambattista Gelli's Circe, Tassoni's La Secchia Rapita, Scarron's Virgile Travesti (p. of the classics); Erasmus' Praise of Folly, Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel (p. of scholasticism). Of these authors Rabelais is the most universal, the richest, and the most difficult to classify.

P. became institutionalized during the 17th c. The existence of academies and distinct literary movements, particularly in Italy, France, and England, encouraged debates in which p. was used as a weapon of satire. Boccalini's Ragguagli di Parnasso (1612) was the origin of a whole genre employing p. as a device for criticizing contemporary authors.

Eng. p. had its beginnings in ecclesiastical litany and the Mass. It was employed in the Miracle Plays where a scene of common life (the Mak episode in The Second Shepherd's Play) provided comic relief. Chaucer's The Rime of Sir Thopas parodied the grandiose style of medieval romances. Shakespeare burlesqued his own romantic love plots with rustic amours, and John Marston, in turn, wrote a rough, humorous travesty of Venus and Adonis. In 1705 John Phillips (The Splendid Shilling) used the solemn blank verse of Milton to celebrate ludicrous incidents. One of the best-known 17th c. parodies was the Duke of Buckingham's The Rehearsal (1671) which leveled its shafts mainly at Dryden's The Conquest of Granada and at the grand manner of heroic drama. In the next century, Sheridan's The Critic took a similar target. Exceptions to the general rule that p. rarely outlives the literature parodied, The Rehearsal and The Critic have been revived in the 20th c.

The Golden Age of p. in Eng. poetry paralleled the rise of romantic and transcendental attitudes, perfect targets for the literary head-shrinkers. Canning, Ellis, and John Hookham Frere produced a series of parodies in the Anti-Jacobin Journal (1790-1810). Here the Southey-Wordsworth brand of Fr. revolutionary sympathy for knife-grinders and tattered beggars provided good anti-Jacobin sport. Byron's Vision of Judgment and Shelley's Peter Bell likewise parodied Southey, Wordsworth, and "elemental" poetry. James Hogg in 1816 took off most of the Eng. romantics, and in 1812 James and Horace Smith published Rejected Addresses, a landmark in Eng. p., in which the styles of Scott, Wordsworth, Byron, Coleridge, Dr. Johnson, and others were skillfully but not uproariously parodied. In the later 19th c. names and titles continue to multiply. Tennyson, Browning, Longfellow, Poe, Swinburne, and Whitman become the chief targets for such parody artists as J. K. Stephen, C. S. Calverly, J. C. Squire, Lewis Carroll (Father William after Southey's The Old Man's Comforts), Swinburne (The Higher Pantheism in a Nutshell à la Tennyson and Nepheleidia, a self-parody), Andrew Lang, and Max Beerbohm. In America the names of Phoebe Cary, Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Bayard Taylor, H. C. Bunner, and J. K. Bangs were most prominent before 1900. In the present century The New Yorker has carried on the tradition established by Punch and Vanity Fair. During the 1920's p. found a highly congenial atmosphere when such talented writers as Corey Ford, Louis Untermeyer, Frank Sullivan, Donald Ogden Stewart, Wolcott Gibbs, James Thurber, Benchley, Hofferstein, and E. B. White persisted in seeing the funny side of the hard-boiled generation in prose and verse. With a history of twenty-five centuries behind it, p., it seems, is here to stay. Like all literature it has had its ups and downs, but at its best it is more than a parasitic art. It has attracted men and women of major stature and at times has shown the capacity to outlive the serious work which has inspired it. See also BURLESQUE.

COLLECTIONS: Parodies of the Works of Eng. and Am. Authors, ed. W. Hamilton (6 v., 1884-89); A P. Anth., ed. C. Wells (1904); A Book of Parodies, ed. A. Symons (1908); A Century of P. and Imitation, ed. W. Jerrold and R. M. Leonard (1913); Am. Lit. in P., ed. R. P. Falk (1957); Parodies, an Anthol., ed. D. MacDonald (1960).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. T. Murray, On P. and Paratragedy in Aristophanes (1891); A. S. Martin, On P. (1896); C. Stone, P. (1915); P. Lehmann, Die Parodie im Mittelalter (2 v., 1922); E. Gosse, "Burlesque," Selected Essays, First Series (1928); G. Kitchin, A Survey of Burlesque and P. in Eng. (1931); A. H. West, L'Influence française dans la poésie burlesque en Angleterre entre 1660-1700 (1931); R. P. Bond, Eng. Burlesque Poetry, 1700-1750 (1932); G. Highet, Anatomy of Satire (1962; chap. on p.).

R.P.F.; W.B.

PAROEMIAC (Gr. "proverbial"). An anapaestic dimeter catalectic commonly used in proverbial and popular expressions, with metrical form

— — — | — — — | — — — | —

It is often employed as a clausula (see PROSE RHYTHM) in anapaestic systems.—Koster; L. Parker, "The Incidence of Word-End in Anapaestic Paroemiacs and Its Application to Textual Questions," cq. n.s. 8 (1958); U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958).

P.S.C.

PARONOMASIA. See PUN.

PARTICULA PENDENS. See ANACOLUTHON.

PARTIMEN (also called joc partit, Fr. jeu parti). A specialized variety of tenso (see under TENZONE) in which one poet proposes two hypothetical situations (e.g., whether it is better to love a lady who does not love you, or to be loved by a lady whom you do not love). The second poet chooses and defends one of these alternatives, while the first poet upholds the other. After each has had his say in the same number of stanzas (usually three), all identical in structure, they commonly refer the debate to one or more arbiters for settlement. There are also partimens involving three poets and three choices, but these are far less frequent. It seems certain that these partimens really represent the cooperative work of two or more poets; but in view of the difficulties involved it is unlikely that they were actually improvised, as they purport to be. Sometimes it is even clear from the poem itself that the poets were writing back and forth over a considerable distance.—L. Selbach, Das Streitgedicht in der altprovenzalischen Lyrik (1886); Jeanroy, II.

F.M.C.

PASSION PLAY. The play of the Resurrection was elaborately developed in the Middle Ages before the events of the Crucifixion were dramatized. Two brief L. plays from Benediktbeuern, Upper Bavaria, in the Carmina Burana manuscript (13th c.) indicate that the plays of the Passion proper were invented as prologues to the Resurrection. Once on the stage such plays, because of their greater interest, quickly became more popular than the Resurrection from which they had originated, so that in time the combined dramas came to be called P. plays. In some places P. plays became parts of the Corpus Christi cycle, but in larger areas on the continent of Europe and the south of England they remained separate from the plays of the Nativity and became enormously popular. Most of them came to an end in the 16th and 17th c., but a few of them in remote places in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland lived on until later dates. The well-known Oberammergau P. play has continued to be acted, usually at ten-year intervals, for hundreds of years. The play has, however, been recast on the lines of classical drama. P. plays seem to have been brought to America by the Spaniards and to have survived in degenerate forms in Sp. America.—W. Creizenach, Gesch. des neueren Dramas (3 v., 1893-1903); J. E. Wackernell, Altdeutsche Passionsspiele aus Tirol (1897); E. K. Chambers, The Mediaeval Stage (2 v., 1903); G. Frank, The Mediaeval Fr. Drama (1954).

H.C.

PASTORAL. HISTORY. The p. imitates rural life, usually the life of an imaginary Golden Age, in which the loves of shepherds and shepherdesses play a prominent part. To insist on a realistic (or even a recognizably "natural") presentation of actual shepherd life would exclude the greater part of the compositions that are called p. Only when poetry ceases to imitate ordinary rural life does it become distinctly p. It must be admitted, however, that the term has been and still is used to designate any treatment of rural life, as for instance Louis Untermeyer's speaking of Robert Frost as a "pastoral" poet or John F. Lynen writing on his "P. art." Perhaps most critics agree with Edmund Gosse that the "pastoral is cold, unnatural, artificial, and the humblest reviewer is free to cast a stone at its dishonored grave." But there must be some unique value in a genre that lasted 2,000 years. This long-lived popularity, it seems, derives from the fact that the shepherd—a simple swain, with whom everyone may easily identify himself—deals with a universal subject—something fundamentally true about everyone. Thus the complex is reduced to the simple; the universal is expressed in the concrete.

For all practical purposes the p. begins with Theocritus' Idyls, in the 3d c. B.C. Though the canon of his work is unsettled, enough of the poems in the collection made by Artemidorus are certainly his to justify the claim that Theocritus is the father of p. poetry. No. 11, for example, in which Polyphemus is depicted as being in love with Galatea and finding solace in song, becomes the prototype of the love lament; no. 1, in which Thyrsis sings of Daphnis' death, sets the pattern and, to no small degree, the matter for the p. elegy; no. 5 and no. 7 introduce the singing match conducted according to the rules of amoebaeon poetry. And no. 7, in the appearance of contemporary poets under feigned names, contains the germ of the allegorical p. Theocritus wrote his pastorals while he was at Ptolemy's court of Alexandria, but he remembered the actual herdsmen of his boyhood and the beautiful countryside of Sicily; so he, like the p. poets who followed him, was a city man longing for the country. But perhaps no other p. poet has ever been able to strike such a happy medium between the real and the ideal.

Virgil's Eclogues refine and methodize Theocritus' idyls. Expressing the sentiment inspired by the beauty of external nature in her tranquil moods and the kindred charm inspired by ideal human relationships (love in particular) in verse notable for its exquisite diction and flowing rhythm, they consolidate and popularize the conventions of p. poetry. During the Middle Ages, the p. was chiefly confined to the pastourelle (q.v.), a native type of dialogue poem, and to a few realistic scenes in the religious plays. The vast body of the modern p.—elegy, drama, romance, p. poetry in general—is a direct outgrowth of Renaissance humanism.

The p. elegy, patterned after such classical models as the Lament for Adonis, credited to Bion, the Lament for Bion, traditionally ascribed to Moschus but most probably by a disciple of Bion, and Theocritus' first idyl, became conventional in the Renaissance. The traditional machinery with variations was the invocation, statement of grief, inquiry into the causes of death, sympathy and weeping of nature, procession of mourners, lament, climax, change of mood, consolation. Marot and Spenser contributed Renaissance specimens, and numerous other p. poets, including Pope, Ambrose Philips, and Gay, tried their hand at the genre. Milton's Lycidas and Shelley's Adonais conform rather closely to the classic conventions, and vestiges of them can be seen even as late as Arnold's Thyrsis.

The p. drama was latent in the idyls and eclogues, for the brief dialogue was easily expandable. Even as early as Boccaccio's Ninfale Fiesolano the dramatic intensity of the eclogue was considerably heightened. With the addition of the crossed love plot and secret personal history, the p. drama emerged and grew in popularity as the medieval mystery plays lost ground. Poliziano's Favola di Orfeo (1472), is perhaps more correctly classified as an opera, but p. elements are prominent. Agostino de' Beccari's Il Sacrificio (1554), the first fully-developed p. drama, led to the heyday of the p. drama in Italy during the last quarter of the 16th c. Tasso's Aminta (1573), an allegory presenting the court of Ferrara, is no doubt the greatest of the kind and has exerted the most far-reaching influence on the tradition. Second only to it is Guarini's Il Pastor Fido (1583), the first important tragicomedy. In France, the most famous drama is Racan's Les Bergeries (1625), founded on d'Urfé's Astrée. It was followed by countless bergeries, which, after the mode of Astrée, were so filled with galant shepherds and beautiful nymphs that the type wore itself out with its own artificiality. England's first noteworthy p. dramas—Lyly's Galathea and Peele's Arraignment of Paris—were both published in 1584, and the most excellent—Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess (imitating Tasso's Aminta)—in 1610. Because of the constant pressure of Eng. empiricism and the austerity of the Puritan taste, the p. drama in England never reached the extravagant artificiality that it attained on the Continent. The last p. drama in England was the belated Gentle Shepherd by Allan Ramsay in 1725. Written in Lowland Scotch, picturing particular Scottish scenes, and using "real" shepherds, it was highly praised by the early romantic poets and critics.

The p. romance usually takes the form of a long prose narrative, interspersed with lyrics, built on a complicated plot, and peopled with characters bearing p. names. Anticipated by Boccaccio's Ameto (1342), a mixed composition of graceful prose and tuneful verse, the genre is usually dated from Sannazaro's Arcadia (1504), a remarkable composition, written in musical prose and filled with characters who live in innocent voluptuousness. Popular imitations are Montemayor's Diana (1559?), in Portugal, and Cervantes' Galatea (1585), in Spain. In France the indigenous pastourelle held back the p. romance; but Rémy Belleau's Bergerie (1572), established the type and in d'Urfé's Astrée the baroque p. romance found its most consummate example, as nymphs bedizened in pearls and satin cavort with chivalric shepherds. The most celebrated Eng. p. romance is Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590). Its lofty sentiment, sweet rhythm, ornate rhetoric, elaborate description and high-flown oratory, display one aspect of the Italianate style of Elizabethan courtly literature. In spite of the riddle of its plot, in which the strange turns of fortune and love make all the virtuous happy, it is still good reading as a romance of love and adventure. The literary influence of the Arcadia was pervasive: Greene and Lodge, for example, imitated it; Shakespeare drew from it for the character of Gloucester in King Lear; on the scaffold Charles I recited an adaptation of a Pamela's prayer; in translation the Arcadia contributed to the elaborate plots of the Fr. romances; and traces of it may perhaps be seen even in Richardson and Scott. The sustained elaboration of its structure marks another step in the development which distinguished the novel from the short story and the picaresque tale. Robert Greene's Menaphon (1589; reprinted as Greene's Arcadia in 1590), conventional and imitative, adds little to the genre except some delightful lyrics. Thomas Lodge's Rosalynde (1590), in the style of Lyly's Euphues but diversified with sonnets and eclogues, was dramatized with little alteration by Shakespeare in As You Like It.

Early in the 14th c. the p. eclogue was profoundly influenced by the new learning, when Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio wrote L. eclogues after the mode of Virgil. They continued the allegory of their master, extended its political and religious scope, and introduced the personal lament. About the turn of the 15th c. Baptista Spagnuoli Mantuanus exploited the satirical possibilities of the p. by using rustic characters to ridicule the court, the church, and the women of his day. Late in the century Marino (1569-1625) developed a style paralleling gongorism and euphuism. His Adone (1623), filled with affected word-play and outrageous conceits, represents a baroque aberration of the genre comparable to the contemporaneous Astrée. The Pléiade transplanted the classical eclogue into France, and Marot and Ronsard and many imitators produced conventional eclogues. In England, aside from the inferior works of Barclay and Googe, p. poetry may be dated from Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar (1579). Though Spenser follows the conventions of the classical eclogue, he aims at simplicity and naturalness by making use of rustic characters speaking country language. During the last quarter of the 16th c., England continued to produce much p. poetry in imitation of Spenser. According to modern taste and judgment, those of most merit are Michael Drayton's Shepherd's Garland (1593), and William Browne's Britannia's Pastorals (1613-16). In his Piscatory Eclogues (1633), Phineas Fletcher imitated Sannazaro, who may have taken his cue from Theocritus' fisherman's idyl, no. 21.

The swan song of the p. was sung by the Eng. poets of the 18th c. Revived by Pope and Philips, whose rival pastorals appeared in Tonnson's Miscellany in 1709, the p. attracted a surprising amount of interest. Pope, inspired by Virgil's Eclogues, produced one of the showpieces of rococo art—a part of "Summer" being so tuneful that Handel set it to music. Philips, under the rising influence of Eng. empiricism, tried to write pastorals that came closer to the realities of Eng. rural life. The followers of neither poet wrote any p. worthy of mention, and the genre soon died of its own inanition. So artificial and effete had it become that Gay's Shepherd's Week, in broad burlesque, was sometimes read as a p. in the true Theocritean style. The outstanding example of the romantic p. is Salomon Gessner's Daphnis (1754), Idyllen (1756), and Der Tod Abels (1758); and Wordsworth's Michael, reflecting the empirical element of Eng. romanticism, well marks the end of serious attempts in the genre.

E. Gosse, "An Essay on Eng. P. Poetry," Complete Works in Verse and Prose of Edmund Spenser (1882); M. H. Shackford, "A Definition of the P. Idyll," PMLA, 19 (1904); J. Marsan, La Pastorale dramatique en France . . . (1905); E. K. Chambers, Eng. Pastorals (1906); W. W. Greg, P. Poetry and P. Drama (1906); J. Marks, Eng. P. Drama . . . (1908); J. H. Hanford, "The P. Elegy and Milton's Lycidas," PMLA, 25 (1910); H. M. Hall, Idylls of Fishermen (1912); H. A. Rennert, Sp. P. Romances (1912); J. P. W. Crawford, Sp. P. Drama (1915); H. E. Mantz, "Non-dramatic P. in Europe in the 18th C.," PMLA, 31 (1916); J. W. MacKail, "Allan Ramsay and the Romantic Revival," E&S, 10 (1924); M. K. Bragg, The Formal Eclogue in 18th C. England (1926); P. van Tieghem, "Les Idylles de Gessner et le rêve p.," Le Preromantisme, II (1930); W. P. Jones, The Pastourelle (1931); W. Empson, Some Versions of P. (1938); T. P. Harrison,

The P. Elegy (1939); M. I. Gerhardt, La Pastorale (1950); J. Duchemin, La Houlette et la lyre: Recherche sur les origines pastorales de la poésie (1960-); J. F. Lynen, The P. Art of Robert Frost (1960).

THEORY: Sustained criticism of the p. begins with the essays of the Renaissance humanists, the most important being Vida's Ars Poetica (1527), Sebillet's Art Poétique françois (1548), Scaliger's Poetices . . . (1561), and "E.K.'s" epistle and preface in 1579. The interest of these critics in the p. sprang from their desire to enrich the vernacular by imitating the "ancients" in this genre and to exploit its allegorical potentialities.

But mere imitation of Theocritus and Virgil did not long suffice, as the debate over Guarini's tragicomedy Il Pastor Fido illustrates. In his Discorso (1587), Jason Denores attacked this play because, he argued, it is a bastard genre, unauthorized by Aristotle. In Il Verato (1588), and Il Verato Secondo (1593), Guarini secured the new form against his adversary, thereby widening the scope of the genre. D'Urfé, in "L'Autheur à la Bergere Astrée" (1610), further extended the bounds of the p. when he turned critic to defend his baroque romance. Though Marini never expressed his critical ideas, his aberration of the genre in his extravagant p. idyl Adone (1623), made him the main target of the neoclassic attack.

In 1659 René Rapin argued that p. poets should return to the ancient models, and to his Eclogae sacrae he prefixed "Dissertatio de carmine pastorali." Reaching the apogee of authoritarianism in p. theory, he declares that he "will gather" all his theory from "Theocritus and Virgil, those . . . great and judicious Authors, whose very doing is Authority enough," and concludes "that Pastoral belongs properly to the Golden Age."

The most significant rebuttal to Rapin's theory is Fontenelle's "Discours sur la nature de l'eclogue" (1688). Whereas Rapin looked for his fundamental criterion in the objective authority of the ancients, Fontenelle, like his master Descartes, sought a subjective standard in and expected illumination from "the natural light of Reason." Fontenelle's method is deductive. He starts with a basic assumption, the self-evident clarity of which he thinks no one will question: "All men would be happy, and that too at an easy rate." From this premise he deduces the proposition that p. poetry, if it is to make men happy, must present "a concurrence of the two strongest passions, laziness and love."

This quarrel between the ancients and the moderns was transferred directly to England; Rapin was translated by Thomas Creech in 1684, and Fontenelle was "Englished by Mr. Motteux" in 1695. The clash between the objective authority of the classics and the subjective standards of reason divided the critics into two schools of opinion, which are best denominated as neoclassic and rationalistic. The immediate source of the basic ideas of the Eng. neoclassic p. critics, the chief of whom are Walsh, Pope, Gay, Gildon, and Newbery, is Rapin's "Treatise." Pope, in practice as well as in theory, epitomizes the neoclassic ideal, explicitly admitting that his "notions concerning" the p. "were derived from . . . Theocritus and Virgil (the only undisputed authors of P.)."

The immediate source of the basic ideas of the Eng. rationalistic critics, the chief of whom are Addison, Tickell, Purney, Johnson, and Mirror no. 79, is Fontenelle's "Discours." But the Eng. followers of Fontenelle insist that the p. conform to experience as well as to reason. Though Dr. Johnson's Rambler essays on the p. in general observe both rationalistic and empirical premises, his "true definition" of a p. poem, in which he asserts that a p. is nothing more than a poem in which "any action or passion is represented by its effects on a country life," is basically empirical.

Romantic p. theory evolved from rationalistic theory. As the critics became more certain of their empirical grounds, they showed more freedom to disregard the form and the content of the traditional p.; to look on nature with heightened emotion; to endow primitive life with benevolence and dignity; and to place a greater value on sentiment and feeling. For example, in An Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope (1756), Joseph Warton, by arguing that Theocritus was primarily a realistic poet and that the Golden Age depicted in his poetry may be equated to 18th-c. rural life, substitutes cultural primitivism for the chronological primitivism of the Golden-Age p. In "Discours Préliminaire" to Les Saisons, Jean-François de Saint-Lambert disregards the distinction between the p. and descriptive poetry and speaks with enthusiasm concerning the beauty of fields, rivers, and woods and of the felicity of rural life as he knew it in his childhood. In Lectures on Belles Lettres, 1783, Hugh Blair singles out Salomon Gessner's Idyllen as the poems in which his "idea . . . for the improvement of Pastoral Poetry are fully realized." Blair's essay, along with Wordsworth's Michael (which exemplifies much of Blair's theory), ends serious consideration of the p. After that poem and Blair's essay, the genre belongs to the academicians.

N. Drake, "On P. Poetry," Lit. Hours (1798); W. W. Greg, P. Poetry and P. Drama (1906); E. C. Knowlton, "The Novelty of Wordsworth's Michael as a P.," PMLA, 25 (1920); M. K. Bragg, The Formal E. in 18th C. England (1926); E. Wasserman, "Intro." to Thomas Purney's

A Full Enquiry into the True Nature of P. (1948); J. E. Congleton, Theories of P. Poetry in England: 1684-1798 (1952); R. Poggioli, "The Oaten Flute," Harvard Lib. Bull., 2 (1957). J.E.C.

PASTOURELLE (Prov., pastorela). A short narrative poem of the Middle Ages which relates the encounter of a knight (who tells the story) and a shepherdess. The form was not fixed; only this conventional situation defines the genre. In the typical p., the knight, while riding along one morning, spies a pretty shepherdess beside the road. He proceeds at once to make advances to her, advances backed up by small gifts or greater promises. In some poems the shepherdess yields with pleasure after very little persuasion. In others, the knight takes by force the favors she tries to deny. In still others, she cleverly outwits him by one stratagem or another, or she is rescued by friendly shepherds, and the knight rides away humiliated or even beaten.

The p. was most popular and had its most typical development in OF in the 13th c. Prov. literature offers relatively few examples (though one of these, by Marcabru, is the earliest extant p. in any vernacular literature), and those few depart widely from the standard pattern. In German, Neidhardt von Reuenthal and his successors developed accessory and subsequent details (the mother's attitude, later developments, scenes of rustic revelry, etc.). The genre has been traced back with some show of probability to certain Latin poems slightly older than the vernacular pastourelles; but the characters in these poems are not a knight and a shepherdess, as they always are in the true p. Whatever its ultimate origin, the p. is the aristocratic product of a superficially polished age, which could find humor in the plight of a silly peasant girl seduced by a man of high rank, as well as in the far less probable discomfiture of the knight outwitted by a peasant girl cleverer than he. It is interesting to note that the delightful little play Robin et Marion is nothing more than an expanded p. of this second type.—E. Piguet, L'Evolution de la p. du XII^e s. à nos jours (1927); J. W. Powell, The P. (1931); Jeanroy, II; W.T.H. Jackson, "The Medieval P. as a Satirical Genre," PQ, 31 (1952). F.M.C.

PATHETIC FALLACY. A phrase coined by John Ruskin and discussed in "Of the Pathetic Fallacy," ch. 12 in Modern Painters, III (1856). It describes the tendency of poets and painters to credit nature with the feelings of human beings. This fallacy is caused by "an excited state of the feelings, making us, for the time, more or less irrational." It is the "error . . . which the mind admits when affected strongly by emotion," a "falseness in all our impressions of external things." To illustrate his definition Ruskin quotes from Kingsley's The Sands of Dee:

PATTERN POETRY

They rowed her in across the rolling foam—
The cruel, crawling foam and says, "The foam is not cruel, neither does it crawl. The state of mind which attributes to it these characters of a living creature is one in which the reason is unhinged by grief."

The highest (creative) order of poets (Homer, Dante, Shakespeare) seldom admit this falseness. It is the second (reflective or perceptive) order (Wordsworth, Coleridge, Keats, Tennyson) who "much delight in it." Ruskin puts his two orders of poets in perspective when he includes them in his four "ranks of being," using the reaction of Wordsworth's Peter Bell to the primrose as a touchstone. The nonpoet is "the man who perceives rightly because he does not feel, and to whom the primrose is very accurately the primrose because he does not love it." The second-rank poet is "the man who perceives wrongly, because he feels, and to whom the primrose is anything else than a primrose." The first-rank poet is "the man who perceives rightly in spite of his feelings, and to whom the primrose is for ever nothing else than itself—a little flower, apprehended in the very plain and leafy fact of it." The inspired poet is a strong man who nevertheless is submitted to influences stronger than himself and who sees inaccurately because what he sees is inconceivably above him. Ruskin thus finds the pathetic fallacy in second-rank poets and in inspired poets. In the former the fallacy is to be condemned as a sign of morbid feeling or inaccurate perception. Inspired poets, on the other hand, quite validly resort to the fallacy, for they are ever aware of the fact out of which strong feeling comes. Ruskin's attack on what he considers to be a morbidity of mind in modern painters and poets, the overpowering of intellect by narrow feelings, follows naturally from his moral theory of art, in terms of which the fallacy of this group is to distort truth, to "miss the plain and leafy fact."

Ruskin coined the phrase, the "p.f.," to attack the secular sentimentalism of his contemporaries. It existed, of course, long before Ruskin named it as a traditional figure of speech, a species of personification going back as far as Homer. But the late 18th c. saw its extensive use. There are numerous figures in Gray, Collins, Cowper, Burns, Blake, Wordsworth, Shelley, and Keats which attribute to natural objects human feelings and powers. Mountains mourn, winds sigh, fields smile. Wordsworth justified such expressions by asserting that "objects . . . derive their influence not from properties inherent in them . . . , but from such as are bestowed upon them by the minds of those who are conversant with or affected by these objects."

The morbid use of the p.f., which Ruskin denounced in theory, Tennyson refined and diminished in poetic practice. Not the large natural forms but individual objects with their peculiar characteristics came to be celebrated for their overtones of human emotion. Knowing more about science than any Eng. poet before or since (except possibly William Empson), and being near-sighted to boot, he took a close look at natural objects. His verse from 1842, as Josephine Miles has shown, reveals a markedly less frequent resort to the fallacy than theretofore. Rather than stress the great likeness between man and nature in terms of sympathies of feeling, he heralded a new emphasis on qualitative comparison between objects in terms of sense perception. The old order, then, had already begun to yield to the new when Ruskin named and denounced the morbid use of the fallacy. After Ruskin, and perhaps because of him, use of the fallacy declined markedly. The Pre-Raphaelites, in paint and language, tried to set down what was really there. Hopkins followed them in his concern with "the plain and leafy fact" of the primrose, though, of course, his inscapes are of a vital nature. Among 20th-c. poets use of the p.f. has continued to decline, although Dylan Thomas used it with brilliant effectiveness.

J. Ruskin, "Of the P.F.," Modern Painters, III (1856); J. Miles, P.F. in the 19th C. (1942); A. H. Warren, Jr., "John Ruskin," Eng. Poetic Theory: 1825-1865 (1950); B. Morris, "Ruskin on the P.F., or On How a Moral Theory of Art May Fail," J.A.C., 14 (1955); J. D. Thomas, "Poetic Truth and P.F.," Texas Studies in Lit. and Language, 3 (1961). J.K.R.

PATHOS (Gr. "suffering," "passion"). That quality which evokes feelings of tenderness, pity, and sorrow in the reader or beholder. See SENTIMENTALITY.

PATTERN POETRY.† Verse in which the disposition of the lines is such as to represent some physical object or to suggest motion, place, or feeling in accord with the idea expressed in the words. The pattern poem, or "shaped" poem, first appears in Western-world literature in the works of certain Gr. bucolic poets, notably in a few poems of Simias of Rhodes (ca. 300 B.C.), later much imitated. It is unlikely that the form is a Gr. invention; its origin has been thought to be Eastern. The true oriental p. poem (Persian or Turkish) blends several visual arts and bears more relation to acrostics, calligraphy, and illumination than to poetry proper. Among the shapes commonly represented in such poems have been axes, eggs, spears, altars, wings, columns, pyramids, diamonds, and other geometric figures. The chief agent in transmitting p. poetry from antiquity to modern times was the Planudean version of the Gr. Anthology. An extravagant instance of figure-poems is the Musarum libri (1628) of Baldassare Bonifacio, whose whole volume is devoted to the type. The first Eng. p. poems belong to the 16th c. (Stephen Hawes, 1509; Richard Willes, 1573; George Puttenham, 1589), though the best known is doubtless the Easter Wings of George Herbert. Modern practitioners of the form, or of related graphic devices, include Guillaume Apollinaire, Dylan Thomas, and E. E. Cummings.—G. Puttenham, The Arte of Eng. Poesie, ed. G. Willcock and A. Walker (1936; Bk. 2); M. Church, "The First Eng. P. Poems," PMLA, 61 (1946); Welck and Warren; A. L. Korn, "Puttenham and the Oriental P.-Poem," CL, 6 (1954). J.L.L.

† In Supplement, see also CALLIGRAMME; CONCRETE POETRY.

PAYADA. Argentine term referring to extemporaneous poetic contest of questions and answers among the Gauchos. Made famous in many gauchesque poems, particularly in part II of Martin Fierro by José Hernández, in which there is a long p. between the protagonist and a Negro. Many of the questions and answers are of a philosophic and lyrical nature, such as: "What is the song of the earth?" "What is the song of the sky?" In the p. contest the Gaucho who is unable to answer, or who answers in an inferior fashion, loses. The p. is also called contrapunto. The champion Gaucho singers are highly regarded in Argentine legend and poetry. Santos Vega was one of the best known of these legendary Gaucho troubadours. J.A.C.

PEGASUS. In mythology, a winged horse born from the blood of Medusa and favored by the Muses (q.v.). He assisted the Gr. hero Bellerophon in slaying the Chimaera, but threw him when he attempted to fly to heaven. He was not associated with poetry beyond the fact that his hoofprint produced Hippocrene, the fountain of the Muses, on Mount Helicon. In postclassical times, however, he is frequently referred to as a symbol of the poetic imagination, either soaring to the heavens of invention or in need of the restraining bit. (Cf. Hesiod, Theogonia 280ff., 325ff.; Pausanias 2.3.5, 2.31.9, 9.31.3; Boileau, Art Poétique 1.6.) A.R.B.

PENTAMETER (Gr. "of 5 measures or feet") should mean a line of 5 measures. The term was actually applied in antiquity to a dactylo-spondaic line consisting of two equal parts ($2\frac{1}{2} + 2\frac{1}{2}$ feet):

ĩn thē Pēn|tāmētēr | āye || fāllĩng ĩn | mēlōdỹ |

back
(Coleridge)

The first 2 feet may be either dactyls or spondees; then comes a long syllable; the second half consist of 2 dactyls, followed by a long syllable. The division between the two halves is marked by a break between words; there must not be hiatus, elision, or syllaba anceps (short allowed to stand for long) at this position. The p. is normally the second part of the elegiac distich (q.v.), the first part of which is a hexameter. The classical p. should not be confused with the so-called Eng. p. (5-stress line), which is usually iambic and generally regular. See BLANK VERSE; HEROIC COUPLET.—Hardie; K. Rupprecht, Einführung in die griechische Metrik (1950); U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958). W.B.

PENTAPODY (Gr. "5 feet"). A group or line of 5 feet. The most common pentapodies in Gr. poetry are the dactylic, iambic, and trochaic.—Koster.

PENTARISIC (Gr. "of 5 rises"). Having 5 metrical beats. See ARSIS AND THESIS. R.J.G.

PENTASTICH. A group, stanza or poem of 5 lines of verse. See also QUINTET, and CINQUAIN, a special form of a 5-line stanza.

PENTHEMIMER (Gr. "of 5 halves"). In Gr. and L. verse a metrical unit consisting of $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet. When these feet are dactylic, the unit is also called hemiepes (q.v.). Correspondingly, the caesura which occurs in the dactylic hexameter and iambic trimeter after the first syllable of the third foot is called penthemimeral.—Koster. P.S.C.

PERFECT, TRUE, OR FULL RHYME. The correspondence in accented syllables of the vowel-sound and the following consonant(s) but not of the consonant(s) before the vowel. It is single, duple, or triple: Keats-beets, Shelley-jelly, Tennyson-venison (J. C. Ransom's "Survey of Literature"). P.R. is the equivalent of Fr. rime suffisante (cf. rime très riche, vaillant-travaillant, in which the preceding vowel and consonant are also identical; rime riche, éclair-crêpusculaire, in which the preceding consonant is also identical; and rime pauvre, ami-fini, mont-ton, where the vowel stands alone or is followed by different unpronounced consonants; if the latter are pronounced, rhyme has weakened to assonance [q.v.]). The designation "perfect" points to the acceptance of varieties of rhyme not perfect, which may have been taken from Ir., Welsh, Icelandic, and other sources into Eng. to make up for the relative scarcity of perfect rhymes in the language, as contrasted with the abundance of such rhymes in other languages; the main varieties are consonance and near rhyme (qq.v.). P.R. has not, however, been displaced by these new devices, which remain still supplemental and not central. S.L.M.

PERIPHRAISIS as a round-about way of naming something makes its meaning apparent by approximating a whole or partial definition. Quintilian distinguished two kinds, the euphemistic (as in the phrase "the Lord of Hosts" to signify God) and the descriptive (as in the phrase "the wandering stars" to signify planets. Institutes 7.6.59). The distinction is the fundamental one. Of the first kind are also those which are meant to weaken the thought of evil (the absit omen motif, as in the phrase "passing away" to signify death); the descriptive kind includes most of those which approximate the two-word definition in the combination of a specific with a general term ("the finny tribe" to signify fish). While widely used in biblical and Homeric literature, the development of p. as a truly important feature of poetic style begins with Lucretius and Virgil, and through their influence it became an important feature of epic and descriptive poetry throughout the Middle Ages and into the Renaissance. Its use in the earlier period, however, was possibly supported by the use of kenning (q.v.) in Germanic poetry. The practice of the Pléiade in the 16th c. gave periphrases a new vogue throughout Europe and led directly to the establishment in the late 17th and 18th c. of a whole battery of phrases many of which conformed to the growing interest in scientific definition (as in the phrase "liquid ambient" to signify water). Since the 18th c., the form has lost much of its prestige, and more often than not survives in inflated uses for purposes of humor, as it does in Dickens. In the history of rhetoric p. is most generally characterized as a trope, and its function has been best analyzed by Longinus who shows how it serves the elevation of thought, and how by unfitting use it becomes gross and turgid (28-29).—E. Krantz, Essai sur l'esthétique de Descartes (1882); J. Arthos, The Language of Natural Description in 18th C. Poetry (1949). J.A.

PERSIAN POETRY. Though poetry was certainly written and sung in Persia long before that country was invaded and converted to Islam by the Arabs during the 7th c. A.D., the term "Pers. poetry" is customarily used to indicate the practice of the poetic art since the Muslim conquest. It is in this sense that the term is interpreted in this essay. It must also be remarked by way of commentary that poetry has been written in postconquest Pers. not only in Persia itself, but also in Turkey, Afghanistan, India, and now Pakistan and some Central Asian republics of the Soviet Union.

It took two to three centuries for Pers., an Indo-Aryan language, to shed most of its ancient inflections and to assimilate those Semitic elements of Arabic origin which enriched its vocabulary and modified its rhetoric. A considerable quantity of fragments from the verse of this transitional period has survived. However, the first major poet of Pers. literature, incidentally the greatest of his kind, was Firdausi (d. ca. 1020), author of the epic Shāh-nāma. This immense work in some 60,000 couplets rehearses the legendary history of the ancient kings of Persia, and was based upon material that goes back to the pre-Muslim period. It is a true masterpiece, for the great breadth of its canvas is matched by brilliant portraiture of individual incidents, of which the best known recounts the tragic story of Sohrab and Rustum, a theme familiar to readers of Eng. poetry through its treatment by Matthew Arnold. All Pers. meters, with a single exception, were derived from Arabic prosody and are quantitative; the meter of the Shāh-nāma is mutaqarib.

— — — | — — — | — — — | — — —
— — — | — — — | — — — | — — —

chu nuh mäh: bigzasht: bar dukht-i shāh yakī kūdak āmad chu tābanda mäh chu khandān shud ū chihra shādāb: kard urā nām: Tahmīna Suhrāb: kard

When nine slow-circling months had roll'd away,
Sweet-smiling pleasure hailed the brightening day.

A wonderous boy Tuhmeena's tears suppress,
And lull'd the sorrows of her heart to rest;
To him, predestined to be great and brave,
The name Sohrab his tender mother gave.
(tr. J. Atkinson)

The rhyming couplet (mathnavī) had been used in Arabic poetry, but was not very popular with a people who greatly preferred to write in monorhyme. The epic, though attempted by a few Arab poets, proved alien to the literary genius of the Arabs. The Persians made these two distinctive contributions to poetic form—the perfecting of the rhyming couplet, and its exploitation in extensive compositions.

None since Firdausi has successfully composed a long and discursive epic on the scale of the Shāh-nāma, though he has had not a few imitators. Epics of lesser magnitude and with more restricted range have been written by many authors, some of great brilliance. Firdausi himself is doubtfully credited with one such idyll on the theme of Joseph and Potiphar's wife; several later writers attempted the same subject, but the most admired treatment is that of Jāmī (d. 1492). The best esteemed of the idyllists is Nizāmī (d. ca. 1203) who composed five minor epics, the longest being upon the legend of Alexander the Great; he also retold the Arab desert romance of Majnūn and Lailā, while ancient Persia provided him with the heroic themes of two other poems. His writings, like Firdausī's Shāh-nāma, inspired Pers. artists to paint their finest miniatures. Jāmī composed in all seven idylls, interpreting as mystical allegories such familiar stories as the tragic love of Salāmān and Absāl. His nephew Hātifi (d. 1521) wrote an epic on the conquests of Tamerlane, and his idyll Lailā u Majnūn also enjoys a certain popularity.

The romantic idyll, like the epic, was composed in rhyming couplets, but the poet had a variety of meters from which to choose, though only one meter might be used in a given poem. Didactic verse also followed the epic form, and indeed sometimes reached truly epic proportions, notably in the mystic Mathnavi of Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī (d. 1273). This famous poem, venerated almost equally with the Koran, describes in a wealth of anecdote the soul's quest after union with God; it runs to about 25,000 couplets and is composed in the ramal metre.

~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~
~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~

bishnav az nai chūn ḥikāyat mīkunad az judāyihā shikāyat mīkunad kaz nayistān tā marā bibrīda and az nafīram mard u zan nālīda and Hear, how yon read in sadly pleasing tales Departed bliss and present woe bewails!

'With me, from native banks untimely torn,
Love-warbling youths and soft-ey'd virgins mourn.'

(tr. Sir William Jones)

Rūmī's chief predecessors in applying the epic form to mystical purposes were Sanā'ī (fl. 1150) who wrote among other things a remarkable Pilgrim's Progress, and Farīd al-Dīn 'Aṭṭār (d. ca. 1230), a voluminous author whose most celebrated idyll is the Bird-Parliament translated in epitome by Edward FitzGerald. A more commonplace and popular note was struck by Sa'dī (d. 1292) in his Būstān, which makes a pair with his prose and verse miscellany the Gulistān; both books are admired for their practical wisdom enshrined in simple yet elegant language. The tradition was continued in modern times by Sir Muḥammad Iqbāl (d. 1938) of Lahore, whose Secrets of the Self and Mysteries of Selflessness express attractively their author's religiopolitical philosophy;

he also composed many graceful lyrics which proclaim his indebtedness to Rūmī.

The formal ode (qaṣida), copied from its Arabic model, has been popular throughout Pers. literary history chiefly as an instrument for courting the favour or appeasing the displeasure of kings and princes. Poets have also employed this form to canvass religious, mystical or ethical ideals, to describe the beauties of nature or to commemorate an interesting event, to congratulate a patron or a friend upon some good fortune or to condole with him in a bereavement. The ode may extend to as many as 100 couplets or more, all having the same rhyme; it is thus taken as a chance to display craftsmanship and virtuosity, qualities which appeal greatly to the primary audience but largely vanish in translation. Hyperboles, rhetorical embellishments, and verbal conceits are the accepted stock-in-trade of the skilful ode-maker. The meters employed vary considerably, and there is a preference for the long and swinging line; the following are the commoner patterns:

| | |
|---------------|-------------------------|
| Ramal | ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ |
| Hazaj | ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ |
| Muḥtās | ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ |
| Muzārī | ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ ~~~~~ |

The court poets who have won greatest fame by their odes include Rūdāgī (d. 940), Farukhī (d. 1038), Anvarī (d. ca. 1190) and Khāqānī (d. 1200). Nāṣir-i Khusrau (d. 1061) is esteemed for his religious and moralizing odes, while Sanā'ī, 'Aṭṭār and Rūmī used the form in their mystical poetry. In modern times the best known ode writers include Qāṣānī (d. 1854), Adib-i Pīshāvarī (d. 1931), Parvin (d. 1941), and Bahār (d. 1951); the convention is now found appropriate to political and social broadsides. Parvin revived charmingly the old moralizing themes made famous by Sa'dī; Bahār's most splendid poem is a formal panegyric composed in honor of Firdausī at his millenary.

The lyric (ghazal) looks at first sight to be simply a short ode, its length averaging between 5 and 15 couplets, all monorhymed. The same range of meters is employed, though the line is often apt to be somewhat briefer. As an art form it appears to have evolved out of the so-called nasīb (erotic prelude) with which the old Arab poets began their odes; its central theme is love, to which wine-drinking is an almost inevitable accompaniment. The beloved may be either male or female; sometimes the person intended is the royal patron; by the mystical poets he is identified with God, and wine is taken as a symbol for ecstatic emotion. The acknowledged master of the lyric is Ḥāfiẓ (d. 1391), to whom some 500 ghazals are attributed; the following is a brief specimen.

PERSIAN POETRY

When my Beloved the cup in hand taketh
The market of lovely ones slack demand taketh.
I, like a fish, in the ocean am fallen,
Till me with the hook yonder Friend to land
taketh.

Every one saith, who her tipsy eye seeth,
"Where is a shrieve, that this fair firebrand
taketh?"

Lo, at her feet in lament am I fallen,
Till the Beloved me by the hand taketh.
Happy his heart who, like Hafiz, a goblet
Of wine of the Prime Fore-eternal's brand
taketh.

(tr. J. Payne)

The foregoing version ingeniously imitates both the rhythm and the rhyming scheme of the original. Other famous lyrical poets are Sanā'ī, Rūmī, 'Irāqī (d. 1289), Sa'dī, Amīr Khusrau (d. 1325) and Jāmī. Many are writing lyrics at the present day, some under the influence of European literature; it is worth mentioning that the Soviet poet Lāhūtī took Stalin for his Beloved. Khānlārī reflects Wordsworth and Tennyson; the genius of Valéry and the imagists has fired the imagination of such writers as Gulchin, Shahriyār, and Tavallālī.

It appears that the only original contribution made by the Persians to poetic form and prosody consists in the quatrain (rubā'ī); and it is just therefore that this should happen to be the form best known to the general public, thanks to the great and continuing popularity of its adaptation by an Eng. translator. Edward FitzGerald's Rubā'iyāt (1st ed., 1859) gives a true picture of the rhyme pattern (AABA, occasionally AAAA) of the Pers. original, though not of its subtle rhythm. Tradition makes out that the invention of the quatrain meter was quite accidental—the gleeful shout of a child at play, overheard and adopted by a passing poet. Most Pers. poets have composed quatrains, which have generally retained the authentic flavor of spontaneity, succinctness, and wit; the rubā'ī is essentially an occasional poem, and the impression of continuous composition conveyed by FitzGerald's paraphrase is wholly misleading. The most illustrious practitioner of this literary form was 'Umar Khayyām (d. 1132), who may have composed as many as 750 quatrains. The following quotations illustrate the pattern of the rubā'ī, and the venial infidelity of FitzGerald to his Pers. model.

---|---|---|---

khurshīd: kamand-i šubḥ: bar bām afgand kaikhusrav-i rūz: muhra dar jām afgand mai khur ki nidā-yi 'ishq: hangām-i saḥar āvāza-yi ishrabū dar aiyām afgand

Wake! For the Sun, who scatter'd into flight
The Stars before him from the Field of Night,

Drives Night along with them from Heav'n, and strikes
The Sultan's Turret with a Shaft of Light.
(tr. E. FitzGerald)

The sun has cast the noose of morn
Athwart the roof-top of the world;
The emperor of day has hurled
His bead, our goblet to adorn.

Drink wine: for at the first dawn's rays
The proclamation of desire Rang through the universe entire,
And bade men drink through all the days.
(tr. A. J. Arberry)

The quatrain is today felt to be the ideal form in which to compose a political squib.

This brief review of Pers. poetic forms is not complete without a mention of certain rarer varieties. The quatrain has a pair in the dū-baitī, a folk convention having the same rhyming pattern but a different and simpler meter. The only poet who has given semi-classical shape to this rustic doggerel is the wild mystic Bābā Ṭāhir (fl. 11th c.). The qiṭ'a is a brief occasional poem in monorhyme; its most accomplished exponent was Ibn Yamin (d. 1344). The tarjī-band is a device for linking together a succession of lyriclike stanzas, a couplet in the form of a refrain being interposed between each component. The spirit of emulation which encourages the Pers. poet to pay tribute to by seeking to outrival the work of his predecessors has engendered the mu-khammas and musaddas; a given lyric is expanded by inserting four or five lines between each line of the original.

Out of obscure and humble beginnings, the Pers. poetic genius suddenly broke into full flower in Firdausi's masterpiece. Other poetic forms—the ode, the lyric, the quatrain, the idyll, didactic verse—quickly matured thereafter, and a classical tradition was firmly established by the end of the 12th c. Toward the year 1500 this transition reached its climax, to be succeeded by a slow decline; though Pers. poetry enjoyed a long Indian summer under the Moghul empire. Royal and princely patronage had throughout these centuries encouraged the poet to give of his best, and so much of Pers. poetry is courtly in theme and tone; yet the portrayal of mystical ideas liberated the individual writer from too strict bondage to earthly rulers and gave him scope to express his personal experiences and his relationship with the Divine Beloved. It is only in this century that the poets of Persia have discovered anew the creative impulse of a most gifted people. The rise of democratic institutions, and intellectual and cultural contacts with Western countries, have set up a new ferment in the Pers. mind, the full effects of which are yet to be seen.

PERSONIFICATION

ANTHOLOGIES: Flowers from Pers. Poetry, ed. N. H. Dole and B. M. Walker (2 v., 1901); A Pers. Anthol., ed. E. G. Browne (1927); Badī' al-Zamān Bishrūya, Sukhan u Sukhanvarān [Poetry and Poets] (1929); Poets and Poetry of Modern Persia, ed. M. Ishaque (2 v., 1933); H. Pizhmān, Bihtarīn ash'ār [Best Poems] (1934); Immortal Rose (1948; anthol. of tr. lyrics) and Pers. Poems (1954; comprehensive anthol. of tr.), both ed. A. J. Arberry.

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. G. Browne, The Press and Poetry of Modern Persia (1914) and A Lit. Hist. of Persia (4 v., 2d ed., 1928; a splendid and complete survey); A. V. Williams Jackson, Early Pers. Poetry (1920); R. Levy, Pers. Lit. (1923; introd. manual); Rizā-zāda Shafaq, Tarikh-i adabiyāt-i Irān [Lit. Hist. of Persia] (1942); A. J. Arberry, Cl. Pers. Lit. (1958); G. M. Wickens, "Poetry in Modern Persia," Univ. of Toronto Quarterly, 29 (1960).

A.J.A.

PERSONIFICATION, as a manner of speech endowing things or abstractions with life, has been a feature of European poetry since Homer. Psychologically and rhetorically it may be described as "a means of taking hold of things which appear startlingly uncontrollable and independent" (T. B. L. Webster). But the famous personifications of Strength and Force in Prometheus Bound parallel and challenge the figures of gods in myths, and according to a theory now current, supported by Cassirer, Cornford, and others, personifications replace mythical figures when rational attitudes supersede the primitive imagination. This theory had an ancient presentation in the Stoic doctrine that abstractions in the form of personifications express demonic force.

In the early Christian and medieval ages the history of p. is closely associated with the rise of allegory (as in the Psychomachia of Prudentius, The Romance of the Rose, and Piers Plowman). It was almost equally important in the mingled development of mythological and romantic poetry in the Renaissance (Poliziano, Spenser). Here, too, as in Ariosto's descriptions of war and in Spenser's Mutabilitie Cantos, the personifications aspire to the power and automatism of mythical figures. Such is the central personification of Spenser's Hymn to Love:

For Love is lord of truth and loyalty.

In the 18th c. personifications lost much of their emotional and quasi-mythical power to the degree that poetry subscribed to the vague anthropomorphism of deistic philosophy, but their vogue increased even as they themselves became, as in much nature poetry, barely more than abstractions. The development of sym-bolist poetry in the 19th c. largely smothered the use of p. as a figure in which the rational element is the determining character. But this kind has returned again to fashion in Auden (At the Grave of Henry James), while the more nearly mythological forms have been employed by Dylan Thomas (The force that through the green fuse drives the flower).

H. Usener, Götternamen (1896); J. Tamborino, De antiquorum daemonismo (1909); R. Hinks, Myth and Allegory in Ancient Art (1939); B. H. Bronson, "P. Reconsidered," ELH, 14 (1947); E. R. Wasserman, "The Inherent Values of 18th-C. P.," PMLA, 65 (1950); T.B.L. Webster, "P. as a Mode of Gr. Thought," JWCI, 17 (1954); C. F. Chapin, P. in 18th-C. Eng. Poetry (1955); N. Maclean, "P. but not Poetry," ELH, 23 (1956); Lausberg. J.A.

PERUVIAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

PETRARCHISM. In the broadest sense of the word P. is the direct or indirect imitation of Petrarch's L. or It. writings whether in prose or in verse. However, it is in connection with his It. poetry that the term has most commonly been employed, alluding almost exclusively to derivations from the Canzoniere or Song-book and compositions by others using Petrarch's collection for imitative purposes. This type of poetic borrowing started during Petrarch's lifetime in the 14th c., reached considerable proportions in the last half of the 15th c. and became the predominant mode of poetic expression in the 16th not only in Italy but throughout Western Europe as well. Most of the lyric poets of the last mentioned period, and they were legion, wrote under the influence of P. In Italy they include such first-rate artists as Ariosto, Della Casa, Michelangelo, Gaspara Stampa, Vittoria Colonna, Tansillo and Torquato Tasso; in France, Maurice Scève, Louise Labé, Ronsard and his fellow-poets in the Pléiade, and Desportes; in Spain, Garcilaso de la Vega, Cetina, the Argensola brothers, Herrera, Lope de Vega, Quevedo, and Góngora; in Portugal, Sá da Miranda, Camoëns, Bernardes, and Antonio Ferreira, in England, Wyatt and Surrey, Shakespeare, and most of the Elizabethans. The authority of Cardinal Pietro Bembo, amounting to a literary dictatorship, exercised through his Asolani (1505), which set up the Petrarchan and Neoplatonic doctrines of love as the great archetypes to be followed, and through his Prose sulla Volgar Lingua (1525) which proclaimed Petrarch's It. poems as the unique linguistic models for composition in verse, did much to firmly establish the tradition. Reacting against the excesses of Quattrocentism, Bembo was instrumental in the restoration of good taste in poetry. He performed the function of systematizing P. Other contributing factors were the diffusion of printing and the vogue of the vernacular as the common medium for love-poetry. It goes without saying that these external stimuli would soon have lost their rousing power were it not for the fact that the Canzoniere is a great poetic masterpiece—the subjective expression of a deep emotional and spiritual conflict, intensely and variously voiced, and in a language that stylistically approaches perfection. Petrarch was aware that he was attempting something new. He refers to le mie rime nove in the sonnet, L'arbor gentil . . . His followers, especially in the 16th c., appreciated this originality and correctly assessed the superlative lyric value inherent in the poems. Those among them who were true poets were able to use the collection as a model and still rise to lyric heights with a minimum of violence to their artistic personalities. On the other hand, numerous others, constituting the majority, indulged in imitation merely because it was a literary fad. They were primarily enticed by the rhetorical elements lurking here and there in Petrarch's verse, and by dint of constant repetition reduced many of its genuinely poetic features to conventional commonplaceness. Some of the most stereotyped features that characterize this type of P. are the description of the physical beauty of one's lady-love—she is apt to have golden hair, ebony brows, rose lips, teeth or fingers of pearl, forehead or hands of ivory, neck of alabaster; her eyes are stars or suns, etc. Morally she is chaste, angelic, and has a miraculous power over men and nature. These two types of beauty lead to contrasting effects: milady's physical beauty, giving rise to hope, and her moral beauty, to despair. Countless poems are addressed to her eyes, hands, and hair. Invocations to night, sleep, wild nature, rivers, the breeze, and jealousy abound. This literary mannerism soon became an object of ridicule and the term "Petrarchistic" acquired a derisive connotation because of it, undeservedly casting a pall of opprobrium upon the movement as a whole. Actually, P. represents one of the most revolutionary advances in the history of modern poetry.

E. H. Wilkins, "An Introductory Petrarch Bibliog.," PQ, 27 (1948) and "A Gen. Survey of Renaissance P.," CL, 2 (1950); C. Calcaterra, "Il Petrarca e il Petrarchismo," in Questioni e correnti di storia letteraria (1949); L. Baldacci, Il Petrarchismo italiano nel Cinquecento (1957); J. G. Fucilla, Estudios sobre el petrarquismo en España (1960); B. T. Sozzi, Petrarca (1963). J.G.F.

PHALAECEAN. See HENDECASYLLABIC.

PHERECRATEAN. Named after the comic poet Pherecrates (5th c. B.C.), this classical meter was the catalectic form of the glyconic (q.v.). Apart from syllaba anceps (q.v.) in the final syllable, it permitted resolutions only in the quantities of the base (i.e., the first 2 syllables). The P. occurs, usually with one or more glyconics, chiefly in Anacreon, the choruses of Gr. tragedy, and Horace (in whom the base was regularly spondaic). An example is Horace's

grāto, | P̄yrrhā, sūb ān|trō
(Odes 1.5.3.).

Bowra; Dale; Koster; Crusius.

P.S.C.

PHILIPPINE POETRY. Although Sp. "cross and crown" colonial policy in the 16th c. required destruction of pre-Christian writings, a strong oral tradition has kept alive even until today Indonesian-Malayan origins of Filipino culture. Riddles and rituals in verse, for the planting-harvest cycles; kumintang, war songs; kundiman, plaintive love lyrics; talindao, boat songs; poetic debates and epics—all these have survived in relatively pure form, ironically because colonial administrations withheld the fruits of the Sp. Renaissance from the governed classes. Consequently, sources of a nativist resurgence have always been present.

The necessity of preserving vernacular literature orally has made both primitive and even modern poetry inseparable from song and the drama. One of the most popular forms of self-entertainment during fiestas in rural barrios is balagtasan, a kind of spontaneous debating in verse, to test wit rather than reason. To the same heritage belong the duplo and karagatan, dramatic debates employed to fulfill social requirements at a wake, to relieve the living during the interval between religious ceremonies. Often the rhyming begins with a fanciful criminal accusation, which the innocent must disprove. Losers forfeit objects which can be reclaimed only after a loa, a declamation such as this from the Visayas:

Nag tanum ako limon
putus brillante ang dahon;
ang tauo nga makapasilong
luas gid sa Kamatayon.

I planted a lemon tree,
Its leaves all diamonds;
Anyman in its shelter
Will find immortality.

Two days are required to recite the epics of the Ifugaos, heirs to the ancient mountain rice terraces: the Hudhud relates the creation of the world and tribal progenitors; the Alim, like the Indian Ramayana, describes collective life among the gods. The Moro epics (darangan)—Bantugan, Bidasari, and others—require a week for declamation, but are valued for absence of Western intrusions. The Ilocano Lamang is generally considered a lesser epic because its present form betrays the influence of 17th-c. Christian fathers.

Even when alien themes or forms were borrowed, however, some native element persisted, making the composite unique. Church litanies have suggested a special kind of two-part verse, with talindao (leader) and pabinian (chorus); dramatic reading of the Bible has led to development of several Pasions in verse, to be wailed for days during the Eastertide, to improvised melodies. In the same manner of development, the dance of armed Moros in 1750, during celebration of Ali Mundi's conversion, Mohammedan leader, inspired imitations called moro-moro plays, melodramatic extravaganzas representing colorful conflicts between Muslims and Christians, religious differences often serving only as temporary obstacle to a mixed love pact. Although Christian triumph is made inevitable, a high degree of invention often has kept poetic expression of tournament and courtship lively. Similarly, the Filipino awit (chivalric-heroic romance) and corrido (legendary or religious tale) are exaggerated adaptations of Sp. material, and exhibit, respectively, the indigenous preference for 12- and 8-syllable lines. The scene of the most distinguished corrido, Florante at Laura, was situated in Albania to enable its author, Francisco Balagtas (1788–1862), to describe Phil. conditions without fear of censorship. Consequently it is remembered for the felicity of its Tagalog (the principal vernacular) rather than for its substance.

Despite over three centuries of Sp. rule, imposed national distinctions prevented writing of verse in Sp. until the late 1800's. Pedro Paterno's Sampaguitas y Poesias Varias (1880), first collection by a Filipino-Sp. poet, had to be published in Europe. Characteristically, poems in Sp. were serenades and lyrics, written for entertainment of friends, or for the accumulation of prestige required by a forensic career. More permanent are the prophetic, patriotic verses of Jose Rizal (whose Ultima Adios composed the day before his execution in 1896, ironically helped provoke an armed revolt which he had worked to prevent) and of his contemporaries whose writings, published in Madrid to change colonial policy at the summit, later were smuggled into the Philippines. The most striking example of early 20th-c. crossroads culture is Jose Palma's Filipinas: written in Sp. (after the mode of Rizal) under Am. rule, eventually it became the Phil. national anthem.

With the introduction of widespread education, Eng. served to help unify an archipelagic nation otherwise divided among nine major dialects. By the 1930's, Quezon as first President of the Commonwealth ordered organization of a national language institute based on Tagalog. Meanwhile, however, just before the outbreak of war he awarded national prizes for literature in the three major languages. One of the prize poems, Zulueta da Costa's Like the Molave, is in the declamatory tradition of Whitman, badly imitated—the pseudo-epic style so attractive to chauvinistic writers substituting enthusiasm for art. The craft of imagery and personal idiom had to wait for Jose Garcia Villa, an expatriate in America, for realization. Villa's theme of estrangement from God and country, pending recognition of equality, has found radiant expression in Have Come, Am Here (1943) and Volume Two (1949), the latter containing Villa's unique "comma poems." Meditative weight is provided each word through indiscriminately regular recurrence of commas, functioning as "holds" rather than as punctuation. Unfortunately, poor imitations of Villa have been a source of "unpoetics" second only to misunderstood Whitman. More recent poets in Eng., often trained and published in the United States, have achieved coalescence of native traditions (dramatic tableau, employment of cryptic and colorful language), New Critical formalism (to shear off excesses of sentimentality and wordiness), and personal vision. Especially important is Edith Tiempo's apocalyptic verse, and Bienvenido Santos' commemoration of lost dignity redeemed through long-suffering. Reanimation of the narrative line, in modern form, is already apparent in the verse dramas of Alejandro Hufana, who is also coeditor of Signatures, first poetry magazine in Eng., founded in 1955. Even if Tagalog succeeds in becoming the language of literature as well as of elementary communication, Am. emphasis on the dramatic and concrete has at least hastened the decline of the romantic abstract and essays-in-rhyme in Phil. poetry.

ANTHOLOGIES: Diwang Kayumanggi, ed. J. C. Laya (4 v., 1947–48; Tagalog prose and poetry); Heart of the Island, ed. M. Viray (1947); Phil. Cross Section, ed. M. Ramos and F. B. Valeros (1950); Phil. Harvest, ed. M. Ramos (1953); Phil. Writing, ed. T. D. Agcaoili (1953); Six Filipino Poets, ed. L. Casper (1955); Kathá I: an Anthol. of Phil. Writing in Eng., ed. J. C. Tuvera (1955).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: T. del Castillo y Tuazon, A Brief Hist. of Phil. Lit. (1937); The Lit. of the Filipinos, ed. J. V. and C. T. Pangiban (1954); L. Casper, "Filipino Poet: Erect and Audible," Phil. Studies, 4 (1956), "Reconnaissance in Manila," Antioch Review, 17 (1957) and The Wayward Horizon: Essays on Modern Phil. Lit. (1961).

L.C.

PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY. A poem may be philosophical in either of two main senses. It may serve as a vehicle of some philosophical teaching which is essentially independent of the poem itself and could therefore be paraphrased in a set of logically developed statements without loss or distortion of meaning: e.g., Lucretius' De Rerum Natura, Pope's Essay on Man, and Bridges' A Testament of Beauty. Or on the other hand, and by a more deeply characteristic procedure, it may employ its full linguistic, rhythmic, and associational resources to open up new insights into values, relationships, and significant possibilities, such as could not be adequately restated, except with gross distortion, outside the particular poem that has succeeded in expressing them. Shakespeare's King Lear, Keats's Ode to a Grecian Urn, and Eliot's Four Quartets may be taken to illustrate this second type.

Even in those cases where an explicit philos. serves as the main subject matter of the poem, it is never quite identical with the whole of the integral philos. that is being poetically expressed. A poem whose meaningful utterances were confined strictly to general propositions in their abstract character would be little more than a didactic tract, and any concrete details which it might employ would function as allegory rather than as poetic symbolism (see SEMANTICS AND POETRY). Where a poem succeeds in conveying an explicit philos. and in being good poetry at the same time, this combination is mainly a result of its employing language in such a way as to generate implicit insights, adumbrated by poetic rather than logical means, so as to deepen and enliven the explicit teachings that furnish the scenario of the poem. Thus in De Rerum Natura the otherwise dry doctrine of universal atomism is watered by fresh insights that find expression in such memorable images as "the flaming ramparts of the universe" (flammanitia moenia mundi) and the "compacts of love" (foedera Veneris) that draw and bind the atoms together. Such imagery is not merely decorative, but constitutive. The word foedus, with its plural foedera, carries a political connotation and suggests, perhaps subconsciously, that the atoms are drawn together by a kind of Roman agreement, instead of being hooked up mechanically as Democritus had supposed. Thus the poet's awe in the presence of cosmic majesty and his tranquil remembrance of the sweet unions sanctified by the goddess of love are real contributions to the total philos. which De Rerum Natura expresses. Accordingly the very opening line of the poem—"Aeneadum genetrix hominum divomque voluptas" (O mother of the race of Aeneas, who stirrest desire in men and gods)—may be taken as an announcement of the philosophical themes to follow, for it succeeds with remarkable economy in doing three things at once: it sets a Roman tone for the poem by its opening word; it invokes Venus, the symbol of archetypal womanhood in its dual aspect of desirable femininity and bounteous motherhood; and it acknowledges Venus' cosmic power, through arousing love, of producing and sustaining life.

The foregoing distinction between explicit and implicit philos. finds a counterpart in the distinction put forward by T. S. Eliot, in his essay on Dante, between intellectual lucidity and poetic lucidity, and correspondingly between "belief attitudes" or "philosophical beliefs" on the one hand and "poetic assent" on the other. Even in Dante's Divine Comedy, where the philosophical beliefs are logically and overtly the same as those of Thomas Aquinas, Eliot points out that the belief attitude of a man reading the Summa Theologica must be different from that of the same man adequately responding to the Commedia. For the Commedia, unlike the Summa, is constructed according to a "logic of sensibility" representing "a complete scale of the depth and height of human emotion." Correspondingly, Eliot argues, Dante's poetic assent, which is to say his total belief attitude, is inseparable from the elaboration of images which are "not merely antiquated rhetorical devices, but serious and practical means of making the spiritual visible."

The view that a poem may express truths by virtue of its peculiar poetic character and may thus claim to be inherently philosophical, was first overtly enunciated by Aristotle in his famous remark that "poetry is more philosophical than history, for poetry deals with universals, history with particulars." No doubt Aristotle was moved to this declaration by the Platonists' denunciation of poetry, as recorded in the 10th book of Plato's Republic. According to this Platonic view the outer world is half unreal, a mere shadow of the ever enduring Forms, or universal meanings and ideals, that find imperfect expression in it; and the arts are declared to be still further removed from the white light of reality, since they irresponsibly pick out elements of the natural world to represent them through their respective media—words and rhythms, or painted and figured surfaces—and thus what they produce is merely "a copy of a copy." Aristotle, on the other hand, regards the world of nature as holding within itself the potentialities of all things, and as striving, with variable success, to realize them; hence "Art partly imitates nature and partly carries to completion what nature has left incomplete," he declares in his Physics. But the carrying to completion of nature's partly realized tendencies is what establishes art as a philosophical operation; for artistic creation, since it is conceived as imitating, must therefore in turn symbolize creative nature at work. Later versions of the Aristotelian principle have held that the universals which poetry expresses are such as to constitute natura naturans as distinguished from natura naturata; the world's soul rather than the world's body; concrete rather than abstract universals; the creative impulse rather than the finished product.

The Aristotelian idea of poetry as at once reflecting and developing the activity of creative nature is notably carried forward by Goethe (1746-1832). Somewhat like Kant in his relatively late Critique of Judgment but independently of him, Goethe holds that evidences of immanent purpose can be found alike in the growth and evolution of natural organisms and in the humanly creative activities that constitute art. The role of mind is not to impose its laws upon an alien world of sense-data (as Kant had taught in his earlier work, The Critique of Pure Reason); its true role is "thinking in objects" (gegenständliches Denken), which involves the discovery of harmonies and analogies between the creative processes of nature and of art, and thus comes to grasp "Ideals," or archetypes, which are present in both of them. However, the Goethean archetype is not, like the Platonic eidos, something sharply distinguishable from the particulars that embody it; rather it exists only "in and through" particulars, and thus can be known only to one whose eyes and ears and heart are responsively open to the sensuously living world. Among these sensuous particulars that flow through one's "living experience" (Erlebnis, as distinguished from "conventional experience," Erfahrung) the rôle of mind is to discover "eminent instances," each of which is "a living-moment disclosure of the Inscrutable"—a disclosure which would never have been made were it not for just this individual manifestation. Poetry has therefore, by its very nature, something of the character of revelation: not because it proclaims universal truths as such, but because "by grasping the particular in its living character it implicitly apprehends the universal along with it."

The essentially philosophical nature of poetry is reaffirmed, on a variety of grounds, by a number of German and Eng. writers representing the romantic movement. The earlier German romantics—particularly the two Schlegels, Novalis, and Schelling—tend to confuse the issue by broadening the idea of poetry to such a degree as to include, in Friedrich Schlegel's words, that "unformed and unconscious poetry which stirs in planets, shines in light, . . . and glows in the loving bosoms of women" (Gespräch über die Poesis, 1800). His brother, August Wilhelm, frames this view with a more definite logic: arguing that as all things in nature are interrelated, so each thing in some way signifies everything else and thus mirrors the whole; and that whereas commonplace awareness is a disturbing medium that obscures the vision of the whole, the imagination (die Fantasie) breaks through this medium and plunges us into the real universe, where nothing is either static or in isolation, but everything participates in everything else in a state of continual metamorphosis. Both Novalis (1772-1801) and Schelling (1775-1854) are in general agreement, describing nature's power to fuse and create as love, which Novalis identifies with "the highest natural poetry" and which Schelling describes as "the spirit of nature that speaks to us only through symbols."

Two later German philosophers, Schopenhauer and Nietzsche, have made notable contributions to the topic. Schopenhauer (1788-1860) holds that nature operates primarily not by love but by will, and that the various grades of will in nature, from inorganic matter up through the plant and animal species to man, are distinguished by the Ideas (in something like Plato's sense) which represent the working of will, or desire, at a given level. Art, including of course poetry, he defines as the kind of knowledge concerned with the Ideas, and declares that "its only aim is the communication of knowledge." The highest art and the highest philos. are therefore one, since they both aim at that painless state in which "the wheel of Ixion stands still" and "we are for the moment set free from the miserable striving of the will." In Nietzsche (1844-1900) the will becomes more vigorously characterized as "the will to power," but this conception is broadened to include such diverse manifestations as the violence of the thunderstorm, the tropisms of a sprouting plant, the babe emerging from the womb, the battle-lust of marching Prussian regiments, the creative sensitivity of the artist, and the asceticism of the saint. In the artist the will to power assumes the complementary aspects of Dionysian creative frenzy (Rausch) and Apollonian love of form with its attendant illusion of universality; together they produce the aristocratic passion of "self-overcoming," in which philosophical wisdom and artistic creation are combined. Philos. and poetry are fundamentally one, because "wisdom is a woman" and can only be wooed by one who is "careless, mocking, forceful." Hazardous flashes of poetic insight, not demonstrative arguments, are the way to truth.

In England during the romantic period the identification of poetry and philosophy was a familiar theme, as illustrated in Shelley's declarations that poets are "philosophers of the very loftiest power" and that poetry is "the center and circumference of all knowledge." Coleridge adds the qualification that the poet is implicitly, not explicitly a philosopher. Both he and Wordsworth, moreover, base their view of the implicitly philosophical nature of poetry upon a theory of the imagination, derived in part from Kant. Now Kant's word for imagination is not Fantasie but Einbildungskraft, connoting by its etymology a power (Kraft) of making (bilden). Analogously Wordsworth characterizes imagination as "the faculty by which the poet conceives and produces—that is images [verb]—individual forms in which are embodied universal ideas or abstractions." Coleridge takes the further step of distinguishing between the Primary Imagination, the "living power and prime agent of all human perception" (virtually equivalent to Kant's "transcendental unity of apperception") and the Secondary Imagination, a combination and reflection of the Primary, guided by artistic aim and control. All imagination, both primary (metaphysical) and secondary (artistic), is "a repetition in the finite mind of the eternal act of creation in the infinite I AM"; and thus there is a firm continuity between a genuine poet's philosophical insights and his poetic creations.

In the past few decades one result of the reaction against romanticism has been a frequent disposition to deny any important connection between poetry and philos. Archibald MacLeish's aphorism, "A poem should not mean / But be," expresses the preference felt by many a poet, especially in a period of philosophical disorientation, to be judged as a maker rather than as a seer. I. A. Richards has provided a semantic groundwork for the divorce between poetry and philos., stressing the role of poetic utterances "as means to the manipulation and expression of feelings and attitudes" (Practical Criticism, 1929) and therefore as "pseudo-statements" (q.v.) to which judgments of true or false in the philosophical sense are irrelevant. However, more recent studies of the semantics of poetry, including some of Richards' own, have tended to recognize the inseparability of being and meaning, or of sentiment and idea, and accordingly to attempt a more adequate understanding of the role of meaning and belief in poetry. For an elaboration of this aspect of the subject see SEMANTICS AND POETRY.

Plato, Phaedrus (the best tr. is by Lane Cooper, 1938); Aristotle, Poetics, or The Art of Poetry, tr. by Bywater (1909), Cooper (1913), Butcher (1917), and others; S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817; esp. ch. 14); A. Schopenhauer, The World as Will and Representation (1818; pt. 3); P. B. Shelley, A Defence of Poetry (1821); F. Nietzsche, The Birth of Tragedy (1872); G. Santayana, Three Philosophical Poets (1910); T. S. Eliot, Dante

(1930); J. M. Murry, "The Metaphysics of Poetry," in Countries of the Mind (2d ser., 1931); G. Boas, Philos. and Poetry (1932); D. G. James, Scepticism and Poetry (1937); W. M. Urban, Language and Reality (1939); K. Burke, Philos. of Lit. Form (1941); E. M. W. Tillyard, The Elizabethan World Picture (1943); J. C. Ransom, "Poetry: A Note in Ontology," repr. in Critiques and Essays in Crit., ed. R. W. Stallman (1949); F. M. Cornford, "The Unconscious Element in Lit. and Philos.," in The Unwritten Philos. and Other Essays (1950), "The Philosopher as Successor of the Seer-Poet," and "The Quarrel of Philos. and Poetry," both repr. in Principium Sapientiae (1952); Crane, Critics; S. K. Langer, Feeling and Form (1953; chs. 1 and 2), J. Maritain, Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry (1953); Wellek and Warren, 2d ed., ch. 10; K. Hoppe, "Philosophie und Dichtung," Deutsche Philologie im Aufriss, ed. W. Stammer, III (1957); E. W. Knight, Lit. Considered as Philos.: The Fr. Example (1957); R. Jordan, "Poetry and Philos.: Two Modes of Revelation," SR, 67 (1959); A. W. Levi, Lit., Philos. and the Imagination (1962); P. Wheelwright, Metaphor and Reality (1962); E. Vivas, The Artistic Transaction and Essays on Theory of Lit. (1963). P.W.

PHONEME. See PROSODY.

PHONETIC EQUIVALENCE. To acknowledge repetition, grouping, or modulation of sounds one must define the phonetic elements. If we can avoid eye-rhymes and get rid of the notion that even the most rational of spellings can accurately represent the sounds of a language, the problem appears superficially to be simple. A given recurrent sound is easily recognized, one might believe, by anyone who knows the language. It is clear that ate / bait / great / straight / weight, or that beau / hoe / mow / so / though, are rhymes, and that in England bitter / bit her are equivalent. Eng. or/au, ar/ah (e.g., born / brawn, car / spa), once stigmatized as "Cockney" rhymes, are now valid for so-called British Eng. (Received Standard of England). Elizabethan throws / trewand may alliterate in tr-. Desperate rhymes, sometimes favored by Browning and Hopkins, such as boon he on / communion, are evidently not exact echoes. Certain 18th-c. German poets use ei / eu(äu), i / ü, e / ö, -gen / -chen, (-de / -te), as rhymes: with them these rhymes represent dialectal sound-fusions, but became conventional rhymes in later writers.

If a speaker of the language, dialect or standard, and the era in which the poem was composed, would accept certain sounds as equivalent (omitting naive errors), these may be called correct echoes. This covers the 18th-c. German rhymes, the "Cockney" rhymes, and the Elizabethan tr above, and in general it suffices for most formal sound repetitions such as true rhyme, Sp. assonance, and most Germanic alliteration. Gaelic rhymes are a special case, in which all voiceless stops are treated as equivalent, all voiced stops, or all "aspirates."

Normal ph. e. does not call for a rigid adherence to the "phonemes." In any case, different schools of linguists present different batteries of phonemes and rules of their combination, and some systems run counter to a mere commonsensical view of language; for example, y- and w- appear in some as i and u. Especially when we consider grouping or modulation of sounds, we must be free to cling to or to abandon the phoneme. But what criteria can we use? The problem is far from simple. In Am. Eng., does the first vocalic element in pyre really echo that in tropic; or in "butter tub drubbing" does the slackened -tt- of butter find equivalents in the t of tub, the d of drubbing, or in its r? Should an Englishman equate the e-vowel in pet, pare and pay? Should a German speaker equate the first vowel element in Mann, Maus, mein? Should a Frenchman equate the vowels in est, et, répéter, même (he does not altogether in rhymes), or those in de, deux, deuil? In Castilian Sp. the voiced z before g (juzgo) is close to the sound of medial d, for whereas initial b (v), d, g are stops, between vowels (etc.) those symbols represent fricatives: should a Spaniard regard these phonetic affinities and distinctions as overriding the phonemics, which equates d with -d- and so on? This initial-vs.-medial difference must cause even more confusion in Danish, which besides presenting a transform like that in Sp., has medial p, t, k resembling initial b, d, g (as with Am. t).

Applying "phonetic syzygy" to "tone-color" (Lanier) we note that certain related variants from separate phonemes sometimes echo, while certain widely differing variants of a given phoneme may not. But analysis of phonemic features is advisable, and the whole of a poem should be considered. "Equivalence" is a misleading term: what we have to recognize are degrees and kinds of likeness and diversity. Their basis need not be linguistically, but must be aesthetically, distinctive for the particular crux. Where motor considerations predominate, the phonemes may be analyzed on a basis of articulation; where acoustic impression are paramount, we may analyze on an auditory-feature basis. No rigid rules are possible, but the more unlike two "sounds" are, the more compensation is needed: whether from (1) their similar position (a) in the syllable (e.g., chat / jay), (b) relative to other sounds (river / rougher, spital / smitten), (c) relative to rhythm and line; or from (2) their comparatively strong phonetic contrast with (d) their surroundings, (e) other more frequent phonemes in the language.

I. The least obtrusive difference between occidental phonemes is either a lenis / fortis or a voiced / unvoiced distinction: e.g. z-sounds and s-sounds (valleys / Alice) or j and ch often suballiterate: "Ses ailes de géant l'empêchent de marcher" (Baudelaire). II. Nasals may ring together: "Sacred Virgil never sang / All the marvel there begun, / But there's a stone upon my tongue" (Yeats). III. Vocalic i, ü, u may respectively echo their corresponding semi-vowels in various languages, and British u-vowels with vocalic l: "dandled a sandalled / Shadow that swam or sank / On meadow and river and wind-wandering weed-winding bank" (Hopkins). IV. Sharp and dull versions of a liquid or nasal may chime together; e.g. It. gl with l: "avolte . . . sciolte . . . / le quali ella spargea sì dolcemente / e raccogliea con sì leggiadri" (Petrarch). V. Even wider linguistic distinctions may be overridden: thus s assimilates with sh, e.g. in "chast desire / . . . Cherisht but with fire" (S. Daniel); and the different vowels in "Shadow . . . On meadow" (Hopkins, above) subassonate. For broader sound classes see TONE-COLOR. See also ALLITERATION, ASSONANCE, CONSONANCE, ECHO, REPETITION, RHYME, SOUND IN POETRY, SYZYGY.—S. Lanier, The Science of Eng. Verse (1880; in centenary ed. of his works, 10 v., 1945); M. Grammont, Traité de phonétique (3e éd., 1946); M. Swadesh, "On the Analysis of Eng. Syllabics," Language, 33 (1947); U. K. Goldsmith, "Words Out of a Hat . . .," JEGP, 49 (1950); H. Kökeritz, Shakespeare's Pronunciation (1953); R. Jakobson and M. Halle, Fundamentals of Language (1956); E. J. Dobson, Eng. Pronunciation 1500-1700 (1957). D.I.M.

PIE QUEBRADO. Although this Sp. metric term may occasionally mean any half-line used with its corresponding whole line (as the heptasyllable and/or the pentasyllable with the hendecasyllable, the hexasyllable with the dodecasyllable), p.q. usually denotes the tetrasyllable (or equivalent) used in combination with the octosyllable, particularly in the copla de pie quebrado (see COPLA). The use of the p.q. has been common in Sp. poetry since at least the early 14th c., when it appears in the Libro de buen amor of Juan Ruiz Archpriest of Hita.—Navarro. D.C.C.

PINDARIC ODE. See ODE.

PITCH. Highness or lowness of tone. One of the four characteristics of a spoken sound, the others being duration (q.v.), loudness, and quality. P. is measured by the number of vibrations per second (8 to 30,000), is sometimes roughly described by the terms acute (high) and grave (low), and is often indicated by musical notation. A number of authorities hold that p. usually coincides with accent (q.v.) or that it is one of the constituents of accent. Despite controversy over the relation of p. to accent, most prosodists would agree that the management of p., in poetry, is one of the primary means of rhetorical emphasis or intensification.—Baum; K. M. Wilson, Sound and Meaning in Eng. Poetry (1930); D. Bolinger, "A Theory of P. Accent in Eng.," Word, 14 (1958). P.F.

PLANH. A funeral lament, in Old Prov. In form, it may be considered a specialized variety of serventes (q.v.). Of the 40-odd planhs preserved, three-fourths bewail the death of some distinguished person, normally a patron or patroness of the poet; only 10 are laments for close friends and loved ones. The poem ordinarily consists of conventional and hyperbolic eulogies of the departed (he was generous, hospitable, gracious, chivalrous, well-mannered, wise, brave, all to a supreme degree), plus a prayer for his soul, and a statement of the poet's sense of loss, the sincerity of which is sometimes open to question.—H. Springer, Das altprovenzalische Klagelied (1895); Jeanroy, II. F.M.C.

PLATONISM AND POETRY. Pl. has been a persistent influence on Western poetry from the 4th c. B.C. until the present day. This is paradoxical since Plato was suspicious of poetry and banned most of its types from his ideal republic. To understand Plato's continuing influence it is necessary to consider four concepts which either originated with Plato or received their most persuasive expression in the dialogues.

I. POETRY AS EDUCATION. A characteristic feature of Plato's thought is his concern for the practical application of philosophy to personal, family, and social problems. Although he believed that the supreme values—the Good, the Beautiful, and the True—were ultimately One, it was the Good which concerned him most frequently. Because of this bias Plato believed that poetry, like all the other arts, should subserve individual and social morality. In the Protagoras (325–26) he showed how poetry could be used to create admiration (hence emulation) of the gods and noble heroes. The sanction against poets in Republic 10 is simply a corollary of this idea. The state must protect its citizens against the corrupting influence of meretricious poetry, as well as indoctrinate them in virtue. Plato did not ban all poetry. It is often forgotten that he permitted those poets to remain who sang "praises of the gods and encomia of famous men" (Republic 10.607), a concession repeated in the Laws 8.801.

Plato's emphasis on the power of poetry to educate is merely the outstanding instance of a general Gr. tendency which has been explored in Werner Jaeger's Paideia. It was a powerful influence on late classical and medieval criticism, which often had to defend poetry against the attacks of moral bigots. During the Renaissance it continued to be used in this way. It also contributed to the theory of the poet as forger of the national consciousness of the newly emergent national state, an idea especially strong in Renaissance epic theory.

II. POETRY AS IMITATION. The theory of ideas led Plato to view the created world as an imperfect imitation of a divine archetype. In the Republic poetry is described as a "mimetic" (imitative) art using as its models the objects and actions which the poet sees in the created world. It is thus an imitation of an imitation, more false than that which it imitates. If this is so, it may be a pleasant pastime, but it leads away from the True rather than toward it. This is a more telling attack on poetry than the claim that much of it is immoral. It implies that poetry is inevitably trivial.

Aristotle's Poetics offered one solution to the problem by suggesting that the poetic imitation, being based upon general probabilities, was "more philosophical" and hence more true than history (cf. Poetics 9). The Neoplatonists went further than Aristotle. Beginning with Plotinus, Neoplatonists generally agreed that the poetic imitation is the highest of all imitations because the poet seeks to imitate the divine archetype, whereas the artisan merely copies an already-existing model. Plato's own terminology thus provided the means for elevating the artist to a position of supreme importance. This theory was widespread during the Renaissance and persisted unabated during the romantic period, largely because of its analogies to Kantian idealism.

III. POETRY AS INSPIRATION. In the Ion Plato satirized a rhapsodist who could not explain the source of his talent for reciting and talking about poetry. Half in jest Socrates explains that both poets and rhapsodists must be moved by a divine power speaking through them. Elsewhere, Plato seems to say that there can be no genuine poetry except by inspiration. In later ages inspiration, or furor poeticus, was interpreted as the suprahuman state during which the poet glimpsed the ultimate nature of things, the divine archetypes. Countless texts and traditions affirm the truth of this doctrine. The conventional invocation to the muse, the primitive tradition of the poet as vates or madman, etc. confirm the idea of poetry as a divine gift. Christian critics who inherited this idea could point to Pentateuch and Psalms for substantiation. See INSPIRATION.

IV. POETRY AS HERMETIC SYMBOLISM. Throughout the dialogues, but especially in Symposium, Timaeus, Parmenides, and Republic, Plato used myths, images, and symbols to express his ideas. Many of these (e.g., number-symbolism) were derived from pre-Socratic philosophy or primitive religion. However, Plato gave them philosophical coherence and permanent expression. In this sense the vast jumble of myths, symbols, emblems, and esoteric notions found in Orphic, Hermetic, and Neoplatonic literature may be called Platonic. On the other hand, many specific symbols and the general tendency toward allegory and jargon are not Platonic but a product of the decadent phase of Neoplatonism.

The theory of imitation and inspiration as developed by the Neoplatonists tended to emphasize the mystic and occult elements in poetry. Carried to an extreme it encouraged poetry which was consciously obscure; and obscurity is perhaps the most obvious feature of Hermetic writing from Hermes Trismegistus through Pico della Mirandola down to Blake and Yeats. This obscurity results from the conscious use of esoteric symbols, which are explained in two ways: First, the poet is by definition trying to convey a more than human vision (the divine archetypes). Since normal language is inadequate, he must resort to symbols. Second, the poet must conceal his knowledge from the profane, who would abuse it. His symbols and allegories create a veil which only the initiated can penetrate. The theory of symbolism as a veil protecting knowledge from the rabble is evident in Fulgentius' reading of the Aeneid, in Dante's Convivio, in Boccaccio's Genealogy of the Gods, and in numerous Renaissance critical works. Among common symbols which may with some justification be called Platonic, the following are typical: the idea of the One and the Many, the equation of Light and Truth (Timaeus, Parmenides); the equation of music with divine order, the music of the spheres, number-symbolism, the golden chain of creation (Republic, Timaeus); the Platonic ladder, Platonic love (Symposium); the soul as the body's prisoner; the soul as charioteer drawn by a dark and a light horse (Republic, Symposium, Phaedrus). Readers interested in Platonic and Hermetic symbols and their history are referred to Frutiger, Dunbar, and Merrill in the bibliography.

HISTORY: Although Pl. has never ceased to be an important influence on European poetry, its influence has sometimes been predominant, sometimes submerged. The four periods of predominance are Neoplatonic (3d-5th c. A.D.), Dionysian (10th-12th c.), High Renaissance (16th-17th c.), and Romantic (19th c.).

The Neoplatonic period is chiefly significant for commentaries on Plato and on various literary texts. Plotinus (d. 270) was the leader of the movement. Although he did not treat poetry specifically, his theory of beauty provided the basis for the idea of poetry as imitation (see above). Among Plotinus' followers, Porphyry (d. 304) wrote on Homeric Questions and On the Cave of the Nymphs, in which he interpreted Odyssey 13.102-12, as a detailed allegory of the universe. He thereby helped encourage the tendency toward allegorical reading of poetry and philosophy evident in Macrobius' commentary on Somnium Scipionis and Fulgentius' De Continentia Virgiliana. Iamblichus (d. 330), his pupil, emphasized the Hermetic element in Neoplatonism but added little to literary theory. On the other hand, Maximus Tyrius (fl. A.D. 150) wrote a series of Dissertations on Platonic topics, three of which (4, 17, 37) defend poetry from the ethical standpoint, asserting the moral probity of Homer. A much later writer, Proclus (d. 485), also defended poetry in an often-quoted commentary on the Republic. Finally, the Alexandrian Jew Philo Judaeus (d. ca. A.D. 50) wrote an immensely influential and long-winded allegorical interpretation of Genesis along cabalistic and Platonic lines.

The Christian Fathers, particularly Origen and Augustine (cf. City of God 8,10; Confessions 8) confessed a strong debt to Plato. Generally they were suspicious of all but spiritual poetry, and when they countenanced secular poetry at all they did so on the basis of its power to educate. From writers like Philo they inherited the technique of allegorical interpretation and read the Bible as an intricate fusion of literal, allegorical, and symbolic meanings. This approach was carried over to the interpretation of classical poets like Ovid, Statius, and Virgil, and often had a profound influence on poets engaged in original composition, Dante being the standard example.

By the 4th c. A.D. the Latin West had lost contact with Plato and the better Neoplatonists. Only the Timaeus (tr. Calcidius, ca. A.D. 350) and a few fragments were available in translation. For the rest, Western scholars had to rely on second- and third-hand sources such as Macrobius, Boethius, or Cicero's philosophical dialogues. However during the 9th c. Pl. was strongly revived by Scotus Erigena's translation of the Mystical Theology, On the Divine Names, and The Heavenly Hierarchy of Dionysius the pseudo-Areopagite. These works were saturated with debased Neoplatonism (especially that of Proclus), but the fact that their author was thought to be St. Paul's famous convert (Acts 17:34) caused them to be read and assimilated throughout the West. Their influence culminated in the writing of such men as Thierry and Bernard of Chartres and the poetry of Bernard Silvestris (de Mundi Universitate) and Alan of Lille (Anticlaudianus; de Planctu Naturae). Their most important influence however was a delayed one. The structure of Dante's Paradise, much of its symbolism, and innumerable details are drawn directly or indirectly from Dionysius.

The influence of Pl. during the High Renaissance is incalculable. It began with the completion (ca. 1482) of Marsilio Ficino's L. translation of Plato and the publication of his noble effort to reconcile Plato and Christianity, the Theologia Platonica. The history of Renaissance Pl. has been traced in detail by many scholars (see Robb, Harrison, Merrill in bibliography), and only a few generalizations will be made here. First, the Platonic concept of paideia furnished the basic justification for poetry throughout the period. Second, the Platonic theory of love, especially in popularized form, furnished the chief subject matter for the Renaissance lyric from Petrarch to Edmund Spenser, as well as appearing in countless courtesy books, epics, philosophical poems, hymns, and the like. Third, the theories of imitation and inspiration recur with monotonous regularity throughout the 16th c.

Generally speaking, Pl. yielded to naturalism during the latter half of the 16th c. in France and the first half of the 17th c. in England. This tendency was opposed by the Cambridge Platonists, and one of them, Henry More, wrote philosophical poetry of some merit (e.g., The Song of the Soul, 1647).

The romantic period witnessed a renewed interest in inspirational literature and literary symbolism as part of the reaction against 18th-c. rationalism. All of these tendencies favored the revival of Pl., but often as a fanciful or "poetic" means of expressing Kantian ideas rather than an independent philosophy. Wordsworth's "Intimations Ode" uses many Platonic theories—e.g., the pre-existence of the soul, the image of the body as prison house, the light imagery—but one hesitates to call it a Platonic poem. On the other hand, Blake and Shelley were conscious Platonists, the former a student of Plotinus, Maximus Tyrius, and Proclus in the translations of Wm. Taylor; the latter a reader of Plato in the original Gr. and a lifelong believer in the power of poetry to educate mankind. In Germany Hölderlin is the best example (among many) of a romantic poet strongly influenced by Pl. In America Emerson interpreted Plato for his fellow Transcendentalists, and Poe, with his Platonic concern for the concrete expression of the ideal through symbols, created a literary theory which influenced Baudelaire and the later symbolists.

Pl. has continued to influence modern poetry, particularly Eng. and German. The translation of Plato by Jowett (1871) had an important effect in diffusing knowledge of his philosophy. Among modern poets whose debt to Plato seems especially important are Rilke and Yeats, both of whom draw on the Hermetic tradition and the idea of poetry as inspiration; and Wallace Stevens, whose idealism and symbols both owe much to Plato. Despite his banishment of poets Plato was as much a poet as a philosopher. His philosophy has always been deeply appealing to the poetic temperament. There is every reason to believe that it will continue to be so in the future.

J. Harrison, Pl. in Eng. Poetry of the 16th and 17th C. (1903); L. Winstanley, Pl. in Shelley (1913); H. Dunbar, Symbolism in Medieval Thought (1929); P. Frutiger, Les Mythes de Platon (1930); N. Robb, Pl. in the It. Renaissance (1935); P. Shorey, Pl., Ancient and Modern (1938); R. Klibansky, The Continuity of the Platonic Tradition during the Middle Ages (1939); Mario dal Pra, Scoto Eriugena ed il neoplatonismo medievale (1941); I. Samuel, Plato and Milton (1949); R. McKeon, "Poetry and Philosophy in the 12th C.," Crane, Critics; P. Kristeller, Il pensiero filosofico di Marsilio Ficino (1953); E. Cassirer, The Platonic Ren. in England (1953); R. C. Lodge, Plato's Theory of Art (1953); R. V. Merrill and R. J. Clements, Pl. in Fr. Ren. Poetry (1957); R. Ellrodt, Neoplatonism in the Poetry of Spenser (1960); G. Harper, The Neoplatonism of William Blake (1961). O.B.H.

PLÉIADE. The term, as it refers to the small group of poets of the Fr. Renaissance led by Pierre de Ronsard, originated in 1556 in an elegy in which the latter welcomed a new member to the group: ". . . Belleau, qui viens en la brigade / Des bons, pour accomplir la septiesme Pléiade" (Critical edition of Ronsard by P. Laumonier, viii, 354). This was Ronsard's only use of the term in this sense. Until that time he had used the term Brigade, which had been hospitable to a much larger number of poets than the expression that replaced it. Probably with no rigid intention of thereby creating an exclusive circle of poets limited in membership to seven, Ronsard adopted the expression Pléiade from the well-known Alexandrine group of poets who in antiquity had gone by that name.

Although membership in the P. varied with the years, it did not at any one time surpass seven. In 1556, along with Remy Belleau and Ronsard himself, the group included Joachim du Bellay, Pontus de Tyard, Jean-Antoine de Baïf, Jacques Peletier, and Etienne Jodelle. According to Ronsard's first biographer, Claude Binet, the name of Peletier was eventually replaced by that of the poet's teacher, Jean Dorat, one of the great Hellenists of the Fr.

Renaissance. Within a few years of its first and last mention by Ronsard, the term P. had been found so convenient as a designation of the group immediately associated with the poet, that Henri Estienne is able to use it in his Apologie pour Hérodote (1566) in confident expectation that it would be understood to refer to the contemporary group of Fr. poets.

Three members of the P. were influential contributors to Fr. poetic theory of the Renaissance: Jacques Peletier, Joachim du Bellay, and Ronsard. As early as 1541, Peletier had published a translation of the Ars poetica of Horace prefaced by remarks of his own in which the fundamental principle which was later to be adopted by Ronsard and his associates was clearly enunciated: that Fr. writers should defend and illustrate (i.e., render illustrious) their own language by writing in Fr., and not in L. or Gr. In 1555 Peletier published an Art Poétique in which he reaffirms the position he had adopted in the preface to the Ars Poetica of 1541, insists upon the divine nature of poetry, discusses the relationship between technique and native endowment, the function of imitation, the varieties of poetic subjects, and genres.

Both Du Bellay and Ronsard may be called, in matters of theory, disciples of Peletier. The former published in 1549 the renowned Deffence et illustration de la langue françoise which, though it followed by eight or more years Peletier's preface, became, because it arrived precisely at the right moment, and because of the intensity of its language, the manifesto of the new school. Du Bellay blames the alleged poverty of the Fr. language of his time on the unwillingness of earlier generations of Frenchmen to devote their energies to its cultivation. Intrinsically, he says, it is capable of the highest reaches of poetic and philosophic expression, and need not bow in these respects before any of the languages of antiquity or of modern times. This is the essence of his deffence. As for the illustration, Du Bellay rejects the position that translation of the great classics into Fr. can of itself suffice to raise Fr. literature to a status of equality with Gr., L., or It. What the Fr. poet needs is so intimate a knowledge of the classics and of the more important modern literatures, that their substance will become part of his own, and that ideally his imitation of them will result not so much in a conscious effort to reproduce their thought and feeling, as in their natural assimilation and transformation into a form congenial to the Fr. language and acceptable to cultivated Frenchmen.

The Abregé de l'art poétique françois of Ronsard (1565) is a brief practical handbook intended for the young beginner in poetry.

Like Peletier and Du Bellay, Ronsard's fundamental premise is that the poet must write in Fr., although he, too, demands that the would-be writer possess as profound a classical instruction as possible. He demands that the poet, who for him is the inspired prophet of the Muses, should hold them "in singular veneration and never reduce them to a position of dishonorable servitude" (ed. Laumonier, xiv, 10).

The "revolution" of Malherbe (1605) was, in reality, the regularization, perhaps the excessively rigid codification, of tendencies already clearly apparent in Ronsard and his colleagues. With the end of the Malherbian dispensation, as the romantic period begins, qualities of subjective lyricism, equally present in the poets of the P., but somewhat neglected during the period of classicism, come once more to the fore. The influence of the P. has thus been durable and pervasive, and it is fair to say that the principles laid down by Peletier, Du Bellay, and Ronsard have not lost their vigor except among poets for whom harmony and sonority take precedence over communication.

A. Rosenbauer, Die poetischen Theorien der Plejade nach Ronsard und Du Bellay (1895); P. Laumonier, "L'Art poétique de Jacques Peletier du Mans," Revue de la Renaissance (June 1901) and Ronsard, poète lyrique (1909, 3d ed., 1931); C. Binet, Vie de Ronsard, ed. P. Laumonier (1910); Patterson; H. Chamard, Histoire de la P. (4 v., 1939-41); R. J. Clements, The Crit. Theory and Practice of the P. (1942); F. Simone, "I poeti della P. ed i loro predecessori," Giornale italiano di filologia, 2 (1949); Crit. Prefaces of the Fr. Ren., ed. B. Weinberg (1950); F. Desonay, "Les manifestes littéraires du XVII^e s. en France," BHR, 14 (1952); R. V. Merrill and R. J. Clements, Platonism in Fr. Renaissance Poetry (1957); J. Bonnot, Humanisme et P., l'histoire, la doctrine, les oeuvres (1959); I. Silver, Ronsard and the Hellenic Renaissance in France (1961-); G. Castor, P. Poetics (1964). I.S.

PLOCE. See ANADIPLOSIS.

PLOT may be defined as the pattern of events in a narrative or a drama, either in prose or in verse. Plot is the Eng. word commonly used to translate Aristotle's mythos, a term used in the Poetics to describe one of the six elements of tragedy. Aristotle gives p. a precise critical definition, assigns it the place of honor, and calls it "the first principle, and, as it were, the soul of a tragedy." The definition given in the Poetics has been the basis of almost all other considerations of p., either friendly or hostile.

The concept of p. has shifted from time to time in the history of criticism, as the critic's concern has been with the making of a work or with the responding to a work, with the creator or the spectator. Viewed in terms of the principles controlling the making of a work of art, p. has referred to action, to pattern, to structure or some variation of these elements; viewed in terms of the psychological and emotional response of the audience or reader, p. has referred to impression, to sense of unity, to purpose, or to some similar response. In terms of the latter view of p., any of many different elements may constitute the controlled affective quality of a work; it is essentially in terms of witness rather than creation that the critics of the contemporary Chicago school have attempted to broaden greatly the concept of p. (See paragraph below on "the Chicago school.") In the common usage of the term p., however, the sense of the making or shaping principle has been dominant in most criticism, and it is in that sense that this article treats the concept of p.

Aristotle called the p. "the imitation of the action" (see IMITATION) as well as "the arrangement of the incidents." He demanded that the action imitated be "a whole," i.e., have a beginning: "that which does not itself follow anything by causal necessity, but after which something naturally is or comes to be"; a middle: "that which follows something as some other thing follows it"; and an end: "that which itself naturally follows some other thing, either by necessity, or as a rule, but has nothing following it." He asked that a p. have unity, i.e., that it "imitate one action and that a whole, the structural union of the parts being such that, if any one of them is displaced or removed, the whole will be disjointed and disturbed." These well-knit plots he opposed to episodic plots "in which the acts succeed one another without probable or necessary sequence." He also distinguished between simple and complex plots, a simple p. being one in which a change of fortune takes place without Reversal of the Situation and without Recognition, and a complex p. being one in which the change of fortune is accompanied by a Reversal or by a Recognition or by both. The Reversal is a change by which the action veers round to its opposite, and a Recognition is a change from ignorance to knowledge. These should both arise, he says, from "the internal structure of the plot, so that what follows should be the necessary or probable result of the preceding action." Therefore, Aristotle's test for sound plotting appears to be "whether any given event is a case of propter hoc or post hoc." This emphasis on causality is central to the Aristotelian concept, yet he also argued against a mechanic art, declaring that "a single action, whole and complete, with a beginning, a middle, and an end" will "resemble a living organism in all its unity." There is much to be said for Humphry House's view that the episode or incident is for Aristotle the means by which the plot is realized. Aristotle's statement that, having found his story, the poet "should first sketch its general outline, and then fill in the episodes and amplify in detail," House would translate "should first sketch its general outline, and then episodize" (Aristotle's Poetics, 1956). Aristotle asserted that the poet "should be a maker of plot . . . since he is a maker because he imitates, and what he imitates are actions." House asserts that "episodizing"—i.e., realizing the plot in terms of incidents—"is the essential activity of the poet as the maker."

The distinction between story and p. is a difficult one to make. E. M. Forster says that ". . . a story [is] a narrative of events arranged in their time-sequence. A plot is also a narrative of events, the emphasis falling on causality" (Aspects of the Novel, 1927). Story, he believes, arouses only curiosity; whereas p. demands intelligence and memory. House is illuminating on this distinction; he says: "There is first a rambling and amorphous 'story,' often taken over from tradition or picked up from some other extraneous source . . . and then comes the serious business of making it into a play or an epic." This making is essentially the making of story into plot.

The superiority which Aristotle assigns p. over character has been a matter of great debate, with most critics since the early 19th c. defending active character as the dynamic aspect of narrative or drama and p. as the mechanic aspect. Edward J. O'Brien, writing on the short story, says: "The plot of a story is structural. . . . The action of a story, as contrasted with the plot, is a matter of dynamics. . . . Plot is merely a means to an end" (The Short Story Case Book, 1935). Probably the best and certainly the most graceful of the mediators between these positions is Henry James, who says: "I cannot imagine composition existing in a series of blocks, nor conceive, in any novel worth discussing at all, of a passage of description that is not in its intention narrative, a passage of dialogue that is not in its intention descriptive, a touch of truth of any sort that does not partake of the nature of incident, or an incident that derives its interest from any other source than the general and only source of the success of a work of art—that of being illustrative. . . . What is character but the determination of incident? What is incident but the illustration of character" ("The Art of Fiction," 1884). James's term illustrative appears to be his rough equivalent of imitation.

The critics of "the Chicago school" have attempted greatly to extend this organic view of p. Ronald S. Crane says: "The form of a given plot is a function of the particular correlation among . . . three variables which the completed work is calculated to establish, consistently and progressively, in our minds." The variables are: "(1) the general estimate we are induced to form . . . of the moral character and deserts of the hero . . . ; (2) the judgments we are led similarly to make about the nature of the events that actually befall the hero . . . as having either painful or pleasurable consequences for him . . . permanently or temporarily; and (3) the opinions we are made to entertain concerning the degree and kind of his responsibility for what happens to him . . ." (Critics and Criticism, 1952). Paul Goodman, also of the Chicago school, considers "Any system of parts that carries over, continuous and changing, from the beginning to the end" a p., and he applies the definition even to short poetry, making it refer to rhythm, diction, and imagery, as well as incidents" (The Structure of Literature, 1954).

The various views of p. have in common an attention to arrangement or pattern or structure. For all critics "pattern" seems a minimal definition; and for almost all of them "pattern of events" is a primary description, however much more than this they may also wish to include. Clearly an episode in itself does not make a p.; equally clearly the presence of two or more episodes does not make a p.; the concept of p. refers to a relationship—and an implied causality—among episodes. We may conclude, therefore, that p. is an intellectual formulation about the relationship existing among the incidents of a drama or a narrative, and that it is, therefore, a guiding principle for the author and an ordering control for the reader. It is something perceived by the reader as giving structure and unity to the work. And herein lies, perhaps, one of the greatest difficulties; for, as Percy Lubbock has argued, it is difficult for a reader to hold the pieces of a drama or a narrative in his mind and almost impossible to retain the total work firmly enough in mind to examine its informing and unifying principle (The Craft of Fiction, 1921).

This difficulty is illustrated by an examination of a special type of narrative structure, the framework story, i.e., the kind of work in which a narrative or a group of narratives is set within a larger controlling frame. The question of when the frame becomes a p. itself or even a portion of the p. is a delicate one. Boccaccio's Decameron, a collection of tales told by a group in special circumstances, has no narrative frame p. at all, for nothing is presented of the circumstances out of which the tales come. Chaucer's Canterbury Tales clearly has a narrative in its frame—the pilgrims are realized as persons, the pattern of a journey is given, a contest within this journey is presented, and the tales themselves at least in part grow out of the events which occur in this framework. Yet the Canterbury Tales can hardly be said to have a framework p. in the sense in which p. has been described in this essay. In some cases the framework does become a p., as, for example, in Melville's Moby-Dick, where the narrator has his own problem and the action dealing with Ahab becomes in a sense an element in this problem. On the other hand, one might argue that the Faerie Queene, had it been completed, would have had no real p., but rather a conceptualized allegorical structure. This is a kind of structure which raises another critical question about p.

Many critics have suggested that theme or philosophical concept is or may be the basis of p. Now certainly the action being imitated in a p. should not be stripped of its rich complexity; yet it must be asserted that the raw materials of plots are conflicts and actions, not concepts and philosophical statements. Even in an allegory we do not think of the p. in terms of the conceptualized abstractions represented by the characters but rather in terms of the characters and their actions broadly independent of the conceptualizations that they represent. Thus, if we give a plot summary of Everyman similar to Aristotle's summary of the Odyssey, in which no names are attached to the actors, we are carried further away from rather than closer to the abstract statement beneath the play. P. may be a formulation by which the author of an allegory translates his concepts into dramatic or narrative terms, but it does not itself partake of the concept which is expressed through it.

Thus we are pointed back toward a view of p. as the controlling and unifying principle of action in a work. It is helpful to think of p. as a "planned series of interrelated actions progressing, because of the interplay of one force upon another, through a struggle of opposing forces to a climax and a dénouement" (W. F. Thrall, A. Hibbard and C. H. Holman, A Handbook to Literature, rev. ed.). Here the emphasis is on conflict as the unifying principle of action. Basically there are four kinds of conflict which may be made the basis of a p.: man against the forces of nature, man against his fellowman, man against himself, and man against some conceptualized or personalized aspect of the order of things, such as Fate or Destiny or Nemesis.

If viewed in terms of the basic conflict, the elements of a p. are: (1) The Exposition, i.e., the establishing of the situation within which the conflict develops. This exposition is frequently delayed until after the conflict has gotten underway and then given piecemeal. (2) The Initiating Action, i.e., the event which brings the opposing forces into conflict. (3) The Rising Action, i.e., the separate events which advance the conflict to its crucial point at which the protagonist in the conflict takes, consciously or unconsciously, the action which determines the future course of the conflict irrevocably. It is possible for this action of the protagonist to be a failure to act, as in the scene where Hamlet fails to kill Claudius at prayer. This decisive point is called the crisis, for upon it the action turns. It frequently, but by no means always, coincides with the climax, which is the point of highest interest. Crisis refers to structure; climax to emotional response. (4) The Falling Action, i.e., the incidents and episodes in which the force destined to be victorious establishes its supremacy. (5) The Dénouement or conclusion, i.e., the incidents or episode in which the conflict called forth by the initiating action is irremediably resolved. The unified p. may be considered to make an upward spiral, in that the resolution of the conflict returns us to a situation similar in its repose or the balance of its forces but not in their exact nature or alignment to that presented in the exposition.

S. H. Butcher, Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and Fine Art, The Poetics and ch. 9 (4th ed., 1911); P. Lubbock, The Craft of Fiction (1921); E. Muir, The Structure of the Novel (1928); C. H. Grabo, The Technique of the Novel (1928); J. W. Linn and H. W. Taylor, A Foreword to Fiction (1935; ch. 5); W. F. Thrall, A. Hibbard and C. H. Holman, A Handbook to Lit. (1936; rev. ed. 1960); H. D. F. Kitto, Gr. Tragedy (1939); F. Fergusson, The Idea of a Theater (1949); R. A. Brower, "The Heresy of P.," EIE 1951 (1952); R. S. Crane, "The Concept of P. and the P. of Tom Jones," Critics and Crit. Ancient and Modern (1952); P. Goodman, The Structure of Lit. (1954); H. House, Aristotle's Poetics (1956); W. C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961); E. Olson, Tragedy and the Theory of Drama (1961); J. Jones, On Aristotle and Gr. Tragedy (1962); R. Lattimore, Story Patterns in Gr. Tragedy (1964).

C.H.H.

PLURISIGNATION. See SEMANTICS AND POETRY.

POÈME. A genre of poetry introduced into Fr. literature by Alfred de Vigny, who defined his poèmes in a preface of August 1837, as "compositions . . . in which a philosophic thought is staged under an Epic or Dramatic form." Among the pensées philosophiques staged in Vigny's poèmes are the following:

that the man of genius is irremediably lonely (Moïse); that man should live uncomplaining and die like the wolf without a cry (La mort du loup); that there is a kind of immortality for man in the knowledge or beauty he bequeaths to those who live after him (La Bouteille à la mer and L'Esprit pur). In 1844, in Le journal d'un poète, Vigny cites the line "J'aime la majesté des souffrances humaines" (from La maison du berger) with the comment: "This verse holds the meaning of all my Poèmes philosophiques."—A de Vigny, Oeuvres complètes (2 v., 1948).

A.G.E.

POESIE is derived from Gr. poiesis and the latter in turn from poiein meaning "to make." Hence, poiesis means making (in general), but is usually narrowed to mean "the composition of poetry." The Eng. 16th c. word makers as in the phrase "courtly makers" is the exact equivalent of the word poets. P. was introduced into the Eng. language early in the 14th c. and has been an Eng. word long enough to beget another word which looks and sounds like a native Eng. word, posy, a motto in a rhyming couplet or quatrain. Later in the 14th c. the word poetrie, derived from L. poetria came into Eng. Poetrie and p. have frequently been used as synonyms; thus Philip Sidney's critical work appeared in 1595 in two editions; one was called A Defense of Poesy; the other, An Apology for Poetry. Ben Jonson in Timber (Schelling's ed., pp. 72 seq.), however, made an effort to distinguish between p. and poetry. He used poem, a word that became Eng. in the 16th c., to mean any single product of a poet's art; poetry to mean the total product of a poet's art; (e.g., the poetry of Milton) and poesy, recurring to the early Gr. practice, to mean the poet's means of composition. Jonson's remarks had little effect, but there were some later critics who expressed similar views.

A.R.B.

POET LAUREATE. About to be seized by Apollo, Daphne turns into a laurel tree. Apollo takes the laurel for his emblem, and decrees that its branch or bay shall become the prize of honor for poets and victors. (Ovid, Metamorphoses 1). The line from Apollo to the Eng. poets 1. follows the custom of kings and chieftains of maintaining a court poet to sing heroic and glorious achievement. The Scandinavian skald, the Welsh bard, and the Anglo-Saxon scop resembled the poets 1. in being attached to a ruler's court and serving his purposes. Professional entertainers like William I's ioculator regis or Henry I's mimeus regis develop into the versificator regis who is part of Henry III's royal household in England. The versificator suggests an official 1. not only by his regular payment in money and wine, but in being ridiculed as were Jonson, Davenant, Eusden, Cibber, Pye, and even Tennyson later on. The actual term "l." arose in the medieval universities which crowned with laurel a student admitted to an academic degree in grammar, rhetoric, and poetry. In time the word applied to any notable poetic attainment, and was used as a standard compliment to Chaucer, and more formally, Petrarch. In a tradition of loosely bestowing the title "l." we find the names of Gower, Lydgate, Skelton, and Bernard Andreas, the Augustinian friar who, under Henry VII, anticipated Dryden's later double appointment as court poet and historiographer royal. Spenser, Drayton, and Daniel shared in various forms of court activity receiving official recognition, while Ben Jonson, a successful court entertainer and panegyrist, thought of himself as a formal l., having received two pensions and much popular acclaim. Davenant seems to have enjoyed a tacit recognition as poet l. under both Charles I and II, but held no official patent. The office was finally authorized with the appointment of John Dryden as the first "poet l." in 1668, and historiographer royal in 1670. The two offices were separated in 1692, and the emolument of l. was fixed at £100 a year where it has in effect remained ever since.

Since Dryden's removal in 1688, fourteen men have been chosen poet l. in succession as follows: Thomas Shadwell, 1689-92; Nahum Tate, 1692-1715; Nicholas Rowe, 1715-18; Laurence Eusden, 1718-30; Colley Cibber, 1730-57; William Whitehead, 1757-85; Thomas Warton, 1785-90; Henry James Pye, 1790-1813; Robert Southey, 1813-43; William Wordsworth, 1843-50; Alfred Tennyson, 1850-92; Alfred Austin, 1896-1913; Robert Bridges, 1913-30; John Masefield, 1930-. A number of poets have sought the laureateship in vain, including Johnson's friend Richard Savage the "volunteer l.," William Mason, Leigh Hunt, and Lewis Morris when, after Tennyson, a period of four years elapsed without a choice being made. The position has likewise been refused by Gray, Scott, Wordsworth once before accepting it, and Samuel Rogers on the death of Wordsworth.

Traditionally the laureate's duty was to write eulogies, elegies, and other celebrations of important events. In this sense, Tennyson's Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington (1852) emerges as the ideal performance. In practice, the laureateship from its beginning with Dryden falls into three periods. Dryden, Shadwell and Tate had no stated duties, and could make of the office what they chose. In Dryden's case this was to speak brilliantly and with entire conviction for the royal cause, making Absalom and Achitophel in its way the ideal laureate's poem. In the early 18th c., the l.

became a member of the royal household, charged with writing annually a New Year's Ode and a Birthday Ode, to be set to music and sung before the king. The office became something of a joke, until the annual odes were abandoned in the tenure of Southey. The modern phase has restored dignity to the position, with Wordsworth symbolically, and Tennyson actively standing for the best that poetry is capable of. Paradoxically, however, the laureateship will suffer until the poet is free of any subservience to the very court that first sustained him; likewise the notion of immediate continuity should be abandoned. If the laureateship ceases to be an office which must be filled as soon as it is vacant, it may gain dignity by waiting until a poet of high order is chosen. Then the difference between what it could be and what in fact it has been will diminish. (See especially E. K. Broadus, The Laureateship, 1921, pp. 216-18.)—W. S. Austin, Jr., and J. Ralph, The Lives of the Poets L. (1853); W. Hamilton, The Poets L. of England (1879); K. West, The Laureates of England from Ben Jonson to Alfred Tennyson (1895); W. F. Gray, The Poets L. of England (1914); K. Hopkins, The Poets L. (1955). B.N.S.

POÈTE MAUDIT. A phrase that mirrors the widening gulf in 19th-c. France between the gifted poet and the public upon which his survival might depend. It was given currency by Verlaine's Les poètes maudits (1884, 1888), a collection of essays on poets hardly known at the time, such as Corbière, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé. A half-century earlier Vigny's Stello (1832) had developed, in successive tales on Gilbert, Chatterton, and André Chénier, the idea that poets ("the race forever accursed [maudite] by those who have power on earth") are envied and hated for their superior qualities by society and its rulers who fear the truths they tell. Thereafter, a sick, impoverished or dissolute poet of significant but generally unrecognized talent came to be seen in these terms as doubly victimized by a hostile or insentient society. Thus Verlaine could write in Les poètes maudits, invoking Vigny's hero: "... is it not true that now and forever the sincere poet sees, feels, knows himself accursed by whatever system of self-interest is in power, O Stello?"—A. de Vigny, Stello (1832); P. Verlaine, Les poètes maudits (1884). A.G.E.

POETIC CONTESTS were of two kinds: imaginary and real. The earliest examples of the imaginary are in ancient Gr. comedy. In Aristophanes' Frogs the characters Aeschylus and Euripides debate the merits of their poetry; in the Clouds the Just and the Unjust Reasoning argue, and so on. L. eclogues and fables preserved the device, and in Carolingian times the device was used again in northwestern Europe. One of the earliest of these medieval L. conflictūs is that of Summer and Winter. Other themes were developed: wine against water, wine against beer. It has been said that poetic debates on love themes first appeared in the 12th c. The most famous is the Altercatio Phyllidis et Florae over the relative merits of the knight and the cleric as lovers. The violet and the rose, the sheep and the flax plant, mind and flesh, soul and body, Moslem and Jew and Christian—these were principal subjects. In the late 13th c. similar themes were handled in Fr.

In Prov. and Old Fr. is found the tenso (tençon) which probably originated as a dialogued serventes, q.v. (political, or satirical poem). The oldest extant example is between Cercamon and Guilhemi in the mid-12th c. The first poet states a belief, and the other argues with him in alternating couplets; or the two poets merely converse in a deprecating way. The goodness and perversity of women was a favorite theme. Many of these dialogues were certainly imaginary, by one author alone; but some of them, by well-known poets, may have been genuine discussions. The 13th-c. lauda (q.v.) in Italy sometimes took this form. A tenso of a special kind, which has separate origins, is the pastourelle (q.v.). Elements of this can be found in L. as early as the 10th c. The pastourelle is a strictly imaginary dialogue in which a man of the upper class approaches a peasant girl and "propositions" her, with varying success. There are many surviving specimens in Old Fr. and a few in Prov. A celebrated It. example is the Contrasto of Cielo d'Alcamo in the 13th c., which is unusually long with several amusing climaxes. Another by Ciaccio dell' Anguillaia has a most unexpected ending. Very similar to the tenso is the partimen (q.v.) or jeu parti. This type of poetic debate may have begun with the Delfin d'Auvergne around 1200. There are some 103 examples in Prov. The oldest Fr. example dates from 1246; there are 182 surviving jeux partis in that language.

The theme of the soul in opposition to the body is found also in Anglo-Saxon; but there it is not yet in dialogue form. It is found later in ME, dating ca. 1200. The debate of the Owl and the Nightingale by Nicholas of Guildford (Dorset) is an early 13th-c. masterpiece, expressing perhaps, on a higher level of interpretation, the dispute between didactic and love poetry. There were also dialogues of body and soul, and wine and water in Spain.

The second kind of poetic contest is a formally held competition at which a number of poets submit their entries on assigned themes to win a prize. This is a very ancient procedure. The tragedies and comedies performed at the Dionysia and Lenaea festivals in ancient Athens were competing in this way. In the Middle Ages, when wealthy patrons had become more scarce, the best poets in 13th c. France were also tradesmen who were associated together loosely. They supervised the poetic instruction of young aspirants, and they took part in prize contests. Such associations and competitions seem to have flourished first in Picardy and the Walloon territory. The Puy at Valenciennes was perhaps the first, dating back to 1229. It met at Notre-Dame-du Puy, hence the name. Arras had a minstrel's association in 1199 and was not slow in holding organized competitions. Others were formed at Douai, Tournai, Lille, and later at Rouen and Dieppe. In Germany the guilds of the Meistersinger (q.v.), burgher poets who flourished from the 14th to the 16th c., organized singing schools an essential feature of which was the singing contest. (The oldest literary example of such a singing contest is the Middle High German poem Der Wartburgkrieg [13th c.], in which the principal minnesingers [q.v.] took part.) Of great importance was the organization of the Academy of the Jocs Florals at Toulouse in 1323, by seven poets, and possibly a lady, Clemence Isaura. The first competition was on May 1, 1324, and the prize was a violet of gold. The Academy has had many vicissitudes but it continues still today. It was imitated by John I of Aragon in 1393 at Barcelona. This Catalan Jocs Florals held its meeting in New York City in 1951. Another annual festival and competition which has survived to this day is the National Eisteddfod of Wales which can be traced to the 15th c. and may date back to the bardic festival held by Lord Rhys in 1176 at Cardigan.

H. Knobloch, Die Streitgedichte im Provenzalischen und Altfranzösischen (1886); H. Walther, Das Streitgedicht in der lateinischen Lit. des Mittelalters (1920); E. Faral, "La pastourelle," Rom., 49 (1923); Recueil général des jeux-partis, ed. A. Långfors and others (2 v., 1926); Jeanroy; A. Taylor, Lit. Hist. of Meistersang (1937); E. Köhler, "Zur Entstehung des altprovenzalischen Streitgedichts," ZRP, 75 (1959).—See also PREGUNTA. U.T.H.

POETIC CONTRACTIONS. In syllabic or accentual-syllabic poetry of a formal and rhetorical kind, p.c. (or elisions) are often used to keep contiguous lines equal in number of syllables. Two basic kinds of contractions can be distinguished: synaeresis (sometimes called synaloepha) and syncope. When contracting by synaeresis, the poet joins two vowels to create a single syllable:

Of Man's First Disobedience, and the Fruit
(Paradise Lost 1.1)

Here, the "ie" in "Disobedience" changes to what is called a "y-glide," and the word is read "Disobed-yence." Such a reading is clearly intended by a poet composing syllabically (see METER). Syncope, on the other hand, involves the dropping of an unstressed vowel flanked by two consonants:

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey
(Goldsmith, The Deserted Village, 51)

In this line, "hastening," normally trisyllabic, is reduced by syncope to a dissyllable, and the line is thus kept predictably decasyllabic.

P.c. in Eng. poetry are found most frequently in verse composed from the Restoration to the end of the 18th c. In this kind of Augustan poetry, the contractions are sometimes indicated by the use of the apostrophe and sometimes not, but they were observed by the reader even if the word was printed in full, for the aesthetic of 18th-c. poetry assumes that each line will be syllabically regular (see ENG. PROSODY). There is evidence, in fact, that the contemporary reader of 18th-c. poetry derived much of his aesthetic delight from his deliberate and conscious "regularizing," through contraction, of normally irregular phonetic materials. Contraction will be found to be a basic structural tool in syllabic or accentual-syllabic verse with pretensions to formality, and, because the neglect or "modernizing" of these contractions distorts what the poems "say," the contractions should be heeded by the modern reader who wishes to re-create for himself the genuine tone of 18th-c. poetry. Contractions also occasionally appear in excessively rhetorical 19th- and 20th-c. Eng. verse (e.g., "o'er," "e'er"), but, unless the poem in which they appear is genuinely syllabic, they may often be regarded as pretentious quasi-"poetic" affectations inspired by ignorance of the structural rationale of formal syllabic or accentual-syllabic verse.—Saintsbury, Prosody; T. S. Omond, Eng. Metrists (1921); W. J. Bate, The Stylistic Development of Keats (1945); P. Fussell, Jr., Theory of Prosody in 18th-C. England (1954).

P.F.

POETIC DICTION. CRITICAL THEORY. The phrase "p.d." begins to assume importance in Eng. literature about the 19th c., when the Preface to Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads (2d ed. 1800) raised the question whether the language of poetry was essentially different from that of prose. In that Preface Wordsworth is as much concerned to discredit the conventional use of words and phrases long associated with meter as to vindicate the genuine language of passion. "P.d." therefore generally means, in Wordsworth's criticism, false

p.d., a fact indicated by the author himself in his statement, "There is little in [Lyrical Ballads] of what is usually called poetic diction" (Preface, 1800). The ambiguity of the phrase has persisted to the present day, for to some writers p.d. means the collection of epithets, periphrases, archaisms, etc., which were common property to most poets of the 18th c., while to others p.d. means the specifically poetic words and phrases which express the imaginative and impassioned nature of poetry. Thus a book entitled Poetic Diction, by Thomas Quayle (1924), has the subtitle A Study of Eighteenth Century Verse, while in another book, also entitled Poetic Diction, by Owen Barfield (1928, 2d ed., 1952), the author says, in his opening passage, "When words are selected and arranged in such a way that their meaning either arouses or is obviously intended to arouse, aesthetic imagination, the result may be described as poetic diction." On a broad view, Barfield's use of the term must appear as the correct one: any special or limited application of it should be indicated by the use of some qualifying word or phrase.

The earliest instance of "diction," given in the OED, in the sense it bears on "p.d." occurs in Dryden's Fables (1700): "The first beauty of an Epic poem consists in diction, that is, in the choice of words, and harmony of numbers." "Diction" thus corresponds to the lexis of Gr. critics.

The history of the critical theory of p.d. as such is not extensive, for the subject does not much lend itself to discussion in general terms, most of the criticism being found in articles on individual poets. The few sentences of a general nature in Aristotle's Poetics are, however, extremely pregnant. The passage, translated by Ingram Bywater, is as follows:

"The perfection of Diction is for it to be at once clear and not mean. The clearest indeed is that made up of the ordinary words for things, but it is mean, as is shown by the poetry of Cleophon and Sthenelus. On the other hand, the diction becomes distinguished and non-prosaic by the use of unfamiliar terms, i.e. strange words, metaphors, lengthened forms, and everything that deviates from the ordinary modes of speech . . . A certain admixture, accordingly, of unfamiliar terms is necessary. These, the strange word, the metaphor, the ornamental equivalent, etc., will save the language from seeming mean and prosaic, while the ordinary words in it will secure the requisite clearness."

It might have been expected that Aristotle's successors among the Gr. critics, many of whom had an acute appreciation of poetic style, would have developed and applied the principles admirably stated in this passage. But instead, this branch of criticism was left to rhetoric, which claimed to offer rules for poetic as well as oratorical diction under the heading of style (lexis, elocutio). (See RHETORIC AND POETICS.) Rhetoric remained a determining influence on conventional p.d. from about the 1st c. A.D. until the end of the 18th c. The influence of rhetoric is best seen in the long and elaborate lists of figures of speech in works like the Rhetorica ad Herennium and Cicero's De Inventione, and in their medieval and Renaissance counterparts such as the Poetria Nova of Geoffrey of Vinsauf (ca. 1150) or the Arcadian Rhetorike of Abraham Fraunce (1590). Generally speaking, rhetoric emphasized the artificial and ornamental aspects of p.d.

In L. criticism there is even less discussion of p.d. than in Gr. The caution of the Roman mind, enforced no doubt by the L. disposition to consider design and general effect rather than the details of execution, led the critics to assume a somewhat aloof attitude towards the ornaments of poetic style. While few of the world's poets have had such skill in the magical use of words as Virgil, the critics, like practical gardeners, concerned themselves with the nature of the soil from which these flowers of speech might best spring. One pronouncement on the subject which might be quoted as the essence of sober classicism was the dictum of Horace: "Cui lecta potenter erit res, nec facundia deseret hunc nec lucidus ordo" (Who-soever shall choose a theme within his range, neither speech will fail him, nor clearness of order—Ars poetica 40-41, tr. H. Rushton Fairclough). According to this view, conception is the great thing; execution may be left to take care of itself. There is an almost puritanical austerity in the Horatian critics, who appear as disciplinarians against the inclinator of poets to luxuriate in verbal extravagance.

The revival of poetry in the Middle Ages was marked by a close connection among poets with the technique of expression. They were interested in general questions of language as well as the art of versification. Short works on these matters by Prov. and Catalan poets survive, and this activity culminates in the L. treatise of Dante, De Vulgari Eloquentia. This work is of great importance in the history of both literature and language, and it is highly significant to find the poet discriminating between various Romance dialects, finally giving his preference to Tuscan on the score of euphony and "significance." Yet the very breadth of Dante's view (and its date) precludes that specialized discussion which marks the criticism of p.d. in the strict sense. Dante, like his medieval predecessors, is concerned with the "lingua d'arte," and his view embraces both poetry and rhetoric. He is concerned with the creation of a literary language rather than a specifically poetic one and pays little or no heed to the distinction between prose and poetry which is fundamental to the nature of p.d.

Critical thought during both the Middle Ages and the Renaissance was much concerned with the "lingua d'arte," but it viewed the matter rather in terms of rhetoric than of poetry. During the later Middle Ages and after, poetry came to be regarded as little more than a subdivision of rhetoric, and poets themselves were known as "rethors" or "rhétoriqueurs." This new emphasis fortunately came after the time of Chaucer, whose position as one of the creators of Eng. p.d. is not sufficiently recognized: he was as clearly conscious of the distinction between poetry and prose, as between poetry and rhetoric. The emphasis on rhetoric coincided with a barren period of Eng. poetry, when style was first marked by "aureate" extravagance, and later by the "drabness" (to borrow Professor C. S. Lewis's word) of versifiers who abandoned verbal ornament to their contemporaries in the sphere of prose. Strong traces of the assimilation of poetry to rhetoric appear in much Elizabethan criticism.

For reasons already noticed, the Horatian critics were disinclined to isolate p.d. as an important subject for discussion, though in Johnson's Lives there are many acute comments on the diction of particular poets. But in Gray's letter to his friend West (1742), there is a passage indicative of a new approach to the subject: the following sentences are original to an extent not easily appreciated today:

"The language of the age is never the language of poetry; except among the French, whose verse, where the thought or image does not support it, differs in nothing from prose. Our poetry, on the contrary, has a language peculiar to itself; to which almost every one, that has written, has added something by enriching it with foreign idioms and derivatives: nay, sometimes with words of their own composition or invention. Shakespeare and Milton have been great creators this way; and no one more licentious than Pope or Dryden, who perpetually borrow expressions from the former. . . ."

Not long after this a contribution to the British Magazine (1762) anticipated a future form of criticism by a detailed examination of verbal effects drawn from many authors. The paper, "On Poetry, as Distinguished from Other Writing," contains some discriminating comments on the "figurative" and "emphatical" qualities of p.d., with apt illustrations from Gr., L., and Eng. poetry.

A revival of interest in the treatise on the Sublime attributed to Longinus had far-reaching effects on poetry and criticism in the 18th c. The treatise was translated into Fr. in 1674 by Boileau, who defined "sublimity" as the quality "qui fait qu'un ouvrage enlève, ravit, transporte." The name of "Longinus" constantly appears in the writings of Eng. critics from Dryden onwards. Addison familiarized his readers with the notion that Milton was the poet of the Sublime, par excellence. "Longinus" was frequently appealed to, in the 18th c., against the neoclassical standard of "correctness," and "sublimity" was thus associated with a poetic style and diction which were daring, irregular, romantic. Passages in Thomson's Seasons which excited awe or terror were admired as "sublime." The odes of Gray, especially The Bard, were "sublime." In critical writings later than the 18th c. the term "sublime" tended to be replaced by others, e.g., the "grand style."

One of the most important documents on our subject is the Preface (1800) to Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads, already mentioned. The views of this work are expressed in exaggerated terms and they are at variance with Wordsworth's own practice in most of his best poetry. Yet it remains the most comprehensive and impassioned utterance ever made by a great poet on this vital aspect of his art. Behind the Preface lies the conviction of the superiority of the natural to the artificial, and its main doctrines are contained in two theses: that true p.d. is natural, and that false p.d. is artificial. Wordsworth, who emphasizes the human character of the poet, considers the genuine language of passion to be itself poetical, meter being merely a "superadded" though desirable element. "The poet is a man speaking to men." On the other hand, all the conventional expressions associated with meter (faded classicism, "stock" epithets, verse equivalents for the living words of real emotion) which had accumulated over a century or more of "classical" writing create a barrier between the poet and his audience, and are to be discarded as artificial. Nor have they any justification in theory. "There neither is, nor can be any essential difference between the language of prose and metrical composition."

It was principally the implication of this last sentence that impelled Coleridge in his Biographia Literaria (chs. 14-22) to complement and correct the views of Wordsworth's Preface. Coleridge, with a vast range of reading to support him, appeals to the nature of meter as an outward token that the poet, in accepting its stimulus and discipline, intends to use a language differing in spirit and purpose from that of ordinary life. Poetic language is more nearly universal, more impassioned, more imaginative than other forms of utterance, and its purpose is to give aesthetic pleasure in itself as well as through "what" it expresses. Admitting that there is a "neutral style" common to prose and poetry, Coleridge finds it "a singular and noticeable fact . . . that a theory which would establish the lingua communis not only as the best, but as the only commendable style, should have proceeded from a poet, whose diction, next to that of Shakespeare and Milton, appears to me of all others the most individualized and characteristic" (Biographia Literaria, ch. 20). He makes a further important point in his criticism of some lines by Wordsworth in which the words, considered separately, are admittedly in everyday use; "but," he asks, "are those words in those places commonly employed in real life to express the same thought or outward thing? Are they the style used in the ordinary intercourse of spoken words? No! nor are the modes of connections; and still less the breaks and transitions" (ibid.). The whole tendency of Coleridge's arguments is to maintain the right of the poet to create a diction strongly marked by the character of his own mind, within the laws which determine the general nature and use of language.

Wordsworth, in his attacks on false p.d., and Coleridge, in his vindication of true p.d., laid down the principles and prepared the way for much valuable criticism in the 19th and 20th c. Many authors who have written excellent studies of the diction of individual poets, e.g., J. W. Mackail, Walter Raleigh, Oliver Elton, Alfred Noyes, E. de Selincourt, Ethel Seaton, Geoffrey Tillotson, George Rylands, while contributing much from their own studies, have not sought to modify the fundamental principles established by the two poet-critics.

An especially constructive contribution to the theory of p.d. is Owen Barfield's Poetic Diction. Barfield holds that there are naturally poetic periods of language before the birth of a distinction between poetry and prose. Language being then predominantly concrete, and meanings not yet split up, there are properly speaking, no "metaphors," which are the revolt against the "deadness" of rational speech: "... primary 'meanings' were given, as it were, by Nature, but the very condition of their being given was that they could not at the same time be apprehended in full consciousness; they could not be known, but only experienced, or lived. At this time, therefore, individuals cannot be said to have been responsible for the production of poetic values. . . . A history of language written, not from the logician's, but from the poet's point of view, would proceed somewhat in the following manner: it would see in the concrete vocabulary which has left us the mythologies the world's first 'poetic diction.' Moving forward, it would come, after a long interval, to the earliest ages of which we have any written record—the time of the Vedas, in India, the time of the Iliad and Odyssey in Greece. And at this stage it would find meaning still suffused with myth, and Nature all alive in the thinking of man. . . . The gods are never far below the surface of Homer's language—hence its unearthly sublimity." Barfield then describes the character of p.d. when meanings are "splitting up . . . and language beginning . . . to lose its intrinsic life." He notes the birth of hitherto unknown antitheses, such as those between truth and myth, between prose and poetry, and again between an objective and a subjective world. "Poetry has now passed from the 'fluid' to the 'architectural' type, and in many characteristic works the aesthetic effect corresponds to a sense of difficulties overcome. . . . In Horace's Sapphics and Alcaics the architectural element practically reaches its zenith. And again if we turn to the history of English, I do not think that we find this architectural element at all pronounced until the 17th c. It strikes us, for instance, in Milton and the metaphysicals, and frequently afterwards, but hardly in Chaucer or Shakespeare." The whole of Barfield's book is an important challenge to the view of Jespersen, and other philologists, to whom "progress in language . . . is synonymous with an increasing ability to think abstract thoughts."

THE DICTION OF ENG. POETRY. OE poetry possessed an elaborate p.d. which was closely linked with the alliterative meter then in use. It included kennings or periphrases (e.g., swanrād, "swan's-road," or "sea"), compound epithets (e.g., fāmigheals, "foamy-necked"), and mythological allusions. The new rhyming measures introduced from Fr. after the Norman Conquest fostered the creation of a "verse diction" abounding in clichés. Its worst features are amusingly parodied in Chaucer's Sir Topas. But Chaucer also developed in his more serious poetry the elements of a distinctively p.d., e.g., the use of mythological names such as Flora, Zephyrus (The Book of the Duchesse, 402); decorative compound epithets such as golden-tressed (Troilus and Criseyde, 5.8), laurer-crowned (Anelida and Arcite, 43); and picturesque metaphorical verbs such as unneste ("fly out of the nest") (Troilus and Criseyde, 4.305). And sometimes there is a phrase modeled on one from Dante to remind us how the new It. style in poetry (dolce stil nuovo, q.v.) stimulated in Chaucer the ambition to draw higher and more imaginative effects from his native tongue. An example is: "Al the orient laugheth of the light" (The Knight's Tale, 1494) adapted from "Faceva tutto rider l'oriente" (Purgatorio, i.20).

In the poetry of Spenser, especially in The Faerie Queene, may be found all the chief elements of that nondramatic diction of poetry which has constituted one of the main traditions in Eng. literature. More than any other man Spenser established by the spell of his example the right of poets to draw upon words and phrases outside those of contemporary speech. As E. de Selincourt says: "He cherished words which though still in use were rapidly passing out of fashion, and the sustained colouring and atmosphere of his style is thus given by a constant use of words which are found in Marlowe, Shakespeare, or Sydney, perhaps once or twice. 'Eftsoons', 'ne', 'als', 'whilom', 'uncouth', 'wight', 'eke', 'sithens', 'ywis'—it is words like these continually woven into the texture of his diction which, even more than the Chaucerian or romance elements, give it the Spenserian colour" (Oxford Spenser, Introduction by E. de Selincourt). Few Eng. poets have been as archaistic as Spenser, but a select number of archaisms have colored the diction of most nondramatic Eng. poets, almost up to the present time. Spenser also cultivated epithets as an enrichment of style, occasionally filling a whole line with them, as in his description of Britain as a

"saluage wilderness,

Unpeopled, unmanurd, unprou'd, unpraysd"

(Faerie Queene 2.10.5)

His compound epithets are more numerous and memorable than Chaucer's, and are of various kinds: the morally serious (e.g., hart-murdring love: F.Q. 2.5.16); the picturesque (e.g., fire-footed teeme: ibid. 1.12.2); the classical (e.g., rosy-fingred Morning: ibid. 1.2.7). Spenser's epithets were the model and inspiration of much brilliant work in Marlowe, Chatterton, Keats, Tennyson, and others, and are no less important than his conservatism which seemed bent on preserving all from the past that could still be made current.

The greatness of Shakespeare as a poet gives him a primary place in this survey. Dramatic dialogue must above all things appear unpremeditated: the archaic and literary qualities of Spenser's diction remove it far from "the real language of men." Shakespeare as a poet could not escape the influence of Spenser, and some of his earlier work (e.g., Romeo and Juliet and A Midsummer Night's Dream) contains passages of rich Spenserian "color." But his mature dramatic needs required that he should develop an extreme suppleness of diction answering to a vast range of characters and passions. The grammatical licences permitted by Elizabethan usage were effectively exploited by Shakespeare at an early date in his career. For instance, we find him using two variations on the word "king" in a couple of lines in Richard II: "Then am I king'd again: and by and by / Think that I am unking'd by Bolingbroke." These and similar licences, when put to the service of Shakespere's power of metaphor, produce that astonishing flexibility of style which matures in Hamlet and reappears again and again as late as The Tempest. The vivid metaphor of the noun-as-verb in Horatio's phrase "It harrows me with fear and wonder" is typical of Shakespeare's maturely developed diction.

During the period about 1620-60 Eng. poetry divides into three major schools. The neo-classical school as represented by Ben Jonson revived the Horatian ideals of decorum, restraint, and neatness, or "curiosa felicitas." Donne and his followers among the metaphysicals (see METAPHYSICAL POETRY) valued a more elaborate diction marked by complex structure, allusion, and elaborate, often obscure metaphor. The most gifted Spenserian of the age was Milton, but the poems he wrote before 1660, exquisitely worded though they are, could not have given him the commanding place which is his in the history of p.d. In Paradise Lost he created a genuine epic diction. Its chief features are: use of Latinate vocabulary and syntax, emphasis on sound effects, use of classical and Hebraic allusions, use of epic simile, and subordination of blank verse line to verse paragraph.

Between 1660 and 1700 the prevailing tendency was toward simplicity seasoned by wit: the powerful secular forces of the age fostered a rational and combative diction, which, as Dryden said, was "fittest for discourse and nearest prose." But in his later years Dryden became more sensitive to the beauty of verbal ornament. In his translation of Virgil and in the Fables, Ancient and Modern his links with Spenser are evident. He revives or adapts many old words and expressions for their poetic color. His critical remarks helped to transmit his admiration of Milton and Spenser to the next century.

The complex pattern of 18th-c. poetry includes one dominant motif—the rivalry between the "way of Pope" and the "way of Dryden." Pope, who opened his career with a display of verbal ornament gathered from his reading of Milton and others, achieved his greatest success in the wise and witty Moral Essays, Satires, and Epistles, in which the diction is close to the best contemporary prose usage. The style and diction of Pope were so congenial to the neo-classical temper of the age that they established themselves, in the eyes of many, e.g., Johnson, as the last word in the art of poetry. Yet even at the height of Pope's reputation there survived a memory of the warmer, more colored, more wayward, and less rigid diction of Spenser, and this was imitated in the work of such professed Spenserians as Thomson, Shenstone, and—somewhat later—Beattie. The fuller and freer tradition of diction was maintained by Gray and by other learned poets such as T. Warton, who had read widely in Eng. poetry and knew how limited was Pope's mastery of diction (however perfect in its way) in comparison with the "pomp and prodigality" of Shakespeare and Milton (Gray, Stanzas to Mr. Bentley). The last quarter of the century witnessed the vindication of dialect as a medium of poetry in the work of Burns, and the development of a mixed style, between poetry and rhapsody, undisciplined by meter, in the earlier Prophetic Books of William Blake.

At no time in the history of Eng. poetry does diction play a more vital part than in the work of the romantic poets from Wordsworth to Keats, nor has there ever been more fruitful discussion of the subject. In Wordsworth, two impulses are evident: opposition to the "inane phraseology" of the more lifeless verse of the time—personifications, clichés, trite mythology, and the like; and an impassioned love of simple words and the poetic effects latent within them, as in the celebrated line in Michael: "And never lifted up a single stone." Wordsworth's love of plain language, however, does not preclude the frequent borrowing of apt phrases from other poets: his diction is, in fact, more literary than is commonly recognized. Coleridge's original achievement in diction was to raise the style of the ballad to a high poetic level, and in Kubla Khan to bring language to the verge of its frontier with music. Byron's diction, in general, is somewhat wanting in precision and the finer qualities, but in Don Juan he produced a diction, which has the ease of prose but often rises to brilliant satiric and lyric effects. The diction of Shelley clearly reflects the notions expressed in his Defence of Poetry. Two statements are particularly important: that poets are the true creators of language, and that "composition" can never do full justice to "inspiration." Shelley's ideal diction emanates from the primal creative elements of nature, from sunlight and from the ether, but in practice Shelley's writing is often vague and abstract. Keats, on the other hand, stressed concrete, visual description and appeal to sense (especially sight, sound, and smell); and his diction owes much to Spenser and Milton. Keats has no superior in the intense picturesqueness of his best descriptions, and at the same time he often employs language with a mythopoeic power, in which the spirit of Gr. poetry reappears with a subtle modernization.

The achievement in diction by these early 19th-c. writers is the highest attained in Eng. poetry since the age of Shakespeare. Their successors were in a difficult position. Though they were men of high poetic ability, the way to originality was less clear than it had been among the excitements and dangers of the previous age. Tennyson, a consummate artist in diction, had an almost unrivaled versatility. Those who are familiar with the grace, power, and picturesque elegance of his better-known poems should not overlook his equal success in dialect. What is most novel in Browning's diction is his use of a contemporary colloquial idiom in short dramatic lyrics and in the much longer dramatic monologues.

The decline in the poetic quality of "poetic" language in Browning is symptomatic of a change affecting nearly the whole of Eng. poetry for some eighty years. Within that period may be distinguished three main attitudes on the subject of diction. The first is that of the poets to whom the traditional diction of poetry was still a suitable vehicle for poetry. To this group belong such poets as Swinburne, Francis Thomson, Robert Bridges in his earlier work, A. E. Housman, Mrs. Meynell, Rupert Brooke, Walter de la Mare, and the present Laureate, John Masefield. The second attitude is that of the poets who respected the traditional diction, but felt that it must be vigorously rejuvenated in a changed and changing world. Fresh vitality might be infused by bold experiments in diction itself, or by novel effects in meter and rhythm. Thus, G. M. Hopkins handled his epithets in a manner suggesting "a passionate emotion which seems to try and utter all its words in one" (Charles Williams); he also enlivened his verse by what he called "sprung rhythm." Robert Bridges, the associate of Hopkins, increasingly felt the need for novel effects of diction and rhythm: in his late poem, The Testament of Beauty, he employed "loose Alexandrines" in which scientific and philosophical terms are woven into the older fabric of traditional diction. A concerted but less vigorous effort to rejuvenate the diction of the past was made by the group of writers associated under the title of "Georgian poets." Writers outside Great Britain often revived the older diction by expressions peculiar to their native custom and landscape. Thus Am. poets had long engrafted new local terms of their own on the traditional stock of Eng. p.d., a method used by a succession of writers from Longfellow to Robert Frost. The Ir. school of poets to which W. B. Yeats belonged did the same, with a more considered program. "Rejuvenation" also came to diction through the experiences of World War I, especially in the work of Wilfred Owen. The third attitude cannot be precisely distinguished from the second, but it is connected with the rise of free verse (q.v.). When metrical regularity disappears in an unlimited "freedom," the distinction between the poetic and the nonpoetic is blurred. Whitman's diction, for example, is powerful and original, but it is also crude and (often intentionally) prosaic.

The conditions which made Whitman acceptable in 19th-c. America were reproduced in an acute form in postwar England. The revolutionary spirit in diction appears in the work of Eliot and Auden, and most recently in Dylan Thomas who (says Anne Ridler, herself a poet) "treats words as though he were present at their creation." Nonetheless, there is a widespread instinct to distrust "revolutionary" writers as models, however much their individual work may be admired. The life of poetry is continuous. There is abundant ground for holding that the consensus of opinion among many good poets now writing is in favor, not of the abandonment of tradition, but of some form of "rejuvenation."

ANALOGIES IN OTHER LITERATURES. The many varieties of diction found in Eng. poetry are closely paralleled in the chief literatures of the Western world. The parallels are of two kinds: there are the fundamental resemblances between techniques of effective diction in classical, especially Gr., poetry and in Eng. poetry; there are also parallels—with some significant differences—between the history of p.d. in Eng. and its history in other important literatures, such as Fr., It., and Sp.

The metaphorical quality of language in Homer, Aeschylus, and Sophocles as well as in Shakespeare and his greatest successors is well known and scarcely needs illustration. Another parallel, little less significant, is the endeavor of poets in their most energetic moments to find or create (in Coleridge's phrase) "one word to express one act of imagination." The Homeric phrase "Pêlion einosiphullon" (Pelion with quivering leafage) and Aeschylus' "anêrithmon gelasma" (multitudinous laughter, i.e., of the sea) are brilliant examples of this: each produces the effect described by Wordsworth in his poem on the daffodils: "Ten thousand saw I at a glance." This is the imaginative power which Coleridge called "esemplastic." The "embracing" or "extensive" epithet occurs frequently in both literatures. The compound epithets in Gr. beginning with eury-, and tele-, and poly- have their Eng. analogues beginning with wide-, far-, and many-. The poly- or "many" group is particularly large. By the side of Gr. epithets having the sense of "rich in flowers," "with many furrows," "with many trees," "with many ridges," "with many glens," "poluphloisbos" (loud-roaring, Homer's epithet for the sea), and many more of the like character, may be placed Milton's "wide-watered" (shore), Keats's "far-foamed" (sands), and Tennyson's "many-fountain'd" (Ida). Such epithets are imaginative in their reduction of multiplicity to unity, of complexity to simplicity. Descriptive diction at its best in both Gr. and Eng. poetry is frequently marked by these two characteristic features—the unifying (or “esemplastic”) and the metaphorical.

Parallels between p.d. in Eng. and Fr. are especially instructive. The decline of medieval poetry, marked in England by aureate (q.v.) diction, produced its Fr. counterpart in the affectations of the rhétoriciens. Renaissance poetry in France and in England was exposed to similar influences, but the national genius of the two countries reacted differently. Sir Thomas Elyot in England and Joachim du Bellay in France both labored to enrich their respective languages with the wealth of classical Gr. and L. But whereas this movement, in England, led to “exornation” and culminated in the unsurpassed wealth of Shakespeare’s poetic vocabulary, in France the critical and negative spirit of Malherbe diverted poetry into another channel. The characteristic triumph which Fr. poetry soon after achieved in the work of Racine was marked not by creative abundance of diction but by restraint, conscious elevation, and a certain economy. “La poésie de Racine,” says Ste.-Beuve “élude les détails.” It shows “une perpétuelle nécessité de noblesse et d’élégance”; it uses “un vocabulaire un peu restreint.” In England, the natural reaction which followed Elizabethan exuberance of diction prepared the way for the neo-classical poetry of the 18th c. which is a close parallel to contemporary poetry in France. The p.d. denounced by Wordsworth has its systematized counterpart in the compilation called Le Gradus Français—a guide for the use of poets to epithet, allusion, and periphrasis.

The literary revolution of the early 19th c. had, in England, for its principal arenas, lyrical and narrative poetry, and philosophical criticism. In France, the contest was fought out more publicly on the stage, the classical drama being the stronghold of “noblesse” and “élégance” in diction, as it was of the Unities. The claim made in Victor Hugo’s celebrated Préface à Cromwell (1827) to the whole truth as the province of poetry, instead of simply the Beautiful and the Sublime, aimed at removing restraints from language no less than from the handling of dramatic plot and the structure of scenes. Thus a new art of diction was introduced, and language was henceforth to be chosen for its intensity of emotion and descriptive effect, without regard for tradition. In due time romantic fervor cooled into aesthetic precision and the cult of the “mot juste,” but the essence of the movement survives in a saying of the brothers Goncourt, valid for more than half the century, “L’épithète rare, voilà la marque du poète.”

With the development of the “symboliste” movement some new and valuable thoughts on p.d. have been put forward by Fr. writers, of whom Paul Valéry is an outstanding example. The restricted outlook which haunted the Fr. mind so long after Malherbe is now exchanged for a conception of poetry as entirely free and autonomous. In Valéry the Eng.-speaking reader is reminded of Dryden, of Wordsworth, of Pater, and of Housman, but the breadth of Valéry’s generalization is his own. For him literature is simply “un développement de certaines des propriétés du langage . . . les plus agissantes chez les peuples primitifs.” Poetry must renew its diction from the “undefiled wells.” “Plus la forme est belle, plus elle se sent des origines de la conscience et de l’expression; plus elle est savante et plus elle s’efforce de retrouver, par une sorte de synthèse, la plénitude, l’indivision de la parole encore neuve et dans son état créateur” (Jean Hytier, La Poétique de Valéry, p. 70). Valéry’s theory of p.d. is an integral part of his conception of “la poésie absolue.”

GENERAL: Aristotle, Poetics, tr. I. Bywater (1909); Dante, De Vulgari eloquentia, tr. A. G. Ferrers Howell (1890; a poet’s critical contribution to the making of a literary language); Buffon, Discours sur le style (1753; for statement of neoclassical point of view); Thos. Gray, Letter to R. West, April 1742; “On Poetry, as Distinguished from Other Writing,” British Magazine (1762); W. Wordsworth, Lyrical Ballads, Preface (2d ed., 1800); Appendix on what is usually called Poetic Diction (1802); Essay, Supplementary to the Preface (1815); S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, chs. 14–22; Ker; F. W. Bateson, Eng. Poetry and the Eng. Language (1934, 2d ed., 1961); F. A. Potte, The Idiom of Poetry (2d ed., 1946); J. Miles, The Continuity of Poetic Language (1951); O. Barfield, P.D. (2d ed., 1952); B. Groom, The Diction of Poetry from Spenser to Bridges (1956).

SPECIAL STUDIES: Norden; M. Arnold, On Translating Homer, ed. W. H. D. Rouse (1905); W. Raleigh, “P.D.,” Wordsworth (1921); T. Quayle, P.D.: a Study of 18th C. Verse (1924); J. W. Mackail, “The Poet of The Seasons,” Studies of Eng. Poets (1926; a valuable study of James Thomson’s diction); H. C. Wyld, “Diction and Imagery in Anglo-Saxon Poetry,” E&S, 11 (1925); O. Elton, “The Poet’s Dictionary,” E&S, 14 (1928); G. Rylands, “Eng. Poetry and the Abstract Word,” E&S, 16 (1930); S. H. Monk, The Sublime (1935); B. Groom, The Formation and Use of Compound Epithets in Eng. Poetry from 1579 (1937; SPE Tract no. 49); C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of Symbolism (1943); J. Arthos, The Language of Natural Description in 18th C. Poetry (1949); R. F. Jones, The Triumph of the Eng. Language (1951; ch. 6); D. Davie, Purity of Diction in Eng. Verse (1952); J. Hytier, La Poétique de Valéry (1953); D. L. Clark, Rhetoric in Greco- Roman Education (1957); G. Tillotson, Augustan Studies (1962). B.G.

POETIC DRAMA. See DRAMATIC POETRY.

POETIC LICENSE. A freedom allowed the poet to depart in subject matter, grammar, or diction from what would be proper in ordinary prose discourse. In a broad sense, the poet is exercising p.l. when he invents fictions ("tells lies," as Plato has it) or takes liberties with facts, as when Virgil makes Dido the contemporary of Aeneas. More frequently the term is confined to the poet's freedoms with language: departing from normal word order; using one part of speech for another ("As those move easiest who have learned to dance"); employing coined or archaic words; contracting or lengthening words ('gainst, o'er; beweeep, aweary); altering their pronunciation (wind rhymed with behind), etc.

P.l. may be used to achieve some special effect or beauty otherwise unattainable, or merely to make the verse conform to the exigencies of meter or rhyme. In the former case, if successful, it generally receives critical commendation; in the latter case its acceptance depends upon the type of poem in which it appears and the standards of the age in which the poem was written. In general, the freedom allowed the poet in his language varies inversely with the freedom allowed him in his meter. In the 18th c., for instance, when metrical laws were very strict, licenses in language were commonly accepted which would not be allowed today when the poet has much greater metrical freedom. In all times, however, the best poets have kept to a minimum such licenses as are dictated merely by meter or rhyme.

Aristotle and Horace both recognize the right of the poet to coin, lengthen, alter, or import words to give distinction to his language, and Aristotle allows him to invent images or situations that improve upon nature: "For poetic effect a convincing impossibility is preferable to that which is unconvincing but possible." Quintilian (ca. A.D. 95) points out that "poets are usually the servants of their meters and are allowed such license that faults are given other names when they occur in poetry." George Gascoigne (1575) advises Eng. poets to place all words in their usual pronunciation and to frame all sentences in their natural idiomatic order, "and yet sometimes . . . the contrary may be borne, but that is rather where rime enforceth, or per licentiam Poeticam, than it is otherwise lawful or commendable." R. M. Alden (1909) states that "all these licenses are admitted sparingly in modern poetry, and are to be reckoned as blemishes unless . . . the change from the normal choice of words or order of words has a certain stylistic value of its own."—R. F. Brewer, The Art of Versification and the Technicalities of Poetry (1925). L.P.

POETIC MADNESS. In Phaedrus 245 Socrates asserts that poets are susceptible to madness and, in fact, cannot succeed without it. In the Ion both poet and critic are described as possessed by a frenzy so that they do not consciously control their words. In Aristotle's Problemata 30 it is said that poets and philosophers are inclined to excessive melancholy. Roman poets are possessed by spirits or demons (Ovid: "Deus est in nobis / Agitante calescimus illo"—"A god is within us; when he urges, we are inspired"); write best when tipsy (Horace); are filled with the divine afflatus (Cicero); or are literally mad (the tradition that Lucretius was driven insane by a love potion). The concept of p.m., which can be found passim in European poetry and criticism, is summed up in two familiar quotations: "The lunatic, the lover, and the poet / Are of imagination all compact" (Shakespeare); and "Great wits are sure to madness near allied / And thin partitions do their bounds divide" (Dryden).

The parallel between poets and madmen is extremely primitive. It apparently goes back to the time when the poet, the prophet, and the priest were one and the same and when madmen were considered the special children of the gods, invested with prophetic and magical powers. By Plato's time we may assume that only a small residue of the primitive attitude survived. Although Plato evidently considered p.m. suspect, to Horace and many Neoplatonic writers it was the special dispensation which made poetry superior to other forms of discourse. In the form of furor poeticus (q.v.) it was identified, especially during the 16th c., with inspiration.

The question whether or not there is a scientific basis for the idea of p.m. is hard to answer. Being especially sensitive, poets may be more subject to neurosis than other men. Many poets (e.g., Sappho, Lucretius, Villon, Marlowe, Collins, Smart, Nerval, Nietzsche, Pound) were either insane or exhibited marked personality disturbances. The romantic theory of the artist as tormented outcast was subsumed by Freud in his essay "The Relation of the Poet to Day-Dreaming" and elsewhere. To Freud, the artist is neurotic and his work is a by-product—often a symbolic statement of—his disturbance. In various forms this idea has been restated by Thomas Mann, Kenneth Burke, and Lionel Trilling. It is explored in considerable detail by Edmund Wilson in The Wound and the Bow, where "wound" refers to the artist's neurosis, and "bow" to the art which is its compensation. In this theory poetry is a catharsis for the author—the pearl of art forms around the irritant of emotional disturbance. However, the theory is challenged by critics in the aesthetic tradition (e.g., Croce, I. A. Richards), who tend to claim that the creator is not less but more healthy than average. Among psychologists, Jung and his followers assert the health of the artist, since creative activity puts man in contact with the primal source of human vitality, the collective unconscious.—G. E. Woodberry, "P.M.," The Inspiration of Poetry (1910); F. C. Prescott, "The P.M. and Catharsis," The Poetic Mind (1922). See also L. Trilling, "Art and Neurosis," The Liberal Imagination (1950). See INSPIRATION.

A.R.B.

POETICS, CONCEPTIONS OF. P. is traditionally a systematic theory or doctrine of poetry. It defines poetry and its various branches and subdivisions, forms and technical resources, and discusses the principles that govern it and that distinguish it from other creative activities. The term is derived from the title of Aristotle's fragmentary work peri poietikés, or "on poetic (art)," which is the foundation and prototype of all later p. Aristotle himself defined it comprehensively as dealing with "poetry itself and its kinds and the specific power of each, the way in which the plot is to be constructed if the poem is to be beautiful, of how many and of what parts it is composed, and anything else that falls within the same inquiry" (ch. 1).

But even before him there were other conceptions of p. A hint of the hedonistic theory of poetry has been found in Homer's reference to the rhapsode who sings only to produce "delight" in his listeners, as in the Odyssey 8. But his song must be orderly and complete, katà kósmos, and his subject is "the deeds of men" (Iliad 2.484), as revealed by Apollo and the divine Muses to the poet, so it is truth. The more austere p. of Hesiod is unmistakably didactic and has no room for pretty lies. The p. of inspiration may be traced to the poet's invocation to the Muse, and received theoretical form in Democritus, who was the best known representative of that view in antiquity. The opposite view of poetry as an acquired skill or technique may be found in certain sayings of Pindar and other poets. Among the philosophical schools, the Pythagoreans with their concepts of harmony, proportion, and catharsis provide the rudiments of another conception of p., which may have been influential upon later views. Some of the early philosophers then started what Plato was to call "the ancient quarrel between poetry and philosophy" (Republic 10.607b), attacking the poets for spreading unworthy notions of God in the tales of mythology. In a different vein

the Sophists built up their own ideas of poetry and of poetic effect, which they probably related to that of rhetoric, or persuasion by means of artfully calculated devices. Gorgias formulated a view of tragedy as "a deception by means of legends and emotions in which it was more righteous to deceive than not to deceive, and wiser to be deceived than not to be deceived." In the same spirit the Sophists made early investigations into the technique of language, i.e., grammar and synonyms, and studied rhetorical devices like irony.

In the work of Plato it is possible to find several different and even conflicting views of poetry, leading to contradictory p. The inspiration theory finds its most elaborate formulation in the Phaedrus and the Symposium, while the latter introduces in a short incidental discussion the startling definition of all art as being poetry and all poetry as being creation, or "the passing of something from not-being into being" (205b). On the other hand, the concept of mimesis which prevails in the Republic and elsewhere logically leads to the depreciation of poetry and art in general as the copy of a copy, and the consequent exclusion of the poets from the ideal state. To this exclusion support is also given by a resumption on the grand scale of the "ancient quarrel" in Book 2. Again, the concept of Beauty receives in Plato a definite metaphysical status and becomes one of the most important archetypes or Ideas, as in the Phaedrus and Symposium, but this notion is initially that of natural beauty, as of a beautiful human body, and not that of the beauty produced by art, particularly poetry. So p. remained in Plato's work an area of unresolved contradictions.

To it Aristotle seemed to bring order and system. He stated his intention to follow the method of philosophy, "beginning with first principles according to the nature of things" (Poetics, ch. 1), i.e., proceeding from the general to the particular: a deductive method followed by many later p., at least in their exposition. Several other procedures and formulas of Aristotle have passed on to his successors in this field, just as his uncertainties and vacillations have remained to plague later p. A constructive step is represented by Aristotle's bringing poetry under its general class, i.e., art or téchne, thus firmly grounding p. from its inception into aesthetics, considered as the general theory of art. But his definition of art as mimesis or the portrayal of an external object through the skilful manipulation of a medium brings us back to the difficulties that beset Plato. Poetry being the portrayal of "men in action" (ch. 2) through the medium of rhythmic speech (ch. 1), this dependence on the object produces a division of poetry according to the kind of men represented, ethically categorized: satire and comedy originate from the portrayal of despicable persons, while epic and tragedy from the portrayal of "noble actions" and of men who are above the common level (chs. 2 and 4). A still more restrictive dependence on the object is to be found in Aristotle's definition of the hero of tragedy. In contradiction with ch. 2, which had made the characters of tragedy "men better than in actual life," the hero is now defined (ch. 13) as a man "like ourselves," neither too good nor too bad, who is trapped by circumstances through committing an hamartia (whatever be the exact meaning of that disputed term). The characters of tragedy are elsewhere said to belong to the class of "a few noble families" famous for their misfortunes (ch. 13), with no hint of their purely mythical character.

This dependence on the object portrayed is of course in keeping with Aristotle's realistic theory of knowledge, which makes the object of knowledge a prerequisite to the act of knowing. In the Poetics it may at times represent an attempt to reach at the eidetic character of poetry, but its logic leaves no room for invention or for the function of the creative imagination which will play such a large part in later conceptions of p. Creative imagination is also excluded by Aristotle's psychological doctrine (Rhetoric I.11.1370 a 28). This doctrine was accurately represented later in Hobbes's definition: "imagination is nothing but decaying sense" (Leviathan 1.2). Aristotle's view allows only for a certain manipulative skill in "putting together the fable," or plot construction, with which in relation to tragedy the most detailed discussion in the Poetics is concerned. Here the poetic talent seems to be identified with the capacity for classification: for the poet's job is made to consist in discerning what episodes and plots come under certain general definitions of desirable ingredients of tragedy, according to the elaborate system of divisions and subdivisions of "recognition" and "reversal." Here also the ultimate test appears to be an effect upon the emotions of the audience, so another external object is assumed as determining the poet's activity: viz. the arousal of certain arbitrarily restricted types of emotion in the minds of the future audience, or the much debated concept of catharsis (q.v.).

It will now be patent that from the beginning of the treatise Aristotle shifts from the conception of p. as a descriptive or philosophical statement to a very different conception that has divided critics into opposing camps throughout the ages, namely p. as prescriptive and regulative. The conflict is between a statement as to what poetry is, independently of the desires or requirements of the theorist, and a statement as to what poetry should be to satisfy those requirements and to fit into a preconceived set of forms and subjects, of types of diction and meter and arrangement and kinds of content. Upon these two conceptions of p. are grounded the two opposing trends of criticism which finally crystallized into the classic-romantic dichotomy: judicial criticism, which assesses poetry from the requirements of a prescriptive p., and aesthetic or romantic criticism, which accepts all kinds of patterns and forms, of genres and of subjects, provided they are aesthetically unified, and attempts to see the poem from the point of view of its creator and to reproduce in the mind of the critic the creative process of the artist. While the latter conception was obviously not available to Aristotle, it might have been possible for him to conceive of art as mimetic without attempting to prescribe laws for it. But this he does from the very opening paragraph, already cited: "the way in which plots are to be constructed if a poem is to be beautiful" (ch. 1). This later develops into the enumeration of the rules that tragedy should follow: it should present a hero of a certain type and not of another, a plot of a certain kind rather than of another, an unhappy ending rather than a happy one (such as is actually found in several extant Gr. tragedies, as the Philoctetes, Alcestis, Helen, Iphigenia in Tauris, etc.), etc. These rules were multiplied by the followers of Aristotle in the tradition of prescriptive p., such as Horace. The latter laid down still narrower rules for the drama: there must be no more than three characters speaking on the stage, neither more nor less than five acts, etc., but he was saved from pedantry by his polished, urbane, man-of-the-world presentation. No such sophistication was achieved by the Renaissance Aristotelian critics, who fathered upon Aristotle the doctrine of the Dramatic Unities and whose pedantry has passed into proverb: "they proclaimed Aristotle always right, even when they translated him wrong" (F. L. Lucas). They thus paved the way to the most famous modern p. of the prescriptive kind, Boileau's Art of Poetry (1674), presenting in verse according to the Horatian tradition the code of Fr. neoclassicism. This view includes a doctrine of generality, or poetry as the expression of the most general thoughts in the most general terms—the acme of an intellectualistic p. for which Aristotle himself, with his excursion into a theory of the poetic universal in ch. 9, is not entirely without responsibility.

From the Renaissance onward theories of p. are to be found not only in treatises with that title but in all kinds of writings. Pope's Essay on Criticism (1711), inspired as it is by Boileau, includes a poetic of the neoclassical prescriptive type, the injunctions to poets ("Trust not thyself") being much less liberal than the advice to critics, a paradoxical situation for which there is also precedent in Aristotle's Poetics, for his ch. 25 consists of advice to critics to avoid pedantic strictures and a defense of various kinds of poetic license. The rise of aesthetics as a philosophical science, formally achieved by J. B. Baumgarten in 1750, tended to strengthen the theoretical and objective treatment of p. rather than the prescriptive. The simultaneous rise of the historical method in literary criticism led to the purely historical handling of p. as the objective account of what poetry and theories of poetry had been in the past, one of the earliest instances being F. von Blankenburg's article on p. in his supplement to Sulzer's aesthetics, 1796-98. Since p. had become identified with the Rules under the neoclassical dispensation, it now shared the discredit which romanticism poured over them, and not many p. have been written since, or at least they have not been so authoritative. However, A. W. Schlegel's Berlin lectures on the theory of art in 1801-2 include a comprehensive survey of questions relating to poetry and constitute the most substantial p. by a romantic critic. They are surpassed in depth only by Hegel's lectures on aesthetics, published after his death. Both Schlegel and Hegel refute the theory that poetry is an imitation of nature and develop a creative concept of art and of poetry, conceiving the poem as a self-developing organism governed by its own principles. This is in keeping with the new metaphysics of mind, in which the object is conceived as an organic creation of the subject. Aristotle had used the organic metaphor, but his dissection of tragedy showed only too clearly his incapacity to conceive of the work of art as an inseparable unity of form and content. It remained for modern interpreters like Butcher to project the pre-eminently romantic concepts of ideality and organic unity into the text of Aristotle.

In the 19th c. p. therefore became either a part of philosophical aesthetics, or was dealt with historically. In the first alternative, a theory of poetry is to be found in all the systems of metaphysical aesthetics which were then built up, from those of the Hegelians such as Vischer (and before them of Schleiermacher and of Solger) and of the anti-Hegelian Herbart, to those of Schopenhauer, Hartmann, Lotze, etc. P., to these writers, is the theory of a particular art in the system of the arts, when the aesthetic is built around such a system, or it may be considered as a purely empirical and external classification of works of art for the sake of convenience, as in Croce's Aesthetics of 1902. Croce's later Poesia (1936) is a discussion of the problems arising from this empirical classification of poetry, with a view to resolving them into a unified concept of art, and is in this sense a kind of p. On the other hand p. treated historically became in Germany what is there known as Literaturwissenschaft, or in its Am. version "the theory of literature": viz., a discussion of the problems of p. with an empirical rather than a philosophical method, grounded upon historical knowledge and assuming implicitly the validity of the theory of genres: e.g., H. Cysarz (1926), E. Ermatinger (1930), J. Petersen (1939), and W. Kayser (1948).

The relations of literary criticism to p., or more generally to aesthetic theory, are manifold and complex. The critic's main concern is usually with the evaluation and analysis of the work which is in front of him, but this evaluation logically implies standards of judgment which have their root in an aesthetic or poetic of some kind. This relationship, being by implication, may range anywhere from the conscious adherence to a definite system (e.g., in the case of the Chicago Aristotelians) to the professed rejection of all aesthetics or p., as in the impressionists à la Anatole France. Even more delicate and sensitive is the relationship between p. and actual creation. Does a poet start with a definite theory of what poetry should be, and then attempt to fit his own composition into the requirements of that theory? All intellectualistic conceptions of p. answer in the affirmative, all intuitionistic or eidetic theories in the negative. But even a critic who believes in the creative imagination may acknowledge that a poet may have before him a vague and fluctuating idea of what his poem is going to be, an orientation toward certain subjects and certain forms, a sketch, outline or "harmony of tones and feelings," from which his poem then develops, assuming definite shape and concrete verbalization in the process of expression. The ideal of the poetry that a poet may dream of or aim at may be called his p. In this sense it is possible to speak of the poetic of Shelley or of Hopkins, of Mallarmé or Valéry, deriving it from their prose statements and from their actual work, and then to present their poetry as the realization of this ideal. Since the eighties there is a symbolistic poetic of this kind, an ideal of poetry as symbol rather than representation, of suggestion rather than of expression, of musicality rather than of discourse. In the postsymbolists of the 20th c. there has been among other things a tendency to return to some of the doctrines of traditional p., to a rule of intellectual construction and technical virtuosity rather than to the p. of imagination and feeling. T. S. Eliot's p., as put forward in his critical writings, has stressed, one after the other, a series of devices considered to ensure poetic effect: he has resorted in turn to "myth," to "conventions," to the "objective correlative," and ultimately to "poetic drama." Pound's poetic has stressed the role of the intellect in the conscious elaboration of technical devices, sharpness of imagery, and metrical innovation. P. in this sense is the individual concern of each poet and finds its consummation in the production of his work. It thus becomes too multifarious for discussion here.

Other contemporary conceptions of p. are based on sociological or anthropological or psychological theories: e.g., the various schools of psychoanalysis, from Freud's complexes to the archetypes of Jung, all of which are supposed to be active in the unconscious (either individual or collective) and emerge unintentionally in poetic compositions. P. also discusses such matters as the difference between prose and verse, the various kinds of meter and the various kinds of composition (see GENRES), the nature of poetic genius, and the function of myth or the supernatural in poetry. It does not usually include fiction or drama in prose (which are included in the German term for poetry, Dichtung), an exclusion which has been followed in the present work, which deals with compositions in verse.

C. M. Gayley and F. N. Scott, An Introd. to the Methods and Materials of Lit. Crit.: the Bases in Aesthetics and P. (1899); Gayley and Kurtz (Gayley's books are out of date in many ways, but they still provide the fullest guide to the earlier lit. of the subject); Wellek and Warren (abundant references to more recent bibliog.); W. Kayser, Das sprachliche Kunstwerk (Bern, 1948; for the German "theory of literature," with up-to-date bibliog.); M. Fubini and others, Tecnica e teoria letteraria (2d ed., 1951).—T. B. L. Webster, "Gr. Theories of Art and Lit. down to 400 B.C.," CQ, 33 (1939); Lit. Crit.: Plato to Dryden, ed. A. H. Gilbert (1940; most usable Eng. tr. of Aristotle's Poetics with sel. from Plato and from Ren. p.); Aristotele, Poetica, ed. A. Rostagni (2d ed., 1945; best ed. of the Gr. text with commentary and important critical introd.); The Art of Poetry: The Poetical Treatises of Horace, Vida and Boileau, ed. A. S. Cook (1892); B. Croce, The Defence of Poetry, tr. E. E. Carritt (1933) and La poesia (1936; selections tr. by A. H. Gilbert in G. W. Allen and H. H. Clark, eds., Lit. Crit.: Pope to Croce, 1941); L'Art poétique, ed. C. Charpier and P. Seghers (1956; compreh. coll. of texts of p., esp. good for modern Fr.).

K. Borinski, Die Antike in Poetik und Kunsttheorie (2 v., 1914–24); M. W. Bundy, The Theory of the Imagination in Cl. and Medieval Thought (1927); G. F. Else, Aristotle's P.: the Argument (1957); J. Jones, On Aristotle and Gr. Tragedy (1962); European Theories of the Drama, ed. B. H. Clark (2d ed., with suppl. on Am. drama, 1947; with an anthol. of dramatic theory and crit. from Aristotle to present); Curtius; Weinberg; R. P. Cowl, The Theory of Poetry in England . . . from the 16th to the 19th C. (1914); 18th C. Crit. Essays, ed. S. Elledge (2 v., 1961); P. van Tieghem, Petite hist. des grandes doctrines littéraires en France de la Pléiade au Surréalisme (1946); Abrams; B. Markwardt, Gesch. d. deutschen Poetik (in 6 v., 4 v. completed, 1937–61); L. Abercrombie, The Theory of Poetry (1926); E. Staiger, Grundbegriffe der Poetik (1946); E. Sewall, The Structure of Poetry (1951); F. Martini, "Poetik," Deutsche Philologie im Aufriß, 2. überarbeitete Auflage, herausgegeben von W. Stammer, 1 (1957); L. D. Lerner, The Truest Poetry (1960); W. L. Schwartz, "Some 20th C. Arts Poétiques," PMLA, 47 (1932); "On Prose and Poetry: Prose Statements by Modern Poets," A Little Treasury of Modern Poetry, ed. O. Williams (1950); Modern Fr. Poets on Poetry. An Anthol., ed. R. Gibson (1961); Frye. G.N.C.O.

POETICS AND RHETORIC. See RHETORIC AND POETICS.

POETISCHER REALISMUS. See REALISM.

POETRY, THEORIES OF. There is no uniquely valid way to classify theories of poetry; that classification is best which best serves the particular purpose in hand. The division of theories presented here is one among many possibilities, adopted because it is relatively simple; because it stresses the notable extent to which later approaches to poetry were expansions—although under the influence of many new philosophical concepts and poetic examples—of Gr. and Roman prototypes; and because it defines in a provisional way certain large-scale shifts of emphasis during 2,500 years of Western speculation about the identity of poetry, its kinds and their relative status, the parts, qualities, and ordonnance of a single poem, and the criteria by which poems are to be evaluated. But like all general schemes, this one must be supplemented and qualified in numerous ways before it can do justice to the diversity of individual points of view.

All theorists recognize that poetry is a fabricated thing, not found in nature, and therefore contingent on a number of factors. A poem is produced by a poet, takes its subject matter from the universe of men, things, and events, and is addressed to, or made available to, an audience of hearers or readers. But although these four elements play some part in all inclusive accounts of poetry, they do not play an equal part. Commonly a critic takes one of these elements or relations as cardinal, and refers the poem either to the external world, or to the audience, or to the poet as preponderantly "the source, and end, and test of art"; or alternatively, he considers the poem as a self-sufficient entity, best regarded in theoretical isolation from the causal factors in the universe from which the poem derives its materials, or the tastes, convictions, and responses of the audience to which it appeals, or the character, intentions, thoughts, and feelings of the poet who brings it into being. These varied orientations give us, in a preliminary way, four broad types of poetic theory, which may be labeled mimetic, pragmatic, expressive, and objective.

MIMETIC THEORIES: In Plato's Republic 10, Socrates said that poetry is mimesis, or "imitation," and illustrated its relation to the universe by a mirror which, turned round and round, can produce an appearance of all sensible things. Plato thus bequeathed to later theorists a preoccupation with the relation of poetry to that which it imitates, and also the persistent analogy of the reflector as defining the nature of that relation. But in the cosmic structure underlying Plato's dialectic, the sensible universe is itself an imitation, or appearance, of the eternal Ideas which are the locus of all value, while all other human knowledge and products are also modes of imitation. A poem therefore turns out to be the rival of the work of the artisan, the statesman, the moralist, and the philosopher, but under the inescapable disadvantage of being an imitation of an imitation, "thrice removed from the truth," and composed not by art and knowledge, but by inspiration, at a time when the poet is not in his right mind (Ion). Plato thus forced many later critical theorists into a posture of defense, in a context of discussion in which poetry necessarily competes with all other human attempts to achieve the true, the beautiful, and the good.

In Aristotle's Poetics the various kinds of poetry are also defined as "modes of imitation" of human actions. Aristotle attributes the origin of poetry to our natural instinct to imitate and to take pleasure in imitations, and grounds in large part on the kinds of subjects which are imitated such essential concepts as the different species of poetry, the unity of a poem (since an imitation "must represent one action, a complete whole"), and the primacy of plot in tragedy (for "tragedy is essentially an imitation not of persons but of action and life"). But Aristotle's use of the term "imitation" sharply differentiates his theory of poetry from that of Plato. In Aristotle's scheme, the forms of things do not exist in an otherworldly realm, but are inherent in the things themselves, so that it is in no way derogatory to point out that poetry imitates models in the world of sense. On the contrary, poetry is more philosophic than history, because it imitates the form of things in the matter or medium of words, and so achieves statements in the mode of "universals, whereas those of history are singulars." Furthermore "imitation" in Aristotle is a term specific to the arts, distinguishing poems from all other activities and products as a class of objects having their own criteria of value and reason for being. And by exploiting systematically such distinctions as the kinds of objects imitated, the media and manner of imitation, and the variety of emotional effects on an audience, Aristotle implements his consideration of poetry as poetry by providing means for distinguishing among the poetic kinds—e.g., tragedy, comedy, epic—and for discriminating the particular parts, internal relations, power of giving pleasure, and standards of evaluation proper to each type of poem.

Later the eclectic Cicero (Ad M. Brutum Orator 2) and Plotinus (Enneads 5.8) demonstrated that it was possible to assume a world-scheme which includes Platonic Ideas, yet allow the artist to short-circuit the objects of sense so as to imitate, in Plotinus' phrase, "the Ideas from which Nature itself derives." In accordance with this strategy, later critics used building blocks from Plato's cosmos to construct aesthetic theories which raise poetry from Plato's inferior position to the highest among human endeavors. The claim that poetry imitates the eternal Forms was developed by It. Neoplatonists in the 16th c., occasionally echoed by neoclassic critics (including, in England, Dennis, Hurd, and Reynolds), and played a prominent part in the writings of German romantic philosophers such as Schelling and Novalis. Diverse cognitive claims for poetry as approximating verities beyond experience are also found in the Eng. romantic critics Blake, Coleridge, and Carlyle. Shelley, in his Defence of Poetry, demonstrates the radically reductive tendency of an uncompromising Neoplatonic theory. Since all good poems imitate the same Forms, and since these Forms, as the residence of all values, are the models for all other human activities and products as well, Shelley's essay all but annuls any essential differences between poem and poem, between poetic kind and poetic kind, between poems written in various times and in various places, and between poems written in words and the poetry of all other men who "express this indestructible order," including institutors of laws, founders of civil society, inventors of the arts of life, and teachers of religion. All strive for the same end and are subject to the same standards of judgment, which are at once judgments of aesthetic, ontological, and moral excellence. In our own day a formal parallel to this extreme critical monism is to be found among the critics who, after Jung, maintain that great poems, like myths, dreams, visions, and other products of the collective unconscious, all reproduce the same limited set of archetypal paradigms, and ultimately the whole or part of that archetype of archetypes, the cycle of the seasons and of death and re-birth. (See, e.g., Philip Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain, 1954; Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism, 1957).

Among mimetic theorists, however, the concept that art reproduces aspects of the sensible world has been much more common than the Platonistic or transcendental variant. The doctrine that poetry and the arts are essentially imitations of this world, in a variety of systematic applications, flourished through the Renaissance and well into the 18th c. In Les Beaux Arts réduits à un même principe (1747), Charles Batteux found in the principle of imitation the "clear and distinct idea" from which he systematically deduced the nature and all the rules of the various arts. The Englishman Richard Hurd declared that "all poetry, to speak with Aristotle and the Greek critics (if for so plain a point authorities be thought wanting) is, properly, imitation . . . having all creation for its object" ("Discourse on Poetical Imitation," 1751). And Lessing's classic Laokoon (1766), although it set out to substitute an inductive method for the blatantly deductive theories of Batteux and other contemporaries, still discovered the "essence" of poetry and painting to be imitation, and derived the bounds of the subjects each art is competent to imitate from the differences in their media.

Since the 18th c. the mimetic doctrine has been more narrowly employed by proponents of artistic realism, or in theories limited to the more realistic literary genres. In the Renaissance there had been many echoes of the saying Donatus had attributed to Cicero that dramatic comedy is peculiarly "a copy of life, a mirror of custom, a reflection of truth." In the early 19th c., when prose fiction had superseded comedy as the primary vehicle of realism, Stendhal put the mimetic mirror on wheels: "a novel," he said "is a mirror riding along a highway." Since that time representational theories have been voiced mainly by exponents of naturalistic fiction and imagist poetry.

The mimetic approach to literature, accordingly, has been used to justify artistic procedures ranging from the most refined idealism to the rawest realism. What the various theories have in common is the tendency to look to the nature of the given universe as the clue to the nature of poetry, and to assign to the subject matter which is represented—or which ought to be represented—the primary role in determining the aims, kinds, constitution, and criteria of poems. The key word in mimetic definitions of poetry, if not "imitation," is another predicate which aligns the poem in the same direction: the poem is an "image," "reflection," "feigning," "counterfeiting," "copy," or "representation." The underlying parallel for a poem, which often comes to the surface as an express comparison, is Plato's mirror, or "a speaking picture," or a photographic plate. The focus of attention is thus on the relation between the imitable and the imitation, and the primary aesthetic criterion is "truth to nature." In purely representational theories, the patent discrepancies between the world as it is and the world as it is represented in poems tend to be explained, not by reference to the psychology of the poet or the reader, or to the conventions and internal requirements of a work of art, but by reference to the kinds or aspects of reality which are to be imitated. Transcendental theorists maintain that poetry represents the poet's intuitions of models existing in their own supramundane space. This-worldly theorists claim that poetry represents a composite of the beautiful and moral aspects of things, or "la belle nature," or the statistical average of a biological form, or the universal, typical, and generically human, or the quotidian, the particular, the unique, and "the characteristic." In all these instances, however opposed, the objects or qualities are conceived to be inherent in the constitution of the universe, and the genius of the poet is explained primarily by his acuity of observation, enabling him to discover aspects of reality hitherto unregarded, and by his artistic ingenuity, enabling him to select and arrange even the more familiar elements into novel combinations which, nevertheless, surprise us by their truth.

PRAGMATIC THEORIES: The pragmatic scheme sets a poem in a means-end relationship, regarding the matter and manner of imitation as instrumental toward achieving certain effects in the reader. "Poesy therefore," declared Sir Philip Sidney in a typical formulation, "is an art of imitation . . . a speaking picture: with this end, to teach and delight." Ancient rhetorical theory provided the conceptual frame and many of the terms for this approach to poetry, for it was held that the aim of rhetoric is to effect persuasion, and there was wide agreement (e.g., Cicero, De Oratore 2.28) that this end is best achieved by informing, winning, and moving the auditor. But the great prototype for the pragmatic view of poetry was Horace's Ars Poetica, with its persistent emphasis that the aim of the poet, and the measure of poetic success, is the pleasure and approval of the contemporary Roman audience and of posterity as well. Aristotle has been more often quoted, but Horace has been the most influential critical exemplar in the Western world. For the pragmatic orientation, exploiting the mode of reasoning and many of the concepts and topics presented in Horace's short epistle, dominated literary criticism through the Renaissance and most of the 18th c., and has made frequent, though more sporadic, reappearances ever since.

"Aut prodesse volunt, aut delectare poetae," Horace declared, although pleasure turns out to be the ultimate end, with instruction requisite only because the graver readers will not be pleased without moral matter. Later critics added from rhetoric a third term, "move," to sum up under the three headings of instruction, emotion, and pleasure the effects of poetry on its audience. Most Renaissance humanists, like Sidney, made moral profit the ultimate aim of poetry; but from Dryden through the 18th c. it became increasingly common to subordinate instruction and emotion to the delight of the reader, as the defining end of a poetic composition. Dr. Johnson, however, continued to insist that "the end of poetry is to instruct by pleasing," and that "it is always a writer's duty to make the world better" (Preface to Shakespeare). In the 19th c. the influential reviewer, Francis Jeffrey, deliberately justified writing in such a way as to please the least common denominator of public taste, and in this procedure he has been followed by later pedlars of formulae for achieving popular success. Neoclassic pragmatists, however, justified the sophisticated preferences of the classically trained connoisseurs of their own day by the claim that these accorded with the literary qualities of works whose long survival prove their adaptation to the aesthetic proclivities of man in general (Dr. Johnson's "common reader"), and that works written in accordance with these principles have the best chance to endure. The renowned masters, John Dennis said, wrote not to please only their countrymen; "they wrote to their fellow-citizens of the universe, to all countries, and to all ages."

We recognize pragmatic critics of poetry, whatever their many divergences, by their tendency to regard a poem as a made object, a craftsmanlike product which (after due allowance for the play of natural talent, inspired moments, and felicities beyond the reach of art) is still, for the most part, deliberately designed to achieve foreknown ends; we recognize them also by their tendency to derive the rationale, the chief determinants of elements and forms, and the norms of such artifacts from the legitimate requirements and springs of pleasure in the readers for whom it is written. Thus the ars poetica—in Ben Jonson's words, "the craft of making"—looms large in this theory, and for centuries was often codified as a system of prescriptions and "rules." "Having thus shown that imitation pleases," as Dryden summarized the common line of reasoning, "it follows, that some rules of imitation are necessary to obtain the end; for without rules there can be no art" (Parallel of Poetry and Painting). These rules were justified inductively as essential properties abstracted from works which have appealed to the natural preferences of mankind over the centuries; in the 18th c., especially in such systematic theorists as Beattie, Hurd, and Kames, they were also warranted by a confident appeal to the psychological laws governing the responses of the reader. Through the neoclassic period, most critics assumed that the rules were specific for each of the fixed genres, or kinds, but these poetic kinds in turn were usually discriminated and ranked, from epic and tragedy at the top down to the "lesser lyric" and other trifles at the bottom, by the special moral and pleasurable effects each kind is most competent to achieve. Poetic deviations from the truth of fact, which in strictly mimetic theories are justified by their conformity to forms and tendencies in the constitution of the universe, are warranted pragmatically by the reader's moral requirements, and even more emphatically, by his native inclination to take delight only in a selected, patterned, heightened, and "ornamented" reality. In 1651 Davenant (Preface to Gondibert) attacked the traditional use of pagan machinery and supernatural materials on the assumption that the poet undertakes to "represent the world's true image"; a point of view which Hobbes at once abetted by proscribing all poetic materials that go "beyond the conceived possibility of nature" (Answer to Davenant). To this influential interpretation of poetic probability as correspondence to the empirical constitution and order of events, pragmatic critics responded by shifting the emphasis from the nature of the world to the nature of man, and by redefining poetic probability as anything which succeeds in evoking the pleasurable responsiveness of the reader. "The end of poetry is to please," Beattie wrote in his Essays on Poetry and Music (1776), and "greater pleasure is . . . to be expected from it, because we grant it superior indulgence, in regard to fiction," than if it were "according to real nature." Later Thomas Twining justified for poetry "not only impossibilities, but even absurdities, where that end [of yielding pleasure] appears to be better answered with them, than it would have been without them" (Preface to Aristotle's Treatise on Poetry, 1789).

EXPRESSIVE THEORIES: The mimetic poet is the agent who holds the mirror up to nature; the pragmatic poet is considered mainly in terms of the inherent powers ("nature") and acquired knowledge and skills ("art") he must possess to construct a poetic object intricately adapted, in its parts and as a whole; to its complex aims. In the expressive orientation, the poet moves into the center of the scheme and himself becomes the prime generator of the subject matter, attributes, and values of a poem. The chief historical source for this point of view was the treatise On the Sublime attributed to Longinus. In this treatise the stylistic quality of sublimity is defined by its effect of ekstasis, or transport, and is traced to five sources in the powers of the author. Of these sources, three have to do with expression, and are amenable to art; but the two primary sources are largely innate and instinctive, and are constituted by the author's greatness of conception and, most important of all, by his "vehement and inspired passion." Referring the major excellence of a work to its genesis in the author's mind, Longinus finds it a reflection of its author: "Sublimity is the echo of a great soul."

The influence of Longinus' essay, after it became generally known in the third quarter of the 17th c., was immense, and its emphasis on thought and passion, originally used to explain a single stylistic quality, was expanded and applied to poetry as a whole. The effect on poetic theory was supplemented by primitivist concepts of the natural origins of language and poetry in emotional exclamations and effusions, as well as by the rise to high estate of "the greater lyric," or Pindaric ode, which critics (following the lead of Cowley) treated in Longinian terms. By 1725 the boldly speculative Giambattista Vico combined Longinian doctrines, the Lucretian theory of linguistic origins, and travelers' reports about the poetry of culturally primitive peoples into his major thesis that the first language after the flood was dominated by sense, passion, and imagination, and was therefore at once emotional, concrete, mythical, and poetic. In Vico is to be found the root concept of the common expressive origins and nature of poetry, myth, and religion which was later exploited by such influential theorists as Herder, Croce, and Cassirer; this mode of speculation is still recognizable in the current theories of Suzanne Langer and Philip Wheelwright, among many others.

In the course of the 18th c. there was a growing tendency to treat poetry, although still within a generally pragmatic frame, as primarily an emotional, in contrast to a rational, use of language, especially among such Longinian enthusiasts as John Dennis, Robert Lowth, and Joseph Warton (see, e.g., Warton's Essay . . . on Pope, 1756-82). By the latter part of the century, unqualifiedly expressive theories of poetry as grounded in the faculties and feelings of the poet are to be found in Sir William Jones's "Essay on the Arts Called Imitative" (1772), J. G. Sulzer's Allgemeine Theorie der schönen Künste (1771-74), and Hugh Blair's "Nature of Poetry" (Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, 1783). German romantic theorists such as the Schlegels, Schleiermacher, and Tieck, formulated the expressive view in the terminology of post-Kantian idealism; Novalis, e.g., said that "poetry is representation of the spirit, of the inner world in its totality" (Die Fragmente). In France Mme de Staël announced the new outlook on poetry in De L'Allemagne (1813), and in Italy it manifested itself, later on, in some of Leopardi's speculations on lyrical poetry.

Wordsworth's "Preface" to the Lyrical Ballads is the heir to a century of developments in this mode of thinking, and became the single most important pronouncement of the emotive theory of poetry. His key formulation, twice uttered, is that poetry "is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings." The key metaphor, "overflow," like the equivalent terms in the definitions of Wordsworth's contemporaries—"expression," "uttering forth," "projection"—faces in an opposite direction from "imitation," and indicates that the source of the poem is no longer the external world, but the poet himself; and the elements which, externalized, become the subject matter of the poem are, expressly, the poet's "feelings." The word "overflow" also exemplifies the water-language in which feelings are usually discussed, and suggests that the dynamics of the poetic process consists in the pressure of fluid feelings; later John Keble converted the water to steam, and described the poetic process as a release, a "safety valve," for pent-up feelings and desires. The poetic process, therefore, as Wordsworth says, is not calculated, but "spontaneous." Wordsworth still allows for the element of "art" by regarding the success of spontaneous composition to be attendant upon prior thought and practice, and takes the audience into account by insisting that "poets do not write for poets alone, but for men." But in the more radical followers and successors of Wordsworth, including Keble, Mill, and Carlyle, the art of affecting an audience, which had been the defining attribute of poetry in pragmatic theory, becomes precisely the quality which invalidates a poem. "Poetry," wrote John Stuart Mill, "is feeling, confessing itself to itself in moments of solitude." And when the utterance "is not itself the end, but a means to an end . . . of making an impression upon another mind, then it ceases to be poetry, and becomes eloquence" ("What is Poetry?", 1833). Sir Walter Scott was almost alone in his time in proposing a theory of poetry as the communication, as well as the expression of emotion: the poet, he said, has the motive "of exciting in the reader . . . a tone of feeling similar to that which existed in his own bosom" ("Essay on the Drama," 1819). Later writers also adapted the concept of poetry as emotive expression to a communicative, or pragmatic, frame of reference. That poetry is emotional communication is the basic principle of Tolstoy's "infection theory" of art (What is Art?, 1898), as well as of the earlier writings of I. A. Richards, who claimed that emotive language is "used for the sake of the effects in emotion and attitude produced by the reference it occasions," and that poetry "is the supreme form of emotive language" (Principles of Literary Criticism, 1924).

Feelings overflow into words, so that it is characteristic of Wordsworth and later emotive theorists, through the school of I. A. Richards, to give to the nature and standards of poetic diction, or "language," the systematic priority which earlier critics had given to plot, character, and considerations of form. In earlier discussions of poetry as an imitation of human actions, "feigning," or fiction, the chief instances of poetry had been narrative and dramatic forms, and the usual antithesis to poetry had been history, or the narration of events that have actually happened. But Wordsworth, Hazlitt, Mill, and many of their contemporaries, conceiving poetry as the language of feeling, thought of the lyrical poem, instead of epic or tragedy, as the exemplary form, and replaced history as the logical opposite of poetry by what Wordsworth called "matter of fact, or science." This romantic innovation in poetic theory has become predominant in our own time. It is the characteristic procedure of I. A. Richards, William Empson, Allen Tate, Cleanth Brooks, and most of the New Critics to establish primarily semantic principles for poetry, by setting up a bipolar distribution of all discourse, and by defining the "emotive," or "imaginative," or the "ambiguous," "ironic," and "paradoxical" language of poetry by systematic opposition to the attributes of the "referential," "cognitive," and unambiguously "rational" language of science.

Among expressive theorists of the 19th c., the old criterion of truth to objective or ideal nature was often reinterpreted as truth to a nature already suffused with the poet's feelings, or reshaped by the dynamics of desire. More commonly still, the criterion was turned around, in the demand that poetry be "sincere"; it was in this period that "sincerity" became a cardinal requirement of poetic excellence. "The excellence of Burns," as Carlyle said, clearly revealing the reversal of the standard, "is . . . his sincerity, his indisputable air of truth. . . . The passion that is traced before us has glowed in a living heart." Or as J. S. Mill asserted, in a phrasing anticipating the theory of later symbolists and expressionists, poetry embodies "itself in symbols which are the nearest possible representations of the feeling in the exact shape in which it exists in the poet's mind." The mirror held up to nature becomes a mirror held up to the poet, or else it is rendered transparent: Shakespeare's works, according to Carlyle, "are so many windows, through which we see a glimpse of the world that was in him." Correspondingly, the elements constituting a poem become in large part qualities which it shares with its author: feelings, imagination, spirit, and (in Matthew Arnold, e.g.) such traits of character as largeness, freedom, benignity, and high seriousness. And as Carlyle shrewdly observed so early as 1827, the grand question asked by the best contemporary critics is "to be answered by discovering and delineating the peculiar nature of the poet from his poetry." Essays on Shakespeare, Milton, Dante, Homer became to a singular degree essays on the temperament and moral nature of the poet as embodied in his work. The most thorough exponent of poetry as self-expression was John Keble in his Lectures on Poetry (1832-41), whose thesis was that any good poem is a disguised form of wish-fulfillment—"the indirect expression," as he said in a review of Lockhart's Scott, "of some overpowering emotion, or ruling taste, or feeling, the direct indulgence whereof is somehow repressed"—and who specified and applied a complex set of techniques for reversing the process and reconstructing the temperament of the poet from its distorted projection in his poems. In both critical premises and practice, Keble has hardly been exceeded even by critics in the age of Freud who, like Edmund Wilson, hold that "the real elements, of course, of any work of fiction, are the elements of the author's personality: his imagination embodies in the images of characters, situations, and scenes the fundamental conflicts of his nature . . ." (Axel's Castle, 1936).

The principal alternative, in Eng. expressive theory, to the view that poetry is the expression of feelings or unrealized desires was Coleridge's view that "poetry" (the superlative passages which occur both in poems and other forms of discourse) is the product of "that synthetic and magical power, to which we have exclusively appropriated the name of imagination" (Biographia Literaria, 1817). The creative imagination of the poet, like God the Creator, is endowed with an inner source of motion, and its creative activity, generated by the tension of contraries seeking resolution in a new whole, parallels the dynamic principle underlying the created universe. Following the lead of post-Kantian German theorists, especially Schelling and A. W. Schlegel, Coleridge opposes the organic imaginative process to the mechanical operation of the fancy; that is, he deals with it, in terms that are literal for a growing plant and metaphoric for imagination, as a self-organizing process, assimilating disparate materials by an inherent lawfulness into an organic unity revealed "in the balance or reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities: of sameness with difference; of the general, with the concrete; the idea, with the image. . . ." Coleridge thus inaugurated the organic theory of poetry in England, as well as the aesthetic principle of inclusiveness, or the "reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities" which—in the mode of "irony," "tension," the "reconciliation of diverse impulses," or "a pattern of resolved stresses"—has become both the basic conception of poetic unity and the prime criterion of poetic excellence in I. A. Richards and many of the New Critics.

One other variant of the expressive theory deserves mention. Longinus had exemplified the sublime quality as inhering especially in the stunning image, or in brief passages characterized by "speed, power, and intensity," comparable in effect "to a thunder-bolt or flash of lightning," and recognizable by the transport or "spell that it throws over us." Most expressive theorists, assuming the lyric to be the paradigm of poetry, depart from the neoclassic emphasis on distinct and hierarchically ordered poetic kinds by minimizing other genres except as the occasion for the expression of various lyrical feelings, as well as by applying to all poems universal qualitative and evaluative terms which are independent of their generic differences. Joseph Warton and other 18th-c. Longinians went still farther, by isolating the transporting short poem, or the intense image or fragment in a longer poem, and identifying it as "pure poetry," "poetry as such," or the "poetry of a poem." In the 19th c., there emerged the explicit theory that the essentially poetic is to be found only in the incandescent and unsustainable short poem or passage, originating in the soul, unachievable by art and unanalyzable by critics, but characterized by the supreme aesthetic virtue of "intensity." This mode of thinking is to be found in Hazlitt's treatment of "gusto"; in Keats's concept that "the excellence of every art is its intensity"; in Poe's doctrine (picked up by Baudelaire) that "a poem is such, only inasmuch as it intensely excites, by elevating, the soul; and all intense excitements are, through a psychal necessity, brief" ("The Philosophy of Composition," 1846); in Arnold's use of fragmentary touchstones for detecting

"the very highest poetical quality"; in the Abbé Bremond's theory of "la poésie pure"; and more recently and explicitly still, in A. E. Housman's The Name and Nature of Poetry (1933).

OBJECTIVE THEORIES: Aristotle, after defining tragedy as an imitation of a certain kind of action with certain characteristic effects, showed the way to the further consideration of the tragic poem as an entity in itself, subject to internal requirements (such as unity, probability, progression from beginning through complication to catastrophe) which determine the selection, treatment, and ordering of the parts in an artistic whole. Despite their persistent appeal to Aristotle as exemplar, however, later critics in effect assimilated Aristotle to the Horatian theoretical frame, aligning the poem to its audience. A radically new approach to an objective theory of poetry was inaugurated by certain It. thinkers of the Renaissance (including Cristoforo Landino, Tasso, and Scaliger) who proposed that the poet or "maker" does not imitate God's world, but like the God of Genesis creates his own world, and, it was sometimes suggested, ex nihilo, "out of nothing." Against contemporary charges that the poet's fictions are lies, the main line of defense in England, as in Italy, was the claim that poets teach by example, through shaping amoral reality to fit a moral ideal. But Sir Philip Sidney further glorified poetry above all other human achievements by the claim that the poet alone among productive thinkers is not tied to nature, but "lifted up with the vigor of his own invention, doth grow in effect into another nature," when "with the force of a divine breath he bringeth things forth far surpassing her doings" (Defense of Poesie); to which Puttenham added that if poets be able to "make all these things of themselves, without any subject of verity," then "they be (by manner of speech) as creating gods" (Art of Eng. Poesy).

The concept of the poet as a creator continued to be echoed rather casually by critics for the next century or so; its revolutionary possibilities for critical theory began to be exploited only when it became necessary to justify pagan myth and other forms of the supernatural against the powerful claim of Hobbes and other writers in the age of the "new philosophy" that, since poetry is "an imitation of human life," the poet may not go "beyond the conceived possibility of nature" (Hobbes, "Answer to Davenant"). By the mid-18th c. the Swiss critics, Bodmer and Breitinger, expanding on Addison's suggestive Spectator 419 on "the fairy way of writing" in terms taken from Leibniz's cosmogony, substituted the metaphor of creation for the metaphor of the imitative mirror. They proposed that the supernatural poem is a heterocosm, a second creation, and therefore is not a reflection of this world, but its own world, with its own laws and reason for being, in which probability is not a matter of correspondence to reality, but of internal coherence and compossibility. Rational truth, Bodmer said, we shall seek in the metaphysicians, "but demand from the poet only poetry; in this we shall be satisfied with the probability and the reason which lies in its coherence with itself" (Von dem Wunderbaren, 1740). Or as Richard Hurd, who also developed Addison's suggestions, said in explicit refutation of Hobbes, poetical truth is not philosophical truth, for "the poet has a world of his own, where experience has less to do, than consistent imagination" (Letters on Chivalry and Romance, 1762). By 1788 Karl Philipp Moritz, writing "On the Formative Imitation of the Beautiful," had expanded the Renaissance metaphor of a second creation, according to lines of thinking suggested by Bodmer, Breiting, and the aesthetician A. G. Baumgarten, into a comprehensive objective theory of art. To Moritz, the energy of the artist "creates for itself its own world, in which . . . everything is after its own fashion a self-sufficient whole"; so that a poem, like all works of art, is a microcosm which "needs no end, no purpose for its presence outside itself, but has its entire value, and the end of its existence, in itself." In the course of the 19th c. Fr. critics developed the explicit theory of l'art pour l'art, building especially on Poe's doctrine of the "poem per se . . . written solely for the poem's sake" ("The Poetic Principle"), and on the concepts of Kant and his followers that beauty is purposiveness without a purpose beyond itself, and that the contemplation of beauty is "disinterested," indifferent to the reality of the object, and without regard to its utility. The common ground of the various doctrines classified as "Art for Art's Sake" is the concept that its claim to truth, its principles of order, and its values are bounded by the confines of the work of art itself; and that the end of a poem is not to teach, nor even to please, but simply to exist and to be beautiful. Such views were sometimes cast in the venerable metaphor of the poem as a world of its own. Pure poems, as A. C. Bradley said in "Poetry for Poetry's Sake" (1901), strike us as "creations," and the nature of poetry "is to be not a part, nor yet a copy, of the real world . . . but to be a world by itself, independent, complete, autonomous."

An objective theory of poetry, in one or another critical idiom and mode of reasoning, is proposed by many of the leading critics in our own day. The emphasis in Fr. pedagogy on the method of explication de texte, and the theory and procedures of the movement known as "Russian Formalism," have focused attention on the study of the poem as such and developed methods for analyzing the internal relations of its elements. Since 1930 the kind of statement most widely approved, especially in America, is that a work of art is "autotelic," and that we must consider poetry "primarily as poetry and not another thing" (T. S. Eliot); or that the first law of criticism "is that it shall be objective, shall cite the nature of the object" and shall recognize "the autonomy of the work itself as existing for its own sake" (J. C. Ransom); or that the basic premise of critical theory is "the poem qua poem," the "poem as an object"; or that the essential undertaking of the critic is the "intrinsic" rather than the "extrinsic" study of literature (Wellek and Warren, Theory of Literature).

Current ways of conceiving the identity and constitution of the independent poetic object, however, vary greatly. Sometimes we find restatements of the old heterocosmic analogue; thus Austin Warren, in Rage for Order, says that the poet's creation is "a kind of world or cosmos; a concretely language, synoptically felt world, an ikon or image of the 'real world.'" The acute and learned Chicago Critics, while recognizing the validity and uses of an "integral criticism" which considers poetry in a broad context as sharing essential characteristics with other things, themselves prefer to advocate and pursue a "differential criticism" which deals with the poem as such. They do so by expanding upon the Aristotelian method of taking a poem as a constructed artistic whole, having a particular "working or power," whose elements and structure are analyzable in terms of internal causes which are analytically separable from extra-artistic causes in the particular nature of an author, his audience, or the state of the language he inherits ("Introduction," Critics and Criticism, ed. R. S. Crane). The commonest approach, however, and the one characteristic of most of the New Critics, has been to proceed on the assumption that poetry in the large (with little or no attention to different kinds of poems) is a special mode of discourse, which is isolated and defined by positing for the language of poetry a set of attributes which are the contraries of the abstract, literal, and conceptual nature, the empirical claims, and the practical purpose of the language of "science." Poetry thus becomes a universe of discourse, rather than a represented physical universe of things, people, and events; and the integrity of poetry, so conceived, is often jealously guarded by prohibitions against the "personal heresy" and the "intentional fallacy"—reference to the temperament, state of mind, and purpose of the author—and against the “affective fallacy”—reference to the responses of the reader. This type of theory has been accompanied by the revival, after the romantic revolt against it, of an ars poetica, or the conception of poetry as a craft of making which involves a knowing application of techniques, conventions, and traditions toward a foreseen end; the end, however, is no longer the Horatian effect on the reader, but the poem itself as a perfected object, or a self-sufficient “structure of meanings.”

The objective theory of the New Critics separates itself off in various ways from the theory of Art for Art's Sake, despite obvious similarities in provenience and formulation. For one thing, it replaces the mainly impressionistic criticism of the earlier theorists with a formidable apparatus for the explication of individual poems as a totality of “logical structure” and “local texture” (Ransom), or of multiple tensions in equilibrium (Tate), or of ambiguities, ironies, paradoxes, and image patterns (Brooks). For another thing, it undertakes to rescue the poem as poem from the claim that its sole function is a beautiful inutility, by engaging it with our ordinary moral consciousness and experience of life.

The common procedure of Cleanth Brooks, R. P. Warren, J. Wilson Knight, and many others is to posit a “theme” as the organizing principle of any poem which is better than merely trivial—a theme which is sometimes treated as a Jungian “archetype” shared with myths, dreams, and religious visions, but is often (in despite of caveats against the “heresy of paraphrase”) formulated as a moral maxim or general philosophical proposition. This revived moral treatment of poetry is put, not in pragmatic terms, as the construction of exemplary characters and actions, nor in expressive terms, as the poet's projection of his criticism of life (Matthew Arnold and Yvor Winters), but in objective terms, as an isolated thesis or set of values which are embodied and dramatized in the poem's evolving meanings, imagery, and “symbolic action,” and is to be judged by such tests as “seriousness,” “maturity,” “profundity,” and the subtlety and complexity of “moral awareness.” (See e.g., the writings of F. R. Leavis, and Brooks's “Irony as a Principle of Structure”). As W. K. Wimsatt warns us in The Verbal Icon, “neither the qualities of the author's mind nor the effects of a poem upon a reader's mind should be confused with the moral quality of the meaning expressed by the poem itself.” Finally, a number of critics, including Blackmur, Ransom, Tate, and Wimsatt, oppose to the view of Art for Art's Sake, as well as to the positivist's claim that valid knowledge is the sole preserve of science, the insistence that poetry is “cognitive,” and yields us a “special, unique, and complete knowledge” (Allen Tate, “The Present Function of Criticism”). This would appear to be a revived mimetic view of poetry, and some of Ransom's statements seem also to bespeak for poetry a truth of simple correspondence to the real world; a poet's imagery, e.g., “is probably true in the commonest sense of true: verifiable; based on observation” (The World's Body). But Ransom also sets out to preserve “the autonomy of the work as existing for its own sake,” and it eventuates that the particularity and “irrelevancies” of the poem as object are merely a salutary reminder-by-analogy that the world's body is “denser and more refractory” than the “docile and virtuous” world pictured by science (The New Criticism). Even more clearly in other cognitive theorists, what we get to know in reading the poem turns out to be the poem itself; as Tate says, “it is sufficient that here, in the poem, we get knowledge of a whole object” (“Literature as Knowledge”). And as in the earlier objective theory of the poem as a heterocosm, or “second nature,” the mimetic truth of correspondence to the external world tends to be reinterpreted as a truth of coherence, or of internal relations coterminous with the poem. Thus W. K. Wimsatt, in The Verbal Icon, undertakes to defend the double thesis that literature is “a form of knowledge,” and that “the verbal object and its analysis constitute the domain of literary criticism.” Poetry “achieves concreteness, particularity, and something like sensuous shape” by “the interrelational density of words taken in their fullest, most inclusive and symbolic character. . . . It has an iconic solidity.” A poem is therefore not a mirror of the world, but is thickened by multiple internal relationships into an object which is itself physical and dense, hence merely isomorphic with the world to which it stands in the relation of an icon, or analogue: “The dimension of coherence is . . . greatly enhanced and thus generates an extra dimension of correspondence to reality, the symbolic or analogical.”

This classification of poetic theories, through the limitations imposed by its own premises, is not complete. Some theories of poetry bring into the center of the scheme what the older and major lines of critical development which have been listed here recognized, but left peripheral. For example, sociological critics from Thomas Blackwell, Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer (1735), through Taine, V. L. Parrington, and the Marxist critics, regard the materials and values of a literary work as determined in large part by the geographical, social, economic, and political conditions of its time and place, whether these enter a poem through the contemporary scene that is imitated, or by adaptation to the assumptions and prejudices of the audience that is addressed, or as a precipitation of collective and superpersonal ideas and forces for which the poet serves merely as a catalyst. Other critics, on the contrary, emphasize the degree to which any poem is the result of an evolving and self-perpetuating process of intrinsically literary forms, conventions, techniques, and artistic materials (Ferdinand Brunetière, L'Évolution des genres, 1898; Harry Levin, "Lit. as an Institution," Accent, 6 [1946]). And the unclassifiable Kenneth Burke deliberately experiments with a diversity of critical approaches to a poem. Simplified though this survey is, however, it reveals the remarkable multiplicity of seemingly conflicting theories of poetry, a phenomenon which in the last century has led to repeated attacks by adherents of critical impressionism against the validity and use of any systematic theory in the domain of art. The most recent and concerted attack of this sort has been launched by a group seemingly remote from the aesthetic impressionists: the philosophical analysts who take their departure mainly from the later lectures and writings of Ludwig Wittgenstein. A number of these philosophers deny the possibility of formulating any significant definitions of art and poetry, or any general theory in which these definitions play a part, on the grounds that such definitions are arbitrary, because there exists no procedure for deciding in favor of one or against another by empirical evidence or counter-evidence. Their conclusion is that traditional artistic theory is mainly a history of logical and linguistic mistakes and confusions, and that the only legitimate criticism is applied criticism, which is regarded as a set of verifiable statements about the properties of individual poems or works of art. (See e.g., Aesthetics and Language, ed. William Elton, 1954). Such "metacriticism," however, is founded on a radical misunderstanding of the function of theory in criticism. A valid poetic theory is empirical in that it begins and ends in an appeal to the facts of existing poems, but it is not a science, like a physical science; it is an enterprise of discovery, or what Coleridge called "a speculative instrument." Its statements are not to be judged by their empirical verifiability out of context, but by their function as stages in the total process of illuminating the qualities and structure of diverse poems. The definitions from which most theorists set out, for example—although some critics have thought that they were using these definitions to manifest the essence or ultimate nature of poetry—in practice have served as an indispensable heuristic device for blocking out an area of investigation and establishing a point of vantage; they have functioned also as a critical premise, or elected starting point for reasoning about poetry and for developing a coherent set of terms and categories to be used in classifying, describing, and appraising particular poems. The diverse theories described in this article—however contradictory an excerpted statement from one may seem when confronted by an isolated statement from another—may in fact be alternative and complementary procedures for carrying out the critic's job of work, with each theory yielding its own distinctive insights into the properties and relations of poems. Criticism without a theoretical understructure (whether this is developed explicitly or brought in merely as occasion demands) is made up largely of desultory impressions and of unsorted concepts which are supposedly given by "common sense," but are in fact a heritage from earlier critics, in whose writings they may have implicated a whole theoretical system. And the history of criticism at the hands of its masters, from Aristotle through Coleridge to T. S. Eliot, testifies that the applied criticism which the impressionists and philosophical analysts applauded has been neither impressionistic nor ad hoc, but most telling when grounded on the general principles, concepts, and reasoning which constitute precisely what we mean by a theory of poetry.

D. Masson, "Theories of Poetry," Essays Biographical and Crit. (1856); J. E. Spingarn, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the Renaissance (1899); Saintsbury; Gayley and Kurtz; Bray; J. W. H. Atkins, Lit. Crit. in Antiquity (2 v., 1934) and Eng. Lit. Crit., I, The Medieval Phase (1943); II, The Renaissance (1947); III, The 17th and 18th C. (1951); Patterson; M. T. Herrick, The Fusion of Horatian and Aristotelian Lit. Crit., 1531-1555 (1946); S. C. Pepper, The Basis of Crit. in the Arts (1946); S. E. Hyman, The Armed Vision (1948); Wellek and Warren; Crane, Critics; M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Crit. Tradition (1953; includes an expanded treatment of much of the material in this article); Crane; Wellek; J. P. Pritchard, Crit. in America (1956); Wimsatt and Brooks; B. Markwardt, Gesch. der deutschen Poetik (in 6 v., 4 v. completed, 1937-61); B. Weinberg, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the It. Renaissance (2 v., 1961); R. Foster, The New Romantics, a Reappraisal of the New Crit. (1962); B. Hathaway, The Age of Crit., the Late Renaissance in Italy (1962); Sutton, Modern Am. Crit.; R. Wellek, Concepts of Crit., ed. S. G. Nichols (1963).

CONVENIENT ANTHOLOGIES OF POETIC THEORY: Crit. Essays of the 17th C., ed. J. S. Spingarn (3 v., 1908-9); Crit. Essays of the 18th C., ed. W. H. Durham (1915); Eng. Crit. Essays, 19th C., ed. E. D. Jones (1916); Kunstanschauung der Frühromantik, ed. A. Müller (1931); Elizabethan Crit. Essays, ed. G. G. Smith (2 v., 1937); Lit. Crit. Plato to Dryden, ed. A. H. Gilbert (1940); Lit. Crit. Pope to Croce, ed. G. W. Allen and H. H. Clark (1941); Crit.: The Major Texts, ed. W. J. Bate (1948); Critiques and Essays in Crit., 1920-1948, ed. R. W. Stallman (1949); Crit. Prefaces of the Fr. Renaissance, ed. B. Weinberg (1950); Lit. Opinion in America, ed. M. D. Zabel (1951); The Achievement of Am. Crit., ed. C. A. Brown (1954); Modern Lit. Crit., ed. I. Howe (1958); The Continental Model, Selected Fr. Crit. Essays of the 17th C. in Eng. Tr., ed. S. Elledge and D. S. Schier (1960); 18th-C. Crit. Essays, ed. S. Elledge (2 v., 1961); Modern Fr. Poets on Poetry, an Anthol., ed. R. Gibson (1961).

See also: W. J. Bate, From Classic to Romantic (1946); Krieger; Frye.—Modern Continental Lit. Crit., ed. O. B. Hardison, Jr. (1962); Modern Crit. in Theory and Practice, ed. W. Sutton and R. Foster (1963). M.H.A.

POETRY AND FINE ARTS. See FINE ARTS AND POETRY. POETRY AND HISTORY. See HISTORY AND POETRY. POETRY AND KNOWLEDGE. See SCIENCE AND POETRY; MEANING, PROBLEM OF; POETRY, THEORIES OF (OBJECTIVE THEORIES); CRITICISM, FUNCTION OF (COGNITIVE THEORIES). POETRY AND MUSIC. See MUSIC AND POETRY. POETRY AND PHILOSOPHY. See PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY. POETRY AND RELIGION. See RELIGION AND POETRY. POETRY AND SCIENCE. See SCIENCE AND POETRY. POETRY AND SEMANTICS. See SEMANTICS AND POETRY. POETRY AND SOCIETY. See SOCIETY AND POETRY. POETRY AND TRUTH. See BELIEF, PROBLEM OF; MEANING, PROBLEM OF; CRITICISM, FUNCTION OF (COGNITIVE THEORIES).†

POLISH POETRY has its beginnings in the 12th c. with a religious hymn Bogurodzica dziewica (Mother of God and Virgin) which far surpasses anything else produced in Poland during the Middle Ages. It contains in its two oldest stanzas a plea to the Holy Virgin and to Christ. The style is sublime, simple, and expressive. The rhythmic structure is elaborate, the lines of varying length are two- or three-partite; rhyme is used both at the end of the line and internally. Analogies with medieval L. and Gr. hymns are discernible. During the 14th c. poetry of a religious character still prevailed. Among the works which have been preserved is Pieśń o Męce Pańskiej (Passion Song), the first work written in 13-syllable lines with a regular caesura after the seventh syllable. By the 15th c. we have both religious and secular lyrics but no epic poetry to speak of. In general, these poems do not yet constitute artistic wholes, but they do frequently contain sincere and moving passages. Among lyric poems should be mentioned Żoltarz Jezusów (Psalter of Jesus), whose structure is mostly syllabic bi-partite with the caesura after the seventh syllable, numerous Lenten and Easter songs, Christmas carols, etc. One of the few religious poems is the Legenda o św. Aleksym (Legend of St. Alexis), based, however, on foreign sources. Secular love poetry is represented by several poems, but in this century it still is relatively poor. In general, Pol. poetry of the Middle Ages is thematically original only in part, shows a variety of metrical structure (between 5 and 13 syllables to a line) with a tendency to asymmetric lines and "grammatical" rhymes, often imperfect.

Humanism penetrated into Poland in the second half of the 15th c. and subsequently played a major role in Pol. intellectual life and literature. L. became the second language of the gentry both in writing and speaking, and L. antiquity absorbed them as much as their own past. By the middle of the 16th c. humanism had become a Pol. national trend. Outstanding poets and prose writers began to write exclusively or mainly in Pol. The "Golden Age" of Pol. literature came into being. The forerunner of this flourishing age was Nicholas Rey (1505-69), whose literary merit lies in prose. His poetry, imbued with didacticism, lacks creative imagination; his language is often clumsy and prosaic, although colorful and expressive. But he wrote exclusively in Pol., did original work reflecting contemporary Pol. life and considered literature his vocation. Among his poetic works are: Krótka rozprawa... (Short Discourse Between Three Persons..., 1543), which is a satire on the clergy and gentry, and Wizerunek... (The Portrait), a moral-didactic poem. Rey shows considerable invention in metric patterns; besides 8-, 10-, and 13-syllable lines we find such unusual structures as 14 and 15 syllables. Rhymes still have a primitive character with "grammatical" rhymes prevailing.

The glory of the 16th c. is Jan Kochanowski (1530-86), the greatest poet of the whole Slavic world at the time. An accomplished humanist, educated in Italy and France, he formed his "literary program" in accordance with the Fr. Pléiade and created a Pol. poetry imbued with the spirit of the ancients. Thanks to him, poetry in Poland became humanistic and national, ridding itself of medieval and early 16th-c. didacticism. Kochanowski was first of all an artist who sang "for himself and the Muses." Poetic genres cultivated by him are those known in ancient and classical literature: Anacreontic Fraszki (Trifles), Horatian Pieśni (Songs), Satyry (Satires), Treny (Threnodies), a tragedy in verse Odprowa posłów greckich (The Dismissal of the Greek Envoys), some epic poems, and a magnificent adaptation Psalterz Dawidów (The Psalter). All these genres acquire in his work a highly original character.

† In Supplement, see also POETRY AND THE OTHER ARTS; POLITICS AND POETRY; PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY.

His "poetic world" is a world of deep universal feelings and thoughts; it reveals a balanced, humanistic mind, broad literary and artistic culture, and a noble and refined morality. His language is the tongue of the educated Pole raised to poetic dignity by new values of cadence, meaning, and suggestiveness. It is always "classical," lucid, and noble without exaggerated neologisms, but also without the commonplace and prosaic expressions still so frequent in Rey. Of fundamental importance is Kochanowski's merit in the field of versification. He established syllabic verse and the uniform full rhyme, and laid the foundation for the Pol. prosodic system. Kochanowski's lyric poetry influenced a number of poets both in the 16th c. and later. Among his contemporaries the most original and independent of his "pupils" was Mikołaj Sep Szarzyński (1550–81), author of the collection Rytmu albo wiersze polskie (Pol. Rhythms or Verses). They contain love poems, reflective, historical, and religious poems, some of them in sonnet form. In the first half of the 17th c. we also have outstanding humanist poets: Mateusz Sarbiewski (1595–1640) who was known abroad as "the Christian Horace" for his L. odes and Szymon Szymonowicz (1558–1629) whose L. works also won him fame abroad. Among Szymonowicz's Pol. poems the finest are his Sielanki (Eclogues), some of which are indeed original and based on Pol. motifs.

The poetic production of the second half of the 17th c. is predominantly baroque in style. In this field Poland has a distinguished pupil of the It. poet Marino in Andrzej Morsztyn (1613–93), author of two collections of poems, Kanikuła albo psia gwiazda (Caniculus or the Dog Star), and Lutnia (The Lute). He excelled in brief compact forms, elaborate verbal combinations, striking comparisons and contrasts in depicting love and its nuances. There is also another, more local alloy of this baroque trend, characterized by a falling away from classical traditions in literary genres, careful structure, clear and noble style, strict versification. In the language, artificial loftiness is speckled with colloquialisms, even vulgarity, and Pol. with L.; complicated poetical figures and images, syntactic inversions, extravagant rhymes abound. One of the most popular genres was the historical epic; immense poems of 12,000 or more lines were written, attempting historical authenticity with little room for creative imagination. Such is the Wojna chocimska (War of Chocim), by Wacław Potocki (1625–96) and the Wojna domowa (Civil War) by Samuel Twardowski (1600–60). Another popular form was the collection of short poems, reflecting the life of the Pol. gentry in its various manifestations: Potocki's original Moralia and Ogród (The Garden) and Wespazjan Kochowski's (1633–1700) Niepróżnujące próżnowanie (Unleisurely Leisure). Baroque-pastoral poetry is represented by Twardowski's dramatic idyll Daphnis w drzewo bobkowe przemieniła się (Daphne Transformed into a Bay Tree), and also by a volume of love songs, Roxolanki (The Ruthenian Maidens), a work by Szymon Zimorowicz (1609–29), full of charm in depicting all the vicissitudes of love. Zimorowicz's style is close to that of Kochanowski, but his versification is quite original, having varied rhythmical patterns, lines of various length and internal rhymes. There were also some works of a satirical bent.

The first half of the 18th c. marks a decline in Pol. poetry; only a few works stand out above mediocrity. But the second half of the century witnesses a considerable renaissance of intellectual life, including poetry. It is the period of Enlightenment influenced by Fr. literature and culture. Neoclassicism predominates; style again becomes pure, poetic images precise, structure careful; strict discipline in verse, rhythm, and rhyme is restored; mixing of different poetic genres is abandoned. Fables, parables, satires, epics and mock epics, epistles, descriptive poems, anacreontics, odes, eclogues, and occasional poems are the main genres cultivated. The old Horatian maxim of amusing and instructing through poetry triumphs without making poetic works artistically inferior.

The most representative poet of the period, and the greatest after Kochanowski, is Bishop Ignacy Krasicki (1735–1801). He wrote in most of the aforementioned genres and left true masterpieces in many of them. This applies especially to his fables and satires. The fables (two collections: 1779 and 1802) are, of course, in the traditional style (Phedrus, Lessing, and La Fontaine), but highly original in transforming known motifs in new forms. The compactness of their structure reaches its summit in 4-line fables presenting the essence of both characters and actions. The rhythmic pattern is either uniform (many 13-syllable lines) or varied; there are examples of syllabo-tonic structures, the caesura is strict, the rhyme full. His Satires (part 1 in 1799) are masterpieces of characterization, observation, subtle humor and wit. Among his mock epics the most amusing is Monachomachia (1778) directed by this talented bishop against the ignorance, laziness and drunkenness of monks. Of similar significance, although of much smaller output, is the work of Stanisław Trembecki (1735–1812). He also wrote fables, epistles, anacreontics (among them "obsecanas"), and descriptive poems. His fables are different from those of Krasicki in that they are generally longer and more elaborate in their treatment of known motifs. Another characteristic is that he does not shrink from using forceful and picturesque expressions drawn from everyday speech or from the peasant language. His imagination delights alike in strong and exuberant as well as subtle and refined phenomena.

Classicist sentimentalism expressed itself mostly in lyrics and eclogues. The finest love poems of the century were written by Franciszek Dionizy Kniaźnin (1750-1807), the most popular eclogues by Franciszek Karpiński (1741-1825). Neoclassicism in quite rigid form extended into the first decades of the 19th c. The main poets of this period are Kajetan Koźmian (1778-1856), Ludwik Osiński (1775-1838), Alojzy Feliński (1771-1820), and others. A variegated poetic activity, however, was developed by Julian Ursyn Niemcewicz (1757-1841). The kind of ballads he wrote linked with the incipient period of romanticism. There were other signs indicating a change in the literary atmosphere. The catastrophe of Poland's partition raised the emotional intensity of some poets, their religious and patriotic feelings and metaphysical longings (J. P. Woronicz). New trends penetrated into Poland from western Europe from the writings of Jean Jacques Rousseau, Chateaubriand, Klopstock, Lessing, Macpherson, Herder, Walter Scott and others.

The romantic period of Pol. poetry begins in 1822, the date of the publication of the first volume of poems by Adam Mickiewicz (1798-1855). He at once attained a position of leadership in the movement and subsequently made Pol. poetry of first importance among the Slavs. Between 1822 and 1830 he published a series of ballads which are on a level with those of Schiller and Goethe; two tales in verse, of which one (Grażyna) possesses a half-classical, and the other (Konrad Wallenrod) a highly Byronic character; two parts of a fantastic drama Dziady (Forefathers' Eve) combining folklore motifs with those of a "mad" romantic love; his masterpiece of this period, the Sonety Krymskie (Crimean Sonnets), marvels of descriptive lyricism; and a number of other lyrics among which religious poems occupy an important place. The importance of the majority of these works lies in the fact that they created genuinely Pol. romantic poetry in a language and verse that is in many respects unsurpassed. Mickiewicz's language has a truly classical clarity and conciseness even in his most romantic "flights." Artfully simple, it attains the highest poetic art by the infallible choice and placement of words and expressions and by endowing them with a new meaning. His versification enhances this quality; without ceasing to be traditional, it is highly original. Syllabic and syllabo-tonic meter is used, but there is immense variety in its adaptation to various rhythmic patterns and in the distribution of accents. In Konrad Wallenrod alone the poet uses 5- to 13-syllable lines and creates the "Pol. hexameter" composed of 6 feet. Besides Mickiewicz, the first period of the Pol. "romantic school" includes several other young poets writing in a similar vein and cultivating similar genres (J. Słowacki, A. Malczewski, S. Goszczyński, B. Zaleski).

The second period begins after 1831 when the defeat of the insurrection against Czarist Russia caused the Pol. intellectual élite to emigrate, mostly to France, where they established the "headquarters" of Pol. poetry. Mickiewicz still dominates the scene. With his Dziady (Forefathers' Eve) part III, 1832, prized by George Sand above Faust and Manfred, he sets the tone for a new poetry imbued with patriotic and messianic elements and at the same time distinguished by an immense richness of styles, moods, and metrical forms. Mickiewicz' genius is revealed even more in an entirely different work: Pan Tadeusz (1834). An epos of the Pol. nation and the Pol. countryside presented against the background of the Napoleonic Wars (1812), it treats with Homeric care both great and small subjects, developing a multiform plot. The poetic language here reaches its summit of clarity and force; the meter is the traditional Pol. 13-syllable line with the caesura after the seventh syllable, modulated by varying main and secondary stresses:

Litwo! Ojczyzna moja! ty jesteś jak zdrowie;
Ile cię trzeba cenić, ten tylko się dowie.
Kto cię stracił. Dziś piękność twą w całej ozdobie

Widzę i opisuję, bo tęsknię po tobie.

Lithuania, my country, you are like health:
how much you should be prized only he can learn who has lost you. Today your beauty in all its splendor
I see and describe, for I yearn for you.

Mickiewicz in exile shares the sceptre of poetry with three other poets: Juliusz Słowacki (1809-49), Zygmunt Krasiński (1812-59), and Cyprian Norwid (1821-83). Słowacki is the creator of the modern Pol. drama; his works embrace a rich variety of dramatic forms: the romantic-patriotic (Kordian), the romantic-legendary, the romantic-Greek (Lilla Weneda), the historic, the "realistic" (Horsztyński), the mystic (Ksiądz Marek—Father Marek) and an "antiromantic" comedy (Fantazy). In some of his late dramas, unfortunately unfinished (e.g., Samuel Zborowski), he went far beyond romanticism, realism, and even symbolism, approaching the modern antirealistic theater. He is also the author of tales in verse (Podróż do Ziemi Świętej—Journey to the Holy Land; Beniowski) and of over a hundred lyric poems, among them a number of masterpieces. His tour de force was his last (unfinished) poem, Król Duch (King Spirit), a unique combination of lyric and quasi-epic elements in an attempt to give a vision of the history of Poland conceived as the inner experience of a spirit incarnating the nation's soul. Słowacki's poetic art is romantic to the highest degree and at the same time outstrips romanticism and approaches symbolism and "surrealism." His language, far from Mickiewicz' simplicity, is unusual "by birth," full of ingenious and bold inventiveness, of amazing virtuosity in fusing sounds, colors and lights in images far more intense than the phenomena of reality. His metric forms range from 2-syllable to 15-syllable lines in numerous structural combinations, many of them entirely new, as, for instance, tonic lines which became common in Pol. poetry only much later. Equally rich and varied are his rhymes.

Of Zygmunt Krasiński's literary works those of the most lasting value are his visionary dramas, Nie-Boska Komedia (The Undivine Comedy) and Irydion. However, in lyric poetry as well, Krasiński occupied a position of importance and influence. His longer poem Przedświt (Pre-Dawn) and his Psalmy przyszłości (Psalms of the Future)—although there is more philosophy than lyricism in them—are a significant chapter in the development of the Messianistic trend in Pol. poetry. C. K. Norwid was one of the most original of all Pol. poets, self-inspired and independent of influences. His poetic world revolved around the most important problems of humanity, history, culture, and art. He expressed them in a wealth of forms: lyrics, epic poems, tragedies and comedies, aesthetical dialogues and tales. Lyric poems occupy the highest place among these genres. They are unique in objectivization and universalization of observations and experiences.

Norwid's devices are condensed to the utmost in grasping the essence of cultural processes and of great men (Socrates, Napoleon, Mickiewicz, Chopin, and others). They are no less successful in giving far-reaching perspectives to apparently average phenomena. Norwid's language is highly individual, elaborate, difficult, sometimes obscure in forging new expressions, but always forceful. His versification, e.g., his Bema pamięci rapsod żałobny (Funeral Rhapsody to the Memory of General Bem) is as rich as that of Słowacki.

Poets of this period who remained in Poland, cultivated patriotic and religious poetry (K. Ujejski) and various forms of lyrics and folk songs (T. Lenartowicz and K. Brzozowski).

The reaction against romanticism in the second half of the 19th c.—the epoch of "positivism" in Poland when prose predominated—found expression, too, in the poetry of Adam Asnyk (1838–97) and Maria Konopnicka (1842–1910).

The very end of the 19th c. and the beginning of the 20th c. brought a new trend in literature called "Young Poland." It was, in turn, a reaction against positivism and realism partly influenced by Fr. and Belgian symbolism and German "modernism." The trend begins with the poetry of Kazimierz Tetmajer (1865–1940), who is the most characteristic representative of "decadence" with its pessimism, agnosticism, cynicism, strong sensuality and hatred for bourgeois culture. Some of these attitudes appear also in the greatest poet of this period, Jan Kasprówicz (1860–1926), but through periods of Prometheanism, inner struggle, and religious crisis he develops to a serene acceptance of the world and its destinies. His verse, first oscillating between syllabo-tonic and tonic meter, finally takes the form of pure "tonism" which from this period on is the usual rhythmic pattern of Pol. poetry. Still bolder in introducing even definite irregularities, is the tonic versification of the leading dramatist of the period, Stanisław Wyspiański (1869–1907), a poet and painter of powerful imagination. The new drama he created combines elements of Gr. and Shakespearean tragedy, the romantic drama and the Pol. folk play. Gr. themes are treated in an original way, giving them a modern application, which is also the main motif of dramas dealing with the Pol. past and present. To his masterpieces belong Noc listopadowa (November Night), an impressive dramatic vision of the first night of the Pol. insurrection of 1830, where historical and fictitious characters mingle with mythological figures, and Wesele (The Wedding, 1901), a strong indictment of contemporary Pol. society attained by means of a "puppet" technique and fusing the world of men with that of ghosts.

To the younger generation belonged Leopold Staff (1878–1957), author of numerous volumes of lyrics. He broke with "decadence," shaping his manly, positive world-outlook in a rich variety of structure and versification. His work shows a classical command over his poetic material and an ability to crystallize it into concise objective images.

The twenty years of politically independent Poland (1918–1939) brought an important change in poetry. The "Skamandrites" (so-called after their organ Skamander), who dominated the literary scene during the first decade, felt free of any "duty" imposed by the nation or society; they wished to be "the poets of today" and to write the best verses possible. They enriched the language with urban and colloquial elements (like the It. and Rus. futurists) and with new and often startling images and metaphors. Their versification, without abandoning traditional syllabism and syllabo-tonism, held to the tonic line, becoming more complex and freer in rhythmic structure, rhymes, and assonances. To the outstanding representatives of this group characterized by the above common traits, but very divergent as individualities, belong: Julian Tuwim (1894–1954) distinguished by an unusual eruptive force of lyricism, mastery of language, and most daring, powerful, imaginative experiments in structure and versification; Antoni Słonimski (1895–) characterized by concentration, self-possession, discursive and rhetorical elements; Jan Lechoń (pseudonym of Leszek Serafinowicz, 1899–1956) the most “classical” and academic of the group in language and verse; Kazimierz Wierzyński (1894–), best known, perhaps, for his poems praising athletics and sport, but also for his serious reflective lyrics of perfect artistic balance; and Jarosław Iwaszkiewicz (1894–). More loosely affiliated with the Skamander group are: Kazimiera Iłakowicz (1892–), highly original in imagination and “free” versification; Maria Pawlikowska (1895–1945) a master of brief, concise, epigrammatic forms; Władysław Broniewski (1889–1962) conservative but powerful in language and metric forms, revolutionary in social outlook; Józef Wittlin (1896–), author of inspiring Hymny (Hymns) and Stanisław Baliński (1899–), a sensitive lyric poet of deep patriotic tones. A more radical program advocated by the “avant-garde” group (Julian Przyboś, Czesław Miłosz, Adam Ważyk, Józef Czechowicz, K. I. Gałczyński, and others) was linked with futurism, expressionism, and surrealism. It was opposed to the “Skamander,” and preached dismissal of traditional poetic language and versification. Since World War II some of these poets have worked in exile, others in the homeland. The younger postwar generation, including several gifted poets, tries to be lyrical and express the “new reality” of its country mostly in forms closer to the avant-garde than to the Skamandrite school. The most interesting and characteristic in this respect are the works of such authors as T. Różewicz, R. Bratny, S. Bieńkowski. The war experience of the young generation is perhaps best expressed in the works of T. Gajcy, Z. Stroiński (both killed in 1944) and K. Baczyński. Poets most freely experimenting with verse and even semantics are: M. Białoszewski, J. Harasymowicz, I. Iredyński, S. Grochowiak, W. Symborska.

ANTHOLOGIES: Polnische Klänge, ed. L. Kop-pens (1922); Moderne polnische Lyrik, ed. L. Scherlag (1923); Les Grands poètes polonais, ed. W. Bugiel (1927); Od Kochanowskiego do Staffa. Antologia liryki polskiej, ed. W. Borowy (1930); Antologia della poesia contemporanea polacca, ed. S. Can and O. Skarbak-Tluchowski (1931); Lirici della Polonia d'oggi, ed. M. and M. Bersano-Begey (1933); A Golden Treasury of Pol. Lyrics, ed. W. Kirkconnel (1936); Poètes polonais, ed. P. Seghers (1949); Anthol. of Pol. Poetry, ed. M. Kridl (1957); Five Centuries of Pol. Poetry, 1450–1950, ed. and tr. J. Pieterkiewicz and B. Singer (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: I. Chrzanowski, Historja literatury niepodległej Polski (many ed.); K. Wójcicki, Stylistyka i rytmika polska (1919); J. Łoś, Wiersze polskie w ich dziejowym rozwoju (1920); J. Kleiner, Juljusz Słowacki (4 v., 1923–27); R. Pilat, Historja literatury polskiej (1926); J. Krzyżanowski, Pol. Romantic Lit. (1930); J. Langlade, Jean Kochanowski (Paris, 1932); B. Chlebowski, La Litt. polonaise au XIXe s. (1933); K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej (3 v., 1934–36); “Dzieje literatury pięknej,” Encyklopedia polska (1935–36); K. W. Zawodziński, Zarys wersyfikacji polskiej (1936); F. Siedlecki, Studia z metryki polskiej (2 v., 1937); K. Wójcicki, Rytm w liczbach (1938); J. Krzyżanowski, Od średniowiecza do baroku (1938); K. Budzyk, Stylistyka teoretyczna w Polsce (1946); S. Furmanik, Podstawy wersyfikacji polskiej (1947); S. Szuman, O Kunście i istocie poezji lirycznej (1948); W. Borowy, O poezji polskiej wieku XVIII (1948); J. Kleiner, Adam Mickiewicz (2 v., 1948); M. R. Mayenowa, Poetyka opisowa (1949); M. Dłuska, Studia z historii i teorii wersyfikacji polskiej (2 v., 1948–50); S. Łempicki, Renesans i humanizm (1951); A. Ważyk, Mickiewicz i wersyfikacja narodowa (1951); Adam Mickiewicz, A Symposium, ed. M. Kridl (1951); J. Krzyżanowski, Historja literatury polskiej. Od średniowiecza do XIX wieku (1953); K. Budzyk, Z dziejów Renesansu w Polsce (1953); K. W. Zawodziński, Studia z wersyfikacji polskiej (1954); W. Weintraub, The Poetry of Adam Mickiewicz (1954); Z. Folejewski, Studies in Modern Slavic Poetry (1955); Adam Mickiewicz in World Lit., ed. W. Lednicki (1956); M. Kridl, A Survey of Pol. Lit. and Culture (1956); Poetyka: Zarys encyklopedyczny, III. Wersyfikacja, ed. M. R. Mayenowa (1955–); K. Wyka, Rzecz wyobraźni (1959); W. Borowy, O Norwidzie (1960); M. Dłuska, Próba teorii wiersza polskiego (1962).

M.K.; Z.F.

The death of Professor Manfred Kridl left the editors with only the first draft of the article on Pol. poetry. In his function as co-author of this article, Professor Folejewski has sought to preserve as much as possible the original plan as outlined by Professor Kridl.

(Ed.)

POLISH PROSODY. See SLAVIC PROSODY.

POLYNESIAN POETRY. Poetry is integral to a Polynesian in his personal life from birth to death and in assemblies for organized entertainment or ceremonies of communal benefit. The value given to artful manipulation of language ensured that any individual, regardless of sex, age, or social position at birth, whether he lived in a large, populous, class-structured archipelago or a small, barren, informally organized atoll, could win social and material rewards through talent in memorizing and chanting old rhythmic formulas to control supernatural forces or in composing new songs or revising the ancient to fit new occasions. Cultural changes following European discovery of this originally nonliterate area have not destroyed native appreciation of creative verbalization nor imitation of established rhythmic models.

Cultural and linguistic homogeneity is sufficiently marked, despite inter-island diversity, to designate Polynesia a distinctive culture area of the Pacific, extending south of the Tropic of Cancer and except for New Zealand and Ellice Islands east of the 180th meridian. Westward in Melanesia and Micronesia are scattered Polyn. enclaves. Northernmost in Polynesia is the Hawaiian Islands, now the fiftieth state of the United States; the old native culture and language, including the style and content of narrative art, show it unquestionably related to the rest of Polynesia.

Poetry is inseparably entwined with ritual acts and dances to maintain traditional knowledge and to harmonize man with innumerable divine beings who ranged from departmentalized, creative gods to personal guardian spirits and with the latent impersonal supernatural force (mana) found throughout the universe and in varying degrees in human beings.

The Hawaiian Kumulipo (Source of Profundity) exemplifies a complex genealogical prayer chant (a genre called ku'auhau, pathway-lineage). It belonged to the family of Kalakaua and his sister Liliuokalani, 19th-c. rulers of the Hawaiian monarchy established after European discovery when their relative Kamehameha I conquered and politically united the archipelago. The Kumulipo may have been the temple prayer (pule heiau) recited, in some parts by one priest and in others by two priests in concert, during the ceremony for Captain James Cook, presumably to consecrate him as the god Lono returned to Hawaii.

Its more than 2,000 words, half of which are genealogical pairs, were a magical charm to vivify the mana in the individual, usually a first-born child, whose genealogy it was. Each name conducted power, like an electrical charge, and glorified the child's kinship to earthly ancestors and to those among demigods, gods, and parent-pairs symbolic of phenomena evolving during genesis, first in the era of primeval darkness and then in the era of light. The individual becomes one with the universe and its divine principle as priests intone strongly, clearly, with carefully controlled breathing and stylized vibrations of tones, the words, in which a single error or hesitation destroys the power. Compositional mechanics serving mnemonic, magical, and aesthetic needs, include quick, mental word associations based on identities and antitheses running in groups, often with the last word or syllable suggesting the name heading the next group. The family's master poet (haku mele) with assistants incorporated allusive phrases and adjectives about ancestral deeds to shape a poetic encyclopedia of philosophy, cosmogony, and family tradition for the individual setting forth on the winding pathway of his lineage. An inner meaning (haona) is that the cosmogonic beginnings are analogous to the sacred child's conception and birth.

Although Liliuokalani credited the poem to the poet Keaulumoku and dated it as A.D. 1700, more than likely it was only the last revision of an ancient composition, because, except for the more recent genealogy, much of the content as well as the style, is widely distributed in Polynesia as part of the shared traditional art of the area.

The following lines illustrate ancient poetic style although the version of the Hawaiian creation chant in which they occur was recorded in the mid-19th c., the time of the monarchy, by educated, Christianized Hawaiians who apparently reinterpreted the events in the light of their Biblical knowledge. These lines tell of the rising waters of the flood sent by the god Kane to destroy evil mankind.

E ala, e ka ua, e ka la, e ka po,
E kaiko'o, e ka pohu,
E ka ohu kolo i uka,
E ka ohu kolo i kai,
Kai wahine, kai tane, e,
Kai pupule, kai ulala,
Kai pili'aiku,
Ua puni ho'i na moku i ka wai.

Awake, O rain, O sun, O night,
O rough sea, O calm sea,
O mists creeping inland,
O mists creeping seaward,
O feminine sea, masculine sea,
Mad sea, delirious sea,
Surrounding sea!

The islands are surrounded by the sea!

(Moolelo o Hawaii. Ms. by S. M. Kamakau, tr. by M. W. Beckwith and M. K. Pukui.)

Anyone might compose a favorite Hawaiian form, the "name chant," to honor another person, and have it performed at the graduation ceremony of a hula troupe, trained in a school where it observed taboos to ensure concentration and dedication to gods of the art. Special schools for secular and religious knowledge, with emphasis on learning chants, existed in many archipelagoes. Young people also learned as members of informal troupes of traveling entertainers or in choruses required in religious ceremonies. Entrepreneurs, often poets themselves, men or women, were employed by families wishing to hold a festival to commemorate the dead or honor the living. Entrepreneurs with fellow poets composed and assembled chants, determined the rhythms and dances for their performance, and coordinated their preparations with the craftsmen and farmers who had their special duties for the festival. Chant specialists became a distinctive, well-paid, honored class in many islands. Marquesan tribes had master chanters, really masters of ceremonies, who alone could recite the initial parts of cosmogonic chants, essential to the completion of any important production, whether house or canoe, in order to link new creation with old. Craftsmen, whose knowledge of chants connected with their work was as important as their manual skill, knew the less sacred portions.

Insulting chants were often institutionalized. Rival bards engaged in traditional contests to exhibit their learning and skill and to mock their competitors. Audiences took sides, shouting belittling songs at each other and eulogies to their poets. In Pukapuka, three villages traditionally faced each other before the entire population for one whole day in a festival period to chant and dance insulting chants, some old, some new, until aggression was spent and competitors fell into each other's arms.

Everywhere women participated in composing and presenting poems, but fear of the magic of their sex excluded them from the most sacred ceremonies. No woman could be a master chanter in the Marquesas. Hawaiian poets, male and female, ascribed to Hiiaka, younger sister of the volcano goddess Pele, many of their own poems. Hiiaka, traveling through the archipelago on a mission for Pele, poured her lyric talent, so the tradition goes, into poems about her moods, her adventures, the people she met, the landscape, and the weather. In New Zealand, women's poems kept alive the memory of old insults in order to incite men to take revenge.

Objective analysis of Polyn. poetic style in terms of its own language and culture has scarcely begun. Finding a hundred different terms for poetic genres is easy in any archipelago. Defining with assurance the style and typical content of even one is impossible. Conscious organizational structure is apparent as in certain Manganian poems, each with an introduction, a foundation, offshoots, and a conclusion, and each poem for a festival fitted into a set of different but complementary genres. Meaning, the poets say, is important. Many poems have inner meanings but the key to the symbolism is held by the poet and his immediate circle. Meter when evident seems entirely accidental. Rhyming of final letters or syllables in phrases or lines is sometimes accidental too because of the character of the language and sometimes deliberate, especially in western Polynesia. Poets or entrepreneurs add meaningless vocables according to their inner ear's determination of which vocables are "good" in each instance. Poets have not formulated their standards and compositional mechanics in rules, nor do they seem able to verbalize on why certain phrases or lines are "good" and worth using generation after generation. It is much easier to compose a new poem than to explain the old.

Collections of texts of chants, most of them with translations and accompanying ethnographic discussion, appear in most of the ethnographical bulletins, special publications, and memoirs of the Bernice P. Bishop Museum (Honolulu) and in the journals and memoirs of the Polyn. Society (New Zealand). Bishop Museum publications of special interest include vols. iv, v, and vi of the Memoirs, and nos. 8, 9, 17, 29, 34, 46, 69, 95, 109, 127, 148, 157, and 183 of the Bulletins. Of Polyn. Society. Memoirs see especially v. iii and iv, and no. 1 in the Maori Texts series. A key to bibliog. on native narrative art is provided in "Survey of Research on Polyn. Prose and Poetry," by K. Luomala, JAF, 74 (1962).

See also W. W. Gill, Myths and Songs from the South Pacific (1876) and Historical Sketches of Savage Life in Polynesia; with Illustrative Clan Songs (1880); N. B. Emerson, Unwritten Lit. of Hawaii: Sacred Songs of the Hula (1909; Bureau of Am. Ethnology. Bulletin 38) and Pele and Hiiaka (1915); M. W. Pukui, "Songs (Meles) of Old Ka'u, Hawaii," JAF, 62 (1949); M. W. Beckwith, The Kumulipo, a Hawaiian Creation Chant (1951); S. H. Elbert, "Hawaiian Lit. Style and Culture," Am. Anthropologist, 53 (1951) and "Symbolism in Hawaiian Poetry," etc., 18 (1962); K. Luomala, Voices on the Wind, Polyn. Myths and Chants (1955). K.L.

POLYPHONIC PROSE. The name given by Amy Lowell to a form she invented; from a foundation in the "long, flowing cadence" of oratorical prose, it reaches over into "cadenced verse" (her term for vers libre) and even metrical verse. The emphasis is on "absolute adequacy of manner to thought"; the determining factors (which distinguished this poetic art form from prose) are "taste and a rhythmic ear." Miss Lowell conceived her form upon reading the versets (q.v.) of Paul Fort; but whereas Fort uses the alexandrine as theme for his formal variations, she found its Eng. equivalent, blank verse, so insistent as to make easy slipping into and out of it impossible. Yet "to depart satisfactorily from a rhythm it is first necessary to have it," and this, presumably, is where taste and the rhythmic ear come in. Miss Lowell finds the typographical arrangement of prose "far from perfect," but apologetically admits to not having evolved a better one. Amy Lowell's polyphonic prose appeared first in the volume Can Grande's Castle (1918), from whose preface the above quotations are taken. The form had a brief vogue and a few imitators; it differs little, actually, from poetic prose as practiced through the ages: every formal element of Can Grande's Castle was used more effectively by Lautréamont, for example, half a century earlier.—Norden (showing the ancientness of Miss Lowell's "invention"); A. Lowell, "Paul Fort," Six Fr. Poets (2d ed., 1916); A. Cherel, La Prose poétique française (1940; showing that any number of writers wrote "polyphonic prose" without knowing it); P. F. Baum, The Other Harmony of Prose (1952; a more recent discussion of rhythm in prose—polyphonic or otherwise). J.S.

POLYRHYTHMIC. A poem composed of lines having different kinds of metrical or rhythmic patterns. Pindar's odes frequently are of this order, as are Cowley's Odes in Eng. and modern free verse. Variety is emphasized rather than balance or repetition. R.A.H.

POLYSCHEMATIST (Gr. "of many forms"). Term applied, with respect to Gr. lyric verse, to an octosyllabic dimeter in which each of the first 4 syllables may be either long (with resolution [q.v.] as a later development) or short, while the remaining 4 regularly form a choriamb (— — — —).—J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912). R.J.G.

POLYSYLLABIC RHYME. See MULTIPLE RHYME.

POLYSYNDETON (Gr. "much compounded"). The repetition of conjunctions; the opposite of asyndeton (q.v.), which is the omission of conjunctions; common in all kinds of poetry. Quintilian remarks that "The source of them [both figures] is the same, as they render what we say more vivacious and energetic, exhibiting an appearance of vehemence, and of passion bursting forth as it were time after time," citing to illustrate p.: "Both house, and household gods, and arms, and Amyclaeon dog, and quiver formed of Cretan make" ("Tectumque lareumque," etc.—Virgil, Georgics 3.344–45; Quintilian, 1st c. A.D., Institutes of Oratory 9.3.51–54). It should be observed that the effect of headlong momentum here illustrated is traceable to the repetitions as such only in cases where the last conjunction alone would be needed for a cool prose statement (the earlier ones thus calling attention to themselves) and that the recondite term p. had best be applied only to cases of this kind. By this rule it would be hard to find a true p. in Eng. involving any conjunction except "and" (e.g., in Sonnet 66 Shakespeare begins 10 of the 14 lines with "and"). Other repeated conjunctions, e.g., "or" or "nor" (as in the last of the Ten Commandments), being practically indispensable for mere clarity, convey in themselves no specially urgent effect. H.B.

PORSON'S LAW (or Porson's Canon). A rule of Gr. metric discovered by Richard Porson, an Eng. philologist (1759–1808), and explained in the supplement to the preface to his second edition of Euripides' Hecuba (1802): when a tragic trimeter (q.v.) or trochaic tetrameter catalectic (q.v.) ends in a cretic (q.v.) formed by one or more words, the syllable preceding the cretic is regularly short unless elision intervenes or unless the first syllable of the cretic is an enclitic which of course belongs metrically to the word before it (likewise a long proclitic monosyllable such as an article or preposition may stand before the final cretic word to which in fact it belongs). For example, Euripides' trimeter verse (Hecuba 343), which ends in prosōpon toumpalin (— — — — —), must be emended to read prosōpon empalin (— — — — —), in so far as the syllable preceding a final cretic (of one word)—e.g., empalin (— — —)—must be short (normally it is anapest [see SYLLABA ANCEPS]) if it is part of a polysyllabic word—e.g., prosōpon. In other words, P.L. is not applicable to a line which does not end with a true cretic. P.L. is no longer considered absolute, since exceptions to it have been found in many cases.—Euripidis tragoediae, ed. R. Porson 1 (1807); recension by J. Scholfield (2d ed., 1829) pp. 27ff.; K. Witte, "Porsons Gesetz," Hermes, 49 (1914); Hardie; L. Laurant, Manuel des études grecques et latines, III (1946); K. Rupprecht, Abriß der griechischen Verslehre (1949); "Metre, Gr.," Oxford Cl. Dict. (1949); Koster; J. Perret, "Un équivalent latin de la loi de Porson," Homages à Léon Herrmann (1961). R.A.S.

PORTUGUESE POETRY. Port. literature has its origins in the cantigas which arose in Galicia toward the end of the 12th c. In the earliest period Galician and Portuguese poetry cannot be satisfactorily separated (see GALICIAN POETRY). Gradually the center of gravity of this common poetry moves south with more and more identifiable Port. names among the trovadores (troubadours of upper classes), se-greiros (lower-born, paid composers), and jograis (minstrels or musicians of humble birth) represented in the three great cancioneiros (see CANTICA). Although these collections contain much monotonous verse revealing poverty of ideas and highly conventional vocabulary, there are poetic gems of clearly personal inspiration and technical perfection, especially among the cantigas de amigo based on indigenous folk cossantes rather than on Prov. types. Some of the better known Port. poets are Joan Zorro, Vasco Gil, Joan Soares Coelho, Airas Perez Vuitorm, Lourenço Jogral, King Diniz (1261-1325) with nearly 140 songs, and this king's natural sons Afonso Sanches and Pedro Conde de Barcelos. After the death of the most prolific of these poets, Diniz, the Galician and Port. languages gradually separate, as Castilian reduces Galician to the category of a patois, and the troubadoursque tradition declines.

PORTUGUESE POETRY

Much of the poetry written during the 15th c. is contained in the Cancioneiro Geral (General Songbook, 1516) published by Garcia de Resende (1470?-1536) with compositions by nearly 300 poets. This court poetry shows greater metrical variety and more sophisticated form than the Galician-Port. compilations. Sp. influence predominates—some poems are in this language. (Indeed, most Port. poets from this time until the 18th c. are bilingual.) Much space is devoted to such trivia as poetic competitions, collective poems on ladies, petty satire, and poetic glosses of more social or sociological than literary interest. There are, however, Garcia de Resende's Trovas on the death of Inês de Castro; João Roiz de Castelo Branco's Cantiga, partindo-se (Song on Parting); the satirical work of Alvaro de Brito Pestana; Duarte de Brito who reveals some It. influence; and poets who were to become famous later in the 16th c. One of these, Gil Vicente (1465?-1536?), the father of the Port. theater, included in his popular drama many a lyric passage, cantigas de amigo, and other songs of medieval and folk inspiration in Sp. as well as Port.

Although Resende's Cancioneiro already shows some Italianate influences, it was Francisco Sá de Miranda (ca. 1481-1558) who after his stay in Italy (1521-26) introduced into Portugal the sonnet, canzone, Dante's tercets and Ariosto's ottava rima and many Renaissance features that characterized the Quinhentistas (poets of the 1500's). Sá de Miranda was a painstaking craftsman but the moral tone and formal innovations of his work are more important than its artistic qualities. His friend Bernardim Ribeiro (1482-1552), author of a highly sentimental pastoral novel Menina e moça, favored bucolic poetry and wrote the first eclogues in Port. (Jano e Franco, etc.). This form was to be greatly exploited for the next century, perhaps most successfully in the longish Trovas de Crisfal by Cristóvão Falcão (1518-57?). The patriotic António Ferreira (1528-69), who boycotted Castilian, wrote a famous tragedy, A Castro, as well as superior sonnets, odes, and epistles in the classical mold but of little originality.

The Renaissance imitation of classical genres inspired Luis de Camões (ca. 1524-80), who not only wrote the greatest Virgilian epic of the Iberian Peninsula, Os Lusíadas, but is also the outstanding Port. lyric poet of all times. His canções and sonnets show a rare mastery of form and genuine inspiration:

Alma minha gentil que te partiste tam cedo desta vida descontente, repousa tu no céu eternamente,
e viva eu cá na terra sempre triste!

My sweet soul who departed so soon, discontent with this life, rest eternally in heaven and let me live always sad on this earth!

The Lusíads, in 10 ottava-rima cantos, is perhaps the most typically national of all epics. Although Vasco de Gama's memorable expedition to India (1497-98) represents the principal subject, the hero of the poem is not the great captain but rather the Port. people collectively. Historical events (the founding of the Port. kingdom, battle of Aljubarrota, death of Inês de Castro, etc.) and legendary ones (the "Twelve of England"), episodes from the voyage (the fictitious Island of Love) and, through prophecy, Lusitanian accomplishments of the 16th c. are all magnificently described. The mingling of pagan mythology and Christianity, prosaic lines, and abuse of classical allusions in this poem have been criticized, but they are amply compensated for by the grandeur of conception, wonderfully quotable lines, sincere Port. inspiration and patriotism, erudition, and reflections of the personal experiences of a very eventful life.

Other contemporaries still popular with anthologists are two brothers: Diogo Bernardes (ca. 1530-1605?) and Frei Agostinho da Cruz (1540-1619). The former had been chosen to write an epic on King Sebastian's Alcazar-Kebir expedition (1578), but after its disastrous outcome and his imprisonment he wrote religious verses and bucolic poems that show a sincere love for Port. nature in their descriptions of the Lima River. Frei Agostinho destroyed his profane verse but left behind in his hermitage some profoundly religious songs inspired by divine mysteries and the contemplation of nature and mankind.

The 17th c. could not but represent an anticlimax. Literarily its chief distinction lies in the great prose that contributed to the development of the modern Port. language. The poetry, much of which was collected in the 5-vol. A Fénix Renascida (1716-28), suffered from excesses inspired by Sp. Gongorism and culteranismo (see CULTISM). Francisco Rodrigues Lobo (1580?-1622), however, continued the Ribeiro tradition with simple, gentle yet colorful eclogues. Sórór Violante do Céu (1601-93), a Dominican nun, was much admired for her ingenious conceits combined with mystic fervor, occasionally in a somewhat incongruous fashion. Francisco Manuel de Melo (1608-66), a polygraph in both Castilian and Port., is better in prose, but has left eclogues and epistles of technical excellence. Throughout the century there were many epics of varying literary merit, but all overshadowed by Camões' work. Perhaps in no other country has such a large part of national poetic effort gone into the production of epics.

The best poetry of the 18th c., particularly from the second half, is produced by Arcadians who represented a rejection of the Sp. influence of the 17th c. in favor of Fr. neoclassicism. The poetry from this period that is still remembered owes its reputation more to style and philosophical content than to its lyrical qualities. Many of the poets belonged to the "Arcádia Lusitana" (or "Acad. Ulissiponense," from 1756) or the "Nova Arcádia" (from 1790). Each poet adopted the name of a shepherd celebrated in antiquity, and often such pseudonyms became better known than the real names. Pedro António Correia Garção (1724-72), the "Portuguese Boileau," is remembered for his reforms and certain elegant poems such as A cantata de Dido. Nicolau Tolentino de Almeida (1740-1811) is the principal satirical poet, while the mock heroic O hissope by his contemporary António Dinis da Cruz e Silva (1731-99) is favorably compared with Boileau's Le lutrin. The most personal love lyrics of the century were written by a poet claimed by both Portugal and Brazil, Tomás António Gonzaga (1744-1810). His Marília de Dirceu, a lyric exception among many volumes of moralizing neoclassic verse of the age, has enjoyed exceptional popularity as demonstrated by the great number of editions (probably second only to Camões). This is due not only to its melodiousness and sincerity, but also to the poet's romantic personal tragedy: his involvement in the Minas Conspiracy in Brazil (1789) and subsequent exile to Angola, which frustrated his love for "Marília." Among the New Arcadians, José Agostinho de Macedo (1761-1831) attracted much contemporary attention by his irregular life, bitterly polemic and philosophic verse, and his immodest attempt to improve upon Os Lusíadas. Much more important was Manuel Maria Barbosa du Bocage (1765-1805), a bohemian whose life has given rise to many piadas (anecdotes) but whose production includes, among much that is trivial, contentious, satirical, and improvised, many sonnets of a perfection to be found only in Camões and Antero de Quental.

A transition to romanticism is provided by Francisco Manuel do Nascimento (1734-1819), "Filinto Elísio," who had great technical perfection and was considered the greatest poet of his time. The purity of his language was not influenced by 40 years of residence in Paris (Lamartine dedicated to him an ode À un poète portugais exilé), but he did turn toward romanticism in vogue there, thus stimulating Almeida Garrett's interest in the new movement. The Port. were further introduced to some of the newer Northern European writers by Coimbra mathematics professor José Anastácio da Cunha (1744-87) and by the "Portuguese Mme de Staël," Leonor de Almeida (Marquesa de Alorna, 1750-1839), whose abundant original verse and translations were, however, known only to a limited circle during her lifetime.

Romanticism in Portugal borrowed many features from France and elsewhere but represents a less spectacular break with the 18th c. than in other countries. Politically, events in Portugal tended to make its proponents patriotic and liberal. The beginning of the movement is usually dated from 1825 with the publication of Camões, an epic on the neglect of genius, by João Batista da Silva Leitão de Almeida Garrett (1799-1854). Almeida Garrett's neoclassic background, as a disciple of Filinto Elísio, prevented him from falling into romantic excesses frequent in other literatures. He contributed to literary nationalism with his collection of ballads, Romanceiro (1843). His best lyric verse, inspired by a late love affair, is contained in Folhas caídas (Fallen Leaves, 1853), ardent, elegant poetry among the best love songs in the language. He is more restrained, more modern than many contemporaries. His influence is similar to that of Sá de Miranda and his position in Port. literature has been compared with that of Goethe in German literature. With his interest in the national past, his politically liberal enthusiasms, his great versatility and mastery of all genres, Almeida Garrett personifies Port. romanticism, which thus comes as close to being a one-man movement as is possible. Contrasting with him in personality and works, Alexandre Herculano (1810-77) wrote his best poetry in A harpa do crente (The Harp of the Believer, 1838), imbued with an austere, Christian spirit reflecting the seriousness of purpose of the author. Herculano, best known for his histories and historical novels, is a master of the language but tends to produce more prosaic poetry than Garrett.

A third important Romantic, António Feliciano de Castilho (1800-1875), remained more apart from the political struggles and agitation of the time because of his blindness. He, too, began as a neoclassic and possesses formal perfection with occasional glimpses of inspiration. Usually, however, he must substitute mastery of language and patient craftsmanship for imagination and sensibility. His translations are excellent in both versification and style but are often excessively free.

Many of the "ultra-romantics" collaborated in the journal O Trovador (1844-48) under the direction of João de Lemos (1819-89), who tended to emphasize form over content. Others wrote for O Novo Trovador (1851-56) under the inspiration of António Soares de Passos (1826-60). Soares de Passos, a translator of Ossian, is characterized by an emotive melancholy and morbid imagination. Raimundo de Bulhão Pato (1829-1912) spent many years on a long poem Paqueta (1866), which overly enthusiastic admirers have compared with Byron's Don Juan. Tomás António Ribeiro (1831-1901) is remembered for his patriotic D. Jaime (1862), which Castilho suggested might be substituted for Os Lusíadas in Port. schools! João de Deus (Ramos, 1830-96) combines some of the best features of the romantics with bourgeois sentiment and optimistic unselfishness. His effervescent Campo de flores (Field of Flowers, 1869, 1893) expresses best o amor português, fresh, chaste and simple love, described with the "vocabulary of a child and the syntax of a bird."

The reaction against Castilho, who had come to represent all that was trivial and traditional in romanticism, gave rise to the "Questão Coimbrã" (1865), a pamphlet war led by Antero de Quental (1842-91), Teófilo Braga (1843-1924), and other Coimbra students. Although they were interested in liberal political and philosophical ideas, they also were more fertile in genuine poetry. Antero's Sonetos are unique in Port. literature, presenting a diary of the poet's pessimism and his agonized struggle to attain a faith reconciling materialism and the spirit, a struggle that culminated in the poet's suicide. Teófilo Braga wrote verse illustrating his positivistic philosophy, but his principal merit lies more in his many literary studies and his compilations of canções populares and romances (folk songs and ballads). Afílio Manuel Guerra Junqueiro (1850-1923), reminiscent of Victor Hugo at times in his fiery rhetoric, attacks church and state in A velhice do Padre Eterno (The Old Age of the Eternal Father, 1885) and A Pátria (The Motherland, 1896), but shows some transition to symbolism in Os simples (1892) with episodes from the simple and virtuous life of country people. Also often iconoclastic and satirical, António Duarte Gomes Leal (1848-1921) has genial moments when he avoids the declamatory. José Joaquim Cesário Verde (1855-86) in the posthumous Livro de Cesário Verde has left a collection of increasing popularity. His chief quality is an adaptation of naturalism or realism to poetry, painting in concrete details the monotony of bourgeois life with some inclination to the unusual and grotesque.

Although literary schools, as can be observed above, tend to be less clear cut and rigid in Portugal than in other countries, António Cândido Gonçalves Crespo (1846-83), born in Brazil but Port. by education and residence, is clearly Parnassian. The clear, precise language, sculptural verses and rhythmic beauty of his Miniaturas (1870) and Nocturnos (1882) are outstanding. António Joaquim de Castro Feijó (1862?-1917), Parnassian in form, goes from irony to moving saudeade (nostalgic longing). His Cancioneiro chinês (Chinese Songbook, 1890) uses Fr. translations in order to adapt gracefully into Port. old Chinese lyrics. António Nobre (1867-1900) lived and published his Só (Alone, 1892) in Paris and was quite familiar with current literary movements there, but is intensely Port. in his introspective subjectivity. His personal suffering is communicated with gentle sensitiveness and almost morbid saudeade. Sebastianism, Port. folklore, a wealth of images, and metrical freedom lend to his work an enduring fascination. Fausto Guedes Teixeira (1872-1940) and Augusto Gil (1873-1929) may be compared in their tenderness and simple lyric qualities. José Duro (1873-99), however, tubercular like Cesário Verde and Nobre, gained notoriety with a work reminiscent of Baudelaire, Fel (Bile, 1898), full of despair and nostalgia inspired by a life that was ebbing away.

Some of the poets above display traits of Fr. symbolism, but usually Eugénio de Castro (1869-1944) is given credit for introducing this movement and Sp. Am. modernism to his fellow countrymen. Castro, who became the country's best known poet abroad, prefaced his manifesto to Oaristos (Intimate Dialogues, 1890). He advocated greater freedom of form, varied and often eccentric vocabulary, unusual rhymes, alliteration, and emphasis on the aesthetic and sensual rather than the social uses of poetry. Beginning as a refined and aristocratic poet for the élite, in Horas (1891), Salomé e outros poemas (1896), etc., he later became more restrained and national in such works as Depois da ceifa (After the Harvest, 1901) and Constança (1900). Camilo Pessanha (1867-1926) wrote the delicate, Symbolistic Clépsidra (1920) and was enabled by his long residence in Macao to translate Chinese poetry.

Afonso Lopes Vieira (1878-1946), an admirer of João de Deus and the Port. classics, was not greatly influenced by current movements but strove for a literary nationalism in his numerous volumes, some of notable musicality. From Algarve in the extreme south of Portugal came João Lúcio (Pousão Pereira, 1880-1918) who has some admirable moments, especially when singing of his native region, but is uneven in style. Like Castro in his international repute, Joaquim Pereira Teixeira de Vasconcelos ("Teixeira de Pascoaes," 1878-1952) invented saudosismo to epitomize the Lusitanian genius, a melancholy and pantheistic solidarity with all things. His influence has been great on the traditionalist "Renascença Portuguesa" group that he gathered around him. António Sardinha (1888-1925) is a poet who represents both literary and political nationalism. Perhaps the most Port. of all poetesses was Florbela Espanca (1894-1930), "Sóror Saudade," whose reputation has continued to grow because of her personal tragedy, unfulfilled yearnings and despair that she expressed so well in her sonnets.

Mário Sá-Carneiro (1890-1916), despondent, eccentric, and finally a suicide, combined extraordinary inventiveness with traditional forms to furnish inspiration to the Presença poets. He had collaborated in the foundation of the Vanguard journal Orpheu (1915), but some of his most important poetry was published posthumously. The principal organ of the modernista movement was Presença (published 1927-40), of which the leaders were José Régio (pseudonym of José Maria dos Reis Pereira, b. 1901) and Fernando Pessoa (1888-1935). Pessoa was educated in South Africa and even wrote several volumes of Eng. verse. His dramatic versatility in dividing his production into four groups and adopting three additional names and personalities has raised questions as to the sincerity of his inspiration, but not as to his importance. His over-all impact on his fellow countrymen has been compared to that of Juan Ramón Jiménez in Spain. José Régio, poet, novelist, dramatist, and critic, is receptive to all forms of art and is independent in his thinking. The conflicts within him are reflected in his work, but he suggests no solution. Poemas de Deus e do Diabo (Poems of God and of the Devil, 1925) present dramatically and with verbal exuberance the conflict of good and evil.

Despite the increasing importance of the novel and short story in Portugal, such younger members of the Presença group as Casais Monteiro (b. 1908), Alberto de Serpa (b. 1906), Miguel Torga (b. 1907), and numerous other contemporaries of diverse orientation (cf. sample in Cabral do Nascimento's anthology Líricas Portuguesas, 2a. série) testify to the survival and continuation of the traditional predominance of (lyric) poetry over other literary manifestations. It is this poetry that made Bell say: "The claim that, with the exception of ancient Greece, no small country has produced so great a literature as Portugal may be a hard saying, but it can be justified."

ANTHOLOGIES: Poems from the Port., ed. A. F. G. Bell (1913); Portugal—An Anthol., ed. G. Young (1916); Antero de Quental, Sonnets and Poems, tr. S. Griswold Morley (1922); Eugénio de Castro, Dona Briolância and Other Poems, tr. L. S. Downes (1944); Luis Vaz de Camoens, The Lusiads, tr. W. C. Atkinson (1952); The Oxford Book of Port. Verse, ed. A. F. G. Bell, 2d ed. B. Vidigal (1953); Port. Poems with Translations, ed. J. B. Trend (1954); Líricas portuguesas, 1a. série, ed. J. Régio (195-?); 2a. série, ed. J. Cabral do Nascimento (1945); 3a. série, ed. J. de Sena (1958).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: T. Braga, História da literatura portuguesa (1896-), many v. in this series deal specifically with different phases of poetry; A. F. G. Bell, Studies in Port. Lit. (1914) and Port. Lit. (1922; Port. tr., 1931); História da literatura portuguesa ilustrada, ed. A. Forjaz de Sampaio et al. (4 v., 1929-42; lavishly illustrated, with bibliog.); F. de Figueiredo, A épica portuguesa no século XVI (1950) and Lit. portuguesa (3d ed., 1955; also available in Sp.); G. Le Gentil, La littérature portugaise (2d ed., 1951; the best brief introd.); H. V. Livermore et al., Portugal and Brazil, An Introd. (1953; sections on lit., bibliog. of studies by E. Prestage and A. F. G. Bell and of tr. from Port. to Eng.); A. J. Saraiva and O. Lopes, História da lit. portuguesa (2d ed., 1957?); Dicionário das literaturas portuguesa, galega e brasileira, ed. J. do Prado Coelho (1960; entries on individual poets and works, versification, and movements); see also CANTIGA and GALICIAN POETRY.

L.A.S.

POULTER'S MEASURE. A meter composed of rhyming couplets made up of a line of iambic hexameter followed by a line of iambic heptameter, thus: "Silence augmenteth grief, writing increaseth rage, / Staled are my thoughts, which loved and lost the wonder of our age." (Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke, Epitaph on Sir Philip Sidney.) Employed in the 16th c. by Wyatt, Surrey, Sidney, Grimald, and other Eng. poets, the meter derives its name from the poultryman's proverbial practice of giving 12 eggs for the first dozen and 14 for the second, noted by George Gascoigne in his Steele Glas (1576). Despite its temporary popularity, the meter has not proved a satisfactory one for sustained composition in Eng. It has a deadly tendency toward monotony, and the heavy stress accents native to the language lend it an effect of panting effort followed by ludicrous haste. Written out as an iambic quatrain instead of a couplet, $a^3 b^3 c^4 b^3$, the form persisted as the "short meter" (q.v.) of the Eng. hymns. —G. Stewart, The Technique of Eng. Verse (1930); C. S. Lewis, Eng. Lit. of the 16th C. (1954); J. Thompson, The Founding of Eng. Metre (1961).

PRACTICAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, FUNCTION OF.

PRĀKRITS POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

PRÉCIOSITÉ traditionally refers to several separable, though often confused, phenomena of Fr. history: polite society of the first half of the 17th c., literature of the same period, and certain traits of style associated with the period but not exclusively possessed by it. Besides, the word has, like "preciosity" in Eng., a general application, unconfined by time, to style and manners, and is taken to mean affectation and overingeniousness.

In reaction to the roughness of Court manners, the Marquise de Rambouillet retired about 1608 to her hôtel, or more precisely, to her alcôve, and for half a century gathered round her those who were concerned to purify both manners and literary style. Originally they drew their code and inspiration from the pastoral novel of Honoré d'Urfé, L'Astrée, which began to be published in 1607; and gradually they developed their own canons, which we know chiefly in the Historiettes of Tallemant des Réaux (not actually published till 1833-35), the enormous romans à clef by a rival, Mlle de Scudéry, and the Dictionnaire des précieuses (1660) of A. B. de Somaize. Though they were satirized notably by Molière in Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659), some frequenters of the Hôtel de Rambouillet helped to form the Académie Française (1635), which finally produced its dictionary in 1694.

Actually the only poet of consequence directly associated with précieux society was Vincent Voiture (1598-1648), whose works circulated but were not published until after his death. His elegant and casual sonnets and rondeaux made him one of the first and best composers of vers de société. Of greater achievement is a group of poets who are usually lumped together either as opponents of Malherbe or as précieux. Among them are Théophile de Viau (1590-1626), Saint-Amant (1594-1661), and Tristan l'Hermite (1601?-1655), whose reputations have been restored only recently in this century. In Théophile's ode Le Matin, for example, we note such possibly précieux details as the lion "herissant sa perruque affreuse," but also traits more generally baroque, such as the profusion of particularized images and a concern with the gradual passage of time.

It must be said that not only is there some confusion as to the scope of the word, but also there is the probability that it will be supplanted as a literary term by baroque. If préciosité is thought to be a universal phenomenon connected somehow with marinism and euphuism, its origins can be found in the Middle Ages and its extension can be traced to our own day. Its literary traits would be urbane wit, use of the conceit, artificiality, etc. If it is restricted to social history, it would apply to those works that reflect the cultivated taste of 17th-c. salons. If p. continues to be used of most early 17th-c. poetry, its scope must be widened to include the best as well as the narrowly "typical."—C. L. Livet, Précieux et précieuses (1856); E. Magne, Voiture et l'Hôtel de Rambouillet (1911, new ed., 1930); D. Mornet, "La Signification et l'évolution de l'idée de p. en France au XVII^e s.," JHI, 1 (1940); R. Bray, Anthologie de la poésie précieuse de Thibaut de Champagne à Giraudoux (1946) and La P. et les précieux . . . (1948); A. Adam, "Baroque et p.," Revue des sciences humaines (Lille), fasc. 55-56 (1949); O. de Mourgues, Metaphysical, Baroque and Précieux Poetry (1953). L.N.

PREGUNTA. The "p." or requesta, question, with the corresponding respuesta, answer, was a form of poetic debate practiced principally by the Sp. court poets of the late 14th and 15th c. One poet presented his question—often on such themes as morals, love, philosophy, or religion—in a poem, and another poet gave the answer in a poem of identical form, including the rhymes. Sometimes several answers were given in identical form and by more than one poet. Occasionally an answering poet was unable to follow the rhymes of the p. and might excuse himself for his substitutions.—P. Le Gentil, La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge. 1^e partie. Les Thèmes et les genres (1949); Navarro; J. G. Cummins, "Methods and Conventions in Poetic Debate," HR, 31 (1963). D.C.C.

PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. A group of Eng. artists, organized in London in 1848 by Dante Gabriel Rossetti, William Holman Hunt, and John Millais. The P.R.B., as it came to be called, had as its aim the reform of the art of painting, away from academicism and toward the realism, sensuousness, and attention to detail which its members professed to find in It. painting before Raphael. However, since Rossetti, the leader of the group, was both a poet and a painter, as were several of its other members, the movement soon made itself felt in Eng. poetry. Indeed, Pre-Raphaelite painting was always distinguished by a strong literary flavor, both in choice of material and in technique. The Germ, the short-lived publication of the group, contained such poems as Rossetti's The Blessed Damozel, in which ardent medievalism as well as attention to pictorial detail expressed the aims of the Brotherhood.

Although the P.R.B. did not survive as an organized group beyond the early 1850's, it was effectively reborn as a literary phenomenon in 1856, when Rossetti met William Morris, whose artistic aims were roughly similar. Other poets to come under Rossetti's powerful influence included Swinburne, Coventry Patmore, and Austin Dobson. Rossetti's sister Christina ranks as one of the best poets of the Pre-Raphaelite school. Pre-Raphaelite poetry elicited strong reactions in Victorian England. Ruskin expressed admiration for the group in 1851, but Robert Buchanan delivered a violent attack on what he regarded as the eroticism of some of their work in 1871 in an article entitled "The Fleshly School of Poetry" (q.v.).

The antecedents of Pre-Raphaelitism, as a poetic style, are to be found in the It. poets of the 13th c., in Spenser, and, to a much greater extent, in some aspects of the work of the romantics—the sensuousness of Keats, for example, and the supernaturalism of Poe. Despite their professed aim of realism, the Pre-Raphaelite poets tended ultimately toward the creation of a poetic realm in which medievalism, musicality, and vague religious feeling combined to achieve a narcotically escapist effect. In some respects they anticipated the Fr. symbolists, although their movement had neither the profundity nor the importance of the later one.

In 1863, some fifteen years after the initial founding of the P.R.B., the Society for the Advancement of Truth in Art was organized in New York City. The members of this group, who never achieved the fame of their British counterparts, came to be called the "American Pre-Raphaelites," because of their adherence to the doctrines of Rossetti and Ruskin.

Ruskin: Rossetti: Preraphaelitism. Papers 1854 to 1862, arr. and ed. W. M. Rossetti (1899); W. H. Hunt, Pre-Raphaelitism and the P.R.B. (2 v., 1905-06); T. E. Welby, The Victorian Romantics, 1850-1870 (1929); F. L. Bickley, The Pre-Raphaelite Comedy (1932); W. Gaunt, The Pre-Raphaelite Tragedy (1942); G. Hough, The Last Romantics (1949); D. H. Dickason, The Daring Young Men, the Story of the Am. Pre-Raphaelites (1953); H. M. Jones, "The Pre-Raphaelites," The Victorian Poets: A Guide to Research, ed. F. F. Faverty (1956);

O. Doughty, A Victorian Romantic: Dante Gabriel Rossetti (2d ed., 1960); D. Hudson, "The Pre-Raphaelites," The Forgotten King and Other Essays (1960). F.J.W.; A.P.

PREROMANTICISM. Those features of 18th-c. writing that reveal a turning away from neoclassicism are now commonly labeled "preromantic," although not all of them are important to romantic poetics or literature (e.g. middle-class drama). There are some preromantic elements in rococo poetry, but more appear in works of genres newly developed or undergoing radical modifications: the exotic or sentimental novel (Defoe, Prévost, Rousseau, Richardson, Goethe); bourgeois drama and nonmusical melodrama (Diderot, Sedaine, Mercier, Sturm-und-Drang [q.v.] playwrights); poetry of personal or individual observation (Brockes, Haller, authors of "Seasons") and experience (Günther, Klopstock, Goethe, Bürger, Chénier, Blake).

With its doctrines of progress and relativism and its view that experiment and individuality are desirable, the Enlightenment created an atmosphere favorable for the use of nonclassical mythology (Gray, Klopstock, and other Bardic poets); of primitive and exotic materials (the Noble Savage of Rousseau and others, the cult of the untutored poet in England and Germany); of forms and themes from popular literature (folk song and ballad, gothicism and medievalism, drama inspired by Shakespeare's histories, verse modeled after that of Hans Sachs); and for such novelties as prose idylls (Gessner), dialogue novels (Diderot), tragedies in prose or prose-and-verse (Lessing, Sturm-und-Drang writers), and unrhymed odes in Gr. meters and lyrics in free rhythms (Klopstock). By allotting an important place to feeling and the unconscious, and by ignoring large metaphysical issues and so perhaps abetting the spread of religious enthusiasm and crypto-mystic societies, philosophic speculation fostered sentimentality (comédie larmoyante, the sentimental novel and lyric) and sensationalism (gothic novel, much Sturm-und-Drang writing). The religion of Nature's God directly accessible to Human Reason permeated most religious and moral speculation; in the absence of special revelation it was widely held that Virtue subjectively felt could be objectively revealed only as feeling expressed, so that Deism, no less than such movements as Pietism and Methodism, favored sentimentality and irrational subjectivism.

Historical relativism led to the interpretation of Homer and the Old Testament as primitive or early national poetry (Young, Herder) and to the overvaluing of Ossian (Blair, Herder). With rural life thought to be closer to God-Nature than urban civilization, the idyll, sentimental or realistic, enjoyed wide popularity (Haller, Gessner, E. von Kleist, Thomson, Gray, Goldsmith, Cowper, Burns, Voss, Müller). Poetry of religious feeling, strongly reflective in tone, was given renewed life by Young, Klopstock and those they inspired. Anticlassicistic critical theories were expounded ever more vigorously (Bodmer, Breitinger, J. E. Schlegel, Gerstenberg, Lessing, Herder, Goethe, Young, Diderot, Rousseau, Mercier); in varying degrees these favored the "characteristic" as opposed to the "normative" or "ideal," so that novels of Lesage and Smollett, no less than Fr. and German plays consciously executed under their influence, may properly be considered preromantic. The concepts of the organic growth of national literatures (Herder) and of the organic structure of the work of art (Goethe) are also developed. Because the unique and the particular are considered valuable, literary language is enriched by neologisms (Klopstock), archaic forms (Chaterton), and dialectical or otherwise uncommon words (Burns, Goethe), especially in Germany, where Hamann and Herder demanded a revitalization of poetic speech.

An inept blending of disparate stylistic elements (e.g., realistic detail and neoclassical epithet; vulgarism and sentimental pathos; ballad form and insistent rhetoric) is evident in most preromantic writing. Not until conscious romanticism and its ironic self-awareness—Goethe's early works are important exceptions—does unity of tone or the successful harmonizing of dissimilar styles become general. Preromanticism is thus more than a breaking away from neoclassicism; it is a series of ideological and technical developments which effectively prepare for the triumph of romanticism (q.v.).

J. G. Robertson, Studies in the Genesis of Romantic Theory in the 18th C. (1923); P. van Tieghem, Le Prérromantisme (3 v., 1924-47); A. Monglond, Le Prérromantisme français (2 v., 1930); P. Trahard, Les Maîtres de la sensibilité française au XVIII^e s. (4 v., 1931-33); K. Wais, Das antiphilosophische Weltbild des französischen Sturm und Drang (1934); E. Bernbaum, Guide through the Romantic Movement (1938, 2d ed., 1949); E. Neff, A Revolution in European Poetry, 1660-1900 (1940); W. J. Bate, From Cl. to Romantic (1946); Wellek, 1.; R. Ayrault, La Genèse du romantisme allemand (2 v., 1961). S.A.

PRIAMEL. Among the aphoristic poems composed by Germans from the 12th c. (Spervogel, Marner) to the 16th, the P. (L. praeambulum) occupies a niche of its own. A literary genre with "origins in many other ages and countries" (A. Taylor, The Proverb . . ., 1962, p. 179), it developed originally from epigrammatic improvisation. Its special feature is that a series of seemingly unrelated and unconnected ideas or observations, taken from everyday life, are brought together, with a surprise effect, in the last line. The form is a kind of teasing and lends itself to humorous employment. It became very popular in the 14th-15th c., and the folk poet Hans Rosenplüt (15th c.) established it as a genre and composed a large number of *Priamel*n. Several manuscripts containing such poems have been preserved, and the "Wolfenbüttel MS" was edited and published by K. Euling in 1908.—W. Uhl, Die deutsche P. (1897); K. Euling, Das P. bis Hans Rosenplüt (1905) and "P.," Reallexikon, II; C. Selmer and C. R. Goedsche, "The P. Manuscript of the Newberry Library, Chicago," PMLA, 53 (1938). B.Q.M.

PRIAPEAN. A measure consisting of a glyconic and a pherecratean (qq.v.), separated by a diaeresis. It was used by Anacreon and other amatory poets and is also found in dramatic poetry, especially the chorus of satyric plays. It was employed by the Alexandrian poet, Euphronius, to celebrate the god of fertility, Priapus, whence its name. In L. literature it is found in Catullus and the Priapea, e.g.,

Ō Colōniā quāē cūpīs || pōntē ludēre lōngō
(Catullus 17.1)

M. Coulon, La Poésie priapique dans l'antiquité et au moyen âge (1932); Dale; Koster, Crusius; V. Buchheit, Studien zum Corpus Priapeorum (1962). P.S.C.

PRIMITIVISM. A primitivist is a person who prefers a way of life which, when judged by one or more of the standards prevailing in his own society, would be considered less "advanced" or less "civilized." The primitivist finds the model for his preferred way of life in a culture that existed or is reputed to have existed at some time in the past; in the culture of the less sophisticated classes within his society or of primitive peoples that exist elsewhere in the world; in the experiences of his childhood or youth; in a psychologically elemental (subrational or even subconscious) level of existence; or in some combination of these.

Primitivistic themes appear in almost all literatures: they are found in classical and medieval literature; in the late Renaissance, Montaigne, in his essay Des Cannibales, praises the happy and virtuous life of savages living close to nature; Pope envies the untutored Indian; 18th-c. interest in p. receives its fullest expression in Rousseau's pietistic doctrine of the children of nature; Wordsworth attributes superior wisdom to sheep-herders and children; Thoreau tells us that "we do not ride on the railroad; it rides upon us"; the poetry of Rimbaud is a record of defiance of Europe and dogmatic Christianity in favor of an Oriental "fatherland," which is his symbol of personal and essential reality; D. H. Lawrence makes a similar condemnation of Western civilization and advocates a return to an older mode of living based on a recognition of man's "blood nature." Primitivists have differed widely on the nature of the evils and weaknesses of civilized life, the causes of these evils, the positive values of the primitive life, and the degree to which a regression to the primitive is possible.

P. has also been used to support revolutions in taste and poetic theory. In the 18th c. Vico, Blackwell, Blair, Herder, and many other critics, in reaction to the rigidities of neoclassicism, admired the poetry of such "primitives" as Homer, the authors of the Old Testament, Shakespeare, Ossian, and the "peasant poets"; some of these critics held that the characteristics of this poetry (spontaneity, wildness, sublimity, free expression of powerful feeling) are the standards by which all poetry should be judged. Wordsworth's poetics reflects primitivist tendencies in his recommendations concerning the proper subject matter and diction of poetry. Some contemporary theorists, influenced by modern psychology and anthropology, regard poetry (together with religion, myth, and ritual) as a reflection of primitive psychic activities. For example, some critics, following Jung, find the power and value of literature to consist in its effective presentation of archetypes, preserved in the racial memory of the collective unconscious, to which humanity must always return for spiritual renewal. Finally, the primitive is fully rehabilitated in the speculations of Coomaraswamy, Eliade, and other Perennial Philosophers: primitive art, which is the symbolic expression of metaphysical truths, is simply the "normal" or "traditional" art of all peoples everywhere; Western realistic and expressionistic theories of art, like Western civilization generally, are historical anomalies.

P. has had its disparagers, particularly among those who have committed themselves to a progressive view of history. Voltaire attacked Rousseau and other primitivists. In the 20th c. Babbitt sees p. as a form of escapism; in its "surrender to the subrational" it threatens the "overthrow of humanistic and religious standards"; it is no substitute for a disciplined intellect and will and a genuine social consciousness. Thus, the long historical debate between primitivist and nonprimitivist is part of the larger debate concerning the standards which determine the good life for man.

I. Babbitt, Rousseau and Romanticism (1919); C. B. Tinker, Nature's Simple Plan (1922); L. Whitney, "Eng. Primitivistic Theories of Epic Origins," MP, 21 (1924) and P. and the Idea of Progress (1934); H. N. Fairchild, The Noble Savage (1928); A. O. Lovejoy and others, P. and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); E. A. Runge, P. and Related Ideas in Sturm und Drang Lit. (1946); A. K. Coomaraswamy, Figures of Speech and Figures of Thought (1946); G. Boas, Essays on P. and Related Ideas in the Middle Ages (1948); M. Eliade, The Myth of the Eternal Return, tr. W. Trask (1954); J. Baird, Ishmael (1956).

J.B.; F.G.

PROCELEUSMATIC (Gr. "rousing to action beforehand"). A foot consisting of 4 short syllables (~~~~). It is derived, with respect to the iambic trimeter, from the resolution of the long in a dactyl, when it is called p. from thesis, or in the anapaest, when it is called p. from arsis (q.v.). It is seldom employed in Gr. lyric poetry or in tragedy and only occasionally in comedy, although in L. comedy it is fairly common, especially at the beginning of a senarius. In late tragedy it is used in dactylic hyporchemata and in dactylic monodies.—W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); Dale; Koster.

P.S.C.

PROEST. See ODL.

PRO-ODE. In Gr. dramatic and lyric poetry the term refers to a strophe, without a corresponding antistrophe, which precedes the first strophe and antistrophe of a choral ode. It can also mean simply a short verse before a longer one.—Kolář, Koster.

R.A.H.

PROSE AND VERSE. See VERSE AND PROSE.

PROSE POEM (poem in prose). A composition able to have any or all features of the lyric, except that it is put on the page—though not conceived of—as prose. It differs from poetic prose in that it is short and compact, from free verse in that it has no line breaks, from a short prose passage in that it has, usually, more pronounced rhythm, sonorous effects, imagery, and density of expression. It may contain even inner rhyme and metrical runs. Its length, generally, is from half a page (one or two paragraphs) to three or four pages, i.e., that of the average lyrical poem. If it is any longer, the tensions and impact are forfeited, and it becomes—more or less poetic—prose. The term "prose poem" has been applied irresponsibly to anything from the Bible to a novel by Faulkner, but should be used only to designate a highly conscious (sometimes even self-conscious) artform.

The tendency is to consider Aloysius Bertrand the creator of the p.p.; his Gaspard de la nuit of 1842 is the first published collection of indubitable prose poetry, though Bertrand was writing p. poems as early as 1827, and Maurice de Guérin, the other initiator, around 1835. But the actual beginnings are in that 18th-c. France where the Academy's rigid rules of versification were driving many a potential poet with a taste for individuality into prose. Thus came about works like Fénelon's poetic novel Télémaque (1699) and Montesquieu's prose pastoral Le Temple de Gnide (1725); these, and their many imitators, represent an approach, and encouragement, to prose poetry. Men like La Mothe-Houdar defiantly produced odes in prose, but this was mostly bravado and rhetoric. A greater incentive and more useful model was provided by translations of foreign verse into Fr. prose. The original might be The Psalms, Gr. or L. lyrics, Norse, oriental, or other "exotic" folk poems, Eng. pre-romantic verse, or such works as in the original already are more or less prose poetry, like Macpherson's Ossian or the Idyls of the Swiss poet Salomon Gessner (1756). In Fr., these emerge as prose poetry, soon to be followed by pseudo-translations which, naturally, take the same form. Best among the latter are the charming Chansons madécasses of Parny (1787), purporting to be folk poems of Madagascar. By this time the poetic novels may contain lyrics in prose, e.g., Chateaubriand's Atala (1799, publ. 1801), but these are still translations, real or supposed. Minor writers, like Volney and Rabbe, may be stepping-stones, but it is the colorful Bertrand and the limpid Guérin (Le Centaure, La Bacchante—unfortunately not publ. till 1861) that write the first fine, admittedly original, pieces which, though neither author is known to have used the term, are p. poems by any name.

The first widely known poems in prose, however, are those of Baudelaire, who also officially christens the genre (Petits Poèmes en prose, or Le Spleen de Paris, begun 1855, published in full 1869). By owning their filiation from Bertrand, Baudelaire bestowed recognition on a young man who died obscurely in a charity ward. Baudelaire's achievement is to have taken an artform which still went in heavily for exoticism and verbal genre-painting and given it the variety and scope, or almost, of the Fleurs du mal. But he does not always escape prosaism, and often becomes merely anecdotal. Rimbaud is the first, and probably only, poet whose greatest work is his prose poetry: Les Illuminations (date of composition uncertain, published 1886) and, somewhat less developed, Une Saison en enfer (1873). Here the p.p. is given the sweep of both a boundless consciousness and a creative subconscious, expressed with extraordinary, dizzying collocations of objects and ideas. Where private imagery does not turn to solipsism, stunning effects are achieved in a wholly flexible form sometimes becoming vers libre or even rhymed verse. From 1864 on, Stéphane Mallarmé was working on p. poems which appeared, along with other prose, as Divagations (1897). In these dozen or so pieces a revolutionary (but always carefully pondered) use of syntax, creating unusual relationships or isolations within the sentence, and a system of overlapping metaphors (tropes within tropes) produce almost infinite suggestiveness, now and then inscrutability. From the Illuminations and the Divagations direct paths lead to such important literary phenomena as free verse, the stream of consciousness, surrealism, James Joyce, and, indeed, modern literature's emphasis on private metaphor and mélange des genres. Significantly, the verse dramatist Claudel and the experimental novelists Gide and Proust wrote prose poetry in their youth.

By the end of the 19th c. the p.p. is firmly established, and even to list its major European and Am. practitioners would be impossible here. In the early period, however, we must note in Germany the amazing ex nihilo manifestation of the above-mentioned Gessner; Novalis and Hölderlin contributed to the genre at the beginning of the 19th c., the young Stefan George and Rilke at the end. Elsewhere in the past century, the p.p. or a reasonable facsimile, made interesting appearances in De Quincey and Beddoes (later in some poets of the Yellow Nineties), in Turgenev, the Spaniard G. A. Bécquer, the Dane J. P. Jacobsen; two of Poe's short pieces, at least, fall into the category. But assertions and splendors notwithstanding, works like Lautréamont's Maldoror, Hölderlin's Hyperion, Nietzsche's Zarathustra, are not p. poems—unless prose epics, hence barely distinguishable from the poetic novel. The p.p. as such is with us still, but its accomplishments having been absorbed by other genres, it has become the occasional "aside" of writers whose essential utterance takes other forms.

C. Baudelaire, "A Arsène Houssaye," Le Spleen de Paris (1869); J.-K. Huysmans, A rebours (1884; end of ch. 14 first anthol. of p.p., with comment); F. Rahut, Das französische Prosagedicht (1929); V. Clayton, The Prose P. in Fr. Lit. of the 18th C. (1936); M.-J. Durry [review of the preceding item], RHL, 44 (1937) and "Autour du poème en prose," Mercure de France, Feb. 1, 1937; A. Cherel, La Prose poétique française (1940); Anthologie du poème en prose, ed. M. Chapelan (1946); P. M. Jones, The Background to Modern Fr. Poetry (1951); "A Little Anthol. of the Poem in Prose," ed. C. H. Ford, New Directions, 14 (1953; possibilities and impossibilities of the p.p.: junk, jargon, and a few gems); S. Bernard, Le Poème en prose de Baudelaire jusqu'à nos jours (1959); M. Parent, Saint-John Perse et quelques devanciers: Etudes sur le poème en prose (1960). J.S.

PROSE RHYTHM. P.r. has been written off as a mere figure of speech and it has been treated seriously by both psychologists and students of literature. Much depends on the definition of rhythm that one starts with. If rhythm means simply, etymologically, "flow," p.r. is a pleasing flow of the sounds of language, and any prose which satisfies the ear is rhythmic. This is sometimes called the rhythm of the flowing line. If, on the other hand, the word has the stricter sense of a series of equal or approximately equal units, the first problem is to find a way of identifying the units. This can be done by grammatical analysis, that is, by observing the length of phrases and clauses: if they seem to fall into more or less equal and repeated patterns, the prose has a recognizable kind of rhythm, sometimes called the balanced style, as is all too common in Dr. Johnson. But this will occur without much regularity; otherwise the prose becomes offensively monotonous or sing-song. Take for example, "Priest falls, prophet rises," or Burke's "Kings will be tyrants from policy when subjects are rebels from principle." To recognize the subtler varieties, such as may occur in ordinary, to say nothing of studied and ornate prose, a trained ear is necessary, and also a careful analysis of the potential elements. And this means breaking down the sentences and paragraphs into phrases, words, and syllables with full regard to their constituents of time (duration), stress (relative emphasis), pitch (rising and falling of the voice in spoken language and an analogous effect in silent reading), and tempo, including pauses; for there are considerable differences in rhythm between rapid and retarded speech—the more rapid the speaking or reading, the longer the rhythmic units seem to become.

Another form of measurement is metrical. Owing to the formal arrangements of language (syntax), words and syllables have a natural tendency to come in set patterns ("the course of the river," "human nature," "inevitable development," etc.). The poet adopts these natural patterns, altering them for special effects and sometimes with, sometimes without forcing, molds the language into his metrical scheme. Often the difference between rhythmic prose and poetry is very slight; for example, in Pope's famous line "Most women have no character at all" or in Milton's "Of Man's First Disobedience, and the Fruit" the meter is so "irregular," that is, departs so far from the expected alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables, that without the context one would not recognize the meter at all. Conversely, a great deal of normal prose contains potential, and unintentional, meter which will be noticed only after close examination but which nevertheless is felt and so contributes to the p.r. If, however, the latent meter is allowed to become too obvious or is purposely developed for emotional effect, as in oratorical or pathetic passages, the sense of true prose is destroyed and the reader or hearer resents the trick played on him. The best prose requires therefore a careful balance of these two forces.

In the study of p.r., then, three facts must be taken into account. First, there is this natural tendency of language to assume metrical patterns. This is the most elementary aspect of p.r. Second, the established grammatical or syntactic arrangements of language are often repeated, in the form of parallelism or balance, for rhetorical purposes. Third, there is a psychological factor which both creates and satisfies a desire for rhythmical repetition and which leads us to find or feel, and sometimes to induce where it does not actually exist, a clear sense of rhythm in language. In its extreme form it develops or imposes a sense of rhythm in any prose which is easy to read or listen to, so that we are inclined to say that all good prose is rhythmical.

Great progress has been made recently in the scientific study of speech sounds, going beyond the simple groups of syllable, word, phrase, etc. This structural analysis has an elaborate code of symbols, including four degrees of stress and four or five of pitch. Besides the usual phonetic values of vowel and consonant, it embraces juncture, the phonemic, morphemic, and syntactic phenomena, and various formulas. This system may eventually enable us to record and interpret the many variations of speech and so come closer than hitherto to an understanding of rhythms, both in prose and in verse. Yet there will always remain a subjective element, and each reader, each listener will recognize and feel the rhythms according to his native receptivity.

The cadence or cursus (clausula) is a special form of prose rhythm. It was invented by the Gr. orators and was, originally, a kind of punctuation for oral delivery, marking the end of a clause or sentence. Cicero adopted the device and used the following clausulae and their numerous resolutions most often:

— — — — —; — — — — —; — — — — —

Zielinski divides Cicero's clausulae into the following classes: verae I = cretic (— — —) or molossus (— — —) + trochee (—) or cretic or ditrochee; verae II, which permit substitution of — — for —; verae III, which permit substitution of a choriamb (— — — —) or epitrite (— — — —) for the cretic; licitae: the c. licita is a c. vera with a 5-syllable word at the end; malae and pessimae, so called in accordance with their degree of departure from the standard patterns; and selectae, which substitute spondees (—) for the trochees of the verae. Of these the verae and licitae comprise 86.8 per cent of Cicero's clausulae, the others 12.7 per cent. Latin prose-writers whose clausulae reflect the Ciceronian pattern include Nepos, Seneca, Suetonius, and Quintilian; among those whose do not are Sallust and Livy. By the 3d c. A.D., the L. clausula had shifted from quantitative to accentual rhythm, and in the latter form it was used during the Middle Ages in three patterns of cursus:

planus or plain (♩—♩—♩—), tardus or slow (♩—♩—♩—), and velox or fast (♩—♩—♩—♩—)

Later it became chiefly, with lexical accent substituted for syllabic length, a stylistic ornament; but in the diplomatic correspondence of the Roman Curia it was used, with modifications, as a secret code or signature. Something similar to the classical cursus has been noted in Eng., starting from the L. collects of the church service and passing on by aural tradition to the Eng. collects and thence into secular prose. But whether the cursus was transmitted to Eng. through the Prayer Book or whether Eng. developed independently its own satisfying cadences has never been fully established. Some patterns recur more frequently in Eng. than others, but they do not correspond closely to the classical cursus. See VERSE AND PROSE; PROSODY.

T. Zielinski, Das Clauselgesetz in Ciceros Reden (1904) and Der constructive Rhythmus in Ciceros Reden (1914); W. Thomson, The Rhythm of Eng. Speech (1907); A. G. Clark, The Cursus in Mediaeval and Vulgar L. (1910) and P.R. in Eng. (1913); P. Fijn van Draat, Rhythm in Eng. Prose (1910); G. Saintsbury, A Hist. of Eng. P.R. (1912, 1922); W. M. Paterson, The Rhythm of Prose (1917); H. D. Broadhead, Latin P.R. (1922); H. Griffith, Time Patterns in Prose (1929); B. Tomashevsky, "Ritm prozy," O Stikhe. Statyi (1929; an important Russ. contribution based on statistical methods); A. Classe, The Rhythm of Eng. Prose (1939); G. L. Trager and H. L. Smith, Jr., An Outline of Eng. Structure (1951, 1956); P. F. Baum, The Other Harmony of Prose (1952); Norden; W. Schmid, Über die klassische Theorie und Praxis des antiken Prosarhythmus (1959). P.F.B.

PROSODIC NOTATION. Notation of prosodic aspects of speech is of three kinds, (1) by diacritical markings imposed upon ordinary text; normal text in all languages includes some such marks, e.g., "accents," and all marks of punctuation are partially or wholly prosodic; (2) by a distinct graphic transcription either of the total phonetic content of a text (phonetic transcription conventionally set within square brackets, phonemic transcription between slant lines) or of abstracted prosodic features only; (3) by an abstract schematic symbolism (usually based upon 1 or 2) representing prosodic elements and values (e.g., use of letters for values, of numbers for position in series, of barring for divisions, etc.); the use of this last is especially to provide concise schematic formulas to represent abstracted patterns of rhythmic or metrical organization of prosodic features.

Of diacritical marks the most commonly used have been the acute accent (') for primary stress, stress in general, or "ictus," sometimes lengthened (/, the virgule), the grave accent (˘) for secondary stress, the macron (—) to indicate a "long" syllable or element, and the breve (˘) for a "short"; relative length of sounds is frequently indicated by a dot above or after the symbol for the sound, protracted duration by two dots aligned vertically after it. Pauses are indicated by normal punctuation (especially the comma) or by the caret (^). The caret is used also to indicate an omission. Relative duration of pauses is indicated with the caret by addition of macron or breve or dot(s); duration of pause may be indicated by conventional musical notation for rests. G. Trager and H. L. Smith (Outline of Eng. Structure, 1951), followed by many linguists, use diacritically over normal text or transcription, for stress-values the acute accent for primary, circumflex for secondary, grave for tertiary, and the breve for weakest; for degrees of openness of juncture, + for open juncture internal to a stress-group, | for "terminal" juncture after clauses or members with even or level pitch conclusion, || for such juncture with rising pitch, # for completive terminal juncture (with falling pitch), and they then use the names of these signs as designations of the grades of juncture ("plus-juncture," "single-bar," "double-bar," "cross-bar" or "double-cross-"). This is in some ways the best of current diacritical systems for languages like Eng., and is in increasing use; but for abstractive prosodic analysis it has, besides the disadvantages of all merely diacritical procedures, the inconvenience that it cannot easily be generalized to fit all languages and prosodic systems, and that it uses for phonological description signs or symbols which in strictly rhythmic analysis are needed or useful for other values and better reserved for those (e.g., ~ | ||).

In rhythmic analysis diacritical marking of normal text is less satisfactory for most purposes than some kind of graphic transcription which clearly abstracts the prosodic features relevant to a rhythmic design and presents them in separation from the qualitative phonemic and other nonrhythmic aspects of the speech in which they occur. There has been great variety in the history of prosody in provision of devices for such abstractive notation, and much diversity as to crudity or refinement in them. Perhaps the oldest is the use of letters of an alphabet to represent prosodic values, found in the fragmentary remains of ancient Gr. prosodic (and musical) notation and exploited systematically in the ancient Sanskrit Chandaśśūtra of Pingala (where G = long or heavy, guru, L = short or light, laghu; Pingala used single letters also to represent systematic combinations of these values, or "feet": M = GGG, N = LLL, R = GLG, etc.); in recent use for Eng., e.g., x = unstressed, a (more often ' or /) = stressed, F (fort) = stressed, f (faible) = weak (P. Verrier, Métrie anglaise, 1909), and very often (following G. R. Stewart, Technique of Eng. Verse, 1930) S = stressed, o = unstressed, l = light stress, p, P = pause short or long or replacing light or heavy. Less often, numbers (0 or 1 to 3, 4, or higher) have been used, to represent either degrees of prominence (J. B. Mayor; J. Lotz for Gr.) or position of stress or other value (so commonly for Romance verse; for stress-verse by J. Lotz; for prose sequences by M. Croll); numbers (1 to 4 or 6) are commonly used to note levels of pitch. Conventional musical notation has often been adapted for rhythmic analysis of verse. For Eng., occasional and partial use of musical notation begins with C. Gildon (Complete Art of Poetry, 1718), and recurs frequently in the later 18th and in the 19th c.; since S. Lanier (Science of Eng. Verse, 1880) full musical notation has often been used by writers whose analysis of verse is musical or exclusively temporal (and has therefore generally been avoided by non-temporalists). Systems of arbitrary graphic symbols often variously incorporating musical and other inherited conventional signs have been sporadically used (J. Steele, Essay . . . establishing the Melody and Measure of Speech . . . expressed and perpetuated by peculiar symbols, 1775; W. Skeat, "Versification," § 98, pp. lxxxii-xcvii of "General Introduction" in his ed. of Complete Works of G. Chaucer, vi, 1894; W. Thomson, Rhythm of Speech, 1923; A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgeschichte, I, 1925; MLA Committee of 1923; etc.)

In the system of notation used in the article on Prosody in this Encyclopedia, o = the single element or unit, normally a syllable, of weak or unemphatic value when not otherwise marked; ó = a syllable or element of stressed or emphatic value. Where more than two values are required, ó = primary, ò = secondary, ô = tertiary, o = weakest; ð = value which may be either primary or secondary; ô = prominence in excess of adjacent primary value. (Since of contiguous primary values the second must always be phonetically stronger if the two are to be perceptually equal, the sequence ó ó is always phonetically ó ð and ð is therefore not often required.) The straight comma , is used to indicate the open juncture or break between stress-groups, the caret ^ for longer pause at more open junctures. (Protraction of pause may be indicated with this caret by a dot under or after it. In metrical sequences, the straight bar | may further be used to separate feet where this is felt to be desirable; the marking of values or stresses should normally suffice for indication of metrical pattern. Caesural breaks are often represented by this straight bar, single or double, or by a vertical dotted line; such breaks too are sufficiently indicated by marks for junctures and pauses.) These signs serve adequately to represent all the values of all the prosodic factors in all languages. Where temporal duration alone is to be noted, as for classical Gr. and L., the macron may be used for long and the breve for short, and o for indifferent or indeterminate quantity; for binary contrast of pitch values, as in Chinese, now commonly o (O) = flat or uninflected, x (X) = inflected; to distinguish levels of pitch, numbers may be used (1 = lowest), or the syllabic sign o placed on a musical staff with lines. When only one of two contrasting values is to be noted, and the place of occurrence of this value alone is to be represented in a schematic indication of a pattern, numbers corresponding to the place of the affected syllables in their series may be used, as by M. Croll for clausular cadences in prose, counting backward from the last syllable (5-2 = ó o o ó o; sr, 16 (1919) lff.). For such schemes, J. Lotz has proposed, counting from the beginning for verse, giving the number only of light syllables between the strong or emphatic in series, indicating absence of weak syllables at end or beginning by 0: (thus 2 1 1 0 = o o ó o ó o ó; Lingua, 6 (1956), lff.).

For rhythmic analysis, it is not necessary or desirable that a notation represent all the variation in the rhythmic aspects of a speech; what is necessary is representation of the rhythmic contrasts relevant to the pattern or meter to be described. The ideal rhythmic notation is therefore always abstractive and, for the total rhythmic variation, only approximative. It should also be remembered that "notational symbols . . . have nothing whatever to do with the problem of good, bad, or indifferent readings; they can, in fact, be used to record readings of any quality or character" (J. W. Hendren, Time and Stress in Eng. Verse [1959; Rice Institute pamphlet 46]).

T. S. Omond, Eng. Metrists (1921); M. W. Croll, "Report of the Committee on Metrical Notation," PMLA, 39 (1924), lxxxvii-xciv; Phonetic Transcription and Transliteration, Proposals of the Copenhagen Conference April 1925 (Oxford, 1926; mainly by O. Jespersen).
J.C.LAD.

PROSODION. A religious song used chiefly in the worship of Apollo in ancient Greece, sung to instrumental music by a chorus either approaching or standing at the altar of a god, hence its name ("processional"). Such a song frequently used the metrical unit called the prosodiakon or prosodiacus = — — — — —. This is sometimes known as the catalectic form of the enoplius (q.v.).
R.A.H.

PROSODY[†] is the most general term in current use to refer to the elements and structures involved in the rhythmic or dynamic aspect of speech, and the study of these elements and structures as they occur in speech and language generally (linguistic prosody) or in the compositions of the literary arts (literary prosody). Descriptive study of pros., linguistic or literary, may be theoretical ("achronic" or "panchronic," concerned with abstracting to the universal or general nature of the phenomena and the principles operating in them, rather than with recording the fact and particular circumstances of their actual occurrence) or historical (either "synchronic" or "diachronic," and either "comparative" or limited to a national or linguistic unit); theory and history are here as elsewhere reciprocally complementary. The evaluative prosodic criticism related to these descriptive studies is grammatical, rhetorical, or aesthetic, as the value it assesses is one of linguistic correctness, rhetorical effectiveness, or poetic form. A preceptive or prescriptive pros. attempts to provide practical rules for rhythmic composition and interpretation or delivery. Such precept has always some connection with contemporary descriptive pros. and the related prosodic criticism, and is often conflated with them, but it is properly a part, not of these disciplines, but of the arts of poetry and rhetoric, or of grammar and elocution and their pedagogy; as such it is a datum for their histories and the history of taste and literary education rather than a division of scientific literary study.

As a part of traditional study of classical grammar, which was both linguistic and literary but concentrated upon poetic texts, pros. was the study of "accent" (L. accentus, ad-cantus, = Gr. prosodia), of phonetic properties (chiefly temporal) of syllables and words as relevant to the measure (Gr. metron) of rhythm especially in verse, and of meters and the forms of verse generally. In antiquity musical analysis of rhythm, developed also by some philosophers, notably Aristoxenus, was applied to verse by writers called rhythmikoi, whose procedures differed from those of the metrikoi, grammatical or literary metrists like Hephaestion; St. Augustine, De musica, represents late conflation of these. Ancient rhetoric (e.g., Cicero, Orator) included treatment of prose rhythm based on these grammatical, musical, and philosophical sources. Later medieval rhetoric elaborated some aspects of prose rhythm (cursus, etc.), and it is within the frame of rhetoric rather than grammar that versification generally is provided for in late medieval and early modern times: the Fr. Seconde Rethorique is the art of versification. Grammatical and rhetorical elements are often combined with musical in treatments of ars rhythmica and verse in the late middle ages, when poetry was again in close practical association with music. Modern linguistic study of pros. is concerned primarily with the practical functioning of the phonetic elements of speech which accompany and vary but are not directly involved in discrimination of phonemes in the narrow sense, and with the conventions by which these elements (intensity, duration, variation of pitch, and phenomena of interruption and transition between sounds) operate in linguistic systems, by variation and distribution of sonority and massing or grouping of sounds, to produce meanings and discriminate among them; but linguistic pros. has also included investigation of verse and of metrical conventions, since wherever a conventional distinction between prose speech and verse exists within a linguistic community, the conventions relevant to this distinction (though not all the further formalizations of language involved in actual uses of verse) may be considered part of the linguistic system (the langue of De Saussure).

Literary pros. studies the rhythmic structure of prose and verse, not as exemplifying linguistic norms but as functioning (in the parole or actual speech) for literary effect as a component in rhetorical processes or constructions or as an aspect of poetic form. Literary pros. is not directly concerned with the use which language makes of rhythm for linguistic ends; it is in fact more properly concerned with the use which rhythmic impulse makes of language for its own ends when those are involved with the processes or forms of rhetoric and poetry. But literary pros. supposes some understanding of its phonetic materials, and of linguistic conventions along with other conventions in the cultural environment which affect the literary arts in their rhythmic aspect; it is part of the task of a literary pros.

[†] In Supplement, see also GENERATIVE METRICS.

to show how the forms it deals with come to be lodged in the material of a language. Prosodic structures differ from language to language, for languages differ in their selection and emphasis among universally available phonetic elements and modes of combining them, first for use in ordinary speech and then for application to the composition of verse; these are always somehow related, but the nature of their relation also varies (as a language too may vary, sometimes radically in these respects, from one period or dialect to another), so that the requisites and characteristics of verse do not always remain the same even in a single language throughout its history, and more than one system of versification, and various interpenetrations of verse and prose, can exist in a language at the same time.

Strictly phonetic phenomena are often more relevant to literary pros. than to linguistics, and some linguistic phenomena of more concern to literary prosodists than they have been to linguists. It is at times necessary for understanding of verbal rhythms to refer to a broader context of more general or other specialized rhythmic behavior, since the rhythm in a verbal structure may reflect or incorporate that of other rhythmic processes with which the verbal has been associated, or into which it has been assimilated, or which it imitates. Speech is a complex act involving concurrence of the verbal with other physical and mental action, and its rhythm is a property of the speech as a whole, not of its verbal part alone; and the act of speech may be conjoined with other action and so further complicated rhythmically, by the natural or stylized movements of ordinary or ceremonial activities or by the elaborated rhythms of music or the dance. The rhythm of song or of chant differs by such association from that of words only spoken or recited; and there are differences within these classes. It is of course only so much of an external rhythmic context as is somehow registered within the structure of a verbal text that is relevant to literary analysis of the text. It is certainly an error in method to assume the reverse and analyze verbal rhythms only in terms of their correspondence with other rhythm, notably the musical. All species of rhythm have generic aspects in common, and there are indeed specific components in some verbal rhythms that are to be accounted for only by musical association or its residual influence; but there are also elements in all literary rhythms which will be ignored or misrepresented in a description based solely on current conventions of musical analysis. It is with the rhythmic structure of the dance that the verbal rhythms typical of verse have most direct affinity; this is not strange, since speech like the dance is an organization of bodily movements, including those of the specialized "vocal" organs, and it is an ordering of the physical movements and pressures which produce sounds, even more than of the physical motion or vibration which constitutes the sound, that is the basis of rhythm in speech.

The structure of sound in speech is an organization, by relations of similarity and difference, of the elements provided by the physical constitution of speech, a succession of vocal sounds and interruptions of sound by silence occurring in time. The relations in this structure are not of sounds or silences simply or absolutely, but of properties or attributes of sound and of silence. Sounds are differentiated in quality (discriminable character or kind) and in quantity (measurable degree or amount of sonority or of general or specific acoustic magnitude, including that of duration in time; temporal duration is the only common property of sound and silence, and the only positive attribute of silence, which is thus essentially quantitative). The rhythm of speech is a structure of ordered variation in the quantitative aspects of the flow of sound in which contrast is balanced by a cyclic recurrence of some identity. Meter is a fixed schematization of the cyclically recurring identity in a rhythmic series. Structured elements may be involved simultaneously in different sets of relations, and so incorporated concurrently into structural units of different kinds. To some of the intrinsic properties and relations of sounds and silences conventional "values" (purely constructional relations) are assigned by which they become susceptible of the special conventional organization that constitutes the phonological or "phonemic" system of a given language. All grammatical or strictly linguistic structure, the syntactic as well as the phonological, is conventional structure of this kind. Rhetorical and poetic structures are never wholly thus conventional, and the conventions observed in them are never exclusively linguistic or grammatical. Rhetoric and poetry use the constructs of a phonological system as they use grammar generally, but their own constructions, especially those of poetry, make freer use of intrinsic phonetic properties and relations apart from phonological conventionalization, so far as these are not masked beyond recognition in perception by phonological conditioning of attention. It is the sound as heard, the perceptual "phone" or "allophone" rather than the phoneme as such, that is relevant for literary, as distinct from linguistic, structure of sound.

Vocal sound is the result of vibration produced by constriction of the current of air projected from the lungs (by movements of the diaphragm and other muscles of abdomen and chest) through the larynx, throat, and mouth, with resonance in chest and head and modification of the current and vibrations by varying articulation of the parts of organs in these passages, especially in the mouth. Continuity and interruption or remission of sound depend upon and correspond to the muscular actions and pressures of expiration (during which normal speech-sound occurs) and inspiration of air and the pauses between them (which though considerable in breathing at rest are neither frequent nor lengthy in continuous speech, in which inspiration normally follows expiration with no interval of rest); it is therefore primarily to the mechanisms of respiratory pressure that most of the massing and grouping of sounds, and in general their quantitative acoustic effects (especially of intensity and duration, but also largely of pitch) are due. Larger and intermediate groupings are determined by action of the diaphragm supported by the muscles of the abdominal and thoracic walls; the smallest aggregatory (and rhythmic) unit, the syllable, as it occurs in polysyllabic utterance in most languages, appears to be the product of a single pressure ("chest-pulse") of the smaller intercostal muscles. (Uttered in isolation the syllable, like all whole-utterance units, is produced by pressure from the abdomen. In polysyllabic utterances it is a slighter pulsation within a larger stretch of sound produced by sustained abdominal pressure. This is the physiological foundation of the "rhythmic group," for which see below.) Obstruction of the current of air and articulatory modification of vibration and resonance produce qualitative differentiation of sounds, upon which phonemic discrimination of segments of sound is based.

Qualitative differences among sounds are usually described and classified in terms of the articulations involved in their production; but the foundation of phonemic distinctions is a generalizing discrimination of acoustic differences which corresponds at times only loosely to articulatory, or to very sensitive auditory, differentiation. (The phonemes of a language are roughly represented by the letters of an alphabet; hence the name alliteration for repetitive figuration of qualitative similarities in sounds.) Quality in vocal sound may be generally described as the acoustic effect of articulatory action, broadly including all varieties of constriction and obstruction (vocalic, consonantal, liquid, etc.) or of vibration and resonance (voiced, voiceless; oral, nasal, etc.) as well as distinction of organ, part, or place (glottal, palatal, dental, labial etc; dorsal, lateral, apical etc; front, back, high, low etc.) or mode (open, closed, rounded, unrounded; plosive, spirant, affricate, etc.) of articulation. Each vowel or consonant is a composite "bundle" of several such qualitative properties or (sub-phonemic) component "features" (now being systematically classified by Jakobson and others), and the relations upon which qualitative structure of sounds depends are relations among these properties or features rather than among the composite sounds or segments (phonemes) as such. Some qualitative differences, e.g. that between voiced and unvoiced sounds, involve accompanying difference in quantity. But qualitative differentiation of sounds, though its figuration (alliteration, assonance, rhyme) may be combined with and even assimilated to rhythmic structure, is never directly a factor in the production of rhythm, since rhythm is a structure of quantitative relations.

The properties of sound directly relevant to rhythmic structure are the quantitative or quantifiable properties of intensity, duration, and pitch. Intensity (loudness or volume) and duration are obviously quantitative in perceptual effect as well as physically measurable. Pitch (corresponding roughly to frequency of vibration, and thus easily quantified, though not subject to extensive or intensive measurement) has an ambiguous perceptual effect, in part quantitative, in part qualitative. As it is used in language, variation of pitch is normally associated with other variation that is quantitative and, whether independently or because pitch is easily conflated in perception with associated features, its effect is quantitative, increasing the prominence of the sound altered by its variation. The quantitative or prosodic properties of sound are used in language not for their absolute or "inherent" characters (as pitch is used in music) but, in contrasting juxtaposition with other variants of the same property in adjacent sounds within an utterance, to provide "relational" oppositions which have semantic effects or syntactic functions. The prosodic features are therefore often distinguished as "relational" from the "inherent" features by which segmental phonemes are characterized, because the phonologically functional characteristics of the individual phonemic segments are discernible in isolated utterance of single phonemes, whereas it is only in continuous successive utterance of sounds that prosodic contrasts can be observed. A similar distinction now in common use opposes prosodic features as "suprasegmental" to the (qualitative) features of the phonemic "segments" of sound upon which they are imposed; phonologically regulated occurrences of prosodic entities ("prosodic phonemes") may then be called "suprasegmental phonemes," patterns of these called "superfixes," and prosodic superfixes called "suprasegmental morphemes" when they have a fixed "morphological" function in the syntax of a language. (British linguists who follow J. R. Firth make different distinctions, otherwise grounded, among prosodic and "phonematic" entities: cf. R. H. Robins, "Aspects of Prosodic Analysis," Univ. of Durham Philosophical Society, Proc. 1, ser. B, no. 1, 1957.)

The various contrasts provided by the prosodic features are used in some languages for lexical distinctions, between words or functional classes of words (e.g. Eng. contrast, n. = ó o, vb. = o ó), but their most general linguistic use is that of ordering and grouping sounds to produce phonological units that function syntactically. The mechanisms of this ordering and aggregation of sounds are those of "accent" (of intensity, "dynamic"; or of pitch, "tonic"), of "intonation" (systematic successive arrangement of pitch-values) and of "pause" and "timing" (dilation or holding, contraction, and interruption of sound; transition with "junction" of various degrees of "openness" between sounds); these mechanisms and their effects (fusion, reduction or promotion, elision of sounds) may involve accompanying qualitative changes. One of their effects is the production of what is usually called (rhythmic) "cadence," i.e. pattern of successive or positional relation of prominent ("strong" or "emphatic") elements to less prominent ("weak" or "unemphatic") elements. The prominence and weakness relevant for cadence may be of intensity, of duration, or of pitch; these factors may operate singly and distinctly or in combinations; and the phonological patterns of a single language (e.g. ancient Gr. and L., modern Czech, Chinese) may produce distinct "natural" cadences of more than one kind. Cadence involves the two aspects of "span" (the number of elements over which a unitary pattern extends) and "direction" (the positional or successional order of the elements). Direction is usually classified as "rising" (o ó, o o ó), "falling" (ó o, ó o o), "mixed" or "undulating" or "rocking" (o ó o, ó o ó), and "level" or "even" (ó ó, o o); these last and other cadence-units (as ó) exhibiting neither "rise" nor "fall," and often the undulating cadences which include both, are also called "neutral"; cadence is called "alternating" when "emphatic" and "unemphatic" elements of equal span succeed each other in a series (especially when the series begins and ends with the same value) and more loosely when equivalence of span is only approximated.

Hegel based the treatment of verse in his Aesthetik upon a sharp distinction between quantitative and qualitative structures of sound. It is important for analysis to distinguish clearly these two quite distinct kinds of structure; but the distinction is not well drawn in Hegel's often penetrating survey, and he mistakenly conceived the two structures as mutually exclusive alternatives. Though all four properties of sound—quality, pitch, intensity, and duration—are distinct in character and effect, and each produces a different kind of structure or figuration, they do not occur in isolation from each other, and their distinct designs may be combined and interrelated. Rhythmic structure is usually complex, and within it a distinction must be made between primary or constitutive elements which create or establish rhythm and secondary or adjunct elements whose figuration only supports or supplements a more basic rhythmic pattern established by the primary elements. The primary constitutive factors of rhythm in all systems of versification are relations of intensity or of duration; these provide rhythmic structures based upon counting of syllables, on counting or disposition of "stresses," and on general quantitative or specifically temporal "measure" or balance. Pitch is not the primary factor of rhythm in any known system of verse, though it may be used with intensity (as duration may) to enforce or even to supply a "stress," and may possibly function similarly with duration. But when either intensity or duration is the primary factor in creating rhythm, the other may operate along with it as an adjunct secondary element; and with either of these as primary, pitch and quality may be used as adjuncts for secondary figuration, as indeed (since verse is a patterning of properties in speech, not of abstracted sound) may the non-phonetic elements of syntactic construction or of semantic relationship. (These latter are related to rhythmic structure not only in figures of balance, "parallelism"—often syntactic parallel crossing semantic antithesis—and the like, but also in construction and internal division of "lines"—"caesura" etc.—and strophic units.)

Patterns of two elements may operate concurrently in a rhythmic structure, the one reinforcing the other in what then may be regarded as a single complex rhythm (from which nevertheless the distinct characters of the harmonizing components make possible regression to a simpler rhythmic base exploiting only one of them, alone or in new combination with other elements). Patterns of accentual cadence were thus combined with those of durational elements in some phases of L. verse and of late ancient Gr., and there was concurrence of numerical correspondence of syllables with durational patterns in "Aeolic" Gr. lyric verse; in Romance verse there is varying concurrence of accentual patterns, more or less regulated, with syllable-counting.

Secondary figuration of adjunct elements may be assimilated into the basic rhythmic structure created by the primary elements, as an integrated support or extension of the form either of all verse in a given language or of particular species of verse. So in all Old Germanic verse alliteration is combined with a primary stress rhythm; in all Arabic and in all the "classical" Persian and Turkish verse modeled upon it some regulated use of qualitative figuration accompanies rhythmic patterning of temporal durations; in Chinese and in almost all Romance verse some "rhyme" or assonance is used with syllable-counting. With syllable-counting the lǜ-shih, "regulated" or "new style" verse of China since the T'ang period, combines a fixed arrangement of pitches or "tones" (a phenomenon common in "tone languages," i.e. those in which variation of pitch is lexically distinctive); in the most elaborate types of traditional Welsh verse (doubtless the most developed example of the fondness for qualitative filigree universal in Celtic verse-systems) the complex qualitative figuration called cynghanedd (q.v.) complements a basic pattern of syllable-counting; in European verse-systems generally particular forms like the sonnet and in Eng. e.g. the "Limerick" are distinguished by fixed rhyme-schemes.

Secondary figuration may occur also as free supplementary embellishment or optional incidental design not thus integrated into the basic rhythmic form, as with alliteration in modern Eng. or other Germanic verse, or tone-arrangement in the Chinese ku-shih or "old style" verse. Since any entity selected for metrical schematization necessarily occurs in concomitance with other nonschematized entities (e.g. syllabic units are present in "nonsyllabic" verse), and these other entities may themselves be independently patterned or regulated, it is at times difficult to distinguish in a verse-system between elements essential to a metrical scheme and redundant concomitant elements whose concurrence with the more primary rhythmic structure is not adverted to in production or attended to in native perception of the rhythm as such.

Confusion of essential or primary factors in the constitution of standard verse with incidental secondary characteristics typical of such verse produces "doggerel" (q.v.), i.e. a structure which provides some secondary figuration characteristic of normal verse, but lacks an essential requisite of its primary rhythmic form. When elements not independently rhythmic are assimilated into a rhythmic structure (e.g. qualitative figuration or syntactic construction marking or creating divisions within such structure) it is often not easy to disassociate them from the rhythm or to describe the form of the rhythm without including them. Strictly rhythmic structure is always the basis of verse, and in some languages verse is identical with its rhythmic or metrical structure; so purely rhythmic considerations account for all aspects of the complex durational metrical verse of classical Gr. and L., or of the simple syllable-counting verse of Japanese. But in most languages some additional figuration, most often qualitative, is characteristic of verse; and even where it is not incorporated into the discrimen by which verse is distinguished from prose (as alliteration appears to have been in Old Germanic verse) such pararhythmic adjunct figuration may be as meticulously elaborated as the primary rhythmic structure, and sometimes more strictly regulated (Arabic, Prov., Welsh, Icelandic). The scope of prosodic study has therefore in practice generally been extended to include phonetic elements not strictly rhythmical, and elements of syntax and meaning, when these are relevant to the structure of verse. But this extension has not generally modified the traditional conception of the "prosodic" (inherited from its connection with Gr. and L., in which verse and metrical rhythm coincided without discrepancy) as essentially restricted to the rhythmic.

It is by the dynamic functioning of the mechanisms of quantitative variation, in intensity, duration, and pitch, that sounds are aggregated together into the smaller clusters and groups, and then into the larger sequences, that make the (semantically ordered) phonetic structure of "natural" speech. The phonemes themselves are aggregates ("bundles"), and quantitative forces and relations are operative in the process of their combination of qualities as in all phonetic aggregation. But the smallest structural unit of speech in which quantitative aggregation, rather than qualitative differentiation, is felt as the primary factor is the syllable, which may be described acoustically as a single massing of sound between recessions of sonority, usually round a definite peak or center (the "syllabic" nucleus). The formation of syllables is a necessary product of the variation of sonority inevitable in any meaningful flow of speech-sound, and the syllable therefore occurs as the minimal aggregatory unit (and hence the fundamental rhythmic unit) in all languages; but there is much variety among languages in the nature of its composition. This diversity is partly in number and order of syllabic components, but especially in degree of sonority or phonetic mass required or permitted for distinction of individual syllabic nuclei, or degree of diminution of sonority regarded as constituting interstitial recession; in Eng., e.g., splash and sponge are single syllables, but in Japanese it would be difficult to form or hear such combinations as having fewer than four syllables.

In most languages the syllabic center is typically a vowel (V), which may or may not have consonant (C) accompaniment before and (less generally) after: CV, VC, CVC, CCVCC, etc. In such languages it is exceptional, but in most not impossible, that syllabic centers be consonantal (Psst!); but in some languages, like Japanese, a single consonant may be a syllable. An element of duration or "timing" may operate in syllabic construction. In some languages (Eng., Rus.) syllables vary freely in duration; in some (e.g. Sp.) all syllables are approximately equal in duration; in some ("mora" languages, including ancient Gr. and L.) syllabic duration varies, for perception or by convention, only within a ratio of roughly 2:1. (Japanese combines the last two conventions; its ratio of 2:1 in time between "long" and "normal" syllables involves a doubling or gemination imposed upon a basic scheme of uniformly equal timing of normal syllables.)

Where syllables are isochronous the distinct identity of the syllable is never reduced or lost, and equal timing of syllables thus provides for, and appears to induce, syllable-counting in verse, which is then itself a kind of timing. The simple ratio of durations in "mora" languages provides similarly in them for the use of this and a few other such ratios as the basis of internal "measure" in the "feet" of a quite different metrical schematization, as in ancient Gr. and classical L. When syllabic duration varies without regulation, as in the Germanic languages or Rus., it seems not to be related to metrical schematization; in these languages variation in time of syllables is absorbed into the contrast of strong and weak stress which is exploited for verse either simply as such or as forming units ("feet") of patterns of "cadence." In its internal contrast of degrees of sonority or intensity the typical syllable may be said to include the minimal presentation of a pattern of cadence; so e.g. rising or alternating cadence is represented at intra-syllabic level by sequences of the type CV-CV-CV etc., normal in many languages in which CV is the most frequent or the only arrangement used in composing syllables.

The grouping of syllables into larger aggregations is determined in natural speech primarily by the semantic functioning of these larger units in the syntactic structure of a language. (In normal speech the physiological and psychological necessity of variation of energy in production, and of some massing of sounds for perception, are subordinated and adapted to systematized semantic and syntactic ends; when these forces operate independently of conventional semantic and syntactic norms in creating phonetic units, the effect is one of artificial "stylized" histrionic or rhetorical "distortion" of "natural" speech.)

As in their construction of syllables, languages differ in their modes of combining syllables into syntactic unities, and especially in the degree of definiteness with which they mark individual units as distinct phonetic entities either by creating discontinuities between units or by establishing continuity or cohesion within units. The largest units of utterance are marked by pause-boundaries which are true interruptions of sound by silence. The necessity of maintaining a degree of continuity in the phonetic microstructure of speech prohibits general use of actual silence to mark the limits of the smallest aggregatory units; the smaller units therefore depend for unitary integrity and distinctness upon internal "culminative" or concentrating factors rather than upon disruptive external "delimitative" effects generally; intermediate units variously combine culminative and delimitative elements. In the smaller units there is thus a condensation or greater concentration of the integrating factors—"prosodic superfixes" of accentual and intonational patterns and timing—which also appear, with little modification, in more diffused form and distributed over broader spans in the larger units; it may be added that the larger the unit, the more significant in this respect will intonation ("melody") be, the smaller the unit the more dependent upon the other prosodic factors for its identity. The smallest unit of aggregation, the syllable, is normally distinguished primarily by the relative prominence of its nuclear center or "syllabic"; its borders are often indeterminate.

The next phonetic aggregate beyond the syllable, the syllabic or rhythmic group, is also usually thus characterized primarily by internal nuclear concentration; it is a sound-cluster spoken with a single phonologically conventionalized pattern or "contour" of accentuation and intonation, the nuclear center or peak of which in the free or full form is a phonologically maximal or "primary" accent (either "dynamic" or "tonic"). In the group-unit it is the nuclear center that is most distinctive; the limits of the group may be marked by any degree of openness in juncture, and they are often, as in the syllable, obscure. (For the nuclear center of the rhythmic group the term centroid was much used in phonetic and psychological studies of rhythm early in this century, and became common in literary prosody; it has not been used in the more recently developed terminology of the newer linguistics. For rhythmic analysis it has the advantage of supplying for the group a term exactly corresponding to "syllabic" for the syllable, and of abstracting from specification of factors involved to generalized neutral indication of a focus of relations.) The group-unit may be a single syllable (Yes!), or several "words" grouped by a single primary accent; it may stand alone as a sentence, or form part of a sentence in which several groups are combined either by subordinating hypotaxis or in paratactic coordination. The group-unit is the minimal free unit of utterance and as such the type of all free utterance-units, for the rest of which its phonological structure may be said to establish a basic norm preserved through various extensions in the larger units. No utterance can be made without this unit, and all utterances consist of such units and their extensions.

Syllabic groups are either simple or composite. A simple group includes no accent potentially "primary" other than that of its contour-nucleus; it may however, in a language provided with sufficient grading of stress or variation of pitch, include syllables with accent of "secondary" (or "tertiary") degree, normally incapable of optional utterance as primary. Composite groups include more than one potential primary or nuclear accent, all but one reduced to secondary level, under a single intonation-contour; a group is composite therefore when it is susceptible of optional utterance as a sequence of more than one group by imposition of additional contours of accentuation and intonation with secondary accents of the composite group as nuclear centers (under these circumstances, $\delta \circ \delta \delta \circ \delta \circ \delta$, optionally e.g. $\delta \circ$, δ , $\delta \circ \delta \circ \delta \wedge$). A composite group is thus a hypotactic inclusion of two or more potentially independent groups under the dominance of the contour and nuclear accent of one. The independent form of a simple group (exemplified in isolated utterance of a single word) is marked by full, if condensed, presentation of a complete intonation-contour; in the included form, this contour is reduced to its accentual nucleus alone, and this in turn reduced to secondary rank or suppressed. The varying distinctness of potential and actual group-units depends upon the definiteness with which subordinated nuclei affirm themselves as such; relatively slight nuclear concentration may suffice to assert a vestigial group-identity. Within the group-unit, even when it is monosyllabic, there appears a pattern of cadence; the accentual contour is a cadence-pattern. It is at the level of the syllabic group that cadence becomes conspicuous in speech. The general cadence of speech, as distinct from the succession of the unitary cadences of its group-units, is the continuous pattern within it of positional relation of prominent and unemphatic syllables, without reference to group division or group-boundaries, and hence without reference to group-contours as such.

In this general cadence, especially when it presents or suggests the regularity of alternation or other continuous recurrence, secondary accents rise to greater perceptual importance without any phonetic increase or modification. Regulation of general cadence by schematization of recurrence within it provides cadencemeter in "stress" languages, notably the Germanic, including Eng. With such meters there can be interplay and tension between the continuous scheme of the metrically regulated general cadence and the varying patterns of the successive group-cadences; in languages with metrical schematization of cadence patterns other than those directly relevant to contours of aggregation, as in the durational feet of Gr. (aggregating by tonic accent) and L. (aggregating probably by stress of intensity), there can be contrast of these metrical patterns with "natural" aggregational cadence generally (in some forms of classical L. verse possibly regulated with reference to the patterns of the meter). The unit of recurrence in the minimal serial rhythm of normal prose seems always to be simply the phonological group-entity as such, without further schematization; to this unit nuclear concentration alone is essential, and cadence is as such irrelevant or redundant. (The group-entity itself however involves uniformity other than repetition of group-character in languages where the position of the nuclear accent within groups is fixed, as e.g. in Fr. at or near the end. Regular serial repetition of a scheme of cadence as such, which would make of this scheme a unit of recurrence distinct from the group-entity, would compromise the non-metrical character of rhythm in prose, since such schematization of recurrence is what constitutes meter.) But in the sporadic figuration which characterizes the further rhythmization of prose (and distinguishes prose called "rhythmical") patterns of cadence may have a conspicuous part, especially at the ends of syntactic or rhetorical units, where cadence patterns in systems involving two or more groups are common; cf. L. clausulae, cursus.

The larger rhythmic patterns of prose result from a massing and distribution of stronger and weaker elements in units corresponding to the larger syntactic and rhetorical entities ("phrases," intermediate members, sentences; the comma, colon, and period of ancient rhetoric); in these units cadence strictly so called is replaced or superseded by a larger movement, surge or swell and fall or undulation, which is only analogous to the minor if sharper contrasts of syllabic units within centroidal groups. Cadence strictly so called is a property of the macrostructure of speech and not, in the natural form of speech, conspicuously apparent in its microstructure. But in the configurational design of the larger units a cadence of their microstructural elements may have a part, and cadence in the strict sense may be one of the factors involved in the prominence or emphasis of the "emphatic" part of a large rhetorical unit.

The centroidal syllabic group-unit is often

identified by phonologists with the syntactic word-unit, and sometimes referred to as the "phonetic [or phonemic] word." Actually, both of the smallest phonological units of aggregation, the syllable and the group, are essentially phonetic entities whose correspondence with syntactic units is not fixed. Of rhetorical and syntactic groupings of sounds other than the syllable and the group-unit it may be said that in them phonetic boundaries always coincide with those of the same or similar syntactic units; but there is no single syntactic, or morphological, entity that invariably corresponds to or coincides with either the syllable or the centroidal syllabic group. The syllable may be either a part of a word or a word (in "monosyllabic" languages, e.g. Chinese, this latter is the norm; in other languages the proportion of monosyllabic to polysyllabic words, as of simple to compound words, in the lexicon varies). So the syllabic "group" may be a single word (possibly monosyllabic) or a combination of words (the accent of one the nuclear centroid of the group, other words "proclitic" or "enclitic" to this) or, more rarely, a part of a word-unit (e.g. in optional eccentric utterance, impossible = ó, ó o o). The word is not a phonetic unit but a syntactic (morphological-lexical) entity; phonetically it corresponds normally and typically with a single syllabic group, but not always. Any of the larger grammatical or rhetorical units (phrase, member, sentence) may also be phonetically a single centroidal group, and indeed monosyllabic. Usually and typically, of course, these larger units include more than one group. When this is the case, the phonological structure of such units includes some form of nuclear concentration (usually at or near the end), and especially a more or less diffused intonation-contour (with specific meaning-effect as well as terminal character), but the identity of larger units is established primarily by the occurrence of more open junctures at their boundaries; wholly terminal juncture is always a silence of indeterminate length.

Since their general intonation and delimitative junctures are sufficient to sustain their identity without reduction of accent in their component centroidal groups, these larger units of speech have the character of serial sequences of the smaller units rather than of systematic aggregation by nuclear accents; accentually they are sequence-units rather than strict aggregations. A distinction of this kind, between sequence-units created by imposing limits upon series, and units which are systems by virtue of internal aggregatory structure, is of use in all analysis. But the units relevant for rhythmic structure are not exclusively or even principally (in verse) the phonetic units that correspond to functional syntactic or rhetorical divisions. These divisions, of words, phrases, cola, and sentences or "periods," are indeed present everywhere in speech, and operate throughout its structure to create effects of "balance" and "measure," the ground of rhythm. All rhythm in speech is a relation among speech-units involved in establishment and conveyance of meaning, and relations among lexical and syntactic units, when these are regarded simply as unitary entities and their masses or characters in any way balanced or "measured" against each other, are not only rhythmic but examples of the most basic and elementary form of rhythm in speech; it is from this foundation that all the more complex rhythms of verse and meter develop by a more or less natural progression, and to this again that, whenever their progressive impulse is enfeebled or momentarily relaxed, they regress. Such elementary balancing occurs in simple paratactic series (lists of coordinate items in menus, scores, marshalings, litanies, etc.) or as relating systems hypotactically ordered internally. The items in such measured relation may be phonetically very disparate; but wherever we are conscious of pronounced balance or measure there is phonetic correspondence or congruence as well as semantic or syntactic, and not only of the balanced entities as total units but also of their component elements. The type of such balance is therefore one that rests primarily upon phonetic correspondence, as in parison or isocolon.

The rhythm thus created by patterns, especially of accentual grouping and phrasing, in the "natural" functional units of speech from the group-unit to the "paragraph," is the fundamental and most basic rhythm in all speech whether prose or verse, metrical or unmetrical. When this rhythm appears alone, and the balance and measure of the speech is due exclusively to patterning of its "natural" functional units with no cyclic recurrence other than that of the group-entity, the rhythm is that of normal prose. Metrical rhythm is distinguished from that of prose by having as the unit of cyclic recurrence not the group-entity but an entity constituted "artificially" by abstraction and recombination of prosodic components of the group in some fixed scheme. The metrical schematization of cyclic entities may itself be serial—a counting of syllables (syllabics) or of "stresses"—producing units ("lines") larger than the typical group-unit but distinct both from it and from the rhetorical units into which groups are aggregated "naturally"; or it may be systematic, an arrangement or ratio of contrasting elements or values, providing units (typically "feet") distinct from the group-unit which may then be ordered by serial count or systematic arrangement into line-units distinct from the larger units of "natural" aggregation; line-units formed in either of these ways may then in turn be ordered together either serially ("stichically") or in some systematic ("strophic") arrangement, which may in its turn be repeated serially or, as in the Gr. choral ode, itself subjected to a further systematic ordering. The selection of elements for metrical schematization and of types of schemes is determined in part by the nature of a language, in part by historical accident; one could not have predicted of L. in its pre-classical stage that its classical verse would adopt Gr. schemes. Once the elements are selected, the multiple contrasts of values of these elements in "natural" speech are commonly reduced to a simple binary opposition for metrical construction (variety of stress-value to "stress" vs. "unstress," pitch variation to "level" vs. "inflected," durations to "long" and "short").

Though a scheme tends to be maintained continuously in recognizable form, once the unit of recurrence is established the essential recurrence is of its unit-character as such rather than of the scheme that specifies it; there is in the metrical verse of most languages, both at the level of the cyclic unit or foot and at that of the line, a good deal of variety in satisfaction of schematic norms ("substitution" etc.) Line-units have in common with the larger units of "natural" aggregation that their terminal sections are their most determinate parts; freedom of variation is more often permitted in the earlier part than at the end, and sometimes schematization is specially or exclusively fixed at or near the end of the line; strophic systematization of lines seems to enforce determinacy at line-ends (Vedic; cf. very general use of end-rhyme as enforcing supplement).

In general it may be said that where there is continuous recurrence of a fixed schematization of a unit roughly equal to or smaller than a typical aggregatory group (or word-unit), the rhythm of the speech is metrical; if there is continuous recurrence throughout of a schematized unit larger than the typical group or word-unit, the rhythm is that of verse (which may be unmetrical, or "free," if there is no continuous recurrence of a schematized cycle at or below the level of the group); where neither of these occurs, the rhythm is that of prose. Rhythmically intermediate speech, conventionally distinguished in many (especially Oriental) languages, though lacking the continuous cyclic schematization which would make it metrical, and the continuous division by lines which would make it verse, supplements the unschematized rhythm of ordinary prose by figuration of the same elements used in the schematizations of meter or of verse.

The datum of a prosodic analysis is ideally an oral performance (actual or conceived) rather than a written text. But every performance is governed by norms supplied by a text, and performance itself is to be judged by its conformity to the textual norm, determined from the graphic signs interpreted in turn by norms provided by the conventions of the given language generally and any relevant special conventions or usages (of period or author, possibly indicated by particular marketings etc.). In practice, a performance represents an abstraction of norms from a text; a prosodic analysis may therefore be a description in terms of such an abstraction of norms, representing perhaps more than one possible performance. Most metrical texts can be performed in more than one way within the limits of a single scansion; many can be read so as to present more than one possible metrical organization.

J. Caramuel (y Lobkowitz), Primus Calamus ob oculis ponens Metametricam (I, Rome 1653; II, 1665); M. Kawczynski, Essai comparatif sur l'origine et l'histoire des rythmes (1889); R. Westphal, Allgemeine Metrik (1892); P. Verrier, Essai sur les principes de la métrique anglaise, II (1909; livre 3, ch. v, "Origine et évolution des mètres poétiques," comparative survey); C. Jacob, Foundations and Nature of Verse (1918); A. Meillet, Les origines indo-européennes des mètres grecs (1923); E. A. Sonnenschein, What is Rhythm? (1925); O. Schröder, Nomenclator Metricus (1929); "Metrica" in Enciclopedia Italiana, XXIII (1934); A. Arnholtz, Studier i poetisk og musikalsk Rytmiik, I (1938); E. Olson, General Pros. (1938); J. C. La Drière, "Prose Rhythm," "Pros.," in Shipley and "Comparative Method in . . . Pros.," Comparative Literature, ed. W. P. Friederich (Intern. Comparative Lit. Assoc. 2d Cong. Proc., 1959); A. W. De Groot, Algemene Versleer (1946); Sound and Poetry, ed. N. Frye (1957; Whitehall, typography, pp. 143-44); Manual of Phonetics, ed. L. Kaiser (1957; esp. Jakobson, Halle, 215ff., Von Essen, 295ff., De Groot, 385ff.); J. Lotz, "Metric Typology," Style in Language, ed. T. Sebeok (1960); International Conference of Work-in-Progress Devoted to Problems of Poetics. 1st, Warsaw, 1960. Poetics . . . (1961); C. Watkins, "Indo-European Metrics and Archaic Ir. Verse," Celtica, 6 (1962); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden L. Artistry (1963); V. Nabokov, "Notes on Pros.," in his tr. of Pushkin, Eugene Onegin (1964).

J.C.LAD.

PROSOPOPOEIA (fr. Gr. prosōpon "face," "person," and poiein "to make"). Term occasionally still used for personification (q.v.).

PROVENÇAL POETRY. The term "Prov.," applied to the poets who cultivated the language in the Middle Ages (the trobadors), coincides with the ancient Roman "provincia" in what is now southern France. As a literary language it attained artificial uniformity throughout the territory, but where the same individual (e.g., Daude de Pradas) was at the same time poet and businessman, the non-literary documents he left behind show marked variations in dialect from the standard.

These writers produced largely, though not exclusively, lyric verse, which, from roughly the middle of the 11th c. through the 13th, was supreme in Europe. Since the discovery of the Sp. jarchas, the chronological priority of Prov. has been laid open to debate, but the basic importance of its impact on the literature of the continent remains unchallenged.

It is unexplained how it is that the first known name, that of William IX of Aquitaine (1071-ca. 1127), already shows, along with a sometimes primitive versification (aaab stanza) and themes fit for a baronial "stag party," the essentials of the courtly tone. This troublesome seigneur assumes an already conventional humility, it seems, before a quintessential domna, or lady far above him on a pedestal.

After him, practitioners of the art become numerous. To cite a few: the dour Marcabru, ever ready to belabor the world's foibles with the fervor of an Old Testament prophet, writing, at the same time, delightful pastourelles, dialogues between the "city slicker" and the no less astute shepherdess. There is Giraut de Borneil, a student in winter, but wandering minstrel in summer, accompanied by two performers who handled the sonet, or air that came perforce with each poem; contrasting in tone, Bernart de Ventadorn, truly sensitive in an essentially unromantic era. There was Peire Vidal, whose nimble wit and highly developed craftsmanship caused his works to be frequently misunderstood and even his biography miscolored in a modern novel.

Presentation soon becomes all-important, showing up in rimas caras (literally "costly rhymes"), sublimated language, and complex strophic form. Ideas were often so preciously conceived that a quarrel ensued between Giraut de Borneil and Raimbaut d'Aurenga as to whether a style should be easily comprehensible (trobar leu) or hermetic (trobar clus), an issue which may never be settled.

The supposedly resultant dearth of content was more apparent than real. True, some content themselves with an air of false, but fashionable, profundity; in many instances genuine, but equally heavy scholasticism is all too evident. Many an abstraction in the courtly terminology stems from the learning of the times.

Such a spirit often invades the genre least capable of admitting it, the canso (Fr. chanson). Here love is the almost exclusive concern and nowhere is there displayed with so great and ceaseless complacency the poet's heart seared by amorous flames. Yet there is nothing tragic, not a single note of fatality about the whole business. The lover surrenders himself to the inexorable mistress upon due reflection and of his free will, since that is what a court person is expected to do in order to demonstrate his valor, or innate worth, and, through service to the lady, acquire pretz, or esteem. The identity of the mistress supposedly remained a secret and the love of the suitor completely disinterested. Both conditions could be theoretical.

Obviously such a poet was of the courts, even when his origin was lowly, and it was for the courts that he wrote. The day when the troops of Simon de Montfort, under royal or papal sponsorship, laid siege to their first castle in the Midi marks the first catastrophic step in the decline of all Prov. lyric. Thanks to the Inquisition, the adoration of the lady takes on a religious cast and the canso assumes a new character. Some genres get a new lease on life, like the sirventes, a satiric type, early immortalized by Bertran de Born, and flourishing again at the hands of the anticlerical Peire Cardenal; but the manifestation is brief. It is curious that the charming pastourelle takes on newer colors with the "last of the court poets," Guiraut Riquier, who makes of the songs true novelettes by grouping them in cycles.

If ideas became circumscribed, form was even more so. In the canso, the number of strophes was usually 5 to 7, with 1 or 2 additional half-strophes, called tornadas, serving as envois, dedicated to ladies or patrons, often addressed to the minstrel charged with their delivery. The stanzas had to be identical in form, sung as they were to identical melodies. They might all possess the same rhymes (unissonans) or differ in scheme (utrissonans). Sometimes a rhymeless verse was used (estramp), repeated in corresponding position in each stanza and serving as link between them. Especially in the earlier days, the term vers was used for this form, and it is hard to distinguish the two, at times, except for a greater tendency on the part of the vers toward masculine rhymes, a greater liberty in the number of strophes, and increased emphasis on satire or humor. The distinction, however, can scarcely be established in a short definition.

Steadier vogue was enjoyed by the dialogue forms, the joc partit and the tenso, both debates, largely on love casuistry, the difference being that, in the former, the opponent could choose any side, while in the latter he could not. The debate could involve no more than a cobla, or single stanza by way of statement and another in reply. Such a form often possessed a decided sting. The planh, or lament, reflects existing society. Reciting the virtues of a defunct patron, it dilates upon the departure of Pretz and Valor, by which, however, it is implied that a generous giver is no longer available. It is an exaggeration, on the other hand, to say that the genre is without emotion. Close to the modern romantic mood is the alba or dawn song, wherein a lover takes leave of his lady, while (at least in one case) a friend, acting as lookout, warns him of approaching day. The alba can also be strictly religious.

For decades, performers used crude manuscripts or learned their songs by heart. When the end of the bloom period was felt near, a great deal of extant material was gathered into beautiful anthologies, especially in Italy, where the Renaissance favored such activity. To this circumstance much Prov. lyric owes its survival. To the creation of anthologies we owe the earliest Prov. literary prose in the form of "biographical" sketches, called vidas, and comments, called razos, which purportedly showed the genesis of their accompanying poems. These so developed that they ultimately became a separate genre, later to become the novella.

So much for the lyric, which dominated the scene. There were epics, like the Jaufre and the Girart de Roussillon, the latter in mixed Fr. and Prov. Both are readable specimens, indeed much so, but southern epics are inferior to those of the north. Among the romances, where the south ranks high, the peer of them all is the Flamenca, in which the age-old subject of jealousy is treated with a skill that still excites admiration.

The 14th c. represents a drop in quantity and quality. Letting alone the uninspired treatises on versification or grammar (Leys d'Amors, Razos de trobar), we may indicate medieval encyclopedic works like the Breviari d'Amor, by the Franciscan friar Matfré Ermenegaut, which, though it does include a "Perilous Treatise" on love, with copious citations from "authorities" like the trobadors, also takes in anything from astronomy to theology.

Religious literature multiplies in the later Middle Ages, but it is usually mediocre. The drama (e.g., the mystery play of St. Agnes) gives evidence of vitality. Production during the Renaissance is permeated with northern Fr. influence; the Toulouse academy, founded at the end of the bloom period, awarded prizes even to works not in any dialect of the Midi. Names could be cited, one of the few interesting ones available being the Gascon Pey de Garros, who shows the impact of the Reformation in the region. From the 18th c. one may perhaps select the earthy tales of Abbé Favre, notably the Sermoun de Moussu Sistre, popular enough, in 1919, to be sold on the newsstands of Montpellier. Favre and others showed their devotion to antiquity by translations, adaptations, even parodies of epics and the like.

Not until the 19th c. does a truly new movement like the Félibrige (q.v.) bring the humble patois back into the realm of world literature. Its chief, Frédéric Mistral, was awarded the Nobel Prize for outstanding lyrics, and for Nerto and Miréio, the latter set to music by Gounod. Mistral is one of several worthies.

Recently it has seemed, despite valiant efforts, that Prov. was fighting a losing battle, though, in contrast with other Fr. patois it is far from dead. Even the local verse written by the Résistants of World War II is evidence of real literary potentiality.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: A. Jeanroy, Bibliographie sommaire des chansonniers provençaux (1916); A. Pillet and H. Carstens, Bibliog. der Troubadours (1933); C. Brunel, Bibliog. des manuscrits littéraires en ancien prov. (1935); P. L. Berthaud, Bibliog. occitane (1946); Crit. Bibliog. of Fr. Lit., gen. ed. D. C. Cabeen, 1 (1952; enl. ed. U. T. Holmes).

ANTHOLOGIES: Choix des poésies originales des troubadours, ed. F.J.M. Raynouard (6 v., 1816-21); Gedichte der Troubadours in provenzalischer Sprache, ed. K.A.F. Mahn (4 v., 1856-73); Chrestomathie provençale, ed. K. Bartsch (6th ed., 1904); Anthologie des tr., ed. J. Anglade (1927); Anthol. des tr., ed. A. Jeanroy (1928); Nouvelle anthol. des tr., ed. J. Audiau and R. Lavaud (1928); Provenzalische Chrestomathie, ed. C. Appel (6th ed., 1930); Anthol. of the Prov. Tr., ed. R. T. Hill and T. G. Bergin (1941); La lirica de los trovadores, ed. M. de Riquer, 1 (1948); Poètes provençaux d'aujourd'hui (1957); Leben und Lieder der provenzalischen Tr., ed. E. Lommatzsch (2 v., 1957-59); Anthologie de la poésie occitane, ed. and tr. A. Berry (1961).

GENERAL STUDIES: J. Anglade, Hist. sommaire de la litt. méridionale (1921); A. Jeanroy, Poésie lyrique des tr. (2 v., 1934) and Hist. sommaire de la poésie occitane (1945); P. Remy, La litt. prov. au moyen-âge (1944); M. de Riquer, Resumen de literatura provenzal trovadoresca (1948); A. Viscardi, Storia delle letterature d'oc et d'oïl (1952); V. Roche, Prov. Regionalism (1954); E. Hoepfner, Les tr. (1955); M. Valency, In Praise of Love (1958).

VERSIFICATION: G. Lote, Hist. du vers fr. (3 v., 1949-55); I. Frank, Répertoire métrique de la poésie des tr. (1953-57).—SPECIFIC GENRES: H. Springer, Das altprovenzalische Klagelied (1895); K. Lewent, Das altprovenzalische Kreuzlied (1905); J. Jones, La tenson prov. (1934); H. J. Chaytor, The Prov. Chanson de Geste (1946); J. Boutière and A. H. Schütz, Les biographies des tr. (1950). A.H.S.

PROVERB. A saying current among the folk, often pithily or wittily expressed. Proverbial subjects favor customs, superstitions, legal maxims, "blasons populaires," weather and medical lore, conventional phrases, and prophecies. Proverbs are among the oldest poetic works in Sanskrit, Hebrew, Germanic, and Scandinavian literatures. "Learned" proverbs are those long current in literature, as distinct from "popular" tradition. The former come into Western European literature both from the Bible and the Church Fathers and from such classical sources as Aristophanes, Theophrastus, Lucian, and Plautus. Erasmus' Adagia (1500) was instrumental in spreading classical proverb lore among the European vernaculars. The first Eng. collection was A Dialogue conteining . . . all the proverbs in the English tongue (1546) by John Heywood. Proverbs had been commonly used by OE and ME writers, particularly Chaucer. The Elizabethan delight in proverbs is evident in John Lyly's Euphues (1578-80) and in countless plays of the period; proverbs are common in Shakespeare. The genres of literature in which they frequently occur are the didactic (e.g., Chaucer's Tale of Melibeus, Franklin's The Way to Wealth, Goethe's "Sprichwörtliches"); the satirical (Pope's writings, passim); works depicting folk characters (Don Quixote, J. R. Lowell's The Biglow Papers, Faulkner's The Hamlet); works reproducing local or national characteristics (E. A. Robinson's New England); and literary tours de force (Villon's Ballade des proverbes).—A. Taylor, The Proverb (1931); B. J. Whiting, Chaucer's Use of Proverbs (1934); W. G. Smith, The Oxford Dict. of Eng. Proverbs (2d ed. rev., P. Harvey, 1948); M. P. Tilley, A Dict. of the Proverbs in England in the 16th and 17th Centuries . . . (1950). D.H.

PRYDDEST. During much of the 19th c., and usually to this day, the "crown," which is the second highest award for a poem in the National Eisteddfod of Wales, is given for a "p.": a poem of considerable length in "free-meter" (q.v.) and not necessarily in cynganedd (q.v.). The need for some such poetic form was seen by the 18th-c. poet and critic Goronwy Owen, who realized that the genius of the traditional Welsh poetic art was lyric and panegyric. Under Augustan influence he sought after a Welsh epic or heroic poem, and introduced into Wales a Miltonic ideal. Many attempts were made in the 19th c. to compose along these lines. The 20th-c. p. is usually shorter, more varied in style and lighter in touch. Romantic narrative and description have become popular, and great scope has been found within the p. form for metrical experiment, and for enlarging the scope of Welsh poetry. D.M.L.

PSEUDO-STATEMENT. Though I. A. Richards, when he introduced "pseudo-statement," in Science and Poetry (1926), used it fifteen times, he did not formally define it; he gave only two instances of p.-s. labeled as such (one from poetry—Blake's "O Rose, thou art sick!" [p. 69]), and his use of the term seemed to hover over at least three different but related senses. In each of these senses, part of what was meant by the term is a string of words that affects our feelings and attitudes (desirably or undesirably)—organizes (or disorganizes) our impulses—and, hence, is true or false only in some pragmatic sense of "true" and "false." What was additionally meant in Sense (1) is a string of words that is in the form of a statement but that—because factually meaningless (empirically unverifiable) and, hence, neither true nor false in the usual sense of "true" and "false"—is not in fact a statement; in Sense (2), a string of words that in certain contexts (scientific ones, e.g.) is a statement but that in certain other ones (poetic ones, at least) is not; and, in Sense (3), a false statement. Blake's line is certainly an instance of p.-s. in Sense (2). In the context of his poem, it is neither true nor false: it neither gives nor pretends to give information. Twenty-nine years later, in Speculative Instruments, Richards explicitly avowed Sense (2) and disavowed Sense (3), saying that "literary folk" had wrongly taken him to mean (3) and that "the more I pointed out that I didn't and couldn't mean that because I meant that—as they [pseudo-statements] occurred in the poetry—they are not statements at all, . . . the more glumly convinced my critics were that I was calling poetry names" (p. 148).

The term has had a curious history. For one thing, though the reviewers of Science and Poetry took little notice of the term, it was the subject of considerable controversy in the 1930's and the early 1940's—partly (one suspects) because "pseudo" is usually pejorative, partly because Richards' use of "p.-s." was, as Murry was first to point out, ambiguous, and partly because the theory in which the term had a rôle (that poetry is not cognitive but emotive) was unacceptable to some critics (Tate, preeminently). For another thing, between 1926 and 1955, though Richards often discussed the problem (of poetry and beliefs) that had occasioned his first uses of the term, he abandoned the term, perhaps because of its poor reception. And, finally, the term was, though often the subject of discussion, rarely a means of discussion—which is a pity, for, in Sense (2) at least, it could function usefully. Wheelwright proposes "poetic statement" as "a more suitable and less misleading term" in Sense (2) ("On the Semantics of Poetry," p. 273). —I. A. Richards, Science and Poetry (1926), Practical Crit. (1929; esp. pp. 186–88), "Belief," Sym., 1 (1930), and Speculative Instruments (1955); A. Tate, "The Revolt against Lit.," New Republic, 49 (1927), "Three Types of Poetry: III," ibid., 78 (1934), "The Present Function of Crit.," Southern Review, 6 (1940), and "Lit. as Knowledge. . .," ibid., 6 (1941); T. S. Eliot, "Lit., Science, and Dogma," Dial [New York], 82 (1927) and "Dante" (1929), Selected Essays 1917–1932 (1932); J. M. Murry, "Beauty Is Truth," Sym., 1 (1930). P. Wheelwright, "Poetry and Logic," Sym., 1 (1930) and "On the Semantics of Poetry," KR, 2 (1940).

M.S.

PSYCHOANALYSIS AND POETRY.† See SCIENCE AND POETRY.

PSYCHOLOGICAL CRITICISM.† See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

PUN. A figure of speech depending upon a similarity of sound and a disparity of meaning. For a successful p., the reader must recognize multiple meanings in a context where all these meanings can be applied. The figure is apparently as old as language, possessing irresistible appeal and appearing in all literatures. It is discussed and analyzed in the classic treatises of rhetoric by Aristotle, by Cicero, and in the anonymous Rhetorica ad Herennium, where three varieties are discriminated: transductio, adnominatio, and significatio. Transductio refers to the use of the same word in different connotations or a balancing of homonyms; adnominatio is the repetition of a word with the addition of suffixes, prefixes, or with transposition of letters or sounds; significatio is closest to the modern p., including double entendre. The medieval rhetoricians, Geoffrey of Vinsauf in his Poetria Nova and John of Garland in his Ars Versificandi made the figure available to such writers as Chaucer and the author of the Roman de la Rose. The p. was not looked upon by classical, medieval, or Renaissance writers as primarily a vehicle for humor. For example, the medieval rime riche, a form of transductio, the use of homonyms in different senses as the rhyming words (e.g., lief-leef [lief-leaf] was looked upon as a beauty rather than a blemish. The p. could be used for comic effect, but it was also a means of emphasis and an instrument of persuasion. Shakespeare uses it for both serious and bawdy purposes. Like most Renaissance writers, Shakespeare followed the divisions of p. by contemporary rhetoricians into antanaclasses, syllepsis, paronomasia, and asteismus. In antanaclasses, a word is repeated, with a shift in meaning:

To England will I steal, and there I'll steal.
(Henry V, 5.1.92)

In syllepsis, a word is used once, with two meanings:

At a word, hang no more about me. I am no gibbet for you.
(Merry Wives of Windsor 2.2.17)

In paronomasia, the repeated words are close but not exactly the same in sound:

Out sword, and to a sore purpose!
(Cymbeline 4.1.25)

In asteismus, a speaker replies to another, using the first man's words in a different sense:

Cloten: Would he had been one of my rank!
Lord: To have smell'd like a fool.
(Cymbeline 2.1.17)

At the same time the p. was esteemed as an adornment for sermons, and Lancelot Andrews can play on gin as both snare and engine or contrivance without comic intent. By the end of the 17th c., word games and excessive ingenuity had brought the p. into disrepute, and by Addison's time, its use seemed a fault. In Spectator no. 61, he indicts it as "false wit" and explains it away in the works of "the most ancient Polite Authors" by their being "destitute of all Rules and Arts of Criticism." From the low critical esteem of the early 18th c., the p. has never recovered full respectability. It is negligible as a serious figure of rhetoric in the romantic period, occurring most notably in a far-fetched form as a sort of consciously outrageous comedy, as in Charles Lamb's "Lamb-puns," or in Barham's Ingoldsby Legends, where in one poem a witch is caught "by a Hugh and a cry." The kind of serious word-play of Verlaine's

Il pleure dans mon coeur Comme il pleut sur la ville would have been thoroughly unlikely in 19th-c. England. Only in the present day, with a revival of interest in the metaphysical poets and greater scholarly interest in medieval and Renaissance rhetoric, has there been any kind of rehabilitation of the p. as a figure of speech and any serious interest in it found in criticism. The allusiveness of modern verse is related to punning, the original context of the quotation standing for the second sense of the word, and here frequently modern poetry makes an approach to the serious wit of the Renaissance (e.g., Eliot's The Waste Land, "When lovely woman stoops to folly and . . ." and "Good night, sweet ladies, good night . . ."). However, another influence, the exuberant word-play in Joyce's Ulysses and the mass of interlingual puns in Finnegans Wake (balmheartzyheat—Barmherzigkeit) is working to keep the comic aspect of the p. dominant.

† In Supplement, see also PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY.

W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1947); Sister Miriam Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); H. Kökeritz, "Punning Names in Shakespeare," MLN, 65 (1950) and "Rhetorical Word-Play in Chaucer," PMLA, 69 (1954); W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "Verbal Style, Logical and Counterlogical," PMLA, 65 (1950); P. F. Baum, "Chaucer's Puns," PMLA, 71 (1956); J. Brown, "Eight Types of Puns," PMLA, 71 (1956); M. M. Mahood, Shakespeare's Wordplay (1957). S.F.F.

PURE POETRY is a prescriptive rather than a descriptive term in that it designates, not an actual body of verse, but a theoretical ideal to which poetry may aspire. Any theory of poetry which seeks to isolate one or more properties as essential and proceeds to exclude material considered to be nonessential may be classed as a doctrine of pure poetry. Interpreted in the widest sense, it could be applied to divergent points of view occurring within a broad historical range, such as Sidney's strictures on tragi-comedy and the 18th-c. idea of "sublimity."

Most specifically, the term refers to "La Poésie pure," a doctrine derived from Edgar Allan Poe by the Fr. symbolist poets, Baudelaire, Mallarmé, and Valéry, and widely discussed in the late 19th and early 20th c. In this context, "pure" is equivalent to absolute, on the analogy of absolute music. The analogy is significant in that both the theory and practice of the symbolists were influenced by the relations of poetry and music.

The doctrine was first enunciated in Poe's "The Poetic Principle." For Poe, the essential quality of poetry is a kind of lyricism distinguished by intensity and virtually identical with music in its effects. Since the duration of intensity is limited by psychological conditions, Poe concludes that the long poem is a contradiction in terms and that passages which fail to achieve a high level of intensity should not be included in the category of poetry. Poetry is regarded as being entirely an aesthetic phenomenon, differentiated from and independent of the intellect and the moral sense. The products of the latter, ideas and passions, are judged to be within the province of prose and their presence in a poem to be positively detrimental to the poetic effect.

In their desire to attain in poetry the condition of music, the symbolists were wholehearted disciples of Poe; in elaborating his theory, however, they were far more aware of the problem of language than Poe had been. The relevance of the doctrine of pure poetry to contemporary theory rests almost entirely upon its concern with the symbolic or iconic properties of language. The impetus toward this line of speculation was given in Baudelaire's rephrasing of Poe's idea: The goal of poetry is of the same nature as its principle and it should have nothing in view but itself. The general import appears to be nothing more than an affirmation of art for art's sake but the technical implications are far reaching. The aim of the symbolists was to confer autonomy upon poetry by reducing to a minimum the semantic properties of language and by exploiting the phonetic properties of words and their marginal or suggestive meanings.

It would not be accurate to ascribe unity of aim to the whole symbolist movement. For Baudelaire, the autonomy of poetic language was incomplete in that meaning involved "correspondances" with an ultimate kind of reality. In his reference to the "supernal beauty" which pure poetry was capable of achieving, Poe had hinted at the possibility of a metaphysical or mystical significance in verbal music. The Abbé Bremond is explicit in claiming a mystical value for pure poetry, which for him is allied to the primordial incantatory element in verse. Mallarmé and Valéry are much more guarded concerning the meaning of poetry, limiting their inquiry to the technical problems of language. Mallarmé's speculations, which were intended for poets, must perhaps remain somewhat obscure to the layman. His conception of pure poetry was that of an absolute, a point at which poetry would attain complete linguistic autonomy, the words themselves taking over the initiative and creating the meanings, liberating themselves, so to speak, from the deliberate rhetoric of the poet. With Mallarmé, interest in subject matter in the traditional sense recedes almost to the vanishing point and is replaced by concern for the medium of poetry.

Speculation in this direction reached its limit in Valéry, who eventually found the processes of poetic composition more interesting than the poetry itself. Valéry's contribution to the doctrine of pure poetry focused on the most baffling aspect of poetic language, the relation of sound and sense. In his first exposition of the subject, preface to a volume of verse by Lucien Fabré, it is defined as poetry which is isolated from everything but its essence. Poe's strictures on the epic and on the didactic motive in general are repeated. Valéry acknowledges the debt of the symbolists to Wagner. The aim of pure poetry is to attain from language an effect comparable to that produced on the nervous system by music. This essay gave rise to considerable discussion and debate. Valéry, without abandoning the doctrine, was later to deny that he had advocated pure poetry in a literal sense. It represented for him a theoretical goal, an ideal rarely attainable in view of the nature of language, in which sound and meaning, sonority and idea form a union as intimate as that of the body and soul.

Poe's ideas, as is generally known, had little direct influence on Eng.-speaking critics and poets; the idea of pure poetry was mainly an importation from France. In the 1920's, George Moore brought out an anthology entitled Pure Poetry. Although Moore had absorbed the views of the symbolists, his notion of pure poetry actually goes back to an earlier tradition, that of the Parnassians. While the element of verbal music is not neglected, it is not of primary importance. The emphasis is on subject matter. Moore's chief aversions are abstract ideas and the intrusion of the poet's personality. Pure poetry is that which achieves the greatest possible degree of concreteness and objectivity.

It is possible to view imagism (q.v.) as an instance of pure poetry, although the doctrine itself does not employ the term and is quite distinct from the aims of the symbolists. The imagist manifesto was ready to dispense with rhyme and meter, if not with the element of verbal music itself. The qualities of vagueness and suggestiveness valued by Poe and the symbolists as an aid to the achievement of pure poetry were contrary to the imagist demand for the utmost precision in the rendering of the concrete image. The imagist doctrine may be included in the broad category of pure poetry insofar as it locates the essence of poetry in a single feature—the concrete image—and judges the other features of poetry to be superfluous.

As Robert Penn Warren has demonstrated in "Pure and Impure Poetry," the doctrine of pure poetry is hardly tenable in practice. Yet T. S. Eliot regards it as the most interesting and original development in the aesthetic of verse made in the last century. He finds its characteristically modern in its emphasis upon the medium of verse and its indifference to content. In his view, it terminated with Valéry and cannot serve as a guide to contemporary poets.

E. A. Poe, "The Poetic Principle," Complete Works, ed. J. A. Harrison, xiv (1902); Pure Poetry: an Anthol., ed. G. Moore (1924); H. Bremond, La Poésie pure (1926); D. Porché, Paul

Valéry et la poésie pure (1926); P. Valéry, Variété, 1 (1934); R. P. Warren, "Pure and Impure Poetry," KR, 5 (1943); J. Benda, La France Byzantine, ou Le Triomphe de la littérature pure (1945); T. S. Eliot, "From Poe to Valéry," HR, 2 (1949); L. and F. E. Hyslop, Jr., Baudelaire on Poe's Crit. Papers (1952); C. Feidelson, Jr., Symbolism and Am. Lit. (1953); F. Scarfe, The Art of Paul Valéry (1954); J. Chiari, Symbolisme from Poe to Mallarmé (1956); H. W. Decker, Pure Poetry, 1925-1930: Theory and Debate in France (1962). S.F.

PURPLE PATCH. Horace in the Ars Poetica (Epistles 2.3.14-19, purpureus . . . pannus), explains the phrase as the irrelevant insertion of a richly described topic into a work about a totally different subject, e.g., a glowing description of a grove and altar of Diana in an epic poem. Thus two elements are necessary: extraneous subject matter and a colorful description of it. In modern usage, however, the term generally means a florid passage which stands out from the tone of the rest of the work. Such unrestrained diction causes the emotion thus aroused to exceed its object; e.g., "Oh Mother, I implore / Your scorched, blue thunderbreasts of love to pour / Buckets of blessings on my burning head . . ." (Robert Lowell, In Memory of Arthur Winslow, sect. 3).

R.A.H.

PYRRHIC (Gr. "used in the pyrrichē or war dance) or dibrach (Gr. "of 2 short syllables"). This may be said to have been the shortest metrical foot in Gr. and L. verse, although it was not recognized as such by Aristoxenus and ancient metricians generally, who felt that feet must be of at least 3 morae or time elements (e.g., the tribrach ~~~). In Eng. verse the p. foot (2 unstressed syllables) occurs frequently as variant or "substitution" (q.v.) in normal iambic series.—Kolář.

R.J.G.

PYTHIAMBI. A dactylic hexameter verse followed by an iambic dimeter (first p.) or trimeter (second p.). Is used by Archilochus and by Horace (Epodes 14-15 and 16).—Koster.

P.S.C.

PYTHIAN METER. See VERSUS PYTHIUS.

Q

QASĪDA. Name given to a formal ode in Eastern literature. The form originated in pre-Islamic Arabia during the 6th c., and was borrowed by Persian, Turkish, and Urdu poets. The theme may be panegyric, satire, warlike boasting, or elegiac; later the repertory was extended to include religious, mystical, didactic, and even political writing. The q. may extend to upward of a 100 couplets, all upon the same rhyme. The most famous examples are the Mu'allaqat, the 7 "suspended odes" of pagan Arabia; the greatest exponents were the Arabs Mutanabbi (d. 955) and Ibn al-Fārid (d. 1235) and the Persians Anvari (d. 1190), Khāqāni (d. 1200), Rūmī (d. 1273), and Sa'dī (d. 1291). In Western poetry, the form was imitated by Tennyson in his Locksley Hall and J. E. Flecker in his poetic drama Hassan. It was also used by the German poet Platen. See ARAB POETRY, PERSIAN POETRY.—R. A. Nicholson, Lit. Hist. of the Arabs (3d ed., 1923); E. G. Browne, Lit. Hist. of Persia (4 v., 1928); A. J. Arberry, The Seven Odes (1957). A.J.A.

QUANTITY. See CLASSICAL PROSODY; METER; PROSODY.

QUATERNARIUS. See IAMB.

QUATORZAIN. A stanza or poem of 14 lines, e.g., a sonnet. The term, however, is now reserved for a 14-line poem similar to or like a sonnet but deviating from its patterns.

QUATRAIN. A stanza of 4 lines, rhymed or unrhymed. It is, with its many variations, the most common of all stanzaic forms in European poetry. Most rhyming quatrains fall into one of the following categories: abab, or its variant xbyb (in which x and y represent unrhymed lines), a category which includes the familiar ballad meter and the elegiac stanza (qq.v.) or heroic quatrain; abba, the so-called envelope stanza (q.v.), of which Tennyson's In Memoriam stanza (q.v.) is a type; aabb, in which an effect of internal balance or antithesis is achieved through the use of opposed couplets, as in Shelley's The Sensitive Plant. Less common quatrains are the Omar Khayyām stanza (q.v.), rhyming aaxa, and the monorhymed quatrain (e.g., Gottfried Keller's Abendlied). Quatrains interlinked by rhyme are also to be found, as are those displaying such complications as the alternation of masculine and feminine rhyme and the use of irregular line length. The q. has been used in Western poetry primarily as a unit of composition in longer poems, but the term is also applied to the two component parts of the octave (q.v.) of a sonnet. As a poem complete in itself, the q. lends itself to epigrammatic utterance; Landor and Yeats have shown mastery in the composition of such poems. (See EPIGRAM).

QUESTION, EPIC. In ancient epic poetry after the theme of the poem is announced, the muse, as patron goddess of the poet, is sometimes asked what started the action e.g., "Which of the gods brought them together in strife for fighting?" (Iliad 1.8.) The answer then offers a convenient way for the poet to begin his narration. R.A.H.

QUINTET. A 5-line stanza of varying rhyme scheme and line length. The most frequent rhyme pattern is ababb as, for example, in Edmund Waller's Go, Lovely Rose. See also CINQUAIN and SP. QUINTILLA.

QUINTILLA. The q., a Sp. stanza form formerly considered a type of redondilla (q.v.) and so called (Rengifo, Arte poética española, 1592) was probably formed by the separation, in the 16th c., of the two parts of the 9- or 10-line copla de arte menor, where it was embryonic. It is a 5-line octosyllabic strophe having two rhymes in consonance and having the following restrictions: there may not be more than two rhymes or two consecutive rhymes and the strophe may not end with a couplet. The five possible rhyme combinations are therefore: ababa, abbab, abaab, aabab, aabba. The last two combinations, which begin with a couplet, are generally avoided in the independent q., but frequently appear as the second half of the copla real. The q. probably ranks among the three or four most commonly used octosyllabic strophes in Castilian. N. Fernández de Moratín (1737-1780) famous Fiesta de toros en Madrid is written in quintillas employing four of the possible five rhyme schemes.—D. C. Clarke, "Sobre la q.," RFE, 20 (1933); Navarro. D.C.C.

R

RAGUSAN POETRY. See YUGOSLAV POETRY.

RASA. See INDIAN POETICS.

REALISM. Following V. da Sola Pinto, we might define r. as that element in art "which is concerned with giving a truthful impression of actuality as it appears to the normal human consciousness." Realistic poetry, at its best, is likely to meet the following conditions: (1) it will describe normal situations and average characters in ordinary settings (often with emphasis on the lower strata of society); (2) it will renounce the use of far-fetched images and metaphors; (3) it will endeavor to reproduce actual speech and tend to approximate prose rhythms. An extreme of realistic poetry in the above sense is reached in Edgar Lee Masters' Spoon River Anthology, where no attempt is made to transcend the mental horizon of the individual speakers.

While fully inherent in the poetry of Villon and Swift (not to mention Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, Piers Plowman and the popular ballads, all of which reflect the medieval tradition of r.), poetic r., as a movement, must be regarded as an outgrowth of romanticism. In the Preface to the second edition of the Lyrical Ballads (1800), Wordsworth defends his choice of "incidents and situations of common life," while, at the same time, advocating "a certain colouring whereby ordinary things should be presented to the mind in an unusual aspect." This selective r., which presupposes a certain degree of idealization, is also championed by Crabbe, who (in the preface to his Tales of 1812) envisages a poetry that has "enough of reality to engage (our) sympathy, but possesses not interest sufficient to create painful sensations." In Germany, the aims of poetic r. (Poetischer Realismus) have been defined by Otto Ludwig as follows: "Die Poesie verfährt nach den Gesetzen der Erinnerung; sie ändert nicht, was geschehen, aber sie mildert es künstlerisch" (Poetry operates according to the laws of memory; it does not change the past but softens it artistically). This applies equally well to the poetry of Eduard Mörike and the prose of Gottfried Keller and Adalbert Stifter. In America, poetic r. is present in the poetry of Robert Frost, whom Louis Untermeyer quotes as having called himself a realist "satisfied with the potato brushed clean."

The ascendancy of stark r. in poetry coincides with the arrival of the industrial age in the second quarter of the 19th c. In Germany, it takes a decidedly political turn in the social lyrics of Freiligrath, Herwegh, and Beck (Das junge Deutschland). Stripped of its revolutionary pathos, it is revived in the age of Neue Sachlichkeit (New Objectivity), especially in the poems of Bertolt Brecht's Hauspostille (1927). In France, Villon's macabre and naive humanitarianism (Ballade des Pendus) is sentimentalized in certain of Béranger's songs (La Pauvre Femme) and in François Coppée's Les Humbles of 1872. On the whole, however, modern French poetry—from Victor Hugo to Paul Valéry—is so markedly antirealistic that Baudelaire could make the statement: "The exclusive taste for the true . . . oppresses and stifles the taste for the beautiful" (Salon of 1859). The humanitarianism of Blake's London and Thomas Hood's Song of the Shirt remains somewhat isolated in Eng. poetry. More characteristic of the latter are the matter-of-factness of Browning ("all I want's the thing / settled for ever one way") and Hardy and the grim, almost satirical, r. of Synge (Danny), Kipling (Barrack-Room Ballads) and Siegfried Sassoon (The Rear-Guard). In America, E. A. Robinson (The Children of the Night) and Carl Sandburg (Chicago Poems) work in a tradition that harks back to Walt Whitman's ecstatic r. as it appears in the Song of Myself. (For a brief historical account of the realistic tradition in European literature see the epilogue to Erich Auerbach's Mimesis, 1953).—E. H. Coleridge, "R. in Poetry," Royal Soc. of Lit. Trans., ser. 2, 31 (1914); J. A. Roy, "R. in Modern Poetry," QQ, 30 (1923), 31 (1924); S. Liptzin, "The Lyric of Nascent Modern R.," CR, 2 (1927); V. da Sola Pinto, "R. in Eng. Poetry," E&S, 25 (1939); M. Nussberger, "R., Poetischer" in Reallexikon, III; W. Silz, R. and Reality (1954; see p. 10-16 of Introd.); Documents of Modern Lit. R., ed. G. J. Becker (1963).

U.W.

RECESSIVE ACCENT. A r.a. is said to occur when a word (usually a dissyllable) accented on its final syllable is succeeded by another strongly accented syllable. In such cases for the sake of greater ease in rhythm, the accent in the dissyllable is shifted to the front of the word: "He is complète in feature and in mind." (Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona 2.4.73) and "Can pierce a complète bosom." (Measure for Measure 1.3.3). A specific variety of wrenched accent, this device has died out of versification, as it has in normal speech usage, from which it no doubt took its origin and justification. Early poets, among them Shakespeare, used it extensively, the romantics employed it, and Bridges speaks of it as a lingering custom in the common speech of Ireland (e.g., extreme unction).—A. Schmidt, Shakespeare Lexicon (2d ed., II, append. 1, 1886); C. F. Jacob, The Foundation and Nature of Verse (1918); R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody (1921); Deutsch.

R.BE.

RECIPROCUS VERSUS. A verse which is in the same meter when the order of the words is reversed, e.g.

Mūsa, mī|hī cāu|sās mēmō|rā quō | nūmīnē |
laēsō
 (Virgil, Aeneid 1.8)

which remains a dactylic hexameter when read backward:

laēsō | nūmīnē | quō mēmō|rā cāu|sās mīhī, |
Mūsa

Sidonius Apollinaris (5th c. A.D., Epistulae 9.14) mentions "recurrent verses" (versus recurrentes) which, when read backward, retain the same order of letters and meter, e.g.

Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor.

H. Keil, Grammatici latini, I (1857), 516.24–517.14; VI (1923), 113.11–114.10.

R.J.G.

RECOGNITION. See PLOT.

REDERIJKERS. (Fr. rhétoriciens.) Members of the rederijerskamers (chambers of rhetoric) which flourished in the Netherlands in the 15th and 16th c. The chambers, which were organized as guilds, each with its patron, its name, and its distinctive motto and emblem, originated in Flanders and Brabant, almost certainly on the model of analogous Fr. associations, and spread gradually to the north, where they became particularly well established in the province of Holland.

The r. (the term included both practicing poets and students of poetry) tended, like their German counterparts, the Meistersinger (q.v.), toward a formalistic, almost mechanical concept of art, and some of the forms in which they expressed themselves have a remarkable complexity. Their major interest lay in dramatic and lyric poetry, and their principal forms were: in the drama, the zinnspel (allegorical morality play) and the esbattement (farce); in the lyric, the refrein (q.v.), a strophic poem utilizing a recurrent 1-line refrain at the end of each stanza, and such Fr. forms as the ballade and the rondel (qq.v.).

The r., who were, on the whole, members of the prosperous burgher class, often organized sumptuous drama and poetry competitions, known variously as landjuwelen, haagspelen, and refreinfeesten. Among the more famous rederijerskamers were De Heilige Geest and De Drie Santinnen at Bruges, De Fontaine at Ghent, Trou moet Blycken at Haarlem, and De Egelantier and Het Wit Lavendel at Amsterdam. The most noted of rederijker works are Elckerlijck (Everyman), which is probably the source of its Eng. analogue, the anonymous miracle play Mariken van Nieumeghen, Colijn van Rijssle's romantic play Den Spiegel der Minnen, the religious refreinen of Anna Bijns, and the esbattements of Cornelis Everaert.—J. J. Mak, De R. (1944); G. J. Steenbergen, Het Landjuweel van de R. (1950).

F.J.W.

REDONDILLA. A Sp. stanza form, an octosyllabic quatrain rhyming abba in consonance and sometimes called r. mayor, cuarteta, cuartilla. Quatrains having the rhyme abab are occasionally called redondillas, but generally use the name serventesio. The r. written in lines of less than 8 syllables is called r. menor. The term formerly included the quintilla (q.v.) and was also applied to any octosyllabic strophe in which all verses rhymed in consonance. The r. apparently is the result of the breaking in two at the strophic caesura of the copla de arte menor (see ARTE MENOR). The separation was completed in the 16th c., and the r. has been one of the most commonly used octosyllabic strophes in Castilian ever since.—D. C. Clarke, "R. and copla de arte menor," HR, 9 (1941); Navarro.

D.C.C.

REFRAIN. A line, or lines, or part of a line, repeated at intervals throughout a poem, usually at regular intervals, and most often at the end of a stanza; a burden, chorus, or repetend. (Burden usually indicates a whole stanza; a chorus is a refrain joined in by a group; a repetend need not occur throughout a poem.) The r. seems a universal feature of primitive poetry and tribal verse, an accompaniment of communal dance and communal labor. Probably the very beginnings of poetry are to be found in iterated words and phrases. Refrains occur in the Egyptian Book of the Dead, in the Hebrew Psalms, in the Gr. idyls of Theocritus and Bion, in the L. epithalamiums of Catullus, in the Anglo-Saxon Deor's Lament; they blossom in the medieval ballads, in Prov. fixed forms, in Renaissance lyrics, and in poetry of the romantic period.

A r. may be as short as a single word or as long as a stanza. Though usually recurring as a regular part of a metrical pattern, it may appear irregularly throughout a poem, and it may be used in free verse. In stanzaic verse it usually occurs at the end of a stanza, but may appear at the beginning or in the middle. It may be used in such a way that its meaning varies or develops from one recurrence to the next (Poe discusses this use in "The Philosophy of Composition"), or it may be used each time with a slight variation of wording appropriate to its immediate context (Rossetti's Sister Helen, Tennyson's Lady of Shalott).

The r. may be a nonsense phrase, apparently irrelevant to the rest of the poem, or relevant only in spirit ("With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino"), or it may very meaningfully emphasize some important aspect of the poem—theme, characters, or setting. The r. furnishes pleasure in its repetition of familiar sound; it serves to mark off rhythmical units, and at the same time to unify the poem; and it may be very skillfully used to reinforce emotion and meaning.—F. B. Gummere, The Beginnings of Poetry (1908); F. G. Ruhmann, Studien zur Gesch. und Charakteristik des R. in der englischen Lit. (1927). L.P.

REFRÁN. The Sp. refrán, usually translated as proverb, is a short, pithy, popular saying expressing advice based on wisdom gained through common experience or observation. It may deal with any subject—such as medicine, hygiene, agriculture, morals, or philosophy, to name but a few. It is often composed of two short phrases that rhyme in consonance or assonance, or contain alliteration, or are of parallel structure, or have some other sound-device that makes them appeal to the ear and cling to the memory. The Sp. language is exceedingly rich in this sort of expression and collectors have been busy for at least half a millennium gathering them into refraneros. The first known collection is the mid-15th-c. Refranes que dicen las viejas tras el fuego, generally attributed to the Marqués de Santillana. Many thousands have been gathered by dozens of collectors since then. Some of the important collections are those of Hernán Núñez, Juan de Mal Lara, Gonzalo Correas, F. Rodríguez Marín, and J. Cejador y Frauca. D.C.C.

REFREIN. A poetic form especially favored by the rederijkers (q.v.) in the Netherlands. It consists of 4 or more stanzas of identical length and rhyme scheme, each of which ends with an identical line (stock, q.v.); the number of syllables in the lines is not fixed. The last stanza, which may be shorter than the others, is usually directed to the "prince" of the chamber of rhetoric or some other person; its initial letters are sometimes used acrostically to form the name of the poet. In accordance with the highly mannered poetic of the rederijkers, great attention is bestowed on rhyme, the intricate use of which makes the refrein a difficult form.

A spoken, not a sung, form, the r. derives its name from the Fr. refrain, and it owes its origin largely to the Fr. ballade (q.v.). Refreinen are divided into vroede (serious, religious, didactic, satiric), amoureuze, and sotte (comic, jocular, obscene, or nonsensical) categories. Refreinfesteen were competitions between various chambers, on given questions or stocks and with a given number of stanzas and lines. The great age of the r. was ca. 1450–1600, and the most notorious examples of the form are those by Anna Bijns and those compiled by Jan van Styvevoort, Jan van Doesborch, and Jan de Bruyne.—A. van Elslander, Het r. in de Nederlanden tot 1600 (1953). R.F.L.

REIZIANUM (colon Reizianum). An acephalous pherecratean named after Reiz (1733–90). Like the telesillean (q.v.) of which it is the catalectic form, it occurs with variations and resolutions in Pindar and Gr. drama as well as in early L. poetry. The versus Reizianus which is frequently found in Plautus is a colon R. preceded by an iambic dimeter acatalectic, e.g.:

(— — — — —)

ēgō tē | fāciām | mīser|rūmūs || mōrtālīs ūtī sīs
(Aulularia 443)

The combination of other meters (in particular an anapaestic dimeter acatalectic) with a colon R. also occurs in Plautine cantica. There is now a tendency in Gr. metric to discard the term "R.": see A. M. Dale, Lustrum, 2 (1957), 12.—W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); L. Havet, "Le distique (dit 'vers') de Reiz," Revue des études latines, 19 (1941); Dale; Koster, Crusius; U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958). R.J.G.

REJET. A term in Fr. versification. The r. occurs as the result of a conflict between syntax and metrical pattern in enjambement (q.v.), when the lesser part of a grammatical phrase-unit flows over from one line to the next: "C'est le sceau de l'état.—Oui, le grand sceau de cire / Rouge" (V. Hugo, Marion de Lorme 3.4.1–2). A more limited form, the r. à l'hémistiche, is identified when such overflow occurs from one hemistich to the next in the same line: "En attaquant Monsieur | Bonaparte, on me fâche" (V. Hugo, Un bon bourgeois dans sa maison). When the greater part of a grammatical phrase-unit overflows in this way, there results what is called a contre-rejet: "Le Sauveur a veillé | pour tous les yeux, pleuré / Pour tous les pleurs, saigné | pour toutes les blessures" (V. Hugo, Dieu).—M. Grammont, Le vers français (1913) and Petit traité de versification française (5^e éd., revue, 1924). A.G.E.

RELATIVISM IN CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

RELIGION AND POETRY. The relations of rel. to poetry have been so varied and often so subtle or intricate, that any simple statement regarding them is likely to invite objections. On the one hand there is the view stated by Amos N. Wilder (Modern Poetry and the Christian Tradition) that poetic experience and religious experience "are profoundly and intimately related to each other if not consubstantial, and religion requires poetry in its discourse." At the opposite pole stands Samuel Johnson's pontifical denial that "contemplative piety, or the intercourse between God and the human soul" either can or should be poetical. For "the essence of poetry is invention" (so Johnson argues in his Life of Waller), and it delights by producing unexpected surprises; whereas the topics of devotion, being few, are already known to all believers, hence "they can receive no grace from novelty of sentiment and very little from novelty of expression."

It would seem that each of these contrary views pushes its point too far. Rel. and poetry can hardly be considered consubstantial, since either of them may occur without the other. Calvinism deliberately repudiates the poetic graces so far as possible, yet only by an arbitrary restriction of language could it be denied that Calvinism is a rel. Conversely, such poems as Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis and Keats's Endymion are not, in any accepted meaning of the word, religious. But if it is thus evident that rel. and poetry differ in essence since they possess demonstrably different meanings, it is equally evident that they should not be conceived in such a way as necessarily to exclude each other. In opposition to Johnson's pronouncement it may be observed that novelty of sentiment and novelty of expression have within reasonable limits a legitimate place in rel., for hackneyed phrases and the stale sentiments which they are likely to engender can do much to weaken the religious consciousness of a freshly inquisitive generation that inherits them. An agnostical reader, to whom prayer has become an expendable anachronism, may be startled into a new, though partial, awareness of its vitality by Auden's unconventional way of addressing God, in "Sir, no man's enemy . . ." Similarly, God's love, which is so inevitable and oft-repeated a theme in Christianity that it runs the double danger of being accepted perfunctorily and of being sentimentalized, has received new lifts at various times from such metaphoric conceits as Spenser's "Then shall thy ravish'd soul inspirèd be . . . / With sweet estrangement of celestial love," Donne's and the Spanish mystics' bold use of carnal union as a symbol of divine love, and the love-chase in Francis Thompson's The Hound of Heaven. Quite evidently the novelties of expression and of sentiment that are present in these poems do not disqualify them from being considered religious.

If the foregoing considerations are valid it follows that rel. and poetry should be defined independently of each other yet not in such a way as to imply mutual exclusion. One method of doing this is to consider the basic modes of apprehending reality which the two disciplines, poetry and rel., individually represent. The poetic mode of apprehension is largely synthetic. It works by fusion; for in the familiar words of T. S. Eliot, the poem qua poem is a particular medium "in which impressions and experiences combine in peculiar and unexpected ways," and consequently "the poet's mind is in fact a receptacle for seizing and storing up numberless feelings, phrases, images, which remain there until the particles which can unite to form a new compound are present together" ("Tradition and the Individual Talent"). In short, poetry works by a "fusion of elements," and it achieves its own kind of objectivity inasmuch as "impressions and experiences which are important for the man may take no place in the poetry, and those which become important in the poetry may play quite a negligible part in the man, the personality." The religious mode of apprehension, by contrast, must be defined in terms not of synthesis but of responsive belief; and it becomes objective—that is, it transcends the merely personal and subjective—to the extent that a vital harmony is achieved, often involving a large measure of paradox, between the belief and the totality of the believer's passive and active (that is, receptive and responsive) experience. A properly religious emotion, as Eliot declares in his essay on Lancelot Andrewes, "is wholly evoked by the object of contemplation, to which it is adequate"; it is "wholly contained in and explained by its object." The spheres of rel. and poetry coalesce, therefore, wherever an imaginative fusion of the elements of experience and a responsive faith in a reality transcending and potentially sanctifying the experience are both effectively present.

As a matter of fact religious language, even when it is not molded into an actual poem, and when its intent is to instruct or exhort rather than to please, tends quite naturally to employ some of the characteristic devices of poetic expression. Everyday language is inadequate to describe such intense and largely unsharable experiences as the soul's yearning for and partial realization of God. Devotional writers, therefore, have generally resorted to figurative language, not always in lieu of an attempt at plain speaking but at least as a supplement to it. Repeatedly in the Bible the soul's relation to Divinity is expressed, for instance, by the metaphor of marriage. Jeremiah and Ezekiel speak of God as Israel's husband; Jesus speaks of himself as the Bridegroom; Paul speaks of the mystical marriage between Christ and his Church; and the Book of Revelation is climaxed by the marriage of the Lamb and his Bride. Or again, in the first chapter of the Gospel according to John, Christ is spoken of as the Word and the Light, and in the fifteenth chapter he speaks of himself as the true Vine. When these epithets are examined it will be seen that each of them represents a double semantic shift. There is a synecdochic shift from whole to part, whereby the writer, in order to speak about the Supreme Reality, concentrates upon one attribute at a time. And there is the metaphoric shift from abstract to concrete, whereby the attribute thus momentarily isolated is presented under the figure of a familiar image. Parable and allegory are further manifestations of this tendency toward figurative speaking; but as distinguished from metaphor they can be translated more or less adequately into literal expository terms, and to that extent they represent a secondary rather than a primary linguistic phenomenon.

As we pass from the scattered and incidental appearances of poetry in religious documents to actual religious poems such as the Oresteia, The Divine Comedy, and Paradise Lost, we find more deliberate and sustained uses of poetic artifice. The religious power of the Oresteia is found not so much in the exhortations and cosmic speculations of the Chorus as in the symbolic overtones of the imagery—particularly the images associated with watching, hunting, crimson blood and the crimson royal robes, ritual slaughter, the serpent in its dual rôle as death bringer and life bearer, the flight of birds, and the coming of light. The Divine Comedy, although it draws freely upon the philosophy and theology of Thomas Aquinas, is by no means merely a restatement of that teaching in more highly colored language. The peculiar perspective and quality of Dante's poem comes not from either the doctrinal content or the poetic embellishments taken separately, but mainly from the fresh insights produced by the poet's fusion of particular images and incidents with the theological ideas which they represent and which they suggest to an informed reader's mind. As for Paradise Lost, which to many readers will seem to deal with its subject matter more straightforwardly than either of the other two poems here mentioned, David Daiches has pointed out that beneath the obvious scenario meaning, which is to say the paraphrasable surface meaning, Milton is presenting obliquely through mood and imagery and indirect allusion a more essential theodicy—namely that "the real justification of God's dealings with men lies in the implicit contrast between the ideal idleness of the Garden of Eden and the changing and challenging world of moral effort and natural beauty which resulted from the fall." For although the postlapsarian world may lack the unruffled bliss of Eden, yet the curse placed on mankind that he shall earn his bread by the sweat of his brow is transformed by Milton into descriptions of the procession of the seasons and the beauty and dignity of rustic labor, all of which "contradict or at least modify the explicit statement that work was imposed on man as a curse" (Daiches, in Hopper, Spiritual Problems in Contemporary Literature).

The 17th c. marks the highest development of religious poetry in England; for in no other period have there been so many poets—Donne, George Herbert, Henry Vaughan, Crashaw, and Traherne among the chief—who combined devotional sincerity with a readiness to experiment with poetry as a verbal and metrical medium. Whereas it had been more characteristic of Spenser, in the late 16th c., to employ simple and familiar metaphors when speaking of God—"that sovereign Light, / From Whose pure beams all perfect beauty springs"—the 17th-c. metaphysical poets sought by new and unexpected tricks of syntax and extensions of metaphor, by "pious wit" as it has been called, to communicate certain more elusive qualities of religious awareness. George Herbert, for instance, can employ such devices as tautology and reversed metaphor with startling effect. Regarding the love-union with God as the absolute of human existence he can declare: "Ah, my dear God, though I am clean forgot, / Let me not love Thee, if I love Thee not"—where the seeming tautology of the second line expresses more potently than a literal declaration could do, the identification of love of God with very existence. The reversed metaphor in the poem Divinity—"He doth bid us take his blood for wine"—surprises us by the interchange of vehicle and tenor, q.v. (since Christian liturgy normally treats the wine of the Eucharist as symbolizing Christ's blood rather than vice versa); but this shock of surprise produces a new depth of understanding by forcing the reminder that Blood, too, is a symbol. In fact, in the final couplet of The Agony Herbert merges the two symbols, declaring: "Love is that liquor, sweet, and most divine, / Which my God feels as Blood, but I as wine." Henry Vaughan, who acknowledged a large spiritual debt to Herbert, is especially concerned with such paradoxical relations as that of time to eternity ("bright shoots of everlastingness"), of death to life ("And where this dust falls to the urn, / In that state I came, return"), and of light to darkness ("The whole creation shakes off night, / And for thy shadow looks, the light").

Coming down to the present, it may be said with some assurance that no poet writing in Eng. today has made a more signal contribution to the art of religious poetry than Eliot. Two poems stand out as particular landmarks. Ash Wednesday is a devotional poem remaining within the Christian framework, employing much of the imagery and echoing a number of the responses of the Anglican liturgy. Four Quartets achieves a more inclusive synthesis. It develops freshly paradoxical insights by fusing traditionally Christian images with images drawn from secular aspects of the contemporary world: as in the "wounded surgeon" lyric in East Coker, or as when the dark dove in Little Gidding represents at once an attacking bomber and the third Persona of the Trinity, or as when the garden imagery in Burnt Norton becomes suddenly vitalized and estranged by a suggestion of Freudian symbolism. Such metaphoric revitalization of the great Christian themes demonstrates anew the real service to poetry and rel. alike which an effective alliance of the two can bring about.

G. Santayana, Interpretations of Poetry and Rel. (1900); P. H. Osmond, The Mystical Poets of the Eng. Church (1918); H. Bremond, Prayer and Poetry (1929); T. S. Eliot, Dante (1929, repr. in Selected Essays, 1932) and "Rel. and Lit.," in Essays Ancient and Modern (1936); H. C. White, The Metaphysical Poets (1936); D. G. James, Scepticism and Poetry (1937; ch. 8); H. N. Fairchild, Religious Trends in Eng. Poetry (5 v., 1939-62); G. W. Knight, The Starlit Dome (1941); Spiritual Problems in Contemp. Lit., ed. S. R. Hopper (1952); A. N. Wilder, Modern Poetry and the Christian Tradition (1952) and Theology and Modern Lit. (1958); E. I. Watkin, Poets and Mystics (1953); L. L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954); Wheelwright; Lit. and Belief, ed. M. H. Abrams (1958); N. A. Scott, Jr., Modern Lit. and the Religious Frontier (1958); R. Stewart, Am. Lit. and Christian Doctrine (1958); C. I. Glicksberg, Lit. and Rel. (1960); R. P. Blackmur, "Religious Poetry in the United States," Rel. in Am. Life, ed. J. W. Smith and A. L. Jamison, II (1961); The New Orpheus and The Climate of Faith in Modern Lit., both ed. N. A. Scott (1964).

P.W.

REMATE. A Sp. metric term denoting a short stanza placed at the end of a poem and serving as a conclusion to the poem. The r. generally repeats the last rhymes of the preceding full-length strophe. It is most commonly used at the end of the canción (q.v.). In it the poet addresses himself to the canción, giving it a special message to bear to a particular person, "recognizing some flaw in the canción, or making an excuse for it, or telling it what it must answer if it should be found wanting in some respect" (Rengifo). It has also been called vuella, commiato, despido, envío, ripressa, ri-tornelo (retornelo), contera.—Rengifo, Arte poética española (1592, ch. 86); E. Segura Covarsí, La canción petrarquista en la lírica española del siglo de oro (1949); Navarro.

D.C.C.

RENAISSANCE POETICS. Despite comparative neglect, Ren. poetics is an important and influential body of criticism. It is thanks to the Ren. that literary criticism is recognized as an independent form of literature, and that the critic is accepted as an honorable citizen in the republic of letters. Nor is that all. All modern poetics is heavily indebted to the Ren. The neoclassical period did little more than normalize the precepts of the Ren., and the romantic period formulated its new doctrines in conscious opposition to neoclassicism. Much of the "newness" of romanticism is little more than the old rules turned upside down. Wordsworth and Hugo, for instance, defined their critical positions by affirming almost all that the neoclassical period negates and negating almost all that it affirms.

Ren. criticism was born in the struggle to defend imaginative literature against its enemies and since literature was attacked on moral and social grounds it had to be defended on those grounds. If today moralistic conceptions seem foreign to literary criticism, it is because the Ren. won its battle and left its heirs free to devote themselves to other matters. Boccaccio in his Genealogia Deorum (1360) and in his life of Dante laid down the main lines for the defense of poetry against its clerical and philistine detractors. He argued that poetry and religion are not opponents. On the contrary, the Bible is poetry and teaches, as does all poetry, by means of allegory. The pagan stories which seem offensive to theologians may be interpreted as the Bible is interpreted: "When the ancient poets feigned that Saturn had many children and devoured all but four of them, they wished to have understood from their picture nothing else than that Saturn is time, in which everything is produced, and as everything is produced in time, it likewise is the destroyer of all and reduces all to nothing." Boccaccio's defense of pagan writers, naive as it may seem, was a step toward complete freedom of subject matter for all artists. Leda and the Swan, for instance, could be considered as shadowing forth the Virgin and the Dove. By his method anything and everything could be defended against moral or theological criticism.

On the social level, Boccaccio's defense is suited to values of the age. Not only has poetry always been admired among all peoples, but its protectors have been kings and princes and great lords. Further, the poet himself has always been worthy of patronage. He is a creator, like God Almighty Himself. No higher function is possible for man.

These arguments were repeated again and again, not only in Italy but in the various "apologies for poetry" written in France and England. They gave an inspirational coloring to even the most practical treatises. The rule makers who flourished in the 16th c. always had these assumptions in mind, as did the practicing poets. Forgetting this, some literary historians have spoken of a disparity between the dry poetic treatises and the creative outburst of the period. This simply did not exist for the men of the time.

Once the subject matter of poetry was defended, the next problem that presented itself was whether poetry could be written in a modern language. This problem was extremely complex. First, some of the humanists were so proud of having restored good L. to the world that they had small sympathy for productions in the vernacular even when these were by Dante, Petrarch or Boccaccio. Secondly, those literary critics whose major interests were in the classical genres usually assumed that great literature demanded either L. or Gr., preferably L. Thirdly, in Italy, which set the pattern in this as in other critical matters, the situation was complicated by the fact that there was no national state and thus no national language. Those who were interested in defending literature in the vernacular had first to defend their choice of a particular dialect.

Blessed with the greatest writers in the so-called vulgar tongue, Florence took the lead in the language question. Dante's De Vulgari Eloquentia (ca. 1305) is the first and greatest plea for vernacular literature, and it has no worthy successor until Alberti's Il Governo della famiglia (1438), where it is argued that the vulgar tongue would become as polished as L. if patriotic writers gave their attention to it. Pietro Bembo in Prose della Volgar Lingua (1524) deserted his fellow humanists and came over to the side of the vernacular. Not content with claiming that Florentine was as good as Latin, he went on to assert that it was even superior as a medium for modern subjects. Since Florentine was the one dialect with a strong literary tradition, most Italians who wrote in the vernacular used it, yet some opposed it and called for a truly national language which they termed "Italian" or, sometimes, "Courtier's Tongue." Il Calmeta and Castiglione were the most prominent of these. Most of their arguments were borrowed from Dante's De Vulgari Eloquentia.

In England and France, the existence of national monarchies made the language problem easier of solution. Although the upholders of L. had to be combatted, the speech of the court was accepted as "English" or "French" and had little competition from outlying dialects. We still speak of the "King's English" in recognition of this standard. The growing national feeling in England and France sped the victory of the vernacular. Du Bellay's Deffence et illustration de la langue françoise (1549) is frankly nationalistic. Borrowing many ideas from Sperone Speroni's Dialogo della lingua (1542), he argues that the Fr. are as good as the Romans, and that there is no reason why their language should not be as good. It is the patriotic duty of all Fr. scholars and poets to write in Fr. and enrich it. Translators in particular can enlarge the Fr. vocabulary by "capturing" words from other languages.

The Eng. were, if possible, even more patriotic. For hundreds of years the nobility had spoken Fr. and though this was no longer true in the 16th c., it had given rise to a strong popular tradition of hostility to any foreign domination of the mother tongue. Yet it was no easy thing to learn to write in the spoken language. In his Toxophilus (1545), Ascham confessed, "to have written this book either in Latin or Greek . . . had been more easier." Bacon, conscious of how Eng. had changed since Chaucer's day, had his Essays published in a L. edition because he feared that "these modern languages will at one time or other play bankrupt with books." But the flood of national pride was irresistible. Eng., which Mulcaster called the "joyful title of our liberty and freedom, the Latin tongue remembering us of our thralldom and bondage," won the day. The victory was accelerated in England, as it was on the continent also, by the Protestant movement in favor of the scriptures in translation.

The critics, having decided that it was allowable to write in the vernacular, were confronted with the fact that popular poetry in the vernacular was quite unlike the Gr. and L. poetry they admired. Desiring to imitate the ancients as closely as possible, they rejected the use of rhyme in modern poetry and characterized it as barbarous, an invention of the "Goths and Huns." Still they were not satisfied. The vernacular had to be adorned with the ancient meters before the classicizing process could be considered complete. Claudio Tolomei in his Versi et regole della nuova poesia toscana (1539) tried to show how It. could be written to sound something like L. verse. He was followed in France by Jacques de la Taille with his La Manière de faire des vers en françois, comme en grec et en latin (1573). In his preface he shows the yearning of the ultraclassicists to be as "good" as Virgil and Homer. Rhyme must be rejected because it is "as common to the unlearned as to the learned." He offers a harder road to Parnassus, one that only the learned can follow, and a hard road it is, he admits, since the language must be changed to fit the meters. What he advocates is really a new Fr. pronunciation with reformed spelling to make the pronunciation possible.

The Eng. critics gave enthusiastic support to this movement, which, though foreign to the nature of the language, was less obviously so than to It. with its plethora of rhymes, and to Fr. with its musical accent. First to begin the discussion was Ascham. His Scholemaster (1570) boldly declared that rhyme was the invention of barbarians who knew no better: "But now, when men know the difference, and have the examples, both of the best and of the worst, surely to follow rather the Goths in riming than the Greeks in true versifying were even to eat acorns with swine, when we may freely eat wheat bread amongst men."

Later treatises such as those of Webbe (1586) and Puttenham (1589) add a new argument as to why Protestant Englishmen should look with suspicion on rhyme. The past is not only "gothic," it is also papist. Webbe writes of "this tinklerly verse which we call rime" and condemns the monks for inventing this "brutish Poetry." He is echoed by Puttenham who speaks of rhyme as "the idle invention of Monastical men," and uses this fact to support the superiority of Protestant classicists. "Thus," he continues, "what in writing of rimes and registering of lies was the Clergy of that fabulous age wholly occupied." That even Edmund Spenser became part of this movement demonstrates its appeal. Spenser was, temporarily, a follower of Thomas Drant as this "verse" he sent to Harvey shows: "See yee the blindfoulded pretie god, that feathered Archer, / Of Lovers Miseries which maketh his bloodie Game? / Wote ye why his Moother with a Veale hath coovered his Face? / Trust me, least he my loove happely chaunce to beholde."

Nor was Spenser the only true poet of his time so to betray the natural genius of the language. At late as 1602, Campion in his Observations asserted that Eng. poets must forget "the childish titillation of riming" if they are ever to rival the ancients. Such examples as he gives from his own poetry prove that it is possible to write lovely lyrics without rhyme but certainly nothing more. Samuel Daniel finally put an end to his Defence of Rime (1603). His treatise not only shows how much in accord with the nature of Eng. rhyme is, but also does its best to destroy the widespread prejudice concerning medieval culture.

The major virtue of the movement was negative. It showed what should not be done in vernacular verse. On the other hand, it did encourage metrical experimentation and may have had a slight influence in making more acceptable dramatic blank verse. Significantly, it seems to be one of the first attempts to pose a clearly conceived technical problem in prosody and deal with it experimentally.

Paralleling the discussions of language and of classical meters was the attempt to reestablish the classical genres in opposition to what the Ren. considered the formlessness of medieval literature. For the readers of the time the two movements must often have seemed in conflict since many of the literary critics were Latinists who had little interest in vernacular literature. However, it is apparent that the two groups were working toward a common end. The masterpieces of Ren. literature are written in the vernacular but the forms are classical, or what was thought to be classical.

The classical genres and the distinctions between them were worked out first by the commentators on Horace and Aristotle, and were codified by critics like Minturno, Scaliger, and Sidney, who wrote independent treatises on poetics. Believing imitation, q.v. (Aristotle's mimesis to mean "truth to life," the mirror held up to nature, the critics decided that the genres should be distinguished one from the other according to the kind of life imitated. Since poetry had been defended on moral and social grounds (and the Ren. interpretation of catharsis [q.v.] strengthened this), it was quite natural for critics to examine the genres from this point of view. The social divisions of the Ren. seemed to them to be reflected in the genres, and it was easy to make a hierarchy of the genres according to the rank of the people dealt with.

Among the dramatic genres tragedy is ranked highest because its characters are kings and princes, as well as because Aristotle's Poetics discussed this genre most fully. The plot is based upon the activities of kings—the affairs of state, fortress, and camp, says Scaliger in his famous Poetices Libri Septem (1561). Giraldi Cinthio says that we call the actions of tragedy illustrious, not because they are virtuous but because the characters who act are of the highest rank. The style of writing employed must be of the highest since any lower one would be unworthy of kings and princes. In Italy, especially, the stage scenery was considered important and it was ordered that magnificent palaces should serve as a background for the action.

Comedy deals with people of the middle class. Obviously, the plots must be suitable to such persons and to the middle class customs with which the poets are familiar. Minturno suggests in L'Arte Poetica (1564) that although noble ladies appear in public, middle-class girls do not until after marriage, and that the poet will violate decorum if he has them do so on the stage. Castelvetro declares that members of the strong-willed aristocracy constitute a law unto themselves but that the middle-class persons of comedy are poor in heart, run to the magistrates with their troubles, and live under the law. Thus the plots of comedies must not contain vendettas or other actions unsuitable to the characters but be drawn from bourgeois and private life. The speech must be everyday speech in the middle style.

There is one dramatic form reserved for the lowest classes. It is the farce. Here the language is that of the gutter and the actions are appropriately low. The ability to keep decorum is considered the prime responsibility of the poet. The Fr. and Eng. critics follow this three-fold division and give, almost word for word, the same definitions as do the Italians. For instance, in L'Art Poétique François (1598), Pierre de Laudun sums up the matter for the Fr. as follows: "The characters of tragedy are grave people of great rank and those of comedy are low and of small position. . . . The words of Tragedy are grave and those of Comedy are light. . . . The characters in Tragedy are sumptuously dressed and those of Comedy garbed in an ordinary way." Many similar quotations could be given from Eng. critics. The practicing dramatists followed the rules of the critics. Most of Shakespeare's tragedies and comedies observe the main distinctions as to rank, action, and language. Ben Jonson, realizing he had not kept the unity of time, felt that it was unimportant in comparison with these. He writes about his Sejanus: "First, if it be objected, that what I publish is no true poem, in the strict law of time, I confess it. . . . In the meantime, if in truth of argument, dignity of person, gravity and height of elocution, fullness and frequency of sentence, I have discharged the other offices of a tragic writer, let not the absence of these forms be imputed to me." In the conventions of rank and subject matter the Ren. critics felt that they were following the ancients. Another important concept which they felt implicit in the classical sources was the concept of the unity (q.v.) of action, time, and place. This concept first appeared in its modern form in Castelvetro's translation and commentary, La Poetica d'Aristotele Vulgarizzata (1570), but it did not become a major critical dogma until the 17th c.

The area of agreement among the leading critics was so large that definition after definition could be transferred from the pages of one man's treatise to another's without being out of place. Yet in two areas—that of tragicomedy and that of romance—real arguments arose. Here the polemical tone of the treatises was evidence that the critics were dealing with modern literary forms for which the ancients were insufficient guides.

For the more conservative critics tragicomedy was by definition a bastard and therefore inadmissible form. Sidney's criticism of his contemporary dramatists in his Apologie (ca. 1583) is typical. He protests, "All their plays be neither right tragedies nor right comedies; mingling kings and clowns, not because the matter so carrieth it, but thrust in the clown by head and shoulders, to play a part in majestic matters, with neither decency nor discretion. So as neither the admiration and commiseration, nor the right sportfulness, is by this mongrel tragi-comedy obtained." Yet, the best playwrights paid little attention to such strictures. John Fletcher could write a tragicomedy and bluntly defend it with the assertion, "a God is as lawful in this as in a tragedy, and mean people as in a comedy." Fletcher knew of the bitter discussion which had taken place in Italy on this question. In his Discorso intorno a . . . la Tragedia (1587) De Nores had written that mixed genres were not even worthy of discussion. Guarini, the author of Il Pasto fido, however, sprang to the defense of his own practice. He argued that since the great and the lowly exist side by side in every country, it is perfectly correct to have both in the drama. De Nores answered (Apologia, 1590) that comedy instructs citizens on how to act. A mixed genre, since it cannot so instruct, is without any useful end. Then he asked a series of questions: How can the dramatist keep decorum if the characters are of different rank? What level of language should be used, the grand or humble? Should the stage settings be palaces or humble cottages? He answered his questions by saying that whatever the choice, it will be inappropriate for one class of characters. Guarini was afraid to answer merely by saying that he wrote to please, though he hinted at it. He, too, had to use the standard social arguments. He said, essentially, that a pastoral tragicomedy like his Il Pastor fido was an acceptable genre because some of the shepherds were noble and others were not. The first made for the tragedy, the second for the comedy. The two together made tragicomedy.

Of the nondramatic genres, the epic was most important and was considered by some critics to be the highest literary form. Not only did it deal with princes and kings, but the heroes were usually national heroes. In both France and England the demand was made for epic poets to come forward and celebrate the glories of the nation. Ronsard with his Franciade and Spenser with his Faerie Queene attempted to glorify their nations. The question of whether such modern poetic narratives could be considered epics was particularly agitated in Italy. In Orlando furioso and Gerusalemme liberata, Ariosto and Tasso had produced romantic poems that appealed to popular taste far more than such a classically "correct" epic as Trissino's Italia Liberata dai Goti. Minturno took the strict classical position and quite correctly contended that the romances could not be considered epics since they lacked classical unity. Not content with this, he poured scorn on the romances because they appealed to popular taste—an instance of the widespread Ren. assumption that what pleased the mob was bad per se. Giralaldi Cinthio, though perhaps less sensitive to what constituted an epic, was more forward looking. Not only did he refuse to reject a poem merely because it was popular but, more important, he claimed in his Discorsi (1554) the right of the new age to develop poetic forms suitable to it and to free itself from overclose imitation of the ancients.

Of similar import was the argument over medieval forms of poetry. The strict classicists were as severe on Dante's Commedia as they were on the romances. They considered it to be obscure, gothic, barbarous and without form. They held that the great poet, himself, lacked all taste. The legion of critics who defended Dante suggested, by the mere fact of their defense, that the ancients and their disciples did not have a monopoly on good poetry.

Thanks to these controversies, the Ren. provided the seed from which, in opposition to classical or neoclassical literature, romantic and later literature was to spring.

The It. Ren. critics and their Fr. and Eng. successors were the founders of modern European literary criticism. The Dutch, the Germans, and the Sp. critics of the Ren. added little that was new. When Lope de Vega attempted a defense of his work, he paid homage to the Ren. authorities with the startling confession that of his 483 comedies, "all except six of them sin grievously against art." In other words, the only way Lope de Vega or anyone else prior to the collapse of the neoclassical spirit could talk about art was in the terms formulated by Ren. poeticians.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: For Fr. and Eng., see Patterson and Smith (below, Collections). For It., R. C. Williams, "It. Crit. Treatises of the 16th C.," MLN 35 (1920); and W. Bullock, "It. 16th C. Crit.," MLN, 41 (1926); For Sp., see Menéndez y Pelayo, Historia de las ideas estéticas en España (9 v., unfinished, 1883-91; v. II); Saintsbury is convenient though inadequate.

COLLECTIONS: Eng.: The major essays are collected in G. Smith, Elizabethan Crit. Essays

(2 v., 1904); and J. E. Spingarn, Crit. Essays of the 17th C. (3 v. 1907). Fr.: Although the work is a history, W. F. Patterson, Three C. of Fr. Poetic Theory (3 v., 1935) contains copious excerpts from Ren. essays; the important prefaces of the period are collected in B. Weinberg, Crit. Prefaces of the Fr. Ren. (1950). It.: There is no satisfactory modern coll. and in view of the mass of material available a coll. is probably impossible, but a generous selection in tr. is contained in A. Gilbert, Lit. Crit. (1940). The opinions and comments of most of the It. critics are collected in what amounts to a commonplace book of crit., Proginnasmi Poetici, by U. Nisieli (pseudonym for B. Fioretti), publ. in Florence (2 v., 1639). Sp.: No satisfactory coll.

PRIMARY WORKS: It.: Dante, de Vulgari Eloquentia (publ. 1529), and Convivio; Boccaccio, de Genealogia Deorum, Bks. XIV, XV (tr. Osgood, Boccaccio on the Art of Poetry [1931]); Pontanus, Dialoghi (esp. "Actius"), ed. Previtera (1943); Vida, de Arte Poetica (1527); Trissino, Poetica (Bks. i-iv, 1529; v-vi, publ., 1563); Robortello, In Librum . . . de Arte Poetica Explicationes (1548); Scaliger, Poetices Libri Septem (1561); Minturno, L'Arte Poetica (1563); Castelvetro, Poetica d'Aristotele (1571); Patrizi, Della Poetica (1586); Tasso, Discorsi (1594). Fr.: Sebillot, Art Poétique François (1548); Du Bellay, Deffence et Illustration de la Langue François (1549); J. Pletier du Mans, Art Poétique (1555); Ronsard, Abrégé de l'Art Poétique (1565); Vauquelin de la Fresnaye, Art Poétique François (ca. 1574; publ., 1605). Eng.: See the coll. by Smith (above, COLLECTIONS). For Spenser, see I. Langdon, Materials for a Study of Spenser's Theory of Fine Art (1911); and for "turn of the century" critics (esp. Jonson and Bacon), see Spingarn (above, COLLECTIONS). For Eng. rhetorical theory, a standard text is Wilson, The Art of Rhetoric (1553), available in the modern ed. of G. Mair (1909). Sp.: A. de Nebrija, Arte de la Lengua Castellana (1492); J. del Encina, Arte de la Poesia Castellana (1496); F. Herrera, Anotaciones a las obras de Garcilaso de la Vega (1580); J. Díaz Rengifo, Arte Poética Española (1592); A. Lopez el Pinciano, Philosophia Antigua Poética (1596); Cervantes, Don Quixote, I, 48 (1605); Lope de Vega Carpio, Arte Nuevo de Hacer Comedias (1609). Dutch and German crit. is unimportant prior to the 17th c., but three critics may be mentioned whose work reflects the spirit of Ren. crit.: D. Heinsius, De Tragoediae Constitutione (1611); M. Opitz, Buch von der deutschen Poeterey (1624); and G. Vossius, de Artis Poeticae Natura (1647).

SECONDARY WORKS: In addition to the general histories of crit. by Saintsbury, Wimsatt, and Brooks, the following studies are useful: C. De-job, De L'Influence du Concile de Trente sur la Litt . . . (1884); K. Borinski, Die Poetik der Ren. (1886); J. E. Spingarn, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the Ren. (1899); K. Vossler, Poetische Theorien in der ital. Frühen. (1900); F. Padel-ford, Select Tr. from Scaliger's Poetics (1905); H. Charlton, Castelvetro's Theory of Poetry (1913); G. Thompson, Elizabethan Crit. of Po-etry (1914); C. Trabalza, La Critica Letteraria nel Rinsciamento (1915); D. L. Clark, Rhetoric and Poetic in the Ren. (1922); Patterson, see above, COLLECTIONS; W. G. Crane, Wit and Rhetoric in the Ren. (1937); F. Markwardt, Gesch. der deutschen Poetik, I (1937); C. S. Baldwin, Ren. Lit. Theory and Practice (1939); R. J. Clements, Crit. Theory and Practice of the Pléiade (1942); V. Hall, Jr., Ren. Lit. Crit. (1945); M. T. Herrick, The Fusion of Horatian and Aristotelian Lit. Crit. (1946); J. W. H. Atkins, Eng. Lit. Crit.: the Ren. (1947); J. Cun-ningham, Woe or Wonder (1954); M. Doran, Endeavors of Art (1954); M. T. Herrick, Tragi-comedy (1955); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500-1700 (1956); B. Wein-berg, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the It. Ren. (2 v., 1961); B. Hathaway, The Age of Crit.: the Late Ren. in Italy (1962); O. B. Hardison, The En-during Monument: a Study in the Relationship between Ren. Crit. and Lit. Practice (1962).

Of the numerous articles on aspects of Ren. poetics, see especially M. W. Bundy, "'Inven-tion' and 'Imagination' in the Ren.," JEGP, 29 (1930); H. S. Wilson, "Some Meanings of 'Nature' in Ren. Lit. Theory," JHI, 2 (1941); B. Weinberg, "The Poetic Theories of Min-turno," Studies in Honor of Frederick W. Ship-ley (1942), "Castelvetro's Theory of Poetics" and "Robortello on the Poetics," both in Crane, Critics; G. Giovannini, "Historical Realism and the Tragic Emotions in Ren. Crit.," PQ, 32 (1953); B. Sozzi, "La Poetica del Tasso," Studi Tassiani, 5 (1955); S. L. Bethell, "The Nature of Metaphysical Wit," Discussions of John Donne, ed. F. Kermodé (1962). v.H.

RENAISSANCE POETRY. The term "Ren." has occasioned much debate. Like other general terms, it embraces many exceptions and ap-parent contradictions. Moreover, it means dif-ferent things in painting, architecture, litera-ture; and its chronological limits vary from country to country. The notion of a "rebirth" is in itself suspect, for culture is not dis-continuous. In general usage, however, the term is most commonly applied to the 16th c. With margins of half a century, roughly, on either side, that application may be accepted. By "Ren. poetry" is meant, then, European po-etry produced between 1450 and 1650.

Within these limits some pervasive charac-teristics may be noticed. Among these is hu-manism, the enthusiastic "recovery" and imitation of the classics, especially Gr.; the eventual displacement of L. by firmly established ver-naculars; and the eminence attained by certain genres: heroic poem, sonnet, madrigal, pastoral, epigram. A heightened conception of the im-portance of the individual parallels the widened horizons in science and geography, presenting new worlds for poetic exploration. The religious renewal expressed in the Reform-ation and Counter-Reformation is both a stimulus to devotional poetry and, in its di-visive effects, a factor in promoting nationalism. Intellectually and artistically, Italy has the dominant rôle as initiator and exemplar.

Certain other characteristics serve to differ-entiate the new age from the medieval period. The major literatures, for instance, achieve noteworthy successes in polishing and regular-izing poetic vocabulary. Allegory and dream-vision tend to give way to realism and lyricism as the older didactic criteria are supplemented or replaced by the criteria of imitation and de-light. The invention of printing, by rendering poetry more accessible, encouraged poets to write for a much wider audience than had been available to the medieval poet. Another differ-ence appears in the emergence of historical self-consciousness. Whereas the Middle Ages had tended to fuse the past into one indis-criminate whole, the Ren. tended to treat the nonclassical centuries either with disdain or with critical condescension. Even where evoca-tion of the past is most sympathetic—in Bo-iardo, in Du Bellay, in Spenser—this attitude may be detected. And as every great move-ment carries within itself the germs of its own decay, there emerges toward the end of the Ren. an increasing interest in form as opposed to content, whence derives the formalism of the neoclassic age!

In Italy, since the great precursors of the Ren.—Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio—established a viable literary language, the question of the language should have been settled. It was not. Petrarch himself mistakenly pinned his hope of poetic fame upon his L. epic, Africa; and his humanist successors remained scornful of the vulgar tongue. No considerable It. vernacular poet appears between Boccaccio (1313?-1375) and Lorenzo de' Medici (1449-92). Within Italy and without, the poetry of the early Ren. is largely neo-Latin. The practice of Latinizing persisted throughout the entire Ren.; the same individuals wrote both L. and vernacular com-positions. Among the most signal neo-L. poets may be named the gifted Giovanni Pontano (1426-1503), erotic poet of marital love; Man-tuan (G.-B. Spagnuolo: 1448-1516), influential through his eclogues; Poliziano, or Politian (Angelo Ambrogini: 1454-94); Girolamo Vida (1485-1566), author of long didactic poems and an epic Christiad; George Buchanan (1506-82), Scottish elegist; the Dutch Joannes Secundus (Jan Everaerts: 1511-1536), truest lyricist of the lot; and John Owen (?1560-1622), Welshman, whose Epigrams (1606ff.) diverted learned Europe. A word might be said also for Jacopo Sannazaro (1456-1530), author of the famed (vernacular) Arcadia (1504), as inventor of the piscatory eclogue; and for Andrea Alciati (1492-1550), whose Emblematum liber (1531) begot innumerable imitations. Many others wrote respectable L. and Gr. verse; and the practice aided in producing a native poetry with greater restraint and more disciplined form than might otherwise have resulted. But from first to last neo-Latin poetry was a graveyard of misdirected effort. The future lay elsewhere.

The magnificent story of the It. Ren., often told, cannot be reduced to a few words. In heroic poem, in lyric, and in pastoral, It. poets dominate the age and set the models for imitation. The medieval chivalric matter of the Carolingian cycle, rescued from popular balladeers and street singers, was raised into conscious art in epic pattern, now humorous and grotesque, as in the Morgante Maggiore of Luigi Pulci (1432-87); now serious and nobly romantic, as in the Orlando Innamorato of Matteo Boiardo (1434-94); now infused with satire and irony, as in the exquisitely polished Orlando Furioso of Lodovico Ariosto (1474-1533), stylistic masterpiece of the genre. These, together with the more lavishly descriptive and moralizing Gerusalemme Liberata of Torquato Tasso (1544-95) established for Italians the primacy of ottava rima as vehicle for heroic poetry and set for others a model rivaled only by the Aeneid. The pastoral strain traces its line of descent from the Orfeo (1494) of Poliziano through Sannazaro's Arcadia (1504) and Tasso's Aminta (1580) to the Pastor Fido (1590) of Giovanni Battista Guarini (1537-1612). The two last, dramatic in form, are lyric in feeling and highly influential upon subsequent pastoral poetry. Smooth writers of the detached lyric, as represented by ballate, canzoni, madrigals, and sonnets are legion; and everywhere the inspiration of Petrarch is evident. It. poetical raccolte of the period, very numerous, are virtually tributes to Petrarch; the masculine vigor and unpolished individuality of Michelangelo Buonarroti's (1475-1564) sonnets are rare exceptions. For It. poetic drama, see below, final section.

After Italy, France was the most effective agent in spreading the civilization of the Ren. to the rest of Europe. Under the influence, initially, of Francis I and his sister, Marguerite d'Angoulême, Fr. Ren. poetry remained largely artificial and courtly. Clément Marot (1495-1544) happily blended sympathies for the old and the new. Adhering to old forms, he invested them with ease and naturalness. His verse paraphrases of selected Psalms enjoyed great popularity; and his elegiac and pastoral poems found a reflection in Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar. Marot's friend Melin de Saint-Gelais (1487-1558) imported the sonnet to France, beginning a vogue which soon became universal. After Marot, leadership in Fr. poetry passed briefly to Lyons. Of the flourishing Lyonnese school, Antoine Héroët (d. 1568) is now forgotten; Maurice Scève (1504-64), eminent and able Petrarchizer in dizains, is only now beginning to be restudied; and Louise Labé (ca. 1525-66), impassioned love poetess in elegy and sonnet, is rather a name than a living force. The Lyonnese, by virtue of proximity, were much influenced by It. neo-Platonism. All this, however, was but prelude to the concerted efforts of a Parisian group, the famous Pléiade (q.v.), whose dual purpose it was to create a distinguished Fr. language and a national poetry. Joachim du Bellay (1525-60), their leader and spokesman, issued their manifesto, La Deffense et Illustration de la Langue françoise, in 1549. But the brightest star of the Pléiade was Pierre de Ronsard (1524-85), in whom the Fr. Ren. came of age. Ronsard's interests and inspirations were varied. An admirer of Petrarch, of Pindar, of Anacreon, of Horace, he was a master craftsman in sonnet, ode, and elegy. His work is characterized by delicacy of feeling and great finish. The inheritor of Ronsard's literary eminence, if not of his gifts, was Philippe Desportes (1545-1606), a copious sonneteer and imitator of It. models. Desportes's rival in the popular taste was Guillaume de Salluste du Bartas (1544-90), whose epic of creation, La Sepmaine (1578), had an astounding European vogue and left traces of influence upon Tasso and—in Joshua Sylvester's translation—upon Milton. A more fiery and compelling Huguenot voice is that of the soldier-poet-historian, Agrippa d'Aubigné (1552-1630). The seven books of D'Aubigné's Les Tragiques (1616), constituting a blistering arraignment of his Catholic enemies and a powerful picture of the sufferings of France during the Wars of Religion, are a fitting curtain to the spectacle of the Fr. Ren.

Spain and Portugal, outside the main current, had their own burst of poetic glory. They, too, finally succumbed to the It. Circe, though not without a struggle between the new schools and the adherents to traditional native forms. In Spain the issue was rather simple; in Portugal, it was complicated by the necessity of choosing between Spanish and Portuguese. Some poets, like Francisco de Sá de Miranda (ca. 1485-1558), were successful in both languages. It. forms were introduced into Spain by Juan Boscán (ca. 1490-1542) and much furthered by the poetry of his greatly gifted young friend, Garcilaso de la Vega (1503-36). Best representative of the older tradition is probably Cristóbal de Castillejo (ca. 1490-1550), who wittily but strenuously opposed the Italianizers. Most eminent of the Salamancan school was the Augustinian friar, Luis de León (ca. 1528-91), who wrote some of the most beautifully simple, direct, and personal lyrics in Sp. His counterpart in the Sevillian school was Fernando de Herrera (ca. 1534-94); and in religious verse, the ecstatic (San) Juan de la Cruz (1549-91). Worthy of mention also is Gutierre de Cetina (ca. 1520-57), another Italianizer. In epic, the age produced Alonso de Ercilla (1533-94), whose La Araucana (1569; complete, 1597) presents an American setting; and, more notably, the Portuguese Luís de Camões (1524-80), whose patriotic Os Lusíadas (1572) is the only modern epic worthy to stand beside Paradise Lost. Another Portuguese, Jorge de Montemayor, following Sannazaro, wrote (in Sp.) La Diana (1559), a prose pastoral romance with interspersed lyrics. Last may be named Luis de Góngora (1561-1627), a witty and gifted lyricist, the introducer of that cult of obscurity which beclouded the later poetry of the siglo de oro. The real giants of the age—Santa Teresa, Cervantes, Lope de Vega, Tirso de Molina, Calderón—although respectable versifiers, belong rather to the realms of prose or the drama (see below, final section).

Germany, whose contributions to the Reformation and to the Ren. were important in other directions, is negligible in vernacular poetry.

England's poetic Ren. came late. The delay was not altogether disadvantageous, for it enabled the Eng. to draw upon the riches of both Italy and France. Of the Tudor poets who preceded Wyatt and Surrey, John Skelton (ca. 1460-1529), author of rough and tumbling medieval satires in jiggling short lines, was most notable. Innovation and experiment in the new spirit, al modo italico, begin with Sir Thomas Wyatt (ca. 1503-42) and Henry Howard (ca. 1517-47), Earl of Surrey. These two, whose poetry was first published in Tottel's miscellany Songs and Sonnets (1557), are credited with introducing into Eng. the sonnet, terza rima, blank verse, and the alexandrine. Less sturdily individual, as a metrist Surrey is considerably smoother than Wyatt; and he became the model for the sporadic Italianizing efforts of various minor courtly poets. Of poets belonging to the generation between these forerunners and Spenser, the ablest is George Gascoigne (ca. 1542-77), a conscientious craftsman whose innovating merit is not exclusively poetic. The once-famous Mirror for Magistrates (1559; enlarged, 1563), reproducing the medieval fall-of-princes theme, is hardly salvageable, even with the "Induction" (ed. 1563) by Thomas Sackville (1536-1608).

A concerted and sustained effort to lift the Eng. language and poetry into rivalry with Fr. and It., as well as classic literature, does not appear until the last quarter of the 16th c. Once the movement was begun, however, it matured rapidly and produced an astounding poetic literature. An age that numbers Spenser, Sidney, Marlowe, Drayton, Shakespeare, Chapman, Donne, and Jonson among its poets need make no apologies anywhere. The great flowering begins with The Shepheardes Calender (1579) of Edmund Spenser (1552-99), eclogues in experimental meters drawing inspiration from the Gr. bucolic poets, from Virgil, Mantuan, Marot, and from Chaucer. Virtually the manifesto of the new movement, it provided an impulse comparable to that originated in the Pléiade's Deffense. This initial success Spenser followed up in his masterpiece, The Faerie Queene (1590; 1596), a bold attempt to "overgo" Ariosto and Tasso in the heroic kind.

Thereafter, success followed success. Poetical miscellanies, following Tottel's, now increased in number and lyric excellence, numbering, among others, The Phoenix Nest (1593), The Passionate Pilgrim (1599), containing poems by William Shakespeare (1564-1616), England's Helicon (1600), and Davison's A Poetical Rhapsody (1602). Narrative and erotic poems of Ovidian stamp, such as the Hero and Leander (1598) of Christopher Marlowe (1564-93) and George Chapman (?1559-1634) and the Venus and Adonis (1593) of Shakespeare abounded. The characteristic Ren. addiction to the sonnet reached full tide in the 1590's, producing such remarkable sequences as the Astrophel and Stella (pr. 1591) of Sir Philip Sidney (1554-86), the Delia (1592, 1594) of Samuel Daniel (1562-1619), the Idea's Mirrour (1594, 1619) of Michael Drayton (1563-1631), and the Amoretti (1595) of Spenser. Shakespeare's sonnets, probably mostly written during this decade, were first printed in 1609. Contemporary with the sonnet cycles were the numerous collections of madrigals and the beginnings of formal verse satire. Nor were the translators inactive. But the noblest creation of this period is a vigorous national drama into which great poetic energies were poured. From Lyly and Peele to Beaumont and Fletcher the Eng. drama sparkles with fine songs and noble passages in a perfected blank verse, the Ren. legacy to Milton (see also below, final section). After the turn of the century, the poetry of Ben Jonson (1572-1637) shows tendencies toward neoclassic formalism; that of John Donne (1572-1631), a manneristic intellectualism and obscurity. With their followers, Milton aside, the Ren. gives way to baroque (q.v.).

J.L.L.

Ren. poetic drama developed from the religious drama of the Middle Ages—the “sacre rappresentazioni” of Italy, the “mystère” of France, and the Eng. mysteries and moralities. Generally, medieval drama is in crude rhyming stanzas serving for both serious and comic dialogue. By the 16th c. medieval drama had proliferated into a series of vigorous popular forms, largely secular but preserving the strong moral bias of the earlier period, as in tragedy based on the “fall of princes” theme. With the advent of humanism, critics advocated a drama modeled on the work of Seneca, Plautus, and Terence. It is significant that where the humanists were most successful (Italy, France), Ren. drama is relatively weak; and where they were least influential (Spain, England), Ren. drama is magnificently successful.

In Italy, poetic drama begins with Mussato, whose Eccerinis (1315), the first regular drama in modern European literature, is an imitation of Seneca in L. verse. In the early 16th c. the circle of Cardinal Riario (1451–1521) made a concerted effort to revive the ancient theatre at the court of Leo X in Rome. It. vernacular tragedy may be dated from G. G. Trissino's Sofonisba (1515), a stiff Senecan tragedy in blank verse (versi sciolti) with lyric choruses. Trissino's followers include Alemanni (Antigone, 1532), Giraldi Cinthio (L'Orbecche, 1541), and Tasso (Il Re Torrismondo, 1587). Far more significant is It. lyric drama imitating the music drama which critics believed to be the most ancient Gr. form. This drama began with Politian's Orfeo (1494) and was continued in the 16th c. by Tasso (Aminta, 1580), Guarini (Il Pastor Fido, 1590), and Rinuccini (Dafne, 1594, 99). It culminated in the first true opera, Striggio's Orfeo (1607), with music by Monteverdi.

Fr. poetic drama followed the It. lead. The earliest important Fr. drama is George Buchanan's influential Johannes Baptistus (1540), soon followed by the Julius Caesar of Muretus. Vernacular drama was established by Étienne Jodelle, a member of the Pléiade, in Cleopâtre captive (1552) and Didon se sacrifiant (1558), both frigidly correct imitations of Seneca. The second is important for its use of alexandrine meter, which thereafter became standard for Fr. tragedy. The classical style reached something of a climax in the tragedies of Robert Garnier (1544–90). While usually stiff, Garnier's verse is occasionally moving. Les Juives (1584) is probably his best work and has been produced successfully in the 20th c. There is no important lyric or pastoral drama in 16th c. France, and Fr. poetic comedy is unimportant until Molière, whose work belongs to the next century.

Sp. poetic drama is the glory of the siglo del oro. After experiments in both popular and classical forms, it blossomed in the work of Lope de Vega (1562–1635). Lope's work (ca. 400 plays survive from an estimated 1500) is usually divided into four categories: (1) comedias de capa y espada, consisting of upper-class intrigue and in a loose rhyming tetrameter; (2) heroicas, or plays on historical subjects (e.g., Roma Abrasada); (3) comedias de santos, saints' plays; and (4) autos sacramentales, allegorical dialogues in verse on religious themes. It is in the heroicas and autos that Lope was most successful. Second place in Sp. poetic drama belongs to Calderón de la Barca (1600–81), who wrote autos, comedias de santos, tragedies (El Principe Constante), and the unique La Vida es sueño (Life is a Dream). Among numerous lesser dramatists are C. de Castro, whose play on the Cid influenced Corneille; Montalban; Alcaron; and Tirso de Molina, creator of Don Juan.

Like Sp. drama, Eng. Ren. drama is closely tied to medieval drama. In Bale's King John (1540) a group of allegorical morality-play characters are suddenly transformed into historical figures. Gorboduc (1562), a Senecan history play by Sackville and Norton, established blank verse as the standard meter for serious drama in Eng. The great period of Eng. drama began around 1580 with the work of Lyly, Peele, Greene, and Kyd, all skilled versifiers and experimenters in such forms as tragedy, revenge play, chronicle history, and lyric-pastoral. Christopher Marlowe (1564–93) is the most important of the early dramatists. His “mighty line” dazzled contemporaries and remains today one of the great achievements of Eng. blank verse. Shakespeare's achievements are so numerous and so profound that they cannot be listed in a brief article such as the present one. He adapted blank verse to every conceivable mood and purpose and is still the dominant influence on Eng. poetic drama. Shakespeare's contemporaries and followers include Ben Jonson (1572–1637), John Fletcher (1579–1625), George Chapman (1559–1634), and John Webster (1580–1625). A special type of poetic drama, in many ways similar to opera, was the court masque (q.v.), usually in lyric meters and set to music. Among the many authors of masques Ben Jonson and Thomas Campion were most successful; John Milton (Comus, 1634), the most significant and poetically moving.

After 1610 Eng. drama declined perceptibly. As the plays became more melodramatic, the poetry became more ornamental and showy. By the closing of the theatres in 1642, Eng. poetic drama was already a dead art. When the theatres were reopened in 1660, it was Fr. classical drama as perfected by Corneille and Racine which set the style of the age. See also LYRIC, NARRATIVE POETRY, TRAGEDY, etc. and the relevant sections in the various national and regional poetry articles. O.B.H.

REPETITION

A. Tilley, The Lit. of the Fr. Ren. (2 v., 1904); J. M. Berdan, Early Tudor Poetry (1920); A.F.G. Bell, Luis de León, a Study of the Sp. Ren. (1925); P. Champion, Ronsard et son temps (1925); W. L. Renwick, Edmund Spenser: An Essay on Ren. Poetry (1925; excellent general introd.); J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly, A New Hist. of Sp. Lit. (1926); H. Hauvette, L'Arioste et la poésie chevaleresque à Ferrare au début du XVI^e s. (2d ed., 1927); Poetry of the Eng. Ren., ed. J. W. Hebel and H. H. Hudson (1929; anthol. with good crit. apparatus); J. G. Scott, Les Sonnets élisabéthains (1929); The Love Poems of Joannes Secundus, ed. and tr. F. A. Wright (1930; with valuable essay on neo-Latin poetry); J. Plattard, Agrippa d'Aubigné (1931); H. Chamard, Les Origines de la poésie fr. de la Ren. (1932; emphasizes medieval heritage); R. Morçay, La Ren. (2 v., 1933-35); J. B. Fletcher, Lit. of the It. Ren. (1934); A. Meozzi, Il petrarchismo europeo: secolo XVI (1934); C. S. Lewis, Allegory of Love (1936) and Eng. Lit. in the 16th C. Excluding Drama (1954); A. Capasso, Tre saggi sulla poesia ital. del rinascimento (1939); G. Toffanin, Il Cinquecento (3d ed., 1945; basic); E.M.W. Tillyard, Shakespeare's History Plays (1946) and The Eng. Epic and Its Background (1954; pt. 3); E. Donadoni, Torquato Tasso (3d ed., 1946); M. Prior, The Language of Tragedy (1947); T. Spencer, Shakespeare and the Nature of Man (2d ed., 1949); M. I. Gerhardt, La Pastorale (1950); C. M. Ing, Elizabethan Lyrics (1951); H. D. Smith, Elizabethan Poetry (1952); P. Cruttwell, The Shakespearean Moment and Its Place in the Poetry of the 17th C. (1954); B. Weinberg, Fr. Poetry of the Ren. (1954); A. L. Sells, It. Influence in Eng. Poetry from Chaucer to Southwell (1955); J. W. Lever, The Elizabethan Love Sonnet (1956); M. Valency, In Praise of Love (1958); M. T. Herrick, It. Comedy in the Ren. (1960); A. W. Satterthwaite, Spenser, Ronsard and Du Bellay: A Ren. Comparison (1960); D. Bush, Eng. Lit. in the Earlier 17th C., 1600-1660 (2d ed., 1962).

J.L.L.; O.B.H.

RENGA. See JAPANESE POETRY.

REPETEND. A recurring word, phrase, or line; loosely, a refrain (q.v.). As distinguished from refrain, r. usually refers to a repetition occurring irregularly rather than regularly in a poem, or to a partial rather than a complete repetition. E.g.: "For a breeze of morning moves, / And the planet of Love is on high, / Beginning to faint in the light that she loves / On a bed of daffodil sky, / To faint in the light of the sun she loves, / To faint in his light, and to die" (Tennyson, Maud 22.7). R. may be richly studied in the medieval ballads, Poe's Ulalume and The Raven, Meredith's Love in the Valley, Eliot's The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock. L.P.

REPETITION of a sound, syllable, word, phrase, line, stanza, or metrical pattern is a basic unifying device in all poetry. It may reinforce, supplement, or even substitute for meter, the other chief controlling factor in the arrangement of words into poetry. Primitive religious chants from all cultures show r. developing into cadence and song, with parallelism and r. still constituting, most frequently as anaphora (q.v.), an important part in the sophisticated and subtle rhetoric of contemporary liturgies (e.g., the Beatitudes). Frequently also, the exact r. of words in the same metrical pattern at regular intervals forms a refrain (q.v.), which serves to set off or divide narrative into segments, as in ballads, or, in lyric poetry, to indicate shifts or developments of emotion. Such repetitions may serve as commentary, a static point against which the rest of the poem develops, or it may be simply a pleasing sound pattern to fill out a form ("hey downe a-downe"). As a unifying device, independent of conventional metrics, r. is found extensively in free verse, where parallelism, q.v. (r. of grammatical pattern) reinforced by the recurrence of actual words and phrases governs the rhythm which helps to distinguish free verse from prose (e.g., Walt Whitman, I Hear America Singing; Carl Sandburg, Chicago, The People Yes; Edgar Lee Masters, Spoon River Anthology, passim).

The r. of similar endings of words or even of identical syllables (rime riche, q.v.) constitutes rhyme, used generally to bind lines together into larger units or to set up relationships within the same line (internal rhyme). Such r., as a tour de force, may be the center of interest in a poem, as Southey's The Cata-ract of Lodore and Belloc's Tarantella, or may play a large part in establishing the mood of a poem, as in Byron's Don Juan. Front-rhyme, or alliteration (q.v.) the r. of initial sounds of accented syllables frequently supplements the use of other unifying devices, although in OE poetry it formed the basic structure of the line and is still so employed occasionally in modern poetry, as by G. M. Hopkins and in W. H. Auden's The Age of Anxiety. Alliteration also may be carried beyond the limits of a single line and may even operate in elaborate patterns throughout a poem (see SOUND IN POETRY) as a counterpoint to other relationships indicated by different sorts of r., such as rhyme, metrical pattern, and assonance (q.v.). The exact r. of sounds within a line serves as a variety of internal rhyme ("Come here, thou worthy of a world of praise," Chapman, The Odyssey). Another repetitional device used chiefly in a decorative or supplemental function rather than in a structural one is assonance, the use of similar vowel sounds with identical consonant clusters. Such a poem as G. M. Hopkins' The Leaden Echo and the Golden Echo will illustrate abundantly how these "supplemental" devices of internal rhyme, alliteration, and assonance may be made into the chief features of the poetic line to support an unconventional system of metrics.

REPETITION

A single word may be repeated as a unifying device or, especially in dramatic poetry, for emphasis. The sections of a poem may be linked by repeating in the opening line of each new stanza the final word of the previous one, as in MacNeice's Leaving Barra. This linking device can be carried further into the formal rhetorical figure of climax, as in the following passage where each noun is picked up and repeated in some form.

And let the kettle to the trumpets speak,
The trumpet to the cannoneer without,
The cannons to the heavens, the heaven to earth.

(Shakespeare, Hamlet)

The suggestions of a quality inherent in a single word may be exploited by the intensive r. of the word in every position within a conventional metrical pattern that the poet's ingenuity can devise, as in De la Mare's Silver, or a word may be repeated to underline an onomatopoeic effect as in the line, itself repeated at irregular intervals, from Catullus' 64th Ode, "Currite ducentes subtegmina, currite, fusi." The immediate r. of a word for emphasis has an incremental emotional effect, as shown most daringly in King Lear with an entire line consisting of a single word repeated ("Never, never, never, never, never!"). One of the dangers of this method is that like all expressions of strong emotion it lends itself to parody rather readily. Almost the same patterns of r. are used by Shakespeare for both serious and comic purposes, the difference in effect lying in context and in metrical subtlety.

O Cressid! O false Cressid! false, false, false!
(Troilus and Cressida)

O night, O night! alack, alack, alack!
(Midsummer Night's Dream)

The same duality of effect may be observed in the following progression from Shakespeare through Nathaniel Lee to Henry Fielding:

O Desdemona, Desdemona dead! O!O!O!
(Othello)

O Sophonisba, Sophonisba O!
(Sophonisba)

O Huncamunca, Huncamunca O!
(Tragedy of Tom Thumb the Great)

Again it is notable that the effective line lacks complete symmetry, while the unintentionally and the intentionally comic lines are rigidly constructed, a situation which suggests caution in the use of immediate r. A special case of r. is the pun (q.v.), where not similarity but difference is pointed up, and the effect within the context in which it occurs is diffusive rather than unifying. In general, double meanings in poetry will be found more frequently within the "tight" or heavily patterned forms of verse, such as sonnets or heroic couplets, rather than in "loose" forms, such as nondramatic blank verse.

The r. of a phrase in poetry may have an incantatory effect as in the opening lines of T. S. Eliot's Ash-Wednesday:

Because I do not hope to turn again
Because I do not hope
Because I do not hope to turn

The remaining 38 lines of the opening section of the poem might well be studied as an example of the effects of phrasal r., containing as they do no less than 11 lines clearly related to the opening 3 and serving as a unifying factor in a poem otherwise very free in structure. Sometimes the effect of a repeated phrase in a poem will be to emphasize a development or change by means of the contrast in the words following the identical phrases. For example, the shift from the distant to the near, from the less personal to the more personal is emphasized in Coleridge's Rime of the Ancient Mariner by such a r. of phrases:

I looked upon the rotting sea,
And drew my eyes away;
I looked upon the rotting deck,
And there the dead men lay.

Allusion (q.v.) or quoting is a special case of r., since it relies on resources outside of the poem itself for its effect. Here, as with the pun, the effect of the r. is diffusive rather than unifying, seeming frequently to be an extraneous, if graceful, decoration. Hence, with the exception of a few poets who have used it as a basic technique (T. S. Eliot, The Waste Land; Ezra Pound, Cantos), its chief use has been humorous, as in Robert Frost's A Masque of Reason or in W. S. Gilbert's Bab Ballads.

The r. of a complete line within a poem may be related to the envelope (q.v.) stanza pattern, may be used regularly at the end of each stanza as a refrain, or in other ways. The multiple recurrence of a line at irregular intervals as in Catullus' 64th Ode, as cited supra, or the line "Cras amet qui numquam amavit, quique amavit cras amet," which occurs ten times in the 92 lines of the Pervigilium Veneris, illustrates the effect of a r. of a specific line apart from a set place as furnished by stanzaic structure. Rarely a line may be repeated entire and immediately as a means of bringing a poem to a close, an extension of the method of bringing a sequence of terza rima (q.v.) to a close with a couplet:

RHAPSODIST

And miles to go before I sleep,
And miles to go before I sleep.

(Frost, Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening)

Lines simply reintroduced once in a poem generally are meant to bear an altered and enriched significance on their second appearance, as:

O all the instruments agree
The day of his death was a dark cold day
(W. H. Auden, In Memory of W. B. Yeats)

The r. of a complete stanza within a poem is generally related to the envelope pattern or to the refrain, already cited. In either case, the effect is to reintroduce into an altered situation a unit which has already provoked a response, which will now modify and be modified.

The r. of metrical pattern is one of the most important elements of poetry. Through such r. individual lines are paired as to structure and groups of lines are built and organized into larger units or stanzas. These may be relatively simple like the ballad stanza, resulting from the breakdown of a pair of 14-syllable lines, or complex like the stanza used by Keats in Ode to a Nightingale. Undoubtedly part of the interest in a long poem lies in the skillful variation possible in the repetition of a single basic unit, whether the tail-rhyme strophes of metrical romance, the Spenserian stanzas of The Faerie Queene, or the heroic couplet in Pope's Rape of the Lock. Similarly in blank verse, much interest lies in the variety possible within limits of the regular beat.—C. A. Smith, R. and Parallelism in Eng. Verse (1894); B. R. Lewis, Creative Poetry (1931); C. P. Smith, Pattern and Variation in Poetry (1932); G. W. Allen, Am. Prosody (1935); Sister Miriam Joseph, Shakespeare and the Arts of Language (1947); J. Greenway, Lit. among the Primitives (1964).

S.F.F.

RESOLUTION. Term restricted in Gr. and L. metric to the resolution of a long syllable into its metrical equivalent of two shorts, e.g., when an iambus (—) or trochee (—) is replaced by a tribrach (—). See CLASSICAL PROSODY and MORA.

R.J.G.

REST. A term adapted from music and generally definable as a pause that counts in the metrical scheme. Most writers seem to restrict this definition to situations where a pause seems to compensate (see COMPENSATION) for the absence of an unstressed syllable or syllables in a foot. The standard example is Tennyson's

xx / xx / xx /
Break, break, break,
x x / x x / x x /
At the foot of thy crags, O sea!

However, others have suggested that a rest may take the place of an entire foot. According to Stewart the variety of metrical pause equivalent to a rest in music seems to be a late literary invention, "hardly begun until after 1920."—Baum; G. R. Stewart, Jr., Modern Metrical Technique as Illustrated in Ballad Meter, 1700–1920 (1923); W. L. Schramm, Approaches to a Science of Eng. Verse (1935).

R.BE.

RETROENCHA (retroensa). A Prov. lyric form (more talked about than actually produced, it would seem) whose chief distinction was that it had a refrain at the end of each stanza. Otherwise, it was indistinguishable from the vers or the chanso (qq.v.).—E. Levy, Provenzalisches Supplement-Wörterbuch, vii (1915).

F.M.C.

REVERDIE. OF dance poem which celebrates the coming of spring, the new green of the woods and fields, the singing of the birds, and the time for love. The versification is usually that of the chanson (q.v.) of 5 or 6 stanzas without refrain. According to Jeanroy, the r. was a popular form which spread from the Franco-Prov. border. Others conceive of it as an artistic form of dance resulting from an aristocratic milieu.—J. Bédier, "Les fêtes de mai et les commencements de la poésie lyrique au moyen-âge," Revue des deux mondes, 135 (1896); Jeanroy, Origines.

U.T.H.

REVERSAL. See PLOT.

RHAPSODIST, rhapsode (Gr. "stitcher"). In ancient Greece a wandering minstrel or court poet who recited epic poetry partly extemporaneously and partly from memory. He selected and "stitched together" (hence the name) his own poetry or that of others into which he frequently interpolated his own work. With the establishment of what was regarded as the authentic Homeric text of the Iliad and Odyssey (ca. 500 B.C.) the term labeled a professional class who recited only the Homeric poems in correct sequence, not selected extracts. Though such a class survived in Greece until the time of Sulla, it came to be unfavorably regarded.—T. W. Allen, Hom. the Origins and Transmission (1924).

R.A.H.

RHAPSODY. Originally a selection or a portion of epic literature, usually the Iliad or Odyssey, sung by a rhapsode or rhapsodist (q.v.) in ancient Greece. The term in literature subsequently meant any highly emotional utterance, a literary work informed by ecstasy and not by a rational organization. It is also applied to a literary miscellany or a disconnected series of literary works.

R.A.H.

RHETORIC AND POETICS. From ancient times to the present, rhetoric in the broad sense has meant the art of persuasion, in the narrow sense the studied ornament of speech, or eloquence. Since the time of Aristotle, poetics has meant the theory of making and judging poetry. Any attempt to describe the relationship between these two disciplines inevitably runs into many complications. In the first place, rhet., as Aristotle remarked in the first sentence of his Rhetoric, is a "counterpart" (antistrophe) of dialectic or logic. Poetry, in turn, is a counterpart of rhet. Both rhet. and poetry depend upon grammar, and lyric poetry has always been associated with music. Many attempts have been made to find the differences between these arts, but more often than not these differences have evaporated in the interpretation of some particular critic. Consequently rhet. and poetics from Plato to T. S. Eliot have been almost inextricably intertwined. Rhet. is still a part of poetics; the analyses of poems that appear in the so-called New Criticism of today are largely rhetorical, in both the broad Aristotelian-Ciceronian sense and in the narrow stylistic sense.

Plato suggested inspiration versus reason or madness versus demonstrable truth as a dividing line between the poet and the orator. Socrates, in the Phaedrus, remarked that no poet can hope to enter the doors of poetry unless he is mad. Socrates' ideal speaker, on the other hand, was a sober dialectician. Aristotle mentioned, in his Poetics, that the poet may have a touch of madness, but went no further. Other critics, especially the Neoplatonists, made much of inspiration, sometimes calling it divine furor, often insisting that inspiration was the essential factor in composing poetry. In the 16th c., the poet-critic Ronsard repeatedly declared that both the poet and musician must be inspired. Shakespeare perfectly expressed the concept in the last act of the Midsummer Night's Dream, where he made Theseus say, "The lunatic, the lover, and the poet / Are of imagination all compact." In the early 19th c. Shelley argued in his Defence of Poetry that the finest passages in poetry are not produced by study and have no necessary connection with the will. Inspiration, however, could hardly be analyzed and provided little matter for any systematic poetics; the critic who wished to draw up principles and rules was forced to turn to rhet. Moreover, some critics would not allow that inspiration was given only to poet and musician. In On the Sublime Longinus maintained that all of the truly elevated passages in literature are ecstatic, and made no distinction between poet and orator; both Homer and Demosthenes transported the reader, and so do Cicero and the author of Genesis. Inspiration and rhet. were always found together in the Bible. There was no questioning the inspired quality of either New or Old Testament, but were the prophetic books, the psalms, and Job oratory or poetry or both?

A more fruitful distinction between rhet. and poetry was provided by Aristotle when he called persuasion the characteristic of rhet. and imitation the characteristic of poetry. The orator is a good rhetorician when he masters all the available means of persuasion, and the poet is a poet because he imitates the actions of men. While Aristotle thought that poetry is more universal and a higher art than history, he did not call it more universal and higher than oratory or philosophy. Some of his Renaissance disciples, however, went so far. J. C. Scaliger (Poetices 1.1), for example, asserted that the poet excels the philosopher, historian, and orator because he alone is not tied to fact but represents a higher nature and in so doing creates as if he were "another god." Sir Philip Sidney and many others, including Wordsworth and Coleridge, echoed this concept.

Not every critic after Aristotle, however, accepted persuasion as a function peculiar to the rhetorician. Scaliger, while calling the poet a second deity, nevertheless maintained that philosophy and drama (i.e., poetry) have the same end as does oratory, namely, persuasion. Scaliger believed, as did most critics of the Renaissance, that poetry should be didactic. There was no explicit statement in Aristotle that the poet is a teacher, but Horace, whose rhetorical Ars Poetica was enormously influential for centuries, had said that the poet should teach as well as delight. Consequently most critics after Horace believed that poetry and rhet. had a common end, didacticism, which is usually identical with persuasion.

The only honest basis of teaching and persuading is knowledge. Plato's Socrates repeatedly quarreled with poets and with bad rhetoricians because they did not know enough. Cicero demanded a thorough knowledge of all the liberal arts and sciences in his ideal orator. Horace, who was doubtless influenced by Cicero, declared that the source and fountain of all good writing is "to know" (sapere). Scholars and critics of the Renaissance readily harmonized Ciceronian and Horatian dicta; they transferred the universal knowledge of

Cicero's ideal orator to the ideal poet and held up Virgil, sometimes Homer, as the exemplar of omniscience.

The concept that the true poet is an imitator or creator of fictions, not merely a versifier, was long accepted by most critics. Scaliger raised objections, arguing that verse and prose provided a satisfactory dividing line between poetry and oratory; but Scaliger was exceptional and most critics supported the Aristotelian theory, especially since it fitted Cicero's well-known statement in De Oratore (1.16), that the orator and poet are closely allied, the poet being somewhat more restricted in expression by his "numbers." For centuries, from Quintilian in the 1st c. to the Eng. romanticists of the 19th, it was a critical commonplace that Lucan was a rhetorician or historian who wrote in verse and that Plato and Xenophon were poets. Wordsworth's Preface to the Lyrical Ballads (1800) maintained that there is no difference between prose and verse save the poet's meter and rhyme. Wordsworth's more learned partner, Coleridge, objected to this theory, but on somewhat different grounds from those used by Scaliger. According to Coleridge, the very act of introducing meter and rhyme into a discourse fundamentally alters the form as well as the expression. Although he did not press his theory to the extent of excluding all prose from any close alliance with poetry—he acknowledged that Isaiah, Plato, and Jeremy Taylor wrote poetry of the "highest kind"—his discussion of the problem in the Biographia Literaria provided an important basis for later theories. Several present-day critics, following the lead of I. A. Richards, have incorporated Coleridge's ideas in their poetics.

Although persuasion as a characteristic did not separate rhet. from poetry, it suggested a significant difference. Since the orator must persuade, he must have an audience, and oratory was always regarded as a practical art. Such was the view of leading ancients like Aristotle, Cicero, and Quintilian, although Plato's Socrates aimed at self-conviction in his rhet. rather than at persuading the mob. The successful poet, especially the dramatist, usually had an audience; but poetry was not necessarily a practical art like rhet. This distinction has often been emphasized in modern times. The first Fr. art of poetry, Thomas Sebillet's Art poétique françois (1548), suggested that the ideal aim of the poet was his own personal glory or the glory of his country, not persuasion of a particular audience. Shelley described the poet as a "nightingale, who sits in darkness and sings to cheer its own solitude with sweet sounds." John Stuart Mill (Poetry and its Varieties, 1859) remarked that since poetry is the "natural fruit of solitude," it is overheard while eloquence is heard. Milton, in

Of Education, said that poetry is "more simple, sensuous, and passionate" than rhet., and many critics have argued that the poet relies more upon emotion, inner emotion, than does the prose writer. In an early essay, "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919), T. S. Eliot tried to separate the poetic experience from other experiences, and called the poetic experience primarily an intensifying of a special kind of emotion, namely, "art emotion." But Eliot never actually defined emotion in poetry. I. A. Richards, using the techniques of behaviorist psychology, has tried to define it, with conspicuous success, according to some disciples, with no success whatever, according to others.

The brief, incomplete analysis above should indicate the impossibility of presenting any systematic history of rhet. and poetics within the space allotted here. A brief account of the historical terminology, however, may at least point out some prominent milestones along the way.

Aristotle was apparently the first critic to construct a terminology for poetics. His Poetics provided both a qualitative and quantitative analysis: tragedy was divided into Plot, Character (ethos), Thought (dianoia), Diction, Music, Spectacle, and into prologue, episodes, choruses, and epode. Epic poetry could be analyzed in the same qualitative way though it lacked music and spectacle. In his Rhetoric, on the other hand, Aristotle divided a speech into two essential parts, statement of the case and proof. A speech might also have an introduction and a peroration, but these parts were not essential. Aristotle's Poetics all but disappeared from Alexandrian times to the close of the 15th c., and meanwhile the terminology of Cicero became the standard for both rhet. and poetics. Cicero's youthful De Inventione and the pseudo-Ciceronian Rhetorica ad Herennium named both qualitative and quantitative parts: rhet. was divided into invention, arrangement (dispositio), style, memory, and delivery; the mechanical parts of a speech were exordium, statement of the case (narratio), proof and/or disproof, conclusion. There were three kinds of style, high, middle, and plain.

Although the author of the Ad Herennium was sparing in his use of poetry to illustrate rhetorical principles, Cicero himself was not, but drew freely, for example, upon Terence to show what good rhet. was. Moreover, Cicero's most distinguished follower, Quintilian, taught that Homer's writings display all the rules of art to be followed in oratory and that a careful study of the comic poet Menander would be sufficient to develop the whole art of rhet. In late classical times and throughout most of the Middle Ages poetry fell under the wing of either rhet. or grammar. When deliberative oratory disappeared under the rule of the emperors and forensic oratory became highly specialized, demonstrative oratory or declamation became the principal rhetorical study and elocutio or style received the major emphasis. Invention and arrangement were either neglected or returned to their original owner, the logician. Some medieval theorists in France associated poetics with music, but most medieval manuals of poetry were rhetorics and only the sections on versification made any significant distinction between poetry and oratory.

With the revival of classical learning came the recovery of the mature rhetorical treatises of Cicero, De Oratore, Brutus, Orator, etc. and the complete Institutio Oratoria of Quintilian, bringing with them a revival of the logical components of rhet., namely, invention and arrangement. One of the influential books of the early Renaissance was De Inventione Dialectica by Rodolphus Agricola (d. 1485). Logic or dialectic, said Agricola, is "to speak in a probable way on any matter"; grammar teaches correctness and clarity, rhet. style. Agricola had anticipated Peter Ramus (1515-72), who insisted that invention and arrangement belonged to logic, that style belonged to rhet. Meanwhile Ciceronians continued to maintain that rhet. included both logical and stylistic disciplines. And the study of poetry remained largely rhetorical; dramas, epic poems, odes, elegies were analyzed in terms of invention, arrangement, and style, and also in terms of exordium, narratio, proof, and conclusion. The Ciceronian hierarchy of styles (high, middle, plain) was also restored.

The recovery of Aristotle's Poetics in the 16th c. produced some modifications of this rhetorical poetics, for scholars like Robortelli and Castelvetro began to mingle Aristotle's poetic terminology with the Ciceronian terminology, and their work gradually found its way into poetics outside Italy. The Pléiade poets, Du Bellay, Ronsard, Peletier, spoke of invention, arrangement, and style. Sidney's Defense of Poesy was mainly rhetorical. In the next century, however, these logical-rhetorical terms appeared side by side with Plot (Fable), Character (Manners), Thought (Sentiments), and Diction, as, for example, in Rapin's Réflexions sur la Poétique d'Aristote (1674) and in Dryden's Preface to the Fables (1700). In the 18th c. the authors of poetics continued to mingle Ciceronian terminology with Aristotle's and to use rhet. in both the broad and narrow sense.

The 19th c. witnessed a romantic revolt by poets and critics of poetry against classical poetics and a professed revulsion toward all rhet. (The revulsion was actually toward oratory.) This dislike of rhet. was carried over into the 20th c., when influential scholars and critics called for a "new" poetics and a "new" rhet. Joel Spingarn and Benedetto Croce recommended a scrapping of all older techniques and terminologies. Spingarn, in his lecture of 1910 entitled "The New Criticism," recommended concentration on the expression of a poem. At about the same time, Croce, in his aesthetic essays, recommended abandonment of form-content and the genres of poetry and adoption of intuition-expression. In 1923, I. A. Richards, one of the leaders of the New Critics, proposed to abandon traditional procedures and fashion a new poetics based on modern psychology. A dozen years later, he had more or less given up psychology and was working on a new rhet. Richards, in fact, had never abandoned rhet.; as Laurence Lerner (The Truest Poetry [1960], pp. 76-78) has remarked, Richards belongs with the Elizabethan apologists for poetry, with Sidney and Puttenham, whose arts of poetry were rhetorical. Northrop Frye, author of the Anatomy of Criticism, has turned back to Plato and Aristotle; he has resurrected the genres of poetry (drama, epic, lyric) and applied rhetorical criticism to them. According to Frye (pp. 245-247), there are two kinds of rhet.: persuasion ("applied literature") and ornament ("the lexis or verbal texture of poetry"). The old traditional terminology, going back through the Renaissance to ancient Greece and Rome, has been modified, but the changes are not so radical as may appear on the surface. Instead of res-verba, imitatio, factio, inventio, dispositio, elocutio, etc. we have Richards' emotive language of poetry vs. the scientific language of prose, John Crowe Ransom's ontology, Allen Tate's "strategies" of language, Cleanth Brooks's paradox, William Empson's ambiguity, and a host of other terms, such as creative imagination, organicism, tension, irony, semantics, and communication—all adding up, in the main, to rhet.

Plato, Phaedrus, Gorgias, Ion, Symposium; Aristotle, Rhetoric, Poetics; Cicero, De Inventione, De Oratore, Brutus, Orator, De Partitione Oratoria; [Cicero], Rhetorica ad Herennium; Horace, Ars Poetica; Quintilian, Institutio Oratoria; Longinus, On the Sublime; F. Robortellus, In Librum Aristotelis de Arte Poetica Explicationes (1548); T. Wilson, The Arte of Rhetorique (1553); Ramus and Talaeus, Rhetorica e P. Rami Regii Professoris Praelectionibus Observata (1572); J. C. Scaliger, Poetices Libri Septem (2d ed., 1581); Puttenham, The Arte of Eng. Poesie (1589); G. I. Vossius, Commentariorum Rhetoricorum Sive Oratoriarum Institutionum, Libri Sex (1643); F. Fénelon, Dialogues Concerning Eloquence (Eng. ed., 1722); G. Campbell, The Philos. of Rhet. (1776); H. Blair, Lectures on Rhet. and Belles Lettres (1783); R. Whately, Rhet. (1828); E. T. Channing, Lectures [On Rhet. and Oratory]

Read to the Seniors in Harvard College (1856); A. Bain, Eng. Composition and Rhet. (1866); J. F. Genung, The Practical Elements of Rhet. (1886); I. A. Richards, Practical Crit. (1929), The Philos. of Rhet. (1936); K. Burke, The Philos. of Lit. Form (1941) and A Rhet. of Motives (1950).

SECONDARY SOURCES: C. S. Baldwin, Ancient Rhet. and Poetic (1924), Medieval Rhet. and Poetic (1928); D. L. Clark, Rhet. and Poetry in the Renaissance (1922); Patterson; M. T. Herick, "The Place of Rhet. in Poetics," in Comic Theory in the 16th C. (1950); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhet. in England, 1500-1700 (1956); N. Frye, Anatomy of Crit. (1957); L. Lerner, Truest Poetry (1960); B. Weinberg, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the It. Renaissance (2 v., 1961); O. B. Hardison, Jr., The Enduring Monument (1962); G. Kennedy, The Art of Persuasion (1963); M. H. Nichols, Rhet. and Crit. (1963).

M.T.H.

RHETORICAL ACCENT. See ACCENT.

RHETORICAL QUESTION. Either a word- or sentence-question asked for effect rather than information, one to which the speaker knows the answer in advance and either does not wait for it or answers the question himself: "ti oun aition einai hypolambano; ego hymin ero" (What then do I regard as the explanation? I will tell you—Plato, Apology 40b). The device, much more favored in Gr. than in Eng., is found rarely in Lysias, quite frequently in Plato and Isaeus, in a highly developed state in Demosthenes. Used frequently in persuasive discourse, r.q. commands attention from the audience, serves to express various shades of emotion, and sometimes acts as a transitional device to lead from one subject to another. The most famous Eng. example is probably the question at the end of Shelley's Ode to the West Wind: "O, Wind, / If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?"

R.O.E.

RHÉTORIQUEURS, grands rhétoriciens. Fr. poets of the late 15th and early 16th c., particularly active at the court of Burgundy and, later, at the Parisian court. Their work is characterized by extensive allegory, obscure diction, and intricately experimental meters and stanza forms, and in their technical innovations they performed an important, if usually unacknowledged, service for later Fr. poets. Despite their courtly activity, the r. were generally bourgeois in their antecedents and, in this respect as in their formalism, they are analogous to the German Meistersinger and the Dutch rederijkers (qq.v.). Their formalism, related to the late medieval confusion of rhetoric and poetics, makes the name by which they are known at least partially appropriate to their work, but it ought to be recognized that they and their contemporaries did not, in all probability, call themselves rhétoriciens. It is a literary-historical designation dating from a much later period.

The first of the r. was Alain Chartier (fl. 1430), and other members of the tradition include Jean Lemaire de Belges, Meschinot, Molinet, Crétin, and Jean Marot (father of the more famous Clément Marot). The poetry of the r. was criticized harshly in the later 16th c. by the School of Lyons and by the Pléiade (q.v.), but modern opinion recognizes to an ever greater degree the value of their contributions not only to the technique of Fr. poetry but also to the development of satire and, in general, to a dissemination of humanist ideals which prefigures the high Renaissance.—H. Guy, "L'École des r.," Hist. de la poésie française au 16^e s., I (1910); W. L. Wiley, "Who Named Them R.?" Medieval Studies in Honor of Jeremiah Denis Matthias Ford, ed. U. T. Holmes, Jr. and A. J. Denomy (1948); A. M. Schmidt, "La Littérature humaniste à l'époque de la renaissance," Hist. des littératures, ed. R. Queneau (1958).

F.J.W.; A.P.

RHOPALIC VERSE (from Gr. "club-like," "thicker toward the end"). Wedge verse in which each word is a syllable longer than the one before it, as Iliad 3.182: "o makar Atreide, moiregenes, olbiodaimon," which begins with a monosyllable and closes with a word of 6 syllables.—Koster.

K.M.A.

RHUPYNT. See AWDL.

RHYME. NATURE AND FUNCTION. The spelling "rhyme" became common in the 17th c. and is now more usual than the older "rime." The main meaning of the word is: a metrical rhetorical device based on the sound-identities of words. The minor meanings can be summarily disposed of before the main one is elaborated: (1) a poem in rhymed verse (cf. Mrs. Browning's Rhyme of the Duchess May which has a "Pro-rhyme" before and an "Epi-rhyme" after); (2) rhymed verse in general (e.g., "Pope's Homer is in rhyme" (3) any kind of echoing between words besides the one specified by the main meaning above (e.g., assonance, consonance, alliteration, etc.); (4) unison or accord (e.g., J. R. Lowell, Among My Books: "of which he was unaware as the blue river is of its rhyme with the blue sky"); (5) a word that echoes another (e.g., "'Love' is a hackneyed rhyme for 'dove'") or the sound common to two or more words (e.g., "The meanings of the words are just as important as their rhymes"); (6) a complement to "reason" (in such phrases as: "without rhyme or reason").

As a metrical-rhetorical device in Eng., r.

involves two or more r-fellows. These may be: whole words (dawn-fawn); ends of words (ap/plaud-de/fraud); groups of whole words (stayed with us-played with us); or ends of words followed by one or more whole words (be/seech him-im/peach him). R-fellows of one sort may of course rhyme with fellows of another sort (poet-know it). If a r-fellow is phonetically analyzed, it will be found to have at least a stem, which must be vocalic (awe, eye, owe). It may have an initial, which if it is present must be consonantal (saw, spy, low); and it may have a terminal, consonantal (all, eyes, own) or vocalic (ayah) or both (awful, eyot, owning). Both initial and terminal may be present as well as stem (lawfully, spying, known). The stem carries the last metrical stress of the line, or possibly the second last make of it-take of it.

The sound-identity for a perfect rhyme must begin in each r-fellow with the stem and continue through the terminal if there is one. At least one of a pair of r-fellows, two of a trio, and so on must have initials, no two initials being the same (ill-fill-mill; but not ill-till-un/till). When the r-fellows are monosyllabic, the r. is male, masculine, or single (pala/din-harle/quin). In Eng. such rhymes far outnumber those involving more than one syllable. Rhymes are said to be female, feminine, or double when the r-fellows are disyllabic (master-di/saster). Trisyllabic r-fellows produce treble, triple, or sdrucchiolo rhymes (Thackeray-quackery). R-fellows with still more syllables are so rare in Eng. that no special names are in use for the resulting rhymes. No doubt rhymes of sorts can be concocted from nonce words, as in Lewis Carroll's Jabberwock. But notionally at least r. comes only from sound-identities between real words, given their accepted pronunciation, accentuation, articulation, and usage. R. which conforms to all the requirements is said to be complete, full, perfect, true, or whole. Departures from the norm are licenses, which may or may not be tolerable according to circumstances.

The origin of r. should not be sought locally or linguistically. R. is to be traced rather to the fact that the number of sounds available for any language is limited and its many words must be combinations and permutations of its few sounds. Every language, therefore, is bound to jingle now and then. It will depend on a variety of factors whether the jingles will come to be used deliberately as a device in poetry and how far that device will be carried. Systematic rhyming, however, has appeared in such widely separated languages (e.g., Chinese, Sanskrit, Arabic, Norse, Prov., Celtic) that its spontaneous development in more than one of them can be reasonably assumed. In the rest it may have been introduced like any other device from the outside, and any language that had already acquired r., no matter how, may have learned new applications of it from its neighbors. Men must have been pleased by verbal jingles long before they realized that the jingles had a use in organizing or pointing their verses. R. is indeed only one instance of that animating principle of all the arts: the desire for similarity in dissimilarity and dissimilarity in similarity. Other results within the literary art are: alliteration, anaphora, antithesis and balance, assonance, meter and stanzas, parallelism, and refrains. Perhaps because man is a creature with paired limbs and organs, he takes pleasure in repetitions, not merely simple duplications, but approximations, complements, and counterpoints.

The functions of r. are metrical and rhetorical. From the metrical point of view end- or final r. is a device to mark the ends of lines and link them in couplets, stanzas, or verse paragraphs. It has an organizing effect, therefore, in respect of metrical units longer than the foot. It might be regarded as an ornamental stress falling on and confirming the metrical stresses at the ends of the lines. But middle-and-end r. is sometimes used to mark the ends of the two halves of a line. Such rhyming is sporadic in many ballads, as well as elsewhere. When it is systematic, it simply results from two short lines having been put down as one to save space.

R. in verse is not limited to the ends of lines and half-lines. One word may echo another anywhere in its immediate neighborhood and apart from the metrical scheme. The purpose of such inner, internal, or medial rhymes is then more rhetorical than metrical, as where Browning builds up a seriocomic climax with them in:—

How sad and bad and mad it was—

But then, how it was sweet!

or where Swinburne suggests the darting flight of the bird in:—

Sister, my sister, O fleet sweet swallow.

Rhetorical, too, rather than metrical is the practice of Shakespeare and his fellow-dramatists intermingling a good deal of end-r. with their blank verse, generally in couplets, but sometimes in greater complication; they were particularly partial to rhymed couplets for ending a speech or pointing a maxim.

Though r. is primarily a feature of verse, it has been resorted to in prose for occasional effects from the earliest Gr. orators downward. Cicero's discreet use of it was probably what commended it to the mannered stylists of the Renaissance (e.g., Rabelais; Guevara and the gongorists; John Lyly and the euphuists). It can be found in later writers as diverse as Hannah More, Disraeli, and George Meredith, not to mention the practitioners of polyphonic prose (q.v.).

Though end-r. in verse is primarily metrical, it has also a rhetorical side. "Poetry aims . . . at increasing, by metrical devices, the number of best places for the best words in the best order" (Sir Walter Raleigh, Six Essays on Johnson). Of these devices r. is not the least important, and the places which it signalizes are among the very best. It concentrates meaning in "ce mot sorcier, ce mot fée, ce mot magique" (Théodore de Banville, Petit Traité de Poésie Française). There is then little point in having good places for words if advantage is not taken of them; and r. is wasted unless its sound cooperates in some ways with the sense. That being so, the poet who has many insignificant words in rhyming places is losing some of his opportunities.

The beauty of r., for the Eng. reader at least, "is lessened by any likeness the words may have beyond that of sound" (G. M. Hopkins, The Note-books and Papers). Even when rhymes are separately unexceptionable, they may be weakened by repetition or near-repetition at no great interval. Such lapses, besides being unenterprising, are destructive of stanzaic patterns. Then again hackneyed rhymes (breeze-trees) can hardly yield the pleasure of a mild surprise; and inevitable yoke-fellows (anguish-languish, length-strength) still less. It does not follow, however, that bizarre rhymes are per contra good in any context, though they may be appropriate in Hudibras or The Ingoldsby Legends. A last weakness, to mention no more, is to let the r. too obviously dictate the sense. For part of the mastery of r. "consists in never writing it for its own sake, or at least never appearing to do so" (Leigh Hunt, Imagination and Fancy).

Languages differ widely in their rhymability, and different conventions have been established as to the acceptable and the unacceptable. Languages which rhyme easily may right the balance by restrictive rules; and those which rhyme less easily may tolerate near-rhymes, though retaining perfect r. as the ideal. Though Gr. and L. poetry normally did without rhyme, it was a recognized figure (homoeoteleuton [q.v.], similiter desinens). It is rarer in Gr. poetry than in L., though not unknown even in Homer and becoming rather commoner in the Alexandrian poets who delighted in all kinds of verbal correspondences. L. poetry seemed to hanker after r. The earliest remains, which are in accentual verse, frequently jingle. Among modern European languages Sp. and It. run the most readily to r., on account of the relatively small number of ways in which words end. Rhyming is further facilitated in It. by the eliding flexibility of the language. Hence the fluency of the improvisatori who can produce extemporary verses in complicated meters with scarcely any cogitation on any subjects suggested by their auditors. Fr. rhymes almost as readily as Sp. and It. But by authoritarian edict many phonetically perfect rhymes are declined on various grounds. Another restrictive influence was the limitation of poets to an exclusive poetic diction, until Victor Hugo "mit un bonnet rouge au vieux dictionnaire." German is less rhymable than any of the Romance languages, but more so than Eng. It has always been ready to accept into art-poetry some of the freedoms of folk-verse and to make a pronunciation in one dialect justify a r. in another. It has also resorted, more often and more successfully than Sp., It., or Fr., to unrhymed measures.

So has Eng., especially in its blank verse. It also has made a considerable use of stanzas which do not require every line to rhyme (e.g., ballad measure, long measure, etc.). Owing to the large number of ways in which Eng. words can terminate, the average number of words to an ending is under three. The number of words which rhyme with only one other is large (mountain-fountain, babe-astro/labe); and those which cannot be rhymed at all is as large or larger (breadth, circle, desert, monarch, month, virtue, wisdom, etc.). The result is that Eng. is more tolerant than any other European language of rhyming licenses. Though Eng. poets vary greatly in the number and the kinds of easements they discover from rhyming rigor, they all allow themselves more merely approximate rhymes than is generally realized, to say nothing of solecisms in usage for rhyme's sake. Several other points are worth mentioning in this connection: first, the anomalies of Eng. spelling which give a sort of sanction to eye or visual rhymes (cough-plough); secondly, the fact that so many of the most admired poets came early when the language was different from what it became; thirdly, the respect for ancient precedents and the revivalism in practically every period among poets who harked back to their predecessors for models; and finally, the frequent draughts of Eng. art-poetry from folk-poetry, if not indeed the virtual absence of any barrier between them. Moreover it is the way of art to make virtues of necessities; and so the poets have found reasons for rhyming relaxation which originate in the recognition of the beauty of imperfection and the pleasure of novelty and surprise. They are, by virtue of their calling, verbal experimenters who strain at and overleap the restrictions of the purists; and poetry is the growing end of language, in the matter of r. as in other respects. A.M.C.

For bibliog. see HISTORY (below).

HISTORY. Saintsbury, famous British prosodist, once declared that r. in Eng. appeared no one quite knows how, or why, or whence. Indeed, in origins, in diffusion, and in function, r. is the most mysterious of all sound-pattern repetitions. It is not originally native to any European or Indo-European language. Among Oriental languages, it appears early in South-Semitic and Chinese, whence from either or both it may later have been adapted to the Sanskrit Indian languages and to Iranian. Fragments of Old Latin poems by Ennius certainly show structural r. as a factor in verse side by side with accent and alliteration, but here one suspects acculturation from a language originally from the northern Near East-Etruscan. Not only are the origins of r. mysterious; it is mysteriously complex in its literary suggestions. Obviously, in the ages before silent reading (see Augustine, Confessions 3) it was a useful mnemonic device. In addition, it contributes to verse a euphonic factor, a phrase and line segmentalizing factor, a pointing (deictic) semantic factor, and—particularly in modern verse—a factor that underlines irony, litotes, and the unexpected collocations of dissimilars we expect to find in the poetry of dissociation. To trace the history of r. in Western Atlantic literatures is a excursion into the unknown, particularly since early writers integrate it with assonance, consonance, alliteration, and the like under one head. In native North America, it occurs only in one Indian language, where it is probably borrowed from Eng. Most cultures' verse lacks r. either as organizational device or as ornament.

In European literatures, the first mention of anything approaching true r. is in the third book of Aristotle's Rhetoric—that remarkable book, long neglected in favor of the Poetics—which discusses practical rhetorical devices under the twin heads of clarity and propriety. Here we are introduced to the notion of homoeoteleuton at the ends, more rarely at the beginnings, of the members of prose periods, as contributing to sound harmony (paromoeosis). Whether or not Aristotle's account derives from Gorgian rhetoricians, or from lost books by Isocrates, or from Near Eastern sources, we do not certainly know. We do know that the later Alexandrian rhetoricians and critics, like some L. writers after them, understood the use of homoeoteleuton in prose.

Verse r., actually homoeoteleuton rather than full r., first appears in hymns of the African Christian Church attributed to successors of Tertullian (A.D. 160?–220?). In these (as in suscipe: tempore) only the final inflectional syllable actually rhymed. Full r. seems first to appear in hymns associated with the followers of St. Hilarius of Poitiers (d. A.D. 368?), but was not generally adopted until some centuries later. In Byzantium, Romanus the Melode and Synesius were exploiting its possibilities in hymnology by the 6th c. A.D. The combined evidence of Aristotelian and Alexandrian homoeoteleuton, the African Tertullian hymns, Hilarian full r., and Byzantinian full r. all points to a South-Semitic, possibly Arabian, source as the diffusion center for r. in the European literatures.

In Western Europe, full r., usually combining end-r. with in-r., seems first to have appeared in Ireland under the influence of early rhymed hymns and among poets writing both in Ir. and in L. Here, the controlling linguistic factor was the early disappearance of Ir. suffixal elements, the development of initial inflection, and the consequent development of end-stress in the word. In Welsh, which was and is a fore-stressed language, r. has always been secondary to alliteration. Very intricate combinations of end-r. with in-r. occur in Ir. as early as the Lorica of St. Patrick (attributed to A.D. 433), and wherever Ir. monks traveled on the Continent of Europe, they seem to have proselytized the use of full r. as ardently as they proselytized their Faith. They are probably responsible ultimately for the intricate rhyming patterns of the goliardic Carmina Burana, and eventually, for those of the 9th-c. Ambrosian hymns. From both sources, r. diffused to the Scandinavian countries, where from Bragi onward it alternated with carefully contrived end consonances (*skothending*s) in skaldic verse. In ON skaldic verse, as in Ir. hymns and L-Ir. goliardic poems, full r. is used as a line-end marker to segmentalize such lovely stanzaic forms as those of the Pervigilium Veneris or the Provençal-Minnesänger stanza form abc/abc/dddd and its variants, first found in the Carmina Burana.

The introduction of end-r. into West Germanic verse is rather curious. In Old High German, the Muspilli shows a degeneration of the original alliterative technique to a point where it is rhythmically unintelligible. Otfried, or someone like Otfried, simply had to introduce end r. as a structural factor marking line-endings and inducing a new accentual verse structure. That Otfried had uneven success with his new technique merely reveals the relative unfamiliarity of end-r. in the German literature of his day. In OE, ornamental in-r. coupled with end-r. is much more common than one usually supposes. Friedrich Kluge found 28 examples in the Beowulf alone. Recent phonemicizations of OE, which construe ea, eo, and io as mere positional (nondistinctive) variants of ae, e, and i, add greatly to the frequency of actual full rhymes found in Beowulf, the so-called Elegiac poems, the Cynewulfian poems, Judith, and so forth. Here we may be concerned with direct or indirect influence from Ir. Yet, although OE full rhymes are ornamental—subsidiary to the primary structural device of alliteration—the Rhyming Poem and the Death of Alfred in the OE Chronicle (both 10th c.) are so similar to the ON runhent (like Egill's Höfuðlausn, composed at York) that we may suspect a well-developed OE tradition of structural full r. of which these two are the only surviving exemplars. Quite probably it originated in the Scandinavian colonies of Eastern and Northern England. The later evolution of the ME unrhymed alliterative romance in the Central and North West Midlands as compared with that of the rhymed metrical romance (quite similar to the later ON rimur) in the North East Midlands and East Anglia adds substance to this hypothesis. Further evidence may be derived from the emergence of such long rhymed poems as Genesis and Exodus and Cursor Mundi around A.D. 1300, the one from the Central East Midlands, the other from the Northern area.

In ME, the first influx of rhymed verse occurs in the late 12th c. with the Owl and the Nightingale and in the 13th c. with Layamon's Brut and the lyrics preserved in MS Harley 2254. The first is in form and subject matter a Prov. tenson and may owe its rhymes, as it owes its adapted theme, to direct Prov. influence. The second is curious: it blends the OE alliterative line with full rhymes, assonances, homoeoteleutons, and nunanations, and may very well owe a direct debt to contemporary Welsh verse. The lyrics raise a vexed question: is their use of stanzaic r. to be attributed directly to Prov.-Fr. influence, or to goliardic lyric, or to Saracen influence working through Prov., or to a combination of these possibilities? The earliest troubadour lyrics themselves undoubtedly derive from the goliardic L. verse of the wandering scholars, although later enriched by the intricate erotic rhymed verse of the Arabic Moors. In all probability, particularly when we consider the macaronic verse of the early ME manuscripts, we are to assume a combination of these influences. If Alisoun plainly recalls the Prov. influence, Lenten is come with Love to Toune recalls, and surpasses, the best of the goliardic lyrics. With Robert of Brunne and the Chaucerians, as with Chaucer himself, the primary influence is undoubted. It is Fr., and Northern Fr. at that. Yet to understand the intrusion of r. into ME verse, certain linguistic facts must also be taken into account. The breakdown of the OE inflectional system enormously multiplied the number of easily rhymed monosyllabic words; the widespread borrowing of Fr. disyllabic and polysyllabic words stressed on the last or next to the last syllable created words easily accessible to end-r. These factors, working in combination, created a verse milieu favorable to r. and relatively unfavorable to alliteration.

The later history of r. in Eng. calls for some preliminary observations. First, languages in which full r. or homoeoteleuton are automatic concomitants of inflection never use r. as a structural factor in verse. Examples are Japanese and certain Bantu languages. Second, end-stress rather than fore-stress facilitates the use of r. A typical example would be that of Italian. Third, when, in any language, rhyming is relatively easy, the poet tends to complicate it by employing rime riche (as in Fr.), or highly complex rhymed stanza forms (as in Prov. and Fr.), or by eschewing r. completely (as in the blank verse allegedly invented by Trissino for drama). Eng., greatly influenced in rhyming habit by Continental sources, shows or has shown all three tendencies. Rime riche occurs in Chaucer; although the ballade, rondeau, rondel, and triolet have never had the popularity of the sonnet, they have been frequently written and are still being written; blank verse achieved almost immediate popularity in drama; and unrhymed quantitative verse, first introduced by Thomas Watson (between 1530 and 1540), Richard Stanyhurst (1582), William Webbe (1586), and Thomas Campion (1602) was revived even in the 19th c. by Arthur Hugh Clough and the Reverend Rackham—this despite Daniel's brilliant Defence of Rhyme (1603). R., in fact, walks a tightrope between ease and difficulty: too easy rhyming or too difficult rhyming produce the same result—the poetic disuse of r.

On these lines, four periods of Eng. rhyming can be distinguished: (1) in the fore-stressed OE, r. was difficult; hence the persistence of structural alliteration; (2) in ME, r. became easier; hence its eventual victory over alliteration; (3) in Early Modern Eng. (roughly 1500–1750) the results of the Great Sound Shift made r. very easy; hence the popularity of such forms as the sonnet on the one hand and blank verse on the other; (4) in the Late Modern Eng. period (roughly from 1830), because of the victorious emergence of the former bourgeois pronunciation as a Received Standard, r. has again become difficult; hence the increasing use of eye-rhymes (based ultimately on the true rhymes of Pope) in the 19th c., and, more lately, the increasing popularity of end-consonance, slant rhymes, assonances, Donnesque rhymes, and, ultimately, through the influence of the Fr. symbolists and Whitman, of "free" (viz. syntactic) verse.

H.W.

A. Ehrenfeld, Studien zur Theorie des Reims

RHYME-COUNTERPOINT

(2 v., 1897-1904); G. Mari, Riassunto e Dizionario di Ritmica Italiana (1901); Kastner; Saintsbury, Prosody; A. Gabrielson, R. as a Criterion of the Pronunciation of Spenser, Pope, Byron, and Swinburne (1909); Schipper; F. Zschech, Die Kritik des Reims in England (1917); O. Brik, "Zvukovie povtory," Poetika (1919); T. S. Osmond, Eng. Metrists (1921); H. C. Wyld, Studies in Eng. Rhymes from Surrey to Pope (1923); V. Zhirmunsky, Rifma, ee istoriia i teoriia (1923); Norden; A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgeschichte (3 v., 1925-29); G. Young, An Eng. Prosody on Inductive Lines (1928); H. Lanz, The Physical Basis of R. (1931); A. M. Clark, Studies in Lit. Modes (1945); F. J. E. Raby, Hist. of Christian L. Poetry (2d ed. 1953) and Secular L. Poetry (2d ed. 2 v., 1957); J. Carney, Studies in Ir. Lit. and Hist. (1955); Parry; W. P. Lehmann, The Development of Germanic Verse (1956); Navarro; J. W. Draper, "The Origin of R.," RLC, 31 (1957). See also SOUND IN POETRY. A.M.C.; H.W.

RHYME-COUNTERPOINT. A term which designates that type of versification in which line length is systematically opposed to rhyme scheme, rhymed lines being of unequal length, unrhymed lines being of equal length. (See A. M. Hayes, "Counterpoint in Herbert," SP, 35 [1938]). Thus, the term "rhyme-harmony" describes such traditional stanzaic forms as ballad meter and limerick (qq.v.), whereas "r.-c." describes the unusual stanzaic forms employed by Donne, Vaughan, and, especially, Herbert.

Hayes sees the chief function of r.-c. as being to compel the reader's attention through the shock of unfulfilled expectation. One might add that this metrical tendency is also a kind of prosodic equivalent of other features of metaphysical poetry (q.v.), e.g. its nervous diction and surprising imagery.

O cheer and tune my heartless breast;
Defer no time,
That so Thy favors granting my request,
They and my mind may chime
And mend my rhyme.

The example above (Herbert, Denial) is composed basically in r.-c., but the last line is in rhyme-harmony with the second line, thereby supporting the content of the stanza. F.J.W.

RHYME ROYAL. Sometimes called the Chaucerian (and Troilus) stanza. A stanza of 7 lines of iambic pentameter, rhyming ababbcc. In the hands of Chaucer, who used the form in Troilus and Criseyde, The Parlement of Fowles, and several of the Canterbury Tales, r.r. was an instrument of extraordinary flexibility and power. Ample enough for narrative purposes, the stanza is also suited to description, digression, and comment, and its rhyme scheme is remarkably subtle in its potentialities. The superb hymn which opens The Prioress's Tale, the leisurely narrative of The Clerk's Tale, and the incisive psychological insights of Troilus and Criseyde, all indicate the wide scope of Chaucer's use of the form.

R.r. dominated Eng. poetry in the century after Chaucer's death; it is said to have received its name during this period from its use by King James I of Scotland in The Kingis Quair, although some prosodists, e.g., E. Guest (History of Eng. Rhythms, 1882) and Schipper trace the name to the Fr. chant royal. As late as the second half of the 16th c., r.r. was mentioned by Gascoigne and by Puttenham as the chief Eng. stanza for serious verse, and in this period it was distinguished by being used in Spenser's Fowre Hymnes and Shakespeare's Rape of Lucrece. Some time before 1619, Michael Drayton revised his r.r. narrative Mortimeriados and recast it in ottava rima as The Baron's Wars. His action symbolized the end of r.r. as a great Eng. measure; its only important subsequent uses were in Morris' Earthly Paradise and Masefield's Dauber, in which, however, its traditional flexibility and strength are apparent.—See also G. H. Cowling, "A Note on Chaucer's Stanza," RES, 2 (1926); Hamer; P. F. Baum, Chaucer's Verse (1961; notes the Fr. [ballade] origin of the stanza).

RHYME SCHEME. The arrangement of rhyming words, usually at the ends of lines, though sometimes internally, which gives the poem its characteristic pattern. R. schemes may be fixed or variable, simple or complex. The sonnet and the Spenserian stanza, for example, have fixed patterns, but stanza forms not traditionally fixed may be shaped to the needs of the individual poem. Among the more useful r. schemes in Eng. verse are those of the couplet, which often suggests the epigrammatic package of meaning as in Pope, and the quatrain, which allows for some flexibility of arrangement (for example, alternating, abab, as in Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard; enclosing, abba, as in Tennyson's In Memoriam; and intermittent, xbyb, as in Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner). Some r. schemes involve the repetition of whole lines, as in the triolet and the villanelle, and others require the repetition of "rhyming" words, as in the sestina. Because rhyming words must carry a semantic as well as a phonetic value, the r. scheme has a great deal to do with the emergence of meaning aesthetically embodied in the stanza or the poem. S.L.M.

RHYTHM. See PROSODY; METER; VERSE AND PROSE.

RHYTHMICAL PAUSE. By some writers apparently equated with the caesura (middle or internal pause), as distinguished from the metrical pause at the end of a line. By others it is distinguished from the sense pause and the metrical pause or the rest (q.v.), and is defined by them as the pause separating each breath group of a sentence.—G. Saintsbury, A Historical Manual of Eng. Prosody (1910); Baum; Deutsch. R.B.F.

RHYTHMICI. See METRICI.

RIDDLE. Essentially a metaphor which draws attention to likenesses between unrelated objects, e.g., Humpty Dumpty. World-wide and one of the oldest forms of literature, riddles are still used by primitive peoples in times of crisis (harvesting, weddings, etc.) with the idea that solving them may, by sympathetic magic, solve the crisis. They may also be a teaching device, and the oldest recorded are Babylonian school texts. Most riddles, especially the older ones, are in verse, partially perhaps for mnemonic purposes but probably principally because of their original use in magic. Customarily a distinction is made between the literary riddle (Kunsträtsel) and the folk riddle (Volksrätsel).

The history of riddles is a long one. The Sanskrit Rig Veda (final version ca. 1000 B.C.) contains riddles. The most famous Arab riddler was Al-Hariri (1054–1122) whose Assemblies was very influential. Hebrew has a long history of riddles, e.g., Samson's exchange with the Philistines at his wedding. The most famous Persian riddles are those in Firdausi's epic the Shah-Nameh (10th c.). Gr. riddles stem from the 14th book of the Gr. Anthology and from Byzantine literature. The literary r. in western Europe begins its tradition with the 100 L. poetic riddles of Symphosius (5th c.), and under his influence the L. verse r. was cultivated from the Berne Riddles (7th c.) and those of Aldhelm (written A.D. 685–705) to the encyclopedic work of Nicolas Reusner, Aenigmatographia (1602). The oldest European vernacular riddles are the poetic riddles of the OE Exeter Book (8th c.), many of which are long, ingenious, and of high poetic merit. The earliest in Germany date from the 13th c., the Warburgkrieg; in Spain, Portugal, and France from the 16th c. In modern times riddles have flourished in France, particularly in the 17th and 18th c. in Germany in the 19th c., and most of all in Italy. In England they have had no vogue.—F. Tupper, The Riddles of the Exeter Book (1910); A. Taylor, The Lit. R. before 1600 (1948); C. F. Potter, "Riddles," Funk & Wagnalls Standard Dict. of Folklore, Mythology and Legend, ed. M. Leach, II (1950). R.P.APR.

RIME. See RHYME.

RIME RICHE. Rhyming pairs pronounced in the same way without having the same meaning; classified as homographs (written and pronounced alike, as stare, the bird, and stare, to gaze curiously) and as homophones (pronounced alike but different in spelling, as stare, stair). Chaucer, observing Fr. practice, has seke-seke (seek, sick), riche-rubriche, ti-raunt-erraunt, and many other such rhymes throughout the Canterbury Tales. Imperfectly naturalized into Eng. verse, r.r. is common and frequent in Fr., éclaire-crêpusculaire; but rhymes on the suffix are considered weak (i.e., too facile) as magnifiques-pacifiques, gladiateur-lecteur. (See discussion of rime très riche, rime suffisante, and rime pauvre under PERFECT RHYME.)—J. Suberville, Hist. et théorie de la versification française (new ed., 1956).

S.L.M.

RÍMUR (plur. of rima). A type of metrical romances peculiar to Iceland, which originated there in the 14th c. and retained their popularity until the 19th c. In subject matter they are most frequently based on heroic tales and chivalric romances. The basic meter is the alliterative 4-line stanza. The rhyme schemes, however, are so numerous that over 2,000 varieties have been recorded, eloquently bespeaking the ingenuity and the metrical skill of the authors. These narrative poems abound in kennings, on the pattern of skaldic poetry, but the poetical phraseology often becomes turgid and obscure. The r. contributed to Icelandic literature a verse form (ferskeytt) corresponding to the modern epigram and flourishing in a highly varied and elaborate form to this day.—Sýnisbók íslenzkra rímna, ed. W. A. Craigie (3 v., 1953; specimens of Icelandic rimur). R.B.

RISING ACTION. See PLOT.

RISING RHYTHM. See ASCENDING RHYTHM.

RISPETTO. An 8-line stanza (octave), rhyming abababcc. It is probably a form of Tuscan popular poetry, although now used throughout Italy. The content is generally amorous, hence the name "respect," honor paid the beloved woman in its hendecasyllabic verses. The form may vary in the last 4 verses (or ripresa) to 2 rhyming couplets of different rhymes. Politian and Lorenzo de' Medici wrote series of rispetti, likewise Lionardo Giustinian. In modern times G. Carducci composed many and G. Pascoli included a number of them in his Myricae. The Fr. respit is more peasantlike in feeling and gives admonitions with whip-lashes. This form is akin to the Sicilian octave or stram- botto.—G. Lega, Rispetti antichi pubblicati da un codice magliabechiano (1905); M. Barbi, Poesia popolare italiana (1939). L.H.G.

RITORNELLO. A group of 2 (sometimes 3) lines repeated like a refrain at the end or sometimes at the beginning of each stanza of a poem. The last 2 lines of the r. form a couplet; the first can combine with them to form a triplet or can rhyme with a line of the preceding stanza. The r. may have begun as a r. intercalare, an exclamation from the congregation in response to the priest who was reading a psalm or sequence. In most instances the r. remained an expression of emotional response to the idea or action treated in the stanza. The fully developed r. probably resulted when the last line of the primitive neolatinic strophe (aaaa) was divided and/or lengthened to form more than one verse. Thus the r. may serve as the refrain of a ballata or even the couplet coda of a sonnet. The fully developed r. strophe seems to have been used first by feminine dancers on May Day, at country fêtes, and on festival days. The term may also designate the stornello (q.v.).—F. Flaminio, Notizia storica dei versi e metri italiani dal medioevo ai tempi nostri (1919). L.H.G.

ROCKING RHYTHM. Term coined by Gerard Manley Hopkins to denote a trisyllabic meter in which a stressed syllable is felt to occur regularly between 2 unstressed (or "slack") ones. In Browning's "Behind shut the postern, the lights sank to rest" (How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix, 5) the phenomenon of rocking rhythm seems apparent in the first half of the line. See FOOT, AMPHIBRACH, RUNNING RHYTHM, SPRUNG RHYTHM. P.F.

ROCOCO. As in art history, r. has come to be used in literary history as a collective term for 18th-c. works of which graceful lightness is an outstanding characteristic. In literature r. (ca. 1720–70) includes the mock-heroic poem (Pope, Zachariä, Voltaire), poésie fugitive and the fable (Gay, Hagedorn, Gellert, Lessing), Horatian and anacreontic verse (E. von Kleist, Gleim, Uz, Götz, Bellamy, Bilderdijk, Bellman), the frivolous or lightly ironic or satirically philosophic tale in verse or prose (Voltaire, Cazotte, Wieland, Casti), the humorous novel (Sterne, Wieland), and satiric and pastoral comedy (Marivaux, Beaumarchais, the early Goethe). Although some r. writing may seem to be deliberately immoral, and some to expound gracefully what purports to be the golden mean (E. von Kleist), homely wisdom (Gellert) or even an enlightened philosophical system (Wieland), common to all is a tacit or explicit repudiation of earnestness as an absolute good. Monotony is avoided by brevity and conscious formal variation (the genre mêlé is cultivated, the length of verse lines is deliberately kept irregular, colloquial tones are imitated), while wit is exploited in connection with serious themes and even at the expense of unity of action or plausibility of characterization. In tone r. writing is often frankly playful; writers cultivate the fiction that they stand in a direct, even personal relationship with their public, at times deliberately interposing themselves between their work and its audience; neo-classical forms remain important for many r. authors but are used as media for expressing the optimistic rationalism and individualism of 18th-c. middle-class intellectuals.—F. Ausfeld, Die deutsche anakreontische Dichtung des 18. Jhs. (1907); E. Ermatinger, Barock und Rokoko in der deutschen Dichtung (1928); P. Trahard, Les Maitres de la sensibilité française au XVIII^e s. (4 v., 1931–33); B. A. Sørensen, "Das deutsche R. und die Verserzählung im 18. Jh.," Euphorion, 48 (1954); E. Merker, "Graziendichtung," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1; W. Widmer, "Die Welt des R.," Imprimatur, 2 (1958–60); W. Sypher, R. to Cubism in Art and Lit. (1960); A. Anger, Literarisches R. (1962) and Deutsche R.-Dichtung (1963). S.A.

ROMANCE. The r.—the Sp. ballad—is the simplest and most widely used set poetic form in Sp. It usually is written in octosyllabic verse in which the even-numbered lines rhyme with the same assonance throughout the poem and the odd-numbered lines are left free. A few romances are in octosyllabic couplets in consonance. The r. doble rhymes all lines in alternating assonance. Other variations of the basic form (even some having a periodic refrain) have at times been popular. The learned and the semilearned—and probably even the illiterate—produce them wherever Sp. is spoken and scholars collect them by the hundreds. They reflect almost every phase of Sp. life. Since many of them are anonymous and have been transmitted largely in oral form, their origin and complete history cannot be traced. The earliest known written romances date from the early 15th c. In the early 16th c. romanceros (collections devoted exclusively to romances) began to appear, the first (1545–1550?) being the famous Cancionero de romances, often called the Cancionero sin año because it bears no date of publication, by Martín Nucio in Antwerp. The most convenient classification of romances—that summarized by S. G. Morley and adapted from those of Duran, Wolf and Hofmann, and Mila y Fontanals—covers the period from the 15th through the 17th c. It corresponds, with the exception of the romances vulgares to three periods of creation, traditional, erudite, artistic: (1) the anonymous romances viejos, primitive or traditional ballads, usually on historical themes and thought to be among the earliest; (2) the 15th- and early 16th-c. romances juglarescos, minstrel ballads, "longer and more personal, but still supported by tradition"; (3) romances eruditos, erudite ballads, written by known authors after 1550 and based on old chronicles; (4) romances artísticos, artistic ballads, usually lyric, on varied themes, and written by known authors from the late 15th c. through the 17th; (5) the crude romances vulgares, blind beggar ballads, from about 1600 on.

The r. heroico, also called r. endecasílabo or r. real, is a r. in Italianate hendecasyllables. A r. in lines of less than 8 syllables is called romancillo (see also ENDECHA). One variation of the r. is the corrido (ballad with guitar accompaniment), especially popular in Mexico. The jácara is a r. in which the activities of ruffians are recounted, usually in a boisterous manner.—E. Mérimée and S. G. Morley, A Hist. of Sp. Lit. (1930); S. G. Morley, "Chronological List of Early Sp. Ballads," HR, 13 (1945); R. Menéndez Pidal, Romancero hispánico (2 v., 1953); Navarro. D.C.C.

ROMANCE, MEDIEVAL. See MEDIEVAL ROMANCE.

ROMANCE PROSODY. EARLY DEVELOPMENTS. Although the Rom. languages are directly derived from L., the evolution of their metrical systems from L. prosody does not show the same continuity. Rom. versification very likely originated from or developed along with that type of late L. poetry which neglects the rules of quantity (whereby 1 long syllable equals 2 short) and seems to be based on the number of syllables, marked accentual endings and rhyme. The origin of this new "rhythmic" verse has been explained in three different ways: (1) the change of L. pronunciation at the end of the Imperial period consisting in the loss of quantitative differences in vowels and in the replacement of pitch accent by stress accent (Fr. theory); (2) the importance of stress for the structure of L. verse at all times (a theory upheld by most Eng. and some German scholars); and (3) the creation by the early Christians of a syllabic verse with, at first, quantitative cadence in imitation of Syrian meters (the theory of Wilhelm Meyer aus Speyer, newly advocated by some scholars).

Recently Michel Burger (Recherches sur la structure et l'origine des vers romans) has offered a more definite explanation of the origin of Rom. verse. He maintains that the transition from L. quantitative meters to accentual verse was a natural and gradual one. At a time when the sense for quantity had vanished, the uneducated when reading classical L. verse disregarded the quantitative metrical scheme and considered only the normal word accent. Thus the Sapphic line Christe servorum, regimen tuorum (— — — — — || — — — — —) was recited

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11.

In composing new verse they kept the structure of their models leaving word accents where they had been in L., free in the interior of the verse line and fixed at the end and, to a certain degree, at the caesura. Due to the fact that the ratio 1 long-2 shorts had been lost, the number of syllables in a line necessarily became fixed while the syllables could be arranged in either ascending or descending rhythm. In this new system the last accented syllable of the verse line (originally coinciding with the thesis) marked the end of the verse the 1 or 2 following syllables being considered as supernumerary. The same happened at the caesura. This is one of the dominant characteristics of all Rom. verse. Burger believes that the important types of Rom. verse were already developed before the scission into the different idioms occurred. These types were later further adapted to each individual language and can still be traced back to their L. (quantitative) models: the decasyllable to the iambic trimeter and the Sapphic, the verso de arte mayor to the lesser asclepediac, the alexandrine to the double iambic dimeter etc.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS. Rom. verse has a definite rhythm indicated by at least one normally accented syllable at the end of the verse or of the hemistich. The odd or even number of syllables preceding this accented syllable produces a rising or falling movement and a division into rhythmical groups. Within the line, metrical beats and word accent do not coincide, and this free distribution of stresses gives to Rom. verse flexibility and variety which are lacking in Germanic verse. Verse based solely on accentuation in the sense of Germanic prosody, where, between fixed beats, unstressed syllables may be accumulated or omitted, would defy the prosodic features of the Rom. languages which distinguish less markedly the force and duration of their syllables.

Syllable count is based on the principles of phonetics and euphony which govern the individual languages. In Prov., It., Sp. and Portuguese the adjustment of the verse line to the required number of syllables is achieved by synaloepha (the blending of two consecutive vowels or diphthongs, one at the end of a word and the other at the beginning of the following word), by elision or by hiatus. Old Prov. had no strict rules about elision and hiatus; Fr. tolerated hiatus in the Middle Ages but ruled it out completely under Malherbe (17th c.);

It., Sp. and Port., while not banning it completely, usually eliminate it by contraction. In Fr., syllable count is complicated owing to the treatment of mute -e. At the end of a verse mute -e is never counted: hence the line with a masculine or oxytonic termination gives its name to the class of verse. Rules set up for the elision of mute e in the body of the verse have not kept pace with the evolution of the Fr. language and are therefore frequently violated by modern poets.

In every Rom. verse there is besides the last tonic syllable which must coincide with the metrical beat, at least 1 additional stress in the interior of the verse line. Archaic meters offer more fixed stresses than modern forms. Thus the Old Fr. octosyllable carried a second stress on the fourth syllable; the decasyllable, likewise, on the fourth, sometimes on the sixth and the dodecasyllable on the sixth. The It. endecasillabo varies its principal stresses which may fall either on the sixth, on the fourth and eighth or on the fourth and ninth syllables. In the Fr. classical alexandrine a stress on the sixth syllable with a following pause is obligatory, while the romantic poets introduced the alexandrin ternaire with accents on the fourth and eighth syllables. The Sp. and Portuguese 14-syllable verse had originally 4 obligatory stresses which were later reduced to only one on the seventh syllable. The verso de arte mayor has a primary and secondary beat in every hemistich. Port. displays more archaic patterns with beats following at regular intervals, usually placed on even syllables.

Long verses are divided by a fixed pause after a stressed tonic syllable. This pause is named after the caesura of classical poetry which, however, was produced by a word ending within a foot. In Rom. versification the caesura may be followed by 1 or more unstressed syllables. In Old Fr. the "epic" caesura was treated in the same way as the verse end; that is, it was preceded by an unclidable feminine syllable not reckoned in the measure. The second variety of feminine caesura found in Old Fr. is known as "lyric"; it is preceded by a stressed atonic syllable counted in the number of syllables composing the line. Usually the caesura is emphasized by the syntactic pattern except in It. where metrical pauses are very slightly perceptible.

As already mentioned, Fr. and Prov. prefer oxytonic verse ends; It., Sp. and Port. paroxytonic; It. admits even propar-oxytonic (sdruciolì). Fr., Prov. and It. show predilection for rhyme while Sp. and Port. have for a long time used assonance besides rhyme. Rhymeless verse is unusual but has been repeatedly tried (versi sciolti, vers blancs, versos sueltos). Rom. assonance consists in the identity of the final tonic vowels of 2 successive lines (Sp. aguiñaldo-honrado); rhyme in the identity of the last tonic vowel and all following sounds (Sp. hermosura-procura). One distinguishes 1-syllable, masculine, and 2-syllable, feminine rhyme; 3-syllable rhyme occurs in It.

Fr. and Prov., with their prevailing oxytonic accents, have resorted to various devices for more elaborate verse endings: rimes riches, lémonines, équivoques, etc., artifices practiced especially at the end of the Middle Ages by the Fr. rhétoriciens (q.v.) and imitated elsewhere. Alternation of masculine and feminine rhyme was devised in France by the Pléiade (q.v.) poets Ronsard and Du Bellay (16th c.) and then codified by Malherbe in the 17th c. Originally, two rhymes were combined (rims caudatz, rimes plates, rime accopiate, versos empareados). Although verse ends coincide with syntactic pauses, enjambement, the overflow of a clause into the next verse line, is permitted throughout in Rom. versification but was avoided in the Alexandrine by the Fr. classicists.

The origin of the various Rom. metrical lines will not be discussed here since this problem has not yet advanced beyond the purely hypothetical stages. Most important among the early Rom. meters is the decasyllable as used in the Fr. epics. Next to it stands the 12-syllable line, also named alexandrine (q.v.) after the Fr. Alexander Romance of Lambert le Tort and Alexandre de Berney in which it was used. In Italy the endecasillabo, which corresponds to the Fr. 10-syllable line, became predominant with Dante in the 13th and 14th c., and was later imported into Spain and Portugal. The octosyllable was popular for a long time in the north and south of France where it furnished the meter for all narrative poetry destined to be read and not recited. Today it is used in lyrical poetry only. The dodecasyllable was reinstated in France by the poets of the Pléiade and subsequently imposed as the Fr. verse par excellence. Ranking as the standard verse for elevated poetry it was imitated outside of France especially in Italy and Spain (verso francés). Spain and Portugal give preference to an 8-syllable line which is used in the romances and in the drama. Since these octosyllables are so arranged that only the even numbered lines assonate and odd lines are left free, some scholars consider them as the two parts of an older 14-syllable meter. The latter may also have been the original pattern for epic poetry which, in the Iberian peninsula, varies its lines from 10 to 18 syllables. Other typically Sp. and Port. verse lines are the verso de arte mayor of 10 to 12 syllables with marked beats, the redondilla de arte mayor (8 syllables) the serranilla verse (7 syllables) and the redondilla de arte menor (5 syllables). Verses of other dimensions have also been practiced in the Rom. territory but do not compare in frequency to those mentioned above.

The most primitive strophic form originated in the division of a long line containing interior rhymes into 2 or 3 short ones, hence the Fr. rimes couées and rimes brisées (aab ccb aab aab), and the cross rhyme (rimes croisées [incatenate, encadenadas]). Rom. strophes are original popular creations. The oldest epics were written in mono-asonanced tirades or laisses, the oldest Saints' lives in mono-rhymed quatrains (Sp. cuaderna vía). Dante's terzinas, subsequently used for longer narrative poems, are a three-lined chain with a 1-line clausula (aba bcb cdc . . . yzyz). Strophic division was further achieved through the use of the refrain (It. ripresa, Sp. cabeza, estribillo, Port. tornel), an echo-like repetition of part of the text and melody. Remnants of original refrains are the Prov. rims estramps, It. chiave, Sp. palabras perdidas, isolated rhymes without correspondence. Later the refrain was extended to two or several lines or repeated in a half strophe at the end of a poem (Fr. envoi, It., Prov. tornada, It. commiato, congedo, ritornello). Strophes of varying length have been used in Rom. poetry, some of which became popular even elsewhere, thus the It. ottava rima.

One of the oldest forms of refrain poetry is the ballad, which probably originated in Provence and in its primitive form was constructed on the theme BBAabBB. In France, it evolved into a 3-strophe poem with a refrain after each strophe and an envoi at the end. The It. ballata differs from the Fr. in that the first strophic part is divided into two sections and that the ripresa, which precedes, is not repeated after each strophe. Of northern Fr. origin is the rondeau which depends on the refrain and on the extent of its repetition. Its basic form, A1 A2 aA aa A1 A2, developed into many different types of rondeaux of which the 16th c. variant of 15 lines is now the only survivor. In Spain, the estribillo has been developed, partly under Arabic influence, into cosante, zéjel, villancico, romance. Unquestionably, the most important of all Rom. poetic forms is the sonnet which can be briefly defined as two quatrains followed by two tercets. It was developed in Italy by the Sicilian school and brought to perfection by Petrarch. Perhaps the most fitting vehicle of poetic thought ever devised, it has remained in constant favor not only in the Rom. but in all literary languages.

At the end of the 19th c. the traditional syllabic verse was discarded by the Fr. symbolists who replaced it with "vers libre" (free verse). It is a verse based on rhythmical groups corresponding to syntactic units and does not observe any fixed rules. This innovation was adopted by some It. and Sp. poets.

E. Stengel, "Romanische Verslehre," in G. Gröber, Grundriss der romanischen Philologie, II (1902), 1-96; still remains fundamental; M. Burger, Recherches sur la structure et l'origine des vers romans (1957). Other works treating problems of Rom. versification include: W. Meyer aus Speyer, Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur mittelalterlichen Rhythmik (3 v., 1905-36); P. A. Becker, Über den Ursprung der romanischen Versmasse (1890); F. d'Ovidio, "Versificazione romanza," in Opere complete, IX (1932); Jeanroy, Origines; P. Henriquez Ureña, La versificación irregular en la poesía castellana (1920); T. Gerold, La musique au moyen âge (1932); Navarro; L. A. Schökel, Estética y estilística del ritmo poético (1959). See also W. Suchier, Französische Verslehre . . . (1963).

T.F.

ROMANCE-SIX. See TAIL-RHYME.

ROMANSH POETRY. Modern Rom. poetry flourishes in the Alpine valleys of southeastern Switzerland (the Grisons), where 45,000 people speak the Rom. language, one of the three branches of Raeto-Romance, an independent language group, sister to other minor Romance languages, such as Prov. and Rumanian. Rom. was first written down when the needs of the religious factions of the Reformation created the two main written forms which have persisted to this day—Ladin in the Protestant Inn-Danube Valley (Engadine) and Surselvan in the Catholic Rhine Valley (Surselva). Because of commercial Swiss-German infiltration into the Grisons in the 18th and 19th c., the Rom.-speaking territory grew smaller and smaller, and there was danger of the extinction of the language. To combat this possibility, Rom. poets and other writers took the lead in a "Raetian Renaissance," beginning about 1886. They formed numerous societies in different regions and founded periodicals for the preservation of the Rom. language and culture. These groups eventually banded together in 1919 to form the Lia Rumantscha which fostered the development of Rom. in the schools, Rom. publications, and linguistic studies to show that Rom. was not an It. dialect (as Mussolini claimed with a view to territorial aggrandizement). The efforts of the "Raetian Renaissance" eventually brought about the recognition of Rom. as the fourth national language of Switzerland by a vote of all the Swiss people in 1938.

Rom. poetry has always been the most important part of Rom. literature. The first written work in Rom. was a poem by Gian de Travers (1483-1563), Chianzun dalla guerra dagl chiasté da Müs (1527) (Song of the War of Müs Castle), a rhymed chronicle of the Grisons' struggle to be free of Austrian domination. Political and historical songs, sometimes satirical, were characteristic of the early poetry. There were sometimes new versions of old Rom. folksongs. But most of these early works are interesting only historically and linguistically because of poor technique and often unpoetic vocabulary, making them of little literary value. Most Rom. writings, prose and poetry, of the 16th, 17th, and 18th c. were religious, since most of the writers were Protestant ministers in the Engadine and Catholic priests or monks in Surselva. There is occasionally real poetry, as in some of the versified paraphrases of the Psalms by Durich Chiampel (1510-82) and others, and in some of the biblical dramas in verse, including several partly original Passion plays. The last Passion play, performed at Sumvitg in 1811 where it had been given for nearly 200 years, is considered by some critics to be truly poetic in parts.

With the sweep of the romantic movement all over Europe at the beginning of the 19th c., Rom. literature in general, and its poetry in particular, began to flourish. Since all Rom. are bilingual from early childhood (Rom. in home and primary school but German in later schooling and business contacts), it is not surprising that the influence of modern German and Swiss-German poets should be greater than that of other nationalities. However, Rom. poets have also translated Eng. (Shakespeare, Burns, Byron and Tennyson, etc.) and Am. (Longfellow, Whitman, etc.) as well as It., Fr. and even Rus. poets. These foreign influences often show in the original creations of Rom. poets who are as diversified as the influences they reflect.

In Rom. poetry all kinds of meters are possible because of the flexibility of the language. Though the early epic and historical poems and religious dramas had very simple forms, mostly long poems of rhymed couplets, modern Rom. poetry consists almost entirely of short lyrics expressed in a wide variety of forms, antique and modern, and using all the technical devices for good poetry, such as varied rhyme schemes, internal rhymes, onomatopoeia and alliteration. As in other Romance languages, Rom. rhymes are not hard to find because of the numerous vowel endings in the language.

Though romanticism at first nourished numerous Rom. love lyrics, now as then, the really dominant theme in Rom. poetry is love of native land, of the Rom. language, the people, their customs and traditions. Many of these patriotic poems have been set to music. The second most important theme in Rom. poetry is nature, which is in ■ way another expression of love of this Alpine region filled with the beauty of bright wildflowers, dazzling snow on the mountains, glaciers in the valleys, and the terror of avalanches, storms, and wild winds. In many of these nature poems there is philosophic symbolism and sometimes deep religious feeling, especially among the Catholic poets in the Surselvan region.

An astounding number of Rom. people, in proportion to the small population, have written poems and published them in the many Rom. periodicals and calendars or in privately printed books and pamphlets. Much of this poetry is without great literary value. However, critics in and out of Switzerland agree that there are a few outstanding poets who have given real vitality and high literary standards to Rom. poetry: da Flugi, Pallioppi, Caderas, and Lansel in the Engadine, and Huonder, Muoth, Tuor, and Fontana in Surselva.

The first of these, Conradin da Flugi (1787-1874) of San Murezzan (St. Moritz), has been considered the father of Rom. lyric poetry. One of his loveliest poems, set to music several times, is an 8-stanza poem, Inviern (Winter) of which the first stanza is typical:

La naivetta, la naivetta
Vain da tschêl a fiöch a fiöch;
Onduland scu las chürrallas,
S'mett'la giò a tòch a tòch.

Little snowflakes, little snowflakes,
Falling, heav'n sent, through the air,
Like the butterflies in summer
Flutt'ring, settle here and there.

Zaccaria Pallioppi (1820-73), Engadine linguist and lexicographer, was a poet of polished technique. He revived antique poetic forms, such as the asclepiadic meter, and introduced forms from the It.: the terza rima of Dante, the Calabrian octave, and the sonnet which was his favorite. His poems are truly classic in their perfection of form and in the intellectual clarity which controls his thought and feeling. Gian Fadri Caderas (1830-91), the most lyric Engadine poet of the 19th c., wrote very unevenly. Some of his prolific output is merely poor verse, but some of his poems are very fine and can rank with the best productions of Rom. poetry.

The foremost Surselvan poet of the mid-19th c. was Anton Huonder (1825-67) whose patriotic poem La Ligia Grischa (The Gray League), written in 1864, was set to music, translated into German and It., and made the anthem of the trilingual Canton of the Grisons. His much-loved lyric Il Pur suveran (The Sovereign Peasant) is one of the most often quoted Rom. poems. The greatest Surselvan poet at the end of the century, and the only epic poet of merit in Rom. literature, was Giachen Caspar

Muoth (1844-1906). Though he is well-known as a humorous poet, a lyric poet, and a short story writer, he is best remembered for his long epics of the thrilling history of that mountain region which he knew so well. His most famous long poem is La dertgira nauscha de Valendau (The Wicked Judgment of Valendau). In addition to his prolific literary work, Muoth did much to stimulate and encourage the "Raetian Renaissance" movement. The best lyric poet in Surselva at the turn of the century was Alfons Tuor (1871-1904). In spite of years of physical suffering, he wrote poems reflecting an optimistic faith in life and his ardent Catholicism. His well-polished poems show him to be a musician who puts his whole soul into his singing. In the 20th c., the outstanding Surselvan poet is Gian Fontana (1897-1935). Writer of scholarly articles and children's stories, he is best known for his lyric poetry which shows mastery of varied forms and poetic understanding of human emotion and of the meanings in nature.

But the most outstanding poet of 20th-c. Rom. poetry is the Engadine poet Peider Lansel (1863-1943) whom many competent critics consider the best poet that either branch of Rom. literature has ever produced. It is felt that Lansel has been to Rom. poetry what Frédéric Mistral (1830-1914) has been to Prov. Lansel's poems combine the polished technique of Pallioppi, the musicality of Caderas, the vitality of Muoth, and the poetic understanding of Fontana. Lansel's Rom. studies and his anthologies of Rom. poetry, as well as his own richly varied poetry have all contributed enormously to the modern movement for the preservation of Rom. culture.

When one considers the size of the Rom.-speaking population (less than 45,000), the fecundity and vitality of modern Rom. poetry is astounding. Though much published is the work of talented amateurs, certain young poets today, appearing in periodicals and in the Lansel anthology of 1950, show real promise. It seems perfectly possible that each generation may find at least one or two Rom. poets of the caliber of those cited here. Thus, contrary to the 19th-c. predictions of doom, Rom. culture will probably not die out but will continue to be creative, largely because of the efforts of its active poets and the influence of their poetry and song. Switzerland itself now encourages the preservation of the four different cultures within her borders which, with mutual respect for one another, in turn give Switzerland strong national unity.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: Bibliografia Retoromontscha 1552-1930, ed. Ligia romontscha (1938); M. E. Maxfield, "Raeto-Romance Bibliog.," UNCSRL, 2 (1941).

ANTHOLOGIES: Raetoromanische Chresto-

mathie, ed. C. Decurtins (13 v., 1896-1919); La musa ladina, ed. P. Lansel (2d ed., 1918; selection of best modern Ladin poets, with introd. and biographies); Engadiner Nelken. Eine Sammlung raeto-romanischer Lyrik, ed. G. Bundi (1920); "Poesias retoromantschas," ed. R. Faesi in his Antologia Helvetica (Leipzig, 1920); Musa romontscha. Musa rumantscha, ed. P. Lansel (1950; Ladin and Surselvan poetry).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: C. Decurtins, "Gesch. der rätoromanischen Lit.," in Gröber's Grundriss der romanischen Philologie, 2d ed., II (1901); T. Gartner, Handbuch der rätoromanischen Sprache und Lit. (1901); P. M. Carnot, Im Lande der Rätoromanen (1934); W. Kirkconnell, "Rhaeto-romanic Tradition," Royal Soc. of Canada. Trans. 31, sec. II (1937); M. E. Maxfield, Studies in Modern Rom. Poetry in the Engadine (1938); R. R. Bezzola, "Rom. Lit.," Cassell's, I; A. Decurtins, La Suisse rhétoromane et la défense de sa latinité (1959).

E.M.M.

ROMANTICISM. The interpretation of this thoroughly controversial term (F. L. Lucas, in The Decline and Fall of the Romantic Ideal, 1948, counted 11,396 definitions of r.) divides critics into roughly three camps, with loyalties overlapping. Two viewpoints derive from sharply bifurcating ideas on the scope and period of r. in literary history: (a) Croce, e.g. (for once in partial agreement with more traditional historians) differentiates between "r.," "later r.," and "decadence," where (b) Praz, M. Paribatra, and Albérés see in r. a complex of literary phenomena associated with a change occurring in European sensibility toward the end of the 18th c., and extending into the present—a concept which underlies our own definition. A third major trend in criticism, springing from Geistesgeschichte, history of ideas, and literary psychology, is exemplified by the attempts of Strich, Cazamian, and Sir Herbert Read to explain r. as one of the poles between which Occidental art in all places and periods oscillates: the pendulum swing between the Schlegels' distinction of "classical" and "romantic" (see CLASSICISM), and Nietzsche's "Apollonian-Dionysian" (q.v.) dichotomy.

Opinions also differ as to the homogeneity of European r. While (e.g.) Wellek argues for its unity, Lovejoy and others stress the diversity of its national manifestations. The truth seems to be that r. (a) does not occur simultaneously in all European literatures, (b) varies in its literary aspects from country to country, and (c), as a word, has not the same meaning everywhere. It started in Germany and England during the 1790's as a new mode of imagination and vision, which spread, with considerable modifications, throughout Europe between 1800 and 1830. Directly or by reaction it affects all modern literature. There are traits common to all of European r. Universally it proposes absolute creative freedom, spontaneity, "sincerity," and a sort of emotional engagement on the part of the poet. Romantic doctrines are generally directed against rationalism, and frequently against genres. To neoclassical dictates of objectivity, imitation, invention, clarity, separation of prose and poetry, the romanticists oppose demands for the free play of imagination and originality, functional rather than decorative imagery, the use of prose rhythms in poetry, and of lyrical prose in novel, essay, and criticism. They defend obscurity as a necessary by-product of myth, symbol, and intuitions of what today would be called the subconscious.

ROMANTICISM

The terrain for romantic poetics was, at least in part, prepared by certain philosophical influences, such as Shaftesbury's concept of genius; discussions of the sublime (Peri Hypsous, Young, Wood, the Wartons, Burke); pietist and theosophical undercurrents of the Enlightenment (e.g., Hamann, Moritz); Herder's irrationalist search for a common bond of humanity, his organic concept of history and the universe, with its far-reaching consequences for all branches of criticism.

Foremost among the literary sources of the romantic sensibility were Young's Conjectures on Original Composition; views on the theatre voiced by La Chaussée, Diderot, and Mercier; the purported imitation of "ancient folk-poetry" by Percy, Bürger, Macpherson—"Ossian," Herder, the Hainbund; primitivism and exoticism (q.v.) as literary themes in Rousseau, Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, etc.; graveyard and nature poetry (Young, Blair, Cowper, Gray, Thomson, Gessner); sentimental, ironical, and gothic novels (Richardson, Sterne, Walpole, Radcliffe); nostalgic evocations of ruins (Volney); the topic of revolt against fate and the gods (Goethe's Prometheus); open and concealed eroticism (Crébillon fils, Rousseau, Restif de la Bretonne, Sade, Laclos, Nerciat, etc.). Rousseau's Nouvelle Héloïse (1761) already contains all the essential ingredients of European r.

FIRST PERIOD: 1798–1805. A first wave of romantic poetry and criticism, passing lightly over England, swept Germany between 1798 and 1805. In France r. was delayed for two decades by the neoclassical trends of Revolution and Empire. Despite the themes of memory, ennui, exoticism, and nostalgia (still clothed in a time-honoured "noble" style) which permeate Atala (1801) and René (1802), Chateaubriand's (1768–1848) lyrical and picturesque prose is still as decidedly neoclassical as the echo it finds in Lamartine's Méditations poétiques (1820), with alexandrines as conventional as any of Parny's. In England the way was cleared for romantic poetry by two outsiders, the Scottish regionalist poet Robert Burns (1759–96), and William Blake (1757–1827) whose hermetic poems found their public posthumously. The first flare-up of Eng. r. marks an attempt at poetic reform and is encompassed by the three editions of Lyrical Ballads (1798, 1800, 1802). William Wordsworth (1770–1850) in his preface to the 2d edition defines his own poems as arising from private rather than general associations, and poetry as "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings," recollected in tranquillity, and presented in a language at once metric, musical, and close to everyday usage. S. T. Coleridge (1772–1834), defending in retrospect these early poems (which had appeared "obscure" to the readers) intimates (Biographia Literaria, 1817) that Wordsworth's contributions aimed at supernaturalizing the natural, and his own at naturalizing the supernatural.

Only in Germany there emerged about 1798 a fully grown romantic revolt with its own aesthetics, philosophy, and poetics, which placed sensibility and flashes of orphic insight above rational experience. H. W. Wackenroder (1773–98) animates his sentimental anecdotes about Dürer, Raphael, Leonardo, Michelangelo, etc., with the spirit of a childlike devotion. His romantic criticism substitutes emotional effusions on religious art and the Christian Middle Ages for neoclassical analysis of form, composition, and structure (Herzensergussungen eines kunstliebenden Klosterbruders, 1797, with a preface by Tieck, some of whose most important work deals with Christian legends). The medieval unity of Christendom is exalted by Novalis in Die Christenheit oder Europa, published as late as 1826 but in manuscript form known to the Schlegels and their circle since 1799. Awakening new interest in medieval Christianity, these works early planted the seeds for Z. Werner's, Friedrich and Dorothea Schlegel's conversions to Catholicism between 1808 and 1810. In Athenaeum, a literary review published by A. W. Schlegel (1767–1845) and his brother Friedrich (1772–1829), German romantic criticism formulated new concepts of myth, symbol, irony, wit, and imagination; it formulated demands for collective endeavours and a fusion of the rational and irrational powers of the human mind in a total artistic creation (Symposie, Symphilosophie). It derived from the metaphysics of J. G. Fichte (1762–1814), his disciple F. W. J. Schelling (1775–1854) and Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834), whose systems continued Kant's transcendentalism. To Novalis, Tieck, the Schlegels, and E. T. A. Hoffmann, Fichte's principle of the individual's boundless creative freedom as the highest realization of the spirit justifies the unrestrained activity of imagination (q.v.) and its rational complement, wit. K. W. F. Solger (1780–1819) analyzes in depth the dialectical playfulness of imagination and wit which results in romantic irony, i.e., the poet's ever-attentive consciousness that mirrors the antinomy of mind in its unfettered freedom and the material boundaries of literary form. It is knowledge about this irremediable conflict, opposing an infinite vision to the limitations of finite poetic form, that leads the artist to mock his public and his art, and to shatter the literary illusion by thrusting himself into his work, often under the mask of grotesque self-mockery. Hence the predominance of paradox, aphorisms, and the "fragment" whose sudden illuminations are preferred to systematically expressed thought, since they appear to be more spontaneous, more truthful, and more sincere.

While Friedrich Schlegel, the foremost theoretician of the movement, admired the balance of nature and spirit in classical Gr. art, he was aware that this perfection—the result of an harmonious reconciliation of opposites—cannot be achieved by the modern artist, whose work is marked by the unbridgeable split which not only the development of Reason but also Christian doctrine, brought about between the finite world of nature and the infinite surge of the spirit. Where classical literature aims at the perfection of being, the romanticist, torn between the ideal and physical reality, expresses in his work the dialectics of becoming, a flux which corresponds to his inner conflict. In an almost existential sense he engages the free subjectivity of his mind, transforming the stuff of reality into poetry, i.e., into a function of his soul and mind as fragments of the infinite. Imagination moved by nostalgia for the infinite is that creative power which can metamorphose reality into spiritual experience. The aim of romantic creation is a sort of mystic union of the mind with a transcendental reality; its perfect literary vehicle—freed from the fetters of genres—the novel (Roman) as a farrago (Mischgedicht), a magic mixture of literary forms, in which poetry, prose, criticism, and philosophy can mingle, transforming reality into dream, dream into reality. On the cosmic level, Schelling's organic view of the physical world (governed as all romantic thought by Platonist and Neoplatonist philosophy) supersedes post-Cartesian mechanistic theories. On this point—despite their open feud on contemporary painting, on Fr. neoclassicism vs. the "r." of Christian authors like Shakespeare, Dante, Cervantes—the opinions of the Romantiker strangely coincide with those of the Klassiker. Novalis, the Schlegels, Tieck, Schelling, and Goethe alike—just as decades later in France Hugo, Nerval, and Baudelaire—seemed convinced of secret and ambiguous correspondences between nature and a cosmic spirit in which latter phenomenon the human mind participates.

The contrast of Klassik and Romantik, real within the framework of the German literary situation, appears artificial from the viewpoint of European r.; all the more so since even the last lines of Goethe's Faust (2d part) are permeated with myth and symbolism of the Schlegel-Novalis variety, and since, paradoxically, Schiller (unromantic to the Germans) is considered in France to be eminently romantic. Likewise Goethe's theory of colors derives from the same organic view of nature which characterizes Schelling's philosophy, just as his concept of art for art's sake approximates Schleiermacher's idea of religion as a mystical transformation of reality into spirit, and a "sense of the infinite." As to Goethe in his last years so to Novalis (F. L. von Hardenberg, 1772–1801), author of the hermetic prose poems Hymns to the Night (1800) and theoretician of a "magic idealism," all finite things are mere symbols, hieroglyphs, whose archetypal meaning can be deciphered by the poet's intuition and the interpretative art of the scientist. Poetry and Naturphilosophie (uniting spirit and nature) are seen as separate keys to the direct knowledge of a deeper reality, where the pulsations of the external universe are analogous to the mysterious impulses of the human spirit. This concept of the poeta-magus as an intuitive interpreter of nature's analogies with the human spirit, developed in Berlin and Jena between 1798 and 1805, emerged more than half a century later in France with the Fleurs du Mal, the Hugo of la Légende des Siècles (1859–83), Rimbaud, Mallarmé, and the Fr. symbolists; it is reflected in E. A. Poe's aesthetics, and since 1817 in Coleridge's Biographia Literaria. Early German r. provides at once a metaphysical and an aesthetic foundation for most European romantic and symbolist schools of poetry.

SECOND PERIOD: AFTER 1806. German r. underwent radical changes during the Napoleonic occupation. At the outset cosmopolitan, urbane, progressive, pantheistic, it now turned to chauvinism and an historical preoccupation with the German Middle Ages. Leading romantics found their way into the Roman Catholic Church. Dissatisfaction with the present had driven the early romanticists toward self-deification and the future. After 1806 the individual submerged in Church and Nation (deified as organic entities), while poetry, philology, and history attempted to transfigure the national past which was explored back to its dim beginnings in prehistory. A predilection for chapbooks, folk songs, and Märchen prompted Joseph Görres (1776–1848) to publish the Deutschen Volksbücher (1807), C. M. Brentano (1778-1842) and A. von Arnim (1781-1832) to collect, and upon occasion to forge, German folk songs (Des Knaben Wunderhorn, 1806-08) and the brothers Jakob Grimm (1785-1863) and Wilhelm Grimm (1786-1859) to write down traditional fairy tales. Simultaneously the Swabian school of poetry (Uhland, Mörike, Schwab, Kerner) drew on folklore for its lyrical production. A century later, the surrealists (q.v.) went back to these same sources of magic inspiration and archetypal myths, which owe much to the romantics' interest in the nocturnal side of nature (magnetism, mesmerism, etc.). Friedrich Schlegel's investigations into the history of myth and religion had led him to a revolutionary concept of the orphic aspects of Hellenism, later to be defined by Nietzsche as the Dionysian element which he opposed to Winckelmann's Apollonian ideal of classical antiquity (see "APOLLONIAN-DIONYSIAN"). Independently, Friedrich Hölderlin's (1770-1843) poetry descended into the depths of orphism. Against the rising tide of German nationalism, Heinrich Heine (1797-1856)—praised by Nietzsche as the greatest German lyricist—launched from his Paris exile the last (and possibly highest) realizations of romantic irony, his mock epics Atta Troll (1843) and Germany, a Wintertale (1844).

While German r., from its very beginnings, was a movement conscious of its aims, the Eng. romantics remained, on the whole, unaware of their romantic trends, and refused to apply the term romantic to their own production. The authors of the Lake school (Coleridge, Wordsworth, and de Quincey) are perhaps the closest approximation to an Eng. school of r. Wordsworth, exalting the "purity" of childhood in Intimations of Immortality (1802-6), in the long autobiographical poems The Prelude (1798-1805) and The Excursion (1814), drew from his pantheism the naive morality that love for nature must needs lead to love for mankind. Together with Coleridge he stressed the superiority of creative imagination over intelligence in its spontaneous intuition of truth (Preface to Poems, 1815). Coleridge, in his poetic period (1795-1802), differed profoundly from Wordsworth, inasmuch as exoticism, magic, dream, imagination prevail in his verse. His Biographia Literaria (1817) and Lectures on Shakespeare (1818), both reflecting the thought of Kant, the Schlegels, and Schiller, were by far the most influential works of literary criticism, together with those of Hazlitt, Arnold, and Ruskin, in 19th-c. England. Lord Byron (1788-1824) regarded himself as a neoclassical poet, continuing the tradition of Pope; to the Germans and the Fr. he became the very personification of r. His poetic travelogue Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812-18), The Giaour (1813), Lara (1814), The Corsair (1814), Mazeppa (1818), Don Juan (1819-24) introduce to literature the semi-autobiographical homme fatal, prototype of the melancholy antihero torn by unbearable guilt feelings, who haunts Fr. romantic literature between 1820 and 1860. Shelley's (1792-1822) Platonism fuses ideals of freedom and world-brotherhood with concepts of love and the perfection of beauty. Pain over the inaccessibility of the world of ideals is tempered by a Pantheism which sees in the fleeting moment revelations of divine beauty and truth. In his Defence of Poetry (1821), Shelley continued Sidney's theories, defining poetry as prophecy and an intuition of ultimate reality. The contribution of Eng. r. to the theatre seems negligible; Byron's Manfred (1817) and Cain (1821), and Shelley's The Cenci (1819) are more pregnant with ideas than excelling in dramatic quality.

Of all British romantics, Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) exerted by far the greatest influence on the development of the European novel (in France on Balzac and V. Hugo; in England on Marryat, Reade, and Thackeray; in Germany on Hauff, Scheffel, Alexis, Fontane). R., undergoing subtle modifications, persisted in England throughout the 19th c. Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806-61) with her Sonnets from the Portuguese continued the Renaissance and romantic tradition of the sonnet; Robert Browning (1812-89) wrote his Faustian poem with Paracelsus (1835) and attained mature symbolism with The Ring and the Book (1868-9). The Pre-Raphaelites, in particular D. G. Rossetti (1828-82), with their adoration of Giotto and the It. Trecento, developed the highly romantic metaphysics of love and death and, in their cultivation of spiritual allegory, started a mystical "art for art's sake" movement, which found its erotic and symbolist counterpart in the lyricism of A. C. Swinburne (1837-1909). Continuing the themes of Byron's poetry, Swinburne's Poems and Ballads (1866, 1878, 1889) bear affinities with the lyricism of Gautier and Baudelaire.

In France—as in Italy, Spain, Portugal, Russia, Poland, the New World, etc.—r. is largely derivative. In 1816 (hardly more than a word in France) it is decried as an unpatriotic attempt to glorify the poetry of the victors of Waterloo, and as a blow struck at the very foundations of national (i.e., neoclassical) taste. At Milan, Stendhal (Henri Beyle, 1783-1842) joined forces in 1816 with the It. liberal romantics Manzoni, Pellico, Visconti, Monti, and Berchet, whose literary aspirations merged with the political aims of the risorgimento. Fr. r. found all its models abroad; across the Channel with "Ossian," Shakespeare (in 1822 still booted in Paris), W. Scott (the "slanderer" of Bonaparte), and Byron; across the Rhine with Schiller (sic), and (to a lesser degree) Jean Paul and Goethe. The vogue of Schiller had been launched from Mme de Staël's headquarters in exile by Barante and Constant. Mme de Staël's De l'Allemagne (1813), creating the fateful mirage of an idyllic Germany (which persisted in England and France until 1870), had awakened an interest in the German romantics. It introduced to France the antinomy "classical-romantic" (see CLASSICISM), gleaned from the Schlegels, which was to split literary and artistic France throughout the Restauration (1815-30) into at least four opposing (yet in their loyalties fluid) factions of royalist classicists, liberal classicists, royalist romanticists, and liberal romanticists.

In the 1820's there developed from these confused beginnings a coherent movement, led since 1827 by Victor Hugo (in 1822 still a royalist classicist; now, as the author of Cromwell, a liberal romantic). R. had matured around three centers: (1) the royalist Muse française (1823-24), edited by Emile Deschamps, conservative and opposed to excesses but exalting Byron, W. Scott, and Shakespeare, and publishing poetry by Hugo, Vigny, and Marceline Desbordes-Valmore; (2) since 1824 the eclectic salon of Ch. Nodier, the librarian of the Arsenal, who (before defecting after 1830) received on Sundays Deschamps, Vigny, Hugo, Dumas, Mérimée, Nerval, Lamartine (when in Paris), Gautier, Balzac, Delacroix, Devéria, David d'Angers; (3) Le Globe (1824-32), a liberal newspaper founded by Paul Dubois, with Stendhal, Mérimée, and Sainte-Beuve (all still unknown) among its contributors, and Rémusat, Viète, and Ampère (whose translation of E. T. A. Hoffmann appeared in 1828) formulating a doctrine of independent taste and freedom from neoclassical rules. Alessandro Manzoni (1785-1873) in his Lettre à M. Chauvet (1823) had postulated the liberation of genius from the fetters of literary conventions, and defined the new movement (somewhat awkwardly) as a classicism broadened by history.

By 1830, most Fr. romanticists were moving away from Byronic frenzy and bizarre ostentation; the necrophily, cult of magic clairvoyance and sadism of A. Rabbe, Pétrus Borel, and Philotée O'Neddy are extravagant but turn into vibrant lyricism when transposed and deepened in Baudelaire's poetry. The dominant figure remains Victor Hugo (1802-85) whose lyricism—traditional in the Odes (1822), picturesque and medieval in the Ballades (1826), exotic with brilliant virtuosity in les Orientales (1829)—became more personal between 1830 and 1840, his odes in a Bonapartist spirit foreshadowing the short epic, cultivated by Vigny and Leconte de Lisle, and flourishing in his own Légende des Siècles (1859-83). Poeta-magus in his late verse (1856-85), Hugo becomes a Neoplatonist visionary whose charity, transcending mere social pity, extends to all creatures. His vast poetic structures—dominated by the idea of the great chain of being—prophecy the final liberation of suffering matter in its irresistible progress from heaviness and obscurity toward spirituality and light. His "Ce que dit la bouche d'ombre" approaches the hermetic rhythms of Nerval, Mallarmé, and Valéry.

Diametrically opposed to Hugo's optimism is the stoic impassivity of Alfred de Vigny (1797-1863). This disenchanted poet turns his creation into the living symbol of an idea; his terse and impersonal poetry, philosophical and often of epic quality, set a pattern later to be continued by Leconte de Lisle and the Parnassiens, whose ascetic cult of "art for art's sake" bears a marked affinity with that of Théophile Gautier (1811-72). The themes and stylistic aspirations of Fr. r. found their fulfillment only in Baudelaire, whose Fleurs du Mal transformed into ferocious and diabolical obsessions the spleen of the dandy and the ennui and remorse which, since Chateaubriand, haunted all Fr. literature. In frenzied and majestic images, Baudelaire's Flowers of Evil expressed the existential anguish of modern Man, while his Spleen de Paris may be considered the first successful attempt to introduce the prose poem into Fr. poetry.

In France, as elsewhere in Europe and the New World of Poe, Melville, and Whitman, r. and its later developments opposed to the neatly rational, universal, and orderly solutions of neoclassicism the untidy and problematic world of Man—as a creator freely probing the irrational and inventing new forms, and as an individual dispossessed of beliefs, traditions, and affiliations, torn by ennui and laden with guilt, a stranger among strangers, and a stranger unto himself. The 20th c., reviving "everything that reinforces our irrationalism" (Malraux), with its poetics ever widening the gap between neoclassical genres and free experimentation in aesthetics, and with its poetry sounding the depth of the subconscious, is producing a literature which, in its ontological quest, is now largely regarded by critics like Albert Béguin, A. Malraux, F. M. Albères, and Marsi Paribatra, as an extension of r., and labeled "neoromantic."

I. Babbitt, Rousseau and R. (1919); P. L. Smith, "Four Words: Romantic, Originality, Creative, Genius," SPE Tract 17 (1924); T. E. Hulme, Speculations (1924); A. O. Lovejoy, "On the Discrimination of Romanticisms," PMLA, 39 (1924); A. Castro, Les grands romantiques espagnols (1924); P. Kluckhohn, Die deutsche Romantik (1924); P. Hazard, "Romantisme italien et r. européen," RLC, 6 (1926);

J. Petersen, Die Wesensbestimmung der deutschen R. (1926); M. Souriau, Histoire du r. en France (3 v., 1927); A. Farinelli, Il Romanticismo nel mondo latino (3 v., 1927); A. Viatte, Les Sources occultes du r. (2 v., 1928); F. Strich, Deutsche Klassik und R. (1928); G. Calgari, Il R. in Germania e in Italia (1929); A. Monglond, Le Prérromantisme français (2 v., 1930); J. v. Frakas, Die ungarische R. (1931); M. Praz, The Romantic Agony (1933; 2d ed., 1951); E. Seillière, Sur la psychologie du r. allemand (1933); Krisenjahre der Frühromantik (letters from and to the Schlegels, 2 v., ed. J. Körner, 1936-37); H. A. Korff, Geist der Goethezeit (5 v., 1940-1957); N. Neusser, "Barock and R.," (Diss. Zurich, 1942); G. Diaz-Plaja, Introducción al estudio del romanticismo español (2d ed., 1942); Ph. van Tieghem, Le R. français (1947); A. Béguin, L'Âme romantique et le rêve (1946); E. A. Peers, A Short Hist. of the Romantic Movement in Spain (1949); R. Wellek, "The Concept of 'R.' in Lit. Hist.," CL, 1 (1949) and A Hist. of Modern Crit., 1750-1950 (v. 2., The Romantic Age, 1955); The Eng. Romantic Poets: A Review of Research, ed. T. M. Raysor (1950); K. Weinberg, Henri Heine, "romantique défrqué," héraut du symbolisme fr. (1954); M. Paribatra, Le R. contemporain . . . 1850-1950 (1954); R.-M. Albérès, Bilan littéraire du XX^e s. (1956); R. H. Fogle, "The Romantic Movement," in Contemp. Lit. Scholarship, ed. L. Leary (1958); E. C. Mason, Deutsche und englische Romantik (1959); Eng. Romantic Poets. Modern Essays in Crit., ed. M. H. Abrams (1960); R. Ayrault, La Genèse du r. allemand (2 v., 1961); R.: Points of View, ed. R. F. Gleckner and G. E. Enscoe (1962); R. Reconsidered: Selected Papers from the Eng. Institute, ed. N. Frye (1963). Consult also bibliog. to MODERN POETICS, 1750-1900. See PREROMANTICISM.

K.W.

ROMANY POETRY. See GYPSY POETRY.

RONDEAU. One of the Fr. fixed forms, comparable in its strictness of construction to the triolet (q.v.). The most common type of r., as practiced by Clément Marot in the early 16th c., consists of 13 lines of 8 or 10 syllables each, divided into stanzas of 5, 3, and 5 lines. The whole is constructed on 2 rhymes only, and the first word, or first few words, of the first line are used as a rentrement (partial repetition), which occurs independently of the rhyme scheme, after the eighth and the thirteenth lines, that is, after the end of the second and third stanzas. If we allow R to stand for the rentrement, the following scheme describes the rondeau: (R) aabba aabR aabbaR. The popularity of the r. diminished toward the first third of the 16th c., and toward the middle of the same century the form disappeared. It was used again at the beginning of the 17th c. by the précieux poets, especially Vincent Voiture. In the latter part of the 17th c. and during the entire 18th it was employed to a lesser extent. The r. had a new vogue among some of the romantics, notably Musset, who took some liberty with the arrangement of the rhymes. Théodore de Banville and Maurice Rollinat used the form subsequently.

Aside from an occasional r. in Eng. as early as the latter 18th c., the form did not flourish in England until near the end of the 19th, at which time it attracted the attention of Swinburne, Dobson, and other poets who experimented with the Fr. forms. In Eng. it has, unlike the triolet, often been used as a vehicle for serious verse. In Germany, where it has also been called the Ringel-Gedicht, Ringel-reim, or Rundreim, the r. was cultivated by Weckherlin, Götz, and Fischart. An accomplished r. demands extraordinary skill in managing a natural return of the rentrement. Often the rentrement embodies a pun or an ambiguity of some sort.—Kastner, H. G. Atkins, A Hist. of German Versification (1923); Paterson; M. François, "La pratique et la théorie du r. et du rondel chez Théodore de Banville," MLN, 52 (1937); states that triolets, rondels, and rondeaux are a single genre with variations).

L.B.P.

RONDEAU REDOUBLÉ. A strict poetic form similar to the older Fr. forms. Hardly used before the 16th c., it is rare even at the time of Clément Marot, who is known to have composed one in 1526 (publ. in 1534). In the 17th c. a few isolated examples occur in the works of Mme Deshoulières and Jean de La Fontaine. In the 19th c. Théodore de Banville used the form. Marot's r.r. may be schematized as follows: ABA'B' babA abaB baba' abaB' babaR (R here signifying a rentrement or partial repetition composed of the first 2 words or the first phrase of the poem's initial line). In addition, each line of stanza 1 is employed in turn as the last line of each of the following 4 stanzas. Stanzas 2, 3, 4, and 5 thus serve as developments of the content of stanza 1, and the final stanza makes a comment or summation. In Eng. light verse the form has been used by such writers as Dorothy Parker and Louis Untermeyer.—M. Grammont, Petit traité de versification française (7th ed., 1930). L.B.P.

RONDEL. A Fr. fixed form, which has had a long and varied history. Its simplest form: AB aA ab AB, reaching back to the 13th c., became known later as the triolet (q.v.). Another early variation was the rondel double, which had the following rhyme scheme: ABBA abBA abba ABBA (the capital letters indicate the repeated lines). In the 15th c. the terms

"rondel" and "rondeau" (q.v.) seem to have been used interchangeably, and one finds the words un rondel, des rondeaux. The rondel best known today is a poem of 3 stanzas and built on 2 rhymes, the scheme being ABba abAB abbaA(B). It is composed of 13 lines in which a 2-line refrain occurs twice in the first 8 lines (lines 1-2 and 7-8) and the first line is repeated as the last line; or it may consist of 14 lines in which case a 2-line refrain appears thrice in the poem. Henley, Gosse, Dobson, R. L. Stevenson, and others have written Eng. rondels.—Kastner; M. Françon, "La pratique et la théorie du rondeau et du rondel chez Théodore de Banville," MLN, 52 (1937). L.B.P.

ROUNDEL. According to the OED, used as a synonym for rondeau and/or rondel by Chaucer (e.g., Knight's Tale 1529) and others. Yet the term now is usually reserved for the variant form introduced by Swinburne and published in his A Century of Roundels (1883). The form consists of 11 lines (3 stanzas), rhyming abaR bab abaR, R standing in this scheme for the refrain (more correctly the rentrement), which is either the first word of the poem or some part of its first line. If the rentrement is more than one word, it usually rhymes with the b-rhyme of the poem. Swinburne's The Roundel is at once a definition and an example of the form. L.B.P.

RUBĀ'Ī (quatrain). See OMAR KHAYYĀM QUATRAIN; PERSIAN POETRY.

RULES. Formulations of poetic "r." have commonly been founded on the assumption that literary composition is partly at least a matter of conscious "art" (technē) for which one may construct a more or less systematic body of principles and precepts (technologos; ars). It is an assumption which, when employed with wisdom and flexibility, has been a basis of much valuable literary theory, criticism, and scholarship. Sometimes, however (as in the 16th and 17th c.), the "art" of poetry has been viewed as a system of highly detailed and inviolable specifications for the subject matter, arrangement, presentation, and style of the various poetic genres; e.g., a play must have five acts; only three actors can be placed on the stage at one time; the established subject matters of the genres cannot be mixed; the pastoral or eclogue must be written in the "simple" style, about shepherds; tragedies must be about kings, princes, and generals; comedies must be about soldiers, servants, farmers, and prostitutes; the "Aristotelian" unities of time and place (limiting the action depicted in a play to no more than two days' duration and usually to a single locale) must be faithfully observed; the time limit of an epic story is one year; etc.

Most 16th- and 17th-c. collections of such r. were in a large degree codifications of artistic practices of classical antiquity, combined with fragmentary citations of various ancient critics; but they were also quite heavily supported by general theorizing about art, nature, the audience, and the poet—from a number of points of view—and particular regulations were frequently defended by different writers on entirely different theoretical grounds. For example, Castelvetro, viewing poetry primarily as designed for the pleasure of a common, ignorant, and unimaginative audience, defends the unity of time on the basis of the impossibility—so he reasons—of making such persons "believe that several days and nights have passed when they know through their senses that only a few hours have passed" (Poetica d'Aristotele [1570]); Minturno, however, viewing poetry both as the product of natural and artistic faculties and as a collection of naturally separate genres all designed for the edification of a more general kind of audience, defends the unity of time as one of the standard "intellectual" requirements of artistic achievement for a "good" (hence socially useful) dramatic poem, and does not argue that it is demanded by laws of credibility (De poeta [1559]). At the same time, a particular rule could be rejected by one critic on grounds very similar to those on which another had defended it; for example, Pierre de Laudun argued, in his Art poétique françois (1597), that strict adherence to the unity of time is unwise, precisely because it tends to force the poet to present impossible and incredible things. (Cf. F. Ogier, Préface au lecteur to Schelandre's Tyr et Sidon [1628].)

Notwithstanding the volume and earnestness of this earlier theorizing, in the 17th c. a gradual general undermining of the so-called neoclassical r. began, influenced partly by trends toward a more independent "philosophical" kind of criticism, and toward a kind of "circumstantial" criticism by which specific r. of the past were rejected as appropriate only to specific past conditions and circumstances of authorship (see R. S. Crane, in urq. 22 [1953], 389-90); and by the middle of the 18th c., especially in England, most of the more notorious r. had been discredited (cf. S. Johnson, Rambler, no. 125 [1751]; Preface to Shakespeare [1765]). The concentration particularly on the r. of the established genres give way first to more flexible definitions of those genres, then to more inclusive lists of legitimate ones (including, e.g., "heroic plays," comedies of manners, and domestic tragedies), and finally to a shift of interest largely away from genres to aspects and qualities of nature and art relevant to poetry in general (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS). With this shift, however, there was not a general denial of the need for artistic r. The tendency was rather to establish new ones, and they were usually based on the ancient principle that achievement of peculiarly poetic qualities is at least partly an "art," not merely a natural process; Wordsworth, for example, in his Preface to the Lyrical Ballads (1800; 1802); while rejecting the "artificial" practices of most 18th-c. poets, announced the presumably innovative r. of "human" subject matter and style by which true poetry could consciously be achieved. Nor was the "neo-classical" principal of guidance by the practices of past masters ever completely abandoned. Rather, rejection of "ancient" examples was commonly accompanied by endorsement of "modern" ones, especially of those who departed from the "neo-classical" r. (see BATTLE OF THE ANCIENTS AND MODERNS). For example, writers as diverse in theory as Lessing, Herder, Voltaire, and Dr. Johnson frequently cited the example of medieval or "folk" poetry, as well as of such non-classical authors as Shakespeare and Milton.

Many of the changes which occur from time to time in "accepted" poetic r. thus seem to result as much from changes of taste and prejudice in poetry itself as from changes in theoretical conceptions of it. Even some recent anti-technical approaches to poetry (from which the concept of artistic intention and r. has been virtually eliminated and the central problem is the accomplished "meaning" of poems) tend to imply the highly restrictive modern rule that "true" or "good" poetry must be made—by conscious intention or not—of paradoxical metaphors like those (say) of the Metaphysical poets of the 17th c. It is not inevitable, however, that the r. of poetic art, whether stated or implied, should be so narrowly conceived and restrictive; much poetic theory and criticism exists, ancient and modern (for example, that of Plato, Aristotle, and Longinus, or of Dr. Johnson, Lessing, and Coleridge), whose principles and methods of reasoning, and the "r." which follow from them, may be positively useful to both the critics and the poets of any age, because they are based intelligently and flexibly on aspects of literary achievement and kinds of general theory which have survived the accidental changes of literary fashion and dogma.—Bray; B. Weinberg, Critical Prefaces of the Fr. Renaissance (1950) and A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the It. Ren. (2 v., 1961); Abrams.

R.M.

RUMANIAN POETRY. Rumania, at the cross-roads between the Orient and the Occident, was bound to undergo numerous cultural influences after the year A.D. 107, when the Roman Emperor Trajan conquered Dacia. This ancient realm comprising the territories of Wallachia, Moldavia, Transylvania, Bukovina, Bessarabia, and a small part of Macedonia, has been populated by a large and homogeneous people, 80 per cent peasantry, whose speech belongs to the great family of Romance languages. The beginnings of its poetry are oral, and the lyrical doina of the villagers expresses grief, exile, loneliness, and death, celebrates wine and carousal, revolts against oppression, contemplates and worships the creation of the Lord, and persistently intones love. Some of the erotic stanzas are ironic or satiric. And they all run the gamut of sentiment. They are sung or recited, and usually begin with the apostrophe "green leaf" followed by the name of an appropriate bough or flower. As the peasant lives in the midst of nature, under the blue or clouded sky, bent over the black earth he cultivates to nourish him, the animals, birds, and plants play an important part in his life. The smallest insect and tiniest blade of grass are known to the rustic poet. Lyricism characterizes even Miorița (The Lambkin), the most quoted poem, which is probably a fragment from a longer epic lost in the distant past. Vasile Alecsandri (1819–90) published it in his collection of ballads (1852–53), gathered from the lips of village minstrels, and "corrected" in order to emphasize their beauty. Lines of 5 syllables (an anapaest preceding an iamb) depict the epoch when vagrant shepherds roamed through pasture fields of aboriginal mountaineers. Its plot is naive, but the verses are concise and heartfelt:

Pe-un picior de plai,
Pe-o gură de rai.

At the foot of a high mountain,
At the entrance to paradise.

And the ancestral song proceeds to tell that there came along the road three flocks of sheep with their shepherds, a Moldavian, a Transylvanian, and a Vrancean of the small land bordering on three Carpathian territories. Two of them plot to slay the Moldavian as he is richer in herds, trained horses, and brave dogs. But Miorița, the little lamb of golden wool, proves its fairly nature. It can talk, and advises its master to change his course toward the dark willow wood where there is grass and shade, and thus outwit the murderers. The fatalist herdsman, however, is resigned to die and asks Lambkin to tell his foes that he wishes to be buried in the nearby fold to be always with his sheep, to hear his dogs bark, and, so that the mourning winds may blow through it plaintively, to have on his grave a "Little pipe of beech."

Even though we find written poetry as early as the 16th c., all texts are influenced by Slavonic, Latin, and modern Gr. cultures, the last becoming dominant. The chronicler Miron Costin (1633-91) gives in his Life of the World a philosophic-theologic poem to show that one can create stihuri (verses) in the vernacular. But lay works are totally absent. The first lyric poet, one of the foremost Wallachian boyars and a high dignitary, tenache Văcărescu (1740-99) shows a genuine love for the lore of his people, but it is more of a presentiment than a realization. When Johan Gottfried von Herder (1774-1803) published his Stimmen der Völker in Liedern (1778-79), the boyar pursued his modern Gr. predilections listening to his gypsy band and exalting the faithful turtle-dove, amid woeful interjections. The Transylvanian Ioan Budai-Deleanu (1770-1830), who, unlike Văcărescu, was a commoner, wrote in 1800 the epic Țiganiada, published posthumously in 1875-77, a satirical comic poem in 12 cantos. Budai-Deleanu read with profit the masterworks of the ancients and moderns, and his work merges the classic and the popular.

The Fr. Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars were decisive in strengthening Fr. influence in the Rum. principalities, its foundation being laid by the Latinist movement originating in Transylvania. Translations of poems are few, but some of the tragedies are in verse. Gradually, the Fr. more than any other of the major European literatures infiltrated Rum. poetry. Mihail Eminescu (1850-89) built a monument of romantic dreams. Blending his Western education with painstaking study of ancient peasant lore and vernacular, he actually molded his masterpieces in the true spirit of the soil, adding the magic of his genius. Disappointed in love, fleeing the commonplace and tedious, sinking into his inborn sadness, he became fascinated by Kant and Schopenhauer. Descending deeper into pessimism, his mind darkened in the prime of life and death followed in an insane asylum. Among his sixty completed poems, in which occidental technique and Rum. folklore fuse with unprecedented craftsmanship, one beholds in Împărat și Proletar the conflict between the emperor and the proletarian in revolutionary France: "The century is ashes—Paris its sepulcher." And in Luceafărul (in iambic feet) Hyperion, the evening star, pleads with God to be made a man for the sake of a beautiful princess:

Often she would gaze at him
With childish ecstasy,
As he rose and shone and led Black ships upon the sea.

When Eminescu's statue was unveiled at Galatz in 1911, Dimitrie Anghel (1872-1914) seized this opportunity to read at the official exercises his Prinosul unui Iconoclast (Offerings of an Iconoclast), a proclamation of independence from the master's sway which grew to the extent of absorbing generations of writers. With Anghel, a new movement of great diversity spread over Rum. poetry, and many young poets were inspired by him. Excessively sensitive, his verse is a garden of discreetly scented gossamer-like flowers. An unhappy love life, complicated by poverty and disillusionment, caused him to commit suicide. Tudor Arghezi (b. 1880) furthers the independent trend. He was too personal, too original, to let himself be carried away by the charm of European poets he read. Thus his motif is of the soil, his idioms taken from life, artistically transposed, and his stark realism verges on surrealism. All forms of contemporary poetry flourish, and we find Tristan Tzara (born in 1896) in Fr. and Rum. anthologies and histories of literature, since one of the originators of dadaism hails from Rumania, as well as Eugen Ionesco (born in 1912), author of The Bald Soprano and other plays.

Of the two extreme views B. Munteanu in his Contemporary Rum. Literature states the traditional idea: "When people speak of Rumania as a Balkan country, they misuse words. It has kept its own peculiar character, bound up with the Carpathians, not the Balkans, with the Danube plains, not the Don steppes." The permanent instinct of being different from his Slav and oriental surroundings "has become in the nineteenth century a conscious and combative act of will. The Rumanian lived through a political and literary pre-renaissance which was accomplished thanks to a passionate attempt to draw near the West." And further: "In place of the metaphysical themes of yesterday, there appear political and economic themes with no spiritual echoes and no perspective. The most important consists in a base flattery, a humiliating idolatry of Soviet Russia and her heroes, the conquest of her genius in all fields. . . ."

The other view, according to official statements, shows that there is one single front with poets like Demostene Botez (b. 1893), Enric Furtună (b. 1881), Panait Cerna (1881-1913) and a number of the younger generation, Nina Cassian being one of the most appreciated due to her liveliness of inspiration and novelty of verse. This front is characterized by its attachment to life, actuality, reality, and the people. Its major preoccupation is with the fond, the idea content in artistic forms. It avoids formalism, hermeticism, and mysticism in favor of clarity and a positive optimism. Much of its poetry is narrative, tending to epic celebration of heroic deeds during the revolutions of liberation and of heroes like those in the great ballads. Reliance on popular forms and rhythms has been at times excessive, but the better poets have outgrown it. The Fr. influence is still strong. Am. (Walt Whitman, Edgar Allan Poe), Eng., German, It., and Sp. models have also had an important influence, especially on the many emigrants living outside of Rumania but writing in their native language. At present Rum. poetry is a vigorous and diversified body of literature outstanding in its love of native land and people.

ANTHOLOGIES: Antologia Poeților de Azi, ed. I. Pillat și Perpessicius (2 v., 1925; collection of modern poetry); Antol. romana, ed. S. Puscariu (Halle, 1938); Antol. Poeziei Romînesti de la începuturi pînă astăzi (1954); Rum. Prose and Verse, ed. E. D. Tappe (1956); Antol. della poesia romana, ed. and tr. M. de Micheli e D. Vranceanu (1961).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: G. Adamescu, Contribuțiune la bibliografia românească (3 v., 1921-28); L. Feraru, The Development of Rum. Poetry (1929), "Rum. Lit.," New Internat. Ency. of Modern European Lit. (1947); O. Densușianu, Literatura romana moderna (2 v., 1929); P. V. Hanes, Hist. de la litt. roumaine (1934); B. Munteanu, Modern Rum. Lit., tr. C. Sprietsma (1939) and "Contemporary Rum. Lit.," BA, 30 (1956); G. Lupi, Storia della lett. romana (1955); G. Nandriș, "Rum. Lit.," Ency. Britannica (1958); Al. Piru, Literatura romînă veche (1961). L.F.

RUNE. A character of the Old Germanic alphabet (or futhark, as it is named from the first letters of its series), probably derived partly from Gr. and partly from L. characters. From about the 4th c. A.D. runes were widely used for inscriptions on weapons, coins, memorial stones, etc., and they occur also in Anglo-Saxon, Icelandic, and Norwegian poems, where the individual letters are to be translated into the body of the verse as common nouns. Certain runes (as for example in Eng. the runewords wyn, thorn, ethel, dæg, and man) were introduced into native scripts with the advent of Christianity, and served thereafter as regular characters, or, more occasionally, as a kind of shorthand. From early times runes were associated with incantation and magical practices (the word itself meant "whisper, mystery, secret counsel"). The surviving Old Germanic poems which use them as special letters are either gnomic-didactic in character or else they dimly recall more superstitious uses, as when the OE poet Cynewulf signs his works with the runes for his name woven into the verses, so that his readers may pray for him.—B. Dickens, Runic and Heroic Poems of the Old Teutonic Peoples (1915); O. von Friesen, "Runenschrift," J. Hoops, Reallexikon der germanischen Altertumskunde, iv (1918-19); H. Arntz, Handbuch der Runenkunde (1935); R. Dérolez, Runica Manuscripta (1954); R. W. V. Elliott, Runes: An Introd. (1959). J.B.B.

RUNNING RHYTHM (common rhythm). Term coined by Gerard Manley Hopkins to denote the standard rhythm of Eng. verse measured by feet of 2 or 3 syllables (with only occasional extra unaccented syllables). The rhythm is said to be rising if the stress occurs at the end of the foot, falling if the stress occurs at the beginning of the foot (see ASCENDING and DESCENDING RHYTHM). If the stress occurs between 2 unstressed (or "slack") syllables (as in the amphibrachic foot), the rhythm, according to Hopkins, is "rocking" (q.v.). Running rhythm, in Hopkins' conception, is opposed to sprung rhythm (q.v.).—"Author's Preface," Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. R. Bridges and W. H. Gardner (3d ed., 1948). P.F.

RUN-ON LINE. See ENJAMBEMENT.

RUSSIAN FORMALISM. A school in Rus. literary scholarship which originated in the second decade of this century and was championed by unorthodox philologists and students of literature such as B. Eichenbaum, R. Jakobson, V. Shklovsky, B. Tomashevsky, Yu. Tynyanov. The main strongholds of the Rus. formalist movement were the Moscow Linguistic Circle, founded in 1915, and the Petrograd "Society for the Study of Poetic Language" (Opoyaz), formed in 1916. The initial statement of the formalist position is found in the symposium Poetics. Studies in the Theory of Poetic Language (1919) and in Modern Rus. Poetry by R. Jakobson.

The formalists viewed literature as a distinct field of human endeavor, as a verbal art rather than a reflection of society or a battleground of ideas. They were more interested in the poetry than in the poet, in the actual works of literature than in their alleged roots or effects. Intent upon delimiting literary scholarship from contiguous disciplines such as psychology, sociology, or intellectual history, the formalist theoreticians focused on "distinguishing features" of literature, on the artistic devices peculiar to imaginative writing. In Jakobson's words, "the subject of literary scholarship is not literature in its totality, but literariness, i.e., that which makes of a given work a work of literature."

According to the formalists, imaginative literature is a unique mode of discourse, characterized by the "emphasis on the medium" (Jakobson) or "perceptibility of the mode of expression." In literary art, especially in poetry, it was argued, language is not simply a vehicle of communication. From a mere proxy for an object, the word becomes here an object in its own right, an autonomous source of pleasure as multiple devices at the poet's disposal—rhythm, meter, euphony, imagery—converge upon the verbal sign in order to dramatize its complex texture.

These methodological assumptions were tested in acute studies of rhythm, style, and narrative structure. Probably, the most fruitful field of formalist endeavor was the theory of versification. To the formalists, verse is not merely a matter of external embellishments, such as meter, rhyme or alliteration, superimposed upon ordinary speech. It is an integrated type of discourse, qualitatively different from prose, with a hierarchy of elements and internal laws of its own—"a speech organized throughout in its phonic texture." The notion of rhythm as a Gestaltqualität, a structural property operative at all levels of poetic language, helped elucidate a crucial problem of poetics—that of relationship between sound and meaning in verse.

The formalist approach to literature was a far cry from that single-minded concern with "social significance" and "message," which dominated so much 19th-c. Rus. literary criticism. Consequently, the formalist research in the masters of Rus. literature resulted in drastic reexaminations. Gogol's famous story, "The Overcoat," hailed by the contemporaries as a moving plea for the "little man," became under the pen of B. Eichenbaum primarily a piece of grotesque stylization. Pushkin, viewed this time at the level of style and genre rather than that of Weltanschauung, appeared as a magnificent culmination of 18th-c. Rus. poetry rather than as the father of Rus. romanticism. And the moral crisis of the young Tolstoy was reinterpreted in largely aesthetic terms as a struggle for a new style, as a challenge to romantic clichés grown stale. In dealing with the current literary production, the formalist critics favored inventiveness, aesthetic sophistication, a search for new modes of expression. In visual arts they encouraged such trends as constructivism or cubism.

At first the formalist spokesmen extravagantly overstated their case. In their early studies Jakobson and Shklovsky played down the links between literature and society and denied the relevance of any "extra-aesthetic" considerations. Eventually, in the face of a concerted attack on the part of the Soviet Marxists, they made an effort to combine aesthetic analysis with a sociological approach to literature. But this attempt at synthesis came too late. In 1929–30 the methodological debate in the Soviet Union was rudely discontinued. With Soviet criticism being whipped into orthodoxy, formalism was suppressed as a heresy. Ever since 1930 "formalism" has been in Soviet parlance a term of censure, connoting undue preoccupation with "mere" form, bourgeois "escapism" and like offenses.

If in Russia the formalist movement was stopped in its tracks, during the thirties its influence was felt in other Slavic countries, especially, in Czechoslovakia and Poland. The theorists of so-called Czech structuralism grouped around the Prague Linguistic Circle, Dimitry Cizevsky, Jan Mukařovský, René Wellek, and last but not least, Roman Jakobson who had lived in Prague since 1920, restated the basic tenets of Rus. formalism in more judicious and rigorous terms.

Viewed in a broader perspective, Rus. formalism appears as one of the most vigorous manifestations of the recent trend toward structural analysis of literature and art, which in the last two decades has made substantial inroads into Eng. and Am. literary study. Formalist doctrine has many points of contact with "new criticisms" (q.v.), especially with its "organicism" variant, as represented by Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren. C. Brooks' emphasis on the organic unity of a poem, with the concomitant warning against the "heresy of paraphrase," his keen awareness of the "ambiguity" of poetic idiom and "the conflict-structures" resulting from this ambiguity, such as irony and paradox—all this is closely akin to their later phase of formalist theorizing. Perhaps one should add that the affinity between these two schools of thought rests on analytical procedures rather than on criteria of evaluation. While the majority of Anglo-Am. New Critics have worked toward some flexible yet absolute standards applicable to literature of various ages, the Rus. formalists frankly espoused critical relativism.

Poetika. Sborniki po teorii poeticheskogo yazyka (1919); R. Jakobson, O cheshskom stikhe (1923); B. Tomashevsky, O stikhe (1929); V. Erlich, Rus. Formalism: History-Doctrine (1955). V.E.

RUSSIAN POETICS. See MODERN POETICS.

RUSSIAN POETRY. Rus. literature, which had its beginnings in the 11th c., was preceded by folk poetry which has always been unusually rich on Russian soil but began to be regularly recorded only in the 19th c. Many folklore genres were not only verbal, but musical as well, and they were sung or chanted by the people or professional performers, sometimes with instrumental accompaniment. There were lyrical and ceremonial songs, divinations, charms, laments. There were religious chants (dukhovnye stikhi) performed by wandering religious mendicants, and "historical songs" telling about great persons or events. Finally, there were byliny (q.v.), epics of legendary content, which are probably the most original and famous genre in Rus. oral poetic tradition. Also, one should add proverbs and riddles with their interesting rhythmic structure and original imagery. Folk poetry often influenced, and occasionally was influenced by, Rus. literary poetry, and it continued to develop. For instance, as late as in the 19th c., a new genre, the now popular chastushka (q.v.) made its appearance.

Among the poetic works of early Rus. literature, which primarily consisted of ecclesiastical works and chronicles, Slovo o pŭlku Igorevŭ (Lay of Igor's Campaign), written in Old Rus. rhythmic prose, stands out as a supreme masterpiece. It tells the story of the unsuccessful campaign of a Rus. prince in the 12th c. against the nomadic tribes, his captivity, and escape. A 16th-c. copy of this 12th-c. poem was found at the end of the 18th c., but later was destroyed in a fire. The work has ties with both its contemporary literary tradition and folklore, and contains pagan elements. It is not an epic narrative, but rather a series of lyrical pictures and patriotic apostrophes. Intensity of lyricism, rich imagery, complex sound patterns, and the variety and subtlety of Slovo's rhythms led some to regard it as a verse composition, and others to question its authenticity. Slovo has become a national classic and has been a source of inspiration for Rus. poets, artists, and composers for more than a century.

Rus. literary verse is a relatively recent development, although it existed in a rudimentary shape, in works written in prose, since the 11th c. Nor should one ignore the Byzantine tradition of Rus. liturgical poetry, written in Old Church Slavonic and having the appearance of free verse with its pronounced line beginnings, syntactical parallelisms, and occasional use of the acrostic form. Formal Rus. verse, however, made its appearance at the beginning of the 17th c. as crude, doggerel-like virshi. In the second half of the 17th c. the earlier form was replaced by isosyllabic virshi which imitated Polish verse and required a constant number of syllables in a line, a fixed caesura, and feminine rhyme. This "syllabic verse" was brought to Russia by the learned Byelorussian monk, Simeon of Polotsk (1629-80), who used it for his long and ornate court panegyrics. The language of syllabic poetry was Old Church Slavonic with admixture of Rus.

The 18th c. was of extreme importance for the development of Rus. poetry. As the result of the reforms of Peter I, a new Russia emerged, and it was eager to adopt European ways and to find expression for individual human feelings. The old syllabic verse, prosaic and amorphous, which was not based on the prosodic structure of the Rus. language, was an inconvenient vehicle for this. The most important poets of the period experimented with new forms of versification, and the 18th c. can rightfully be called the laboratory of modern Rus. poetry. Despite the fact that Rus. 18th-c. poets drew heavily on the ideas and techniques of Fr. neoclassicism, their work is distinctly Rus. The brilliant poet-diplomat Antiokh Kantemir (1708-44) stubbornly continued to use the antiquated syllabic meter (though his vocabulary was almost purely Rus.), but he championed enlightenment and criticized society in his satires which contained elements of realism. Vasily Tredyakovsky (1703-69) was the first to see the inadequacy of syllabic verse, and he looked to the folk song for the basis of the new Rus. verse, which was to be accentual. Tredyakovsky was a paradoxical figure, being both a pioneer in many important poetic fields and also the father of all subsequent archaists in Rus. poetry. An indefatigable translator and scholar, he was historically sensitive, but apt to stop at half-measures. For almost two centuries his poetry was dismissed by many as unreadable trash, but critics now usually admit that it deserves attention and contains interspersed passages of genius. In spite of Tredyakovsky's insights into the nature of Rus. verse, it was given not to him, but to his foe, the "Russian Leonardo," Mikhailo Lomonosov (1711-65), the great scientist, scholar, and poet, to create the first poem in the new meter, based on word-stress and usually referred to as syllabo-tonic. After him, iamb became the most popular Rus. meter and remains so at present. Lomonosov wrote sonorous odes in which he praised the ideal Rus. empire, but probably his best poetry is to be found in his two "razmyshleniya" (meditations) with their grandiose vision of nature, and in his "spiritual odes" in general. Lomonosov put an end to stylistic confusion by offering his "theory of three styles," which allowed the use of rare Church Slavonisms in the "high style" genres (heroic epics, odes), limited their use in the "middle style" (most dramas, satires, lyrical poetry) to those already accepted into Rus. spoken language, and did not permit them in the "low style" works (comedies, songs). In comparison with Lomonosov, his foe, Alexander Sumarokov (1718-77) was a lesser poet, but he emphasized what Lomonosov termed the "middle style," i.e., the language of educated classes, which was to become the main instrument of Rus. poetry for more than a century. Sumarokov also introduced a great variety of genres and meters, but, in spite of his efforts to preach brevity, economy, and precision in expression and to fight against the loud sound and uncontrolled flights of fancy in the odes of his contemporaries, these latter dominated the poetry of the greatest poet of the Rus. 18th c., Gavriilo Derzhavin (1743-1816) who was a giant of poetic imagination. This man, who began his career as a simple soldier and ended as a cabinet minister, was possessed by a passion for justice, and in his magnificent odes, he continued the Lomonosov tradition. But he also daringly mixed diction and genres, combining ode with satire (Felitsa) and Pindaric heights with realistic description. Thus, in an ode to the Empress, he mentions his wife looking for lice in his hair. Derzhavin's odes are an encyclopedia of Rus. life in his time, but they also present examples of profound tragic art, as in his famous monodies Na smert' knyazya Meshcherskogo (On the Death of Prince Meshchersky) and Vodopad (Waterfall), and of astounding spiritual rhetoric (the ode Bog [God]). This barbarian classicist filled his lines with splendid sound and unsurpassed visual richness. He also could speak softly and good-naturedly, and with him the intonation of spoken Rus. appeared in Rus. poetry for the first time, as in his late poem Zhizn' zvanskaya (Life in Zvanka) where he described his day in the country from morning to night and which is a masterpiece of mood and color, anticipating all subsequent attempts to treat poetry in a realistic way. One of Derzhavin's most original achievements was the fact that in his poems a real man, complete with sublime ideas and belching after a good dinner, unashamedly entered Rus. poetry. Rus. poetic fable was developed by several poets during the 18th c., but yielded its finest results when Ivan Krylov (1769-1844) began to write in this genre at the beginning of the 19th c. His fables are not so much satires of the society as the best expression of the common sense of the Rus. people in verse. The racy colloquialisms of his proverb-like lines make one forget the foreign sources of many of his fables completely.

The most prominent figure of the transition from the 18th to the 19th c. is Nikolay Karamzin (1766-1826), who, although a minor poet, affected Rus. poetry greatly with his reform of the literary language, aimed at purging it of archaic Church Slavonisms, at giving it European garb and at making it flexible enough for modern sensibility. Karamzin was a leading figure of Rus. sentimentalism which did not produce great poets, but helped to refine Rus. literary manners and to shift emphasis from universal and state affairs to the themes of individual life. The beginning of the 19th c. was the period of polemics between the circles close to Karamzin (see ARZAMAS) and the literary conservatives who desired to retain archaic diction as the mark of poetry and resisted the excessive Europeanization of the language. The modern party won, but the conservatives, for a variety of reasons, never lacked individual defenders of their cause throughout the subsequent development of Rus. poetry.

The first three decades of the 19th c. are often referred to as the "Golden Age of Rus. Poetry." The tender and self-effacing Vasily Zhukovsky (1783-1852) was the first great name in the long list of Rus. poets of the 19th c., and, quite appropriately, the human soul is in the center of his poetry. Zhukovsky's poems were both sentimentalist and romantic, and his own unhappy love colored them with melancholy and infused them with motives of resignation and yielding to one's destiny. Zhukovsky became very popular through his translations and adaptations (Svetlana) of German romantic ballads, and he is still considered the greatest Rus. translator (Odyssey); but it would be difficult to draw a line between his original and translated works as he often used the latter for his most intimate personal outpourings, frequently improving on the originals. This pious tutor of the future Rus. emperor made of the Rus. language a most refined vehicle. He was the first to be able to express shades and subtle transitions of meaning, and few Rus. poets could equal the beauty of his melody, his rhythmic variety, and the purity of his style. Zhukovsky can be credited with creating for Rus. poetry a new language, the language of the human soul. His contribution was complemented by Constantine Batyushkov (1787-1855), also a member of the "Arzamas," and an officer who participated in campaigns against Napoleon and fell victim to hereditary madness in the middle of his life. If Zhukovsky's was usually the poetry of heaven, Batyushkov remained on the earth, but this earth was an ideal one. His eroticism was purified, and he was tender rather than passionate in his love poetry. In his early idyllic and hedonistic poems, Batyushkov sang of simple love, friendship, and solitude, but melancholy crept in gradually and added tragic shades to his last poems which are full of strange beauty. In general, his neoclassic imagery went hand in hand with a romantic treatment of words. Batyushkov consciously tried to make Rus. flexible, purged of Church Slavonisms and in sound as close as possible to his favorite It., and he often succeeded: in sheer beauty, his best poems were hardly equaled even by greater poets than he was. Such is the case, for instance, with the beginning of his Ten' druga (The Shade of a Friend). Rus. poets of our times discovered Batyushkov after a century of neglect, probably attracted by the inimitable combination of outward harmony and inner discord in his verse.

Both Zhukovsky and Batyushkov prepared the way for Alexander Pushkin (1799-1837), who is not only regarded as the greatest Rus. poet, but probably is one of the four or five greatest poets of postmedieval Europe. He summed up the Rus. 18th c., and his art was essentially classicistic; however, his name was closely connected with the contemporary romanticism and even with the future realism. Contrary to what is often said, he was not the creator of the Rus. literary language, but his verbal perfection, in combination with his stylistic and ideological Proteanism, made several subsequent poetic movements claim him as their predecessor. Pushkin was endowed with the unique ability to assimilate all the valuable things he met on his way and to accept life with all its conflicts, combining them in a higher harmony. Thus, he was the first (and perhaps the last) to combine folklore and the European tradition successfully in Rus. poetry. One critic called him "the poet of the empire and of freedom," and, when applied to Pushkin, this does not sound paradoxical. Pushkin's early poetry, which he wrote at school, was imitative but not immature. He became famous after publishing his poema (Rus. for a longer poem) Ruslan i Lyudmila (Ruslan and Ludmila), a delightful tale of adventure, full of irony and parody, which started a literary controversy. Having been exiled to the south for writing political verse, Pushkin began his romantic period, which has been often termed "Byronic." However, the romanticism of his "southern" narrative poemy is skin-deep. Only in Bakhchisarayskiy fontan (The Fountain of Bakhchisaray), a love story with Oriental background, did he indulge in extreme beauty of sound. In the following Tsygany (The Gypsies) and the later Poltava, the familiar Pushkin objectivity and impersonality can be observed. The former, a story about a flight from civilization and about love and jealousy, not only cuts a Byronic hero down to size, but also is a complex treatise on the nature of freedom, whereas the latter adds a national epic to the romantic love story and marks Pushkin's ever-increasing interest in history.

Still in exile, though moved to his estate in the north, he finally completed his magnum opus, Eugeny Onegin, which was probably his greatest work in verse. It is both a novel in verse and an "encyclopedia of Rus. life," to quote a famous critic. Onegin's simple story, noble ending, and portrayal of the main characters (a "superfluous" man, an ideal Rus. girl) greatly affected Rus. literature. But this is also a lyrical poem with the author as one of the heroes. The lyrical themes accompany the narrative and are often almost indistinguishable from the informal chat with which the poet interrupts the action continually;

they are made by him to appear and disappear with a Mozartian ease and skill of modulation. The entire work gives the appearance of "a work in progress" with its natural and, on the surface, disorganized growth as well as its immediate adaptation of tone and style to the change in theme and action. Many Pushkin admirers consider, however, Medny vsadnik (The Bronze Horseman) his master piece, and this work is as tight and somber as Eugeny Onegin was fluent and light. The action centers here on the famous flood of 1824 in St. Petersburg, but the theme is "state vs. individual," and the poet, with tragic objectivity, recognizes the claims of either party without trying to reconcile or take sides in the conflict. Pushkin's late years were mainly devoted to writing prose, and his lyrical poetry of this period made a further step toward stripping verse of all ornament and toward a nonviolent inclusion of prosaisms in the texture. These lonely years were also characterized by growing inner despair and by the poet's moving politically to the right.

But whether in his earlier romantic elegies or in his later experiments with folklore, the essential qualities of Pushkin's poetry remained the same: individual experience became universalized, and he handled words in the classical way, aiming at simplicity, brevity, and precision of expression. Few poets had such a perfect ear and such ability to stop where necessary.

Imagery was used by him sparingly, and one would in vain look in his lines for "interesting" ideas, since Pushkin was a genius of the obvious and normal. All this makes it difficult to translate him, and in a foreign language Pushkin may sound flat and banal. Some of his most beautiful lines, like

Kak grustno mne tvoyo yavlenye,
Vesna, vesna! pora lyubvi!
Kakoe tomnoe volneniye
V moye dushe, v moye krovi!

How sad looks to me your arrival,
Spring, Spring, the season of love!
What languorous excitement
In my soul, in my blood!

rely entirely on intonation too elusive for an analysis or a reproduction. After an eclipse in reputation which lasted several decades, Pushkin, at the end of the 19th c., became the object of practically unchallenged adoration which continues to grow.

Pushkin was surrounded by a handful of poets, mostly his friends, who are known under the name of the "Pushkin Pleiad," and some of them were first-rate talents, only slightly overshadowed by his genius. Though different in their temperament and subject matter, they all were classicists in more than one respect. Two of them stand out in particular. Evgeny Boratynsky (also spelled Baratynsky) (1800-44) attained popularity as the author of melancholy elegies and Byronic narrative poemy, but even in these he remained essentially a "poet of thought," as he was called. Restraint, logical development, and verbal precision were his typical traits. Toward the end of his days, his philosophical pessimism grew and his poetic meditations became visions of the approaching end of poetry (Posledniy poet [The Last Poet]) and of human life (Poslednyaya smert' [The Last Death], Osen' [Autumn]). Their tragic grandeur was intensified by Boratynsky's use of archaic diction reminiscent of the 18th-c. odes. In many respects his opposite was Nikolay Yazykov (1803-46), whose sensual songs with their abandon and hedonism are unique in their power and the combination of lightness with audacity, and rapid movement with majesty. Yazykov's poetry is highly original, and it abounds in daring imagery. His sonorous alliterations and bold new word coinages produce the effect of an almost physical intoxication. Yazykov was extolled by his Slavophil admirers as a perfect specimen of the truly Rus. "breadth of soul," but his ideological polemics in verse failed to produce anything first-rate. Nevertheless, in his imitations of psalms he again showed verbal magnificence, and in his foreign-diary poems there is charm of everyday detail and of intimate intonation. Other names in the "Pleiad" are the dry and witty Prince P. Vyazemsky, and the indolent Baron A. Delvig who wrote imitations of folk songs, classical idylls, and impersonal sonnets. Both were Pushkin's closest friends. There were also poets who did not belong poetically to the Pleiad and went their own ways as, for instance, the religious poet Fyodor Glinka and the freedom-loving Wilhelm Kuechelbecker, a participant in the Decembrist revolt, who was exiled to Siberia. Decembrist ideas had an important influence on contemporary poets (including Pushkin), and one of the Decembrist leaders, Kondraty Ryleev, hanged for his part in the revolt, was also a poet of note.

Critics and the reading audience recognized Mikhail Lermontov (1814-41) as Pushkin's heir, although his work represents a new departure for Rus. poetry both in mood and in subject matter, particularly in its almost complete severance of ties with the 18th c. This army officer, who lived a short and unhappy life, was Russia's greatest romantic poet, and his Byronism was more than just a fashionable pose. His poetry of great passions and proud loneliness found its best expression in two poemy. Demon, set against a Caucasian background, is the story of the love of a demon, who bears a resemblance to Lucifer, for a mortal beauty. Mtsyri, also a Caucasian poema, is the confession of a dying novice at a monastery, full of unrestrained passion, rhetorical richness, and a powerful desire for freedom. For the first time in Rus. poetry, in Lermontov's works, nature appears as a hero, not merely an aesthetic fact; and the Rousseauist theme of flight from civilization is sounded more distinctly and convincingly than ever before. Lermontov's rebellious spirit cannot be interpreted merely politically, for he was a metaphysical rebel. He was also the best religious poet of Russia, and no other poet left such sincere prayers or expressed better the homesickness of the human soul while bound to this earth. There was also a strong prophetic element in his poetry. On the other hand, realism made its first distinct appearance in Lermontov's poems—in those written from another man's viewpoint (usually a man of humble origin) as well as in those resembling a page from a diary, extremely sincere and full of self-observation and self-criticism. Lermontov not only excelled in oratorical meditation, he also introduced journalism into poetry, and this connects him with such later poets as Nekrasov. But Lermontov also marked the end of the Rus. poetical Golden Age. After him, there began a gradual loss of poetic culture, deterioration of technique and the general decline of attention to poetry. It is customary to mention at the end of the Golden Age the name of the folk poet Alexey Koltsov, who left a few original songs about peasants' life, but actually he was already the beginning of the decline.

There was, however, a poet who began writing at the beginning of the century and lived through the decline, while standing apart from his contemporary literary life. He was Fyodor Tyutchev (1803-73), one of the greatest Rus. lyrical poets, who lived for many years abroad as a diplomat and later was a government official in Russia. As a poet, he was twice "discovered" during his lifetime and once posthumously. Tyutchev was first of all a philosophical poet whose poems were full of profound metaphysical vision and symbols. His pessimistic world outlook was based on the image of primordial chaos which is the foundation of our universe and its true reality. This chaos is hidden from us behind "the golden cover" of the day, but during the night hours and in the howling of the wind it reveals itself to us, and it has a strong attraction for the poet. This dualism of chaos and cosmos is complemented by that of lonely and ignorant man and the nature surrounding him. However, as presented by Tyutchev, the pantheist, this nature is far from being completely indifferent, and in his most popular poems (Vesenn- yaya groza [The Thunderstorm in the Spring]) it lives and breathes like a human being. The dualism continues in the portrayal of human soul by Tyutchev:

O thou, my wizard soul, oh heart
That whelming agony immerses,
The threshold of two universes
In cleaving thee, tears thee apart.

The romantic vision of his poetry is presented with the rhetorical art of a classicist, and he adds to the melody of Zhukovsky the archaic diction and oratorical structure of Derzhavin. Subtle impressionism goes hand in hand with aphoristic quality in his fragment-like poems. Tyutchev also wrote much political verse, reacting to contemporary events and defending the religious mission of Russia in the world; but his most original contribution, next to his somber metaphysical revelations, was his love poetry which reflected his own love affair and his suffering after his mistress' death. Love was for Tyutchev a "fatal duel" between the sexes, and its portrayal had much in common with that in Dostoevsky's novels. Tyutchev greatly influenced Rus. symbolists of the 20th c. by his form, his vision, and the prophetic character of his poetry.

The second half of the 19th c. was a time of conflict between two camps. One of these insisted that poetry had the civic duty of contributing to the social struggle of the period for the improvement of conditions under which the majority of the Rus. people lived, and the poetic slogan was "You do not have to be a poet, but you must be a citizen" (Nekrasov). The opposite party, known under the misleading label of the "poets of art for art's sake" considered it poetry's sacred task to create beauty. Among the civic-minded (who usually coincided with the political left), there was only one poet worth mention, Nekrasov, but he was a giant, comparable in the scope of his achievements only to Pushkin and Lermontov. Nikolay Nekrasov (1821-78)—praised by his contemporaries on the ground of his message and subject matter, but only after his death appreciated as a poet of great talent and craftsmanship—was early in his career persuaded by the influential critic Belinsky to draw material directly from life and to place his poetry at the service of the social cause. Nekrasov enjoyed enormous popular success during his lifetime, and he was a complex personality, an unscrupulous and shrewd, but discerning, publisher, a gambler, a social snob, but simultaneously a man of "wounded heart" (Dostoevsky), a sensitive and guilt-ridden hypochondriac who penitently confessed in his poems a discrepancy between his democratic ideals and his way of life. Among his poemy, there are the social satire Zheleznaya doroga (The Railroad), the peasant love and murder story Korobeyniki (The Pedlars), the realistic fantasy Moroz krasny nos (Frost the Red-Nosed), and the huge epic Komu na Rusi zhit' khorosho (Who is Happy in Russia), a satiric crosscut through contemporary society, ending with a glorification of Rus. populist intelligentsia. In spite of the fact that even now Nekrasov's poetry is often extolled or rejected on the ground of his humanitarian or revolutionary message, he was the greatest and the most representative poet of his time. The "suffering of the people," which he sang all his life, may well have been the symbol of his own tortured soul rather than an expression of group feelings. It is for this reason that his uneven "muse of vengeance and sorrow," as he himself called his poetry, so often achieved immediacy and white-hot intensity. His originality lies not only in his masterly, broad, and compassionate treatment of the Rus. peasant theme (and this includes some of the best Rus. rustic idylls, not only the poems about "suffering"), but in the combination of conversational style and folk song and in the daring use of "prosaic" diction. Variety was also Nekrasov's mark. Next to a sobbing melody, tortuous reflections, sad landscapes, pictures of rural and urban poverty as well as the portrayal of pain in human love relations, one finds healthy humor and racy vigor.

The "art-for-art's-sake" school was richer in names, but not a single one among those poets, with the probable exception of Fet, ever reached Nekrasov's stature. Also, they suffered as much as their civic-minded adversaries from the decline in poetic technique. Most of them were eclectics who considered themselves, or were considered, Pushkin's heirs. Among them, the following were the most prominent: Alexey K. Tolstoy, who also wrote the best Rus. nonsense poetry, a Rus. "Victorian," Apollon Maykov, and the poet with a gift of song, Yakov Polonsky. But only Afanasy Fet (1820-92) can be considered Nekrasov's rightful rival, despite the fact that many of his contemporaries turned their backs at him for his "reactionary" behavior. Fet was an army officer, and later a practical landowner, but he was also one of the most tender and subtle Rus. poets. His inner poetical freedom was comparable only to Pushkin's. He was primarily the poet of nature and love, but his late poems, published under the title Vechernie ogni (The Evening Lights), showed a distinct turn to metaphysical subjects and the influence of Schopenhauer. Fet was close to the Zhukovsky tradition in Rus. poetry in his ability to express nuances of feeling and catch elusive and fleeting impressions, as well as in the suggestiveness of his verse, its high musicality and rhythmic variety. Nature in his poems seems to dissolve in lyrical emotion, and in his love poetry Fet is both passionate and subtle. All these qualities made him particularly dear to Rus. symbolists who dominated Rus. poetry around the turn of the century.

The general poetic decline continued, and toward the end of the 19th c., the poetic level of the idols of the radicals (S. Nadson), or of their antagonists (A. Apukhtin), or even of the predecessors of the coming poetic renaissance (C. Slucevsky), was extremely low. Slightly above this level was the mystical poetry of the famous philosopher Vladimir Solovyov. But in the 1890's, there began the aesthetic and spiritual revolution which, in poetry, resulted in the complex and heterogeneous phenomenon of Rus. modernism which has often, and rather misleadingly, been called symbolism. This movement opposed the realistic tradition of Rus. literature and its social-progress orientation. It emphasized aesthetic individualism with overtones of anarchism and amorality, and in many respects was based on the Western European art and poetry of the fin de siècle (however, later the Slavophil elements grew and began to predominate). There was a renewal of interest in spiritual problems and of intense quest in philosophy, religion, and mysticism. There was also an active revaluation of the past, which returned to their rightful places many important figures of Rus. literature, art, and thought. A salient feature of this modernist movement was attention to poetic form; craftsmanship, variety, and subtlety in poetry ceased to be an exception. First-rate poets began to appear in great numbers, and the period was afterward called by some the "Second Golden Age," whereas others, taking into consideration its prevalent "decadent" features, insisted on the name "Silver Age."

The first decades brought into prominence several poets. Constantine Balmont (1867-1943) infused Rus. poetry with unusual richness of sound. His often heavily alliterated lines dazzled the ear and enchanted it with a real song quality. The scholarly Valery Bryusov (1873-1924) soon became the recognized leader of the movement, and in his poems Rus. poetry regained the previously lost cultural level. His stylized, often oratorical verse, with its heavy rhythm (Urbi et orbi), emphasized proud solitude and almost allegorical eroticism. Fyodor Sologub (1863-1927) presented symbols of evil and praised the beauty of death in his deceptively simple and unadorned poems with their Manichean world outlook and the general mood of tiredness, cruelty, pain and yearning. The intellectual poetry of Zinaida Gippius (1869-1945) was also bare of ornament, but this Pushkin-like feature was counterbalanced by a Lermontovian metaphysical Sehnsucht.

Apart from the movement stood Innokenty Annensky (1856-1909) whose nervous poetry, perfect in form, subtle and precise in expression, continues to be the object of admiration among poets, although the general public has never been particularly aware of him.

The next generation of Rus. symbolists had more right to use this name because in their literary works and activities aesthetic considerations were definitely subordinated to a mystical atmosphere and apocalyptic expectations. Individualistic self-assertion was clearly on the wane. A leading figure of the period was Vyacheslav Ivanov (1866-1949), scholarly and antidecadent in outlook. In his heavily ornamented, static, and priestly poems (Cor ardens), full of classical allusions, archaic diction, and "symbol-myths," he spoke about the coming transfiguration of the world, which would bring about the triumph of "collective individualism." But the real king of the Rus. poets of the 20th c. has so far been Alexander Blok (1880-1921) whose first success was the romantic and mystical Stikhi o Prekrasnoy Dame (Verses About the Beautiful Lady) with its atmosphere of eschatological expectation. Despite the fact that Blok lacked the erudition and sophistication of other leaders of the movement, he felt his symbolism more profoundly and sincerely; and his poetry, in which life and creation are blended, is full of ups and downs, moving from exaltation to disillusionment. Soon he abandoned celestial heights and plunged into reality, but this reality continued to be transformed by his mysticism for years to come, resulting in a most peculiar mixture of realism and mystical vision. The expectations alternate in his poems with moments of doubt, emptiness, gloom and despair. Romantic irony, blasphemy, and self-parody appear, as well as hauntingly beautiful cycles of love poetry. Blok's poems are uneven in quality, but the best of them are unique in the force of their passion and intoxicating rhythm and melody. His late poetry (Strashny mir [The Frightening World], Vozmezdie [Retaliation]) became increasingly tragic despite a short period of relief in his poems on Russia, which appeared now as the poet's wife, i.e., another incarnation of his mystical love. Blok accepted the revolution of 1917 in his enigmatic poema Dvenadtsat' (The Twelve) which not only astounded with contrasting images and rhythms, but also gave birth to a host of interpreters of its puzzling end in which twelve Red soldiers (the apostles of the new world) are preceded on their march by Jesus Christ. Blok's friend, and intermittently a foe, was Andrey Bely (1880-1934), another leader of Rus. symbolism and a complex figure who mixed solemn predictions with outright foolery in his brilliant poems. He changed style drastically and often, and was apt to produce a collection of abstract meditations (Urna [The Urn]) after a book containing realistic pictures of Rus. life (Pepel [Ashes]). Bely was a tireless experimenter in both prose and verse, especially in the field of rhythm, and he was probably the only Rus. symbolist who could be genuinely humorous.

Symbolism's universal aspirations and its constant aiming at overstepping the borders of art were bound to arouse an opposition. The poet Mikhail Kuzmin (1875-1936), who was close to symbolist circles and wrote verse of great charm, ease, and variety, demanded publicly a return to "beautiful clarity." This was soon followed by the neoclassicist movement of acmeism (q.v.) whose leaders protested symbolism's neglect of this world and the vagueness and "mistiness" of its doctrine. The acmeists also put a special emphasis on poetic craftsmanship, and the movement's recognized leader, Nikolay Gumilyov (1886-1921) also headed the Guild of Poets, to which many younger poets owed their technical brilliance. In his early poetry, Gumilyov had a particular predilection for the exotic, and he devoted a whole book to "geographic" poems about his favorite continent of Africa (Shatyor [The Tent]). He admired virility and glorified in his poems warriors, adventurers, and discoverers of new lands. War was to him an almost mystical activity and the natural outlet for human heroism. His best collection, Ognenny stolp (The Pillar of Fire), a book of great promise, was published after its author was executed for his participation in an anti-Soviet conspiracy. Gumilyov's wife, Anna Akhmatova (b. 1889), was a greater artist than her husband. She early became famous with her book of short love-poems, Chotki (Beads). These poetic cameos are little masterpieces of compactness. They are written in a conversational style, which Akhmatova later abandoned in the solemn and austere poems on the Russian war and revolution (Anno Domini). Akhmatova's most recent major work, the somber and obscure Poema bez geroya (The Poem Without a Hero), is autobiographical. The third great acmeist, Osip Mandelstam (1891-1939) wrote militant critical essays in which he tried to deepen the rather flat aesthetics of the movement. In his neoclassicist verse (Kamen' [The Stone]), a keen feeling for history, especially classical antiquity, is revealed, and words are treated with perfect balance and strange detachment, so that his Rus. sounds like Latin. In Mandelstam's best book, Trostia, there is a tendency toward loosening of semantics. His later poetry has a complex texture, but its theme remains the poet's dialogue with time in general and his own time in particular. Mandelstam's poetry written in concentration camps (where the poet died) was recently published outside Russia. It is poignant, though elusive, and occasionally reaches the heights of tragic lyricism.

Another reaction to symbolism was that of the Rus. futurists (see EGO-FUTURISM and CUBO-FUTURISM) who began their movement with a nihilistic rebellion against the past. Their poetry often sounded like a cross of the poètes maudits and the dadaists, but soon revealed not only points of affinity with the Rus. 18th c., but also a very productive doctrine of the essentially verbal nature of poetry. Their theories of the "self-oriented word" (samovitoie slovo) and the "trans-rational language" (zaumny yazyk) asserted that words are not simply means of expression, but the source and essence of poetry. The greatest poet of Rus. futurism was Victor (Velimir) Khlebnikov (1885-1922), a tireless experimenter with words, the creator of interesting linguistic mythology and a supreme craftsman. This bizarre and lonely man was also a Utopian dreamer who hoped to find the mathematical foundations of history. He combined, in a paradoxical way, rationalistic dreams of the harmonious future life based on science with attraction to the old Slavic past and an almost prehistoric mentality. The enormous variety of his work and his continuous mixing of forms and genres make Khlebnikov a difficult poet to classify, but his greatest poetic achievements are to be found among his numerous poemy in which he lovingly described the pagan world (Vnuchka Malushi [Malusha's Granddaughter]), created the best specimens of Rus. primitivistic idyll (I i E) and later portrayed revolution with genuine tragic art (Nochnoy obysk [A Night Search]). Khlebnikov was anti-Western and stressed the Asiatic ties of Russia. He was one of the strongest influences on Rus. poetry during the first years after the Communist revolution.

Another great poet with a futurist background was Vladimir Mayakovsky (1894-1930) whose loud and rebellious expressionist poems (Oblako v shtanakh [The Cloud in Pants]) are among the most original literary events of Russia just before the revolution. He wanted to create the poetry of the streets, extrovert and devoid of any sentimentality and sweetness, but in his work social satire and oratory alternate with some of the most passionate love poems ever written (Fleyta-pozvonochnik [The Spine Flute], Pro eto [About That]). Mayakovsky also created his own highly effective verse system, based on stress only, in which a word, rather than a line, was the unit. He used elaborate rhyme and had a predilection for hyperbole. After the revolution of 1917, Mayakovsky placed his work at the service of the Communist state and wrote some of the best Rus. propaganda poetry (Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, Khorosho! [It's Good!]). After his suicide, he was officially proclaimed the best poet of Soviet Russia, and he is still the poetic hero of the Soviet youth. Mayakovsky's rival in popular esteem, but until recently under a semi-ban, was Sergey Esenin (1895-1925), a boy from the village who attracted the attention of prerevolutionary poetic circles with his melodious verse about the Rus. countryside. For some time, he was associated with the Peasant Poets' group, which was headed by Nikolay Klyuev (1885-1937) who wrote heavily ornamented poetry, often based on the imagery of Rus. religious sects. Later, Esenin joined the modernist group of imagists, who considered the autonomous trope the basis of poetry and abundantly used it in their rudely erotic and blasphemous poems. Esenin became particularly popular after the revolution with his melancholic love poems which often stressed the theme of the end of the Rus. peasant's old way of life, so dear to the poet. Motives of death predominate in this poetry, and they further increase in his later "tavern" poems (Moskva kabatskaya [The Moscow of Saloons]) with their devil-may-care tragic abandon. Esenin's late poetry, written just before his suicide, produced both realistic, mildly humorous pictures of the Soviet village (Rus' ukhodyashchaya [The Disappearing Russia]) which he observed with a sad smile, and morbid alcoholic visions (Chorny chelovek [The Black Man]).

The 1920's were the most active period in the development of Soviet Rus. poetry. From the formal point of view, it was a continuation of the traditions of the prerevolutionary "Silver Age," with futurist ideas predominating. In subject matter, it was usually the poetry of factories and cosmic revolution (see SMITHY POETS) or the romanticism of the Civil War (Bagritsky, Aseev, Tikhonov). The group of constructivists (q.v.) aimed at an alliance between poetry and technology (Selvinsky). However, at the beginning of the 1930's, the government forced poetry, together with the rest of literature, to become part of its political machinery and to accept the method of "socialist realism" which can be best defined as party line in literature and art. After this, poets did whatever was required by the party. Most of them glorified Stalin's wisdom, extolled the collective farm labor or attacked capitalism and the alleged internal enemies of communism. During World War II, spontaneous patriotism produced a few sincere poetic works (Simonov, Tvardovsky), but it failed to create great poetry or major poets. The only new name during this decade is Nikolay Zabolotsky (1903-58), who began as a master of satirical grotesque, but, after criticism, switched over to the more acceptable Soviet brand of neoclassicism. Neither was the postwar period very productive in this respect. Recently the young Evgeny Evtushenko (b. 1933) has attracted much attention both inside and outside Russia with his energetic and often courageous poetry reflecting the new Soviet generation's search for truth, and characterized by mastery of realistic detail and a mild tendency to formal innovation (mainly in rhyme). However, the most consistent representative of Soviet non-conformism remains the towering, lonely figure of Boris Pasternak (1890-1960), who began his poetic activities before the revolution as a moderate futurist, but very soon found his individual voice. In most of his poems, he remained a poet of nature and love, and he stubbornly refused to write poetic propaganda for the creation of the new society according to official prescriptions. In one of his poems he said:

The great Soviet gives to the highest passions
In these brave days each one its rightful place,
Yet vainly leaves one vacant for the poet.
When that's not empty, look for danger's face.

For decades, Pasternak was severely criticized for his apolitical attitude and was finally forced to turn exclusively to translating. His outstanding feature as a poet is his combination of culture and sophistication with intense passion and freshness. In his rushing, syntactically complex lines, colloquialisms jostle "poetic" words, and unexpected metaphors are created by free association. There is a special vision of life in his poetry. Things come alive, the commonplace becomes strange, and natural optimism reigns. Pasternak's most famous book of poems remains his early Sestra moya zhizn' (My Sister Life). His late poems, while remaining primarily poetry of nature, show more preoccupation with moral and religious problems, especially the poems concluding his novel Dr. Zhivago. The diction is more simple, and the general tone shows more restraint.

The poetry of the Rus. exiles has never had enough attention from critics, and yet its achievements were not inferior to those of the poets who remained after the revolution in their country. The émigré literature concentrated in Paris, and there numerous poets contributed to what was later named "the Parisian tone" (parizhskaya nota). It is the poetry of simplicity and brevity, which avoided loud tone and stressed the theme of human loneliness. However, the greatest poets of Rus. exile belonged to the older generation and had begun their careers before the revolution, although they fully developed only in emigration. Vladislav Khodasevich (1886-1939) was the virtual head and the feared critic of Rus. poets in Paris. Being a scholar of note, he consciously imitated the style of the Pushkin period, but in content his mystical poetry was a direct descendant of symbolism. There is a deep discord in it between the "quiet inferno" of this ugly world and the regions where the soul dwells (Tyazholaya lira [The Heavy Lyre]). The growing despair at the inability of poetry to change the state of things led Khodasevich to the poetic silence near the end of his life. Quite different was the loud-voiced and high-pitched poetry of Marina Tsvetaeva (1892-1941) who lived in poverty in exile and then returned to Russia only to commit suicide there. Rus. folklore, the Rus. 18th c., Goethe and Rilke are combined in her rhythmically luxurious and verbally magnificent poems, full of archaic diction and colloquialisms, high rhetoric and intimate confessions, genuine passion and verbal virtuosity (Remeslo [Craft], Posle Rossii [After Russia]). In poetry, as in life, she yearned for true nobility and never failed to defend lost causes (Lebediny stan [The Camp of Swans]) or move against the stream, and, as a consequence, she was an outcast wherever she lived. Probably the greatest Rus. lyric poet in exile was Georgy Ivanov (1894-1958) who began as a minor acmeist, but developed into a major poetic force in Paris. His diary-like poetry, where he now indulged in irresponsible jemenfoutisme, now created poems of almost unbearable beauty, was the logical conclusion of the period of Alexander Blok. Melancholy at the loss of his native country develops in it into a cynical nihilism and the conviction that art and beauty have deceived man (Portret bez skhodstva [A Portrait Without Likeness]). In his poems, there is a combination of utter simplicity and brevity with elusiveness, of modern consciousness with a nostalgia for things past, and of acid beauty with a desire to tease the reader.

ANTHOLOGIES: Specimens of the Rus. Poets, tr. J. Bowring (2 v., 1821, 1823); Russkaya poeziya, ed. S. A. Vengerov (issues I-VII, 1893-97; the most complete anthol. of the 18th-c. poetry); L. Wiener, Anthol. of Rus. Lit. from the Earliest Period to the Present Time (2 v., 1902-3); Yu. N. Verkhovsky, Poety pushkinskoy pory (1919; standard anthol. of the poets of Pushkin's time); Rus. poetry, an Anthol., tr. B. Deutsch and A. Yarmolinsky (1927); Russkaya lirika, malen'kaya antologiya ot Lomonosova do Pasternaka, ed. D. Mirsky (1924; the best little anthol.); I. S. Ezhov and E. I. Shamurin, Russkaya poeziya XX veka (1925; standard); N. K. Chadwick, Rus. Heroic Poetry (1932); Soviet Lit., an Anthol., ed. and tr. G. Reavey and M. Slonim (1934); Modern Poems from Russia, tr. G. Shelley (1942); A Book of Rus. Verse, ed. C. M. Bowra (1943); Three Rus. Poets, Selections from Pushkin, Lermontov and Tyutchev, tr. V. Nabokov (1944); The Oxford Book of Rus. Verse (2d ed., 1948; Rus. texts, Eng. preface and commentaries); A Second Book of Rus. Verse, ed. C. M. Bowra (1948); Priglushonnye golosa, Poeziya za zheleznyym zavesom, ed. V. Markov (1952; the best poetry by the best Rus. poets who lived in Soviet Russia); Yu. P. Ivask, Na zapade (1953; the widest selection of Rus. poets in exile); Antologiya russkoy sovetskoy poezii, 1917-1957, ed. V. Lugovskoy et al. (2 v., 1957; the most complete recent Soviet anthol.); Poety XVIII veka, ed. G. P. Makogonenko (2 v., 1958, the latest anthol. of the poets of the 18th c.); Russkie poety XIX veka, ed. N. Gaydenkov (1958; the widest sel. of 19th-c. poets); Russkoe narodnoe poeticheskoe tvorchestvo, ed. E. V. Pomerantseva and S. I. Mints (1959; the latest anthol. of Rus. folklore); An Anthol. of Rus. Verse 1812-1960, ed. A. Yarmolinsky (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: I. N. Rozanov, Russkaya lirika (1914; standard on the end of the 18th c. and the beginning of the 19th c.); L. A. Magnus, The Heroic Ballads of Russia (1921); D. S. Mirsky, Pushkin (1926); V. Khodasevich, Nekropol' (1939; brilliant portraits of some of the leading figures of the poetical "Silver Age"); A. S. Kaun, Soviet Poets and Poetry (1942); N. K. Gudzy, Hist. of Early Rus. Lit. (1949); D. S. Mirsky, A Hist. of Rus. Lit. (1949); L. Strakhovsky, Craftsmen of the Word, Three Poets of Modern Russia (1949); M. Slonim, The Epic of Rus. Lit. (1950); Y. M. Sokolov, Rus. Folklore (1950); G. Struve, Soviet Rus. Lit., 1917-1950 (1951); O. A. Maslenikov, The Frenzied Poets, Andrey Biely and the Rus. Symbolists (1952); M. Slonim, Modern Rus. Lit., From Chekhov to the Present (1953); Akademiya Nauk SSR, Istoriya russkoy literatury (10 v., 1941-54); G. Struve, Russkaya literatura v izgnanii (1956; standard on Rus. lit. in exile); B. O. Unbegaun, Rus. Versification (1956); R. Poggioni, The Poets of Russia, 1890-1930 (1960); D. D. Blagoy, Istoriya russkoy literatury XVIII veka (preferably last ed., 1960; standard). v.m.

RUSSIAN PROSODY. See SLAVIC PROSODY.

S

S.M. Abbreviation for short measure or meter.
Hymn stanza.

SANSKRIT POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

SAPPHIC. An important Aeolic (q.v.) verse form named after Sappho, a Gr. poetess from Lesbos of the 7th-6th c. B.C. The S. stanza consists of three Lesser S. lines

— — — — — — — — — —

followed by one Adonic

or Adoneus, — — — — —

Sappho's contemporary, Alcaeus, also used the stanza and may have been its inventor. Catullus (84-54 B.C.?) made an adaptation of one of Sappho's odes (Catullus 51) and composed another in the meter (Catullus 11); with these poems he probably introduced the S. into L. poetry, but it is not certain. Horace (65-8 B.C.) provided the S. model for subsequent Roman and European poets; he used the meter 27 times, second in frequency only to the alcaics (q.v.) among his poems. Horace also makes a single use of the Greater S. strophe, i.e., an Aristophanic (— — — — — — — — — —) followed by a Greater S. line (— — — — — || — — — — —). Seneca (4 B.C.-A.D. 65) sometimes uses the separate elements in a different order, e.g., by arranging a continuous series of longer lines with an Adonic clausula. The S. stanza is today read in two quite different ways. We may stress the long third and fifth syllables ("integer vitae") or the fourth and sixth syllables, which in the Horatian pattern bear the word accent ("integer vitae scelerisque purus"). This second method is suggested by medieval rhyme in, e.g., vita sanctorum, decus angelorum.

Late medieval German Sapphics are rhymed.

The stanza was popular with poets and metricians in Italy, France (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES), Germany, England, and Spain during the Renaissance and, in varying extent, during later periods. Leonardo Dati used it for the first time in It. (1441, cf. HEXAMETER). He was followed by Galeotto del Carretto (1455-1530), Claudio Tolomei (1492-1555), and others. Felice Cavallotti (1842-98) experimented with the Horatian Greater S. Spain's Estéban de Villegas (1589-1669) is the chief practitioner of this meter in his country. In the 18th c. F. G. Klopstock varied an unrhymed stanza with regular positional changes of the trisyllabic foot in the Lesser S. lines; H. von Platen and others in Germany sustained the strict Horatian form. The Victorians, Tennyson and Swinburne in particular, included Sapphics among their many reproductions of classical meter.

Recent examples of the S. ode are in abundance. Translators of Horace and Catullus are constantly attracted by the deceptively simple scheme, e.g.

... I'll adore my Lalage's pleasant laughter, pleasant discoursing.

(J. B. Leishman)

For an example of original Sapphics today see Ezra Pound's Apparuit, one stanza of which reads as follows: "Half the graven shoulder, the throat aflash with / strands of light inwoven about it, loveli- / est of all things, frail alabaster, ah me! / swift in departing."—For bibliography, see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES. Also, G. Mazzoni, "Per la storia della saffica in Italia," Atti dell' Acc. Scienze lett. arti, 10 (1894); C. H. Moore, Horace . . . (1902), 42; H. G. Atkins, A Hist. of German Versification (1923); G. Highet, The Cl. Tradition (1949); Koster; Navarro. R.A.S.

SATANIC SCHOOL. A term applied in the early 19th c. to a group of romantic poets, it was originated by Robert Southey in his preface to A Vision of Judgment, an attack on Shelley, Keats, and, especially, Byron. Southey attacked the second generation of Eng. romantics on the basis of an alleged immorality in their work and lives, coupled with their rejection of the revelations of the Christian religion. The term "Satanic school" seems in particular to designate that interest in the exotic, the passionate, the violent, and the perverse which distinguishes one group of romantics. Moreover, Southey's condemnation was susceptible of extension to other Eng. poets—Leigh Hunt and Thomas Moore, for example. Some critics (M. Praz, The Romantic Agony, 2d ed., 1951) have associated this attitude with the Marquis de Sade. Continental poets who show such "Satanic" elements include Hugo, Musset, and Baudelaire in France, and Kleist in Germany.

SATIRE, says Dr. Johnson, is "a poem in which wickedness or folly is censured"; and more elaborate definitions are rarely more satisfactory. No strict definition can encompass the complexity of a word which signifies, on one hand, a kind of literature, and on the other, a spirit or tone which expresses itself in many literary genres. The difficulty is pointed up by a phrase of Quintilian (Institutio Oratoria, 10.93): "satura [as opposed to other literary forms] tota nostra est"; Quintilian seems to be claiming s. as a wholly Roman phenomenon, although he had read Aristophanes, and was familiar with a number of Gr. forms that we would call satiric. The point is that by satura (which meant originally something like "medley" and from which comes our "satire") he intended to specify that kind of poem "invented" by Lucilius, written in hexameters on certain appropriate themes, dominated by a Lucilian-Horatian tone. Satura referred, in short, to a poetic form, established and fixed by Roman practice. After Quintilian's day the signification of the term broadened to include works that were "satirical" in tone, but not in form; then, according to Hendrickson, from Gr. satyros and its derivatives were appropriated terms which became our satirist, satiric, satirize, etc. This confused etymology made for confusion: satura was modified orthographically into satyra and then, in Eng., into satyre. Elizabethan writers, anxious to follow classical models but misled by a false etymology, believed that "satyre" derived from the Gr. satyr-play; satyrs being notoriously rude, unmannerly creatures, "spies out of . . . secret faults," it seemed to follow that "satyre" should be harsh, coarse, rough:

The Satyre should be like the Porcupine,
That shoots sharp quilles out in each angry line. . . .

(Hall, Virgidemiarum, 5.3)

Isaac Casaubon exposed the false etymology of the satire-satyr relation in 1605; but the tradition has remained strong.

The formal verse s. as composed by Horace, Persius, and Juvenal is the only satiric form to have even a remotely determinate structure, and it furnishes exceptions to every generalization ("qui dit satire latine, dit mélange," writes Lejay). Generally speaking, the formal s. is a quasi-dramatic poem, "framed" by an encounter between the Satirist (or, more reasonably, his persona, the "I" of the poem) and an Adversarius who impels the satirist to speech. Within this frame, as M. C. Randolph has shown, vice and folly are exposed to critical analysis by means of any number of literary and rhetorical devices: the satirist may use beast fables, Theophrastian "characters," dramatic incidents, fictional experiences, anecdotes, proverbs, homilies; he may employ invective, sarcasm, irony, mockery, railery, exaggeration, understatement—wit in any of its forms—anything to make the object of attack abhorrent or ridiculous. Complementing this negative aspect of the poem is a positive appeal, explicit or implicit, to virtue and rational behavior—to a norm, that is, against which the vicious and the foolish are to be judged. Thus, though the materials of the s. are astonishingly varied, there is pressure toward order internally from the arraignment of vice and appeal to virtue, and externally from the (often shadowy) dramatic situation which frames the poem.

Formal satires are written in the middle style; they are discursive, colloquial, as befits a form unremittingly aware of its low estate in the hierarchy of genres. Juvenal's occasional self-conscious flights into the grand style, however, sanctioned the "tragically" s. of later writers, and his saeva indignatio contrasts with the tone of urbane mockery characteristic of Horace.

In addition to attacking vice and folly on nearly all levels, the formal satirist has from the beginning felt impelled to justify his ungrateful art. His apologiae (Horace, 1.4; 2.1; Persius, 1; Juvenal, 1; Régnier, 12; Boileau, 9; Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot) are conventional; they project an image of the satirist as a plain honest man, wishing harm to no upright person, but appalled at the evil he sees about him and forced by his conscience (facit indignatio versum) to write s. Readers have not always been convinced. While the influence of Roman practice on later satirists in matters of theme, point of view, tone, literary and rhetorical device, etc., has been enormous, relatively few poets have attempted to adapt precisely the Roman form. Boileau and Pope are great exceptions.

The satiric spirit as it is manifested in verse seems to appear (whether as mockery, railery, ridicule, or formalized invective) in the literature or folklore of all peoples, early and late, preliterate and civilized. According to Aristotle (Poetics 4. 1448^b–1449^a), Gr. Old Comedy developed out of ritualistic invective—out of satiric utterances, that is, improvised and hurled at individuals by the Leaders of the Phallic Songs. The function of these "iambic" utterances was magical, as F. M. Cornford has shown; they were thought to drive away evil influences so that the positive fertility magic of the phallus might be operative. This early connection of primitive "s." with magic has a remarkably widespread history. Archilochus (7th c. B.C.), the "first" Gr. literary satirist, composed iambs of such potency against Lycambes that he and his daughters are said to have hung themselves. In the next century the sculptors Bupalus and Athenis "knit their necks in halters," it is said, as a result of the "bitter rimes and biting libels" of the satirical poet Hipponax. Similar tales exist in other cultures. The chief function of the ancient Arabic poet was to compose s. (hiǧā) against the tribal enemy. The satires were thought always to be fatal and the poet led his people into battle, hurling his verses as he would hurl a spear. Old Ir. literature is laced with accounts of the extraordinary power of the poets, whose satires brought disgrace and death to their victims: ". . . saith [King] Lugh to his poet, 'what power can you wield in battle?' 'Not hard to say,' quoth Carpre '. . . I will satirize them and shame them, so that through the spell of my art they will not resist warriors'" (The Second Battle of Moytura, tr. W. Stokes, Revue Celtique, 12 [1891], 91-92). (F. N. Robinson adduces linguistic, thematic, and other evidence to show a functional relation between primitive s., like that of Carpre, and the "real" s. of more sophisticated times.) Today, among the Eskimo, the loss of a duel in s. (the drum-match, in which two enemies alternately hurl verses of ridicule and abuse at each other) may lead to exile and even death. Primitive s. such as that described above can hardly be spoken of in literary terms; its affiliations are rather with the magical incantation and the curse.

When the satiric utterance breaks loose from its background in ritual and magic, as in ancient Greece (when it is free, that is, to develop according to literary rather than "practical" impulses), it is found embodied in an indefinite number of literary forms which profess to convey moral instruction by means of laughter, ridicule, mockery—forms such as Aristophanic comedy, the Bionean diatribe, the mime, the beast fable, the Theophrastian character, etc., all of which contribute to the developed formal s. of Rome. But the spirit which informs them is too mercurial to be confined to exclusive literary structures; it proliferates everywhere, adapting itself to whatever mode (verse or prose) seems congenial. Its range is enormous: from an anonymous medieval invective against social injustice to the superb wit of some of Chaucer's portraits and the somber power of the Vision of Piers the Ploughman; from the burlesque of Pulci to the scurrilities of Aretino; from the flailings of Marston and the mordancies of Quevedo to the bite of La Fontaine and the great dramatic structures of Jonson and Molière.

By and large the satiric spirit seems to fuse most readily with the comic genres: when s. was prohibited by law in Elizabethan England, and it was ordered that the verses of Hall and Marston be burned, the satirists turned promptly to the comic drama ("comically satyre") as the form most appropriate for their purposes. But, as in all generalizations about s., the qualifications are important. Juvenal deliberately sought to rise above the prescriptive bounds of the comic; at the end of the scarifying Sixth S. he enforces a comparison in theme and tone with Sophocles. In the modern Age of S. Alexander Pope catches beautifully, when he likes, the deft Horatian tone; but his wit (like that of Dryden in Absalom and Achitophel) is also a serious wit, deeply probing and prophetic. The last lines of the Dunciad rise to a terrifying sublimity as they celebrate the restoration of chaos, the obliterating triumph of the anti-Logos. Such passages transcend easy generic distinctions.

The private motivations of the satirist we cannot know. The public function of s.—how it works in its social, psychological, cultural dimensions—we understand only obscurely. (Approaches to these problems by way of psychoanalytic theory, cultural anthropology, etc., are promising; e.g., the work of E. Kris and E. H. Gombrich on caricature in Kris, Psychoanalytic Explorations in Art [1952].) But the public motivation of the satirist is explicit and self-justificatory; he writes, so he claims, to reform. His audience may be small (a few "right-thinking men") but it must share with him commitment to certain intellectual and moral beliefs which validate his critique of aberration. Ridicule, which in some cultures may kill and in our own kills symbolically, depends on shared assumptions against which the aberrant stands in naked relief. The greatest s. has been written in periods when ethical and rational norms were sufficiently powerful to attract widespread assent, yet not so powerful as to compel absolute conformity—those periods when the satirist could be of his society and apart from it; could exercise the "double vision." Neoclassic poets had available to them as a kind of implicit metaphor the mighty standard of the classical past; witness the success in the period of the mock-heroic genres. These mock not primarily the ancient forms (although there may be affectionate laughter at some aspects of the epic) but present society, which in the context of past grandeur shows contemptible and mean.

