The 20th c., like the 19th, lacks such available norms; but unlike the 19th (Byron's Vision of Judgment and Don Juan and Heine's Atta Troll are hardly characteristic of their period) it has a taste for s. Yet though this may be a satirical age, it is hardly an age of great verse s. The alienation of poet from society is notorious; and when the poet has struggled through to the adoption of beliefs and values adequate to his needs, it is a question whether they will serve as metaphors for poetry. Three exceptions (to speak only of poets writing in Eng.) may be noted: Yeats, his vision radically private, and Eliot, his values at the time of The Waste Land generally religious, have both written powerful s.; and Auden, his orientation at first social-political, later religious, has demonstrated that a poet writing consciously within the 18th-c. satiric tradition can speak sharply, eloquently, effectively—can speak satirically—even to our fragmented society.

J. Dryden, "A Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of S." (1693), Works, ed. W. Scott and G. Saintsbury (1882-93), XIII, 1-123; P. Lejay, "Les origines et la nature de la satire d'Horace," in his ed. of Horace, Satires (1911); F. N. Robinson, "Satirists and Enchanters in Early Ir. Lit.," Studies in the Hist. of Religions. . . , ed. D. G. Lyon and G. F. Moore (1912); H. Walker, English S. and Satirists (1925); G. L. Hendrickson, "Archilochus and the Victims of his Iambics," AJP, 46 (1925) and "Satura tota nostra est," CP, 22 (1927); J. W. Duff, Roman S. (1936); O. J. Campbell, Comical Satire (1938); V. Cian, La satira (2 v., 1939); D. Worcester, The Art of S. (1940); M. C. Randolph, "The Structural Design of the Formal Verse S.," PQ, 21 (1942); I. Jack, Augustan S. (1952); M. Mack, "The Muse of S.," Studies in the Lit. of the Augustan Age, ed. R. C. Boys (1952); J. Peter, S. and Complaint in Early Eng. Lit. (1956); J. Sutherland, Eng. S. (1958); A. Kernan, The Cankered Muse (1959); R. C. Elliott, The Power of S. (1960); G. Highet, The Anatomy of S. (1962). R.C.E.

SATURA. See SATIRE.

SATURNIAN. This early L. meter, related as it was subsequently by the imagination of Roman writers to the age of Saturn, is generally thought to have been indigenous, although Caesius Bassus (1st c. A.D.) held that its ultimate source was a Gr. lyric verse of the type:

Ἐρασμῶνιδε Χαρίτῳ, || χρέμα τοῖ γελῶν.

Whether it was quantitative or accentual remains an unsolved problem because of the perplexing variety displayed by the 160 or so lines which survive in inscriptions and in the epic fragments of the poets Livius Andronicus and Naevius (second half of 3d c. B.C.). The lines, however, are regularly divisible into two cola, between which elision of vowels plays no part, e.g.

virum mihi, Camēna, || insece versutum,

where the presumed metrical stresses indicate the rhythm of Macaulay's famous imitation:

The queen was in her parlour || eating bread and honey

and are those of the quantitative theory whereby, at any rate in this example, the first colon has the appearance of an iambic dimeter catalectic and the second that of an ithyphallic. Accentual scansion on the other hand, according to the law of the penultimate, would give:

virum mihi, Camēna, || insece versutum.

Lines like this with 7 syllables in the first colon and 6 in the second or 13 in all are more common than those with a total of 12 or 14. After Naevius the Saturnian disappeared from L. literature, and the hexameter took its place as the meter of epic. Horace's description of the horridus numerus Saturnius as an offensive poison (grave virus) is an example of later taste in regard to it.—W. Beare, "Pollicis Ictus," the Saturnian, and Beowulf," CP, 50 (1955); good discussion of previous views and argument that the rival theories concerning quantity and accent are largely unreal) and L. Verse and European Song (1957); F. Novotný, "De versu Saturnio," Studia Salac (1955); G. B. Pighi, "Il Verso Saturnio," Rivista di filologia e di istruzione classica, 35 (1957); P. W. Harsh, Lustrum 3 (1958); R. G. Tanner, "The Arval Hymn and Early Latin Verse," CQ n.s., 11 (1961). R.J.G.

SCALD. See SKALD.

SCANSION. The system of describing more or less conventional poetic rhythms by visual symbols for purposes of metrical analysis and study. Three methods of scanning Eng. verse are generally recognized: the graphic, the musical, and the acoustic. The primary symbols most commonly used in traditional graphic s. are: x or ~ representing a syllable which, in poetic context, is unstressed; and ' or —, representing a syllable which is stressed. Secondary symbols are: |, representing a division between feet; and ||, representing a caesura (q.v.). In performing s. of a line or group of lines, the reader first marks stressed and unstressed syllables, not according to any preconceived pattern, but according to the degree of sense emphasis transmitted by the syllables. For example:

x ' x x x x x x x x
I sometimes think that never blows so red
The Rose as where some buried Caesar bled;
That every Hyacinth the Garden wears
Dropt in her lap from some once lovely head.
(FitzGerald, The Rubaiyat)

After ascertaining whether the lines are generally in ascending or descending rhythm (q.v.), the reader next marks the feet, as follows:

^x I ^x some^x times ^x think | ^x that ^x ne^x ver ^x blows | ^x so ^x red |
 The ^x Rose | ^x as ^x where | ^x some ^x bur^x ied ^x Cae^x sar ^x bled; |
 That ^x év^x ery ^x Hy^x ac^x inth | ^x the ^x Gar^x den ^x wears |
 Dropt ^x in | ^x her ^x lap | ^x from ^x some^x | ^x ónce ^x love^x ly^x
 head. |

S. does not make rhythm: it reveals it by transferring it from a temporal into a spatial dimension. By giving the reader a visual representation of the metrical situation underlying the words of the poem, s. helps to make clear the function of metrical variations (q.v.): in the fourth line of FitzGerald's stanza, for example, the s. makes visually apparent the substitution of a trochee for the expected iamb in the first position; this variation reinforces the suddenness and the rapidity of the fall of the drops of blood.

The s. of the following stanza also serves to reveal in visual symbols meaningful variations from the expected metrical pattern:

^x Her ^x lips | ^x were ^x red, | ^x her ^x looks | ^x were ^x free, |
^x Her ^x locks | ^x were ^x yel^x low ^x as ^x gold: |
^x Her ^x skin | ^x was ^x white | ^x as ^x lep^x rosy, |
 The ^x Night^x mare ^x Life^x in^x Death | ^x was ^x she, |
 Who ^x thicks | ^x men's ^x blood | ^x with ^x cold. |
 (Coleridge, Rime of the Ancient Mariner)

Here the s. of the last line reveals that a spondaic substitution has occurred in the second position, and that the added metrical weight performs the function of reinforcing the sense of the slow, heavy movement of chilled and thickened blood (see METRICAL VARIATIONS).

Total stanzaic structure is often recorded by indicating the rhyme scheme in letters, and the number of feet per line in numbers. For example, the FitzGerald stanza may be represented thus: a a b a₆; and the Coleridge thus: a₄ b₃ aa b₃.

Some prosodists reject the traditional graphic s. symbols, as illustrated above, and use instead musical symbols. In s. systems of this kind, eighth notes may represent unstressed syllables and quarter or half notes stressed syllables of varying degrees of emphasis. Caesuras are sometimes indicated by musical rests of various lengths. Musical s. has the advantage of representing more accurately than graphic s. delicate differences in degree of stress: it is obvious to anyone that an Eng. line has more than two "kinds" of syllables in it, and yet graphic s., preferring convenience to accuracy, gives the impression that any syllable in a line is either clearly stressed or clearly unstressed. On the other hand, the major disadvantage of musical s. is its complexity; a lesser disadvantage is that it tends to imply that poetry follows musical principles, an assumption not universally accepted.

The third method of s., the acoustic, has been developed by modern linguists working with such machines as the kymograph and the oscillograph. Like musical s., it is a system advantageous in the accuracy of its representations of the empirical phenomena of spoken verse but disadvantageous in its complexity.

Some theorists reject all three kinds of s. and prefer to mark the rhythmical movements of verse by cadences (q.v.), often indicated by wavy lines or brackets drawn above the poetic line.

E. Smith, The Principles of Eng. Metre (1923; on the s. of free verse); Y. Winters, Primitivism and Decadence (1937; free verse); "Eng. Verse and What It Sounds Like," KR, 18 (1956; articles by J. C. Ransom and others); W. K. Wimsatt, Jr. and M. C. Beardsley, "The Concept of Meter: an Exercise in Abstraction," PMLA, 74 (1959; on the s. of Eng. verse). P.F.

SCAZON. See CHOLIAMBUS.

SCHOOL OF NIGHT. A philosophical and literary society believed by some scholars to have existed in England in the closing years of the 16th c. Among its members are supposed to have been Sir Walter Raleigh (its founder and patron), the poets Chapman and Marlowe, and the mathematician Harriot. The existence of the society as such cannot be definitely proved. Modern scholars who accept its existence (the theory was first pronounced by Arthur Acheson, Shakespeare and the Rival Poet, 1903) see Chapman's obscure and ambitious poems The Shadow of Night and Ovid's Banquet of Sense as expressions of the group's theologico-scientific interests and esoteric learning, particularly in his use of "night" as the symbol of divine and hidden knowledge. The writers associated with the group had an undeserved contemporary reputation for atheism, due no doubt to their relation to the modernist thought which was beginning to shake Europe at that time, but in their grandiose pretensions as in their enthusiastic classicism they were typical late-Renaissance men. The "school of night" theory relies heavily for specific evidence on an interpretation of Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost 4.3.254: "O paradox! Black is the badge of hell, / The hue of dungeons, and the school of night," which is seen as a satiric reference to the esoteric and learned claims of the group.

But the passage, undoubtedly puzzling and often emended, admits of diverse readings, and the "school of night" theory remains an unproved, if fascinating, hypothesis.—M. C. Bradbrook, The School of Night (1936); J. H. P. Pafford, "Schoole of Night," N&Q, 202 (1957). See also J. D. Wilson's comments in his 2d ed. (1962) of LLL. F.J.W.

SCHOOL OF SPENSER. A group of Eng. poets of the earlier 17th c., strongly under the influence of Edmund Spenser (1552–99). Their work is sharply distinguished from the more radical poetic movements of the time, movements epitomized by the classicism of Jonson and by the "metaphysical" (q.v.) style of Donne. The principal poets of the Spenserian school—Browne, Wither, Giles, and Phineas Fletcher, and the Scottish poets Drummond of Hawthornden and Sir William Alexander—show the influence of Spenser in their sensuous imagery, their smooth meter, their archaic diction, and their fondness for narrative and pastoral modes of expression. They also owe to Spenser their allegorical and moral tendencies. Such ambitious narrative poems as Giles Fletcher's Christ's Victory and Triumph and Phineas Fletcher's The Apollyonists suggest Spenser's Faerie Queene in their pictorial quality and in their stanzaic forms (modified Spenserian); they also anticipate Milton, who, occasionally echoing the Fletchers, follows them in the use of Christian material for epic purposes and himself acknowledged his indebtedness to Spenser whom he termed master.

SCHÜTTELREIM. A double rhyme based on the principle of the Spoonerism, that is, on the transposition or "shaking" of the initial consonants of two words or syllables. It lends itself peculiarly well to humorous and satirical verse in German. It is found in couplets or in longer line series, some of which have become popular quotations while their authors have been forgotten, e.g., "Nicht jeder, der da freite zwo, ward über seine zweite froh," or "Als Gottes Atem leiser ging, schuf er den Grafen Keyserling" (attributed to Friedrich Gundolf). The shortest known Sch. is "Du bist Buddhist." Regine Mirsky-Tauber (Schüttelreime, 1904) and Anton Kippenberg (Benno Papentrighs Schüttelreime, 1943) have written whole cycles of light verse in this form. U.K.G.

SCIENCE AND POETRY. I. INTRODUCTORY. In a general way, the relation between sci. and poetry has had its critics since Plato's suggestion in The Republic that there may be a fundamental opposition between the aims of the poet and those of the philosopher. Clearly, the relation could not be considered in modern terms until sci. itself assumed its present forms.

There is general agreement that modern sci. emerged during the 17th c., when the rival claims of sci. and poetry (truth and fiction, method and imagination) were first examined in ways that would sound familiar to a reader of Matthew Arnold's "Literature and Sci." or I. A. Richards' Sci. and Poetry.

Comments on sci. and poetry have in every period of history ranged far beyond the limits suggested by the phrase "sci. vs. poetry." An adequate treatment of the subject must approach it from two directions—historical and analytical. But because of the philosophic nature of the problem, attitudes and positions overlap, so that they cannot always be confined within given categories and under fixed rubrics. Both approaches must recognize that comments on sci. and poetry are related to larger assumptions about the place of each in the scheme of human knowledge.

The Aristotelian approach was to lead to considerations of a rapprochement between sci. and poetry. This was to be effected through an interplay of disciplines in a widening conception of the nature of poetry on the one hand and of knowledge or sci. on the other. Neoplatonists from Plotinus to the romantic period felt that art was an avenue to absolute truth and that it was therefore one of the highest of the sciences. And where poetry was related to divine inspiration and revelation, it was free of any opposition to sci.

The "system of the sciences" derived from Aristotle was passed on to the high Middle Ages in a tripartite division of the theoretical, the rational, and the practical categories, all "scientific" in the sense that they were concerned with truth. The question of poetry vs. sci. did not arise. There was a swerving between the idea that poetry was only a secondary rhetoric and as such was deficient in knowledge, and the notion that the absorption of sci. in poetry made the latter a worthy vehicle of all knowledge. When it was considered as a "theoretical sci.," poetry became a method of discovering ultimate truth, as well as a vehicle for philosophy (as in Lucretius).

The chief concern from the 17th c. down to our present day has been the mind's tilting with a pervasive dualism which would keep poetry and sci. apart as two antithetic activities of mental operation. Entrenched in the argument for dualism is a vulgar or crude empiricism. In one form or another, it is the basis of most discussions involving the relation of poetry and sci. For Kant, the fountainhead of idealism, there was no opposition between art and sci.; though they are different modes of intellection, they are both implicated in the contemplation of phenomena. "A rose is a rose is a rose" is as valid a statement as "A rose is a plant." Sci. and poetry are distinguished in that the scientist refers the phenomenon to a law "explaining" it (the fall of an apple—the law of gravitation), whereas the poet and his reader—once the phenomenon has been expressed in significant form—appreciate it for its own sake as a unique experience. Thus, in the light of recent testimony by both scientists and poets, the neo-Kantian tendency to associate sci. with abstraction and poetry with particularity is an oversimplification.

Historically, our problem takes us, in the classical period, from Plato for whom the poet was impractical and remote from truth to Aristotle who looked upon art as a force complementary to nature and upon poetry as capable of reducing contraries to harmonious form and in this respect contributing to knowledge. From the Plotinian affinity between subject and object and the Augustinian opposition to dualism we move to a nexus between sense (poetry) and truth. For Scholasticism, poetry was a secondary rhetoric, and the true scientia was beyond reason. During the Renaissance, the so-called Dante quarrel turned upon the merits of his linking in his poetic work ethics, philosophy, and sci. The tension between the desire for knowledge and the urgency of the expression of feeling made itself felt in the Renaissance, one of whose chief preoccupations was sci. Elizabethan psychology and astronomy certainly are fundamental to the poetry of the period. The metaphor of the circle, inherited from the Greeks, appealed to the 17th-c. imagination largely because it symbolized a "unified sensibility" which resulted when thought and feeling were brought together. Paradise Lost registers the "tension between the inner and the outer life of man." The 18th c. that gave rise to the concept of man as a machine (La Mettrie) was rife with divisiveness between the claims of reason (sci.) and desire (imagination, poetry). With the romantic movement, we enter a period when, in spite of dissident voices (like that of Peacock), poetic genius was conceived of as having the power to encompass scientific insight as well as intuitive penetration. Yet it is true that much of romantic theory turned on the disparity between imaginative and scientific perception. Coleridge, whose potency is felt in present-day criticism, was for a conjunction of poetry and sci., because he held, as Hegel did, that man's highest faculty included both the emotional and rational elements. Even the 19th-c. positivist Buckle argued that there was an organic relationship between poetry and sciences "simply because the emotions are a part of the mind." In the latter part of the century, Matthew Arnold reiterated the plea for wholeness.

Analytically, we find in current viewpoints

a continued tension between the claims of poetry and sci. as well as an effort to relate them in a theory of cognition. Man among his machines has still not been emptied of desire and idealism. To save himself from fragmentation, he resorts, in both sci. and poetry, to transformism and symbolism. In his effort to "musicalize" his experiences, man reasserts a "poetic monism" suggested by Kant and Schelling and entertained by Coleridge. Granted a difference in aims between the scientist and the poet, the true scientist, who is also a philosopher (like Poincaré, Heisenberg et al.), will turn from mere pointer readings to pregnant experience which also engages the poet. The scientist will join the poet on the way to a new sensibility; for already sci. itself has furnished both with new psychic experience and, at least, with intimations of a new cognition. Poetry and sci., through symbolist abstraction, become two complementary symbol systems that, with the dissolution of the old realist faith in objects, illumine and correct the perceptual world. Nonetheless, since the time of I. A. Richards' Sci. and Poetry (1926), critics have continued to envisage the poetry-sci. problem in a bipolar manner, saying that the language of the one is referential and that of the other emotive. The whole problem has received further critical consideration in the framework of poetry as knowledge. Tate adduces Richards' testimony that Coleridge's claims for a poetic order of truth were not coherent. If Coleridge is found wanting in his attempt to unify poetry and sci., Richards is far from offering a final solution, and (according to Tate) modern semiotic or logical positivism implies an ultimate assimilation of poetry and sci. in a strict instrumentalism. In Vivas' view, the poet, wrenching form from nature and creating novelty, brings a new sense of reality and thus may be said to contribute knowledge. Though it is not a knowledge "of which we may demand correspondence with the actual world," it is, by the fact that it is constitutive of culture, prior to all knowledge. L. D. Lerner, who oscillates critically between "literature is knowledge" and "literature is not knowledge," finds Richards' differentiation between referential and emotive language rigid and even false. Perhaps (he suggests) we ought to regard language as a continuum between the poles of mathematics and dream.

II. HISTORICAL ASPECTS. The history of the emergence of self-consciousness in man is still lost in obscurity. However, with the progressive development of his analytic powers, he began to differentiate between forms of thought and forms of feeling, between reason and emotion. In time, sci. came to be associated with the one and poetry with the other; and this in spite of the fact that often no hard and fast line could be drawn between the two, since sci. could inspire certain emotions (as the sense of vastness in astronomy) and poetry could be reflective as well as lyrical.

1. Classical and medieval. In classical antiquity, this divisiveness comes to the fore explicitly in Plato. Favoring mathematical thought, his view of reality put poetry on the defensive as something that is at best an imitation of reality and, at worst, a distortion of it. There is at present no satisfactory treatment of the relationship between poetry and sci. in Plato's thought. The dominant assumption of his philosophy is that branches of human knowledge are to be ranked according to their contribution to man's ethical and political welfare. Since poetry is impractical and, at least apparently, indifferent to truth, it is trivial and even pernicious. Sci., on the other hand, though less important than ethics, is directly concerned with truth and is therefore of great value. A subdominant strain in Plato, inherited from primitive tradition and the Pythagoreans, and evident in the Timaeus and the Symposium, assumes that the highest good is the perception of absolute truth which is most perfectly manifested in the harmony of numbers. The ideal scientist is the mathematician. Since his tool is measure, Plato's theory of knowledge is loaded in favor of sci. This view seems to be supported by the image of God as a Geometer (see Theaetetus, 143b).

With Aristotle, Plato's pupil, the situation is considerably different. The author of the Poetics, it must be kept in mind, is also the author of the Physics as well as the Metaphysics. There are indications that he wished the first of these works to be interpreted in the light of the others. Thus, while he was engaged in constituting a morphology of bone structure in terms of homology and, as an empiricist, was opposed to Plato's other-worldliness, he was at the same time concerned with ideal types which "must surpass the reality," with form and essence, and with the concept of the whole which surpasses its parts. All these ideas come into play in his Poetics, often as echoes from the Physics and Metaphysics. In his elements of tragic structure—"matter," "medium" and "manner," which may also be taken as the elements of poetry as such—we have the essential operanda of his Physics and Metaphysics. Implicit in these elements are form, which inheres in anything as one of its causes; the dynamic principle of change in a given direction; and oneness or unity, which embraces a heterogeneity of interacting parts. The principle of imitation finds expression in his Meteorology and in the Physics. There art is conceived as a force which helps nature to attain its goal; or, if nature is found wanting, art finishes the job, so to speak, by imitating the parts. Thus art or poetry helps nature realize its fullest potential. In addition, poetry imitates the harmony that, in nature, arises from contraries: it does so for the soul by reducing the clashes of passion to harmonious form. Thus we find poetry and sci. converging on a common goal: the stabilization of the soul.

The affinity that Plotinus envisioned between subject and object would suggest, at least to the modern student, the common delight that poetry and sci. share when they bring objects into harmony with the senses and so engage the whole nature of man. St. Augustine, who was opposed to dualism as a form of evil, embraced the Plotinian monism and conceived of an "ascent from rhythm in sense to the immortal rhythm which is truth" which would (to our way of thinking) engage poetry and sci. in a common partnership of beate contemplari or delighted contemplation.

Only obliquely can the problem of poetry and sci. be approached in Albertus or in St. Thomas: in the former through the notion of the splendor of form and in both (as in a good many of the theologians of their period) through what has later come to be known as the aesthetic of light (claritas, splendor, lux, etc.) [see Wimsatt and Brooks, 128]. For Scholasticism, a true relation between poetry and sci. could be thinkable only if the two were conceived as engaged together in the common enterprise of capturing and expressing the resplendentia formae in nature and thus flooding man's mind with that fulgor which is revealed understanding. In general, however, poetry was regarded as "a secondary rhetoric" or as a propaedeutic to logic. Poetic knowledge, deficient in truth, had to resort to metaphoric evasion. As for sci., the true scientia was above reason.

Contrary to the views just expressed, both poetry and sci. (imagination and reason) were, for Dante, in the service of revelation. Renaissance scholars credited him with encyclopedic knowledge in the arts and the sciences as well. His treatment of natural things reflected that knowledge in its "modo poetico." Those who questioned the right of Empedocles and Lucretius to the title of poet readily assented to Dante's merit in this respect because of his use of persona and figurative language. There were those, however, like Ridolfo Castravilla, who denied Dante's preeminence as poet, because they held that the arts and sciences were not acceptable subjects of poetry. Contrariwise, Vincenzo Borghini found the Divina Commedia great poetry precisely because it makes use of all the sciences in the service of the poem. The so-called Dante quarrel turned on this issue and oscillated between deroga-tion and adulation: those who held that the introduction of learned matter interfered with the rendition of a "legitimate and well-understood imitation" and those who found a most worthy "concatenation" of elements in the poet's work because in the persona of the philosopher he linked successfully ethics, philosophy, and sci. (see Weinberg, pp. 823-94, passim). It is in this historic light that one can understand Chaucer's artistic use of sci. in the development of his characters.

2. Renaissance. With the Renaissance, we enter a period in which (as Bernard Weinberg authoritatively indicates) the study of any subject of necessity entailed consideration of its place in the entire framework of the arts and sciences and particularly of its relation to philosophy. Accordingly, poetics had to justify itself in relation to truth, and poetry was considered among the discursive sciences. Some writers on poetry (e.g., Giovanni Battista Pigna and Gabriele Zinano) saw the poet as one who "participates in every science" and poetry as a universal sci. encompassing all the others; and some (e.g., Benedetto Varchi), considering poetry as the greatest of all human activities, assigned to poetics a position more exalted "than all the other faculties, arts and sciences" (Weinberg, pp. 1-9, passim). Scipione Ammirato held that the poet's divine furor itself constitutes a kind of knowledge—one, in the long run, superior to that obtained through sci. Among Platonists there were those who, through their own researches, came to conclusions opposed to Plato, because of the testimony of the ancients that the first contributions to civilization were made by the poets and that as a result "poetry became the first of the arts and the sciences and mother of all the rest" (Weinberg, p. 296). But the signal event in the history of literary criticism in the It. Renaissance, we are told, was the discovery of Aristotle's Poetics. Its interpreters were engaged with the problem of imitation in its various aspects. Thus Lionardo Salviati, in his Poetica d'Aristotile parafrasta e commentata, is concerned with the fact that (1) poetry is an imitation of verisimilar objects; (2) it is an imitation in verse; (3) its ends are to profit and please. By comparing poetry with nature, a causal relationship is seen between objects, senses, and pleasure in nature; whereas in poetry, the causal chain (Weinberg, p. 614) is objects-appearances-imitation-senses (pleasure). Since the ideal of necessary order and catenation found in nature is wanting in poetry, the poet has to resort to verisimilitude—the resemblances whereby he produces the world of reality (see Tasso, Delle differenze poetiche, ca. 1585; Weinberg, p. 630). For Scaliger, the poet (Virgil) is nature, since what is represented in it only imperfectly by objects is given perfection in his poetry (Weinberg, p. 747).

Even the Renaissance was on the defensive with regard to the uses of the imagination. The type of orthodox humanist represented by Peletier was torn between the desire for knowledge (sci.) and the compulsion for the expression of feeling in poetry. Yet sci. was one of the chief preoccupations of 16th-c. poetic humanism. Ronsard's irrepressible pessimism is, at least in part, the expression of the tension between the claims of sci. and technology (for which he evinced great enthusiasm) and the mandate for the expression of feeling in poetry. For Maurice Scève (see his three songs of the Microcosme), poetry, consisting of "numbers," carries intimations of celestial numbers which rule the universe. In general, certain syntagmic structures bring into focus the sci.-poetry polarity: the Platonist-astrologic synthesis of Peletier, the astrologic-demonic synthesis of Ronsard, the microcosm synthesis of Scève. The search for order in the welter of Renaissance thought becomes, in one of its aspects, the quest for a literary form worthy of presenting the dignity of the human mind.

Closely allied to Ronsardian pessimism is Renaissance "star-crossed" melancholy born of a psychology of humors compounded with an astronomy of omens. Somehow, this weird combination was supposed to foster "intellectual and imaginative powers." The poetry-sci. tension also encouraged a certain type of solitude which was at once a response to, and an alienation from, "the infected world." In Milton's Il Penseroso we find an historical adumbration of the romantic poet over his "lamp at midnight hour" in "some high lonely tower." Milton looks toward William Butler Yeats; and Burton, writing his Anatomy of Melancholy as "an antidote out of that which was the prime cause of my disease," looks toward a galaxy of Freudian introspectivists.

3. 17th and 18th c. The 17th c. poses an historical paradox in that it is at once committed to order on a cosmic scale and to divisiveness on the psychological plane; matter and mind, extension and thought. This situation gives rise to a new sensibility and a complex vision. The intellectual climate, it is claimed, became inimical to poetry. A legend was promulgated that Descartes had cut the throat of poetry. Yet with Henry More, a great admirer of Descartes, there was a motion to transcend the divisiveness of matter and mind by claiming extension for spirit. In such a tendency, the confrontation of poetry and sci. in a possible theory of cognition was inevitable. By mutual fructification, they form jointly a scientia intuitiva. The subjection of "the shows of things to the desires of the mind" (Bacon) need not mean that the mind remains unaware of the difference between appearance and reality.

Try as he might, man could not escape the use of analogy in his attempt to articulate his experience of the world as a system. Thus (to follow Marjorie Nicolson), while we think of our universe in similes, the Elizabethans thought of theirs in metaphors; and the 17th c. inherited the metaphor of the circle (itself of ancient origin). In their desire for unity, poets and philosophers had tried for 300 years to put together the pieces of a circle; they tried to do so in the interest of preserving a "unified sensibility" of feeling and thinking. Miss Nicolson's succinct statement summarizes the situation: "The language of poetry and science was no longer one when the world was no longer one." The decisive break in the so-called Circle of Perfection came with the shift from the Gr. view that the world was permeated with mind to the Cartesian that the world is a lifeless machine. Thinking and feeling had ceased to be parts of the same process. This is expressed by Donne:

And New Philosophy calls all in doubt,
The element of fire is quite put out:
The sun is lost, and the earth, and no man's wit
Can well direct him where to look for it.

The Circle of Perfection was disturbed by the persistence of the idea of infinity. Because the "human understanding is unquiet," as Bacon tells us, the vast spaces engaged not only the reason of Pascal but his emotions as well. In him we find the clue for the study of the infinite as an aesthetic entity: a study of the mutual fructification of poetic feeling and mathematical expression. It is not that we find here the genesis of romanticism but an indication of its perpetuity. Conversely, Paradise Lost, the greatest poem of the 17th c., attempts to confront the sci. of its age, particularly in its cosmology, and to reiterate the traditional affirmations. It is filled with the "tension between the inner and the outer life of man" (Svendsen), but its sci. is not so much an incursion from without as it is an invitation from within. Whatever Milton's limitations, his attempt places him in the great tradition of poetry that uses sci. to find an order in which feeling and thought are harmoniously orchestrated, from Lucretius to Goethe; from Rabelais to Pascal; from Chaucer to Donne and Shelley. And it was always more than a question of versifying sci. or of making poetry "scientific."

As we turn to the 18th c., we go from an aesthetic of vastness to one of light in which

(again we are instructed by Nicolson) poetry and sci. had mutual commerce. Burke's essay on the Sublime and Beautiful (ca. 1757) bears witness to this; for here the scientific facts of light and color are brought into alignment with the poetic response which in turn communicates the scientific facts in depth. But privations of light, in that they are terrible, are productive of Vacuity, Darkness, Solitude, and Silence, according to Burke. We are back in the Pascalian vastness. When we compound "A Newton's genius" with "a Milton's flame," we have plenitude indeed. One must not overlook, however, the pervasive impression that the poets of the 18th c. were divided between the claims of reason and those of desire, between the intellect and the imagination as often opposed to each other. In 18th-c. discussions of the relation of poetry to sci. and other forms of discourse, poetry (according to Abrams) was considered truth ornamented with certain devices, while the bare representation of truth was non-poetry. Newton himself thought with Barrow that poetry was "a kind of ingenious nonsense."

With the movement of the 18th c. toward the Fr. Revolution, poetry had to sustain itself against rising odds. In view of this, André Chénier (1762-94), for instance, recommended a new content for poetry, namely modern sci. His own attempt may be found in his poem Hermès. With Wordsworth's idea of poetry as a "science of feelings," we move in the same direction as Alexander Baumgarten's conception of aesthetics as the "science of sensuous cognition" (see Wellek).

In any consideration of the relation of poetry to sci., Blake is a seminal figure. As Miss Nicolson remarked on the basis of the poet's marginalia: ". . . [The] aesthetics which came to a climax in Burke was to Blake a corollary of the metaphysics supposedly engendered by Newton." In a lengthy passage cited by her from the Annotations, Blake declares himself against both the sci. and metaphysics of Burke. Urizen wept as he beheld the philosophy of five senses—the product of "the terrible race of Los and Enitharmon"—put "into the hands of Newton and Locke" (The Song of Los). Blake's rejection of sci. was but an extreme form of the general trend, from the end of the 18th c., toward a monism embracing man and nature.

4. 19th c. Pope's declaration that "all are parts of one stupendous whole" was accepted by Shelley as his "favorite theory." Prometheus expresses the mystical union of man and nature and identifies the energies of life and love with that of electricity (see Grabo). Significantly, Whitehead makes much of Shelley's power to visualize geometric facts and give them poetic expression. Of course, the Promethean myth itself, as used by Shelley, allegorizes man's conflict with the forces of nature and his attempt to master them.

For Keats, the "innate universality" of a Shakespeare seemed to suggest that poetic genius had the power to encompass all scientific insight. Yet in Lamia, he indicted sci. memorably: "Philosophy will clip an Angel's wings . . . Unweave a rainbow." For Abrams, Keats exemplifies "a romantic tendency to shift the debate about the discrepancy between science and poetry from the question of poetic myth and fable to the difference between the visible universe of concrete imaginative observation and that of scientific analysis and explanation." Thus, Peacock (Four Ages of Poetry) maintains that poetry arouses emotion at the expense of truth, and that as such it is a waste of time. And Macaulay, in the main, agrees with him. He can find no way of uniting "the incompatible advantage of reality" and "the exquisite enjoyment of fiction." Poe's sonnet To Science echoes phrases from Lamia. In fact, almost all the important romantic theorists comment on the disparity between imaginative and scientific perception and deplore the neglect of the former.

Working from the idea that the highest faculty includes both the emotional and rational elements, Coleridge urged the conjunction of poetry and sci. This conjunction is further suggested by Hegel's idea of thought becoming incandescent by its own acceleration and "philosophy in its last synthesis showing itself to be poetry"; and by Mill's declaration that "every great poet has been a great thinker." Another aspect of this thought is reflected in the romantic Emersonian notion that the mind itself is involved in a universal metaphor, a Universal Analogy, according to which the natural world is the reproduction of the spiritual world, and that it is the business of poetic genius to interpret this analogy (see Baym's "Baudelaire and Shakespeare," The Shakespeare Assoc. Bull., 15, nos. 3 and 4 [1940]). Sci., therefore, joins poetry in a magnificent harmony of universal knowledge. Hence hymns to intellectual beauty and the equation of beauty with truth.

Between 1800 and 1850, the romantic poets in France and elsewhere had before them a rich array of scientists (see Ampère, Essai sur la philosophie des sciences). Though Fusil maintains that romanticism, contrary to the 18th c., had momentarily broken the chains of sci., we find Lamartine singing a lyrical obligatory to the astronomy of Tycho Brahe, Kepler, Herschel, and Newton, with man's love and desire written into space (L'Infini des cieux). Vigny sings, though pessimistically,

La distance et le temps sont vaincus! La Science Trace autour de la terre un sentier triste et droit . . .

Hugo's Le Satyre, for which Shelley's Prometheus is suggested as a source, celebrates evolution and universal progress. In spite of many ineptitudes and exaggerations, the romantic poets prepared the way for the finer and more profitable coalescence of poetry and sci. in the literature that was to follow in the second half of the 19th c. and the first half of the 20th.

August Comte's great insight was the idea that all knowledge had a progressive historical character. But his big error consisted in his attempt to impose upon knowledge, nevertheless, a rigid pattern from which he himself, having undergone a "méditation exceptionnelle," had to recoil. It is a curious fact that, in the midst of the progress of positivism in England, Buckle pointed to an organic relationship between poetry and sci. His central idea was that in abrogating any portion of the mind's activities, one impoverished and even injured another. The operations of the imagination (and the emotions associated with it) were central to the total activity of the mind. For historical support of his idea, Buckle turned to 17th-c. England, rich in scientific discoveries as well as in poetry. Seeing in this a causal relationship, he warned the physical scientists of his own day, who were inclined "to separate philosophy from poetry, and to look upon them, not only as indifferent, but as hostile," that they might be taking too narrow a view of the functions of the human mind and of "the manner in which truth is obtained." Pretty much in the spirit of Spinoza before him and of Freud after, he maintained that the emotions, too, obeyed fixed laws and that "they [had] their logic and method of reference." Poetry, he concluded, was "a part of philosophy [or sci.], simply because the emotions are a part of the mind." Like Shelley in his Defense, Buckle held that vast masses of observations were useless unless they were connected with a presiding idea and that "the most effective way of turning them to account would be to give more scope to the imagination" and to incorporate the spirit of poetry with the spirit of science" (Hist. Civil. in Engl., 2d ed., II [1901] 395-99).

If the influence of Erasmus Darwin is felt among the poets of the first half of the 19th c., that of Charles Darwin is powerful after the publication of the Origin of Species. Lionel Stevenson has studied that impact on such poets as Tennyson, Robert Browning, George Meredith, Thomas Hardy, and others. Implicit in the response of Meredith and Hardy to evolution is the unconscious desire to resolve the tension which the Ego experiences in the Chain of Being. Meredith's response took the form of poetic irony which found beneficence in the drama of development from mud to mind. Hardy's reaction assumed the form of a tragic catharsis which comes from a stark confrontation with an immanent, blind will pervading the endless variety of things in a process called nature. Both Meredith and Hardy herald a growing awareness in modern sensibility of the fragmentation of knowledge which (as Bonamy Dobrée says) "We all deplore while we all so busily further it." This situation is poignantly expressed by Anthony Woodhouse in Song at Twilight:

We must go on from here

The bridge behind is down

The Canyon-crack of knowing Divides us now from Spring . . .

In a sense, the whole problem of the poetry-sci. relationship is expressed in these words: how to fill in "the canyon-crack of knowing." The shadow of Pascal is with us again.

The great plea for relating poetry and sci.—though he admitted ignorance as to the manner of bringing it about—came in Matthew Arnold's "Literature and Sci." Echoing Wolf, he maintained that "a genuine humanism is scientific." He argued that there was a general tendency in human nature to relate poetry and sci. in obedience to an emotional need for wholeness or completeness, reflected in human conduct. The effecting of such a relationship is further called for by the dire need for recapturing an antique symmetry (symmetria prisca) once possessed by the Greeks—"fit details strictly combined, in view of a large general result nobly conceived."

Conversely, the great spokesman for the antithesis between poetry and sci. in the 19th c. is Nietzsche. Already in The Birth of Tragedy (1872) Nietzsche maintained that the malaise of contemporary culture stems from the rise of the analytic intellect, typified by Socrates and (in poetic art) Euripides. To escape the sterility of the analytic world view, man must rediscover the Dionysian elements of life which Nietzsche felt at an early stage in his career were exemplified in Wagner. If "the canyon-crack of knowing" divides us from "Spring," the way to return is to destroy the "knowing"—an idea which recurs in D. H. Lawrence and others.

III. PRESENT VIEWPOINTS. The age-old question of "reality" inevitably and recurrently comes to plague poet and scientist alike. In retrospect, the 19th-c. division between analysis and synthesis appears an over-simplification. Today the correlativity of the two has come to be recognized. Newton did not expel God from nature; nor Darwin from life; nor Freud from the soul. The act of transcendence which produced the concept of God also impelled man to proceed into the bowels of the earth and the vastness of the heavens, as well as into the awesome domain of the mind. At each stage of his quest he experienced the shock of discovery whose correlative came to be known as the aesthetic shiver (frisson esthétique). In each instance, poetry and reality became one, like water and shore—a reciprocal action expressed by the Abbé Delille:

Du mobile océan tels les flots onduleux
Vont façonner leurs bords, ou sont moulés par eux.

1. Transformism and symbolism. It is at least debatable whether the world of the actual—the average man's "higgledy-piggledy" world—remains the same when touched by the visions of the poet and the scientist. Transformism is the order of both. Both tend to de-phlegmatize inert matter, to infuse it with energy; and, in doing so, to raise it to a higher potential, of which music is the type and mathematics the notation. Thus the aspirations of scientists and artists converge in musicality—a purity of representation which leaves the senses behind on the way to form. This is represented by symbolism, with Valéry as its later representative. But the so-called "quest for a pure representation" may be traced from Novalis to Rilke and Valéry.

With the intermittent death of idealism after Hegel, not only philosophy but poetry as well was at the mercy of sci. which now presided over reality. To redeem this atmosphere symbolism brought a new enthusiasm. Man, isolated among his machines, falls back on his desire. The orientation is an idealistic one. Paul Fort and Whitman sang of a cosmic unanimism: "La terre et le soleil en moi sont en cadence, et toute la nature est entrée dans mon coeur" (La grande ivresse). The elements themselves—"air, soil, water, fire—those are words. / I myself am a word with them" (A Song of the Rolling Earth). And "The words of true poems are the tuft and final applause of science" (Song of the Answerer).

2. Toward a poetic monism. Here we have the mutual salute of intelligence and sensibility with which our contemporary philosophers of art and literature are concerned. Herbert Read has struggled with the possible rapprochement of the two in the forms of sci. and poetry—the one said to be discursive, the other "more exactly, a mode of symbolic communication." For him, intelligence would unite poetry and sci. In the last analysis, Read asserts a "poetic monism" which was first suggested by the Critique of Judgement and was then more firmly outlined by Schelling and held many attractions for Coleridge. This effort toward a poetic monism was made not without certain misgivings which plagued Coleridge and still agitate all thinking men (see Read's The True Voice of Feeling).

The appetite for unity or monism manifests itself especially in the study of origins as a clue to common tendencies. Only a conception which would still relate poetry to magic would regard it (poetry) as totally apart from sci. C. Day Lewis feels that as physical scientists have moved during the last half century toward the study of the micro-event, they have been brought nearer to the poets. That the imaginative leap is necessary to scientist and poet alike, is attested by men like Poincaré, Bronowski, and Keuklé. All languages (even mathematics as Scott Buchanan emphasizes when he says, "Almost every term [in analytic geometry] is a metaphorical expression for a proportion" [p. 118]) have recourse to metaphor. Indeed, for Lewis sci. is a kind of poetry; and so it is for many others. Sherrington (quoted by Lewis) points to the ghostliness of mind in its indivisibility and intangibility, and asks the question which he answers himself: "What then does that amount to? All that counts in life, Desire, zest, truth, love, knowledge, 'values.'"

3. Toward a new sensibility. While for the present the aims of the scientist, in Herbert Dingle's view, are different from those of the poet, there will come a time when the scientist will "pass beyond the inspid observations of pointer readings and find something to say about the pregnant experiences that have been the poet's concern from the beginning." In essence, what is implicit in Dingle's remark is that a progressive philosophy of sci., whether it succeeds in reconciling the poet to the scientist or not, will give pause to both to see experience in its rich variety. This is attested to by the names of Leonardo da Vinci, Pascal, Goethe, and Valéry.

One of the chief problems entailed in the sci.-poetry relationship is the total sensibility of the observer and the observed. Experimental sci. too often fails to elicit the answers we should so much like to have to this question. Heinrich Henel ("Goethe and Sci." in Sci. and Literature) calls our attention to the fact that Goethe's remark that nature falls silent when put on the rack by experimental sci., has recently been corroborated by Heisenberg. Of course, even his disciples held that Goethe was neither a scientist nor a philosopher. Goethe himself conceived of a sci. of ideas which would "give poetic form to reality rather than to realize the so-called poetic, the merely fanciful." This purpose, according to Henel, was common to his poetry and his studies of nature. Goethe's approach to the art-nature relationship is based on a paradox according to which the law-giving artist (gesetzgebende Künstler) strives for artistic truth which obeys a lawless, blind impulse; that is, the realism of nature bears the imprint of his own laws. For Goethe, then, the poet and the scientist often remain apart while they have much in common. For a German poet of a century later, Rainer Maria Rilke, sci. could be the best and the worst of things. He is almost overwhelmed by the opposition of poetry (imagination) to sci., and especially technology. For him, this constitutes an element of disharmony and disequilibrium (see "Rainer Maria Rilke et la Science Moderne" by Adrien de Cléry in Sci. and Literature).

4. The psyche and cognition. The advance of sci. has furnished the poet with new psychic experience. We may assume with William Rose that the roots of the creative imagination reach into the unconscious. This is, of course, supported by Freud. But error lurks on both sides: the literary analyst dare not neglect the unconscious, if he is to reach the heart of the matter he deals with; the psychoanalyst who leaves out of account the conscious striving for form will come to grips with the work of art only partially. The student of literature and the anthropologist should have a common field of research. But turning to Freud's essay on "The Relation of the Poet to Day-Dreaming," we find him saying that poets themselves give no satisfactory explanation of the power their art has to move others. Clearly, the full possibility of a satisfactory rapprochement between scientist and poet waits upon the perfection of a deeper sci. of cognition than we now possess. Such a sci. would go beyond Freud in the exploration of phantasy and of the rôle of language as its vehicle. Yet the investigator of the poetry-sci. tension has much to learn from recent psychoanalytic work in metaphor, for instance, which is one of the great essentials of poetry. For Ella Freeman Sharpe, "the intellectual life of man is only possible through the development of metaphor (see Baym, "The Present State of the Study of Metaphor," BA, 35 [1961]). In metaphoric language idea and affect hurtle each other and interfuse. The metaphysical becomes a transmutation of the physical.

5. Abstraction in poetry and sci. We come now to the question of abstraction in sci. and poetry, whereby the imagination conjures up a world independent of common sense. Some recent thinkers (for instance, E. R. Briggs) find that in studying the impact of sci. upon the concept of the imagination, they must go back to Descartes. For him, imagination is the ability to form images precisely and to carry to the brain the imprint of external objects received through the senses. Though he normally uses the term pejoratively, he tends, nevertheless, to invest the 'imagination' with a vague status, higher than that of matter but lower than that of spirit, when he implicitly abandons his dream of a purely deductive method requiring only reason. Briggs finds a much keener approach in Baudelaire's suggestion that the function of the imagination is to detect relationships between things,—"correspondences." Every image tends to suggest relationship. In pointing to the ultra-sensitive, analogical intelligence of the artist, Baudelaire (Briggs thinks) has gone beyond Descartes.

For abstract sci., theoretical concepts displace the idea of a solid world of sight and touch. We are in the world of relativity and quantum mechanics. The old realist faith in objects with qualities is replaced by faith in images and symbolisms that incorporate sensibility in the thing seen or heard. Poetry and sci. become two complementary symbol systems that illumine nature and correct the perceptual world. As Ronald Peacock puts it ("Abstraction and Reality in Modern Sci.," in Sci. and Literature), "the point of reference of symbolic systems, including the perceptual, must lie not in one or the other separately but in their equilibrium. Sci., art, poetry, and the study of language all attempt a constant adjustment of thought in the search for this equilibrium." Thus, symbolist abstraction in Valéry, for example, reveals itself as a vehicle for "sensibility." Frost will speak of himself as a "sensibilist" even if he might object to the label "symbolist poet." Rilke will see in the poetic process an attempt to replace a chaotic outside ("ideal") world by an ordered inside world of symbols.

6. Poetry and knowledge. In any thorough investigation, then, of the relation of poetry and sci., there inevitably arises the general problem of poetry as knowledge. This problem is dealt with in varying degrees of analytic insight by Allen Tate, Eliseo Vivas, and Laurence D. Lerner, among others. The first (Limits of Poetry, 1948) brings into his discussion Coleridge, Matthew Arnold, I. A. Richards, and logical positivism in the person of Charles W. Morris. Arnold gave the case for poetry away to the real scientist who demands a one-to-one relevance of language to the objects and events to which it refers. The positivists have replaced "meaning" by a concept of "operational validity" which dispenses with cognition and "mind." While the word poetry appears frequently in Morris' two articles on aesthetics ("Esthetics and the Theory of Signs," J. of Unified Sci., 8 [1939]; "Sci., Art & Technology," KR, 1 [1939]), there is no actual analysis. Tate regrets, of a passage or even a line of verse. Morris' sci. of semiotic implies an ultimate assimilation of poetry and knowledge (sci.) in obedience to a rigorous instrumentalism. Tate goes back to Coleridge and his definition of poetry: "A poem is that species of composition, which is opposed to works of science, by proposing for its immediate object pleasure, not truth. . . ." Coleridge's failure "to get out of the dilemma of Intellect-or-Feeling," says Tate, "has been passed on to us as a fatal legacy." Tate adduces I. A. Richards' testimony (Coleridge on the Imagination) that Coleridge's claims for a poetic order of truth were not coherent. For logical positivism, the knowledge or truth of poetry is immature; and for modern psychology, pleasure is a response to a stimulus. Poetry has come under the general idea of "operational validity." Tate defers to Richards who will not accept the notion that language is a "mere signaling system." "It is the instrument of all our distinctively human development, of everything in which we go beyond the animals." Tate considers Coleridge on the Imagination the most ambitious attempt of a modern critic to force into unity the long-standing antithesis of language and subject, of pleasure and truth. In the chapter "The Wind Harp" two doctrines are expressed: (1) The poet's mind, with an insight into reality, reads nature as a symbol of something behind or within nature not ordinarily perceived. (2) The mind of the poet creates a nature into which he projects his own feelings and aspirations. At this point, Tate finds a confusion, especially in the light of positivism which would eliminate both "mind" and cognition. By following the positivist road, we lose "everything in which we go beyond the animals." By embracing the second doctrine, we have a knowing mind without anything that it can know. Tate finds that Richards' conception of the imagination (quite different from Coleridge's) closely resembles a Hegelian synthesis. Richards' two doctrines are neither consequences of a priori decisions, nor verifiable as the empirical statements of sci. are verifiable. He certainly does not offer a final solution of the problem of the unified imagination, but he asserts: "It is the privilege of poetry to preserve us from mistaking our notions either for things or for ourselves. Poetry is the completest mode of utterance" (Coleridge on the Imagination, 163). Here Tate adds: "[The] completeness of Hamlet is not of the experimental order, but of the experienced order." Correlative with all this is Richards' insight that myths are "hard realities in projection. The opposite and discordant qualities in things in them acquire a form. . . . Without his mythologies man is only a cruel animal, without a soul . . . a congeries of possibilities without order or aim." Tate comments: "Man, without his mythologies, is an interpretant." We have "the failure of the modern mind to understand poetry on the assumptions underlying the demi-religion of positivism."

According to the second critic, Eliseo Vivas, the artist or poet is one who "wrenches form from the heart of nature" (Creation and Discovery, 1955). Vivas differentiates his view from that of Aristotle (catharsis), that of Suzanne Langer (presentational symbol), and that of Wimsatt (icon), by what he (Vivas) calls the facts of intransitivity and creativity. The first is an assertion of novelty, which is the equivalent of the creation of new knowledge. The second maintains that the artist creates form and so a new sense of reality where before there was a blurred and cliché-cluttered reality (p. 120). Through his originality, the artist captivates the reader's mind by creating within him a state of "ecstasy" and thus supplies him with "something very similar to what we experience when we acquire knowledge." As a subscriber to Bergson's dictum that art reveals the reality of things, one would expect Vivas to equate poetry and sci. in their common effort toward that goal. But he adds the qualifying phrase "superior reality" and explains that the reality symbolized by a work of art is "superior not to the reality of the work of physics, but to the alleged reality of our physical world, that is, of the cliché-cluttered, hastily grasped, by-passion-blurred world in which we daily live" (p. 120). It is difficult to distinguish the cognitive from the aesthetic mode of experience. The artist refurbishes our world picture in concrete terms and by presenting the dramatic pattern of human life defines for us its sense. He gives us an aesthetically ordered picture. In a broad sense, literature (a product of the mind) does give us "knowledge" which has "undeniable similarities with the symbolic constructions of knowledge in the narrow sense." In the latter sense literature or poetry does not give us knowledge "since it does not give us a picture of which we may demand correspondence with the actual world." But, urges Vivas, it ought to be recognized that literature "is prior in the order of logic to all knowledge, since it is constitutive of culture, which is one of the conditions of knowledge" (p. 127).

The third critic, L. D. Lerner (The Truest Poetry: An Essay on the Question What is Literature? 1960) devotes one section of his work to the assertion that literature (for him the poet is one who is engaged in any form of imaginative writing) is knowledge and another section to the negation of this statement. Lerner goes back to Shelley's statement that poetic language "remarks the before unapprehended relations of things." This would seem to argue that the poet—at any rate, the great poet—gives us original knowledge (see Vivas' theory of intransitivity). No wholly cognitive theory is by itself satisfactory for the future of poetry. Even in the realm of ideas, intellectual susceptibility is promoted by cathexis. (Lerner quotes Freud's "Introductory Lecture," 18 and 27 to this effect.) The romantic movement contributed the notable insight that no subject is as important as the growth of the poet's sensibility. Hence Lerner links The Prelude of Wordsworth with Proust's A la Recherche du Temps Perdu as "poems" that deal with two faculties that have a great deal in common, namely, memory and poetic power. The chief motive for writing poetry is relief: emotion pressing for expression in words. While Lerner credits Collingwood (The Principles of Art, Bk. 2: "The Theory of Imagination") with placing an idealist and rationalist philosophical approach in the service of the romantic view of art, he is aware that we owe the expression theory to Wordsworth's declaration that poetry is the "spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings" and that "it takes its origin from emotion recollected in tranquility" (pp. 39, 56). To this is related the furor poeticus, whose history stretches from Plato through the Renaissance. Lerner confronts, in all honesty, the contrary winds of opinion concerning the relative functions of poetry as knowledge. Wordsworth had thought about the cognitive status of poetry and reflected on

Those sweet counsels between head and heart Whence grew that genuine knowledge fraught with peace

(Lerner, p. 140; The Prelude 353)

At the same time the poet inveighed against "Our meddling intellect" which "Mis-shapes the forms of things: / We murder to dissect." Our critic finds Richards' differentiation between referential and emotive language rigid and to that extent false. It should prove surprising to Richards, on his own theory, that "almost all the illuminating criticism before this century, and a great deal since, has been written by poets" (p. 129). This raises the question as to whether, instead of classifying language into two kinds, we ought not to regard it as a continuum between the poles of mathematics and dream (ibid.). Lerner takes issue with Valéry's anti-intellectual intellectualism which would reserve the very existence of poetry for those who hold the correct theories of its nature: "it exists (says Lerner) for those who can appreciate it" (p. 181). In the end, our critic's position, with respect to the question Is literature (poetry) knowledge?, is a conservative one. He does say (p. 219) that literature cannot have the same cognitive function as sci. In conclusion, one may quote his words: "In the end, there are two types of literary theory, and two types of literature. One is constantly tugging literature in the direction of music [compare Valéry's idea of "musicalization" of experience], because music seems the type of pure creation. The other tugs literature toward ordinary human activity—and essentially toward speech. There has been the threat that if literature clings too obstinately to its cognitive function, it may die out before the advancing sciences of man" (p. 221).

CONCLUSION. In 1889 Charles Morice wrote: "One asks how science and art will effect that large understanding on which the future counts. Pascal, Balzac, Edgar Allan Poe, and Villiers de l'Isle Adam know the answer: 'Art will touch science with its foot to gain assurance' of a solid foundation and will with one swoop cross over it on the wings of Intuition.'" This is, of course, a statement born of an enthusiastic wish. Poetry constantly makes the error, from a scientific point of view, of attributing to nature or the universe something of man's own nature. Once called the pathetic fallacy, it has also come to be known as metaphysical pathos. Poetry has always lived on this anthropomorphism. The so-called universal analogy stems from it. But, even granting this error, what poetry does is to declare that there is a relationship between a subject and an object, between a sensorium and that which is sensed. Without such a relationship no knowledge would be possible. The so-called error of poetry turns out to be a necessity analogous to the necessity of hypothesis in sci. In a Freudian age, we must recognize the "deep unconscious processes in the creative act" and such a recognition, as Jerome Bruner remarks, will go far "toward enriching our understanding of the kinship between the artist, the humanist, and the man of science."

It is not without significance for our problem that the world-renowned physicist Louis de Broglie was asked to write a preface to Paul Valéry's Cahiers. Faced with the question of what could have led the great poet to his prolonged studies in the field of sci., de Broglie answered: "What actually complemented in a unique manner Paul Valéry's qualities of imagination and poetic sensibility was a great love of general ideas, a constant tendency towards precision in images and terms, a finesse d'esprit at times reaching subtlety. Thus, he could find in the development of modern science all that suited his mind: the clarity of concepts and words, the suddenly discovered vast intellectual horizons, the fine subtlety of theories which, revealing lapses of logic, unforeseen properties of forms and numbers, the relativity of time and space and the uncertainties of the atomic world, have opened for human thought strange new perspectives. And Paul Valéry, poet with a penetrating insight, knew how to envision, behind the dryness of experimental facts and the coldness of logarithms and theories, this triumphant conquest of the unknown, this ascendant march toward the splendor of the True, which constitutes the value and the poetry of Science." The image of the mind reflected in its own mirror, so patent in Valéry's poetry and poetics (as Elizabeth Sewall has so brilliantly shown) indicates the poet's struggle—and the struggle of many artists and scientists—to get rid of a dualism such as the poetry-sci. division presents.

But the debate continues. In a symposium on sci. and poetry held at Yale in 1961 (see Rev. of Metaphysics, 15 [1961] 236-55), in which scientists and humanists participated, it was suggested that the semantic problem involved in the cultural schism between the arts and the sciences could be cleared up with a little aesthetic cultivation on the one hand and more vigorous education on the other. At the same time it was said that whereas the poet uses the self instrumentally to test his intuitions of existence, the scientist finds that instrument inadequate in probing the secrets of the cosmos. It was admitted, however, that "the arrogance of the scientist comes in thinking his the only discipline. . . ." A common ground was found in the use of metaphor by both sci. and poetry. A geologist suggested that "there is a continuous series running from pure poetic metaphor (perhaps the haiku would be an example), in which the meaning is almost entirely dependent on a resonance with human awareness, to the pure symbolic analogue (say a mathematical formulation of the phase rule), in which the meaning is entirely contained within the terms as formally defined" (p. 242). Ultimately (and paradoxically), the scientist's analogues "become his means of grasping experience. They become resonant with his personal response and begin to function poetically as his metaphors." We are advised by a scientist to "have no illusions that the scientist is set apart from other men by the pure, objective quality of his mind" (p. 244). The scientific jargon itself may be a defense against poetry creeping in." Matt Walton (whose words have been quoted above) sums the matter up thus: "We are inescapably concerned with two genuinely different ways of grasping reality, poetically as a function of human response, scientifically as something independent and subsuming the human response." He adds that both senses of reality, functioning in some degree in everybody, are necessary for a full awareness of the meaning of existence (p. 246). In the over-all picture, the tension between poetry and sci. translates the tensions of both poets and scientists in confrontation with an elusive reality.

A. A. Fusil, La Poésie scientifique de 1750 à nos jours (1918); S. Freud, "The Relation of the Poet to Day-Dreaming," Collected Papers, iv (1924); A. N. Whitehead, Sci. and the Modern World (1925); W. C. Curry, Chaucer and the Mediaeval Sciences (1926); I. A. Richards, Sci. and Poetry (1926); S. Buchanan, Poetry and Mathematics (1929, repr. 1962); C. H. Grabo, A Newton Among Poets (1930); L. Stevenson, Darwin Among the Poets (1932); B. Willey, The 17th C. Background (1934); J. W. Beach, The Concept of Nature in 19th-C. Eng. Poetry (1936); A. O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being (1936); F. R. Johnson, Astronomical Thought in Renaissance England (1937); H. V. Routh, Towards the 20th C. (1937); A.-M. Schmidt, La Poésie scientifique en France au 16^e s. (1938); D. C. Allen, The Star-Crossed Renaissance (1941); A. Gode-von Aesch, Natural Science in German Romanticism (1941); H. J. Muller, Sci. and Crit. (1943); F. J. Hoffman, Freudianism and the Lit. Mind (1945, 2d ed., 1957); M. H. Nicolson, Newton Demands the Muse (1946), The Breaking of the Circle (1950, rev. 1962), and Sci. and Imagination (1956); D. Bush, Sci. and Eng. Poetry (1950); N. H. Pearson, "The Am. Poet in Relation to Sci.," The Am. Writer and the European Tradition (1950); H. H. Waggoner, The Heel of Elohim: Sci. and Values in Modern Am. Poetry (1950); L. Babb, The Elizabethan Malady (1951); H. Read, The True Voice of Feeling (1953); Abrams; B. Dobrée, "Scientism I, II," chaps. 3, 4 in The Broken Cistern (1954); J. Z. Fullmer, "Contemporary Sci. and the Poets," Science, 119 (1954); replies and rejoinder, Science, 120 (1954); A. R. Hall, The Scientific Revolution, 1500-1800 (1954); Sci. and Lit.; Wellek; M. I. Baym, "On the Relationship between Poetry and Sci.," Yearbook of Comparative Lit., 5 (1956); J. Bronowski, Sci. and Human Values (1956); K. Svendsen, Milton and Sci. (1956); C. D. Lewis, The Poet's Way of Knowledge (1957); Wimsatt and Brooks; E. Sewall, The Orphic Voice: Poetry and Natural Hist. (1960); P. Ginestier, Poet and the Machine, tr. M. B. Friedman (1961); 17th C. Sci. and the Arts, ed. H. H. Rhys (1961); A. Huxley, Lit. and Sci. (1963). M.I.B.

SCOLION. An early type of Gr. lyric poetry, a sort of after-dinner or drinking song. The exact origin of the term is difficult to trace and its etymology cannot be established with certainty. Tradition ascribes its origin to Terpander who was the first to give it artistic form. Its stanzas were composed of 2 phalaeacians or hendecasyllabics (q.v.), a colon of the form ~~~~~, and another with ~~~~~ repeated. The s. was sung by choruses accompanied by the lyre or the flute and dealt with historical events or expressed deep personal feeling and shrewd and trenchant comments on daily life. In the course of the 5th c. this type of poetry was considerably simplified. Often the scolia were pure extemporized pieces, excerpts from lyric poetry or even selections from Homer's poems.—R. Reitzenstein, Epigramm und Skolion (1893); Smyth; Schmid and Stählin. P.S.C.

SCOP. An OE name, like "gleeman," with which it is interchangeably used, for the professional entertainer, a harpist and poet-singer, normally a member of a royal household, who was the shaper and conservator in England of Old Germanic poetic tradition. He was of an old and honored class, sharing with his audience a critical interest in his craft; he commanded a mastery of the complex oral-formulaic materials of Old Germanic prosody (q.v.) hardly comprehensible to lettered societies. His repertory included more than encomiastic court verse: he was also a folk historian; and his narrative celebrations of heroic boldness and sacrifice, mingled with lyrical reflection and secular or Christian morality, have been preserved in later written forms as a central part of the Anglo-Saxon poetical corpus. There are no extant full-length biographies of OE scop, as there are of some of the Icelandic court poets, for instance; but a fictional biography in verse of one Widsith, together with a quasi-autobiographical lyric by a certain Deor, afford glimpses of the bard's social status and of some of his professional techniques. It is likely, however, that the transmission of verse depended less upon the personality and talent of an individual scop than upon the formulaic materials with which he worked, the cooperative appreciation of his audience, and their common familiarity with traditional themes. It is sometimes hard to distinguish between the art of popular and courtly poetry, between the art of a court gleeman and that perhaps of a chieftain who might take up the harp and recite a lay himself; or that of a warrior-singer whose function as a singer would be incidental to his personal knowledge of a battle; or even that of an humble person like Cædmon (Cædman), described in Bede's Historia Ecclesiastica (A.D. 721), who had no training as a singer, but who nevertheless developed the art of narrative verse on Christian themes in what must have been, technically, a thoroughly traditional manner.—L. F. Anderson, The Anglo-Saxon Scop (1903); R. W. Chambers, Widsith (1912); K. Malone, Deor (1933, 1962); Widsith (1936); D. Whitelock, The Audience of Beowulf (1951); F. P. Magoun, Jr., "Bede's Story of Cædman: The Case Hist. of an Anglo-Saxon Oral Singer," Speculum, 30 (1955). J.B.B.

SCOTTISH CHAUCERIANS

SCOTTISH CHAUCERIANS. A name applied to a group of Sc. poets of the 15th and 16th c., whose work, although the freshest and most original Eng. poetry of the period, shows a common indebtedness to the example of Chaucer. The most important Sc. Chaucerians were King James I of Scotland, Robert Henryson, William Dunbar, Gavin Douglas, and Sir David Lindsay, and of these Henryson and Dunbar were poets of major importance. Henryson is remembered for Robene and Makyne, a superb pastoral, and for The Testament of Cresseid, a profound and moving elaboration and continuation of Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde. Dunbar, a poet of wider range, wrote elaborate occasional verse, biting satires, and such memorable short poems as his famous elegiac Lament for the Makaris. In formal terms, the Sc. Chaucerians continued the vogue of the 7-line stanza introduced into Eng. poetry by Chaucer. Indeed, it has been said by some prosodists (though denied by others) that its name of "rhyme royal" (q.v.) derives from the use of this stanza by James I in his poem The Kingis Quair.—G. Gregory Smith, "The Sc. Chaucerians," CHEL, II (1949); C. S. Lewis, Eng. Lit. in the 16th C., Excluding Drama (1954).

SCOTTISH GAELIC POETRY. The origins of Scot. Gael. poetry are naturally identical with those of Ir. This identity is preserved in classical or "bardic" poetry, which continued to be written without significant regional variation in both countries—up to the 17th c. in Ireland, the 18th in Scotland, which held the status of a cultural province vis-à-vis the mother country. This fact, as well as destruction of manuscripts, has to be considered when noting the comparative rarity of poems of Scot. provenance or authorship. Nevertheless, there are examples of poems connected with Scotland extant from as early as the 11th or 12th c. Identity is constituted by the same literary dialect; the same expression of "heroic" values; the same metrical forms (although Gael. is a stressed language, classical poetry, based on late L. verse, observes regularity of syllable grouping rather than stress); the same rigorous and almost incredibly complex rules of ornamentation. Not all poems of course conform to this austere standard. Ogláchas or "prentice-work," which utilizes an easier, modified technique, is fairly common whether written by members of the hereditary caste of learned men who had undergone the arduous training of the bardic schools or by members of the aristocracy who had not, but who knew the literary language and possessed a facility for composing diletante or occasional verse. All these features of style and authorship are admirably displayed in the earliest and principal compilation of classical verse to have survived in Scotland, viz. the Book of the Dean of Lismore (ca. 1512–26). It also provides a fair sample of the range and variety of the themes of bardic verse: encomia of court poets for their patrons, satire, religious poetry, "ballads" of Fionn and Oisear, etc. (formally the Gael. "ballad," in this context, belongs with the rest of bardic poetry), a sprinkling of moral and didactic verse, and a few love poems in the amour courtois tradition. These limited examples serve to remind us of the relative paucity of that genre in classical poetry until the notion of courtly love, introduced with the Anglo-Norman invasion of Ireland, became rooted in Gael. tradition. The excellence of bardic verse lies in the highly developed language employed, with its sophisticated and allusive style, and, above all, in the elaborate and subtly modulated music of its intricate metrical patterns. Its limitations are in fact inherent neither in subject matter nor technique but derive rather from a formality of approach inseparable from the conventions of the professional poet's office, that of public panegyrist to the great men of his society.

The classical poets were by definition literate; their counterparts, the vernacular poets, on the whole were not; and with some exceptions their work has been recovered from oral tradition by 18th-c. and later collectors. But too much can be made of this disjunction. Syllabic versification did not die out with the professional poets nor, in the stressed meters, do we at once find a poetry of totally different content or thought. Stressed poetry exists in a multiplicity of forms, the most interesting, because restricted to Scotland, being the so-called strophic meter (minimally, two lines each of two stresses, followed by a triple-stressed line—but extensions and elaborations occur). The two great early practitioners of this type of verse whose work has survived, Mairi Nighean Alasdair Ruaidh (ca. 1615–1707) and Iain Lom (ca. 1620–1710) are not innovators. Although the latter is exercised by national issues, both are clan poets, still in the panegyric tradition, and both have clearly the security of established practice behind them—stretching back perhaps to a point anterior to the introduction of Latin learning and the syllabic meters. The rhetoric of their verse at its best has a splendidly affirmative quality.

Syllabic verse persisted in Scotland both in written and orally composed vernacular poetry. The anthology known as the Fernaig MS, compiled between 1688 and 1693, contains distinctive examples of poems (religious, political, elegiac etc.) that help to point the steps in the development from classical to vernacular syllabic meters, while oral poetry displaying substantial vestiges of syllabic meter is being composed at the present day. In this connection one must note the significance of the great collections from MSS and oral recitation of vernacular Fionn and Oisean ballads. These collections were mostly made after the publication of James MacPherson's Ossian (1760), which was ultimately based on the ballads.

Of obscure origin but almost certainly indigenous is the corpus of oral songs sung in single lines or couplets followed by meaningless and sometimes highly elaborate refrains. Again restricted to Scotland and composed largely by women, these songs contain some of the most vivid and arresting poetry in Gael. Often it has a strong pagan tone. Possibly from the 17th c., which appears to be the heyday of the tradition, comes the Lament for Seathan, which concludes thus:

A Sheathain, mo ghile-gréine, Och dha m'aindeoin ghlac an t-eug thu,
'S dh'fhàg sìod mise dubhach deurach
'S iargain ghointeach orm ad dhéidh-sa;
'S masa fìor na their na cléirich
Gu bheil Irinn 's gu bheil Nèamh ann,
Mo chuid-sa Nèamh, di-beath an éig e,
Air son oidhche mar ris an eudail,
Mar ri Sheathain donn mo chéile.

O Seathan, my brightness of the sun!
Alas! despite me death has seized thee,
And that has left me sad and tearful,
Lamenting bitterly that thou art gone;
And if all the clerics say is true,
That there is a Hell and a Heaven,
My share of Heaven—it is my welcome to death—

For a night with my darling,
With my spouse, brown-haired Seathan.

In the 18th c. a fresh dimension was added to the scope and expressiveness of poetry by Alexander MacDonald (1700–1770), the fervid nationalist and poet of the “Forty-Five,” and by Duncan Bàn Macintyre (1724–1812), the hunter-poet. A highly literate man—he was formally educated at Glasgow University—drawing on all the resources of Gael., MacDonald is the outstanding figure of his age. The resonant verse of John MacCodrum (1693–1779) seems more of the 17th c. by comparison, but the controlled, detailed naturalism of Macintyre's Praise of Ben Dorain embodies a movement away from clan poetry. These two were completely oral poets, as was Rob Donn (1714–78), the best satirist in vernacular Gael. The poetry of William Ross (1762–90) manifests a wider sensibility, which certainly owes something to his learning in Eng. and in the classical languages. Ross's tender, anguished love poems merit a special place in the history of Gael. literature.

The nadir of Gael. verse falls in the 19th c. when the breakup of Gael. society, due to Eng. intrusion and forced emigration, partially destroyed the Gael. spirit. Moreover, a good deal of published work is the product of urbanized Gaels influenced by romanticism and other alien conventions. Yet an appreciable body of vigorous oral poetry was composed, in which the verse of Mary MacPherson of Skye (1821–98) is notable.

Gael. poetry throughout its history has suffered from being largely excluded from external influences. The importance of this is underlined by pointing out that it has been almost totally unaffected by the Renaissance. Less important, but equally significant, is the fact that (with perhaps some minor exceptions) all Gael. poetry appears to have been sung or chanted. But partly because it is mainly an oral poetry, and partly too because verse and not prose has always been the prime literary medium of Gael., a strong, supple, rich language has been evolved, capable of expressing immense diversity in form and mood.

In our own time it has been triumphantly recharged by Somhairle Maclean (b. 1911) in Dàin do Eimhir (1943) the publication of which marks a revolution in Gael. writing. Like George Campbell Hay (b. 1915), whose verse rehabilitates the subtle movement of the older syllabic meters, Maclean writes with an intense private awareness of international problems of the 20th c. Of younger poets Derick Thomson (b. 1922) and Iain Crichton Smith (b. 1928) are the most significant. With these writers Gael. poetry, without compromising its intrinsic virtues, suddenly has become “modern.”

ANTHOLOGIES: Ortha nan Gaidheal: Carmina Gadelica, ed. A. Carmichael (5 v., 1928–54; with parallel tr.); Highland Songs of the Forty-Five, ed. J. L. Campbell (1933); Scot. Verse from the Book of the Dean of Lismore, ed. W. J. Watson (1937); Heroic Poetry from the Book of the Dean of Lismore, ed. N. Ross (1939); Bardachd Ghàidhlig: Specimens of Gael. Poetry 1550–1900, ed. W. J. Watson (3d ed., 1959; contains useful bibliog. of printed and manuscript sources).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: D. Maclean, The Lit. of the Scot. Gael (1912); M. Maclean, The Lit. of the Highlands (2d ed., 1925) and The Lit. of the Celts (2d ed., 1926); N. MacNeill, The Lit. of the Highlanders (2d ed., 1929); D. Young, “A Note on Scot. Gael. Poetry,” Scot. Poetry: A Critical Survey, ed. J. Kinsley (1955); K. Wittig, “The Scot. Gael. Trad.,” The Scot. Tradition in Lit. (1958).

J. MACI.

SCOTTISH POETRY. A brief description of Scot. poetry can be most clearly indicated with-the year 1603 in mind. That year took Queen Elizabeth from the English; it also took James VI from his throne in Auld Reekie to sit as James I in Whitehall. The departure of James signified the end of Scotland's identity as a kingdom and the loss of her individual culture. It also closed the first volume of Scot. poetry.

Long before 1603 a Scot. tongue had developed slowly from Northumbrian Eng. to the point where it was regarded as literary. As early as the 13th c. poets like Rhymer and Huchowne had left their names linked with metrical romances, ballads, and songs. And out of those beginnings three figures had emerged to fix in verse-history the national pride of the Scots: John Barbour, author of The Bruce; Andrew of Wyntoun, author of a rhymed chronicle; and Blind Harry, author of The Wallace. Barbour (ca. 1357), first and foremost of these poet-chroniclers, is remembered by Scotland today chiefly because he remembered the men of the Scot. War of Independence as heroes and patriots in such lines as "and certes, thai suld weill hawe prys / That in thair tyme war wycht and wise, / And led their lyff in gret trawail, / And oft, in hard stour of bataill, / Wan eycht gret price off chewalry, / And was woxydyt off cowardy."

In the 15th c., when Blind Harry composed his eleven books of heroic couplets on Wallace, James I of Scotland, the reputed poet of The Kingis Quair, was living out his 18 years of imprisonment in England. Knowledge of Chaucer and Gower gained through these years spread in Scotland upon James's return and became an important stimulus for Scotland's richest body of poetry.

This Renaissance poetry was the work of the Scot. Chaucerians or makars—Henryson, Douglas, and Dunbar—who, like James, held Chaucer and his Eng. imitators as their "maisteris dear." The makars borrowed from Chaucer as he had borrowed from the best in medieval poetry; of such, for example, was their use of the rhyme-royal stanza (q.v.). More or less on their own, they completed the development of a literary language (Middle Scots) so fully sophisticated and metropolitan that it remained adequate for expressing Scot. culture until Eng. was substituted for that purpose in 1603.

Robert Henryson (1425–1503) opened this memorable period with a retelling of the Troilus and Criseyde story, a number of moral fables after Aesop, and Robene and Makyne, perhaps the earliest pastoral in British poetry. Bishop Gavin Douglas of Dunkeld (1474–1522) followed with the first translation of a classic into Scots (Eneados) in which the prologues, notably that for Book VII, reveal an able poet with the typical Scots poet's eye for the natural scene.

William Dunbar (1463–1535) most severely tested the capabilities of Middle Scots in poems like The Golden Targe (for many his masterpiece), The Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedy, and Ane Ballat of Our Lady. Never long, his poems are often pessimistic, free and brilliant after Horace, forceful, coarse, and sententious. Dunbar employed a variety of metrics (he was the first to write blank verse in the Scots vernacular), a variety of tone—now religious, now violently satiric, now bawdy—and a variety of diction.

The last of the notable figures in this period was Sir David Lyndsay (1490–1557): an early defender of writing for Iok and Thome in the maternal language, the most popular Scots poet before Burns, and the tutor of James V. Lyndsay is known primarily for his Ane Pleasant Satire of the Thrie Estaitis striking out against the corruption of the clergy and nobles.

With the poetry of the makars and anonymous pieces like Rauf Coilyear and The Bewteis of the Fute-ball; with the lyrics of poets like Scott and Montgomerie; and with the manuscript collections of Maitland and Bannatyne, which show lyrics and ballads to be the staples of Scot. poetry, national Scotland approached the year of Elizabeth's death and the subsequent loss of its own court and independent life. This loss and the prolonged dissipation of intellectual efforts in theological speculation and controversy make it impossible to name a Scot. poet of high distinction during the entire 17th c., not excluding William Drummond, who showed with some success what a Scotsman could compose in Eng.

Scotland's great corpus of folk poetry, a major part of what is now known as "the Ballads," coexisted with and even predated the court poetry of the makars. These vivid verse narratives, whether of national history (The Battle of Otterbourn), of legendary local feud or farce (Jock o' the Side; Get up and Bar the Door), or of doomed romance and the supernatural (Edward; Thomas of Ersseldoune), reveal constant techniques of dramatic immediacy and economy. The language, stark and nonliterary except for a few often repeated epithets and "kennings" (q.v.), acquires a dynamic urgency from the relentless beat of the ballad rhythm: "At kirk or market where we meet, / We dare nae mair avow"; or evokes "the abomination of desolation": "Ower his white banes, when they are bare, / The wind sall blaw for evermair"; or freezes us with the shudder of mortality and the unknown: "The cock doth craw, the day doth daw, / The channerin' worm doth chide." In their dramatic intensity, their laconic understatement, and their pervasive undertone of grim humor, the ballads come nearer than almost any other literary form to expressing the elemental values of a rugged people for whom struggle was the basic condition of life.

From 1603 to the present day Scotland has produced a number of excellent poets who chose literary Eng. as their medium because they thought it was impossible to write in Scots and yet write seriously. James Thomson (1700-1748), poet of The Seasons, Robert Blair, Alexander Ross, James Beattie, and John Home used standard Eng. for the works by which they are remembered. Byron and Campbell were Scotsmen, but hardly Scots poets. Sir Walter Scott's long poems are in Eng., so are such later works as James Thomson's (1834-82) The City of Dreadful Night and Stevenson's A Child's Garden of Verses.

Modern Scot. poetry—to be distinguished from that of the makars and of those poets coming after them who wrote principally in Eng.—had rather inauspicious beginnings in the 17th and early 18th c. as literary jokes like Semple's Epitaph of Habbie Simson, Piper of Kilbarchen and Allan Ramsay's burlesque elegy on John Cooper, a kirk treasurer who could smell out a bawd. Because of the vogue of pastoral poetry, Ramsay selected Scots also for his poetic drama The Gentle Shepherd and by so doing increased the growing sentiment that Scots with its rural origin and popular character encouraged a homely directness of approach and was well suited to express simple ideas.

Ramsay, Robert Fergusson, and Robert Burns all were discontented with the lowly state of Scot. verse during their time; yet all three, the only Scotsmen to write significant Scot. poetry in the 18th c., were fully aware that exclusive use of Scots had become the mark of the vulgar. Ramsay's poetry became the principal source of Fergusson's, whose poetry, in turn, became the principal source of Burns's. The types which all three favored were the epistle, ode, elegy, and satire—Ramsay and Burns being interested, moreover, in the song. All three poets relied heavily upon four verse forms: the octosyllabic couplet, the standard "Habbie," the heroic couplet, and the Christ's Kirk stanza. Fergusson and Burns were successful also in the Spenserian stanza, introduced to Scot. poetry by Fergusson.

Such poetry as Fergusson's gave to Burns the example of completely free self-expression in Scots—something unknown to Ramsay. But the poetry of Burns is most easily distinguishable from that of Fergusson by its power of concentrating thought upon theme. Not only such powers as this, but also Burns's wisdom in staying away from standard Eng. or using it sparingly for a particular effect is evident in his best poems. Had The Jolly Beggars served as the anthology piece of Burns instead of The Cotter's Saturday Night, there would be today a truer picture of Burns's poetic genius, for it is here that his characteristic merits of description, narration, dramatic effect, metrical diversity, energy, sensitivity to the beauties inherent in Scots music and language, and keen discernment of country folk are to be appreciated. Hundreds of songs, moreover, show these merits of Burns. No poet—certainly in Great Britain—has left so many memorable ones or so much evidence of masterful skill in uniting words with music! Let a Scotsman sing Come Boat Me O'er, The Banks o' Doon, or Scots Wha Hae and the genius of Robert Burns explains itself. These songs are a contribution to world poetry made by Burns and Scotland. Many of them describe the continuation of the collecting of folk songs and ballads which Ramsay had begun and which Percy, Herd, Ritson, Burns, Scott, Child, and others carried on.

In the 19th and 20th c. there have been very few fish in the sea. Poets have been at work and have produced infrequently a piece or two like Caller Herrin' or The Bush aboon Traquair to turn up in anthologies. Sentimentality and heavy use of the diminutive, as in the popular Cuddle Doon, mark much of their poetry as Scot.

More recently, a group of Scots poets, led by Hugh MacDiarmid (C. M. Grieve), has determined that the practice of vernacular verse shall not involve any surrendering of the poet's cultural dignity or any loss of his intellectual personality. Refusing to accept the 18th-c. limitations of the vernacular, these poets have tackled the problem of having to create a Scots idiom of their own. One answer has been their battle cry "Back to Dunbar!"—that is, back to Dunbar's "literary" stature, his variety of expression, and his richness of vocabulary. How successful contemporary Scot. poets have been in freeing Scots from the cultural bonds of a class and dialect speech forged after 1603 and in using current Scots for the profounder utterances of the spirit may be judged by reading George Campbell Hay's volume Wind on Loch Fyne, William Soutar's poem The Gowk, or MacDiarmid's brief lyric with which we conclude:

The Bonnie Broukit Bairn

Mars is braw in crammasy,
Venus in a green silk gown,
The auld mune shaks her gowden feathers,
Their starry talk's a wheen o' blethers,
Nane for thee a thochtie sparin,
Earth, thou bonnie broukit bairn!
—But greet, an' in your tears ye'll droun
The haill clanjamfrie!

ANTHOLOGIES: Specimens of Middle Scots, ed. G. Smith (1902); The Poets of Ayrshire, ed. J. Macintosh (1910); The Edinburgh Book of Scot. Verse: 1300-1900, ed. W. Dixon (1910); The Northern Muse, ed. J. Buchan (1936); The Golden Treasury of Scot. Poetry, ed. H. MacDiarmid (1941); A Scots Anthol., ed. J. Oliver and J. Smith (1949); Scot. Verse: 1851-1951, ed. D. Young (1952).

BALLADS AND SONGS: Ancient and Modern Scots Songs, ed. D. Herd (1769); The Scots Musical Museum, ed. J. Johnson (6 v., 1786-1803); Bishop Percy's Folio Manuscript, ed. J. Hales and F. Furnivall (3 v., 1867-68); Eng. and Scot. Popular Ballads, ed. F. J. Child (5 v., 1883-98); Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scot. Border, ed. T. Henderson (4 v., 1902); Border Ballads, ed. W. Beattie (1952); The Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads, ed. B. Bronson (1959-).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: G. Douglas, Scot. Poetry (1911); A. Mackenzie, Historical Survey of Scot. Lit. to 1714 (1933); W. Craigie, "The Scot. Alliterative Poems," Proc. of the British Academy (1942); P. Brown, A Short Hist. of Scotland, ed. and rev. by H. Meikle (2d ed., 1951); Scot. Poetry: A Crit. Survey, ed. J. Kinsey (1955); K. Wittig, The Scot. Trad. in Lit. (1958); T. Crawford, Burns: A Study of the Poems and Songs (1960); D. Craig, Scot. Lit. and the Scot. People (1963); see also introd. to anthol. listed above, esp. MacDiarmid's. R.D.T.

SEA SHANTIES (chanteys, chanties). The work songs of sailors aboard square-rigged sailing vessels, as distinct from fo'c's'le songs, the story-songs and lyrics sung by sailors for their off-duty amusement. Shanty singing goes back at least to the days of the Tudor carracks, and one song of that period, Haul on the Bowline, has been preserved. The heyday of the shanty was the clipper era (1830-80). Sh. were not permitted in the Am. or British navies. The purpose of the shanty was partly to keep up morale but primarily to coordinate group labor. Sh. therefore are grouped by the kind of labor they could accompany, since different jobs required different rhythms. The short-haul shanty (Boney, Haul Away, Joe) coordinated a job that could be done with a few hard pulls, such as "sweating up" halyards; halyard sh. accompanied heavy, prolonged jobs, such as hoisting sail. Examples are Blow the Man Down and Hanging Johnny. The capstan shanty (The Fair Maid of Amsterdam, Shenandoah) was for pulling in anchor cable and similar sustained work of moderate difficulty. A shantymen—Irishmen or Negroes were preferred—directed the singing, coming down heavily on the word on which the gang was to heave in concert. The narrative line in sh. is generally incoherent; the songs tended to be compounded of independent stanzas so that they could be curtailed or expanded as the job required.—COLLECTIONS: Sea Songs and Sh., comp. W. B. Whall (1927); Songs of Am. Sailormen, comp. J. C. Colcord (1938); Shantymen and Shantyboys, comp. W. M. Doerflinger (1951); Sh. from the Seven Seas, ed. S. Hugill (1961). A.B.F.

SEGUIDILLA. A Sp. poetic form of popular origin. It probably originated as a dance song and was popular, at least in the underworld, early in the 17th c. In the beginning it was probably a 4-line strophe of alternating long (usually of 7 or 8 syllables) and short (usually of 5 or 6 syllables) lines, the short (even-numbered) lines assonating (called s. simple or s. para cantar). Later, probably, in the 17th c., a second, semi-independent part of 3 lines—short, long, short—was added, the short lines having a new assonance. Eventually the strophe became regularized as a literary form to lines of 7,5,7,5: 5,7,5 (the colon denotes a pause in thought), lines 2 and 4 having one assonance, lines 5 and 7 another (called s. compuesta or s. para bailar) and was often used by the poets of the 18th c. Sometimes the rhythm only has been used in lines of 7-plus-5 syllables as by Rubén Darío in his Elogio de la seguidilla. The s. favors all paroxytonic verses except when hexasyllabic oxytones are substituted for the pentasyllabic lines. The s. is sometimes used to serve as a conclusion (estribillo) to another song.

The s. gitana (Gypsy s.), also called flamenca or playera, is usually a 5-line strophe of successively 6,6,5,6,6 syllables, lines 2 and 5 assonating. Lines 3 and 4 may be written together as one line of from 10 to 12 syllables.—F. Hansen, "La s.," AUC, 125 (1909); F. Rodríguez Marín, La copla (1910); P. Henríquez Ureña, La versificación irregular en la poesía castellana (2d ed., 1933); D. C. Clarke, "The Early s.," HR, 12 (1944); Navarro. D.C.C.

SEMANTICS AND POETRY. The word "semantics," derived from the Gr. semainein, denotes properly "the study of meaning." Although the word was brought into modern use by the publication of Bréal's Essai de Semantique (1897; Eng. tr. 1900), it was employed there in a more limited philological sense than has subsequently been the custom.

Wherever meaning is present (and where it is not present we cannot properly think or speak) there are always two terms involved: that which means, and that which is meant; or the indicator (in the broadest sense) and the meaning. When the meaning is definite enough to be pointed to or otherwise clearly identified, it is also called the referend; when it is too general or too elusive to define exactly, it may be called the reference.

Indicators may be grouped, according to their methods of functioning, into three main classes: natural signs, steno-signs, and symbols. Natural signs are those which indicate a certain referend or referential situation by reason of some actual (usually causal) connection in the real world. In this sense a rapidly clouding sky is a sign of a storm; if it suggests appropriate action, such as running for cover, it is a signal as well. Natural signs are the primitive materials out of which both steno-signs and symbols are developed by different routes.

By a steno-sign is meant an indicator whose meaning has become fixed and definite, whether by gradual habituation or by stipulative agreement, for those who understand the particular language-convention that governs it: e.g., the word "tree" (for those who speak Eng.), the sign + (for those who know arithmetic), and a red traffic light (for motorists and most pedestrians). The third of these steno-signs functions also as a signal, and the second may do so where there is a problem to be solved. Four characteristics of the steno-sign deserve notice. (1) Since the relation of steno-sign to its meaning is governed by convention, the sign and the meaning tend to be quite distinct. The word "tree" is replaceable by the word "Baum" or "arbre" without semantic loss when the linguistic context is changed to German or French; there is no more of the character of tree attached to any one of these words than to the others. Nor is there any character of plusness in the sign +. (2) The relation of steno-sign to its meaning is properly univocal. In a given context it should have only one meaning, or, if more than one, these should be so distinguishable that they could be represented by distinct symbols if the occasion should require. Moreover, this meaning should be definite, and for the course of a given argument or given science, invariant. (3) The referend of any steno-sign is characterized by either of two kinds of mental (often preconscious) integration: logical universality, established by definition based on definite similarities or analogies, and existential particularity, established by space-time continuities. These two familiar modes of meaning are what Santayana has called concretions in discourse and concretions in existence; the one is normally expressed by common names ("man"), the other by proper names or particularized common names ("John," "the man I met yesterday"). (4) Steno-signs lend themselves to the making of steno-statements, or propositions. It is characteristic of a proposition, in this logical sense, that it should be internally coherent (not self-contradictory) and that its truth be a function of the potential evidence on which it rests.

The obvious utilitarian value of steno-signs has given rise to a type of semantics which takes the operations of such signs, on whatever level of abstraction, as coextensive with semantic functioning in general; consequently treating all other modes of semantic functioning, particularly those found in religion and in poetry, as either variations or violations of these. For brevity of reference this type of theory may be described as steno-semantics. The usual way of interpreting poetry from the standpoint of steno-semantics is to deny that it functions semantically at all—that is, in its proper character as poetry—and to emphasize rather its psychic effects. This reemphasis (termed "the affective fallacy" [q.v.] by Beardsley and Wimsatt) is exemplified in Morris' statement that poetry is "an example of discourse which is appraisive-valuative" and that "its primary aim is to cause the interpreter to accord to what is signified the preferential place in his behavior signified by the appraisors." Similarly I. A. Richards, in his earlier writings, distinguishes between the "statements" of science and the "pseudo-statements" which are typical of poetry; defining a pseudo-statement as one whose validity is entirely subjective—"entirely governed by its effects upon our feelings and attitudes."

The third type of indicator, supremely important for poetry and such related disciplines as religion and mythology, is the expressive symbol, or depth symbol. The qualifying adjectives are designed to distinguish this use of the word "symbol," justified by a long popular and literary tradition, from its technical use in logic and mathematics, where, in terms of our present definitions, it is taken as a specially abstract type of steno-sign. The steno-sign and the depth symbol represent two complementary and interpenetrating uses of language, which are the outgrowth, by and large, of two complementary semantic needs—to designate clearly as a means to efficient and assured communication, and to express with maximum fullness. The role of a depth symbol is thus to evoke richness and suggestiveness of meaning, usually at some sacrifice of conventional and utilitarian exactness: e.g., the Cross to a believing Christian, the ominous contrasting connotations of the blood and darkness imagery in Macbeth, the mythic Father and Mother archetypes associated respectively with the powers of sky and earth. It is evident that the more interesting and important semantic problems of poetry have to do with its employment of, and shifting relations to, depth symbols. As distinguished from steno-semantics, which undertakes to interpret the meanings of poetry according to the rigid laws of steno-signs, the method of a poeto-semantics must be to examine the actual character and semantic action of depth symbols in a variety of particular poems and to construct a theory of meaning that does something like adequate justice to these. As opposed to the four characteristics of steno-signs above noted, the characteristics of the depth symbol, or poeto-symbol, in its most typical manifestations, may be set down as follows.

1. The depth symbol, although pointing to a meaning beyond itself, is to some extent participative in that meaning. The Cross, the holy image, and the liturgical act have received into themselves, through the associative power of long tradition, much of the religious character which properly belongs to the transcendental reality which is their meaning and justification. In poetry and the arts the participative nature of the symbols employed shows itself in the artist's and the beholder's love for the medium itself. Not only what is said but the way of saying it counts; where the double condition is lacking, art falls into mere abstractionism and experimentalism on the one hand, or into either allegory or propaganda on the other.

2. As distinguished from the univocality of the steno-sign, the depth symbol tends to be plurisignative; which is to say, its intended meanings are likely to be more or less multiple, yet so fused as to produce an integral meaning which radically transcends the sum of the ingredient meanings, and hence which defies any adequate analysis into monosignative components. In this latter respect real plurisignation differs from simple punning or wit-writing. The power of the Cross for a Christian resides semantically in its double meaning of sacrificial death and resurrected life, both as represented archetypally in the Christ and as constituting the ultimate vocation of each believer. Lady Macbeth's reply, "And when goes hence?" to her husband's announcement of King Duncan's forthcoming visit is more than a pun, for the innuendo carries an air of ominous foreboding that is functionally related to the movement of the drama. Empson's use of the term "ambiguity" generally refers to the plurisignative character of poetic language; his word is inappropriate, however, since ambiguity implies an "either-or" relation, plurisignation a "both-and."

3. One mode of plurisignation is of such importance as to require separate treatment—namely, the archetypal character which resides perhaps implicitly and somewhat darkly, in many a depth symbol. An archetypal meaning is present wherever the transient image and the particular idea are permeated and enriched by suggestions of something more universal and perduring. Such archetypes as the Divine Father, the Earth Mother, new life growing out of death, the bread of life and the wine of the spirit, angels of light and demons of darkness, have powers of emotional and cognitive association which enable a poet, by deftly evoking them, to give an added referential dimension to his discourse. (See ARCHETYPE, MYTH). The archetypal character of the true symbol should not be confused with allegory, where the particular has status merely as an instance and example of the universal. Archetypal symbolism, by contrast, is what Hegel and more recently Wimsatt have called "concrete universality" and what Goethe has called "a living-moment disclosure of the inscrutable."

4. Whereas the steno-sign is, in principle at least, strictly invariant throughout a given discourse, the depth symbol, involving as it does some fusion of multiple meanings, tends to exhibit some degree of contextual variation—that is, to be semantically influenced and freshened by each particular context, even though there will also be a relatively persistent core of meaning which unites or relates the various semantic occasions together.

5. Poetic expression, striving more after semantic fullness than after logical exactitude, is hospitable to meanings which do not have definite outlines and which cannot be adequately represented by terms that are strictly defined. This property may be called, by photographic analogy, soft focus. Logical exactitude can be attained only by the systematic neglect of all the overtones of meaning and allusion that do not fit into the stipulated definition. But these overtones are the very life of the depth symbol, and while a poet controls them as well as he can, it would be unrealistic to suppose that they can ever be exactly the same for different readers. "Poetry is implication, don't try to turn it into explication," Robert Frost warns his readers. But T. S. Eliot's counter-warning should also be heeded, that "the suggestiveness is the aura around a bright clear centre, that you cannot have the aura alone."

6. As opposed to the third characteristic of the steno-sign, depth symbols tend to represent other concretions of meaning than those two stereotyped ones, existential particularity (the individual thing) and logical universality (the class concept). The one represents our common ways of identifying things in the public world, the other represents our common ways of grouping qualities and functions under class-concepts in order to draw logical inferences about them. But the role of the poet is not simply to repeat identifications and generalizations that have already been made. "The sole excuse which a man can have for writing," said Remy de Gourmont, "is to unveil for others the sort of world which mirrors itself in his individual glass." To express that individual world will always require to some degree what Coleridge has called the "balance or reconciliation of discordant qualities." There will be realignments of meaning, "produced by bringing into relation without explicit comparison two distant realities whose relations the mind alone has seized" (Paul Reverdy). The linguistic device by which this is achieved Allen Tate calls "fused metaphor"—that is to say, not metaphor in Aristotle's, Quintilian's, and the grammarians' sense of an abbreviated simile, but rather, according to Herbert Read's definition, as "the synthesis of several units of observation into one commanding image" and as "the expression of a complex idea, not by analysis, nor by direct statement, but by a sudden perception of an objective relation."

7. As distinguished from the fourth property of steno-signs, the depth symbol enters into the making not of logical propositions, but of depth statements. As shown by Wheelwright (The Burning Fountain, chap. 13), the difference between a depth statement and a pure proposition is not only a result of the six forementioned differences between depth symbols and steno-signs, but consists also in this, that whereas the meaning of a pure proposition is strictly declarative, the declarative element in a depth statement is fused with one or more of the four other modes of sentence-formation: the interrogative, exclamatory, hortatory, and acquiescent. As a consequence, paradox is a frequent property of depth statements. They can be paradoxical because of the softening effect of the nondeclarative elements in them, and they are likely to be paradoxical to some degree or other by reason of the tension of conflicting meanings struggling for quasi-assertion. Paradoxes in poetry may be either rhetorical or metaphysical. The former type may be an affair purely of surface, as in the conventional oxymoron of Romeo's "O heavy lightness! serious vanity!" Or it may result from an assertion made overtly and a counter-assertion implicit in the imagery or in the context. The metaphysical type of paradox is found in such a line as Eliot's "So the darkness shall be light, and the stillness the dancing"—where the paradoxical language is aimed at expressing a truth that transcends the area of ordinary experience, and where such transcendence is expressed symbolically by a flouting of the conventional laws of contradiction.

S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817; chaps. 13, 14); J. M. Murry, The Problem of Style (1922) and "Metaphor," in Countries of the Mind (2d ser., 1931); I. A. Richards, Science and Poetry (1926); Coleridge on Imagination (1934); Philos. of Rhetoric (1936); Speculative Instruments (1955; secs. 2, 3); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (1928); G. Rylands, Words and Poetry (1928); W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930); Some Versions of Pastoral (1935); The Structure of Complex Words (1951); J. Sparrow, Sense and Poetry (1934); E. M. W. Tillyard, Poetry Direct and Oblique (1934; rev. ed. 1945); A. Tate, "Tension in Poetry" (1938; repr. in On the Limits of Poetry, 1948); K. Britton, Communication (1939); W. M. Urban, Language and Reality (1939); K. Burke, "Semantic and Poetic Meaning," in The Philos. of Lit. Form (1941); S. K. Langer, Philos. in a New Key (1942) and Feeling and Form (1953); T. C. Pollock, The Nature of Lit. (1942); J. Hoppers, Meaning and Truth in the Arts (1946); C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947); M. Foss, Symbol and Metaphor in Human Experience (1949); S. K. Coffman, Imagism (1951); R. McKeon, "Semantics, Science, and Poetry," MP, 49 (1952); P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1954) and Metaphor and Reality (1962); Wimsatt. P.W.

SENARIUS (L. "of 6 each"). The Roman equivalent of the Gr. iambic trimeter. Whereas the latter name recognizes the division of this meter into 3 pairs of feet or dipodies, each ending in an iambus (or its equivalent tribrach in the first or second dipody), the senarius of early Roman drama ignored Gr. dipodic structure and admitted spondees in the second and fourth feet (but not in lieu of the pure iambus of the sixth foot). In the first 5 feet there are frequent resolutions of long syllables and the fifth foot is rarely an iambus. Later Roman poets, with the exception of Phaedrus, wrote trimeters rather than senarii.—W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); Crusius. R.J.G.

SENHAL. A fanciful name ("My Magnet," "Tristan," "Good Hope") used in Old Prov. poems to address ladies, patrons, or friends. A few of the persons so addressed have been identified with some certainty, but for the most part they remain either completely unknown or the objects of more or less probable conjectures. F.M.C.

SENRYŪ. See JAPANESE POETRY.

SENSIBILITY first became prominent as a literary term in the mid-18th c., with the meaning "susceptibility to tender feelings." It links the (possibly undesirable) quality of feeling sorry for oneself and conscious of one's own woes, with a morally praiseworthy quality—susceptibility to the sorrows of others—and an aesthetically praiseworthy quality, responsiveness to beauty. This complex of qualities is naturally popular in the age of Sterne, Goldsmith, and Cowper. The Man of Feeling (there is a novel of this title by Mackenzie) represents much of what the later 18th c. admired:

he is the opposite of the Stoic (the cult of sensibility sometimes involved a conscious rejection of Stoicism) and an obvious anticipation of the romantics.

Perhaps the first important use of "s." in this way comes in a passage from the periodical The Prompter in 1735: the writer is defending that Humanity which "is not satisfy'd with good-Natured Actions alone, but feels the Misery of others with inward Pain. It is then deservedly nam'd Sensibility." The term seems to become popular in the 1760's, and there are a good number of odes to s. from then on; Goldsmith's Deserted Village was no doubt thought of as a poem not lacking in s., and the youth at the end of Gray's Elegy who "gave to Mis'ry all he had, a tear," is a Man of Feeling. The famous lines from Cowper's Task:

I would not enter on my list of friends
(Though grac'd with polish'd manners and fine sense, Yet wanting sensibility) the man,

Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm suggest that its opposite is not only insensibility but also (he goes on to use the word) cruelty.

Several other favorite terms of the period overlap with "s.": especially "delicacy" and "sentimentality." "Delicacy" perhaps differs in stressing fineness rather than intensity of feeling, though it is often used as a synonym; while to distinguish "sentimentality" from "s." is even more difficult, perhaps impossible.

The concept of s. is probably most familiar today from the attacks made on it, by Dr. Johnson and (especially) Jane Austen. Sense and Sensibility is the most famous of these; less profound, but more convenient for the literary historian, is Jane Austen's portrait of Sir Edward Denham in Sanditon, who, talking of the sea and the sea shore, "ran with Energy through all the usual Phrases employed in praise of their Sublimity, and descriptive of the undescribable Emotions they excite in the Mind of Sensibility."

In the 19th c. the adjective "sensible" underwent a semantic change, attaching itself to "sense" and not to "s." It was—more or less—replaced by "sensitive," but "sensivity" never became a technical term of literary discussion as "s." had been. The concept itself seemed to disappear: perhaps the advent of romanticism had made it unnecessary to defend the Man of Feeling. At any rate, when the term "s." returned to criticism, it was with an altogether new meaning: one which draws on the (non-literary) history of the word.

This modern meaning was anticipated by Baudelaire. In his essay on Constantin Guys he suggests that the child, the convalescent, and the artist are alike in possessing "the ability (la faculté) of being vividly interested in things, even those that appear most trivial The child sees everything afresh (en nouveauté); he is always drunk." The man of genius is he who adds powers of analysis and expression to the s. of the child. We can see here the linking of physical and emotional responsiveness that is the essence of the modern meaning of the word. Baudelaire's view of s. involves an emphasis on the physical strain of thought, a special awareness of flux, and a mingling of the senses. Almost all his essay could apply to Proust (he even says "le génie n'est que l'enfance retrouvée à volonté"—genius is simply the deliberate recapturing of childhood), and a great deal to the whole stream-of-consciousness tradition. Both Virginia Woolf and Joyce are peculiarly aware of the flux of the world of sensations, and of the physical strain accompanying intense emotional experience; and next to Baudelaire's assertion that "inspiration has some connexion with congestion" we can set the experience of Lily Briscoe, in Virginia Woolf's To the Lighthouse, who when she has had her vision "with a sudden intensity, as if she saw it clear for a second," then lays down her brush "in extreme fatigue." It seems just to speak of Proust and Virginia Woolf as "novelists of sensibility" (in this modern use of the term); and the attitudes and limitations of this kind of novel are discussed by William Troy, who lays stress on the fascination of instability, the withdrawal from action of the essentially solitary characters, and the vicarious nature of their experience.

The philosophical background to this literary concept is in Bergson, and in his Eng. disciple, T. E. Hulme. Reality is a flux of interpenetrated elements, unseizable by the intellect: art is a more direct communication of reality than we can normally have. Hulme stresses the freshness of the artist's vision (the perfect artist would "perceive all things in their inner purity"—a sentence that could have come from Baudelaire's essay); he remarks, following Bergson, that those characteristics of mental life which art combats are imposed on us by the necessity of action. This certainly anticipates Virginia Woolf, and the theory seems to come full circle when Troy attacks her for constantly depicting states of mind that are almost totally withdrawn from action. Hulme does not use the word "s.," but he accepts the major assumption that its modern sense indicates: that the perception of sounds and colors is closely allied to emotional awareness (perception of "the subtlest movements of the inner life"), and is quite independent of the intellect.

But of all modern critics, it is T. S. Eliot who has done most to bring the term into common use. For him, too, its physical connections are very strong: "a thought to Donne was an experience: it modified his sensibility"—this means that he perceived it with his five senses—"like the odour of a rose." But for Eliot the term does not indicate one special kind of awareness, nor is its exploitation the mark of one kind of writing: s. is simply a name for the artistic faculty, as found in every poet. As a result, he brings the term closer to intellect. It may not actually include intelligence, but it is very closely related to it, and seems to include the ability to offer resistance—intellectual resistance—to the dangers of generalization. Hence the remark that Henry James had not merely a sensibility but a "mind so fine that no idea could violate it." Eliot's famous doctrine of dissociation of sensibility (q.v.) refers to a dissociation between the intellect and the senses.

Since Eliot the term (now very common) has widened still more, and today a poet's s. may mean simply "the sort of man he is." This meaning is already covered by "personality" or "character," and it may be that this widening has robbed the term of much of its original interest.

So distinct are the two uses of "s." that this bibliog. is divided into two sections. I. THE 18TH-C. USAGE: The Guardian, no. 19 (1713); The Prompter, no. 63 (17 June 1735); L. Sterne, Tristram Shandy (1759–67; see especially such episodes as Uncle Toby's speech to the fly, v. II, chap. 12), A Sentimental Journey (1768); Wm. Cowper, The Task (1785; esp. Book vi); R. S. Crane, "Suggestions towards a Genealogy of the Man of Feeling," ELH, 1 (1934); C. S. Lewis, Studies in Words (1960); L. I. Bredvold, The Natural History of S. (1962); C. J. Rawson, "Some Remarks on 18th C. Delicacy . . .," JEGP, 61 (1962). II. THE MODERN USAGE: C. Baudelaire, "Le Peintre de la Vie Moderne," L'Art Romantique (1869); H. James, "The Art of Fiction," Partial Portraits (1888); T. E. Hulme, Speculations (1924); V. Woolf, "Mr. Bennett and Mrs. Brown," The Common Reader (1925); T. S. Eliot, "The Metaphysical Poets," "Andrew Marvell," Selected Essays (1932); W. Troy, "Virginia Woolf: The Novel of S.," Lit. Opinion in America, ed. M. D. Zabel (3d ed. rev., 2 v., 1962). L.D.L.

SENSIBILITY, DISSOCIATION OF. See DISSOCIATION OF SENSIBILITY.

SENTIMENTALITY in poetry. (1) Poetic indulgence in the exhibition of pathetic emotions for their own sake; (2) poetic indulgence of more emotion (often of a self-regarding kind) than seems warranted by the stimulus; (3) excessively direct poetic expression of pathos without a sufficient poetic correlative. Whether found in poet or reader, s. (a form of emotional redundancy, and thus a fault of rhetoric as well as of ethics) often suggests the presence of self-pity and the absence of mature emotional self-control. The poetic sentimentalist appears to be interested in pathos as an end rather than as an artistic means or a constituent of a larger, less merely personal experience. The sentimentalist will often be found to be afflicted with an uncritically romantic sensibility: dogs, children, old women, the poor, and the unfortunate, regardless of any inherent merit, are not merely objects of interest and pity to the sentimentalist: they are frequently objects of reverence and even envy.

S. in poetry tends to express itself in the tags of popular journalism: adjectives are frequently clichés, and emotions remain vague and oversimplified; they somehow never become transmuted into something more meaningful than the bare, uncomplicated emotion itself. A good example of sentimental treatment is the journalistic habit of using invariably the redundant adjective "little" when some unfortunate child is being described. A similar technique of emotional redundancy is apparent in the following example: "When love meets love, breast urged to breast, / God interposes, / An unacknowledged guest, / And leaves a little child among our roses" (T. E. Brown, When Love Meets Love).

The quality of self-indulgence in the following example (a parody, by Coleridge, of the standard late 18th-c. sentimental poem) is noteworthy: the speaker characteristically tells us (and not once, but many times) that he is experiencing emotion; he does not present the emotion—he merely describes it: "Pensive at eve on the hard world I mused, / And my poor heart was sad: so at the Moon / I gazed—and sighed and sighed—for ah! how soon / Eve darkens into night" ("Nehemiah Higginbottom"). In this parody, the feeling has not found its poetic correlatives (images, symbols) but remains instead naked and untransmuted.

Poetic s. also tends to manifest an unconvincing hyperbole, and the hyperbole often fails because the imagery is trite or vapid: "If I can stop one heart from breaking, / I shall not live in vain; / If I can ease one life the aching, / Or cool one pain, / Or help one fainting robin / Unto his nest again, / I shall not live in vain" (Emily Dickinson). These last two examples will suggest that the sentimental poet generally expects to be admired for the feeling he exhibits; he reveals that, at the moment of composition, he has been more interested in the poet than the poem.

Historically, s. (at least in the modern sense of the term) seems not to have entered poetry much before the 18th c.; its appearance (for example, in Cowper, Gray, Shelley) can perhaps be ascribed in part to a strong current of philosophic optimism which transmitted itself to the public from the writings of Shaftesbury and Rousseau. Its appearance would also seem to be related to the tendency towards increasing subjectivity in 18th-c. aesthetics. It is perhaps connected with the gradual decay of medieval and Renaissance conceptions of the inherent evil of mankind. Viewed historically, s. can be seen to be a uniquely "romantic" phenomenon and thus one of the inherited constituents of the modern sensibility.

It is well to remember, finally, that the presentation of pathos (or of any strong emotion) is not in itself a poetic vice; s. (and bad verse) results only when the pathos, for whatever reason, is inadequately transformed into poetry.—Richards, Practical; Brooks and Warren; L. Lerner, "A Note on S.," The Truest Poetry (1960).

P.F.

SEPTENARIUS (L. "of 7 each"). The Roman equivalent of the Gr. catalectic tetrameter. Whereas the latter was divided into 4 pairs of feet or dipodies (the last of course being incomplete), the iambic, trochaic, and anapaestic s. of early Roman drama were each regarded as composed of 7 feet and an additional syllable.—W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); L. Strzelecki, "De septenariis anapaesticis," Société des Sciences et des Lettres de Wrocław, Travaux, series A, no. 54 (1954); Crusius.

R.J.G.

SEPTENARY. A metrical line of 7 feet, usually in trochaic tetrameter:

mihi est propositum in taberna mori
(Confessio Goliae of Archpoet)

The s. is metrically the same as the heptameter (q.v.) and the fourteenner, but the term is now rarely used and best restricted to medieval L. verse and to such vernacular compositions as the Middle Eng. Orrmulum and Poema Morale, which are predominantly iambic.—Schipper.

SEPTET, septette (It.); also septain (Fr.). A 7-line stanza of varying meter and rhyme scheme, usually reserved for lyric poetry. In Fr. employed as early as Guillaume de Poitiers; not infrequently heterometric (characterized by diversity of meter), as in Cantique de Gottschalk sur la douleur du Péché. Also, more generally, the 7-line iambic pentameter stanza of rhyme royal, q.v. (Chaucer's Man of Law's Tale, Troilus and Criseyde—Lydgate, Hoccleve, Dunbar, Skelton, Wyatt, Morris, etc.) is a form of septet. Term is not in general use with reference to Eng. prosody.

R.O.E.

SERBO-CROATIAN POETRY. See YUGOSLAV POETRY.

SERRANILLA. A Sp. poem composed in any short meter, but especially in the arte mayor (q.v.) half-line, and dealing lightly with the subject of the meeting of a gentleman and a pretty country girl. Sometimes, especially if it is octosyllabic, it is called serrana. The serranilla was particularly characteristic of the late medieval period. The most famous are those of the Archpriest of Hita (1283?-1350?), and especially those of the Marqués de Santillana (1398-1458). The latter may have been influenced by the "... great volume of Portuguese and Galician cantigas, serranas, and decires ..." to which he says he had access in his early youth.—P. Le Gentil, La poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge. 2^e partie. Les formes (1953); Navarro.

D.C.C.

SESTET(T), sestette, sestetto. (a) The minor division or last 6 lines of an It. type sonnet (q.v.), preceded by an octet (see OCTAVE). Sometimes the octet states a proposition or situation and the s. a conclusion, but no fast rules for content can be formulated. The rhyme scheme of the s. varies. (b) Any separable 6-line section of a stanza, but s. is not generally used to describe an entire stanza.

R.O.E.

SESTINA. The most complicated of the verse forms initiated by the troubadours. It is composed of 6 stanzas of 6 lines each, followed by an envoy of 3 lines, all of which are usually unrhymed. The function of rhyme in the s. is taken over by a recurrent pattern of end-words; the same 6 end-words occur in each stanza, but in a constantly shifting order which follows a fixed pattern.

If we let the letters A through F stand for the 6 end-words of a s., we may schematize the recurrence pattern as follows:

stanza 1: ABCDEF
2: FAEBDC
3: CFDBAE
4: ECBFAD
5: DEACFB
6: BDFECA
envoy : ECA or ACE

Most commonly, the envoy, or tornada, is further complicated by the fact that the remaining 3 end-words, BDF, must occur in the course of the lines, so that the 3-line envoy will contain all 6 recurrent words.

The invention of the s. is usually attributed to Arnaut Daniel (fl. 1190), and the form was widely cultivated both by his Prov. followers and by Dante and Petrarch in Italy. It was introduced into Fr. by Pontus de Tyard (ca. 1521-1605), a member of the Pléiade, and was practiced in 17th-c. Germany by Opitz, Gryphius; and Weckherlin. In the 19th c. the foremost writers of sestinas were the Comte de Gramont, who wrote an astonishing number of them, and Swinburne, who sometimes varied the pattern, even using rhyme, and who composed, in his Complaint of Lisa, a double s. of 12 stanzas. The form has had a certain popularity in the 20th c., and Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden have all written sestinas of distinction.—Kastner; F. J. A. Davidson, "The Origin of the S.," MLN, 25 (1910); A. Jeanroy, "La 's. doppia' de Dante et les origines de la sestina," Romania, 42 (1912); L. A. Fiedler, "Green Thoughts in a Green Shade: Reflections on the Stony S. of Dante Alighieri," KR, 18 (1956).

SICILIAN OCTAVE

SEXAIN, sixain, sextain, sextet, sestet, hexastich. Names variously and indiscriminately applied to the great variety of 6-line stanzas found in Western poetry. The term "sestet" (q.v.), properly speaking, is restricted to the concluding 6 lines of a sonnet (q.v.), especially an It. sonnet, in distinction to the octave (q.v.), or first 8 lines. The remaining terms are applied interchangeably to such forms as the Burns stanza and tail-rhyme (qq.v.), as well as to the many 6-line stanzas which have no distinctive names. The most familiar types of sexain in Eng. poetry are the following: (1) ababcc, in iambic pentameter (the so-called Venus and Adonis stanza, q.v.); (2) ababcc, in iambic tetrameter (Wordsworth's The Daffodils; also a familiar stanzaic form in German lyric poetry); (3) tail-rhyme, aa'b³cc'b³ (Chaucer, Tale of Sir Thopas); (4) Burns stanza, aaa'b²a'b²; (5) xayaza (Rossetti, The Blessed Damozel). The sestina (q.v.) uses a 6-line stanza in which word recurrence rather than rhyme is used as a principle of organization. Six-line stanzas occur more frequently than do 5-line stanzas. Indeed, their incidence ranks only after that of the quatrain and the couplet (qq.v.).

SEXTILLA. A Sp. stanza form of 6 octosyllabic or shorter lines. In the classic period the usual rhyme schemes were abbaab, ababba, ababab, abbaba, aabbab, and abaabb; modern definitions often call for aabccb or ababcc (sometimes this last is called sestina) and occasionally stipulate that the b lines be oxytones and the others paroxytones. Sextillas have been pointed out in the prologue to Alfonso the Wise's (13th c.) Galician-Portuguese Cantigas a Santa Maria and in the Archpriest of Hita's (14th c.) Libro de buen amor:

; Ventura astrosa,
cruel, enojosa,
captiva, mesquina!
¿Por qué eres sañosa, contra mí tan dañosa,
e falsa vesina?

Rengifo, Arte poética española (1592); A. de Trueba, Arte de hacer versos (1905); Navarro. D.C.C.

SHANTY (less correct chanty). See SEA SHANTIES.

SHIH. See CHINESE POETRY.

SHORT (syllable). See MORA; CLASSICAL PROSODY.

SHORT METER (S.M. of the hymn books). In effect a variant of ballad meter (q.v.), for if the first tetrameter of that 4343 pattern is shortened, the 3343 arrangement of s.m. results. The form is also similar to the "Poulter's measure" (q.v.) of the 16th c. (if the "Poulter's" couplets are divided at the caesuras), but it is susceptible of greater variety than is found in the monotonous alternations of hexameters and heptameters in the latter. It is most frequently, but by no means exclusively, found in hymnals. S.m. rhymes abcb or abab, and is sometimes written in trochees, but more frequently in iambics, as in Emerson's

To clothe the fiery thought
In simple words succeeds,
For still the craft of genius is To mask a king in weeds.

L.J.Z.

SIAMESE POETRY. See THAI POETRY.

SICILIAN OCTAVE, or strambotto popolare. An 8-line It. stanza, rhyming abababab, composed of hendecasyllabic verses. The name is applied with the content in mind, not the metrical form (which may be even 6-line with the same rhyme scheme). Originally its content was satiric, akin to the Fr. estrabot of the Middle Ages. According to a minority of present-day scholars, this type of octave existed early in the 13th c. in Southern Italy and Sicily, and toward the end of that century in Tuscany. Recent investigations tend to place its origin in Tuscany and to consider it a derivation from the octave of the sonnet. E. H. Wilkins suggests that what we today call "ottava rima" was the popular borrowing in the 14th c. on the part of some minstrel or minstrels of the strambotto form for long poems (cantari) of less than epic length. In the last analysis, no one knows accurately the origin, the precise development, or connections, nor etymology [strammotto, strammuto (Sicilian); strambo (squint-eyed, sidelong glancing); motto (dictum)]. This form remained in popular use until the 15th c., when art-poets (Politian, Lionardo Giustinian) took it up; then in the first half of the 16th c. it disappeared from the literary scene, yielding its place to the madrigal.—F. Flamini, Notizia storica dei versi e metri italiani . . . (1919); E. LiGotti, "Lo Strambotto," Convivium (1949); R. M. Ruggeri, "Protostoria dello strambotto romanzo," SFI, 11 (1953); Wilkins.

L.H.G.

SICILIAN SCHOOL (also known as Frederician poets). A group of poets writing in the vernacular, who were active at the court of the Hohenstaufen monarchs in Sicily during the first three quarters of the 13th c. They flourished particularly under King Frederic II and his son Manfred. Some thirty poets are associated with the Sic. school; the majority of them were Sicilians, but a fair proportion came from the It. mainland, some from as far north as Tuscany.

The major importance of the Sic. poets is that they established It. as a literary language. The content of their work is derived from troubadour models, but, unlike their northern It. contemporaries, they abandoned Prov., the traditional language of the love lyric, and wrote in their own tongue. Of almost equal importance is the formal achievement of the Sicilians; they invented the sonnet and the canzone (qq.v.), the two most important lyric forms of It. poetry. The sonnet of the Sic. school, as written by Giacomo da Lentino and others, shows already the distinctive separation into octave and sestet. The octave always rhymes abababab and the sestet is either cdcdcd or cdcdcd.

These first It. poets (whose use of the vernacular may have been suggested by their acquaintance with the work of the trouvères and the Minnesinger (qq.v.) exerted a powerful effect on all subsequent It. lyric verse through their influence, both formal and thematic, on the Tuscan poets of the 13th and 14th c., on Guittone d'Arezzo, Guido Guinicelli, Dante, and Petrarch. Indeed, their influence was linguistic as well as literary, and the occurrence of typically southern locutions in the Tuscan, which became the standard literary language of Italy, may be traced to their example. The best of the Sic. poets, in addition to Giacomo da Lentino, are Giacomino Pugliese and Rinaldo d'Aquino.

La scuola poetica siciliana. Le canzoni dei rimatori nativi di Sicilia. Testo critico (1955) and La scuola poetica siciliana. Le canzoni dei rimatori non siciliani (2v., 1957–58), both ed. B. Panvini; Poeti del Duecento, ed. G. Contini

(2 v., 1960); G. A. Cesareo, Le origini della poesia lirica e la poesia siciliana sotto gli Svevi (2d ed., 1924); V. de Bartholomaeis, Primordi della lirica d'arte in Italia (1943); Wilkins; W. T. Elwert, Per una valutazione stilistica dell' elemento provenzale nel linguaggio della scuola poetica siciliana (1955); A. del Monte, Le origini (1958).

F.J.W.; A.P.

SIGN. See SEMANTICS AND POETRY.

SIGNIFICATIO. See PUN.

SIJO. See KOREAN POETRY.

SILESIAN SCHOOL. A designation applied to two distinct poetic groups in 17th-c. Germany. Both groups included chiefly men from the middle classes, who had received their strongest intellectual stimuli in or from the Netherlands (e.g., from Lipsius, Heinsius, Grotius, Salmasius). The so-called First Silesian School was made up of those poets, not all from Silesia, who followed the stylistic reforms of Martin Opitz early in the century. These reforms, based largely on the theories of Ronsard and the Fr. Pléiade (q.v.), introduced the stricter forms and more precious diction of Renaissance classicism into German verse, but contributed to a decline in its native vigor. One of the major technical innovations of the group was the substitution of the alexandrine line for the indigenous Knittelvers (qq.v.). The term "Second Silesian School" has been applied to the poetry of Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau, Casper von Lohenstein and their followers in the middle and later years of the 17th c. The work of the later Silesians is distinctly baroque and shows marked affinities to that of Marino and his It. imitators (see MARINISM). Eccentric imagery and supercharged eroticism characterize the school, and in the work of Lohenstein these features degenerate into the tasteless bombast which later German critics called Schwulst.

The absence of a dominating poetic figure, together with the chaos brought about by the Thirty Years' War, prevented the Silesians from achieving major work or leaving a permanent mark on G. poetry. Modern scholars, recognizing the vagueness of the concept of a "First Silesian School," have preferred to restrict the term to Hofmannswaldau, Lohenstein, and the later group, together with their greater predecessor, Andreas Gryphius, whose lyrics and dramas (the latter composed under Dutch influence) stand as the most important monuments of the school.—H. Heckel, Gesch. der deutschen Lit. in Schlesien (1929); J. Nadler, Literaturgesch. der deutschen Stämme und Landschaften, II (1931); H. Schöffler, Deutscher Osten im deutschen Geist von Opitz zu Wolff (1940); R. Newald, Die deutsche Lit. vom Späthumanismus zur Empfindsamkeit, 1570-1750 (3d ed., 1960). F.J.W.; A.P.

SILLOGRAPHER. A writer of silloi ("squeint-eyed" pieces), satirical poems or lampoons directed not against personalities but against the doctrines of individuals or schools. Perhaps the first sillographer of antiquity was Xenophanes of Colophon, who criticized the mythology of Homer and Hesiod. However, the most famous was Timon of Phlius (fl. 250 B.C.), who in his main poem, entitled silloi and written in pseudo-heroic hexameters, ridiculed all dogmatic philosophers.—C. Wachsmuth, Sillographi Graeci (1885); Schmid and Stählin, I. P.S.C.

SILVA. A Sp. poem in Italianate hendecasyllables and heptasyllables in which the poet makes his strophic divisions at will, usually in unequal lengths, and rhymes most of the lines without set pattern, sometimes leaving a few lines unrhymed. Other meters may be used. The s., introduced in the 16th c., is sometimes considered a form of Italianate canción (q.v.) and called canción libre. Morley-Bruerton (The Chronology of Lope de Vega's Comedias, 1940, p. 12) distinguishes four types in Lope's silvas, which are also the types generally used by other poets: (1) "silva de consonantes, aAbB-cCdD, etc." which "could be called pareados [couplets] de 7 y 11"; (2) "sevens and elevens mixed irregularly, no fixed order of length or rime, some unrimed lines"; (3) "all elevens, the majority . . . rimed, not counting the final couplet, no fixed order, mostly pairs, some ABAB and ABBA. May approximate to suelos [free-riming lines] or pareados [couplets] de 11"; (4) "sevens and elevens mixed irregularly, all rimes in pairs."—Navarro. D.C.C.

SIMILE. A comparison of one thing with another, explicitly announced by the word "like" or "as."

Aristotle granted that good similes "give an effect of brilliance," but preferred metaphor to simile because s., being longer, was less attractive, and because the s. "does not say outright that 'this' is 'that' . . . the hearer is less interested in the idea." (Rhetoric 1410a). As a figure of speech, s. merges with and to some extent overlaps the "prosaic" metaphor of comparison, substitution, or description, differing from it only by the presence of "like" or "as" (see e.g. Rhetoric 1406a, 1410a). Not every s. is a metaphor, though some similes can be compressed or converted into metaphors; and only some metaphors can be expanded into similes. At the level of comparison, substitution, or description it is useful to preserve the formal distinction between "metaphor-form" and "simile-form," and to apply the term "submerged s." to figures of metaphor-form which are in fact similes with the word "like" or "as" omitted. For example, "Thou Moon beyond the clouds! . . . Thou Star above the Storm!" is a submerged s. (Many of the more vigorous submerged similes are of the 4-term analogical type A is to X as B is to Y [e.g. "a poisonous resentment"] and are in their origins at least truly metaphorical.) On the other hand, some figures in s.-form may be converted into genuine metaphor, usually by the resonance of the context.

Dull brown a cloak enwraps, Don Juan,
Both thy lean shanks, one arm,
That old bird-cage thy breast, where like magpie
Thy heart hopped on alarm.

Whereas metaphor is a mode of condensation and compression, s. through its descriptive function readily leads to diffuseness and extension, even to the digressive development of the figurative scene, action, or object as an object of beauty in itself. Homer's brief similes (e.g. Thetis rises out of the sea like a mist, Apollo descends like the night, "And with them followed a cloud of foot-soldiers") suggest clearly their origin in metaphor; for, although comparison is explicitly indicated by the word "like" or "as," the two things are not primarily compared but identified, yet without any loss of individual character. Such a use of the metaphor in s.-form may be a natural mark of young and vital speech. (See Bowra, Tradition and Design.) Indeed Chaucer's characteristic brief similes are of this kind: "hir eyen greye as glas," "His eyen twynkled in his heed aryght,/ As doon the sterres in the frosty nyght." Such similes are also found in Old Fr. romance. But W. P. Ker has pointed out that "similes are not used much in English poetry before Chaucer, or in medieval vernacular poetry before Dante"; that similes, though commonly used by medieval L. writers, are uncommon in Old Eng. and Old Icelandic (Form and Style, p. 253).

The true epic s. involves the comparison of one composite action or relation with another composite action or relation. For example, in Iliad 4.275 the Gr. host led by Ajax is compared to a storm-cloud: "As when a goatherd looks out from a watch-tower of a hill over the sea, and sees a cloud coming afar off over the sea, carrying with it much tempest, showing to him blacker than pitch, coming on driven by the west wind, and he shudders to see it, and drives his flock into a cave, so appeared the march of the Greek warriors." It is to Homer's epic s. that the whole European tradition of extended s. may be traced. In Homer too is to be found an insistently diges-sive tendency in s. The example cited above has a double reference (for more complex relations see e.g. Iliad 13.271-76, 586); but his aim is usually to provide some single common characteristic in the comparison. His favorite source of material for similes is his direct observation of the life around him; he will sometimes, from delight in the material, follow his fancy and develop the picture without much care for the initial comparison (e.g. Iliad 4.141-45, 12.278-86). Homer uses his similes for a variety of purposes: for relief, suspense, decoration, magnificence. The Homeric similes—striking, various, self-contained, if not always completely apposite—seldom fail to heighten the narrative and to give pleasure for their own sake.

In succession, Virgil and Dante refined the epic s. in order to develop with precision a multiplicity of comparisons within a single extensive image or action, to "make us see more definitely the scene" (T. S. Eliot, Dante, p. 24). This process reaches its culmination in Milton who, as Newton noticed, surpassed all his predecessors in the matter of consistency. Historically, the process may be seen as a process of degeneration from metaphor in the direction of descriptive and logical consistency; from the specifically poetic mode to a discursive mode; from the simple vivid s.-form metaphor discernible in Homer to an extended comparison through imagery, the success of which depends upon the multiplicity and precision of logical, actual, and visual correspondence. (This, in Coleridgean terms, could be described as a movement from Imagination to Fancy.) Homer's success in s. often depends upon violent heterogeneity between the elements of s.—a practice implicitly commended by Quintilian: "The more remote the simile is from the subject to which it is applied, the greater will be the impression of novelty and the unexpected which it produces" (Institutio Oratoria 8.3.74; cf. Johnson's dictum: "A simile may be compared to lines converging at a point, and is more excellent as the lines approach from a greater distance"). This striking heterogeneity, often found also in Virgil, may be taken as a mark of the origin of s. in metaphor, being a kind of parataxis or "confrontation" (see METAPHOR). Milton, on the other hand, avoids digressive tendencies in his choice of illustrative material, and chooses his imagery with an almost mathematical subtlety to secure a delicate and complex consistency of internal relations. The organic correspondence of many of Milton's similes with their context and with the whole poem, their exquisite finish, and relentless logical and imaginative consistency, carry them paradoxically out of the field of discursive comparison toward the field of identity and of metaphor, e.g., Paradise

Lost 3.431-41:

As when a Vultur on Imaus bred,
Whose snowie ridge the roving Tartar bounds,
Dislodging from a Region scarce of prey
To gorge the flesh of Lambs or yearning Kids On Hills where Flocks are fed, flies toward the Springs
Of Ganges or Hydaspes, Indian streams;
But in his way lights on the barren plains
Of Sericana, where Chineses drive
With Sails and Wind thir canie Waggon light:
So on this windie Sea of Land, the Fiend Walk'd up and down alone bent on his prey. . . .

The extended s. is not confined to epic poetry. Jeremy Taylor and Sir Thomas Browne are only two of several 17th-c. prose-writers capable of using s. with perspicuous accuracy and florid invention. Shakespeare had handled extended s. with unerring point and carried it to unmatched depths of implication. But after Milton no poet uses the epic s. with his force or precision. Keats shows craftsmanlike skill in Hyperion, his comparison of the fallen gods to Stonehenge being justly celebrated; Byron, through carelessness, misuses the epic s. in Childe Harold; Matthew Arnold cultivated the heroic manner rather too sedulously in Sohrab and Rustum but not without a few notable successes. Shelley has a curious habit, in passages of transcendent emotion, of accumulating a shower of approximate similes (both in explicit s.-form and in metaphor-form); prime examples occur in Epipsychidion 26-34, 115-23 (but cf. Adonais 17). The art of extended s. had a vogue in later 19th-c. journalism but has now happily passed out of fashion. And now that power rather than revelation has become the central concern of the public orator, the more grotesque manifestations of extended s. (e.g. "Like a paralytic who finds his arms useless to move his wheel-chair from the murderous flame that would snuff out his life, I am powerless to strain the muscles of coincidence" arm by suggesting any connexion between the mayor's timely affluence and the loss of the Party funds") are seldom heard now even on political platforms.

The distinction drawn by C. S. Lewis (The Allegory of Love) between symbolic allegory and "formulated" allegory can be seen to be parallel to the distinction between metaphor and s. Symbolic allegory (e.g. Roman de la Rose, The Faerie Queene (in part at least), Pilgrim's Progress, Kafka's Trial) develops two or more levels of meaning simultaneously. The "formulated" allegory (e.g. Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, Swift's Tale of a Tub), in which the "real meaning" is derived by direct substitution from the details and context of the "story," may be regarded as an extension of "submerged s."; for the comparison unfolds in the manner of an extended s., though the primary subject for comparison is withheld and the fact that a comparison is intended is (for a variety of reasons) not explicitly stated. This relation of "formulated" allegory to s. tends to be overlooked because of the habit—to be seen, for example, in Coleridge, Yeats and Fowler—of assuming that all allegory is of the type of "formulated" allegory and concluding that allegory is the contrary term to symbol.

H. Fränkel, Die homerischen Gleichnisse (1921); Ker, p. 250-59; C. M. Bowra, Tradition and Design in the Iliad (1930); J. Whaler, "Grammatical Nexus of the Miltonic S.," JEGP, 30 (1931), "Compounding and Distribution of Similes in Paradise Lost," MP, 28 (1931), "The Miltonic S.," PMLA, 46 (1931); I. F. Green, "Observations on the Epic Similes in the Faerie Queene," PQ, 14 (1935); L. D. Lerner, "The Miltonic S.," EIC, 4 (1954); M. Coffey, "Function of the Homeric S.," AJP, 78 (1957); J. Notoopoulos, "Homeric Similes in the Light of Oral Poetry," CJ, 52 (1957); K. Widmer, "The Iconography of Renunciation: The Miltonic S.," ELH, 25 (1958). G.W.

SINCERITY. As a poetic criterion s. can be either helpful or harmful, according to the tact with which it is employed. With the Eng. romantics s. was a genuine correspondence with or expression of the poet's state of mind and feelings, from which the poem derived its vitality. The Victorians gave s. even more importance, and a more exclusively moral meaning. For them it was the chief and indispensable value, and the integrity of the poet's character became the principal question. The romantics inclined to treat s. as a guarantee of the poet's natural gift. Thus Leigh Hunt praised Keats's Eve of St. Agnes for its naturalness and spontaneity: "All flows out of sincerity and passion." G. H. Lewes, John Keble, Carlyle, and Matthew Arnold, however, all gave s. stronger moral implications than did the romantics. "To every poet, to every writer," exclaimed Carlyle, "we might say: Be true, if you would be believed. Let a man but speak forth with genuine earnestness the thought, the emotion, the actual condition of his own heart." To Arnold the touchstone of great poetry was "the high seriousness which comes from absolute sincerity." Henry James returned to s. its aesthetic meaning, proposing as "the one measure of the worth of a given subject . . . is it valid, in a word, is it genuine, is it sincere, the result of some direct impression or perception of life?"

In so questioning, James returned to the best romantic version of s., though doubtless his emphasis is more exclusively aesthetic. For Wordsworth in his rejection of "poetic diction" and in his claim that "I have at all times endeavoured to look steadily at my subject" was simply requiring that poetic language should be "the result of some direct impression or perception of life." Likewise Shelley is expounding the most profitable doctrine of s. when he calls the poets the creators of language: "Their language is vitally metaphorical; that is, it marks the before unapprehended relations of things and perpetuates their apprehension."—Wellek and Warren; Abrams; Wellek. For a crit. hist. of the term, see H. Peyre, Lit. and S. (1963); D. Perkins, Wordsworth and the Poetry of S. (1964).

R.H.F.

SINHALESE POETRY. The earliest extant specimens of Sinh. poetry go as far back as the 1st c. A.D. These verses, limited to about half a dozen unrhymed couplets, are found in the form of inscriptions carved on rock. One of these couplets perpetuates the memory of a royal lapidary who had died while on duty. Though there is evidence to show that this tradition of poetry continued to exist, no examples have survived, and one has to wait till the 5th or the 6th c. to get further examples of early Sinh. poetry.

The graffiti incised on the Mirror Wall at Sigiriya range from 5th c. to 13th c. These graffiti, essentially lyrical in character, embody the reactions of visitors to the Sigiriya Rock when they viewed the well-known paintings executed in some pockets there. A variety of metrical forms is used in these verses, and they range from the unrhymed couplet to the rhymed 4-line stanza, a form which became very popular in later times.

The earliest extant full length Sinh. poem, however, is assigned to the 10th c. This work, Siyabasalakara, based on earlier Sanskrit works, is a treatise on rhetorics, and is devoted to a discussion of the different types of poetic embellishments and figures of speech with illustrations. The verse form employed in this work is known as gī, i.e. an unrhymed couplet, employing a variable number of syllabic instants in the 2 lines of verse.

This is followed by three poems, the Sasadvāta (Birth story of the Hare), the Muvadevdāvata (Birth story of the Deer) and the Kav-Silumiṇa (Diadem of Poetry) in all of which the gī form of verse is employed. The first was composed in the reign of Queen Līlāvati (A.D. 1197-1200) while the Kav-Silumiṇa is attributed to King Parākramabāhu II (A.D. 1234-1269). The Muvadevdāvata, whose author is not identified, is considered to have been written after the Sasadvāta but before the Kav-Silumiṇa.

Each of these poems is based on a Jātaka,

i.e. a previous life of the Buddha. The authors of these poems attempted to follow closely the rules laid down by writers on the Indian theory of poetry, and as a result these poems contain a considerable amount of irrelevant descriptions which detract from their organic unity.

Toward the middle of the 14th c. a new literary form known as Sandēśa was adopted by Sinh. poets. In this form, a messenger, usually a bird such as a peacock or a parrot, is supposed to take a message from the author to a god or a high religious dignitary asking the latter to give his blessings to the King or to a Minister of State. In describing the route the messenger had to take, the authors indulged in profuse descriptions of the villages, towns, rivers and shrines the messenger would see or visit on his way. The earliest Sinh. Sandēśa are the Mayūra-Sandēśa and the Tisara-Sandēśa, and later in the middle of the 15th c. the well known Sālalihiṇi-Sandēśa, the Kokila-Sandēśa, and the Girā-Sandēśa were composed by authors who were contemporaries. The Sandēśa as a literary form became popular with Sinh. poets and a considerable number was composed in later times. Even in the present day one hears occasionally of a new Sandēśa being published. Though the authors of Sandēśa poems generally followed the established poetic conventions, this new literary form provided Sinh. poets with an opportunity, for the first time, of giving expression to their own experience and observation. In these poems passages of considerable literary merit are occasionally found.

During the same period the *Kāvyaśekhara*ya and the *Guttīla Kāvya*ya, two poems based on the previous lives of the Buddha, were also written. The Buduguṇāṅkārāya, based on an event in the life of the Buddha and the Lōvāda-Sangarāva—a popular exposition of Buddhist ethics—were also composed during this period. In all these poems gi verse is replaced by the rhymed stanza of 4 lines.

This period was followed by one of internal strife and strain. The Portuguese, followed by the Dutch and the Eng., invaded Ceylon. Literary activity during these troublous times appears to have suffered a setback, though mention has to be made of the poet Alagiya-vanna (2d half of 16th c.) and the poets of the Matara School (2d half of the 18th c.) whose works are characterized by signs of decadence and decline.

Recent and present day Sinh. poetry is characterized by an admixture of both the old and the new in respect of form and content. An attempt at what is termed social realism can also be discerned, particularly in the works of the present day poets that have come under the influence of radical ideologies. An important feature of this recent and present phase is the appearance of free verse with neither rhyme nor meter.

M. Wickramasinghe, Sinh. Lit., tr. E. R. Sarathchandra (1949); C. E. Godakumbura, Sinh. Lit. (1955); Sigiri Graffiti, ed. S. Paranavitana (1956); Padyāvali, pts. I and II, ed. S. Palansuriya (1959-60). P.E.E.F.

SIRVENTES. A poem in Old Prov. which is strophic in form but which is not a love poem. The main themes are personal abuse or (occasionally) praise; literary satire of a superficial nature; moralizing on the evil state of the world; politics and current events; and the crusades (exhortations to go, songs of parting, etc.). The tone is mostly satiric, and gross vituperation is common. In form, the s. came to be regarded as a subservient genre, deserving less originality than the chanso (q.v.). Indeed, it became a recognized practice to write a s. to the tune of a popular chanso, and even in many cases to adopt the actual rhyme sounds of the chanso whose tune was borrowed. This custom was so general that the s. was sometimes defined in these terms, as an imitative poem; but it seems most unlikely that this imitation was ever considered by the poets themselves as an essential condition of the genre.—Jeanroy, II; J. Storost, Ursprung und Entwicklung des altprovenzal. S. (1931); F. M. Chambers, "Imitation of Form in the Old Prov. Lyric," RPh, 6 (1952-53). F.M.C.

SKALD (scald). The word skald had the general meaning "poet" in ON, and still does in Icelandic. In Eng., however, it is applied specifically to the Scandinavian poets of old who were attached to the courts of kings, earls, and other chieftains in the Northern countries, England, and elsewhere. The first skalds were Norwegian. The oldest whose work we know was Bragi Boddason the Old of the first half of the 9th c.; he was the forerunner of a number of other Norwegian skalds, but from the end of the 10th c. and down to the close of the 13th, when the court poetry went out of fashion, the Icelanders dominated the field almost exclusively. Altogether, the names of about 250 skalds have come down to us. See also OLD NORSE POETRY.—W. Craigie, The Art of Poetry in Iceland (1937); The Skalds, tr. and ed. L. M. Hollander (1945). R.B.

SKELTONIC VERSE. A verse form (sometimes treated as part of a generic type called tumbling verse, q.v.) named after its originator and principal practitioner, John Skelton (ca. 1460-1529). Its characteristics are: a line that is usually quite short (from 3 to 6 or 7 syllables and of 2 or 3 stresses), though longer lines with the typical skeltonic feel are not uncommon; a rhyme scheme in which a rhyme set may be extended indefinitely, though rhymes are never crossed; the elevation of parallelism to a major rhetorical element.

And if ye stand in doubt
Who brought this rhyme about My name is Colin Clout.
I propose to shake out
All my conning bag,
Like a clerly hag.
For though my rhyme be ragged,
Tattered and jagged
Rudely rain-beaten, Rusty and moth-eaten,
If ye take well therewith
It hath in it some pith.

—Colin Clout

The effect of this highly irregular verse struck a number of generations as "rude rayling," but beginning with favorable comments by various eminent romantics, including Coleridge and Wordsworth, a reevaluation has taken place, till skeltonic is much admired by many modern poets.

The traditional roots of the verse form have been variously described as Anglo-Saxon rhyming poems (Guest), as a fine form of native doggerel bent on escaping the dullness of post-Chaucerian poetics (Saintsbury), as an adaptation of rhymed accentual verse of medieval Latinists (Berdan), as a fusion of the Anglo-Saxon 4-accent alliterative line (broken into halves), and the aforementioned Latinists (de Sola Pinto). The most specific suggestion from this later group is Kinsman's, who traces a close relationship from both medieval Eng. and L. poems on the "Signs of Death" to Skelton's Uppon a Deedmans Hed. Nelson has advanced a persuasive theory, namely, that the principal forbear of skeltonic is the similiter desinens or rhymed prose of the Latins which, combined with clausulae (short parallel clauses), enjoyed a vogue from the 11th to the 14th c., and which Skelton himself practiced.—Saintsbury, Prosody, I; J. M. Berdan, Early Tudor Poetry (1920); R. Graves, John Skelton. Selections (1927); W. Nelson, John Skelton: Laureate (1939); John Skelton: A Selection from his Poems, ed. V. de Sola Pinto (1950); R. S. Kinsman, "Skelton's 'Uppon a Deedmans Hed': New Light on the Origin of the Skeltonic," SP, 50 (1953).

R.BE.

SLANT RHYME. See NEAR RHYME.

SLAVIC POETICS. See MODERN POETICS (20TH CENTURY).

SLAVIC PROSODY. A comparative study of Slav. pros. has as its aim both the reconstruction of Common Slav. versification and the description of the individual Slav. prosodic systems which evolved after the breakdown of Slav. unity, around the 10th c. A.D. These systems comprise an oral (declamatory or sung) popular tradition, which to some extent is the continuation of Common Slav. pros., and a tradition of written poetry, which is genetically and structurally connected with the former, but has been subject to various foreign as well as cross-cultural Slav. influences. Whatever metrical system exerted an influence on or was adopted by a given Slav. pros., its needs must be adjusted to the prosodic possibilities of the particular Slav. language implementing it. In recognizing this fact, modern study of versification does not limit itself to an enumeration of ideal metrical schemes, but views verse as a structure within which the metrical constants correlate to rhythmic tendencies.

Attempts to reconstruct Common Slav. pros. have so far yielded the following results. Common Slav. had two types of verse: a spoken asyllabic verse, based on syntactic parallelism of the lines; and a syllabic verse, based on a fixed number of syllables in each line and syntactic pause at the end of the lines. Specimens of the first type are found in Slav. folklore in the form of wedding-speeches and sayings and in the imparisyllabic lines found in older Western (e.g. 14th-c. Czech epic poems) and Rus. (17th-c.) poetry. The syllabic type was recitative or sung. Direct descendants of the recitative type are the laments (tužbalice, plači) and epic songs (junačke pesme, byliny) preserved among the Balkan Slavs and in Northern Great Russia. The laments consisted of short or long lines with a trochaic cadence, which were divided into uniform cola (4 + 4 or 4 + 4 + 4). The epic songs also consisted of long or short lines and were divided into asymmetrical cola: (4 + 6) with a trochaic cadence and (5 + 3 or 3 + 5) with an iambic cadence. The epic verse also had a quantitative clausula. All four types of the recitative verse are very well preserved in the South Slav. area. In the Northern Rus. area the recitative verse changed its structure considerably after the loss of phonemic length and intonation. The asymmetrical verse of epic songs, both long and short, had lost its syllabic pattern just because of its asymmetry, and became a purely accentual verse with a two-syllable anacrusis and a dactylic clausula (which replaced the quantitative one). The symmetrical verse of the laments preserved its syllabic pattern much better. It also developed a new dactylic clausula owing to an additional syllable. Thus it now consists, as a rule, of 9-syllable or 13-syllable lines with a trochaic cadence.

The oldest learned Slav. poetry, that of the Old Church Slavonic-Moravian period, was based on isosyllabism without rhyme and owed its origin to Common Slav. syllabic verse as well as to Byzantine-Gr. forms.

The new political, religious, and linguistic developments which took place around the 10th c. A.D. created the conditions for independent Slav. poetic traditions and prosodic systems. The formation of Slav. states and their subsequent destinies, the adoption of Christianity, and the Schism affected the growth and functions of poetry in the various Slav. countries in different ways. The longest uninterrupted tradition of learned poetry existed among the Western Slavs and, to a lesser degree, in the Catholic Southern Slav world where it started among Croats and Serbs on the Dalmatian coast during the flowering of the Renaissance in this area. In the Orthodox Slav. world learned poetry developed much later: among Eastern Slavs in the 17th c. and among Balkan Slavs (Serbs and Bulgarians) in the 18th and 19th c., respectively. As a consequence of the breakdown of Common Slav., a new word-prosody developed in the various Slav. languages, which can be formulated as follows: (1) Czech and Slovak; (2) Serbo-Croatian; and (3) Slovenian preserved phonemic quantity. In Czech and Slovak, stress has the function only of delimiting word boundaries, being fixed on the initial syllable of a word. In Serbo-Croatian and Slovenian, stress is concomitant with pitch, which is distinctive but metrically irrelevant, or in the absence of the latter, it delimits the word boundary, falling on the first (Serbo-Croatian) or final syllable of a word (Slovenian). In the Eastern Slav. languages and in Bulgarian, stress has a distinctive function, whereas in Polish it is bound to the penultimate syllable of a word.

Syllabism has been up to now the basis of Polish versification. In the 14th-15th c., isosyllabism of the lines was merely a tendency, which was pronounced in the works influenced by medieval L. poetry. The greatest innovator of Pol. syllabic verse was J. Kochanowski. He canonized the principle of strict isosyllabism, eliminated syntactic parallelism of the lines as a constant, and stabilized the place of the caesura in longer (over 8-syllable) lines. He also introduced a full, $1\frac{1}{2}$ rhyme (with a penultimate stress), which was not strictly adhered to by his 17th- and 18th-c. followers. These innovations lent Pol. verse new flexibility: they allowed the use of lines and hemistichs of various length and released syntactic phrasing for expressive effects. The consistent adherence to the syllabic principle accounts for the popularity of the longer lines, especially of 11 (5+6) and 13 (7+6) syllables, in which the best Pol. lyric and epic poetry has been written. The shorter octosyllable has generally been used in learned poetry without a caesura. In popular verse, this line is divided into hemistichs (5+3 or 4+4), which entails a breakdown of the line into word groups with an equal number of stresses or a strong trochaic tendency.

The rhythmical measures of the folk song enter at first into Pol. romantic poetry as a form of popular stylization. The impulse for syllabic-accentual pros. was, however, given mainly by the imitation of classical, quantitative meters and by foreign (Rus.) models. Syllabic-accentual meters are used by the romantics in smaller lyric poems and in sections of dramatic works. The great romantics, who introduced masculine rhyme and iambic and anapestic feet (Mickiewicz, Słowacki), used these meters with moderation. Syllabic-accentual verse became the norm with the "positivist" poets (Konopnicka, Asnyk), who practiced it with extreme rigor. Modern poets admit frequent deviations from the metrical scheme. The imitation of classical meters, especially the hexameter, actually led to the introduction of purely accentual meters, based on an equal number of stresses in each line. In our times, these meters, as well as free verse, compete successfully with the traditional syllabic verse.

In Czech the 8-syllable line formed the backbone of both lyric and epic Old Czech poetry, with a pronounced trochaic tendency in the former, and syntactic parallelism approaching a constant in the latter. Dramatic works, on the other hand, were based on asyllabism. Syllabic-accentual meters, with a trochaic and iambic cadence, became popular during the Hussite movement with the flourishing of religious songs. But as a consequence of the frequent discrepancy between music and meter, and the general decline of secular poetry, the 15th and 16th c. saw a return to purely syllabic meters, a development which coincided with the Pol. syllabic versification and was partly influenced by it. In this system, quantity served only as an element of variation. However, in the poems and songs of the Czech humanists who imitate classical versification (Komenský, Blahoslav), it becomes the metrical principle.

At the end of the 18th c., syllabic-accentual meters, based on the congruence of foot and word boundaries, triumph in Czech poetry. The poets of the Puchmajer school adhere strictly to the metrical scheme. Later on this rigor is considerably attenuated through the use of quantity, of polysyllabic words, and of heterosyllabic, mainly dactylo-trochaic feet. The romantics (Mácha) make very skillful use of iambic feet, which are contrary to the dactylo-trochaic cadence of the Czech language. Toward the end of the 19th c., the metrical scheme is again rigorously implemented (by the Lumírovci) to finally cede place to the modified syllabic-accentual meters and to the vers libre of the symbolists (Březina).

In its early, Štúr period, Slovak poetry drew its inspiration from the local folk poetry, which is syllabic. In the last quarter of the 19th c., the Slovak poets (Hviezdoslav, Vajanský) abandoned syllabism for the syllabic-accentual meters of Czech origin, which was strictly adhered to toward the end of that century. Subsequently the syllabic-accentual frame became more flexible, to mark the transition to free rhythms.

Serbo-Croatian popular verse shows striking similarities to that of Czech and Slovak, with the difference that quantity is sometimes endowed with a metrical function (e.g. the quantitative clausula of the epic decasyllable). Dalmatian poetry of the Renaissance owed its verse forms to popular inspiration. The influence of Western (It.) poetry has here been responsible for the introduction of rhyme (and media rima), which replaced syntactic parallelism as a constant. Besides the epic asymmetric (4 + 6) and the lyric, symmetric (5 + 5) decasyllable, the most common meters are (8 and 12) syllabic lines (4 + 4 and 6 + 6) with a pronounced trochaic cadence. Modern poetry employs, in addition, 11-syllable lines (5 + 6). Syllabic-accentual meters appeared under foreign (German and Rus.) influence during the 19th c. (Radičević, Zmaj, Kostić; Vraz, Preradović, Šenoa, F. Marković). The division into feet is, as in Czech, dependent upon the arrangement of word boundaries. Quantity serves mainly as an element of variation, although in some positions it may substitute for stress (especially in rhymes).

The meters of modern Slovenian poetry, which developed in the 19th c., are syllabic-accentual. The role of quantity as a rhythmic factor is more restricted here than in Serbo-Croatian. In the poetry of Prešeren, the greatest romantic poet, who used primarily the iambic pentameter (with feminine rhyme), the metrical scheme is still rigorously observed. Modern versification (Aškerc, Župančič) has moved in the direction of relaxing the metrical requirements; it also adopted ternary meters and free verse.

Syllabic-accentual meters became the basis of Rus. prosody in the 1740's under German influence, following a period of syllabic verse which had reached Russia from Poland, via the Ukraine, in the 17th c. (Simeon of Polotsk, Istomin, Kantemir). From the time of Lomonosov, Trediakovsky, and Sumarokov, binary meters were used almost exclusively in the poetry of the 18th c., especially iambic tetrameter, iambic hexameter (alexandrine) and trochaic tetrameter. At the beginning of the 19th c. the iambic pentameter became widespread in the poetry of Zhukovsky, Pushkin, and others, replacing the alexandrine in dramatic poetry. In the 19th c. ternary meters also became more popular, especially in the second half of the century (Nekrasov, A. Tolstoy, Fet). While in Rus. ternary meters all downbeats, as a rule, are always stressed, in binary meters only the last downbeat in the line has a compulsory stress; stress on the other downbeats is merely a tendency. In ternary meters the excess of constants led in the 20th c. to the admission of a variable number of unstressed syllables (usually one or two) between the downbeats, giving rise to the dol'niki in the poetry of the symbolists and acmeists (Bryusov, Blok, Akhmatova, Gumilev, etc.) and, later, to purely accentual verse with a still freer number of unstressed syllables between downbeats (especially in some poems of Mayakovsky). Free verse (vers libre), based primarily on phrase intonation rather than on the number of stresses per line, was introduced into Rus. poetry by Blok and Kuzmin, but it was never widely adopted as it was in other Slavic literatures (Czech, Polish, and Serbo-Croatian). Syllabic-accentual meters, especially the iambic, constitute the bulk of Rus. verse up to the present. In addition to the stress and syllabics, in Rus. prosody the arrangement of word boundaries is also free to serve as an element of variation.

Ukrainian and Bulgarian learned poetry of the 19th c. (Shevchenko, Botev) is indebted for its verse forms to the popular tradition of the folk song, which shows a strong tendency toward a fixed arrangement of word groups within the short line and a division into hemistichs in the long line. Subsequently Bulgarian and Ukrainian poetry underwent the influence of Rus. syllabic-accentual versification, which became the prevailing norm, with the exception of Western Ukrainian poetry, where purely syllabic verse is still written. In this century, the dol'niki (Tychina, Javorov) and vers libre have competed also with the syllabotonic meters.

See especially R. Jakobson, "Studies in Comparative Slav. Metrics," osp, 3 (1952) and "The Kernel of Comp. Slav. Lit.," HSS, 1 (1953). The most recent and most comprehensive attempts at a reconstruction of Common Slav. pros.—S. Furmanik, Podstawy wersyfikacji polskiej (1947; a clear, though somewhat mechanical survey of the principles of Polish pros.); M. R. Mayenowa (ed.), Wiersz, II cz. I (1963), Sylabizm, III (1956), Sylabotonizm, IV (1957), (Wersyfikacja, important ser. Poetyka, Polska Akademia Nauk). The most comprehensive v. on two types of Pol. meters.—J. Mukařovský, "Český verš. Obecné zásady a vývoj novověkého verše"; R. Jakobson, "Verš staročeský," 376–429, 429–459, Československá Vlastivěda, III (1934; compreh. outlines of the hist. of Czech

mām ēkām saraṇām vājā

(Abandoning all duties, take refuge in Me alone.)

For bibliog., see INDIAN PROSODY.

V.R.

verse); M. Bakoš, Vývin slovenského verša od školy štúrovej (2d ed., 1949; a synthetic survey of Slovak versification); K. Horálek, Zarys dziejów czeskiego wiersza (1957; a brief historical survey of Czech and Slovak verse).—S. Matić, "Principi umetničke versifikacije srpske," Godišnica N. Čupića (1930-32; a thorough, though one-sided, study of Serbo-Croatian syllabic meters); R. Košutić, O tonskoj metrici u novoj srpskoj poeziji (1941; a compreh. study of syllabo-tonic versific., but with a normative bias); K. Taranovski, "Principi srpskohrvatske versifikacije," Prilozi za književnost, 20 (1954) and "The Prosodic Structure of Serbo-Croat Verse," osp, 9 (1960; briefer treatment); A. V. Isačenko, Slovenski verz (1939; brief survey of Slovenian metrics, with a comparative outlook).—B. V. Tomashevsky, Russkoe stikhoslozhenie (1923; a balanced and compreh. work on the structure of Rus. verse); B. M. Zhirmunsky, Vvedenie v metriku. Teoriya stikha (1925; clear and well-documented, somewhat controversial study on the structure of Rus. verse); K. Taranovski, Ruski dvodelni ritmovi 1-11 (1953); B. O. Unbegaun, Rus. Versification (1956; useful introd. to the hist. and structure of Rus. verse).—V. Jakubskij, Nauka viršuvannja (1922; a compreh. study of the principles of Ukrainian pros.).—A. Balabanov, "B' 'lgarski stix," Iz edin život (1934); M. Janakiev, B' 'lgarsko stixoznamie (1960; up-to-date survey of the hist. of Bulgarian verse).

E.ST.

ŚLOKA or anuṣṭubh. Verse form in which the bulk of Sanskrit metrical literature is composed. Being rather free, it is generally used for narrative, epic, mythology, and scientific treatises; and being brief it is also used effectively for epigrams and maxims. S. originally meant "praise" or "fame" or "the act of praising." Later, the word came to mean verse in general. Anuṣṭubh, a name for s. going back to the Veda, refers to its octosyllabic class having 4 feet of 8 syllables each. It is a completion of the Vedic gayatri of 3 feet of 8 syllables each.

The s. or anuṣṭubh continued to be a fluid meter when all quantitative meters had become rigidly fixed. The standard rules in a s. are that the sixth syllable shall always be long, the fifth short, and the seventh short in the even feet, giving them an iambic cadence. However, only the last rule is strictly enforced in the classical s.; and in archaic writings, ślokas with a long 7th giving a trochaic cadence to the even feet are to be found. Perhaps the most basic requirement of a s. is that it should give a true "śloka-feeling" to the ear. The following is a typical s. from the Bhagavad Gita 18:

5th 6th

sarvadharmān paritījāya

SLOVAK POETRY. Until the last century the Slovaks had virtually no literature in their own language; L. and Czech served as written languages, and only sporadic attempts were made to write in Slovak. The 17th c. saw what may be regarded as the beginnings of a national literature in two great hymnals, the Protestant Cithara sanctorum (1636) and the Catholic Cantus catholici (1655). The first collection contained mostly Czech hymns, but a few were Slov. and employed vernacular expressions. The language of Cantus catholici represented an attempt by the Jesuits of the University of Trnava to write in Slov., using Western Slov. dialects. Throughout the latter part of the 17th and most of the 18th c., the baroque period in Slovakia, poetry continued to be almost entirely religious or didactic.

Neoclassicism dominated Slov. literature at the end of the 18th and in the first three decades of the 19th c. A new attempt to standardize Slov. was made at this time by Anton Bernolák (1762-1813), a Catholic priest. Bernolák's Slov. was likewise based on Western Slov. dialects. His follower, Ján Hollý (1785-1849), wrote ponderous epics on patriotic historical subjects, drawing heavily for inspiration on antique poets. The failure of Bernolák's Slov. to win acceptance doomed Hollý's work to oblivion. More successful was Ján Kollár (1793-1852), who wrote in Czech. His great sonnet cycle, Slávy dcera (The Daughter of Sláva, 1824), laments the impotence of the Slavic peoples, but predicts their future greatness.

Not until the 1840's and the first romantic generation was a standard Slov. language which would endure created. Based on Central Slov. dialects, and hence more widely acceptable, it was largely the work of two Protestant nationalists, Ľudovít Štúr (1815-56) and J. M. Hurban (1817-88). The romantic poets who surrounded Štúr were strongly influenced by the Slov. folk song; ardent patriots, they largely defined national literature by its use of popular speech and folk forms. They finally solved the question of prosody, which had vexed Slov. poets almost as much as the language problem: both quantitative and qualitative versification had been employed. On the model of the folk song, the romantics now adopted qualitative (accentual) verse.

The romantic generation included a number of significant poets. Andrej Sládkovič (pseudonym of Ondrej Braxatoris, 1820-72) created a historical epic, Detvan (1853), an idyllic but accurate description of the life of the peasants of the region of Detva. Janko Král' (1822-76), the greatest of the romantics, produced ballads interesting for their use of Oedipal themes. Ján Botto's (1829-81) Smrt' Janašika (The Death of Janašik, 1862) eulogized the famous bandit of the Carpathians, who had become a symbol of liberty for the common people. Ján Kalinčiak (1812-71) treated national historical subjects, but with more realistic detail than the other romantics.

The hope of the romantic generation for liberty was shattered by the failure of the Revolution of 1848. As the century wore on and Hungarian rule grew more severe, a mood of helplessness set in. Svätozar Hurban Vajanský (1847-1916) and Pavol Országh (1849-1921), who wrote under the pseudonym of Hviezdoslav, were the greatest poets of the era. Hurban Vajanský, the son of J. M. Hurban, was a romantic, but with a vein of irony and satire new to Slov. literature. Hviezdoslav was a Parnassian poet. His translations from Shakespeare, Goethe, Pushkin, and others gave Slov. poetry a new stimulus. In keeping with his cosmopolitanism, he avoided the hitherto dominant tone of the folk song. Though he was a lyric, epic, and dramatic poet, his masterpiece is probably the Krvavé sonety (Bloody Sonnets, 1919), which mirror the horror of World War I. His last poetry became more and more disillusioned, though he lived to see Slovakia win freedom.

Symbolism, or Moderna, as the Slovaks called it, had its chief poet in Ivan Krasko (pseudonym of Ján Botto, 1876-), the son of the older Botto. Krasko shares Hviezdoslav's pessimism, but his poetry is more modern in its use of the lexicon and the subtler shades of introspective feeling of symbolism. Janko Jesenský (1874-1945) cultivated a cosmopolitan satire relatively unique in Slov. poetry. Among recent writers, Emil B. Lukáč (1900-) is a complex and contradictory religious poet influenced by Paul Claudel. Ján Smrek (pseudonym of Ján Cietek, 1899-) is a vitalist who delights in sensual descriptions of female beauty. He has also flirted with poetism, an indigenous Czechoslovak poetic movement which arose in the 1920's and which contained traits of futurism, dadaism, and surrealism (qq.v.). Another poetist was Laco Novomeský (1904-), a Communist journalist who has recently been in prison for nationalist "deviation" under the Communist regime. Since 1948 Communist rule has silenced most of the older poets and greatly restricted the range of themes.

The chief foreign influences on Slov. poetry have been Czech, German, and Rus. literature. Like Czech, Slov. has fixed stress on the first syllable, which facilitates the use of trochaic rhythm. Still, iambic verse—usually with considerable metrical freedom in the opening foot of the line—is very common, and more popular than trochaic in the second half of the 19th c. Pure trinary meters are virtually impossible in Slov. because the stress tends to fall on every odd syllable. Dactylic feet may alternate with trochees, however; such purely tonic rhythms were popular under the influence of antique meters and of native folk songs, both in the romantic era and again in modern times.

The severity of the national problem in Slovakia and the political role played by many Slov. writers have given poetry a strongly nationalistic coloring. Those poetic forms are popular in which national ideas can be expressed or implied: narrative poetry, occasional verse, the popular song, and the reflective lyric.

ANTHOLOGIES: Slovenská poesie XIX. stololetí, ed. Fr. Frýdecký (1920); Sborník mladé slovenskej literatúry, ed. J. Smrek (1924; 19th and early 20th c.); Slovenské jaro; ze slovenské poesie, 1945-1955, ed. C. Stitnický (1955); The Linden Tree, ed. M. Otruba and Z. Pešat (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: P. Bujnáč, Hviezdoslav (1919); S. Krčméry, "A Survey of Modern Slov. Lit.," SEER, 6 (1928) and "Úvod do dejín slovenskej literatúry, najmä poézie," Sborník Matice slovenskej, 18 (1943); M. Pišút, K počiatkom básnickej školy Štúrovovej (On the Beginnings of Štúr's Poetic School, 1938); M. Bakoš, Vývin slovenského verša (The Development of Slov. Verse, 1939); A. Kostolný, O Hviezdoslavovej tvorbe (On Hviezdoslav's Work, 1939); A. Mráz, Die Lit. der Slovaken (1942) and "Dejiny slovenskej literatúry" (Hist. of Slov. Lit.), Slovenská vlastiveda, 5, 1 (1948); J. Brezina, Ivan Krasko (1946); W. E. Harkins and K. Šimončič, Czech and Slov. Lit. (1950; brief surveys with a bibliog.); B. Meriggi, Storia della letteratura ceca e slovacca (1958). W.E.H.

SMITHY POETS. A group of Soviet poets who wrote on such themes as the role of industrialization and the solidarity of the proletariat in the new Soviet society. Formed in 1920, they included Vladimir Kirillov, Vasili Kazin, Alexei Gasteve, and others. Their verse, which they strove to make rhythmically free and "modern," was often crude and naive.—G. Z. Patrick, Popular Poetry in Soviet Russia (1929); "Kuznitsa" (Smithy), Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, v (1931). W.E.H.

SOCIETY AND POETRY. The most obvious truth concerning the relations of poets and poetry to soc. is diversity. Pope spat as much as he praised, Yeats cursed, Shelley fled and prophesied, and Shakespeare's and Racine's aristocratically ordered worlds are always underthreatened by the elemental and savage power of human sin. Homer, Virgil, the Germanic scops, and the Hebrew prophets spoke in and for their societies, but not with simple acceptance, rather with heroic exaltation, or tragic breadth, or denunciation.

The diversity is not surprising. Neither is the lack of simple relations. No man or poet can wholly reject his soc.; if he accepts it genuinely, he accepts its moral standards and finds, on observing social actualities, much cause for lamentation, satire, and fear. Societies do not stand still; nor do poets. Most societies have seen themselves as incomplete against the measure of the divine. Those that have not are fragmented, pluralistic, and individualistic, like modern America; or see themselves as incomplete against the immanent measure of unfolding historical process, like modern Russia; or are tyrannically stultifying, like Nazi Germany. Therefore men seldom find their relation to soc. simple and secure; poets are men. They are also poets; societies assign poets to various roles, high or low; or they ignore poetry, in which case the alienation of the poet becomes a social issue.

Men are individuals through and through: they are born alone; they live and decide alone; they die alone, and much of their labor is spent in a never completely successful effort to close down the gap of their separation from God and their neighbors. Men are social through and through: the conception that gives them existence, and the childbirth that brings them into the world (even if there is no midwife or doctor, there are mother and child), are social acts; the food that becomes their physical substance, the language with which they think, decide, and perhaps rebel, are given them by their soc. The relations between these counter-truths are mysterious. As long as this is true, there can be no adequate theory of the relation of the individual to soc., and hence no adequate statement of the relation of the poet to soc. This general truth, which applies to all men, is complicated by the historical complexity of the poet's economic relations to his soc. and his various degrees of feeling in or out of, for or against his soc., by the varied way in which he uses social "tools" in his poetry, the varied ways in which he speaks about his soc. In selecting illustrative examples, this article will deal with poet and poetry at once. The divisions that follow are neither exhaustive nor exclusive, nor make any claim to be of value to the social historian. They are useful for showing some responses and relations involving poets, poetry, and soc.

UNIFIED SOCIETY. A soc. is unified, in this sense, if it achieves social solidarity, if it is felt to be unified by enough relevant members.

Primitive societies, Gr. city-states (and Greece in the imagination of later men), Rome, the Jewish nation, medieval Christendom, 17th-c. royalist France, are examples. The poet is apt to feel himself part of such a soc., rather than a rebel from it, a conveyor of old truth, rather than a discoverer of new. The epics of Homer and Virgil convey and dignify the history of a people, the good wars, and the gods; they presume the moral dignity of man, the value of civilizing labor, an informed and sympathetic audience. Social wisdom is conveyed by the choruses of Gr. plays. The sufferings of the individual in high station are bound to the soc. and even to the fields and harvest by natural, social, and supernatural ties. Social wisdom requires a sense of the mysteries beyond soc., of the limits of human expectation: here Odysseus, Oedipus, Aeneas agree.

A soc. may achieve unity—in spite of temporal insecurities and failures—by a dominant and continued purpose. The Jewish nation is one major example. Church is state, the profound agony of the psalmists and the prophets is the agony of Israel. The soc., its lore, its acts are holy and one, even in exile and separation. The unified soc. is apt to have firm belief, a clear sense of hierarchy. In the Jewish soc. of the Old Testament and the early Christian soc. of the New, the social hierarchy matters less than the reality of God. The prophets threaten the social structure with sublime derogation. Those who are high shall be brought down. Christian paradox informs the rhetoric as well as the theology of the New Testament and, through it, of much Christian literature. Jesus is a humble carpenter, a titular descendant of David, the Messiah. The homeliest things—sheep, work, bread—are exalted, great things are brought low.

But in classical soc., hierarchy tends to prevail. The rhetoric of Cicero and Quintilian, which exerted a major influence on Western thought about poetry through the Renaissance, divides styles into three: high, middle, and plain. There are social connections, especially between the high style and aristocratic dignity. Theories about poetic and dramatic characterization tend toward the typical, toward a simple propriety of class and function. Horace simplifies Aristotle in this respect, and, more than 1700 years later, Rymer attacks Shakespeare for making a soldier kindly. The acceptance of standards can make for variety as well as for uniformity. For instance, Virgil, Ovid, Juvenal, and Horace partake of one firm culture, but Virgil tends to idealize, deepen, and heighten links between past and present, between man, nature, ancestors, and gods; Ovid in The Art of Love accepts the standards of a sophisticated soc. playfully and cynically, but turns to a strong sense of the past and the lore of his people in the Metamorphoses; Juvenal holds high standards of civilized behavior and lashes those who depart from them; Horace's poetry has perhaps its greatest influence in its vision of the good man in retirement taking a large and sane view of men and affairs.

Security—real or apparent—can make for frivolity, for self-conscious elegance, for setting a high value on witty expression and brilliant entertainments. The précieux of 17th-c. France have their highly artificial games, but also show, in their elaborate restraints and "Platonic" devotions something of the ascetic side of their Catholic tradition. In the Eng. Restoration, the complex protocol of seduction in plays is an attempt to systematize, civilize, and justify the debauched morals of a social class. One of the loveliest of courtly entertainments is the masque, especially in the hands of Jonson and Milton, where high aristocrats themselves take part and allegorical figuration of noble ideals blends into the festivity of an evening.

All patriotic poetry presumes or seeks the unity of a people. It is easy for moderns to forget how much of the world's great poetry is profoundly patriotic—Homer, Virgil, David, Dante, Chaucer, Shakespeare, Spenser, Corneille, Whitman, Wordsworth, René Char, as perhaps most important poets, have all written patriotic poetry. The power of such poetry and its social value can be great, even if all of it shares in varying degrees the tendency to idealize the nation or people and then defend the actuality by the idealization. When such poetry is war poetry, as it often is, the enemy is (more or less subtly and completely) both ennobled—that the victory may be noble—and debased—that the slaughter may be morally admirable.

Those who describe the unified soc. as a theoretical ideal have been liable (from Plato to modern communism) to give poetry its marching orders or its dishonorable discharge. Poetry must, they insist, transmit social ideals, form social virtues, praise great men, idealize the system. (We should remember that poets have often done these things without being told). Censorship may be a corollary. Plato in the Republic excludes poets from the ideal state because they tell lies, malign the gods, soften character, confuse the unreal and real.

DIVIDED SOCIETY. A soc. is divided when there are in it distinct sides to be chosen. A soc. locked in civil war is the clearest example, but not the only one. A poet in such a soc. may firmly choose a side, like Milton in his attack on the Anglican clergy in Lycidas or Dryden in his defense of Charles II in Absalom and Achitophel. Or he may vacillate, as Venantius Fortunatus who, in the 6th c., both wrote panegyrics of his barbarian patrons and the powerfully liturgical Vexilla Regis. All Christendom has been, in such a sense, a divided soc. through much of history, since the choice between the worldly and the holy has been recurrently and variously possible, a fact that provides for the literary kind of the medieval debate between body and soul. Or the poet (or his culture) may reconcile. An extremely important example is the Christianization of the classics by allegory (so that such an unpalatable story as that of Saturn eating his children comes to mean merely Time bearing all his sons away, and the Aeneid becomes a pilgrim's progress) and by the continuation and re-creation of classical ideas and literary forms (as Aquinas is to Aristotelian philosophy so is—to speak—Milton to the Virgilian epic).

THREATENED SOCIETY. The threat may come from God's wrath; plague or famine; military force; a new, potent system of thought and feeling; or internal social decay. The essential condition is that men face changes they intensely fear. All tragedy and all apocalyptic poetry envisions soc. as fearfully unstable, and such fears may be felt at the time of greatest unity and achievement. The plague underwrites Chaucer's Pardoner's Tale and Thomas Nashe's "Adieu farewell earth's bliss" (and even, as background and contrast for social comedy, Boccaccio's Decameron); the theme of the Last Judgment figures in poems as diverse as the Dies Irae, the close of Dryden's Song for St. Cecilia's Day, Michael Wigglesworth's popular The Day of Doom, and Dylan Thomas' "And death shall have no dominion." Shakespeare, in King Lear and Hamlet and expressly in the famous "degree" speech in Troilus and Cressida, sees the overturn of social hierarchy reechoed in nature, and adumbrating apocalypse. The 16th and 17th c. debate whether nature (and hence soc.) has decayed, which issues on the one hand into Baconian optimism, also provides pessimistic motifs for poetry, for example in Donne's Anniversaries. Racine's Phèdre images the underworld of sinful human passion as an explosive and mysterious social force. So does Baudelaire in such poems as Les Sept Vieillards. In both works, the image focuses in an agonized individual consciousness, but the social consequences are plainer in Racine. Phèdre is a queen, Baudelaire's persona an alienated poet. The close of Pope's Dunciad rises to pessimistic grandeur, telling and foretelling how men fall away from great norms of thought and conduct.

Poets have responded in many other ways to threatened, or present, or imagined social cataclysm. A poet may turn from the cataclysm to the universal in common experience, as did Hardy in In Time of Breaking of Nations, Herrick in most of his poems. A poet may express violent reversal of feeling and commitment like Coleridge in France: An Ode. He may, like Yeats, adopt dozens of variant, persuasively expressed attitudes, then attempt to unify them into a contemplative whole. He may simply call for a greater allegiance to the common cause: Donald Stauffer, writing as a Marine captain in World War II, invented a memorable phrase—"Get thee behind me, Buddha." He may call for vindication of the oppressed, like Hugo in L'Enfant; or he may triumphantly express, among greater things, the vindication of a nation (the final chorus of Milton's Samson Agonistes). He may indict deity with Voltaire in his poem on Lisbon, or call men back to God with Johnson in the peroration of The Vanity of Human Wishes, or achieve pessimistic universality, like Juvenal in his 10th Satire (from which Johnson adapted his poem) or de Vigny in La Mort du Loup.

FRAGMENTED SOCIETY. Such a soc. is ours, in many ways: individualistic, pluralistic, and uncertain of its values. There have been several major responses to it.

1. eclecticism. The poet imaginatively and temporarily appropriates values of this culture and that and expresses them. Karl Shapiro has stated that he writes as a Jew one day, a Christian the next. Yeats, Eliot, Auden, Stevens, Pound, Valéry, all share something of the quality that Yvor Winters castigated in Pound when he called him, in a memorably savage phrase, "a barbarian on the loose in a museum."

2. syncretism. No sharp line is fixed between the eclectic and the syncretic. It depends on how much is joined. A successful syncretism in modern poetry is yet to come. Yeats's A Vision is the most bold attempt (though in prose, it is a system for poetry), though it is not surprising that he spoke of it ambiguously; and his poetry—great in its power and beauty and in its deep cultural awareness—is more various than unified.

3. mystical unity. A long way from traditional mysticism, this is the solution of Walt Whitman, Hart Crane, and (at times) Emerson. Relativism and pluralism may themselves be praised, but a cultural unity assumed: Whitman assumes a cultural unity in American democratic brotherhood, feels (perhaps more deeply) a unity of life with death. Crane tries to achieve such unity by his powerful, many-stranded image of the bridge.

4. Marxist futurism. This tremendously powerful cultural force has not had much place in 20th-c. poetry, though it has had its say in literary criticism and had revolutionary forebears of the stature of Shelley. Stephen Spender's sentimental and unconvincing "Death is another milestone on the way" is an example.

5. alienation of the individual (from soc., himself, the past, and God). This is surely the favorite theme of modern poetry. It is nostalgic, pathetic, yet dignified in the best of MacLeish's earlier poetry; powerfully complex and tragic in Tate's Ode to the Confederate Dead; multifariously and pretentiously sly in Steven's The Comedian as the Letter C; modest and precise in several of Donald Justice's poems; arrogantly stoic in Jeffers; ragingly bitter in the later Yeats. It flavors, or occasions, several of the other responses.

6. imaging the disorder by disorder. Disorder as expressive of social disorder, recommended by Henry Adams, is a major feature of Eliot's The Waste Land and Pound's Cantos, and of many shorter poems by such writers as E. E. Cummings, Stevens, and Dylan Thomas, reaching its extremes in Dadaism and surrealism in France and the trivial, noisy San Francisco school of the American 1950's. Outside of Eliot—perhaps not even excluding his work—the most powerful writing of this kind is that of Robert Lowell, notably in The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket and New Year's Day.

7. regionalism. The most important exemplars of this 'strategy' (a word they have significantly liked) are the Southern traditionalists, particularly Ransom, Tate, and Warren. They look to the past to judge the present, the region to judge the nation, but do not accept simple nostalgia, idealization, or patriotism as adequate responses. Rather they express division, tragic inconclusiveness, and deal with their subject with irony and ambiguity.

8. other responses. Poets turn to the personal life (Delmore Schwartz, E. E. Cummings, E. A. Robinson among others), whether lyrically or unhappily. Others turn to the permanent and universal in human experience, and by an act of will appropriate and continue the major tradition of Western ethics. Yvor Winters is the most distinguished example. There are various, not very bold versions of Art for Art's Sake, taking such forms as the concentration on physical details in the work of Marianne Moore and William Carlos Williams, the playful variety of synaesthetic and vocal effects in Edith Sitwell, the mannered and graceful and apologetic elegance of Richard Wilbur.

No modern poet submits tamely to total inclusion in any one of these categories, and it is perhaps a measure of the stature of Robert Frost that he fits them least well.

POETRY AS SOCIAL. Language itself is social. Poetry is refined speech, hence is always (1) communicative, (2) invented. Sir Philip Sidney said that poetry asserts nothing, hence cannot be accused of lying. I. A. Richards held, at least in part of his career, a similar doctrine, and Suzanne Langer holds that poetry "is never 'about' soc., since it is always pure invention. Without maintaining such bold and refutable paradoxes, one can clearly see that the soc. in poetry is always, in a sense, invented rather than actual. Further, all poetry is about invented soc., since—even in the most abstractly didactic or personally expressive of poems—the fundamental invention of each poem is a voice, a someone speaking to someone. Still, one needs to distinguish between the soc. of voice and listener, the invented soc. within the poem, and the actual soc. imitated. And poetry does offer various invented societies that have their own attractiveness as inventions as well as their multifold moral bearings on our experience: the world of pastoral, the world of folk belief, the world of the Faerie Queene, the world of medieval dream visions. There are many degrees of re-creation of soc. Herrick's country people and scenes are less realistic than Goldsmith's, Goldsmith's less than Crabbe's. But there is always re-creation and imitation, however mixed. Poetry, then, is always social in its instrument, its chief purpose, its subject, and its invention. It also constitutes a unified soc. Its great themes and great continuities of form are one of the real strands of unity in our history, across nations, across bitter religious and political differences, across centuries. The ideal of literary emulation is one of the greatest Western ideals and of immeasurable social utility.

But if poetry is social, it is not only social. The individual towers above soc. in the very act of naming it; poets universalize as well as express their times; they see soc. in change, limited by history and apocalypse; they imagine men alienated from soc. in exile and fear (so all men always to some degree are). They can also see soc. in relation to permanent standards and realities that transcend civilization and make it possible. Such a view was taken by Longinus, one of the greatest of critics of poetry, in a permanently noble passage: "What is it they saw, those godlike writers who in their work aim at what is greatest and overlook precision in every detail? This, among other things: that nature judged man to be no lowly or ignoble creature when she brought us into this life and into the whole universe as into a great celebration, to be spectators of her whole performance and most ambitious actors. She implanted at once into our souls an invincible love for all that is great and more divine than ourselves. That is why the whole universe gives insufficient scope to man's power of contemplation and reflection, but his thoughts often pass beyond the boundaries of the surrounding world. Anyone who looks at life in all its aspects will see how far the remarkable, the great, and the beautiful predominate in all things, and he will soon understand to what end we have been born." See also CRITICISM, TYPES OF for sociological criticism.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: A. Beljame, Men of Letters and the Eng. Public in the 18th C. (1948); H. D. Duncan, Language and Lit. in Soc. (1953), pp. 143-214; Wellek and Warren, 2d ed., pp. 322-24.

GENERAL: L. Cooper, The Poetics of Aristotle (1923); V. F. Calverton, The Newer Spirit: A Sociological Crit. of Lit. (1925); H. N. Fairchild, The Noble Savage (1928); L. I. Bredvold, The Intellectual Milieu of John Dryden (1934); T. R. Henn, Longinus and Eng. Crit. (1934); Lewis, A. O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being (1936); M. W. Bundy, The Theory of Imagination in Cl. and Medieval Thought (1927); D. Daiches, Lit. and Soc. (1938); Gilbert and Kuhn; G. N. Shuster, The Eng. Ode from Milton to Keats (1940); J. C. Ransom, The New Crit. (1941); T. Spencer, Shakespeare and the Nature of Man (1942); Wellek and Warren, 2d ed., pp. 82-98; E. M. W. Tillyard, The Elizabethan World Picture (1943); Auerbach; L. C. Knights, Explorations (1947); Y. Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947); J. F. Danby, Shakespeare's Doctrine of Nature (1949); C. Dawson, Religion and the Rise of Western Culture (1950); R. C. Wallerstein, Studies in 17th-C. Poetic (1950); H. Baker, The Wars of Truth (1952); Crane, Critics; I. Jack, Augustan Satire (1952); A. Tate, The Forlorn Demon (1953); G. Whicher, Poetry and Civilization (1955); D. de Rougemont, Love in the Western World (2d ed., 1956); Krieger; Frye; H. Levin, Contexts of Crit. (1957); A. Salomon, "Sociology and the Lit. Artist," Spiritual Problems in Contemp. Lit., ed. S. R. Hopper (2d ed., 1957); W. J. Ong, "Voice as Summons for Belief," Thought, 33 (1958); R. P. Warren, Selected Essays (1958); R. N. Wilson, Man Made Plain: The Poet in Contemp. Soc. (1958); P. Ginestier, The Poet and the Machine, tr. from Fr. by M. B. Friedman (1961); B. Snell, Poetry and Soc. (1961). P.R.

SOCIETY VERSE. See LIGHT VERSE.

SOCIOLOGICAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

SOLILOQUY. See MONOLOGUE.

SONG. In general, any music of the human voice, most often modulating the words of speech; more specifically, a poem or other formalized utterance and its musical setting, whether composed together or separately, the text before the melody, or vice versa. One might distinguish "s." from what is thought of as "chant" with reference to the smaller melodic range and less sharply defined contours of the latter, and to the fact that one seldom speaks of an accompanied s. as a "chant." It might be observed that we tend to apply the notion of "chanting" to what we consider either primitive or else highly ritualized passages of singing, whether the indigenous singing of non-Indo-European cultures, unfamiliar to Western ears, or, on the other hand, to the prolonged intonation of narrative or scriptural texts. Another useful distinction between s. proper (in its literal, modern sense) and the word's more extended range of applicability can best be pointed out by invoking a distinction between the modern Fr. chant and chanson: the latter being generally used to refer to what are literally "songs," the former covering the extended senses of "poem," "lyric utterance," "recitation," etc. (Occurrences of such usage apparently as perverse as in Le Chanson de Roland and, generically, in chanson de geste, however, resulted from their application to long poems which were nevertheless sung to short, interminably repeated, melodic fragments.) At various times, particularly before the development of modern conceptions of literary or musical genres, we may find "s." standing for poems, narratives, and musical compositions almost indiscriminately; but at such times there is almost always a wealth of nomenclature whereby different sorts of forms and functions serve to draw any necessary distinctions. The types of troubadour lyric, for example, are organized with respect not only to verse form (vers) but to purpose (planh, sirventes) and peculiarities of genesis (tensos) as well. In these cases, incidentally, the melodic structure of the music is by and large entailed by the versification, and since both text and melody were generally composed by the troubadour himself, we might almost wish to employ him as the model of the "singer" (in every sense but that of actual performer) in postclassical times.

Up through the Renaissance, "s." continues to refer either to a musico-poetic entity or, at times (and particularly under the influence of antiquity), to a poetic text alone. It is only during the later 15th and the 16th c., however, that modern categories of type of s. begin to be useful. Even assuming (in the 16th c., at any rate) one basic canonical musical language, that of high-Renaissance polyphony, a category of musical types, such as songs of various numbers of parts, those with prescribed accompaniments and those without, etc. may be employed. And categories of subject (amatory, pastoral, satiric, narrative, religious, etc.), poetic form (sonnet, various ode forms, etc.) and function (dramatic lyrics, masque songs, postprandial madrigals, etc.) become necessary, in the light of 16th-c. practice, as descriptive terms.

It is with the notion of s. as chant rather than as chanson, however, that literary history is primarily concerned. The processes by which more purely literary senses accrued to the word "s." must themselves be studied, of course, against the background of the tangled history of musico-poetic relations. The splitting into separate practices and concepts, in postclassic times, of music, poetry, and dance in no way interfered with the transmission of a literary heritage in which "singing" could now be taken metaphorically as "writing" and the Apollonian lyre as an inspiring muse. The 12th and 13th c., it is true, saw a reunification of music and lyric poetry in the art of the troubadours, trouvères and Minnesänger; even the 14th c. saw an important lyric poet as well as a truly great polyphonic composer in Guillaume de Machaut, and there are cases, like that of the German Oswald von Wolkenstein, of poet-composers as late as the 15th c. After this, however, such names as that of Thomas Campion come to represent the extremely rare exceptions.

But if the 16th c. saw the final separation of roles of poet and musician, there nevertheless occurred a temporary identification of chant and chanson. Short lyric poems of almost any kind, including those like the sonnet whose real heritage was purely literary and intellectual, were written in the conscious knowledge that they were candidates for musical setting. Secular vocal composers turned to plays, sonnet sequences, pastorals, miscellanies, etc. for their texts, and any poem, regardless of its particular literary intention, might end up in a s. book. But even amidst this burst of harmonious musical and literary activity, the notion of chant began to crystallize out. An early and significant case is that of the envoy of Spenser's Epithalamion, in the lines that seem to summarize so nicely much of the Elizabethan aesthetic (ll. 427-8):

Song, made in lieu of many ornaments
With which my love should duly have bene dect. . . .

Here, "song" = "literary composition," pure and simple; and it is thus that "s." comes to designate lyric poems, not necessarily composed as candidates for possible setting at all, throughout the 17th c. The metaphysical lyric, commencing perhaps with Donne's Songs and Sonnets, poses a special problem. If we were to contrast the Elizabethan and metaphysical lyric with respect to their musical status, we should have to remark that it is the former that models itself on the chanson text, and that the latter tends to approach more and more a formal argument, a quasi-scriptural or philosophical "text" for study, contemplation, exegesis, etc. The metaphysical lyric may be said to be more semantically dense than we would expect the text of a chanson to be: the rapidity, that is, with which its highly complex statement moves forward is even greater than the movement of the formal verse itself. The density of a chanson text, on the other hand, would be lessened to the degree that its thought progressed less slowly than its own (prosodic) or accompanying (actual) music. Musicians will recognize here a useful analogy to the musical concept of harmonic rhythm, which similarly treats of the "density" or rapidity of harmonic change with respect to rhythmic flow.

By and large, it is this rarer semantic density which characterizes the actual s. text throughout the later 17th and 18th c.; and even within the context of the over-all development of lyric poetry, the chanson remains a more or less trivial poetic form. In drama, with the possible sole exception of the opening, programmatic lyric in Dryden's Marriage à la Mode, nothing approaches the variety and intricacy of purpose to which songs are put by Shakespeare. The development of opera and the exigencies of libretto-writing gradually eclipse in importance, while perhaps never surpassing, the proto-operatic songs of Jonson's masques.

In general, it is only rarely that long or ambitious lyric poems like Smart's A Song to David or Blake's Songs of Innocence are actually so called, and it is interesting that the title of so important a manifesto as the Wordsworth-Coleridge Lyrical Ballads avoids the word almost pointedly. Throughout the 19th c., nevertheless, a greater tendency may be noted to unify chant and chanson, the German lyric appearing as a Lied, for example, and the flourishing of the art-song in general as a musical development contributing to this in no small part. In the latter half of the century, however, the notion of chant seems to undergo its greatest extended application; with the heritage of the symboliste movement and its reverberations in the poetry of many languages up through the present century, "s." comes to be used more and more in perverse and ironic ways, finally coming to name or describe any poem, in verse or prose, and of whatever length. Interestingly enough, it is during this same later 19th c. that an over-extended musical sense of "s." begins to develop, in the short instrumental (usually piano) solo piece entitled chant sans paroles, and later, simply, "song." See LYRIC; MUSIC AND POETRY.

J. B. Beck, La Musique des troubadours (1910); J. R. Noble, Shakespeare's Use of S.

(1923); E. H. Fellowes, The Eng. Madrigal (1925); P. Warlock, The Eng. Ayre (1926); J. M. Edmonds, "An Account of Gr. Lyric Poetry," Lyra Graeca, ed. and tr. J. Edmonds (2d ed., III, 1928); G. Bontoux, Le Chanson en Angleterre au temps d'Elizabeth (1936); M. Bukofzer, Music in the Baroque Era (1947); Historical Anthol. of Music, ed. A. T. Davison and W. Apel (2v., 1949-50); A. Einstein, Essays on Music (1956); Beare; A Hist. of S., ed. D. Stevens (1960); C. M. Bowra, Primitive S. (1962). J.H.

SONNET (fr. It. sonetto, a little sound or song). A 14-line poem in iambic pentameter (normally iambic hexameter in France) whose rhyme scheme has, in practice, been widely varied despite the traditional assumption of limited freedom in this respect. The three most widely recognized forms of the s., with their traditional rhyme schemes, are the It. or Petrarchan (octave: abbaabba; sestet: cdecde or cdcdcd or a similar combination that avoids the closing couplet), the Spenserian (abab bcbc cdcd ee), and the Eng. or Shakespearean (abab cdcd efef gg). With respect to the It. pattern (by far the most widely used of the three) it will be observed that a two-part division of thought is invited, and that the octave offers an admirably unified pattern and leads to the volta (q.v.) or "turn" of thought in the more varied sestet. The effect of the abbaabba octave is truly remarkable. It is actually a blend of 3 brace-rhyme quatrains, since the middle 4 verses, whose sounds overlap the others and echo their pattern, impress the reader with a similar rhyme pattern, thus, abbaabba. Normally, too, a definite pause is made in thought development at the end of the eighth verse, serving to increase the independent unity of an octave that has already progressed with the greatest economy in rhyme sounds. Certainly it would be difficult to conceive a more artistically compact and phonologically effective pattern. The sestet, in turn, leads out of the octave and, if the closing couplet is avoided, assures a commendable variety within uniformity to the poem as a whole. The Spenserian and Shakespearean patterns, on the other hand, offer some relief to the difficulty of rhyming in Eng. and invite a division of thought into 3 quatrains and a closing or summarizing couplet; and even though such arbitrary divisions are frequently ignored by the poet, the more open rhyme schemes tend to impress the fourfold structure on the reader's ear and to suggest a stepped progression toward the closing couplet. Such matters of relationship between form and content are, however, susceptible of considerable control in the hands of a skilled poet, and the ultimate effect in any given instance may override theoretical considerations in achievement of artistic integrity.

SONNET

Most deviations from the foregoing patterns have resulted from liberties taken in rhyming, but there have been a few novelties in use of the s. that may be mentioned, among them the following: caudate (q.v.), with "tails" of added verses; continuous or iterating, on one or two rhyme sounds throughout; retrograde, reading the same backward as forward; chained or linked, each verse beginning with the last word of the preceding verse; interwoven, with medial as well as end rhyme; crown of sonnets (q.v.), a series joined together by rhyme or repeated verses, for panegyric; terza rima sonnet (q.v.), with a rhyme scheme corresponding to terza rima; tetrameter, in tetrameters instead of pentameters. Meredith's Modern Love sequence is clearly related to the s. in its themes and its abba cddc effe ghgh rhyme pattern, but whether these 16-line poems should be admitted to the canon is questionable.

Historically, s. beginnings centered about the It. pattern, and it is probable that the form resulted from the addition of a double refrain of 6 lines (2 tercets) to the 2-quatrain Sicilian strambotto (q.v.). In any event (for the origins must remain uncertain) the earliest antecedents of the "true" It. s. are credited to Giacomo da Lentino (fl. 1215-1233) whose hendecasyllables usually rhymed ababab cdecde. Although others of Lentino's contemporaries (the Abbot of Tivoli, Jacopo Mostacci, Pierro delle Vigne, Monaldo d'Aquino) used the form and established the octave-sestet divisions (with quatrain-tercet subdivisions), it remained for Guittone d'Arezzo (1230-1294) to establish the abbaabba octave, which became traditional through its preference by Dante (Vita Nuova; Canzoniere) and Petrarch (Canzoniere); and for Antonio da Tempo, in his Summa Artis Rithimici (1332), to enunciate the first theoretical discussion of the s. as a type. The sonnets of Dante to Beatrice, and of Petrarch to Laura ("spells which unseal the inmost enchanted fountains of the delight which is the grief of love" [Shelley]) normally opened with a strong statement which was then developed; but they were not unmarked by the artificiality of treatment that stemmed from variations on the Platonic love themes, an artificiality that was to be exported with the form in the 15th and 16th c. as the s. made its way to Spain, Portugal, France, the Netherlands, Poland, and England, and later to Germany, Scandinavia, and Russia; until its use was world-wide and the number of poets not using it negligible. Following Petrarch there was in Italy some diminution of dignity in use of the form (as in Serafino dall'Aquila [1466-1500]), but with the work of Tasso (1544-1595) and his contemporaries (Michelangelo, Bembo, Castiglioni) the

s. was reaffirmed as a structure admirably suited to the expression of emotion in lyrical mood, adaptable to a wide range of subject matter (love, politics, religion, etc.), and employed with skill by many writers in the centuries to follow (Alfieri, Foscolo, Carducci, D'Annunzio).

It was the Marquis de Santillana (1398-1458) who introduced the pattern to Spain, although it was not established there until the time of Juan Boscán (1490-1552) and, especially, Garcilaso de la Vega (1503-1536), and Lope de Vega (1562-1635) and other dramatists of the siglo de oro. Sá de Miranda (1485-1558) and his disciple, Antonio Ferreira, brought the s. to Portugal, where it is better known in the Rimas of Camões (1524-1580) and, more recently, in the exquisite work of Anthero de Quental (1842-1891). Clément Marot (1496-1544) and Mellin de Saint Gelais (1491-1558) introduced it to France, but it was Joachim du Bellay (1522-1560) who was most active, writing (in the Petrarchan pattern) the first non-Italian cycle, L'Olive, as well as Regrets and Les Antiquités de Rome (translated by Spenser as The Ruins of Rome). Ronsard (1524-1585) who experimented with the form in alexandrines, and Philippe Desportes (1546-1606) wrote many sonnets and were instrumental in stimulating interest both at home and in England; while Malherbe (1555-1628) put the weight of his authority behind the abbaabba ccdede or cccdced pattern in alexandrines, which became the accepted line length. After a period of decline (general throughout Europe) in the 18th c., Theophile Gautier (1811-1872) and Baudelaire (1821-1867) revived the form, which soon reached new heights in the work of Heredia, Lecomte de Lisle, Valéry, Mallarmé, and Rimbaud. Germany received the form relatively late, in the writings of G. R. Weckherlin (1584-1653) and, especially insofar as creative achievement is concerned, Andreas Gryphius (1616-1664). There followed a period of disuse until Gottfried Bürger (1747-1794) revived the form and anticipated its use by Schlegel, Eichendorff, Tieck, and other romantic writers. The sonnets of August Graf von Platen (1796-1835; Sonette aus Venedig) rank among the best in modern times, while in more recent years the mystical sequence, Sonette an Orpheus (1923), of Rilke and the writings of R. A. Schröder have brought the German s. to another high point.

In England the s. has had a fruitful history. Wyatt (1503-1542) brought the form from Italy but showed an immediate preference (possibly influenced by the work of minor writers while he was abroad) for a closing couplet in the sestet. Wyatt did, however, adhere to the Petrarchan octave, and it was Surrey (1517-1547) who established the accepted abab cdcd efef gg, a pattern more congenial to the comparatively rhyme-poor Eng. language. This pattern was used extensively in the period, but by no means exclusively for there was wide variety in rhyme schemes and line lengths. It was brought to its finest representation by Shakespeare. A rhyme scheme more attractive to Spenser (and in its first 9 lines paralleling his Spenserian stanza) was abab bcbc cddc ee, in effect a compromise between the more rigid It. and the less rigid Eng. patterns. The period also saw many s. cycles, beginning with Sidney's Astrophel and Stella (1580) and continuing in the sequences of Daniel (Delia), Drayton (Idea), Spenser (Amoretti), and Shakespeare; with a shift to dissimilar themes shortly thereafter in John Donne's Holy Sonnets. It remained for Milton to introduce the true It. pattern, to break from sequences to occasional sonnets, to give a greater unity to the form by frequently permitting octave to run into sestet (the "Miltonic" sonnet, but anticipated by the Elizabethans), and a greater richness to the texture by employing his principle of "apt numbers, fit quantity of syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another," as in his blank verse. Milton's was the strongest influence when, after a century of disuse, the s. was revived in the late 18th c. by Gray, T. Warton, Cowper, and Bowles; and reestablished in the early 19th by Wordsworth (also under Milton's influence but easing rhyme demands by use of an abbaacca octave in nearly half of his more than 500 sonnets); and by Keats, whose frequent use of the Shakespearean pattern did much to reaffirm it as a worthy companion to the generally favored Miltonic-Italian. By this time the scope of s. themes had broadened widely, and in Leigh Hunt and Keats it even embraced an unaccustomed humor. S. theory was also developing tentatively during this period (as in Hunt's "Essay on the Sonnet") to eventuate in an unrealistic extreme of purism in T.W.H. Crosland's The Eng. Sonnet (1917) before it was more temperately approached by later writers. Since the impetus of the romantic revival, the form has had a continuing and at times distinguished use, as in D. G. Rossetti (The House of Life), Christina Rossetti, E. B. Browning (Sonnets from the Portuguese), and the facile work of Swinburne. Few writers in the present century (W. H. Auden and Dylan Thomas might be named) have matched the consistent level of production found in the earlier work, although an occasional single s., such as Yeats's "Leda and the Swan," has rare beauty.

The s. did not appear in America until the last quarter of the 18th c., in the work of Colonel David Humphreys, but once introduced, the form spread rapidly if not distinctively until Longfellow (1807-1882), using the

It. pattern, lifted it in dignity and lyric tone (especially in the Divina Commedia sequence) to a level easily equal to its counterpart in England. Following him there was wide variety in form and theme, with commendable work from such writers as Lowell, George Henry Boker, and Paul Hamilton Hayne. Of the later writers E. A. Robinson, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Merrill Moore, Allen Tate, and E. E. Cummings hold a recognized place, although, space permitting, many others might be named who stand well above what Robinson called

. . . these little sonnet men

Who fashion, in a shrewd mechanic way,
Songs without souls, that flicker for a day,
To vanish in irrevocable night.

During the past century s. themes in both Europe and America have broadened to include almost any subject and mood, even though the main line of development has remained remarkably stable. Structurally, even within the traditional patterns, the type has reflected the principal influences evident in modern poetry as a whole: the sprung rhythm of Hopkins and free-verse innovations have frequently led to less metronomic movement within the iambic norm; substitutions for exact rhymes have supplied fresher sound relationships; and a more natural idiom has removed much of the artificiality that had long been a burden. This adaptability within a tradition of eight centuries' standing suggests that there will be no diminution of interest in and use of the form in the foreseeable future, and that the inherent difficulties that have kept the numbers of truly fine sonnets to an extremely small percentage of those that have been written will deter neither versifier nor genius from testing for himself the challenge of what Rossetti called

. . . a moment's monument,—

Memorial from the Soul's eternity
To one dead deathless hour.

S. Lee, Elizabethan Sonnets (2 v., 1904); E. H. Wilkins, "The Invention of the S.," MP, 13 (1915; rewritten and brought up to date in his collected Studies in It. Lit., Rome, 1957); T.W.H. Crosland, The Eng. S. (1917); R. D. Havens, "Milton and the S.," The Influence of Milton on Eng. Poetry (1922; excellent survey of the s. in 18th- and 19th-c. England); W. L. Bullock, "The Genesis of the Eng. S. Form," PMLA, 38 (1923); G. Bertoni, Il Duocento (1930); L. G. Sterner, The S. in Am. Lit. (1930); A. Meozzi, Il Petrarchismo Europeo: Secolo XVI (1934); E. Hamer, The Eng. S. (1936); L. C. John, The Elizabethan S. Sequences (1938); W. Mönch, Das Sonett (1955; the most comprehensive study to date, with extended bibliog.); J. W. Lever, The Elizabethan Love S. (1956); E. T. Prince, "The S. from Wyatt to Shakespeare," Elizabethan Poetry, ed. J. R. Brown and B. Harris (1960). L.J.Z.

SONNET CYCLE or sequence. A series of sonnets on a given theme or to a given individual. The effect is that of stanzas in a longer work, but with the difference that each sonnet retains its integrity as an independent poem. When this is not the case, as in William Ellery Leonard's moving Two Lives (1925), the sonnet loses much of its force as a type and becomes in fact "stanzaic." At times the sequence will be given added unity by use of repetition, either of rhymes or of lines, between the different poems, as in the "crown of sonnets" (q.v.). From the earliest times the cycle has been used to amplify the limited scope of the single sonnet and to reflect the many facets of the chosen theme. Among the most famous or noteworthy of these cycles may be named Dante's Vita Nuova, Petrarch's Canzoniere, du Bellay's L'Olive (the first non-It. cycle), Camões' Rimas, Sidney's Astrophel and Stella (the first cycle in England), Spenser's Amoretti, Shakespeare's Sonnets, Donne's Holy Sonnets, Wordsworth's Ecclesiastical Sonnets, Rossetti's The House of Life, E. B. Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese, George Henry Boker's A Sequence on Profane Love, Longfellow's Divina Commedia, Arthur Davison Ficke's Sonnets of a Portrait Painter, Edna St. Vincent Millay's Fatal Interview, and Rilke's Sonette an Orpheus. L.J.Z.

SORITES. See CLIMAX.

SOTADEAN (fr. Sotades, an Alexandrian poet of the 3d c. B.C.). A verse form based on the major ionic (ionicus a maiore) and essentially an ionic tetrameter brachycatalectic (---|---|---|---). Anacsis (q.v. and see IONIC) and resolutions and contractions of long syllables may occur. The S. was introduced to Latin in nondramatic verse by Ennius, but was never extensively used (Accius, Varro in his Menippean Satires, Petronius twice, and Martial once). The strictest form occurs in Petronius and Martial (3. 29):

hās cūm gēmīnā cōmpēdē | dēdicāt cā | tēnās
Sātūrne tī | bī Zoīlus | anulōs prī | ōres, with anacsis (--- in place of ---) in the third foot or, as some prefer to say, as a system of two ionics plus three trochees. See also PALINDROME.—Koster; Crusius. K.M.A.

SOUND IN POETRY. This subject has attracted much controversy. One reason is our psycho-physiological variety. Human beings are divisible into pure verbalizers who can think only in words, pure visualizers who use only visual images, and two larger groups, predominantly verbal or visual; a verbalizer unconsciously says words for his thoughts over to himself, as betrayed by his breathing. (Cf. Science News, 24 [May 1952], 7-21.) Presumably most poets "verbalize"; poems by exclusive visualizers must depend solely on images, and their sound structure will be conventional or scarcely organized (Blake? Whitman?). Many poets "chant" their verses and, even if they recite in monotone, give full play to vowel and consonant values. Berry (1962) claims that a poet's work matches the physical characteristics of his voice. With Valéry, we may consider a poem on paper as merely an inadequate "musical score."

SOURCE. Human prelanguage may have been a set of predispositions towards fluid utterances partly expressing emotion and need. Poetry, concerned so much with expression, can embody such primitive mechanisms. Expression through sound utterance (now under its own conventions) involves pitch, stress, duration, voice quality, articulatory gesture, phonetic timbre, and pattern in time: all can be organized into a formally satisfying poem or chant, or used expressively and decoratively. As music and poetry differentiate, pitch and duration are drawn more into music, articulation and phonetic timbre more into poetry.

A tendency to reduplicative phonetic patterns seems innate in man. They occur in infant babbling; in certain languages; in strong feeling; in spells; in oaths; in proverbial expressions; in oratory; and in advertisements. The chants of modern "primitive" tribes reveal a repetitive structure: refrains, word repetitions, syllable echoes; but these features are already often stylized.

SOUND AS STRUCTURE. Sound effects must be felt against the whole phonology of a language (see TONE-COLOR), the fundamentals of its verse (see ALLITERATIVE METER, CLASSICAL PROSODY, RHYME, CELTIC PROSODY, CYNHANEDD, and [for syllabic verse] METER, PROSODY); and the particular verse form. Welsh cynhanedd crystallized complex phonetic sequences. Legitimate changes rung on structural forms are often exploited musically or expressively. Thus in poll d' dnanta kātanta pārauta te dōkhmiā t' ēlthon dactyls replace spondees wherever permissible: one reason why the line is appropriate to horses cantering. If ictus (metrical beat) was present in classical verse, effects could be achieved by counterpoint with the prose accent, as claimed by W. F. Jackson Knight in Virgil; "reversal of foot" and "ionic foot" are expressive in accentual, and stress-clumping in nonsyllabic verse. The line-internal pause or caesura can be expressively shifted. Variation, and grouping, of rhyme-vowels (and rhyme-consonants) has been observed in, e.g., the Eng. Renaissance by Oras.

SOUND AS TEXTURE. The whole body of free sound in verse is available for exploitation. There are periods, usually those in which spoken verse existed side by side with sung verse, as in the Elizabethan or the European Renaissance, when conscious virtuosity in varieties of word repetition, in wordplay, and in sound echoes, is the rule; individuals have also used blatant alliteration etc.; but in civilized verse, alliteration at the expense of sincere expression often defeats the objects of poetry: cf. Poe, Swinburne. Duration-variation may be achieved by grouping sounds either "clog-gingly" or "trippingly": contrast the two 5-beat "iambic" lines "Rocks, Caves, Lakes, Fens, Bogs, Dens, and shades of death" (Milton) and "For the ripple to run over in its mirth" (Browning). Classes of vowel or consonant, somber or bright, liquid or harsh, may be grouped (see TONE-COLOR). The tissue of most verse forms a web of sound-patterning, often related to sense and mood; the poet may not have worked for it, the reader may not be aware of it, but the words were chosen, and the reader/listener reacts, under its influence; words first chosen may "attract" others of like sound, which then seem to reinforce their aura. And "le style, c'est l'homme même" is as true (and untrue) of sound as of any other feature.

FUNCTIONS OF SOUND-MANIPULATION. These may be divided into (overlapping) types, in practice rarely isolated pure. Behind them are (a) associations of sound arrangements with certain sets of words; (b) familiarity with the grammatical function, and hence with any arbitrary use, of sounds as mere labels; (c) traditional and accepted synaesthesias (see ONOMATOPOEIA, TONE-COLOR); (d) vocal/facial emotive expression; (e) instinctive satisfaction in sounds, articulations, and reiterations. Types A-C below are especially concerned with (aspect 1) the formal structure of the verse; types D-H, with (2) the sense; I-K (also D, H) with (3) the scene; L-O (G) with (4) the feeling; and P-R with (5) the aesthetic flavor. We start each of these five groups here with its crudest type. Apart from the Emphases (A, D, L) the functions in group 2 are mainly symbolic, in groups 3 and 4 mainly representational. In the face of sound effects under aspect 2 it is helpful to list the words involved in each phonetic theme; under 3 and 4 careful study of the subtleties of sensory metaphor is essential; under 5 an analysis of the patterning is needed for full understanding. Many of our examples here are necessarily too short.

A. (Under aspect 1.) Structural Emphasis (i.e.

of the form). A rhetorical addition to the formally required sound structure. E.g. gratuitous rich-rhymes; scene-end rhyming couplets in blank verse; alliterative support as in "Against this nearest cruelest of Foes / What shall Wit meditate, or Force oppose?" (Prior).

B. (Under 1.) Underpinning: relatively subtle reinforcement of the verse structure. E.g. unobtrusive sporadically rich rhymes; Milton's compensatory line-end assonance and consonance in his blank verse (Oras, 1953). Sometimes combined with C, as follows.

C. (1.) Counterpoising: arrangement of some sounds in opposition to the verse structure. Notice the imperfect rhymes, distractingly echoed by internal rhyme and submerged alliteration, in "violet,— / Solution sweet: meantime the first-wind blows / . . . sleet / Against . . . St. Agnes' . . . set." (Keats); this compensates for the next stanza repeating this rhyme, in a different place, with "beat" and a second "sleet." Owen's Exposure (with a structure of dissonant rich-rhymes) has some complicated counterpoising.

D. (2, 3.) Rubricating Emphasis (i.e. of words or images). Common; in England richest in Tudor verse. In "The turtle to her make hath tolde her tale. / Sommer is come, for euery spray now springs; / The hart hath hong his olde hed on the pale; / The buck in brake his winter cote he flings; / The fishes flote with newe repaired scale; / The [j]adder [j]all her sloughe away she slinges; / The swift swallow pursueth the flies smale; / The busy bee her honye now she minges; / Winter is worne, that was the flowers bale" (Surrey) striking echoes rubricate each image (besides cross-links such as make—brake, tolde—olde, cote—flings—flote—flies—flowers and others).

E. (2.) Tagging: punctuation of syntax or thought by sounds. Common before the romantics. In "The baiting-place of wit, the balme of woe" (Sidney), the analogous nouns in the two parallel phrases are respectively labeled with b- and w-; in "The pallor of girls' brows shall be their pall" (Wilfred Owen) the metaphor is primarily underlined by p-l / p-l.

F. (2.) Correlation: indirect support of argument by related echoes. Very common. Notice the relevance of the repeated sound-groupings in "Then farewell, world; thy vtermost I see: / Eternal Loue, maintaine thy life in me" (Sidney); "Five! the finding and sake / And cypher of suffering Christ. / . . . Sacrificed" (Hopkins). Types E and F also occur as pun and near-pun (paronomasia).

G. (2, 4.) Implication: more involved interconnection of sound, meaning, and feeling. Almost universal. Wordplay and hidden associations sometimes take part. "With his loll'd tongue he faintly licks his Prey; / His warm breath blows her flix up as she lies; / She, trembling, creeps upon the ground away, / And looks back to him with beseeching eyes" (Dryden) swarms with interlocking echoes too numerous to analyze, but including f—liliks / bl—z / fliks / l—ks; cf. "At length himself unsettling, he the pond / Stirr'd with his staff, and fixedly did look" (Wordsworth).

H. (2, 3.) Diagramming: the abstract pattern symbolizes the sense. Notice the criss-crossing sound patterns in Dryden's account of the Fire of London: "He wades the Streets, and streight he reaches cross." This has the sounds [e:dz] (w—ades) invading [stri:t] (Streets) and transforming it into [dstre:t] (and streight), then in reaches (pronounced with [ri:t—z] or [re:t—z]) sending their [z] one syllable ahead to leap over in "—s cross" [zkr—s]; thus inspiredly "imitating" the mode of spread of the flames.

I. (3.) Sound-Representation: some similarity to the relevant sounds (see ONOMATOPOEIA). Rather rare unless adulterated; its worst excesses are baroque. "The double double double beat / Of the thund'ring DRUM" (Dryden); "Sudden successive flights of bullets streak the silence" (Owen).

J. (3.) Illustrative Mime: mouth-movements recall motion or shape (cf. TONE-COLOR). Rare pure. "When Péarse summoned Cuchulain to his side, / What stalked through the Post-Office?" (Yeats); here a reader's half-conscious mouthing of the words may evoke a looming, slow-striding figure.

K. (3.) Illustrative Painting: articulations, sounds, or their patterns, correspond to appearances and nonacoustic sensations. "The horrid crags, by toppling convent crown'd, / The cork-trees hoar that clothe the shaggy steep, / The mountain-moss by scorching skies imbrown'd" (Byron) is chiefly appropriate to the ruggedness, dark tints, and dizzy heights (for analysis see TONE-COLOR).

L. (4.) Passionate Emphasis (as from the emotion). E.g. "Ruin seize thee, ruthless King" (Gray).

M. (4.) Mood-Evocation: choice of tone-colors resembling vocalizations natural to the emotion. Rare pure. Milton's sonnet of anger and grief on the massacre at Piedmont has all the octet rhymes and one of the two sestet rhymes in [o:], plus resonant octet-rhyme consonants.

N. (4.) Expressive Mime: mouth-movements ape the expression of emotion. Chiefly in dialogue. "Out of my sight, thou Serpent, that name best / Befits thee with him leagu'd, thy self as false / And hateful" (Milton): in the succession s—t / s—p—t / b—st / b—f—ts / s—lf—zf—ls / tf—l the reader's mouth is made to spit out Adam's hatred.

O. (4.) Expressive Painting: sounds, articulations, or their arrangement, correspond to feelings or impressions. Certain repeated sounds express monotony in "And the dull wheel hums doleful through the day" (Crabbe); Shelley's revolutionary fervour is conveyed in the s, sk, and sp sounds of "Liberty . . . o'er Spain, / Scattering contagious fire into the sky, / Gleamed. My soul spurned the chains of its dismay"; for analyses see TONE-COLOR.

P. (5.) Ebullience: pure exuberance or pleasure in sound. Seldom alone. "The wealthy crops of whit'ning rice / 'Mongst thyine woods and groves of spice, / For ADORATION grow; / . . . Where wild carnations blow" (Smart) includes the ten interwoven motifs w—l, th (—)i, kr—s / gr—z, ps / sp, wi, wi'n / inw, r—s / r—z, w—d, grō, ation.

Q. (5.) Embellishment: superficially "musical." More frequent through the Renaissance (cf. Surrey under D), possibly as compensation for verse not sung. "No clowde was seene, but christaline the ayre, / Laughing for joy vpon my lovely fayre" (Drayton) includes the five motifs n—kl/k . . . l—n, s—n/s . . . n, r . . . l/r, l—f/l—v, l(—)if—r.

R. (5.) Incantation: profoundly musical or magical. Not infrequent pure, but disappears during the neoclassical period. Adequate analyses impossible here. Enobarbus describing Cleopatra in the barge (A. & C. 2.2.191–94); "The Sounds, and Seas with all their finny drove / Now to the Moon in wavering Morrice move" (Milton); "Of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn" (Keats), esp. v . . . l . . . n / f . . . l—n / f—l—n; "Shrill music reach'd them on the middle sea" (Tennyson) with ilm / i / them / themi—l; "That dolphin-torn, that gong-tormented sea" (Yeats).

SURVEY (Classical, Romance, Eng. and Germanic, Slavonic). Gr. civilization achieved refinements of sound effect. Such writers as Homer, Sappho, Aeschylus, Pindar afford florid sound-patternings. Gr. and L. suffered from excess of like-endings, but other consonances are common, usually parceled out rather as in It. or Fr.: "Diomēdea d' ámbroton ksanthá pote Glaukōpis éthēke theon; / gaia d' en Thēbais hūpēdekto keraunotheīsa Dios bélesin / mántin Oikleidan, polēmoio néphos" (Pindar); which also includes such echo-progressions as: oto/ot/to/oth, po/po/pho, ám/má, deadám/den/éde/eidan, éthēketh/édekt—ke. Demetrius On Style writes of imitative words and the virtues of vivid cacophony in Homer; cites musicians who distinguish "smooth" words (vocalic, e.g. Aias), "rough" (bébrōke), etc.; defends juxtaposed vowels as harmonious; and commends long vowels and lengthened consonants (Kallistratos). In the 1st c. B.C. Dionysius of Halicarnassus writes an elaborate analysis of composition, especially sound; double letters like x are preferred for sonority, sigmatism is condemned, short vowels (especially e) are thought ugly; imitative words are illustrated from Homer (e.g. rhôkhthei "crashes out"); many Homeric examples of sound echoing sense are analyzed, some mainly rhythmical like the famous lines on Sisyphus' stone, but most phonemic.

L. writers (rhetorician-inspired?) use abundant sound-patterning, too rich for a structural code which has been suggested. There is much underpinning, embellishment, painting, sound representation, and mime. Catullus, Virgil especially, Horace, Ovid, even Juvenal, are the great practitioners: "frīgora mītescunt Zephrīs, uēr prōterit aēstās / interitūra, simul / pōmifer autumnus frūgēs effūderit, et mox / brūma recurrit iners" (Horace) has recurrent motifs in fr—g and ī (for cold), fr/f—r, fu, rū/urr/ūr, mu/um/ūm, pō, cu, terit, in, erit, t—m/tm, etc. Herescu's study concentrates much on patterns in ictus-bearing vowels (italicized in the quotation above), but without "long/short" distinction.

Early medieval L. hymns became accentual and developed rhyme. They also show texture: "Pange, lingua, gloriosi proelium certaminis, / Et super crucis tropaeo dic triumphum nobilem, / Qualiter redemptor orbis immolatus vicerit" (Venantius Fortunatus, c. 600) includes the four themes p—eli/prēli/pēr/r—pē, ēert/ēt/pēr/r—ē/ērit, up—rkru/tr—p/ktr—ūmpu/mpt—r, ōr/pr/p—r/rop/ōbil/ptorōrbi/ol.

Mediterranean vernacular poets developed a host of rhymed song-forms, etc., some with intricate repetitions like the leixa-pren. But rich textures appear too: "Quant l'erba fresqu' e-l fuelha par / E la flors botona el verjan, / E-l rossinhol autet e clar / Leva sa votz e mou son chan, / Joy ai de luy e joy ai de la flor / E joy de me e de midons major; / Daus totas partz suy de joy claus e sens, / Mas sel es joys que totz autres joys vens" (Bernart de Ventadorn, ca. 1150, in Provençal, Chrétien de Troyes and Guy de Coucy in Fr., Giacomo Pugliese in It., all 1150-1250).

It. Dante's word-classification betters Demetrius'; his onomatopoeia, implication, harmony recall Virgil's: "Ora incomincian le dolenti note / A [f]armisi sentire: or son venuto / Là [d]ove [m]olto pianto mi percuote" includes "ear-striking" ōt / to / ōlto / to / ōt and at least 13 other motifs, some with stress-shunting in co, om/mo, mī, īān, l—do, le, enti, ent/en—t, nt, ol, s—n, ve, m . . . p . . . t. Later masters are Petrarch, Boiardo, Tasso, Marino, Testi; 19-20th c.: Leopardi, Carducci, D'Annunzio, Ungaretti, Montale, Quasimodo.

In Sp., the few different vowels, never "long,"

go with a tendency to simple vowel patterns which embellish or underpin a line or neighboring lines. Renaissance masters, preluded by Mena, include Garcilaso, Luis de León, Carrillo y Sotomayor, Góngora: "De púrpura, y de nieve [-eβe] / florida la cabeza [-βe] coronado, / a dulces pastos mueve, / sin honda, ni cayado / el buen pastor, en ti su hato amado" (León); 19-20th c.: Darío, Lorca, Jiménez. Portuguese—Renaissance: Sá de Miranda and the great Camões; 17th c.: Rodriguez Lobo; 18th c.: Bocage; 19-20th c.: Quental, Junqueiro, Nobre, Castro, Pessanha, "Modernists" Sá-Carneiro and Pessoa, also Mourão-Ferreira and others of today.

Fr. The 15th-c. Grands Rhétoriciens use a host of conscious echoes and repetitions for embellishment. The 16th-c. Pléiade and their followers are rich in deliberate patterning, chiefly for implication, rubrication, painting, or incantation: "Puis tout à coup, avec sa troupe belle / D'un saut léger en l'onde se lança, / L'eau jette un son, et en tournoyant toute" (Du Bellay) has the succession tout / oup / troupe / lèjè / anl / lan / l—jè / antour / antout; in 1587 he remarks that a, o, u, m, b, s, r "sont une grande sonnerie et batterie aux vers." The Pléiade were influenced by Dionysius; they restored sung verse, and regarded recital as an important test of a harmonious style. Jacques Pelletier had introduced the notion of harmonie imitative (chiefly sound-representation); this could be exceedingly crude, as in the punning "La gentille Alouette avec son tire-lire, / Tire l'ire à l'iré, et tire-lirant tire / Vers la voute du ciel; puis son vol vers ce lieu / Vire, et désire dire: adieu Dieu, adieu Dieu" (Du Bartas).

Reaction against excess begins with Malherbe, whose echoes are discreet and more logical: "Je crains à l'avenir la faute que j'ai faite" (tagging). In the supreme artist Racine some celebrated lines are richly patterned for correlation or, as in the afflige line, for dramatic mood-evocation; usually he produces for implication a quieter sound-scambling: "Que, sévère aux méchants, et des bons le refuge, / Entre le pauvre et vous, vous prendrez Dieu pour juge" includes the 5 themes èuèr/vrèu, leref/relep, chan/jan, p—vr/voupr/pour, antrelep/prandr—d.

Romantics such as Vigny, Hugo (more bristling), Musset revived wealth of sound (including rich-rhymes), sound-representation and illustrative painting: "J'aime le son du cor, le soir, au fond des bois, / Soit qu'il chante les pleurs de la biche aux abois, / Ou l'adieu du chasseur que l'écho faible accueille, / Et que le vent du nord porte de feuille en feuille" (Vigny) includes the 8 themes: swa/bwa/swa/bwa, leurdeula/ladyeud/euy (3ce); ôf/ôf and ab/jab with dissonances; f . . . euy/feuy/feuy, ilch/fich/uch, pl/bl, or/or/or; and "imitative" vowels. Baudelaire employs rather subtler patterns for mystical correlation and expressive painting. The symbolistes meant various things by "music," but their practice often involved elaborate incantation. Mallarmé occasionally has wordplay, perhaps from Poe: "Tristement dort une mandore"; his swan-sonnet in i is his best-known example of extended complex patterning, there for painting and implication; but the most intricately interbonded wholes in any language are perhaps his shipwreck and ptyx sonnets, partly syllable for syllable, partly in whole lines and rhymes. Verlaine's "music" often depends on short lines with well-focused consonants or vowels. The Belgian Verhaeren's clamant echoings (only onomatopoeic in "Un long appel, qui long, parmi l'écho, ricoche") often amount to word-play. Valéry's exuberant patterns, for painting or emphasis, are sustained but virile: "Harmonieuse MOI, différente d'un songe, / Femme flexible et ferme aux silences suivis / D'actes purs! . . . Front limpide, et par ondes ravis, / Si loin que le vent vague et velu les achève" (© Editions Gallimard 1917 tous droits réservés).

Jules Romains and others instituted ACCORD (q.v.—vowel-less rhymes classified like true Fr. rhymes). Trannoy and Grammont recognize the importance of total vowel-melody in Fr.: e.g. "Voici la verte Écosse et la brune Italie" (Musset) has a i / a è / é o / / é a u / i a i with satisfying grouping and contrast; Grammont's classification (see TONE-COLOR, as also for the earlier instrumentalistes and a modern Belgian critic of sound-suggestion, Delbouille) is more helpful than Trannoy's.

Eng. (see also section FUNCTIONS in this article). In contrast to the simpler syllabic structure of Fr., Eng. fosters strung-out and scrambled patterns, often all-consonant. Alliterative meter (q.v.) persisted to ca. 1400, but Chaucer's occasional patternings could represent ex-classical rhetoric. After a relatively dead period while the phonology underwent rapid changes, Wyatt's songs and Surrey's poems usher in the Renaissance; owing much to It. influence, including Surrey's assonances. Encouraged by Fr. and It. models and a new joy in language, writers produced a wealth of (syntactically) repetitive devices, codified by, e.g., Puttenham. Pun and wordplay mingled with often florid alliteration: Drayton writes one sonnet "Nothing but No and I, and I and No . . ." which is a pas-de-deux for these two syllables. Edwardes, Sackville, Greville, Nashe, Raleigh, Daniel, Drayton, employ plangent echoes; Constable, Spenser, Southwell are more subdued: "The sea of Fortune doth not ever flow, / She draws her favours to the lowest ebb, / Her tides hath equal times to come and go, / Her loom doth weave the fine and coarsest web," with weave assonating with favours. Shakespeare, sharing all the rhetorical tricks in his poems and early plays, also develops painting, implication, incantation: "Come, seeling Night, / Skarfe vp . . . pittiful . . . bloodie and inuisible Hand / Cancell and teare to pieces that great Bond / Which keeps me pale. Light thickens, and the Crow / Makes Wing to th' Rookie Wood" (including the seven themes [k—ms—l / sk—f / f—l / v—z—b—l / k—ns—l / k—psm—p—l], [bl—d / nd / bl / nd / b—nd], [pi:s / i:ps], [nd / nd], [k—sm . . . e: / me:ks], [θɪk / ð—k / ð . . . ki], [ks / k—sm / θɪk—z / m—kswi / ð—kiw]). Writers like William Browne, Quarles, Herbert, continue repetition and harmony into the next century. Milton in maturity develops expression, correlation, implication, underpinning.

With Waller and Dryden and the heroic couplet forthright rhetoric increases and incantation dies down: "A Race unconquer'd, by their Clime made bold, / The Calidonians." Pope is richest in correlation and implicatory harmonies: "awakens ev'ry grace, / And calls forth all the wonders of her face"; he often conducts melodiously varied repetition of stressed vowels within alliteration: "Now feels my heart its long forgotten heat"; but "The Sound must seem an echo to the Sense" may refer to rhythm. Thomson's rubrication and Johnson's rhetoric are heavy; Dyer, Akenside, Goldsmith, more subtly implicatory: "The spring / Distills her dews, and from the silken gem / Its lucid leaves unfolds"; Gray paints delicately; Collins and Smart are flamboyant.

The commonest rhyme-vowel was and is ā/ai (now pronounced [eɪ]), but Pope seems especially addicted to it (25 per cent, less -r, of perfect rhymes in Windsor Forest, especially "shades"; and assonance everywhere); however, ee, ī, oh appear to gain ground through Keats to Tennyson; later short and dark rhyme-vowels increase. Romantics gave jostling variations their head: Keats is lushly incantatory (with some false notes), Shelley passionate often overwrought: "I stood within the city distinterred; / And heard the autumnal leaves like light footfalls / Of spirits passing through the streets; and heard / The mountain's slumberous voice at intervals / Thrill through these roofless halls; / The oracular thunder penetrating shook / The listening soul in my suspended blood" (Latinesque in its richness and onomatopoeia). Tennyson weaves rather facile spells. Poe, though hailed apostle by Baudelaire and Mallarmé, recalls baroque excess and effect-seeking. Arnold is a milder Gray. Swinburne whips his verses along with consonants. Hopkins' welter of patterns reflects his richly "inscaped" visual world and intensity of response, as well as his interest in Welsh cynghanedd; he reintroduced nonsyllabic verse:

"Evening strains to be time's vast, | womb-of-all, home-of-all, hearse-of-all night" (4+4 beats). Housman revived a starker alliterative rhetoric. Owen experimented with florid echoes, some for prophetic emphasis, and introduced vowel-less rich-rhyme (brutes / brats) expressing 1914-18 shock and disillusionment. Yeats developed (with arresting rhythms) occasional richness and rarer "musical" organization of the whole (Byzantium); Eliot also, but with much wordplay; both often use thin sounds (abstract vocabulary). Wallace Stevens, another word-repeater, could offer a suave resonance or an untamed clangor. Dylan Thomas used Welsh extravagance eventually subordinated to traceable implications.

German. Simple alliteration survives piecemeal (Luther). The 17th c. has baroque devices. Klopstock and Claudius are subtler. G. sound-echoes, denser than Fr. or Eng., are more florid than It. or Sp. Theorists attend most to vowels. Goethe sets the tone (musical, pictorial): "Ihr seid mir hold, ihr gönnt mir diese Träume, / Sie schmeicheln mir und locken alte Reime. / Mir wieder selbst, von allen Menschen fern, / Wie bad' ich mich in euren Düften gern!" includes (for him) the succession ihr'aitmühr / traime // schmai'eln-mühr / teraime // mühr / lenm-nschen / m / inairen; the Erkönig is noted for painting, the Hochzeitslied for crude onomatopoeia.

Hölderlin is sonorously rich, then starker. Tieck experiments with blatant echoes; Eichendorff is plangently, sustainably Shelleian: "Und sie sehn ihn fröhlich steigen / Nach den Waldeshöhen hinaus, / Hören ihn von fern noch geigen, / Und gehn all vernügt nach Haus" (cf. Vigny): note motifs in fr/fer, n—ch, al, f—n, hö—n, gn/gen, ehn. Droste-Hülshoff has bold syllabic effects; Mörike, Storm, fine painting, incantation. C. F. Meyer has dense echoes (implication): "Wolken, meine Kinder, wandern gehen / Wollt ihr? Fahret wohl! auf Wiedersehen! / Eure wandellustigen Gestalten / Kann ich nicht in Mutterbanden halten." George is measured, tableau-depictive; Hofmannsthal is incantatory; Rilke develops from undisciplined floridity to richness organized for bizarre correlations and implications.

Dutch Renaissance masters include Hooft and Vondel; 19-20th c.: Perk, Kloos, above all Verwey (e.g. De Terrassen van Meudon), and Mok.

Rus. masters include: Pushkin; symbolists such as Bryusov, Bal'mont (overdone alliteration) and Blok; Svetaeva, Akhmatova, and Pasternak. The postsymbolist formalist movement, which spread to other Slav countries, had much to say on the interaction of sound (i.e. both "verbal orchestration" through phonetic repetitions, and rhythm) with meaning. Polish masters of sound include Mickiewicz, Śłowacki, Tuwim, and Pawlikowska; Czech: Kollár, Neruda, Wolker.

See also ACCORD, ALLITERATION, ASSONANCE, CONSONANCE, DISSONANCE, ECHO, EUPHONY, NEAR RHYME, ONOMATOPOEIA, PHONETIC EQUIVALENCE, REPETITION, RHYME, SYZYGY, TONE-COLOR.

H. Werner, Die Ursprünge der Lyrik (1924); A. I. Trannoy, La musique des vers (1929); Patterson; M. M. Macdermott, Vowel Sounds in Poetry (1940); L. P. Wilkinson, "Onomatopoeia and the Sceptics," cq, 36 (1942) W. F. J. Knight, Roman Vergil (1944); S. Bonneau, L'univers poétique d'Alexandre Blok (1946); M. Cressot, Le style et ses techniques (1947); M. Grammont, Petit traité de versification française (13e éd., 1949); T. Pfeiffer, Umgang mit Dichtung (6. Aufl., 1949); A. Spire, Plaisir poétique et plaisir musculaire (1949); D. Alonso, Poesía española: ensayo de métodos y límites estilísticos (1950); D. T. Mace, "The Doctrine of Sound and Sense in Augustan Poetic Theory," RES, n.s. 2 (1951); D. I. Masson, "Patterns of Vowel and Consonant in a Rilkean Sonnet," MLR, 46 (1951); A. Oras, "Surrey's Technique of Phonetic Echoes," JEGP, 50 (1951); R. Peacock, "Problème des Musikalischen in der Sprache," Weltliteratur, Festg. f. F. Strich (1952); S. S. Prawer, German Lyric Poetry (1952); D. I. Masson, "Vowel and Consonant Patterns in Poetry," JAAC, 12 (1953); D. I. Masson, "Word and Sound in Yeats' Byzantium," ELH, 20 (1953); A. Oras, "Echoing Verse Endings in Paradise Lost," South Atl. Studies f. S. E. Leavitt (1953); A. Stein, "Structures of Sound in Milton's Verse," KR, 15 (1953); Wellek and Warren; D. I. Masson, "Free Phonetic Patterns in Shakespeare's Sonnets," Neophilologus, 38 (1954); H. W. Belmore, Rilke's Craftsmanship (1954); W. Kayser, Das sprachliche Kunstwerk (3. Aufl., 1954); H. Kökeritz, "Rhetorical Word-Play in Chaucer," PMLA, 69 (1954); F. Scarfe, The Art of Paul Valéry (1954); D. Alonso, Estudios y ensayos gongorinos (1955); V. Erlich, Rus. Formalism: History—Doctrine (1955); D. I. Masson, "Wilfred Owen's Free Phonetic Patterns," JAAC, 13 (1955); A. Oras, "Intensified Rhyme Links in The Faerie Queene," JEGP, 54 (1955); E. R. Vincent, "Dante's Choice of Words," It. Studies, 10 (1955); J. Hollander, "The Music of Poetry," JAAC, 15 (1956); Sound and Poetry, ed. N. Frye (1957); John Keats: a Reassessment, ed. K. Muir (1958); N. I. Herescu, La poésie latine: étude des structures phoniques (1960); D. I. Masson, "Thematic Analysis of Sound in Poetry," Proc. of the Leeds Phil. & Lit. Soc., Lit. & Hist. Sec., 9, pt. 4 (1960); F. Berry, Poetry and the Physical Voice (1962); C. C. Smith, "La musicalidad del Polifemo" [Góngora], RFE, 44 (1962); D. I. Masson, "Sound & Sense in a Line of Poetry," Brit. J. of Aesth., 3 (1963). See also I. Fónagy,

"Communication in Poetry," Word, 17 (1961); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden L. Artistry (1963).

D.I.M.

SOUTH AFRICAN POETRY. I. IN AFRIKAANS. The Afrik. language had to struggle for recognition. It developed, like Eng. and the Romance languages, by dropping the inflections and has become, as Sir Patrick Duncan said, an instrument fit for use in the universities and capable of expressing the subtle needs of poetry. In an unpublished letter Roy Campbell said some twenty-five years ago: "The Afrikaans language is today as full of adventure for the bold and daring as was ever any language in history and unique among contemporary tongues for youth and freshness." Sir Thomas Holland, the late Principal of Edinburgh University, wrote in 1936: "Could any man fail to regard with less than admiration the true portrait of the rough old Voortrekker that A. G. Visser has outlined in a few words? For English readers I will offer a translation: 'With children about my bed, / I feel my pilgrimage is done; this is the last out-span—'".

When Afrik. first appeared in printed form (from ca. 1875), it leaned heavily on the literature of Europe. President Reitz translated Scott and humorous pieces from Burns, incidentally showing a quality that has distinguished the Afrikaner from most of his forebears in Holland, a sense of humor. This quality is seen preeminently in A. G. Visser and in some of C. M. van den Heever's work, but has become obscured in the stress and strain of modern conflicts, and has been superseded sometimes by verse that is itself obscure.

Even in the early days, Afrik. poetry diverged from the poetry of Holland with which the cultural contacts were always tenuous and uncertain. It became deeply rooted in the soil and did not look to another home overseas. The most telling descriptions of the S. Afr. scene are in Afrik., but, as in the case of Eng. verse, the later Afrik. poets developed the universal sense of poetry. The most spontaneous of the Afrik. poets, and also the most careless, is the late C. L. Leipoldt (1880-1947). He had a very intimate knowledge and experience of nature and a wide sympathy with human beings. Writing after the S. Afr. War (1899-1902), he expressed the bitter suffering of his people; but he outgrew bitterness and attained a generous humanity. Technically his work is criticized by the younger poets; but it contains more of the real substance of poetry than theirs, in spite of its apparent artlessness: He wants to hear songs of the veld and its denizens, "of clouds and of seas and of mountains, / But never, no never, of gold." The shadow side of the gold discoveries is frequently found in the earlier poets. Similar to Leipoldt is Toon van den Heever (1894-1956): "In the Highveld, in the open, where the sky is broad above, / Where the grasses skip like lambs that leave the fold," it is still possible to breathe freely and to believe in the love of Heaven, while the gold mines that draw the labor of the impoverished farmer are the negation of these values.

Politics have had a marked effect on Afrik. poetry, but the major poets have risen above party strife. C. M. van den Heever (1902-57) published in 1955 Hundred Sonnets, which show depth and beauty. He is one of the older poets who preferred traditional forms, a disciple of the late J. D. du Toit (Totius, 1877-1953), who, with Jan Celliers and D. F. Malherbe and Leipoldt form the pillars of the earlier Afrik. poetry. A writer of very great merit and sensitivity, who may in the future be ranked above many of the popular ones, is Eugène Marais: "A drop of gall is in the sweetest wine; / In joyous mirth there yet are tears of grief" (tr. A. E. Thorpe).

With the widening interest in technique it was inevitable a new school of poets should arise in the 1930's. They were influenced by writers like T. S. Eliot and sought new forms of expression and new themes. They turned away from the romantic idea and from what they called rhetoric. They adapted themselves to the streamlined world of modern technology and looked on language with a semantic eye. Chief of these poets is N. P. van Wyk Louw, who has become celebrated for beauty of expression in a modern form, as has D. J. Opperman, and for his search for new values. There are indications, as in the case of van Wyk Louw's brother, W. E. G. Louw, that the search for new values may lead back to ancient universal standards. In Ernst van Heerden, too, we find a modern poet with a fine feeling for language. Peter Blum has a strange attraction and is full of influences derived from continental Europe.

Sensitive poetry has been published by W. A. de Klerk and G. A. Watermeyer; by Elisabeth Eybers and the Jewess Olga Kirsch, now living in Israel; and by the colored writers S. V. Petersen (whose poetry was crowned in 1959 by the Suid-Afrikaanse Akademie), P. J. Philander, and Adam Small. A new development is poetry in the mixed (Eng.-Afrik.) language of the colored folk written vividly by the Uys Krige and Adam Small. I. W. van der Merwe (Boerneef) has recently gone in the same direction and reproduced in verse the actual patois of the nonwhites, sometimes obtaining very vivid and striking effects and penetrating into the soul of primitive people. This new interest in the feelings and habits of the underprivileged may be of great significance.

I. D. du Plessis, however, a distinguished poet of the older group, ably interpreted the life of the Cape Malays in melodious traditional meters. More than anyone else, he has identified himself with the traditions of the "Colored People." Elisabeth Eybers is outstanding among women writers of Afrik. poetry. She preserves a fine melody in her verse and a fine sense of form. But it is her deep and genuine feeling and her keen observation that specially distinguish her writing. In this poetry that springs from the soil, but is widening its horizons, perhaps the most remarkable figure is that of Uys Krige who spent years in the Mediterranean with Roy Campbell, and has expressed his deep sympathy with Sp. work. Often in his work, as in Leipoldt's, we find phrases of Afrik. so rooted in the soil that they defy translation.

Thus Afrik. poetry has developed from a pioneering stage to a position that will bear comparison with modern verse in most parts of the world.

ANTHOLOGIES: Afrikaanse Natuurpoësie, ed. P. J. Nienaber (1949); Zuid-Afrikaanse Poësie, ed. R. Antonissen (1950); Lied van die Land (1954) and Groot Verseboek (4th ed., 1955), both ed. D. J. Opperman; Afrikaanse Verse, ed. D. F. Malherbe (1955); Digterstemme, ed. J. Kromhout (1956); Janus, ed. L. Herrman and S. Goldblatt (1962; bilingual anthol.).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: C. M. v. d. Heever and T. J. Haarhoff, The Achievement of Afrik. (1934); T. J. Haarhoff, Afrik., Its Origin and Development (1936) and "S. Afr. Lit. in Afrik.," Chambers Ency. (1950); F. E. J. Malherbe, Aspekte van Afrikaanse Literatuur (1940); P. J. Nienaber, Ons Eerste Digtters (1940), Geskiedenis van die Afrikaanse Letterkunde, I (with G. S. Nienaber, 1941) and Perspektief en Profiel (1951); R. Antonissen, Schets van den Ontwikkelingsgang der Zuid-Afrik. Letterkunde (1946); G. Dekker, Afrik. Literatuurgeskiedenis (4th ed., 1947); F. E. J. Malherbe, Afrik. Lewe en Letterkunde (1958); N. P. van Wyk Louw, Swaarte en Ligtepunte (1958); D. J. Opperman, Wiggelstok (1959); E. van Heerden, Rekenskap (1963).

II. IN ENGLISH. The British settlers came to S. Africa in 1820, and like the early Romans, they had to bend to the task of colonization and opening up the country, with little time for the cultural side of life. When they did begin to write poetry it was of a nostalgic type, following closely the forms established in Britain. Yet even as early as Thomas Pringle (1789-1834), of whose poem, The Desert, Coleridge wrote that it was "among the most perfect lyrics in our language," we find that the spirit of the veld: "... I sit apart by the desert stone / Like Elijah at Horeb's cave alone."

It has been held against the earlier poets that their verse was merely descriptive. But Francis Carey Slater (1876-1958) did more than write strikingly descriptive lines like: "The wing-foot sprinkbok's leaping loveliness." In The Trek he made a generous effort to understand the Afrikaner and in Dark Folk he showed his sympathy for the Bantu. The late Arthur Shearley Cripps (1869-1952) was a Rhodesian missionary who interpreted the life of the native in terms of haunting pathos and beauty and expressed his gratitude to the veld "that gave me my lost manhood back."

It was realized more and more that genuine poetry must be based on direct personal experience and that symbols and colors cannot be the same as those of Eng. poetry in Britain in a land where nature takes a different form and May falls in mid-winter. And similarly, the experience of a multiracial society produced an outlook that was necessarily different from that of those who formed their opinions by looking on from a distance.

A poet who has not yet received due recognition is Mary Morison Webster. She represents an advance (to the universality of art), from merely descriptive poetry and poetry related to local affairs. Her verse has great beauty and reminds us of Elizabeth Barrett Browning: "Now with this love shall I walk regally, / Henceforth shall I go proudly as a queen. . . ."

Another poet whose work will be recognized is Adèle Naudé who is deeply concerned with the interpretation of nature and the spiritual sources of inspiration. Like most S. Afr. poets, she keeps a balance between the traditional and the free forms of verse. To the same group belong the younger poets, like Roy Macnab and Anthony Delius who has established himself as a sensitive poet, versed in the use of modern technique and alive to the racial problems of our time. The younger poets are feeling their way to a significant symbolism and trying to transcend the one dimensional type of verse that used to dominate the scene. Especially is this true of Guy Butler who holds the chair of Eng. at Rhodes University in Grahamstown and who has edited the Oxford Book of South Afr. Verse. He has been interpreting the racial problems of the country in verse; but his dramatic verse is less successful than his lyrics. Racial themes enter inevitably into the writing of the younger generation and they have established a fashion that is not always followed with balance and sanity. An Afrik. poet, G. A. Watermeyer, has essayed a long poem in Eng.: Atlantis, or The Crying of the Waters, which contains some remarkable descriptive poetry, though the language needs revision.

But the chief poet on the Eng. side is without doubt Roy Campbell (1902-57). He kept, throughout, to the traditional form of poetry. There is a virility in his verse that stands out in contrast to the introverted and affected poetry that is merely self-centered. He spent many years away from his native land, yet he had a stronger and healthier S. Afr. feeling than many who have never left their country. His poem on the Zulu Girl breathes the spirit of Africa, and his verse is taut like a strung bow. His poems contain much of his experience in Spain: "Toledo, when I saw you die / And heard the roof of Carmel crash. . . ."

SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY

On the whole we see a steady progress to an Eng. S. Afr. poetry that is not merely an imitation of British tradition, but contains a spirit that springs from the soil. It is here that Afrik. poetry has an advantage: it has greater direct inspiration and is not related to Holland as the earlier Eng. verse in S. Africa was related to England. There is a corresponding danger of inbreeding and parochialism; but this is being surmounted.

ANTHOLOGIES: The Centenary Book of S. Afr. Verse, 1800 to 1925 (1925) and The New Centenary Book of S. Afr. Verse (1945), both ed. F. C. Slater; Rhodesian Verse, 1888-1928 (1938) and A New Anthol. of Rhodesian Verse, both ed. J. Snelling (1950); S. Afr. Poetry, ed. R. Macnab and C. Gultson (1948); Poets in S. Africa, ed. R. Macnab (1958); A Book of S. Afr. Verse, ed. G. Butler (1959).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: M. Nathan, S. Afr. Lit. (1925); E. R. Seary, "S. Afr. Lit. in Eng.," Chambers Ency. (1950); G. M. Miller and H. Sergeant, A Crit. Survey of S. Afr. Poetry in Eng. (1957).

T.J.H.

SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY† had its origins in the classical tradition of the Sp. and It. Renaissance. At first, it was written by Spaniards for Spaniards. The Am. setting appeared only as an exotic world to captivate the fancy of Europeans. As some of the soldier-poets stayed in America a strange sense of attachment and loyalty for the New World developed in their writings. Soon they began to express the saga of the Conquest with a social consciousness which was not entirely European, but rather the result of humanism tested under the forces of war and death in the dramatic adventure of the Am. Conquest. These fabulous soldier-poets, of whom Alonso de Ercilla (1533-1594) is the most eminent example, could not bring themselves to follow exactly the fashion of It. epic poetry. There was no need to make up adventures in America. The poet had hardly anything to invent. Not only was he fighting Indians, but his own allies as well, and quite often he wrote his poems to secure royal favor, or to promote the cause of a kind patron or to thwart a personal enemy. His characters were very real indeed.

Heroines were a luxury with which he could dispense. Romance was used sparingly and only to break the monotony of narrative. Touched by the self-sacrificing attitude of the Indian people and by the un-Christian exploitation of which they were victims, these poets glorified their enemies and presented them to the European reader of the 16th and 17th c. as pure and noble creatures driven to desperation by the evil ambitions of Western Civilization. The Black Legend thus was born and the foundations were laid for the idealization of the primitive man to be expounded by the Fr. philosophers of the 18th c.

Sp. Am. epic poetry of the 16th and 17th c., then, differed somewhat from the epic poetry of the European Renaissance and one could say that a poet such as Ercilla actually developed an original form of epic which might be described as follows: his poem has no individual hero, and the poet sings the birth of a nation, exalting the people, both of Spain and of America; Ercilla devotes a great deal of space to the narrative of his own adventures; the intention is more political and social than purely artistic. From the purely literary viewpoint Ercilla's epic blends the direct realism of primitive epic poetry and the artistic flair of the It. Romanzi. Ercilla's masterpiece La Araucana is divided into three parts and they appeared separately in 1569, 1578, and 1589. He had a school of imitators and among them one is still remembered by critics: Pedro de Oña (1570-1643?), a Chilean, whose poem Arauco domado appeared in 1596 and who is more appreciated now for the lyric quality of El Vasauero.

There was another kind of soldier in the Sp. conquest of America, just as fearless and determined as the heavily armored Conquistador: the missionary. Between the cross and the sword the Am. Indian found his way into the literary world of Western civilization. Since the priest-poet could not deal directly with contemporary wars, he wrote sacred verse on subjects taken from the Middle Ages and ancient history. The best examples of this type of epic produced in Sp. America are: La Cristiada by Fray Diego de Hojeda (1570?-1615), an Andalusian by birth, who lived and died in Lima; and El Bernardo o la victoria de Roncesvalles (1624) by Bernardo de Balbuena (1561-1627), who lived in Mexico. Relegated to obscurity by the popular success of Ercilla, the priest-poets withdrew more and more into the learned isolation of their monasteries and from there engaged in rhetorical contests which marked the beginning of baroque poetry in Sp. America. They opened their hearts and their minds to the intellectual pyrotechnics of the great Góngora, the Sp. master of euphuism, and vied with each other in the art of expressing deep concepts in a syntax laden with L. and Gr. complexities. Testimony of these contests is Carlos de Sigüenza y Góngora's (1645-1700) Triunfo parténico, and proof of Góngora's predominance among the Sp. Am. baroque poets is the Apologético en favor de don Luis de Góngora (1662) by the Peruvian Juan de Espinosa Medrano (1632-1688), also known by the nickname of "El Lunarejo." It is obvious that these and other poets of the same period did have an inkling of what Góngora was attempting to accomplish in his poetry. They knew that in his rhetorical labyrinth he was creating a poetic language of his own and building with it a world of fantasy that stood defiantly against the logic of classical realism. He was the precursor of present day "Abstractionists." But, in general, his disciples failed him. One alone approached him in deepness of thought and poetic charm: Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1648-1695), the Mexican nun who excelled in every literary genre in which she chose to write. She produced comedies, dramas, and religious plays; she wrote an autobiographical essay, Respuesta a Sor Filotea de la Cruz (1691) that stands even today as a model of independent thinking and brilliant argumentation; she wrote poetry in the popular vein, and her "Villancicos" can be counted among the most charming lyric poetry in the history of Sp. letters; she emulated the great euphuistic poets of Spain, Góngora and Calderón, in Primer Sueño, and produced an interpretation of the subconscious world which, for its imagery and fascinating poetic structure stands today with the best creations of surrealism; she wrote of love with an insight and a profound understanding which have made the critics wonder if a real passion might not have been the reason for her religious seclusion. One example might give the reader an idea of the excellence of her love sonnets, which the critics have compared to those of Lope de Vega and Shakespeare:

† In Supplement, see also PUERTO RICAN POETRY.

Love, at the first, is fashioned of agitation,
 Ardors, anxiety, and wakeful hours;
 By danger, risk, and fear it spreads its powers,
 And feeds on weeping and on supplication.

It learns from coolness and indifference,
 Preserves its life beneath faithless veneers,
 Until, with jealousy or with offense,
 It extinguishes its fire in its tears.

Love's beginning, middle, and its end are these:
 Then why, Alcino, does it so displease That Celia, who once loved you, now should leave you?

Is that a cause for sorrow and remorse?
 Alcino mine, no, love did not deceive you:
 It merely ran its customary course.

(Translated by S. G. Morley.)

Sp. Am. baroque poetry was a hothouse flower, nursed by artifice, and killed by artifice. Far away from literary academies and the solitude of the cloisters a new poetry was slowly coming into being: a rough, impetuous song of mountains, pampas, rivers, and seas. This poetry was the Am. descendant of the Sp. Romancero. Old Sp. ballads were on the lips of the Conquistadors and, used as they were in the manner of proverbs, served to illustrate many a decision or to give a historical twist to local incidents. Hernán Cortés was quick to quote an old ballad, if we are to believe his historian Bernal Díaz del Castillo. Perpetuated by oral tradition, these ballads underwent colorful modifications and eventually came to express the Am. spirit that was treasuring them. From the great variety of subjects in the Sp. Romancero Sp. Am. people chose those that specially appealed to their imagination, and worked on them with exuberant fantasy. They made and remade the adventures of Charlemagne, El Cid, Los Infantes de Lara, Conde Alarcos and Juan de Austria. They memorized the deeds of famous bandits and invented new outlaws, romantically brave, full of vengeance against the Sp. masters and the wealthy creoles. This was the birth of the so-called Gaucho poetry (q.v.), which developed from the time of the arrival of the Conquistadors in the 15th c. through colonial times and reached its peak in the second half of the 19th c.

Heavily influenced by the liberal philosophy of the Fr. encyclopaedists and expressing themselves in the verbose manner of the Spaniard Manuel José Quintana, Sp. Am. poets rose at the beginning of the 19th c. to sing the War of Independence. Their poetry was lofty in ideas but exceedingly poor if judged from a strict artistic viewpoint. The most eminent of these poets were the Argentine Vicente López (1815-1903), the Chilean Camilo Henríquez (1769-1824?), and the Mexicans Andrés Quintana Roo (1787-1851) and Anastasio de Ochoa (1783-1833).

The young scions of wealthy Am. families, who had the fortune to study in France, Spain, and England, absorbed the political and literary effervescence created by the romantic movement. They were joined by the exiles, who plotted from Paris and London the overthrow of the Sp. rulers in America. Napoleon's invasion of Spain brought about the political independence of Sp. America and as the new republics were coming into existence the political and literary expatriates started their journey back home. Romanticism took root in Sp. America without the structure of a movement. Poets wrote romantic poems without realizing they were doing so. A Cuban, José María Heredia (1803-1839), brought up in the best neoclassical tradition, wrote the first romantic poem in the Sp. language: En el Teocalli de Cholula (1820), ten years before the romantic movement was launched in Spain. His themes were an idealization of the Mexican landscape, decadence, and death. The poet searches for the expression of an ideal beauty but his words are only approximations lost among mysterious echoes in an atmosphere of melancholy and disillusionment. Another of his compositions, Niagara, was perhaps his best poem. His description of the waterfall, eloquent and impassioned, his masterly blending of landscape and mood—solitude, homesickness, an invocation to God—make of this poem a true example of the best Sp. Am. romanticism. Two other poets contributed also to the introduction of romanticism in Sp. America: José Joaquín Olmedo (1780–1847) born in Ecuador and author of A la victoria de Junin: Canto a Bolívar; and Andrés Bello (1781–1865), the eminent Venezuelan humanist whose poem Silva a la agricultura de la zona tórrida, although of dubious artistic merit, is truly Am. in subject matter and intent. The expression of both these poets is strictly bound to classical norms, but the love for their homeland, their deep lyrical feeling for the beauties of the Am. landscape, their glorification of Am. heroes, their use of Indian words, transcend rhetorical limitations and give their compositions an undeniable romantic meaning.

Sp. Am. romanticism bloomed in the second half of the 19th c. Its success as a school was strengthened by the presence of a number of distinguished Sp. poets who had come to America in search of wealth and honors. Among these poets two should be remembered for the influence they had on their Sp. Am. contemporaries: José Joaquín de Mora (1783–1864), who settled down as a teacher in Chile and traveled extensively in America before returning to Spain, and the famous José Zorrilla, who spent a short time in Mexico. Perhaps because of the fact that romanticism had come late to the New World many of its most important representatives wrote in the romantic fashion denying all the time that they belonged to this school. They realized that romanticism was a thing of the past in Europe and they knew that Fr. poetry was already undergoing a transformation which soon would crystallize in parnassianism and symbolism. This reluctance to accept the romantic nature of their poetry produced an odd situation: Andrés Bello and his Chilean disciples, and the Argentine Domingo Faustino Sarmiento and his own disciples, polemicized on the need to create a literary style truly American; Bello was identified as a classicist and Sarmiento as a defender of romanticism. But Bello had been a powerful factor in the establishment of romanticism in Sp. America, not only as a poet but as a translator as well, and Sarmiento had savagely ridiculed romanticism in his newspaper articles. . . . The fact is that they both were arguing for one and the same thing, only from different viewpoints: they wanted a poetry that would reflect the genius of the New World, a new and forceful expression which would exalt its people to create their own civilization. Bello had an eclectic mind and wished to benefit from the classical heritage as well as from modern achievements; above all, he had complete faith in the genius of Spain. Sarmiento, on the other hand, took the view that Spain had run its course, that Sp. Americans should sever all ties with her and open their minds to the fresh and invigorating influence of France.

The young poets, whether following Bello or Sarmiento, emulated models which sang in a surprisingly similar key: Zorrilla or Espronceda, Chateaubriand or Lamartine or Hugo. Sp. Am. poets suddenly discovered themselves at odds with bourgeois society, they fought tyranny, they went into exile, they longed for the homeland, they felt bitter and rejected, they sang of the glories of Greece, Poland, and Mexico in the struggle for their independence, they even evoked the Middle Ages, although more often historical interest led them to a colorful Indian past; they took the ocean as a symbol, twilight as the emblem of their melancholy; they wrote legends and historical plays—in a word, they produced romanticism. They are too numerous to list; few are remembered today as first-rate poets; among these one should mention: the Cuban Gabriel de la Concepción Valdés (1809–1844) also known as Plácido el Mulato; the Argentines José Mármol (1817–1871) whose fiery diatribes against Rosas, the dictator, gained him the admiration of his people, Esteban Echeverría (1805–1851) Rafael Obligado (1851–1920), and Olegario Andrade (1839–1882); Guillermo Blest Gana, a Chilean (1829–1905), author of two or three memorable sonnets; the Peruvians Carlos Augusto Salaverry (1831–1890) and Manuel González Prada (1848–1918); the Mexicans Manuel Acuña (1849–1873) and Juan de Dios Peza (1852–1910); and the Uruguayan Juan Zorrilla de San Martín (1855–1931) whose poem Tabaré (1888) is one of the landmarks of Sp. Am. romanticism.

Gradually the romantic fever subsided and the poets who began to write in the last third of the 19th c. showed a growing concern for refinement and sophistication: Eloquence is toned down. The desire to escape reality becomes a search for the exotic and the decadent. No longer do the expatriates weep for a distant homeland; they enjoy the foreign places they visit and write about them with elegance and a sort of wicked irresponsibility. They are still romantic, of course, and many refuse to go the way of damnation singing its praises. Instead, they pine away in touching "Nocturnos" and commit suicide. These, the suicides, are referred to by some critics as "the precursors of modernism." Two of them are good, brilliant poets in a dated sort of way: Julián del Casal (1863-1893), a Cuban, author of some of the saddest poetry written in Sp., and José Asunción Silva (1865-1896) a Colombian, perhaps the greatest Sp. Am. lyric poet of the 19th c. What makes these poets, and the others referred to as "precursors of modernism," different from their romantic predecessors? A touch of sophistication, one would say, symbolism and Parnassianism borrowed from Fr. literature, nothing else. They wrote short bits of melancholy amorousness, whereas their predecessors wrote vast cascades of passionate lamentations. They show no concern for historical events, except that they condescend sometimes to attack the United States for its budding imperialism in Sp. America. If they feel at odds with society they do not confront it, but escape from it sometimes literally and sometimes literally by doing away with themselves. The most socially conscious of them, the Cuban José Martí (1853-1895), is the least "modernistic." The more refined and artistic they become the more they distinguish themselves from romanticism. Salvador Díaz Mirón (1853-1928), a Mexican, is a good example of this: neoclassic in his descriptions of nature, romantic in his love poems, he is at all times obsessed by the importance of novelty and uniqueness in the choice of words, so he adorns and overadorns, and because of it is praised by the master of modernism, Rubén Darío. Another Mexican poet Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (1859-1895) can be rescued from romanticism only because of his contrived and rather naive symbolism.

Therefore the critics say a new poetic movement was born in Sp. America and they name it "modernism." They exaggerate, or, rather, they mistake the facts. What happened is that a new poet, a great poet, was born in Central America, and this poet absolutely dominated Sp. and Sp. Am. poetry for about twenty years. He was modernism, he and a few talented disciples, and when he died modernism died with him. His name was Rubén Darío (1867-1916) and he was born in Nicaragua. At a very young age he left his native land, lived for a while in Guatemala and El Salvador, and settled for a few years in Santiago de Chile. In Chile he came into contact with writers who introduced him to the works of Fr. symbolists. Under a strong Fr. influence he published a book of poems and short stories,

Azul . . . (1888), which immediately gained for him an international reputation. His later works further convinced the critics of his extraordinary powers. At the turn of the century, his books—Prosas profanas (1896); Cantos de vida y esperanza (1905); El canto errante (1907)—were the Bible of the new poets and his name was immensely revered. Critics and historians of Sp. Am. literature have written scores of books dealing with modernism. It would not be too daring to say that in future years the word "modernism" as the denomination for a literary school will have lost its meaning, and instead the name of the great Nicaraguan will stand to mark an epoch and to give significance to the hundreds of minor poets who sang under his wing. At any rate, whether one calls it "modernism" or "rubenismo" or something similar, the poetic trend dominating Sp. America at the turn of this century and lasting to about 1920 could be described more or less as the Sp. Am. expression of Fr. Parnasse and Symbolisme. In its beginnings it represented an escape from reality—it was then that exoticism was one of its main features—later it turned its attention to America—influenced somewhat by Walt Whitman's Americanism. From Parnassianism it inherited a fastidious concern for beauty of form. From symbolism it learned to subdue emotions, replacing exclamation by suggestion, and also it inherited a liking for pure fantasy and a playful curiosity about decadence and sin. From gongorism, which Darío revived in all its splendor, modernism took a fondness for intricate and brilliant imagery. Putting all this together was the fascinating miracle wrought by Rubén Darío. He made people think that a "new civilization" was being born, but today one realizes that with Darío an old historical fact found its affirmation in the work of art: Sp. Am. "new civilization" was the blossoming of European culture, mainly Fr. and Sp., in the midst of a continent whose soul and whose natural forces were still unknown entities. Darío awakened many a dream in the minds of Sp. Am. intellectuals. His magic touch sent his disciples away with the dangerous notion that they too were demi-gods. After his disappearance modernism faded in the winds of our materialistic age like a cloud of golden dust.

A number of poets achieved true distinction following the steps of the Nicaraguan master. Here are a few names: Leopoldo Díaz (1862-1947) and Leopoldo Lugones (1874-1938), both Argentines, the first an outstanding sonnetist, the latter, Lugones, an eloquent, rather overpowering poet in whose works—Las montañas del oro (1897), Los crepúsculos del jardín (1905), Los poemas solariegos (1928)—one finds an amazing blend of all the major literary currents of the 19th c.; Amado Nervo (1870-1919), the refined, gently religious, amiable Mexican, a genuine romanticist, one of the greatest in the Sp. language, author of Elevación (1917), Plenitud (1918), Serenidad (1914) and many other books; Luis G. Urbina (1868-1934) also a Mexican, sentimental, ironic, surprisingly original in the treatment of certain subjects considered "prosaic" in his own times (Lámparas en agonía, 1914, El glosario de la vida vulgar, 1916); Rufino Blanco Fombona (1874-1944), Venezuelan, a brilliant, colorful, poet, too strongly bound by the current likings of his epoch (Pequeña ópera lírica, 1904 and Cancionero del amor infeliz, 1918); Julio Herrera y Reissig (1875-1910), Uruguayan, undoubtedly the greatest poet of modernism after Darío, a true representative of the baroque, deeply preoccupied with the creation of a poetic language that would combine the best elements of gongorism, symbolism, and Parnassianism; he is the real link between the poetry of the 19th and 20th c. in Sp. America; Ricardo Jaimes Freyre (1868-1933), Bolivian, exquisite in his already outmoded exoticism, a true master of versification (Castalia bárbara, 1899; Los sueños son vida, 1917); Guillermo Valencia (1872-1943), Colombian, a poet of profound pictorial sense, whose classical aloofness in the midst of a period when color and brilliance were used with naive profuseness is proving to be the reason for his permanent popularity (Ritos, 1898; enl. London, 1914); José Santos Chocano (1875-1934), Peruvian, a bombastic versifier, self-styled interpreter of the American world (La selva virgen, 1901; Alma América (1906); and the Chileans Manuel Magallanes Moure (1878-1924) and Carlos Pezoa Véliz (1879-1908).

Some poets, too young to accompany Darío as disciples, but too old to overtake the avant-garde forces, found themselves stranded with the remnants of modernism. A few of them became excellent poets and for a number of years they have held their own against newcomers, but as a group they represent a lost generation. The best known among them are: Álvaro Armando Vasseur (1878), and Sabat Erasty (1887) from Uruguay; Ángel Cruchaga Santa María (1893), Juan Guzmán Cruchaga (1896), Daniel de la Vega (1892) from Chile; R. López Velarde (1888-1921), Juan José Tablada (1871-1945), E. González Martínez (1871-1952), J. Torres-Bodet (1902), Alfonso Reyes (1889-1959) from Mexico; Porfirio Barba Jacob (1883-1942) from Colombia; Ricardo Miró (1883-1940) from Panama; R. Arévalo Martínez (1884) from Guatemala; R. Brenes Mesén (1874-1947) from Costa Rica; L. Llorens Torens (1878-1944) from Puerto Rico; and, in a place by themselves, the four poetesses of modern Spanish America: Gabriela Mistral, Juana de Ibar-

bourou, Alfonsina Storni, and Delmira Agustini.

The mention of these women brings one to the threshold of contemporary Sp. Am. poetry, that is to say, the poetry that is being written today, halfway into the 20th c. In the maturing of the new schools that followed Rubén Darío, France again played an important role, for it was the spirit of Dada that killed the nostalgic decadentism of Darío's late disciples, and it was surrealism and creationism (qq.v.) that offered the aesthetic ideas which materialized that break with Spain's classical and neoclassical tradition promoted by Sarmiento in the mid-19th c. Contemporary poetry seems to have come into its own through the combined action of three main factors: the personal influence of Gabriela Mistral, Delmira Agustini, Alfonsina Storni, and Juana de Ibarbourou; the reaction against Darío; and the return to realism led by Pablo Neruda. The poetesses just mentioned helped to bring about a social revolution of far-reaching effect: they fought for the social and psychological emancipation of Sp. Am. women. Gabriela Mistral (1889-1957), especially, who won the Nobel Prize in 1954, became the living banner of a movement for child welfare, for women's rights, and for social laws to protect the Indian and the Negro. It has been said that the Nobel Prize may have been given to her as a reward for an entire life devoted to defending the poor and the outcast, and that her glorification of motherhood convinced the Swedish Academy of the true universality of her poetry. To the student of Sp. Am. literature her greatness reaches beyond the limits of mere philanthropy. In her three books, Desolación (1922), Tala (1938), and Lagar (1954), the Chilean poetess created a style that is entirely her own. Solidly realistic, direct and forceful, deeply religious in a biblical sense, and oddly rural in its vocabulary, her language offered a sharp contrast to the decadent elegance of modernism. The Uruguayan Delmira Agustini (1886-1914) began writing before she was 17 years old. Her presentiment of violent death—she was killed when she was 28 years old—her yearning for an all-satisfying love, her passionate descriptions of masculine beauty, her direct and voluptuous allusions to the sexual act, were taken by the critics as the daring but innocent poetical exercises of an extremely gifted adolescent. But when her poems appeared in book form Darío and his disciples recognized in amazement that a new major poet had arrived. Her work is thoroughly human. Not a shade of artifice mars the pathos of her sensuous pleas. Touched by the sublime emotion of a real artist, the crude reality of her naked figures assumes a classical aloofness. She had the depth that Darío never attained, not even in the mystic period of his belated religiosity. Her style is baroque but it would be difficult to find another poetry in which the twisting elaborateness of form is more genuinely motivated by a corresponding complexity of soul. In the Argentine poetess Alfonsina Storni (1892-1938) the tragic story of Delmira Agustini is repeated. After a nightmarish routine of loneliness and economic strain, she committed suicide. Sex flashes violently in her metaphors. But she lacks the natural refinement of Delmira Agustini, and her verse, after pounding on the emotions of the reader who senses the coming unhappy climax, falls to earth in a mixture of childish bewilderment and sad, prosaic, almost cynical defeat. The Uruguayan Juana de Ibarbourou (1895-), on the other hand, devotes her wholesome life to singing of motherhood and youth. With her the revolutionary period of feminine poetry in Sp. America comes to an end.

Around 1920 there came a strong reaction against Darío's preciosité. The Mexican Estridentismo, the Whitmanism of Armando Vasquez and Sabat Ercasty; the sensual pessimism of Barba Jacob; the Creationism of Vicente Huidobro, and the Argentine Jorge Luis Borges' Nativism, led the fight against a "modernist" revolution which in less than thirty years had already become reactionary. These poets, with the exception of the Whitmanists, replaced one formula by another. They abandoned the objective or "representational" approach to nature, they outlawed rhyme and, transitorily, even punctuation. They created a new form of exoticism: the escape into abstraction. The most brilliant of these poets was the Chilean Vicente Huidobro (1893-1948). In his country he was followed by a gifted group of poets: Rosamel del Valle (1900), Humberto Díaz Casanueva (1908), Juvencio Valle (1907), among others.

In the early 1930's it was another Chilean who directed a new rebellion against abstract poetry: Pablo Neruda (1904), who evolved from the melodious symbolism of 20 poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (1924), to an astonishing glorification of the most prosaic elements of reality. Slowly and deliberately he proceeded to destroy all that modernism considered sacred. In conceiving the monumental chaos which constitutes the essence of Residencia en la tierra (1925-35), Pablo Neruda has expressed, as no one had done before, the metaphysical anguish of the Sp. Am. man, his terrors, his superstitions, his sense of guilt imposed on him by religious teachings and the broken tradition of his Indian forefathers, his loneliness in the midst of a strange civilization that he does not understand and cannot appreciate, his consternation before Nature that crushes him with its untamed jungles, oceans, and mountains, his decadence coming as the result of exploitation, malnutrition, alcoholism, poverty, and disease. Residencia en la tierra is really an expression of the psychological and social drama affecting great numbers of Sp. Am. people today. In recent years Neruda has become a political propagandist. His latest books include: Canto General (1950), an epic of the Am. world, Las uvas y el viento (1954), and Odas elementales (1954, 1955, 1957); also, Estravagario (1958), and Navegaciones y regresos (1959).

Surrealism has assumed a strong political undertone in the works of two leading Sp. Am. poets: César Vallejo (1892-1938), the great and mysterious Peruvian who expressed the soul of the Indian in the tormented notes of Los heraldos negros (1918) and Trilce (1922); and the Chilean Pablo de Rokha (1895) whose poetry, Gran temperatura (1937), Escritura de Raimundo Contreras (1929), Morfología del espanto (1942), is a fascinating combination of baroque imagery, Rabelaisian humor, and Chilean slang. Two other first-rate poets, the Ecuadorean Jorge Carrera Andrade (1902) and the Cuban Nicolás Guillén (1902), have established themselves as the great interpreters of the tropical world. They are experts in the use of a magic realism that permits them to condense the beauty of their land into few but excellently chosen metaphors.

Mexican poetry offers a strange picture of isolation. Untouched by the portentous events of the Mexican Revolution, which had deep effects on the novel, on painting, and on music, suspicious of foreign influences and extremely reluctant to allow itself to show enthusiasm for any lately arrived ism, Mexican poetry suffers from a case of what one might call "sorjuanismo," that is to say, a persistent attachment to the most conservative Sp. tradition. Loyal to classical form, Mexican poets experiment, however, with subjects of varied and profound significance. The love poetry of Xavier Villaurrutia (1903-1950) is the epitome of exquisite sophistication. José Gorostiza (1901), on the other hand, explores the metaphysical meanings in everyday life, and Carlos Pellicer (1899), the third in a distinguished group of poets, encompasses a world of music and color in highly stylized form. Among the young poets of Mexico, Octavio Paz (1914) seems to stand out with a poetic expression that is surrealist in form and genuinely philosophical in content. His preoccupation with the soul and the fate of his people lends a serious, almost tragic, tone to his recent poetry.

ANTHOLOGIES: Antología de poetas hispanoamericanos, ed. M. Menéndez y Pelayo (4 v., 1893-95; mostly 19th c.); Poetas jóvenes de América, ed. A. Guillén (1930); Antol. de poetas . . . hispanoamericanos modernos, ed. F. Monterde (1931); The Modernist Trend in Sp. Am. Poetry, ed. G. D. Craig (1934); Antol. de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, ed. F. de Onís (1934, 1961; excellent); Some Sp. Am. Poets, ed. A. S. Blackwell (2d ed., 1937); Anthol. of Contemporary L. Am. Poetry, ed. D. Fitts (1942; Sp. and Eng. texts); Three Sp. Am. Poets, ed. J. L. Grucci and others (1942); 12 Sp. Am. Poets, ed. H. R. Hays (1943; Sp. and Eng. texts); Antol. de la poesía hispanoamericana, ed. G. de Albareda and F. Garfias (10 v., 1957-);—Índice de la poesía argentina contemporánea, ed. J. González Carbalho (1937); Argentine Anthol. of Modern Verse, ed. P. Cannon and H. Manning (1942);—La poesía chilena nueva, ed. E. Anguita and V. Teitelboin (1935);—Orbita de la poesía afrocubana, ed. R. Guirao (1938);—Índice de la poesía ecuatoriana contemporánea, ed. B. Carrión (1937); Antol. de poetas ecuatorianos, ed. A. Arias and A. Montalvo (1944);—A Brief Anthol. of Mexican Verse, ed. S.L.M. Rosenberg and E. H. Templin (1928); La décima en México, ed. V. T. Mendoza (1947); La poesía mexicana moderna, ed. A. Castro Leal (1953); Anthol. of Mexican Poetry, comp. O. Paz, tr. S. Beckett (1958).—Cien años de poesía en Panamá, ed. R. Miró (1953);—Índice de la poesía paraguaya, ed. S. Buzó Gómez (1943);—Las cien mejores poesías (líricas) peruanas, ed. M. Beltroy (1921); Índice de la poesía peruana contemporánea, ed. L. A. Sánchez (1938);—Índice de la poesía uruguaya contemporánea, ed. A. Zum Felde (1935);—Nuevos poetas venezolanos, ed. R. Olivares Figueroa (1939).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Donoso, La otra América (1925); J. E. Englekirk, Edgar Allan Poe in Hispanic Lit. (1934); S. Rosenbaum, Modern Women Poets of Sp. Am. (1945; best treatment of the subject, excellent biblio.); E. Anderson Imbert, Historia de la lit. hispanoamericana (2 v., 1961, Eng. tr. 1963); F. Alegría, Walt Whitman en Hispanoamérica (1954); M. Henríquez Ureña, Breve historia del Modernismo (1954).—A. Alonso, Poesía y estilo de Pablo Neruda (1940, 2d ed., 1951); A. de Undurraga, El arte poético de Pablo de Rokha (1945); E. Anguita, Antología de Vicente Huidobro (1954; the introd. is the best study available on Huidobro's poetry); F. Alegría, La poesía chilena (1954);—E. Neale-Silva, Estudios sobre José Eustasio Rivera: El arte poético (1951);—R. Fernández Retamar, La poesía contemporánea en Cuba (1954); M. Henríquez Ureña, Panorama histórico de la lit. cubana (1963); I. J. Barrera, Historia de la lit. ecuatoriana (4 v., 1944-55); H. R. Hays, "Jorge Carrera Andrade, Magician of Metaphors," BA, 17 (1943);—M. del Carmen Millán, El paisaje en la poesía mexicana (1952; 19th c. esp.); F. Dauster, Breve historia de la poesía mexicana (1956);—A. Torres-Rioseco, Rubén Darlo: casticismo y americanismo (1931);—

L. Monguió, César Vallejo (1952; introd., biblio., anthol.) and La poesía post-modernista peruana (1954);—F. Manrique Cabrera, Historia de la lit. puertorriquena (1956);—J. F. Toruño, Índice de poetas de El Salvador en un siglo, 1840-1940 (1941).

See also: Lit. hispanoamericana, ed. E. Anderson Imbert and E. Florit (1960).—P. Henriques Ureña, Literary Currents in Hispanic America (1945); Panorama das literaturas das Américas, de 1900 à actualidade, ed. J. de Montezuma de Carvalho (1958-). F.A.

SPANISH POETICS. See MEDIEVAL, RENAISSANCE, BAROQUE, NEOCLASSICAL, MODERN POETICS.

SPANISH POETRY. THE EARLIEST LYRICS. Sp. poetry originated, no doubt, simultaneously with the Sp. language itself, or more precisely, with those Romance dialects which developed on the Iberian peninsula during the Middle Ages. The dialects began, of course, not as written, but as spoken languages; the first Sp. poetry was, naturally, oral poetry. Only almost indecipherable fragments of this poetry have been preserved, transcribed in Arabic or Hebrew letters, as refrains (kharjas) appended to longer, more learned poems written as early as the 11th c. by Moorish or Jewish poets of southern Spain. The dialect of the kharjas, known as Mozarabic, reflects the earliest stage of a recognizably Sp. language. These kharjas, which antedate even the lyric poems of the Prov. troubadours, are predominantly love songs, snatches of lamentation in which girls bewail the absence of their lovers; the poetic intensity of these fragments, tremulously chaste in the Hebrew poems, more sensual in the Arabic ones, can still be felt by the Sp. reader, despite one or two archaic words of Semitic origin:

Vayse meu corazón de mib.
 ¿Ya, Rab, si se me tornará?
 ¡Tan mal meu dolor li-l-habib!
 Enfermo yed: ¿Cuándo sanará?

My heart is leaving me. / Oh God, I wonder whether it will return? / My grief for my beloved is so great! / He is sick: when will he be well?

Such fragments are the only survivors of a body of oral poetry which must have been common to most communities of the Iberian peninsula. The first Sp. poetry recorded in the L. alphabet, that of the 13th-c. Galician-Portuguese cancioneiros or collections of songs, include cantigas de amigo which are quite similar to the kharjas in theme; and in the traditional folk poetry of Castile, as well, the villancicos or refrain carols, deriving from the Hispano-Arabic zajal, are frequently Frauenlieder of a similar sort.

THE MEDIEVAL EPIC. The oldest major work of Sp. literature is the anonymous Poema del Cid or Cantar de Mio Cid; written about 1140, it is the best surviving example of the Sp. medieval epic. Like the Fr. chansons de geste, the Poema del Cid reflects feudal customs of Germanic origin, which may be traced back to the Visigothic period; it also shows signs of the direct influence of Fr. literary models and, perhaps, of certain Arabic sources. The word "cid" itself is of Arabic origin and means feudal lord; it is the title of the poem's hero, Rodrigo Díaz de Vivar, a well-documented historical personage who, exiled by Alfonso VI of Castile and Leon between 1079 and 1099, took the city of Valencia from the Moors in 1089. Given a degree of historicity and of geographical precision which clearly distinguishes this poem's level of realism from the fantasy of Fr. epics such as the Chanson de Roland, the Poema del Cid is essentially the dramatic depiction of a relatively restrained and modest type of feudal hero.

Written in lines of variable length (14-syllable lines predominate) which divide into hemistichs, with assonant or vowel rhyme at the end of each line, the poem was evidently composed for dramatic oral recitation by a jongleur or professional court entertainer. It begins with the pathos of the hero's unjust exile. But Rodrigo Díaz is always a faithful vassal to the king, sending him booty from each of the battles that he wins in Moslem land. After taking Valencia, the king restores him to his good graces and honors him by sponsoring his daughters' marriage to two Leonese noblemen. But the sons-in-law turn out to be as decadent and cowardly as they are proud. When they beat and abandon their wives, the Cid does not take vengeance into his own hands, but appeals to the king for justice to be administered in accordance with law. His second vindication is even more glorious than his first.

The sober understatement of this epic poem's style reflects the orderly, measured character of its hero. Thus, the first major work in the history of Sp. poetry has none of the baroque exuberance or picaresque cynicism which are often considered typical of Sp. literature; it is, in fact, quite classically subtle in its balanced avoidance of all extremes.

Other Sp. medieval epics existed and can be reconstructed from later chronicles and ballads, but the original versions are, for the most part, lost. Among the surviving texts are a 13th-c. clerkly reworking of an epic on Fernán González, and the much later Mocedades de Rodrigo, in which the Cid is depicted, not as an austere feudal vassal, but as an arrogant, fiery youth. It is this later, more romantic Cid who was to become famous in ballads and in plays.

MONASTIC POETRY. In the 13th c., the scholarly poet of the cloister begins to compete with the jongleur of the feudal court. He replaces the militaristic Romanesque virtues of feudal society by the Gothic virtues of devotion to Our Lady, to the saints, and to the Mass. His sources are not recent Sp. history or oral legends, but L. manuscripts: the Bible, the lives and miracles of the saints, even legends of classical antiquity. And he uses, not a loose oral meter, but a fixed stanzaic form known as "cuaderna vía": four 14-syllable lines (alejandrinos) all with the same full rhyme.

Gonzalo de Berceo (ca. 1200-1265) is the best representative of this poetic school. A secular priest and confessor of La Rioja, he was closely associated with the important monasteries of San Millán de la Cogolla and Santo Domingo de Silos. His works deal exclusively with religious subjects: lives of saints, theology, the Virgin Mary. His Milagros de Nuestra Señora (Miracles of Our Lady), for example, consist of 25 brief stories, each telling of a miracle wrought by the Virgin's intercession. These stories are almost all adapted from standard L. sources common to most of medieval Europe. Berceo's poetic achievement was to popularize and humanize these legends by retelling them in Castilian, the local language of the people. His style is simple and clear to the point of being almost prosaic; but his attitude of childlike faith and his rustic images are often charming and occasionally quite lyrical. A spirit of Christian equalitarianism and a sense of humor further contribute to the 20th-c. revival of Berceo's popularity as a Sp. poet.

Somewhat different, though of the same metric genre and period (the first half of the 13th c.), is the Libro de Alexandre, doubtfully attributed to a Leonese cleric, Juan Lorenzo "Segura" de Astorga. Following L. and Fr. sources, it reveals Alexander the Great in the medieval guise of a legendary hero. It is encyclopedic in scope, combining classical reminiscences, exotic fantasies, mythology, evocations of the springtime garden of love, and moral didacticism. It is definitely more sophisticated than Berceo's works, more formally polished in style. Other poems of this school are the Libro de Apolonio, the Poema de Yusuf (the story of Joseph based on the Koran rather than on the Old Testament and written in the Arabic rather than the Latin alphabet), and the Vida de Santa Maria Egipcíaca.

POETRY OF THE 14TH C. It is significant, as has been emphasized recently by Criado del Val, that Spain's greatest medieval poet lived south of the Guadarrama Mountains, that is, not in the more soberly European Old Castile of Burgos and the Cid but in the Mozarabic New Castile of Toledo. Juan Ruiz (ca. 1283-1350), probably born in Alcalá de Henares, no doubt studied at the episcopal seminary of Toledo; here the archbishop, primate of Spain, maintained a strongly clerical center of studies in the midst of a peculiarly Sp. goliardic atmosphere of taverns and Moorish dancing girls. Though ordained and made Archpriest of Hita, Juan Ruiz conveys in his poetry this Mozarabic atmosphere as he assimilates to it his readings in the medieval L. literature of Europe, ranging from the Bible and the Breviary to preachers' moral fables and aphorisms to goliardic love songs and Ovid's erotic poems.

Though his great poem, the Libro de buen amor (The Book of Good Love), is written chiefly in the same "cuaderna vía" stanzas that Berceo had used in the previous century, it really belongs to a different genre altogether. It is, in fact, sui generis so far as European literature is concerned; its peculiar autobiographical and didactic form has recently been related by María Rosa Lida to the Semitic maqāmat, a genre cultivated by various Hispano-Hebraic authors preceding Juan Ruiz. In a general way its picaresque tone and content might remind the Eng. reader most of the contemporary Chaucerian Wife of Bath's prologue and tale. Its essentially equivocal nature allows the author to play constantly between poles which are usually considered to be mutually exclusive: personal experiences and adaptations from L. sources, moral didacticism and irrepressible humor, ascetic fervor, and erotic fever. The author seems simultaneously to be a priest and a sidewalk jongleur.

When one analyzes more literally the objective content of the Libro de buen amor, one can distinguish from the basic plot, which is a series of erotic adventures told in the first person, several elements which are more or less loosely attached: moral fables, adaptations of Ovid's Ars amandi and of the 12th-c. L. comedy Pamphilus, burlesque allegories associated with Lent and Easter, assorted satires, and a few lyric poems, mostly devoted to the Virgin. The Libro de buen amor is, in sum, Spain's poetic synthesis of Gothic culture, a crudely human comedy worthy of comparison with Dante's refined divine one: full of the joy and pathos of life under the shadow of death, permeated by a deeply ironic humor and childlike sense of playfulness.

There is only one poem worthy of note in the second half of the 14th c.: The Rimado de palacio by the solemn Basque Chancellor Pero López de Ayala (1332-1407). This "palace rhyme" is primarily political in its emphasis; it is austere, severely moralistic as it fiercely satirizes contemporary decadence of church and state.

THE REIGN OF JUAN II. Lyric poetry as an independent written genre developed much later in Castilian than it did in Galician-Portuguese or Catalan (qq.v.), the western and eastern dialects of the peninsula. Early Catalan poetry is, in fact, part of the history of the troubadour lyric, the linguistic difference between Prov. and Catalan being relatively slight. In the west, lyric poetry written in the Galician-Portuguese dialect included both the cantigas de amigo, which we have seen were related to the same aboriginal folk poetry reflected earlier in the Mozarabic kharjas, and more sophisticated love poems stemming from the direct influence of the Prov. troubadours. Thus, the cult of courtly love entered Sp. literature; even poets who spoke Castilian as their native dialect used Galician for writing lyric poetry during the 13th and most of the 14th c. The scholarly Alfonso X of Castile (1221-1284) wrote his 430 Cantigas de Santa Maria in Galician, illustrating a wide range of metrical virtuosity à la provençale. But between 1350 and 1450 the center of Sp. lyric poetry shifts from Galician to Castilian; the first collection of Castilian lyrics, the Cancionero de Baena, is dated 1445. In this collection the troubadour style predominates, but the allegorical and philosophical influence of It. poetry, particularly Dante, is also apparent.

The two major prehumanistic poets of Juan II's reign are Íñigo López de Mendoza, first Marquis of Santillana (1398-1458) and Juan de Mena. Santillana was a leading aristocratic figure of the northern Castilian nobility, involved militarily in the civil wars of Juan II's reign. His youthful lyrics include witty dezires, courtly canciones, and pseudo-rustic serranillas (pastourelles); the latter, based on the encounter of traveling knight with mountain lass, are delightfully sophisticated variations of a popular genre. More ambitious is his Comedieta de Ponça (1436), an elaborate allegorical narrative in the It. tradition. An interesting product of Santillana's final twenty years are 42 sonnets, the first to be written in any language other than It.; they reveal the influence of the "dolce stil nuovo" and of Petrarch. A final category of poetry includes mature works treating of moral, political, and religious themes; typical is Bias contra Fortuna (ca. 1450), in which the semi-legendary philosopher-statesman of ancient Greece engages in Stoic debate with an arbitrary and tyrannical Fortuna.

Juan de Mena (1411-1456), born in Cordova the son of a leading family of converts from Judaism, is the typically scholarly humanist of southern Spain; he studied at the University of Salamanca and at Rome and was named L. secretary at the court of Juan II. His poetry is of two basic types: troubadour love poetry as it had developed in Spain, marked by scholastic "wit," psychological subtleties, and a strong tendency to use pseudo-religious hyperbole; and politico-moral poetry such as La coronación, a difficult allegory in which literary personages are presented as though either in Hell or in Paradise, with the Marquis of Santillana crowned as perfect knight in both arms and letters. Mena's most ambitious poem is the Laberinto de Fortuna, consisting of almost 300 arte mayor stanzas (eight 12-syllable lines each). In it the poet visits the crystal palace of Fortune under the guidance of a maiden representing Providence. Allegorical wheels and planetary circles lead up to the culminating vision of Jupiter and Saturn, representing Juan II and his minister Don Álvaro de Luna, prophesying the achievement of national unity. His rhetorical grandiloquence, Latinized vocabulary, aesthetic use of classical allusion, and emphatic nationalism make of Juan de Mena the most significant herald of the Renaissance in 15th-c. Sp. poetry.

One other poem of this period deserves special mention: the Coplas por la muerte de su padre of Jorge Manrique. This elegy for the death of his father is one of the most perfectly controlled poems in Sp. literature; its classical flow of simple language makes it a perennial favorite of the Sp.-speaking world. Its themes are late medieval commonplaces: the fugacity of earthly life ("Ubi sunt qui ante nos in mundo fuerunt") and a compensating Christian faith in eternal life. But these themes receive at the hands of Jorge Manrique a molding of verbal expression that is inimitable:

. . . cuán presto se va el placer,
cómo después de acordado
da dolor,
cómo a nuestro parecer
cualquiera tiempo pasado fue mejor.

. . . how swiftly pleasure leaves us; how, when we recall it, it grieves us; how, in our opinion, any time past was better than now.

THE REIGN OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA. With the marriage of Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile, the political unity of the peninsula (except for Portugal) was achieved; religious unity was achieved in 1492 by the expulsion of all unconverted Jews and by the capture of Granada, the sole remaining Moslem kingdom on Sp. soil. The Middle Ages were receding; in art and in education the It. Renaissance was clearly arriving. But in poetry it was still a transitional period. The Hispanized troubadour lyric continued without great change. Religious poetry took on a more personal sentimental coloration in the works of the popular Franciscan poets Íñigo de Mendoza and Ambrosio Montesino. The most important development was a new interest, on the part of literate poets, in the folk tradition; villancicos or refrain-carols, which go back to the Mozarabic kharjas, and romances or ballads, deriving from the fragmentation of the old epic cycles, were now being collected, elaborated upon, and published. All of the above elements may be observed in the great folio Cancionero general published by Hernando del Castillo in 1511 and republished, with modifications, several times during the 16th c. This late medieval corpus of poetry continued to exert an influence upon Renaissance poets of the succeeding generations, including those of the 17th c.

The ballads or romances are especially interesting and important in the history of Sp. literature. The semi-lyrical fragments deriving from national epics such as the Poema del Cid maintained an epic meter: 16-syllable lines divided into 8-syllable hemistichs with a continuous assonant rhyme at the end of each line. (In modern editions the hemistichs are usually printed as complete octosyllabic lines, and the assonance thus appears at the ends of the even-numbered lines only.) Similar ballads grew out of Carolingian, Arthurian, Moorish, and other romantic or popular stories. They were published first in small groups as single-sheet broadsides; these were gradually collected and reprinted as small volumes; finally, in 1600, a voluminous Romancero general was published. Famous Golden Age plays were based upon the more popular cycles; everyone seems to have been familiar with the romances, for they were constantly cited and alluded to. As a genre it has been familiar to every generation, from the Golden Age to the romantics and the neopopularists of Lorca's generation; even the oral tradition has lived on into the 20th c. among the more isolated communities of Spain, the Sephardic Balkans and North Africa, and Sp. America.

RENAISSANCE POETRY OF THE 16TH C. In 1526, at the court of Charles V in Granada, the Venetian ambassador Andrea Navagero suggested to the courtier-poet Juan Boscán (ca. 1490-1542) that he try his hand at writing sonnets and other It. forms in Sp. With the encouragement and collaboration of his friend Garcilaso de la Vega (1503-1536), Boscán's experiment was successful; a new type of poetry eventually took root in Spain, marking a distinct shift of poetic sensibility. The success of this revolution was due largely to the superior aesthetic gifts of Garcilaso, who not only assimilated It. metric forms (the hendecasyllabic line in sonnets, canzoni, terza rima, ottava rima, rima al mezzo, and blank verse), but also captured an essential part of the It. Renaissance spirit in his poetry: a sensuous, metaphoric flow of bucolic, erotic, and mythological themes expressing a new sense of beauty in grief and in idealized classical scenes and landscapes. Despite his many stylistic debts to Virgil and Sannazaro, to Petrarch and to Ovid, Garcilaso's Sp. poetry (he also wrote L. odes) strikes a new note which belongs to him alone.

Cerca del Tajo en soledad amena
de verdes sauces hay una espesura toda de hiedra revestida y llena que por el tronco va hasta el altura
y así la teje arriba y encadena que el sol no halla paso a la verdura;
el agua baña el prado con sonido, alegando la hierba y el oído.

Near the Tagus River in sweet solitude / there is a thicket of green willows / all covered over and filled with ivy / which climbs the trunk to the top / and so weaves and enchains it up there / that the sun can not penetrate the verdure; / the water bathes the greensward with sound, making joyful the grass and the human ear.

The poetry of Boscán and Garcilaso was published posthumously, in a single volume, in 1543, and was republished many times during the 16th c. Garcilaso's poetry was published separately for the first time in 1570; it was treated as a humanistic classic by being annotated by a professor at the University of Salamanca in 1574 and by the scholar-poet Fernando de Herrera, of Seville, in 1580. Thus Garcilaso's 35 sonnets, 5 odes, 2 elegies, 1 epistle, and 3 eclogues become the foundation of a Renaissance tradition of poetry in Spain; very little poetry has been written in Sp. since the 16th c. that has not been influenced to some extent by that of Garcilaso de la Vega. We could list innumerable 16th-c. poets belonging to Garcilaso's new school: Diego Hurtado de Mendoza (1503-1575), Hernando de Acuña (1520?-1580), Baltasar del Alcázar (1530-1606), Francisco de Figueroa (1536-1617?), Francisco de Aldana (1537-1578), Gutierre de Cetina (1520-1557?), et al. There was a more or less serious movement of nationalistic resistance against the new It. meters, headed by Cristóbal de Castillejo (1490?-1550); his own poetry, however, while avoiding the new meters, frequently reflects the Renaissance spirit much more than it does the spirit of the Sp. 15th c.

Christianity and the Renaissance join forces in the poetry of the Augustinian friar Luis de León (1527-1591) and of the reformed Carmelite monk San Juan de la Cruz (or St. John of the Cross, 1542-1591). Luis de León was a biblical scholar and professor at the University of Salamanca. In his vigorously classical odes he manages to fuse the satirical rusticity of

Horace with a soaring Neoplatonic Christianity which at times approaches true mysticism. Because of its explicit philosophical content, his poetry often receives more serious attention than does that of Garcilaso; it seems to reconcile again the Greco-Roman and the Hebraic-Christian traditions and certainly reaches more than once the heights of truly great classical poetry. Much more ethereally mystical is the even smaller body of lyrics by San Juan de la Cruz. His major poem, the Cántico espiritual, draws directly upon the Song of Solomon and indirectly upon Garcilaso's eclogues; the resultant imagery, tremulously sensual, lends itself to an extended allegory of the soul's mystic love for God. Nowhere else in Western poetry is erotic intensity so essential to the expression of an overwhelming religious experience; St. John of the Cross is without doubt one of the few great mystic poets. After a climax, he writes these lines:

Quedéme y olvidéme,
el rostro recliné sobre el Amado;
cesó todo y dejéme,
dejando mi cuidado
entre las azucenas olvidado.

I stayed there forgetting myself, / I leaned my face over the Beloved; / everything stopped and I let myself go, / leaving my cares / forgotten
among the lilies.

At the same time, on a lower plane, poets continue to use the traditional Sp. meters, especially the 8-syllable line. Scholastic wit of a 15th-c. sort is revived for religious purposes in the Conceptos espirituales (1600), for example, of Alonso de Ledesma (1562-1623).

The most serious attempt to continue Garcilaso's tradition was that of his annotator Fernando de Herrera (1534-1597), the central figure of a school of poets developing in Andalusia, principally in Seville. His voluminous notes to Garcilaso's works are, in fact, a poetic manifesto of a Neoplatonic sort. Herrera declares that erudition is necessary for great poetry, that the Sp. language is as richly expressive as the It., and that the poetic genius expresses divine reality. His classical learning is inexhaustible; in his notes he writes veritable histories of the poetic genres and uses a large Gr. vocabulary in making rhetorical analyses. Thus his Anotaciones (1580) are a major contribution to Renaissance poetics (q.v.), second in Spain only to the Aristotelian Filosofía antigua poética (1596) of A. López Pinciano.

Having taken minor orders, Herrera devoted his entire life to scholarship and poetry. He wrote several heroic odes or hymns on national themes; their grandiloquent echoes of the Old Testament define Herrera's organ voice. But the social center of his life was the literary tertulia, or salon, of the Count and Countess of Gelves; here Herrera found it natural to focus his poetry, in the manner of Petrarch, upon the lovely young countess. These sonnets, odes, and elegies, in which he exquisitely suffers and delights, reflect primarily a literary experience within an aristocratic, scholarly setting; they won for him among his contemporaries the title of "the Divine," when in 1582, a year after the countess's death, he published them with the modest title of Algunas obras de Fernando de Herrera. Other members of this Andalusian school of poets are Luis Barahona de Soto (1548–1595), Pedro de Espinosa (1578–1650), Francisco de Rioja (1583–1659), and Francisco de Medrano (1570–1607).

SPANISH POETRY

Mention should here be made of Renaissance epic poetry. Spain has nothing to compare with Portugal's Lusiadas (1572), but the epic of the conquest of Chile, La Araucana (1569–1590) by Alonso de Ercilla (1533–1596?), can still be read with interest and pleasure. Worthy of note is the literary treatment of the Indian chieftain Caupolicán as a "noble savage."

Baroque poetry of the 17th C. From among the dozens of considerable poets of 17th-c. Spain, we can select for special attention the three who are generally considered greatest: Luis de Góngora (1561–1627), Lope de Vega (1562–1635), and Francisco de Quevedo (1580–1645). Among them they represent the main trends of Sp. lyric poetry during the second half of the Golden Age. Góngora, like Juan de Mena, was born in Cordova and, like Herrera, took minor orders entitling him to an ecclesiastical benefice; in classical erudition and aristocratic intellect he was second to neither of his Andalusian predecessors, rivaling Garcilaso himself as a major creative figure of Sp. poetry. In a sense he continues and elaborates upon Garcilaso's tradition, carrying each of his stylistic traits out to its ultimate poetic consequences, achieving an aesthetic purity almost devoid of any everyday human emotion deriving directly from such common themes as love, religion, or politics.

Like Lope and Quevedo, Góngora cultivated poetry, not only of the Renaissance tradition in Italianate meters, but also of the more medieval folkloric tradition in octosyllabic and other short lines. His romances and villancicos (or letrillas) show a thorough familiarity with the more popular themes and meters; Góngora characteristically polishes and elaborates upon them, however, in such a way that we could never mistake his exquisite poems for those of the anonymous tradition. His burlesque and satirical poems are equally polished. And his sonnets realize a final formal perfection, whether heroic, funereal, erotic, or burlesque in theme. His most ambitious classical poems are quite difficult to read, both because of their unusual syntax and word order and because of the intellectual complexity of their metaphors, conceits, and mythological allusions. His masterpieces in this style are baroque pastorals: the Fábula de Polifemo y Galatea, based on Ovid's Polyphemus, and the Soleidades, the "plot" of which is more original, though hardly a line is without classical allusions. This style of his, traditionally labeled culteranismo or cultismo (q.v.), though widely imitated in Spain and Sp. America, was never surpassed:

No la Trinacria en sus montañas, fiera
armó de crueldad, calzó de viento, que redima feroz, salve ligera, su piel manchada de colores ciento:
pellico es ya la que en los bosques era mortal horror al que con paso lento los bueyes a su albergue reducía, pisando la dudosa luz del día.

Sicily in its mountains never armed a beast with such ferocity nor shod it with such wind that it might either fiercely or swiftly save its many-colored skin: it is already a jacket, that former mortal terror of the woods, for him who with slow step brought back the oxen to his shelter, treading the doubtful light of day [i.e., twilight].

The world of Góngora's major poems is a material world of solid substances and glittering colors in which the poet, using words, attempts to rival the artificiality of nature, of Natura Artifex, herself. It is no accident that a taste for this poetry has been revived in the 20th c. by Spain's most sophisticated modern poets.

Lope de Vega, the creator of Spain's lyrical Golden Age theater, was also a very productive poet; his sonnets alone number 1,600 or more! He wrote many long narrative poems, of which perhaps his Tassoeseque Jerusalén conquistada is the most noteworthy. Between 1604 and 1637 five important collections of his lyric poems were published; they are not so polished as those of Góngora, but they are full of variety, spontaneity, and flowing grace. His odes, eclogues, elegies, and sonnets belong to Garcilaso's classical tradition, with light baroque elaborations of all sorts; he occasionally attempts to rival even Góngora. His poems actually do surpass Góngora's in subjective personal emotion, if not in erudition and technical skill. At the other pole, Lope's folkloric lyrics are unexcelled; unlike Góngora's, they are often indistinguishable from those of the anonymous tradition. And his ability to fuse these two traditions, the learned and the popular, is likewise unexcelled. No other poet could compete with Lope de Vega's facile abundance;

he was indeed a veritable phenomenon, "Nature's monster."

Finally, Francisco de Quevedo, though his poetry too is extremely various, represents chiefly a severe moralistic trend, an awareness of universal human corruption, in Spain's baroque poetry. An incisive satirical wit characterizes most of Quevedo's poetry, which at times is quite obscene; his colloquial puns and other witticisms are often very funny in a grim sort of way. His profoundest lyrical note is struck when he faces death with stoic desperation:

Ya formidable y espantoso suena
dentro del corazón el postrer día;
y la última hora, negra y fría, se acerca, de temor y sombras llena . . .

Now fearfully within the heart resounds the final day; and the last hour, black and cold, draws near, filled with terrible shadows. . . .

It is traditional, though inaccurate, to list Spain's 17th-c. poets either as cultista followers of Góngora (Jáuregui, Bocángel, Espinosa, Soto de Rojas, Villamediana, Polo de Medina, et al.) or as conceptistas like Quevedo (the Argensola brothers, Esquilache, the anonymous author of the Epístola moral a Fabio). As a matter of fact, classical erudition and mythological allusions, the trademarks of cultismo, were almost universal in 17th-c. poetry; and few poets completely avoided indulging in puns, conceits, and other forms of baroque wit. The question is, with regard to each poet, how he developed an individual style and poetic mode as he made use of the contemporarily popular devices. The modern critic can usefully study the poetics of the period: the Libro de erudición poética (1611) by L. Carrillo y Sotomayor; the Discurso poético (1623) by J. de Jáuregui; and, above all, the Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1642), in which the great Jesuit conceptista Baltasar Gracián (1601-1658) cites Góngora far more than any other poet. Among 17th-c. epic poems, perhaps two are worthy of mention here: La Christiada (1611), based on Christ's Passion, by Diego de Hojeda (1571?-1615), and El Bernardo (1624), on a national epic hero, by Bernardo de Balbuena (1568-1627).

Neoclassical poetry of the 18th C. The second half of the 17th c. in Spain was marked by a general cultural decadence; baroque poetry continued to be turned out almost automatically, according to established formulas, but further development or self-renovation seemed impossible. Ignacio de Luzán (1702-1754) brought into Spain, from his studies in Italy and France, a neoclassical standard of "good taste" by which all baroque extremism could be cleared away to make room for a new, philosophical, international sort of poetry. Luzán's treatise, the Poética (1737), was based largely upon the neo-Aristotelianism of Muratori and others; it gave rise to many polemics concerning Sp. literature of the 17th c., in which the classical rules had usually been ignored. The result was a return to Garcilaso and Luis de León, the classical poets of the 16th c. The best of the Sp. neoclassical poets of the 18th c. was Juan Meléndez Valdés (1754-1817), whose elegiac and pastoral melancholy shows a classical restraint and a delicate pre-romantic sensibility. In the 16th c. he would have been appreciated as a minor poet; in the 18th he dominates the otherwise almost deserted scene of Sp. lyric poetry. La Fontaine and Voltaire are visible influences in the verse fables of Félix Samaniego (1745-1801) and Tomás Iriarte (1750-1791).

Romantic and post-romantic poetry of the 19th C. The romantic movement, like neoclassicism, came into Spain from outside; it was the Germans and the Eng. who helped Spaniards to rediscover and appreciate anew their own romances or ballads and Golden Age lyrics. This leads eventually to the publication of the Romances históricos (1841), new poems by the Duke of Rivas (1791-1865), in which national legends and atmospheres are nostalgically evoked in colorful pictures. More passionately romantic and lyrical was José de Espronceda (1808-1842), an active Byronic personality pregnant with political and amorous escapades. His Poesías líricas (1840) are filled with emotions which are violent, if not profound, and with the sound and rhythm of a renovated poetic language; his erotic and libertarian impulses are often colored with a rebellious, nihilistic Satanism. The best example of this is his Don Juanesque Estudiante de Salamanca, full of vitality and technical virtuosity. Greatly influenced by Rivas and Espronceda was José Zorrilla (1817-1893), whose romantic stage version of the Don Juan story is filled with similar poetry and is still played annually. With Zorrilla the romantic movement put roots deep down into Sp. history. Zorrilla wrote verse facily and in tremendous quantities; by the time he died, he had become himself a national monument to romanticism, a 19th-c. Lope de Vega.

The only Sp. poet of the 19th c. whose works can still be read without condescension in the 20th is Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer (1836-1870). Romantic idealism of a vaguely Platonic variety and neat economy of form are, in general terms, his distinctive traits. His 76 short Rimas (1871) are marked externally by a direct simplicity and musicality of language reminiscent of folk song; their inner dream-world of sentiment is, however, more ethereal, sophisticated, deliberately artistic. A constant theme is the ineffability of love, despair, memories, and all profound emotional values.

SPANISH POETRY

¿Será verdad que cuando toca el sueño con sus dedos de rosa nuestros ojos, de la cárcel que habita huye el espíritu en vuelo presuroso?

Can it be true that when sleep touches / our eyes with its rose-colored fingers, / our spirit flees the prison it inhabits / and soars away in haste?

Perhaps two non-Castilian poets, writing in dialects revived literarily by romantic regionalists, are remotely comparable in quality to Bécquer: Rosalía de Castro (1837-1885), writing in Galician, and Jacinto Verdaguer (1845-1902), writing in Catalan. More widely read than any of these, however, were two postromantic, solidly bourgeois poets, the prosaic humorist Ramón de Campoamor (1817-1901) and the rhetorical idealist Gaspar Núñez de Arce (1832-1903); with these two, Sp. lyricism reached a nadir from which it was to rise only under the impulse of Ruben Darío's modernism (q.v.).

The 20th C. Ruben Darío (1867-1916) was born in Nicaragua, but his poetic innovations reached every corner of the Sp.-speaking world.
His cult of beauty, evinced in his rhythmic metrical experiments, in his Parnassian sensuousness, and even in his Verlainean religiosity, amounted to a stylistic revolution hardly less important than that of the 16th c. Yet Spain's first great poet in the 20th c. was not a modernist; in fact, Antonio Machado (1875-1939) seems to illustrate, as an Andalusian living in somber Castile, a reaction against all that was showy and external in Darío, a deliberate turning within, a searching for his own unknown God. His style is simple, apparently almost prosaic at times; yet there are always deep inner resonances. Even his landscapes have their true existence, not in the world of geography, but upon the contours of the soul.
His most typical symbolic scene is that of a fountain trickling in a deserted square at sunset.

Las ascuas de un crepúsculo morado
detrás del negro ciprésal humean . . .
En la glorieta en sombra está la fuente con su alado y desnudo Amor de piedra, que sueña mudo. En la marmórea taza reposa el agua muerta.

The embers of a purple twilight / smoke behind the dark cypress grove . . . / In the shadowy arbor is the fountain / with its winged nude Cupid of stone / silently dreaming. In the marble basin / reposes the still water.

More directly related to Darío is the poet of transition who stands between Modernism and

Lorca's generation, Juan Ramón Jiménez (1881-1958). A perfectionist like Valéry, Jiménez spent his life working on his poetry, stripping it of all nonessentials, seeking forms of expression to reflect as precisely as possible the subtle shadings of his emotional world. In 1956 he received the Nobel Prize, both for his own work and, vicariously, for that of two Sp.
poets no longer living at that time: Antonio Machado and Federico García Lorca.

Lorca (1899-1936) is the most widely known member of the major constellation of 20th-c Sp. poets, which reached maturity during the 1920's. With Alberti (1902-) he represents primarily the Andalusian, folkloric tendency:
a popular intuitive genius of great lyrical power, fusing in his poetry elements drawn from many currents within the Sp. cultural heritage, ranging from childlike ingenuousness to the sophistication of a Góngora. The Civil Guard attacks the gypsy town:

En el portal de Belén
los gitanos se congregan.
San José, lleno de heridas, amortaja a una doncella . . .

In the doorway of Bethlehem / the gypsies congregate. / Saint Joseph, full of wounds, / enshrouds a maiden . . .

More cosmopolitan and intellectual members of the same group are the Castilians Pedro Salinas (1892-1952) and Jorge Guillén (1893-).
Guillén's perfectionism is reminiscent of Juan Ramón Jiménez's. He owes something, no doubt, to Rimbaud and other Fr. poets, but his poetry as contained in Cántico (definitive edition 1950) is very much his own creation: an attitude of boundless wonder and joy at human existence in this physical world. In recent years, however, his poetry has taken on a somewhat more anguished, less exuberantly optimistic color; we do not yet know what new worlds he will create and reveal. At least two other important members of Lorca's generation should be mentioned here, both having continued to write poetry in Spain since the Civil War: Dámaso Alonso (1898-) and Vicente Aleixandre (1900-). Aleixandre is generally categorized as Spain's greatest sur-realist; he has patronized and encouraged many younger poets. Alonso, Spain's leading philo-logian and literary critic, initiated a distinctly existentialist movement in Sp. poetry with his Hijos de la ira (1944), which with its God-forsaken anguish at human suffering echoes in modern terms certain notes of the Hebrew Psalms.

During and since the Civil War many poets have made themselves known in Spain; poetry has, in fact, been less stunted by the Franco regime than either drama or fiction. One very promising poet, Miguel Hernández (1910–1942), died in prison; a country boy with very little formal education, he read Sp. baroque poetry for himself and wrote some highly original verse. A relatively conservative group of poets who had participated actively in the Civil War published in the postwar review Escorial: Luis Felipe Vivanco (born 1907), Leopoldo Panero (1909), Luis Rosales (1910), Dionisio Ridruejo (1912). The younger poets have tended to gravitate toward two poles. The more neoclassical, orthodox ones, following the lead of the Escorial poets, characteristically entitled their review Garcilaso: José García Nieto (1914), Rafael Morales (1919), José María Valverde (1926), and others. A more baroquely existentialist group looked rather to Quevedo and Hijos de la ira for guidance, centering around the review Españaña: Gabriel Celaya (1911), Blas de Otero (1916), Leopoldo de Luis (1918), Vicente Gao (1919), Carlos Bousoño (1923), Eugenio de Nora (1923). In this younger generation as a whole there is a definite reaction against the aestheticism of Juan Ramón Jiménez and the Lorca generation; their poetry is often directly concerned even with questions of social justice. But the definitive history of postwar Sp. poetry has, of course, yet to be written; the poet José Luis Cano (1912) is the author of the best interim history of this period.

ANTHOLOGIES: Contemporary Sp. Poetry (1945) and Ten Centuries of Sp. Poetry (1955), both ed. E. L. Turnbull; The Heroic Poem of the Sp. Golden Age, ed. F. Pierce (1947); Antología de la poesía lírica española, ed. E. Moreno Báez (1952); Sp. Lyrics of the Golden Age, ed. P. D. Tettenborn (1952); The Penguin Book of Sp. Verse, ed. J. M. Cohen (1956); Floresta lírica española, ed. J. M. Blecua (1957); Poesía española, ed. D. Marín (1958); Ren. and Baroque Poetry of Spain, ed. E. L. Rivers (1964).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Coster, Fernando de Herrera (1908); H. A. Rennert and A. Castro, Vida de Lope de Vega (1919); A. F. G. Bell, Luis de León (1925); J. Cano, La poética de Luzán (1928); K. Vossler, Lope de Vega und seine Zeit (1930); J. Baruzi, St. Jean de la Croix (1930); A. Valbuena Prat, La poesía española contemporánea (1930); E. Joiner Gates, The Metaphors of Luis de Góngora (1933); F. Lecoy, Recherches sur le Libro de buen amor . . . (1938); R. Menéndez Pidal, La España del Cid (1939); E. A. Peers, A History of the Romantic Movement in Spain (1940); W. E. Colford, Juan Meléndez Valdés (1942); A. del Río, Pedro Salinas (1942); J. Guillén, "La poética de Bécquer," Revista Hispánica Moderna, 8 (1942); E. Honig, García Lorca (1944); M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Antología de poetas líricos castellanos (1945); J. Casaldueiro, Jorge Guillén: Cántico (1946); R. Menéndez Pidal, Le epopeya castellana a través de la literatura española (1946); P. Salinas, Jorge Manrique, o tradición y originalidad (1947); G. Díaz-Plaja, Historia de la poesía lírica española (1948); R. Lapesa, La trayectoria poética de Garcilaso (1948); M. R. Lida de Malkiel, Juan de Mena, poeta del prerrenacimiento español (1950); R. Menéndez Pidal, Los orígenes de las literaturas románicas (1951); G. Brenan, Lit. of the Sp. People (1951); D. Alonso, Poesía española (1952); A. Castro, La realidad histórica esp. (1954); D. Alonso, Estudios y ensayos gongorinos (1955); Navarro; F. Cantera, La canción mozárabe (1957); E. Asensio, Poética y realidad en el cancionero peninsular de la edad media (1957); R. Lapesa, La obra literaria del marqués de Santillana (1957); D. Alonso, De los siglos oscuros al de oro (1958); S. Pellegrini, Studi su trove e trovatori della prima lirica ispano-portoghese (1959); M. Criado del Val, Teoría de Castilla la Nueva (1960); M. Arce, Garcilaso (1961); M. R. Lida de Malkiel, Two Sp. Masterpieces: The Book of Good Love and The Celestina (1961); C. D. Ley, Sp. Poetry Since 1939 (1962); O. H. Green, Spain and the Western Tradition (1963–). E.L.R.

SPANISH PROSODY. See ROMANCE PROSODY.

SPASMODIC SCHOOL. A derisive term applied first (1853) by Kingsley and more strikingly (1854) by Aytoun to a group of poets then popular. Neoromantic yearners toward the cosmic, exploiters of intensity and formlessness, they were made ridiculous by Aytoun's parody, Firmilian: A Spasmodic Tragedy. The hero, himself a tragedian, was represented as "Gathering by piecemeal all the noble thoughts / And fierce sensations of the mind," and hoping to "utter such tremendous cadences / That the mere babe who hears them at the breast . . . / Shall be an idiot to its dying hour!" Charter members of the school were P. J. Bailey (Festus), S. Dobell (Balder), Alexander Smith (A Life Drama), and perhaps J. S. Bigg. Other critics then and later applied the name to various poetasters, including G. Massey, J. W. Marston, G. Gilfillan, Ebenezer and Ernest Jones, R. H. Horne, W. B. Scott, and others. They have been called Shelleyan or Byronic; they may have been the feeble Keatsians whom Browning belittled in his poem Popularity. Mrs. Browning, however, is recognizably "spasmodic" in some of her work both before and after marriage, as is Tennyson in Maud.—[W. E. Aytoun] hoax review of Firmilian: A Tragedy, by "T. Percy Jones," Blackwood, 75 (1854); NED; G. Saintsbury, CHEL, XIII, part of ch. 6, pp. 164–249; J. H. Buckley, The Victorian Temper (1951);

SPONDEE

J. Thale, "Browning's 'Popularity' and the Spasmodic Poets," JEGP, 54 (1955). F.A.D.

SPELL. See CHARM.

SPENSERIAN STANZA. An important stanza in Eng. poetry, composed of 9 iambic lines, the first 8 being pentameter and the last hexameter (alexandrine), rhyming ababbcbcc. The form was invented by Edmund Spenser for his The Faerie Queene, and, despite some similarity to ottava rima and to the linked octave used by Chaucer in The Monk's Tale, it stands out as one of the most remarkably original metrical innovations in the history of Eng. verse. The stanza is perfectly suited to the nature of Spenser's great poem, at once dreamlike and intellectual, by turns vividly narrative and lushly descriptive, for it is short enough to contain sharply etched vignettes of action and yet ample enough to lend itself to digression, description, and comment. The subtly recurring pattern of rhyme gives the stanza a formal unity, and the final alexandrine is suited to limpidly expressive emotional effects rather than, like the closing couplet of ottava rima (q.v.), to epigrammatic and witty observations.

The Sp. stanza fell into general disuse in the 17th c., although complex variations of it occurred early in the century in the work of Giles and Phineas Fletcher, and although, later, the philosopher Henry More used it in his largely forgotten allegorical narratives. Some poets of the mid-18th c. revived the stanza with enthusiasm; Shenstone's The Schoolmistress (1742) and, particularly, James Thomson's Castle of Indolence (1748) show a real grasp of its varied possibilities. Beattie's The Minstrel (1771-74) provides a transition to the Eng. romantics, who made the stanza one of their principal vehicles. Wordsworth's early Guilt and Sorrow is written in this measure, but it remained for the younger generation of romantics to produce poems in the Sp. stanza equal in merit to The Faerie Queene. Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812, 1816), with its frequent changes in tone and attitude, utilizes the stanza to advantage; Keats's Eve of St. Agnes (1820) revives the rich sensuousness associated with Spenser's stanza as with his whole art; and Shelley's Revolt of Islam (1818) and Adonais (1821) show their author to be the greatest master of the form since its creator himself. The Sp. stanza has been seldom used since the middle of the 19th c.; an interesting example of a 20th-c. poem in this stanza is the Dieper Levensinkijk (Deeper Life-Vision) of the Dutch poet Willem Kloos, which is also one of the rare examples of non-Eng. Sp. stanza.—Schipper; E. Taboureux, "The Sp. Stanza," Revue de l'enseignement des langues vivantes, 15 (1899), 16 (1900); E. F. Pope, "The Critical Background of the Sp. Stanza," MP, 24 (1926); L. Bradner, "Forerunners of the Sp. Stanza," RES, 4 (1928); Hamer. F.J.W.; A.P.

SPIRITUALS. These religious folk songs of the Am. Negro were known until quite recently as Jubilee Songs because of the Fisk Jubilee Singers who introduced them to the musical world in 1871. Circumstantial evidence, like the survival of Roll, Jordan, Roll among slaves from the U.S. isolated on a Caribbean island since 1824, would seem to place the beginnings of these songs very early in the 19th c., if not, indeed, in the 18th, allowing for the time it usually took such music to develop and become generally known. Musically, the s. often take the Africa-derived form of "call and response chants," but sustained, long-phrase melodies as well as syncopated, segmented ones are used frequently. Their lyrics have no set form, but an indication of the language as well as the subject matter of this most influential body of folk art is contained in such titles as Swing Low Sweet Chariot, Deep River, My Lord What a Morning, Shout All Over God's Heab'n, and Go Down, Moses.—J. B. Marsh, The Story of the Jubilee Singers (1875); Folk Songs of the Am. Negro, ed. J. W. and F. J. Work (1907); Negro Folk Rhymes, ed. T. W. Talley (1922); The Book of Am. Negro S. (1925) and Second Book of Negro S. (1926), both ed. J. R. and J. W. Johnson; Am. Negro Songs and S., ed. J. W. Work (1960). A.B.

SPONDAIC VERSE. A dactylic hexameter (q.v.) whose fifth foot contains a spondee rather than a dactyl, thus causing the verse to end in (at least) 2 spondees:

cōnstīti|t, ātque ōcū|līs Phrygī|a āgmīnā|
cīrcūm|spēxīt
(Virgil, Aeneid 2.68)

Occasional in Homer, common in his Alexandrian imitators (especially in lines which end with quadrisyllabic words, e.g., Catullus 64.78-80 has 3 such lines in succession), rarer in succeeding L. poets (e.g., Virgil's use of spondaic endings is perhaps most frequent within words borrowed from Gr.), almost disappearing after Ovid.—Hardie; Koster. D.S.P.

SPONDEE (Gr. "used at a libation" poured to the accompaniment of the 2 long notes). In classical metric, a unit consisting of 2 long syllables:

(—; fēcā)

Meters entirely composed of spondees are rare, but do occur:

Zeū pān|tōn ār|chā, pān|tōn hā|gētōr
(Terpander, fr. 1)

In the common meters, a s. may replace dactyl, iamb, trochee, or anapaest. In Eng. stressed verse, the s. (' ' ; amén) is rarer than might be expected, the instance of 2 equally stressed syllables in the same foot being almost wholly confined to compound words or 2 adjacent monosyllables:

The lóng|dáy wānes;|thē slów|móon clímbs
(Tennyson, Ulysses)

It is the basis of no Eng. verse, occurring only as a variation. Most Eng. attempts at the foot in classical imitations result in trochees.—Hamer; U. v. Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958); P. Maas, Gr. Metre, tr. H. Lloyd-Jones (1962). D.S.P.

SPONTANEITY. Like sincerity, spontaneity is for the romantics the hallmark of the genuine poet. For Wordsworth, "Poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings." Coleridge distinguishes between "promises and specific symptoms of poetic power," and "general talent determined to poetic composition by accidental motives, by an act of the will, rather than by the inspiration of a genial and productive nature." Such promises are "the sense of musical delight," the choice of subjects remote from the private interests and circumstances of the writer, the modification of imagery by a predominant passion, and depth and energy of thought. J. S. Mill follows Coleridge in distinguishing poets "by nature," and poets "by culture." Keats maintains that "if Poetry comes not as naturally as the Leaves to a tree it had better not come at all." "I appeal," says Shelley, "to the greatest poets of the present day whether it is not an error to assert that the finest passages of poetry are produced by labor and study. The toil and the delay recommended by critics can be justly interpreted to mean no more than a careful observation of the inspired moments, and an artificial connection of the spaces between their suggestions." The doctrine of spontaneity is now largely discredited as dangerous in its implications for the practice of poetry. Taken with caution and common sense, however, it will be found to contain a substantial element of truth.—Abrams. R.H.F.

SPRUCH. Ever since the extension of the term to the short lyrical poem of the minnesingers (q.v.) one has to distinguish between the lyrical Sp. and the Sp. proper (Sprechspruch). Thematically, there is no sharp dividing line between the two. The former is set to music and contains subjective emotional elements, even when dealing with matters other than minne. It is not restricted to one stanza. Before Walther v.d. Vogelweide, only the spurious Spervogel (some identify him as Herger) stands out as a lyrical Sp. poet. Walther developed the genre to an art which in his later years outweighed his lied production. He found many imitators (Bruder Werner, Reinmar von Zweter).

The Sprechspruch, however, is meant to be spoken and read. It is gnomic poetry, including pithy sayings of practical wisdom; religious admonitions; fables or novellas which point a moral (the latter type occurs under the name of bîspel; cf. also the popular, often jocular Priamel [q.v.]). Its form is the 4-beat line, arranged in rhyme pairs. It is nonstrophic, but may be subdivided in line groups of varying length. Such Sprüche first appear in the 12th c. The bourgeois poet Freidank's collection Bescheidenheit (early 13th c.) enjoyed wide popularity into the 16th. The flowery, rhymed speeches (Reimreden) of the Austrian Heinrich der Teichner and his friend Peter Suchenwirt (14th c.) may be considered extended Sprüche. In the 15th c. both Sp. types can be found in the works of the same poets. Hans Sachs made a clear distinction between his Meistergesang and Sp. poetry. Goethe, in his old age, was fond of the Sp. form. The works of Stefan George (the most gnomic of modern German poets) abound in Sprüche; nearly all 100 poems of Der Stern des Bundes are variants of this genre (most of them being unrhymed).

H. Jantzen, Gesch. des deutschen Streitgedichts (1896); W. Nickel, Sirventes und Spruchdichtung (1907); W. Wilmanns and V. Michels, Walther v. d. Vogelweide (4th ed., 1916); H. Schneider, "Spruchdichtung, mittelhochdeutsche," Reallexikon, III; W. Preisendanz, Die Spruchform in der Lyrik des alten Goethe und ihre Vorgesch. (1952); A. Schmidt, "Der politische Sp.," Wolfram-Jahrbuch (1954); H. de Boor, Die höfische Literatur 1170–1250 (3d ed., 1957); R. Kienast, "Deutschsprachige Lyrik des Mittelalters," Dt. Philologie im Aufbruch, II (1958). U.K.G.

SPRUNG RHYTHM. Term coined by Gerard Manley Hopkins to describe what he thought to be his most important metrical rediscovery. As Hopkins describes it, "Sprung rhythm . . . is measured by feet of from one to four syllables, regularly, and for particular effects any number of weak or slack syllables may be used. It has one stress, which falls on the only syllable, if there is only one, or, if there are more, then scanning as above, on the first, and so gives rise to four sorts of feet, a monosyllable and the so-called accentual Trochee, Dactyl, and the First Paeon [q.v.]. . . Sprung Rhythm cannot be counterpointed [q.v.]. . ."

Sprung (or "abrupt") rhythm differs from running rhythm (q.v.) in that it may use rests, monosyllabic feet, and the first pæon (1 x x x); running rhythm, if scanned from the first stress in the line, will consist of accentual trochees and dactyls only, while s. rhythm can juxtapose monosyllabic feet to produce effects of slowness and weight not possible in running (or "alternating") rhythm.

Hopkins points out that s. rhythm is found in nursery rhymes, and a good illustration of the rhythm is to be found in

One, two,
Buckle my shoe.

Here, line 1 is in s., line 2 in running rhythm. Another example given by Hopkins is

March dust, April showers Bring forth May flowers, where, if "showers" and "flowers" are considered monosyllables, both lines are in s. rhythm. These examples will make clear that s. rhythm is essentially a system of over stressing; the poet practicing s. rhythm composes almost as if the spondee were a normal Eng. foot. As has been said of s. rhythm, "Its external distinguishing feature is the free occurrence of juxtaposed stresses without intermediate unstressed syllables."

S. rhythm, by approximating the movements of emotion-charged natural speech, suggests a tone of frank sincerity and intimate emotional involvement. Good examples of the tone most natural to s. rhythm are Hopkins' poems At the Wedding March and Spring and Fall: To a Young Child.

H. Whitehall, "S. Rhythm," in The Kenyon Critics, Gerard Manley Hopkins (1945); Sister M. M. Holloway, The Prosodic Theory of Gerard Manley Hopkins (1947); "Author's Preface," Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. R. Bridges and W. H. Gardner (3d ed; 1948); A Hopkins Reader, ed. John Pick (1953). See also P. F. Baum, "S. Rhythm," PMLA, 74 (1959). P.F.

STANZA (It. "station, stopping-place"). A basic structural unit in verse composition, a sequence of lines arranged in a definite pattern of meter and rhyme scheme which is repeated throughout the work. Stanzas range from such simple patterns as the couplet or the quatrain (qq.v.) to such complex stanza forms as the Spenserian (q.v.) or those used by Keats in his odes. The term "stanza" is sometimes restricted to verse units of 4 lines or more, "couplet" and "tercet" being the preferred terms for the shorter forms. The term is also sometimes employed to designate irregular formal divisions found in nonstanzaic poetry (e.g., Paradise Lost), but the term "verse paragraph" (q.v.) is here more expressive and less confusing.

Some narrative poetry, particularly of the epic type, is nonstanzaic (i.e., stichic) in structure (e.g., the Iliad, the Aeneid, Paradise Lost, The Ring and the Book) and thus achieves an effect of linear development in which the narrative line in itself provides the essential structure. Such compositions as Pope's Rape of the Lock (in couplets) and Dante's Divina Commedia (in tercets, or, more properly, in terza rima) achieve a similar effect. True stanzaic composition, as in Spenser's Faerie Queene (Spenserian stanza), Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (ottava rima), and Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (rhyme royal), lends itself to a kind of tension between narrative structure and lyric, elegiac, didactic, or satiric digression. Although the essence of stanzaic composition lies in the regular repetition of the pattern, stanzaic verse often employs variation, not only through metrical substitution but also through irregularities in s. form, as in Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, with its subtle rhetorical embroideries on the basic ballad measure.

The term "s." is sometimes applied to independent poems of complex metrical pattern, such as the ballade, the sestina, and the sonnet (qq.v.). Synonymous or analogous terms include the Gr. strophe (q.v.) and the early Eng. batch and stave (q.v.). F.J.W.; A.P.

STASIMON (Gr. "stationary song"). An ode sung by the Gr. chorus after it has taken its position in the orchestra. Aristotle distinguishes the s. from the parodos, the song of the chorus in anapaestic meter as it marches into the orchestra, and defines it as "a song of the chorus without anapaests or trochees" (Poetics 1452 b. 20ff.). The stasima alternate with the episodes, the dialogue passages delivered by the actors, and their number in tragedy varies between three and five. Originally, and during the longer part of the 5th c. B.C., the stasima were intimately connected with the subject matter of the episodes. However, this connection became, gradually, very tenuous, until, finally, Agathon (ca. 447-400 B.C.) replaced them by the embolima, intercalary pieces, mere choral interludes which could be introduced into any play (Poetics 1456 a 29-30).—W. Aly, "S.," in Pauly-Wissowa, Real-encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, 2d ser., III (1926), 2156-66; W. Kranz, S. (1933); W. J. W. Koster, "De metris stasimi I et II Electrae Euripidis," Mélanges Emile Boisacq, II (1938). P.S.C.

STAVE (a back formation from the plural staves, of staff). A group of lines of verse or a stanza of a poem or song, particularly a hymn or drinking song; possibly the term was once restricted to poems intended to be sung. Also, the initial alliterative sound in a verse: e.g., the s in the line, "Or snorted we in the Seven Sleepers den" (Donne). This special meaning possibly comes from analogy with German Stab, meaning staff; in German stabweimender Vers means alliterative verse. R.O.E.

STICHOMYTHIA. Line by line conversation between two characters in the Gr. drama. It occurs in argumentative passages and is characterized by contrasted statements, repetition of the opponent's words, and angry retort. S. is very frequent in Seneca and is often used by Elizabethan dramatists, especially in plays written in imitation of Seneca's tragedies. Shakespeare employs it in King Richard III, 4.4, and in Hamlet, 3.4, as does Molière in Les Femmes Savantes, 3.5. It is occasionally referred to as "cut and parry" or "cut and thrust" dialogue.—J. L. Hancock, Studies in S. (1917); J. L. Myres, The Structure of S. in Gr. Tragedy (1950). P.S.C.

STICH(OS) (Gr. "row," "line"). A line of Gr. or L. verse. More precisely a single line (or a poem 1 line long, of which Anthologia Palatina 11.312 cites an example) is called a monostich, a couplet a distich, and a half-line or section of a verse a hemistich. "Stichic" verse is that which was composed in recurrent and homogeneous lines, whereas in "stanzaic" verse a limited number of lines or cola (often, in the case of personal lyric, in quatrains and generally of varying length and movement) are combined in recurrent groups or stanzas. Stichic arrangement was normal for recitative poetry, whereas that which was sung was generally stanzaic.—J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); Dale. R.J.G.

STILFORSCHUNG. See STYLISTICS.

STILNOVISMO. See DOLCE STIL NUOVO.

STOCK (also called sto(c)kreg(h)el, reg(h)el, sluutvers). The identical line which concludes each stanza of the refrein (q.v.) practiced by the rederijkers (q.v.). It expresses the theme or leading thought of the poem and is borrowed from the Fr. ballade. Occasionally, the s. may consist of 2 or 1½ lines, or even of a half-line.—A. Borguet, "De 'stok' van het referein," Tijdschrift voor Levende Talen (1946); A. van Elslander, Het refrain in de Nederlanden tot 1600 (1953). R.F.L.

STOCK RESPONSE. This usually pejorative term, probably coined by I. A. Richards in Principles . . . , has two main senses: (1) "Response evoked partly by a present stimulus—e.g., a word ('mother,' say) or a topic (motherhood) in a poem—but largely by past, associated stimuli—e.g., other poems with similar words or topics." If the context of the present stimulus is a poem, then such a response results in misreading, in neglecting the rest of the context. (2) "Stimulus likely to evoke a stock response in Sense (1)." "Here . . . the stock response is actually in the poem" (Practical Criticism, p. 244); if, however, such a response is in some sense "appropriate," then such a poem may be good (" . . . [Gray's] Elegy is perhaps the best example in English of a good poem built upon a foundation of stock responses"—ibid., p. 253). But in either sense s. responses are generally bad; for they generally stand between someone and reality—either between the reader and the reality mirrored in the poem (Sense 1) or between the poet and reality (Sense 2). They are "stereotyped reactions" (ibid., p. 246)—inappropriate, unrealistic, and inefficient.

"S. response" is, of course, a metaphor; and the vehicle of the metaphor—something ready-made, carried in stock, and sold without alteration—has inspired other terms: " . . . [a passage from Charles Reade] works on the feelings known already to be in stock with the suitable reader . . . in tapping the Great Heart of his Public he stresses 'little' and 'white-headed boys' and gives the bird human attributes, thus bringing off a response to his indecently false pathos" (D. Thompson, Reading and Discrimination [1934] p. 19; italics supplied); "The emotional appeal of stock phrases is probably very considerable . . ." (E. G. Biaggini, Eng. in Australia [1933] p. 21).—I. A. Richards, Principles of Lit. Crit. (1924) and Practical Crit. (1929); A. West, Crisis and Crit. (1937). See also N. Frye, The Well-Tempered Critic (1963). M.S.

STORNELLO (sometimes called fiore, ritornello, motteto, novella). A short It. folk verse form customarily divided so that it can be sung responsively. It took root in Tuscany in the 17th c. and from there has spread throughout central and southern Italy. Originally, it must have consisted of a rhymed distich, a type now common in Sicily, but the 2 principal types that have prevailed are (1) a composition of 3 hendecasyllables the first and third having a consonantal or assonantal rhyme, and the second an atonic rhyme (-ore, -äre, -ire); and (2) a composition of 2 hendecasyllables prefixed by a pentameter or some other short verse line which consists of an invocation to a flower or plant, or an exclamatory or vocative phrase. Often between one s. and another or between its parts a refrain (ritornello, rifiorita) is intercalated. The s. lends itself to easy improvisation.—V. Santoli, I Canti popolari italiani (1940). J.G.F.

STRAMBOTTO. A 1-stanza composition in hendecasyllables and one of the oldest of It. verse forms. Though the number of its verses varies, particularly from region to region, the two dominant patterns which it assumes are the octave with the rhyme scheme:

AB AB AB AB
AB AB CC DD
AB AB AB CC
AA BB CC DD

and the sestet with the rhyme scheme:

AB AB AB
AB AB CC
AA BB CC

Of these the octave type is characteristic of Sicily where the form is supposed to have originated. The sestet type, on the other hand, is Tuscan and is presumed by some authorities to be a modification of the Sicilian octave (q.v.). Critical opinion is now tending to oppose this monogenetic thesis by a polygenetic one.

The term derives from Fr. estrabot, but whereas the Fr. have used it to apply to satirical compositions, the Italians have restricted it to rhymes that are sentimental and amorous in content.—G. D'Aronco, Guida bibliografica allo studio dello strambotto (1951).

J.G.F.

"STRATEGY" began to appear in literary criticism in the 1930's. (1) Kenneth Burke defined literature as "symbolic action" in which a "situation" is "sized up" and a "strategy" (or "attitude") is indicated for "handling" or "encompassing" it. Thus The Rime of the Ancient Mariner reflects (in part) Coleridge's s. for the "redemption" of his drug habit; and the typical s. of Blake is "purification by excess." (2) For other critics (Ransom, Brooks) s. means "art," "craft," "method," or "technique." S. is an author's selection and deployment of various formal elements (whether of style or structure) for the achievement of poetic ends, however these ends may be defined. (3) Finally, the principles of the various systems of criticism have been called strategies (by R. P. Warren, Tate, Fiedler, Pollock) in the sense (a) that by different "approaches" they seek the "defeat" of the artistic work, or (b) that they are polemical devices for "attacking" established reputations and "defending" revolutions in taste, or (c) that, logically considered, they are proposals for the redefinition of normative terms and as such carry implicit recommendations whether the critic or his reader realizes this or not.—K. Burke, The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941); T. C. Pollock, "The Strategy of Classification," The Nature of Lit. (1942).

F.G.

STRESS. The vocal emphasis received by a syllable as part of a metrical pattern. S. is held by some linguists and prosodists to be equal to accent (q.v.); it is held by others to be one of the constituents of accent; the term is used by still others to mean metrical accent as distinguished from rhetorical accent. In this latter sense, the term "stress" is often used instead of "accent" to refer to the ideal or normal pattern of accents in a regular accentual or accentual-syllabic poetic line: e.g., "Swift was fond of the four-stress line." The term "stress-unit" has recently attained some popularity as a synonym for "foot," but in fact the two are distinct although they may coincide. Free s. is emphasis which may fall on any syllable of a word according to rhetorical weight; fixed s. is emphasis which falls always on the same syllable of a word regardless of the word's rhetorical context. Four degrees of s. are sometimes discriminated: strong, secondary, tertiary, weak. See ACCENT, METER, PROSODY.

P.F.

STRICT-METRE POETRY. The earliest extant attempt at a metrical analysis of Welsh poetry is attributed to Einion the Priest, and dates from the 1st half of the 14th c. His division of "metres" into the three categories of awdl, cywydd, and englyn and, subject to the modifications by Dafydd ab Edmwnd in 1450, his arrangement of the "twenty-four metres" comprised in these three classes, became the accepted forms of "strict-metre" poetry and have remained so to this day. See AWDL, CYWYDD, DYFALU, ENGLYN, ODL.

D.M.L.

STROPHE. Originally, the initial component of a choral ode, as in the classical Gr. drama. The s. derives its name from the first of the tripartite divisions of a Gr. choral interlude, which the chorus chanted while moving from one side of the stage to the other; it was followed by the antistrophe (q.v.) of identical metrical structure, chanted in accompaniment to a reverse movement, and then by the epode (q.v.), of different metrical structure, chanted as the chorus stood still.

In later periods the term was extended to apply to a structural division of any irregularly stanzaic poem of intermediate length, particularly of the ode type. It is thus partially synonymous with stanza (q.v.). In the modern period the term "s." has also been applied to the irregular rhetorical unit of free verse, possibly because the original classical s. was free from any prescribed limit of length or meter. The free-verse s. is a unit determined by rhythmic or emotional completeness rather than by metrical pattern.

STRUCTURE. The term "s." in the sense of "sum of the relationships of the parts of a literary whole to one another" has a long history. The NED cites instances as early as 1746; but there is at least one nearly a century and a half older: ". . . call it [i.e., dimeter] what you please," Campion wrote in 1602, "for I will not wrangle about names, only intending to set down the nature of it and true structure. It consists of two feet and one odde sillable" (Observations in the Art of Eng. Poesie, p. 16). The whole referred to in the definition is usually a literary work but may be a chapter, a scene, or a stanza; a sentence or a line; or a part of a line (as in Campion) or even a word. The parts may be formal subdivisions of the whole, certain significant marks on the page or certain significant sounds (the parts of a line, e.g., may be phrases or words, feet or syllables, or morphemes or phonemes), or nonformal subdivisions (certain topics or events, e.g.).

The relationship of one formal part to another is always either linear (marks on the page) or temporal (sounds). To say that the line "And smote him, thus" consists of "and," "smote," "him," and "thus" in that order; or of a conjunction, a verb, a pronoun, and an adverb in that order; or of two iambs is to describe its formal s. The relationship of one nonformal part to another is sometimes linear or temporal but not always. To say that Paradise Lost consists of certain topics or events (the revolt of the angels, the fall of the angels, the fall of Eve, etc.) presented in a certain serial or temporal order is to describe one of its nonformal structures. An account of the plot of an epic or a novel (such as Milton himself gives in the argument preceding each book) is, thus, a description of a nonformal s. of that work; and a topical outline of an essay represents a nonformal s. of that essay. Sometimes, however, the relationship of one nonformal part to another is quite otherwise. To say, as Aristotle would, that Paradise Lost consists of fable, characters, diction, and thought—or, as Tillyard does (Milton, Pt. 3), that, like an onion, it consists of at least two layers of meaning: the "conscious" or "professed" meaning (man's disobedience, etc.) and the "unconscious" or "real" ("the true state of Milton's mind when he wrote it")—is to describe (truly or falsely) another of its nonformal structures. And to say, as Empson does, that a single word consists of senses, implications, emotions, and moods is to describe a nonformal s. of that word (The Structure of Complex Words, pp. 15-39).

The concept designated by the term "s." is even older than the term. Its rôle has always, and necessarily, been prominent in any criticism (such as Aristotle's) whose focus is (a)

the work itself rather than "nature," the writer, or his audience; (b) the work as a function of one of these other things (as, e.g., an imitation of "nature"); or (c) one of these other things as a function of the work (the emotion of pity in the audience, e.g., as a function of certain properties of the fable and the characters of a tragedy). Its rôle is smaller in criticism (such as Johnson's) whose focus is "nature" (mimesis) or the audience (dulce et utile), or criticism (such as Coleridge's) whose focus is the writer (the imagination).

Aristotle, in defining "tragedy," considers "nature" and the audience as well as the work itself but carefully establishes a functional relationship between the work and the other two. The tragedy itself has six qualitative or formative parts: fable, characters, diction, thought, spectacle, and melody (Poetics 6.1450a14). The fable imitates "nature": a serious, complete action of some magnitude etc. (7.1450b23-25); and the fable and the main character are such (13.1453a7-17) as to arouse certain emotions in the audience: pity and fear (9.1452a2). A tragedy has four quantitative parts also: the prologue, the epeisodia, the exode, and the choral parts (the parade and the stasima) (12.1452b17-24). The qualitative or formative parts constitute a nonformal s.; the quantitative (insofar as they may be distinguished by formal criteria), a formal.

Disagreements about s. are only rarely factual—at least, rarely exclusively factual. Critics disagree about what s. a work ought to have (if it is to be rightly denominated a "true" lyric, e.g.). They rarely disagree about what s. it has. At the root of most disagreements lie rival persuasive definitions of "poetry"—statements of policy rather than statements of fact (about actual usage of the term); and they largely determine critics' answers to the two questions that are, as Crane shows (The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry, pp. 5-6), the loci of disagreements about s.: (a) whether all species of poetry (say) ought to have the same s. or each have its own and (b) what that structure or those structures ought to be. These questions have been variously answered by ancients and moderns; but—since the answers are many, and analysis of them complex—a few observations must suffice. As to (a), Aristotle and Crane himself (and the Chicago neo-Aristotelians generally) are pluralists; most modern critics (especially New Critics), monists. Some of Aristotle's answers to (b) appear above; perhaps the best-known modern answer is Brooks' in The Well Wrought Urn: Studies in the Structure of Poetry. A poem, Brooks holds, is essentially a s. of paradoxes (in an extended sense of "paradox" that counts as paradoxes, not only apparent contradictions, but also descriptions of surprising states of affairs—e.g., London's looking attractive in "Westminster Bridge"): "... the language of poetry is the language of paradox" (p. 3). Since for him poetry is by (persuasive) definition (i) a form of discourse and (ii) discourse differing from other ("scientific") discourse by its use of paradox ("It is the scientist whose truth requires a language purged of every trace of paradox; apparently the truth which the poet utters can be approached only in terms of paradox" [ibid.]), his answer to (b) could have been predicted.

Perhaps "s." would be more critically useful if part of its meaning were taken over by "style," so that "s." would mean "sum of the relationships of the nonformal parts of a literary whole to one another" and "style" "... formal parts. . . ." This distinction would reserve "style" for remarks about words and their syntax, and "s." for ones about the things designated by the words and about the relationships among these things. See FORM; STYLE.

Aristotle, Poetics (ca. 325 B.C.); T. Campion, Observations in the Art of Eng. Poesie (1602; ed. G. B. Harrison, 1925); E. M. W. Tillyard, Milton (1930); C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947); W. Empson, The S. of Complex Words (1951); Crane. M.S.

STURM UND DRANG (Storm and Stress). The title of a wildly bombastic play (1776) by Klingler, and a hendiadys for the impulse to give violent expression to one's individuality, S.u.D. was quickly used to describe a revolutionary literary movement that flourished in Germany from the late 1760's to the early 1780's; because most of its representatives calmed down with advancing years, the term often denotes a period of youthful exuberance and/or maladjustment.

Hostile to neoclassicism as exemplified in Fr. literature, S.u.D. was greatly influenced by pre-romantic developments in France and, especially, England, whose literature had been regarded as the more congenial to the German national character since the 1740's (Bodmer, Breitinger, Klopstock, Lessing). A general repudiation of normative aesthetics based itself upon (1) the new sense of historical relativism and the importance attributed to environmental forces (Montesquieu, Herder); (2) the revaluation of primitive and early national literature and art (Rousseau, Macpherson and Ossian; popular balladry, the Gothic revival, Homer as interpreted by Young and Shakespeare by Herder); and (3) the cult of original genius (Shafesbury, Young), which Herder conceived of as dynamic. S.u.D. developed in Germany as the optimism of the Enlightenment began to appear unwarranted by its intellectual and social achievements. Herder and his teacher Hamann were both centrally concerned with religious issues, and many S.-u.-D. writers subscribed to a voluntaristic pantheism in which Spinozistic and Leibnizian elements were fused with pietistic subjectivism. With nature felt to be a demonic force not entirely accessible to reason, a deliberate cult of the irrational became widespread.

For the drama Shakespeare, as formally unconventional, and Diderot and Mercier, as socially realistic, were inspirations and models (Goethe, Lenz, H. L. Wagner, F. Müller). The lyric was permanently enriched with folk song elements (new structural freedom, simpler and more direct language), although the ode in Klopstock's manner continued to be cultivated, especially by members of the Göttinger Hainbund, q.v. (Society of the Grove—grove as home of bards). The novel, largely concerned with emotional crises, showed the influence of Rousseau, Richardson, Goldsmith, and Sterne. Emphasis on the "characteristic" as opposed to the "ideal" marks most S.-u.-D. writing; in the drama violently individualistic heroes—extroverts, misfits, outlaws—dominate (Goethe, Schiller), while the novel of psychological development, often partly autobiographical, begins to flourish (Goethe, Jung-Stilling, F. H. Jacobi, Heinse, K. P. Moritz).

Despite novel, almost expressionistic, technical experiments in drama and lyric, the movement was abortive. Individualistic rather than social (apparent interest in contemporary social issues often reflects only a choice of unconventional naturalistic themes), it could not realize in a complex and sophisticated age its vision of a universally popular national literature such as Homer and Shakespeare were held once to have exemplified. A direct contemporary influence was exerted in Swedish and, more feebly, Eng. literature; analogous features have been discerned in some other literatures, but only in Germany was S.u.D. a self-conscious group movement. By radically undermining traditional concepts of poetry it undoubtedly hastened the first flowering of a conscious romanticism, that of Germany in the 1790's.

H. A. Korff, Geist der Goethezeit, I (1923); B. Markwardt, "S.u.D., Geniezeit," Reallexikon, III; K. Wais, Das antiphilosophische Weltbild des französischen S. u. Drangs (1934); E. A. Runge, Primitivism and Related Ideas in S.u.D. Lit. (1946); H. B. Garland, Storm and Stress (1952); R. Pascal, The German S.u.D. (1953); Wellek, I.; E. Blackall, "The Language of S.u.D.," Stil-und Formprobleme in der Literatur, ed. P. Böckmann (1959); E. Braemer, Goethes Prometheus und die Grundpositionen des S.u.D. (1959); S. Atkins, "Zeitalter der Aufklärung," Fischer-Lexikon (Lit. II, 1, 1965). S.A.

STYLE. How are we to distinguish between what a poem says and the language in which it says it? On the one hand, there is no such thing as a "content" which does exist quite apart from the words; on the other hand the very existence of the word "style" shows that something can be said about the words which does not refer directly to the content. The relation between the two must be described metaphorically; and looking at the metaphors that have been used, we see that they are of two kinds. The first suggest that the relation is mechanical, that s. is something added, more or less at the poet's discretion; if on the other hand we see the relation as closer and more intimate, we are likely to use an organic metaphor.

The first kind is common in Renaissance and neoclassic criticism. Puttenham compares "ornament" (the term had a very wide meaning for him, almost that of "s.") to flowers, to jewels or embroidery, even to "the crimson taint which should be laid upon a lady's lips." Even commoner is the comparison of s. to a garment: says Sir William Alexander (1634): "Language is but the apparel of Poesy, which may give beauty but not strength." The same conception survives into neoclassic criticism: for Chapelain (1668) the essentials of a poem are "l'invention, la disposition, les moeurs et les passions"; diction, s., and versification are unimportant—"de petite consideration." Rosamund Tuve has made an attempt (which has not convinced everyone) to claim that some of these apparently mechanical views are really organic: pointing out that the garment image, for example, was also applied to the body in relation to the soul.

It is possible to find the organic view in Renaissance theory (Ben Jonson uses the body / soul analogy); but it comes into its own only with the romantics. Coleridge states it as well as anybody: images, he says in the Biographia Literaria, "become proofs of original genius only as far as they are modified by a predominant passion; or by associated thoughts or images awakened by that passion;" or in several other ways which would give an inner unity to the s. This passage, incidentally, says almost exactly the same as the 17th section of Longinus' treatise On the Sublime, the one notable statement of the organic view in antiquity.

After Coleridge there are innumerable statements of the organic view: for Pater, for instance, the process of polishing one's style may seem mechanical, but the result, when successful, is organic—"the house he has built is rather a body he has informed." Two modern statements worth special mention are those of Middleton Murry and Leo Spitzer. Murry, who actually uses the word organic ("style is organic—not the clothes a man wears, but the flesh and bone of his body") holds that metaphor is more than an ornament, more even than an act of comparison: in creative literature of the highest kind it becomes "almost a mode of apprehension." This is confined to imaginative writing: in the case of argument and exposition, he is prepared to allow that s. is detachable from content. Spitzer assumes the organic view of s. in his account of the "philological circle": the process of arguing from details of a linguistic structure to its postulated cause, "mental centre" or "inner significance," and then back again to other details. Spitzer regards this process as the same whether the "cause" is the artistic purpose behind a particular poem, or the hypothetical vulgar L. prototype behind the details of modern Fr. and It.: the process applies both to linguistics and to literary study. "The reader must seek to place himself in the creative centre of the artist himself and recreate the artistic organism." This assumes that stylistic details in a poem, like verbal details in a language, are not an inchoate chance aggregation, but part of a related whole: that seems a fair and even a necessary assumption, though many of Spitzer's readers will not follow him in the religious corollaries he deduces from it.

S., then, may be considered as something added, or as part of an organic whole. We need to ask next what it is added to, what it depends on or reflects. There are three main answers to this: that s. depends on subject, or an author, or on period. The first view was systematized in the Renaissance doctrine of the three styles: "to have the style decent and comely it behoveth the maker or Poet to follow the nature of his subject, that is if his matter be high and lofty that the style be so too, if mean, the style also to be mean, if base, the style humble and base accordingly" (Puttenham). The high s. suited epic and, in theory, tragedy; the middle s. verse epistles, "common poesies of love," elegies, and matters "that concern mean men, their life and business, as lawyers, gentlemen and merchants"; the base s. was for satire, and for pastoral, "the doings of the common artificer, servingman, yeoman," etc. Decorum demanded the use of "words, phrases, sentences, and figures, high, lofty, eloquent and magnific" for a poem like the Faerie Queene: "Dread sovereign goddess that dost highest sit / In seat of judgement in th'Almighty's stead, / And with magnific might and wondrous wit / Dost to thy people righteous doom aread. . . ." At the other extreme, here is the base s., as used by Donne in a satire: "But he is worst, who (beggarily) doth chaw / Others wits fruits, and in his ravenous maw / Rankly digested, doth those things out-spew / As his own things. . . ."

Each s. is bad if applied to the wrong subject: and Puttenham offers examples of such indecorum. Aeneas should not trudge out of Troy, Juno should not tug Aeneas, for these terms are "better to be spoken of a beggar, or of a rogue, or a lackey" than a prince and the hero of an epic. The theory of decorum has a social basis.

Naturally it is the grand s. that receives most discussion. For the supreme example of its use, we need to move forward to the next age, to the plays of Racine. It is in fact not easy to find the grand s. in Elizabethan literature, for the stylistic practice of the Elizabethans was much less doctrinaire than their theory. Donne and Marlowe mingle the styles and apply them to inappropriate subjects, with daring and successful results. No one does this more than Shakespeare: the language of Cleopatra and Lear, at their finest moments, is full of low terms. For the theory of stylistic decorum runs counter to the great strength of Elizabethan literature, and especially drama—its linguistic flexibility and boldness.

The s. of Racine's plays is discussed by Erich Auerbach as the culmination of a movement toward the grand s. that goes back for centuries. He appreciates the effect that this s. yields in the baroque plays of Racine, but is very conscious of the price paid. Auerbach considers all European literature in relation to the division of styles: this is not really found in Homer, he claims, and it is contradicted by the very spirit of both Old and New Testaments. In the world of Christianity, "sermo gravis" and "sermo humilis" are merged: the effect of Christianity has been to merge tragedy in the everyday, not to isolate it, and so to contribute to the realistic tradition that Auerbach so admires. W. H. Auden, too, rejects the grand s., though for another reason: "All words like peace and love, All sane affirmative speech" have been degraded by their use in a commercial age, "pawed at and gossiped over;" so that the writer of integrity is driven to use "the wry, the sotto voce."

Neoclassic interest in the grand s. almost drove out interest in the others: and the idea that there are three styles (or even more than three, as the Elizabethans often concede) is replaced by the idea that there is only one s., based not on the subject of a poem, but merely on the fact that it is a poem, and must therefore differ from the language of speech or prose. "The language of the age," said Gray, "is never the language of poetry . . . our poetry has a language peculiar to itself." This results in the theory of poetic diction (q.v.), aggressively rejected later by Wordsworth, who maintained, in direct opposition to Gray, that "there neither is nor can be any essential difference between the language of prose and metrical composition." Wordsworth's best practice often (though not always) contradicts this; and Coleridge partly reinstated the idea of a special language for poetry in his discussion of Wordsworth's theories. In Coleridge, however, this is not described in terms of choice of words, or any criterion that can be applied mechanically, but it is the result of the poet's "inward vision" and "modifying powers."

So much for subject: next there is the theory that s. reflects the individual author. "Le style est l'homme même": the famous sentence of Buffon seems to sum up this view, though when we look at it in context we see that it is not a view of personality expressed through s. or of "self-expression." For Buffon a fine s. depends on impersonal factors, the truths it presents, the arrangement of the thoughts. In this he is still in the Renaissance/neoclassic tradition (and incidentally is echoed by the demi-romantic Flaubert). It is easy to find assertions in Renaissance criticism that s. is "mentis character," a reflection of the man himself. Puttenham points out that although s. reflects subject, "men do choose their subjects according to the metal of their minds;" and since it is accepted that the personages of a play should speak in character, the extension of this to the poet speaking in his own person needs only a simple analogy. Nonetheless, no preromantic critic sees s. as the man himself in the full sense that this would now be claimed, for this depends on the new emphasis the romantics gave to the individual personality of the writer. The idea that deeper levels of a man's mind are revealed, sometimes even despite himself, in his style, is a comparatively modern one: and its most sophisticated versions (such as that of William Empson) are likely to use the insights of Freud. The traditional view of s. as "l'homme même" was a moral view (as in Longinus and Cicero); the modern version, if not actually psychoanalytic, will certainly emphasize the individual creative act. S. as personality is now a truth universally acknowledged; and the first impulse of a modern is to describe the difference between the two passages quoted earlier in terms of the difference between Spenser and Donne. Here is matter for controversy between the New Critics and the New Scholars. Is an epic by X more like a satire by X or an epic by his contemporary Y? The New Critics tend to emphasize the continuity of author; the others, of subject.

The s. of an author can be subdivided chronologically (Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Yeats are clear examples); and this division may overlap (it does with Dryden and Yeats, it does not with Milton) with the third way of considering s., as depending on the age. According to this view, it is possible to date a poem by the way it uses language: and there have been attempts (such as that of Bateson) to see a number of main phases of Eng. poetry, depending on the changing state of the language. As an example of period s., we may take the famous perspicuity of the Augustans. The Augustan ideals, as is well known, were clarity, perspicuity, good sense, nature, correctness, and reason: these preferences being based on the growing importance of science, the social influence of the bourgeoisie, the philosophy of Hobbes and Descartes. Obviously it is correct to say that this outlook is reflected in the prose of Addison, Defoe, and Swift, the poetry of Denham, Dryden, and Pope, and that there is therefore such a thing as an Augustan s., of the late 17th and earlier 18th c. What qualifications are needed to this simple view? First, that there is more strain among the Augustan ideals than they themselves always recognized: e.g. between reason and good sense, or between correctness and naturalness. This strain is mirrored in stylistic contrasts, e.g. between the coolness of the prose of Addison and the savage energy of Swift's (yet both are Augustan), or between the language of Pope's pastorals and that of his satires. Further, much of the energy of Augustan writing went into the characterizing of what they did not altogether approve of. "One glaring chaos and wild heap of wit," writes Pope in the Essay on Criticism, with a creative fire that in The Dunciad was to become an inspired condemning.

Relating s. to period, though prefigured in such a document as Coleridge's essay on s., is on the whole characteristic of the historical approach of the 20th c. There have been many interesting attempts to discuss the mechanism behind the formation of a period s. F. W. Bateson, for example, emphasizes that social and ethical influences can act on poetry only indirectly through their influence on the language. Promising as this sounds, it issues either in truism or in an utterly unprovable determinism, asserting that the characteristics of a group of poets are "imposed on the poets willy nilly" by the state of the language. Indeed, a theory of "period s." can hardly escape determinism, as we can see in two much subtler critics, Erich Auerbach and Patrick Cruttwell. "At any given moment," says Cruttwell, "there are not more than one or two poetic manners in which success is possible;" and his book (The Shakespearean Moment) analyzes those in which it was possible in the 17th c. Cruttwell has not the magnificent sweep of Auerbach's immense learning, but he has the one quality which the attentive reader of Auerbach begins to miss: he recognizes the importance of the creative act. For Auerbach, s. is often (especially in early periods) the reflection of a tension between the author's intent and the pressure of social forces: thus the s. of Ammianus Marcellinus is the resultant of a stoical "respect for the past" in Ammianus being acted upon by the sombre realism, the social violence, and the sensory prominence of gesture found in his material and, behind that, in his age: the author's control, as maker, is almost ignored. And discussing Racine, the s. and the theory behind it, Auerbach offers a "sociological" interpretation of the apparent contradiction (paying tribute to Taine), in terms of an elite with more prestige than function. The determinism of Auerbach is subtler and more specious than that of Cruttwell, but also more rigid; for although Cruttwell offers a less complex version of the social forces at work, he sees these forces not as themselves determining s., but merely as imposing a limit to the kind of creative act possible.

The problem of what determines s. (subject, author, or period: or yet further possibilities, such as the language itself, or certain philosophical positions) is in one sense a philosophical not a literary problem; and it can be shelved while we are actually analyzing styles, or suggesting ways of comparing them. It is impossible even to mention all the worthwhile analyses of styles which exist, but a word seems in place on some of the classifications that have been suggested, into kinds of s. There is the contrast between a plain and an ornate s.: the plain s. of course overlaps with the period s. of the Augustans, but at almost any time there is some sort of movement for plainness. What it attacks can vary, and a later age may not find it plain at all: thus George Herbert claimed to prefer "honest plainness" to veiled sense and baroque imagery (cf. Jordan), and yet is accused by the Augustans of those very qualities himself. Bagehot suggested a three-fold distinction, between the pure s. of Wordsworth, the ornate s. of Tennyson (he calls this romantic, but it is really parnassien), and the grotesque s. of Browning. Remy de Gourmont suggested a distinction between visual and emotive styles, and regarded the first as the essentially poetic: few modern critics would follow him here. Many accounts of the classical romantic distinction have been offered, one of the best being Valéry's ("Tout classicisme suppose un romantisme antérieure. L'essence du classicisme est de venir après.")

Finally, it must be said that the discussion of s. is a part of literary criticism. The nature of literary creation is such that if it is successful, every detail of the product is of significance only as pointing to a total meaning: the better a poem, the more certain we may be that the organic view of s. is the true one for it. This means that there can be no worthwhile discussion of "figures," stylistic details, and ornament apart from their function in the poem.

"Longinus," On the Sublime (1st c. A.D.); Puttenham, The Art of Eng. Poesy (1589; esp. Bk. III, chaps. 5, 23); Ben Jonson, Timber, or Discoveries (1640; esp. sections cxv-end); Boileau, L'Art Poétique (1674); Addison, The Spectator, no. 285 (1712; on poetic diction); Pope, Essay on Crit. (1711), The Dunciad (1728-43), To Augustus: the First Epistle of the Second Book of Horace Imitated (1737; a survey of Eng. poetry); G. Buffon, Discours sur le S. (1753); Wordsworth, Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800); Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817; esp. chaps. 15-22) and "On Style," no. 14 of A Course of Lectures (1818); Keats, Letters (esp. that to Shelley, Aug. 10, 1820); Bagehot, Wordsworth, Tennyson and Browning or Pure, Ornate and Grotesque Art in Eng. Poetry (1864); Pater, "S.," in Appreciations (1889); R. de Gourmont, Le Problème du S. (1902); M. Proust, A L'Ombre des Jeunes Filles en Fleurs (NRF ed., v. III, 1919, pp. 156-57; s. as the revelation of personality); J. M. Murry, The Problem of S. (1925); P. Valéry, 'Situation de Baudelaire,' Variété, II (1929), 141; F. W. Bateson, Eng. Poetry and the Eng. Language (1932) and Eng. Poetry (1950); Tuve; L. Spitzer, Linguistics and Lit. Hist. (1948); Welles and Warren, esp. ch. 14, and excellent biblio.; W. H. Auden, dedicatory poem to Nones (1952); Auerbach; M. C. Bradbrook, "Fifty Years of Crit. of Shakespeare's S.," ShS, 7 (1954); P. Cruttwell, The Shakespearean Moment (1954); W. Nowotny, The Language Poets Use (1962).

L.D.L.

STYLISTICS. Deriving from grammar and rhetoric, stylistics was, prior to this century, normative and prescriptive. With modern linguistics and semantics, it has become analytical and has increased its scope to cover all the expressive aspects of language. It ranges over phonology and prosody, morphology, syntax, and lexicology, and the study of figures and tropes. Although it usually proceeds from the linguistic form to the idea or feeling embodied therein (semasiology), it may reverse the procedure and seek what means of expression are available to embody an idea or feeling (onomasiology). It may examine a single passage, an entire work or group of works, a genre, period, or national language (idiomatology). Essentially interpretative, it can reach evaluation by comparing texts or determining the degree of coherence of stylistic traits. It may also serve to fix authorship and chronology.

Internationally, stylistics is polarized between two tendencies which are most clearly formulated in Fr. stylistique and German Stilforschung. Stylistique considers itself closely linked to linguistics and merely an auxiliary of literary history and criticism, to which it supplies observations, definitions, and classifications. Its orientation is positivistic and its ultimate aim is to create a science of style, or repertory of all the stylistic elements of language. Literary language is but one of the numerous systems which together constitute a language; any one of these systems may be studied stylistically. Lack of emphasis on individual literary works gives rise to a large number of monographs on stylistic procedures either within a given period (synchronic) or across periods (diachronic). When stylistique turns to a specific work, it considers all style resources as present potentially in language, defines style as choice from among available means of expression, and determines the author's originality by comparison of his choice with generally accepted usage. Consequently, it utilizes a series of categories into which it sorts the work's constituent elements. Striving for completeness, it lists, for example, vowel and consonant sounds, rhythms and rhymes, parts of speech, kinds of vocabulary, types of sentences, figures, devices, and images. It establishes charts, graphs, and frequency tables. It has made great use of statistical methods and, recently, of electronic tabulations. There is usually no concern with determining relations among the style elements within the work or grouping them around a unifying principle. Its findings consequently take the form of quantitative analysis and linear description. Although stylistique occasionally confuses style with grammar, it remains within the language system and points up the relationship between literary language and ordinary language. Its findings are always verifiable.

Stilforschung identifies itself with literary history or criticism. It diminishes the importance of the concrete linguistic form and emphasizes the "spirit," or psychological attitude, behind the form. It follows Croce in maintaining that all language is style and individual creation and can therefore be seized only in literary works; in Saussurean terms, only in parole (individual), not in langue (general). No external categories may be applied to the work, which must be intuited as a whole. The goal is a grasp on inner form, which determines outer form and the relation of the whole to the parts. An unusual linguistic trait (outer form) reflects a similar deviation in the inner form which the investigator is thus able to penetrate. The entire work may then be recreated synthetically by the to-and-fro movement between inner and outer form. The approach is qualitative and concentrates on one or several key style elements. The concept of inner form offers difficulties, because it rarely turns out to be strictly aesthetic and is usually a psychic irregularity in the author or his metaphysical vision. Emphasis on inner form often results in leaving the original linguistic observation (and Croce) behind and in merging the author's spirit in that of his period and his nation. Since, at the period level, all cultural manifestations are felt to reflect the same time spirit, it becomes legitimate to assimilate literary to art history and to apply Wölfflin's style pairs to literary works. Thus, despite its having been originally a reaction against Geistesgeschichte, Stilforschung tends to fall back into psychological biography or history of ideas. Many of its insights are extremely valuable, but by soaring so far above linguistic phenomena, it is sometimes open to the charge of first determining the "spirit" of a work and then looking for a stylisticum which is supposed, not always convincingly, to embody it.

SUBJECTIVITY AND OBJECTIVITY

To stylistique may be likened the work of members of the first phase or generation of the New Criticism as well as certain of the more systematic aspects of Slavic formalism, e.g., phonostylistics, use of statistics, study of the relation between literary and other types of language. Stilforschung, by its concern with words in context, meaning structure, interrelation of form and content elements, and holism, offers analogies with other aspects of Slavic formalism and the New Criticism in its mature stage. Also, a few practitioners of Stilforschung concentrate on the work as an artistic object, to the exclusion of the poet's psyche or cultural history. However, Slavic formalism and the New Criticism have shown distrust of intuition, placed greater emphasis on the linguistic medium, and insisted on the differentia of literary language—the how and what rather than the why. Slavic formalism combines the objective thoroughness of stylistique with the integralism of Stilforschung. The New Criticism, with its interest in image-clusters, plurisignation, ambiguity, paradox, and irony, as observed in groups of poems spread over several literary periods, has created a modern rhetoric, or "science of tropes." Stylistics has discredited the impressionistic evaluation of style and has become an indispensable part of literary scholarship, creating techniques which may be said to constitute an intrinsic approach to literature.

H. A. Hatzfeld, A Crit. Bibliog. of the New Stylistics Applied to the Romance Literatures (1953); Wellek and Warren, 1956, pp. 282-96, 325-39; H. A. Hatzfeld and Y. Le Hir, Essai de bibliographie critique de stylistique française et romane (1955-1960) (1961).—GENERAL: D. Alonso, Poesía española: Ensayo de métodos y límites estilísticos (1950); T. Spierri, "Éléments d'une critique constructive," Trivium, 8 (1950); C. Bruneau, "La Stylistique," RPH, 5 (1951); L. Spitzer, "Les Théories de la stylistique," FM, 20 (1952) and "Stylistique et critique littéraire," Critique, 98 (1955); A. Schiaffini, "La stilistica letteraria," Momenti di storia della lingua italiana (1953); H. Seidler, Allgemeine Stilistik (1953); P. Guiraud, La Stylistique (1954); W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "Verbal Style," The Verbal Icon (1954); H. Hatzfeld, "Methods of Stylistic Investigation," Lit. and Science (1955), pp. 44-51; E. R. Vincent, "Mechanical Aids for the Study of Language and Literary Style," Lit. and Science, pp. 56-60; J. Miles, Eras and Modes in Eng. Poetry (1957); Wimsatt and Brooks; G. Antoine, "La Stylistique française," Revue de l'enseignement supérieur, 1 (1959); J.-P. Richard, "Quelques aspects nouveaux de la critique littéraire en France," Filologia moderna, 1 (1961; relation of phenomenological critics to Stilforschung). A.A.E.

SUBJECTIVITY AND OBJECTIVITY. This distinction is the result of the 17th-c. Cartesian separation between thought and thing, which along with the rise of science has been baneful to poetry. In the 18th c. it limited the scope of poetry to amusement and morality, and greatly hampered the Eng. poets up to Blake. Blake asserted the power of art, poetry, and the imagination by denying objective reality to God and Nature, or by refusing to admit any distinction whatever between the internal and the external, between the subjective and the objective. The effect of his beliefs is evident in the wholly non-naturalistic imagery of his poetry. Wordsworth and Coleridge posited an ideal correlation between Nature and the human mind, and Coleridge's exposition of "the poetry of nature" (Biographia Literaria, chap. 14) illustrates his conception of the fusion of subject and object, or of imagination and observation, by the image of sunset or moonlight upon "a known and familiar landscape." Keats's "What the imagination seizes as beauty must be truth" is his solution of the problem, though he was not always confident of its correctness.

In such Victorians as Tennyson and Arnold the breach between subjective and objective widened. In general there is a discrepancy between the Victorian sensibility and the Victorian beliefs, as witness the exquisite nature poetry, unbased in doctrine, of Hardy and Housman. Modern poets, bolstered by depth-psychology and myth, have evolved a position akin to Blake's. The hallucinatory vividness of Yeats's "Byzantium," for example, is an assertion of the reality of imagination, a new kind of "willing suspension of disbelief." Yet it is to be remarked that most modern critics have taken subjectivity to mean solipsism and self-indulgence, as in the 20th-c. treatment of Shelley, while objectivity has been equated with honesty and insight. This is a decided shift from Blake's attitude toward free will and the power of the individual.—S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, ed. J. Shawcross (1907), i. xii-xiii; A. Tate, Reason in Madness (1939); J. C. Ransom, The New Criticism (1941); Abrams; Wimsatt; A. Gérard, L'Idée romantique de la poésie en Angleterre (1955). R.H.F.

"SUBLIME," a Latin-derived word meaning literally "(on) high, lofty, elevated," owes its currency as a critical and aesthetic term to the anonymous Gr. treatise Peri Hypsous (hypsos, "height, elevation"), formerly ascribed to the rhetorician Cassius Longinus, 3rd c. A.D., but now generally agreed to belong to the 1st c., perhaps around 50 A.D. Whatever his name and origin, its author was certainly a rhetorician and a teacher of the art, but one of uncommon mold. His essay, with its intimacy of tone (it is addressed to a favorite pupil, a young Roman) and breadth of spirit, stands more or less isolated in its own time, but has had a recurrent fascination for modern minds since the 17th c.

The idea of sublimity had its roots in the rhetorical distinction, well established before "Longinus," of three styles of speech, high, middle, and low. His achievement was to draw it out of the technical sphere, where it had to do with style primarily, and associate it with the general phenomenon of greatness in literature, prose and poetry alike. "Longinus" regards sublimity above all as a thing of the spirit, a spark that leaps from the soul of the writer to the soul of his reader, and only secondarily as a matter of technique and expression. "Sublimity is the echo of greatness of spirit." Being of the soul, it may pervade a whole work (speech, history, or poem: "Longinus" pays little attention to genre distinctions); or it may flash out at particular moments. "Father Zeus, kill us if thou wilt, but kill us in the light." "God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was light." In such quotations as these "Longinus" shows among other things his sharp eye for the particular passage and his capacity for Einfühlung into the actual work: qualities that are rare in ancient criticism and presage the modern spirit.

The distinguishing mark of sublimity, for "Longinus," is a certain quality of feeling. But he will not allow it to be simply identified with emotion, for not all emotions are true or noble. Only art can guard against exaggerated or misplaced feeling. Nevertheless art plays second fiddle to genius in his thinking. There are five sources of the sublime which he enumerates: great thoughts, noble feeling, lofty figures, diction, and arrangement. The first two, the crucial ones, are the gift of nature, not art. "Longinus" even prefers the faults of a great spirit, a Homer, a Plato, or a Demosthenes, to the faultless mediocrity that is achieved by following rules.

The treatise remained unknown, or at least exercised little influence, in later antiquity. It was first published by Robortelli in 1554, then translated into L. in 1572 and into Eng. in 1652 (by John Hall). But it made no great impression until the late 17th c. Paradoxically enough it was Boileau, the archpriest of neoclassicism, who launched the Peri Hypsous on its great career and thus helped to prepare the ultimate downfall of classicism. His translation (1672) had immense reverberation, especially in England. The Eng., always restive under the "French rules," instinctively welcomed "Longinus" as an ally. The Augustans duly admired him as "himself that great Sublime he draws" (Pope), but at the same time he was being invoked by John Dennis in support of the thesis that "Passion is the Principal thing in Poetry" (1701) and by Samuel Cobb as a champion of "the Liberty of Writing" (1707). As the 18th c. advanced, the sublime was absorbed into the bloodstream of Eng. thinking not only about literature but about art in general and even external nature. Under it were subsumed all the loftier feelings—"admiration," "transport," "enthusiasm," vehemence, even awe and terror—which literature, art, and nature are capable of inspiring, but for which neoclassicism had no clearly marked place. More and more frequently the sublime was distinguished from the beautiful—and ranked above it. Thus it played no small part in the drift toward subjectivism, the psychologizing of literature and literary experience, the concept of "original genius" unfettered by rules (Edward Young, the Wartons, Robert Wood, ca. 1760-70), and ultimately in the rise of romanticism in poetry and the concurrent establishment of aesthetics as a new, separate branch of philosophy (Kant, Hegel, etc.).

In this development the sublime left its beginnings in "Longinus" far behind; it became an independent concept with an intellectual history of its own. Burke's Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas on the Sublime and Beautiful (1757) and Kant's Critique of Aesthetic Judgment (1790) make little use of the Peri Hypsous. But its significance is not exhausted by its historical role. Though not greatly in fashion today, it remains a perennially moving plea for greatness of spirit in literature, and it can also provide—coming as it does from a rhetorician—a timely corrective for overabsorption in poetic language and style.

PRIMARY WORKS: "Longinus on the Sublime," ed. and tr., with introd. and appendices, W. Rhys Roberts (2d ed., 1907; best and fullest ed.); Anonimo del Sublime, ed. and tr. A. Rostagni (1947). Tr.: W. H. Fyfe (1927; Loeb ed.); B. Einarson (1945); G.M.A. Grube (1958); D. A. Russell (1965; text and commentary, 1964).

SECONDARY WORKS: T. R. Henn, L. and Eng. Crit. (1934; spotty); S. H. Monk, The S.: A

SUMERIAN POETRY

Study of Crit. Theories in 18th-C. England (1935; definitive); E. Olson, "The Argument of Longinus' 'On the S.,'" MP, 39 (1942; repr. in Crane, Critics; subtle, overmodernizes "L."); F. Wehrli, "Der erhabene und der schlichte Stil in der poetisch-rhetorischen Theorie der Antike," Phyllobolia für P. von der Mühll (1946); W. J. Hipple, The Beautiful, The S., and the Picturesque (1957); J. Brody, Boileau and Longinus (1958); J. Arthos, Dante, Michelangelo and Milton (1963). G.F.E.

The lovely lady, Christabel,
Whom her father loves so well,
What makes her in the wood so late,
A furlong from the castle gate?

SUBSTITUTION. In most Gr. and L. verse forms one metrical foot, under certain conditions, might be substituted for another, e.g., in a Gr. iambic trimeter a spondee could replace the initial iambus of each dipody:

— — — — | — — — — | — — — —

See also METRICAL VARIATIONS.

R.J.G.

SUMERIAN POETRY. The Sumerians lived in Southern Babylonia along the lower Euphrates during the 3d millennium B.C. Their language is agglutinative, but has no close relations with any other known language. Their literature, written on clay tablets in cuneiform characters derived from actual pictures, flourished chiefly from 2500 to 2000 B.C.

The poetry of the Sumerians, like that of the ancient Hebrews, Egyptians, Hittites, and Babylonians, consisted of verses having an accentuating rhythm and a variable number of syllables. The verse was divided into two equal parts and appears in Eng. translation as a distich. Often the two halves of the verse either complete one another or stand in parallelism, as in the poem on Inanna-Ishtar's descent to the Underworld:

ú-da kúr-še Dú-na-mú-de
án du-du-dam gar-gar-má-ni-ib éš-gu-én-na tuku-a-má-ni-ib e-dingir-ri-e-né-ke nigín-na-má-ni-ib
(33-36)

When I shall have come to the nether world,
Fill heaven with complaints for me;
In the assembly shrine cry out for me,
In the house of the gods rush about for me.
(Tr. S. N. Kramer)

The standard verse in Sum., as in the ancient Near East, was divided into equal halves, each having 4 stress accents (8 beats for the verse). The meter is therefore identical with that of the following stanza of Coleridge (corresponding to 2 verses in Sum.):

Some scholars believe that the 4:4 verse should be regarded as two 2:2 verses, as conventionally printed above; but such a metrical structure would eliminate the parallelism. Occasionally Sum. poetry used the elegiac meter, known also in ancient Egyptian and Hebrew (Lamentations 1-4; Amos 5:2) literature, in which a silence takes the place of the last beat (4:3 + silence; some scholars scan it as 3:2 + silence).

The earliest poetry may have been that of workers songs, as in Egypt (cf. the song of the well-diggers in Numbers 21:17-18), but only a few Assyrian ones have survived. Extant Sum. poetry is religious in character, consisting of mythological epics, hymns, and prayers. All ancient Near Eastern poetry was sung, usually to the accompaniment of wind and string instruments. Such Sum. hymns and prayers have come down for the most part in Akkadian translations, or with interlinear Akkadian translation. Almost all other known Sum. poetry is mythological, except for a few lamentations and proverbs; most of the poetic texts were excavated by the University of Pennsylvania at Nippur (modern Nuffar) from 1889 to 1900.

Among the hymns to gods we may mention those to Nannar (Sin, the moon god), to Ningirsu and Gatumdug (the god and goddess of the city Lagash), to Ninkarrak (goddess of Isin). The hymns to Inanna-Ishtar and Anu were sung antiphonally. We have a lamentation for Dumuzi-Tammuz (Adonis, the dying god of vegetation) and one about the destructive anger of Enlil (god of Nippur).

The human, semi-divine or divine protagonists of the epics are: Enmerkar (who conquered Aratta for Erech), Lugalbanda (who succeeded in bringing Enmerkar's message to Inanna at Aratta), Gilgamesh (king of Erech, son of Lugalbanda), Ninurta, and Inanna (who fought against Entiki). The mythological poems deal with the creation of the world and its organization, the slaying of the dragon (the myth common to all Mediterranean peoples), the descent of Inanna-Ishtar to the nether world, the deluge, the marriage of the god Martu (the god of the Amorites), "Inanna-Ishtar prefers the farmer," and others.

The best Eng. tr. (by S. N. Kramer) are found in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. J. B. Pritchard (1950); these tr. are repr. in an inexpensive ed. by I. Mendelsohn, Religions of the Ancient Near East, 1955).—For general and literary histories, see: M. Jastrow, Jr., The Civilization of Babylonia and Assyria (1915); B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien, II (1925) and Die babylonisch-assyrische Literatur (1930); S. N. Kramer, "Sum. Lit., a Preliminary Survey of the Oldest Lit. in the World," Proc. of the Am. Philos. Soc., 83 (1942), Sum. Mythology (1944, rev. ed., 1962; standard work), "Enki and Ninhursag," Bulletin of the Am. Schools of Oriental Research, supp. studies, no. 1 (1945) and From the Tablets of Sumer (1956) as well as The Sumerians (1963).—See also Sumerische und akkadische Hymnen und Gebete, tr. A. Falkenstein and W. von Soden (1953; important introd.).

R.H.P.

SURREALISM. In its beginnings s. was presented by its chief spokesman, André Breton, in his first Manifesto (1924) as an attempt to give expression to the "real functioning of thought" through pure psychic automatism, by means of the spoken or written word, or by any other means available. He proclaimed its main interest to be that of furthering a revolution destined to liberate the mind of man, and its superior aim to be the unification of exterior reality with interior reality. Thus, s. resolutely placed itself apart from literature. However, the talent of those who, with Breton, furthered the cause of s. made of this movement the principal poetic as well as artistic current of the first half of the 20th c.

The study of dreams, of hallucinations, the practice of automatic writing under the dictation of the subconscious are considered by the surrealists as the true means of knowledge. They ascribe a great importance to the analysis of the interpenetration of the sleeping and waking states. Hallucinations, either spontaneous or provoked, are for them revelatory of the workings of the mind when liberated from the control of reason, as well as from conscious aesthetic or moral preoccupations. Automatic writing, equally free from aesthetic or rational control, reveals the life of the subconscious and widens the range of Baudelairian correspondences.

All these methods allow the surrealist to liberate his mind from the censorship of habits, of social conventions, and of education. He is then free to participate in the world of "surreality," which alone reveals the true relationship between man and the universe.

Later Breton was to enlarge this definition in his Second Manifeste du S., which first appeared in the December 1929 issue of La Révolution Surréaliste:

"The idea of s. tends simply to the total recuperation of our psychic forces by a means which is no other than a vertiginous descent within ourselves, the systematic illumination of hidden places and the progressive darkening of all other places, the perpetual rambling in the depth of the forbidden zone. . . . Everything leads one to believe that there exists a certain point in the mind from which life and death, the real and the imaginary, the past and the future, what is communicable and what is incommunicable, the high and the low, cease to be perceived as contradictory. Vainly would one assign to surrealist activity another ambition than the hope of determining this point."

Surrealist poetry is primarily an instrument of knowledge which brings the poet to a clearer awareness of the world perceived by the senses. In turn the poet becomes a revolutionary in that he seeks, by solving the principal problems of life, to change the human condition. There is no attempt, in this poetry, to adhere to established rules of versification, nor even to create new ones. Very often the poem is indistinguishable from prose; a certain rhythm is, however, to be found in the works of the best surrealist poets such as Breton and Eluard. By considering words as images having an autonomous life of their own and by bringing together word-images of widely removed species (e.g. "Sur le pont la rosée à tête de chatte se berçait," A. Breton), the surrealist poet creates new images of a remarkable ignescent quality. This, rather than the use of metaphors, or other figures of rhetoric, is the basis of surrealist imagery.

The main themes of surrealist poetry are love, revolt, the marvelous, freedom, the exaltation of desire, "black humor" and the universe of subconscious thought. The love of woman, of a frankly erotic character, is considered as a form of liberation. Revolt, for the surrealists, is directed principally against logic, social morality, and conventional norms. These they would replace by an unconditional pursuit of the marvelous in everyday life, especially as it manifests itself in urban civilization. "Black humor" is also an expression of revolt in that it is characterized by an explosive and liberating effect. The exaltation of desire is upheld because of a belief in the ultimate worth of all passions.

The chief surrealist writers in France have been: Louis Aragon (1897-), Antonin Artaud (1895-1948), André Breton (1896-), Aimé Césaire (1913-), René Char (1907-), René Crevel (1900-35), Robert Desnos (1900-45), Paul Eluard (1895-1952), Julien Gracq (1909-), Michel Leiris (1901-), Benjamin Péret (1899-), Francis Picabia (1878-), Raymond Queneau (1903-), Philippe Soupault (1897-), Tristan Tzara (1896-).

It is difficult to ascribe a precise date for the beginning of the s. movement. As Breton has pointed out, the movement presented itself from the start as a codification of a state of mind that has manifested itself sporadically throughout the centuries and in every country. The first to use the word s., but in its adjectival form and with a humoristic connotation, was Guillaume Apollinaire (1880-1918). His farce Les Mamelles de Tirésias (1917) was subtitled: drame surréaliste. The word acquired new meaning and a precise definition in Breton's Manifeste du S. (1924) and, in the same year, appeared in the title of the movement's review: La Révolution surréaliste, directed at first by Pierre Naville and Benjamin Péret and later (1925-30) by Breton. The first surrealist text, however, was Les Champs Magnétiques, written jointly, as an exercise in automatic writing, by Breton and Philippe Soupault and published in the 1919 review Littérature, directed by these two poets and by Louis Aragon. The first manifesto summed up the conclusions drawn by the surrealists in what Breton calls the "heroic period" of their movement.

In 1922 Breton and his friends broke away from dadaism (q.v.), and Breton took over the direction of the review Littérature. From then until 1924 the surrealists sought, and found, the fields for their experiments which were to be hypnotically induced sleep and the subconscious probed by automatic writing. In 1921 Breton had been received by Freud, for whom he had conceived an enthusiastic admiration and whose theories were to have an important influence on the development of surrealist methods.

Many other influences can be cited. In Fr. literature, the surrealists recognized their indebtedness to the Marquis de Sade (1740-1814), in whom they saw an example of perfect revolt, to Gérard de Nerval (1808-55), who had affirmed that there was a link to be found between the external and the internal worlds and who had first used the word supernaturalism, to Charles Baudelaire (1821-67), who first described the chaos of modern man, to Stéphane Mallarmé (1842-98), who considered the main function of the poet to be that of magician, to Isidore Ducasse "comte de Lautréamont" (1846-70) for the spiritual torment and the concern for the human condition that they found in his work Les Chants de Maldoror, to Arthur Rimbaud (1854-91), who had proclaimed the unity and innocence of life and had recommended the cultivation of hallucinations and other abnormal states of mind, to Alfred Jarry (1873-1907) for his violent and obscene humor, and to Guillaume Apollinaire.

In foreign literatures, the surrealists drew from Novalis and von Arnim, from Blake and Coleridge, Ann Radcliffe and Horace Walpole, as well as from the philosophy of Hegel and the psychology of Freud. The personality of Jacques Vaché (1896-1919), whom Breton met in 1916 in a hospital at Nantes, and who, through his suicide in 1919, became for the surrealists a symbol of their revolt, played a major role in determining the climate of s. Lastly the surrealists were inspired by the arts of the primitives of all lands and of all times.

From 1924 to the outbreak of the Second World War, s. produced many poetic works such as Aragon's Le mouvement perpétuel (1925), René Crevel's Etes-vous fous? (1929), Robert Desnos' Corps et Biens (1930), Paul Eluard's L'amour la poésie (1929), Benjamin Péret's Le grand jeu (1928), and Breton's Le revolver à cheveux blancs (1932) which, together with numerous prose works, testified to the vitality of the movement.

S., from its beginnings, had refused to draw a dividing line between the arts. Thus, painters, sculptors, and poets worked hand in hand and borrowed freely from each other. Salvador Dali (b. 1904) gave the movement a new impetus in 1933 through his method of paranoiac-criticism, based on critical interpretation of states of delirium. From the application of this method issued the surrealist objects, i.e., objects made gratuitously or following the dictates of the subconscious or of dreams. In 1938 an international exhibit of s. was held in Paris, to which eighteen nations sent representative works of art, showing thereby that the movement had spread to all parts of the globe.

In 1930 La Révolution Surréaliste became Le Surréalisme au Service de la Révolution to indicate the importance attached by the surrealists to social revolution, especially after the Moroccan war of 1925. After the break with the Communist party in 1933 this review ceased to appear. In 1934 the review Minotaure became the vehicle for surrealist publications, and in 1937 Breton became one of its directors.

During the Second World War Breton came to the United States. He founded the review vvv and in 1942 gave an important lecture at Yale University, entitled La situation du s. entre les deux guerres, which was shortly followed by the Prolégomènes à un troisième Manifeste du S. ou non (published in 1946 with the two previous Manifestes). Most of the other members of the surrealist movement stayed in France during the war and participated in the Resistance against the Nazis. Aragon, who had been "excommunicated" by Breton some years before the war, and Eluard, who left the movement in 1942, wrote poetry inspired by fervent patriotism but still preserving much of the surrealist technique.

Since 1945 s. has attracted many young writers and its influence is still important, though it can no longer be considered as an integrated movement. In 1949 twenty-four nations participated in an International Exposition in Paris.

Breton's major recent works: Arcane 17 (1945), Ode à Charles Fourier (1947), Poèmes (1948), Anthologie de l'Humour Noir (1950—first published in 1940), bear witness to his continued optimism as to man's progress towards a better condition. No review has been able to take the place of S.A.S.D.L.R. but Breton, after having directed the short-lived Le S. même, has recently, with Robert Benayoun, founded La Brèche (March 1962). Apart from Breton, other writers have since the Second World War produced interesting surrealist works: Pierre de Mandiargues, Dans les années sordides (1948), Georges Schehadé, Poésie II (1948), Henri Pichette, Les Epiphanies (1948), Aimé Césaire, Les Armes Miraculeuses (1946), etc.

S. has exercised an undeniable influence on poetry during the last thirty-eight years. The poem is no longer considered merely as a vehicle for aesthetic pleasure but as a springboard for metaphysical knowledge, and this transformation is, in great part, due to the surrealists. The experimentations in language have left their mark on poetic language in France and in other countries as well. The surrealist conceptions of love, of liberty, of humor, and of the marvelous have helped to fashion the modern mentality. Aside from poetry, s. has left its mark on the theatre (through Antonin Artaud principally), the novel, the cinema, and on painting and sculpture. This influence has been felt in and outside France, for s. has been a major international movement in the arts of the Twentieth Century. Japan, Egypt, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Poland, Sweden, England, Spain, Italy, Argentina, Mexico, and the United States have all had their surrealist poets and painters and their surrealist reviews. In all these countries the surrealist affirmation that the poet and the artist belong to the same species and are interdependent has been amply demonstrated.

M. Raymond, De Baudelaire au S. (1933); A. Breton, Qu'est-ce que le S.? (1934), Situation du S. entre les deux guerres (1945), Les Manifestes du S. suivis de Prolégomènes à un troisième Manifeste du S. ou non (1946), Entretiens avec André Parinaud (1952); D. Gascoyne, A Short Survey of S. (1935); H. R. Hays, "Surrealist Influence in Contemporary Eng. and American Poetry," Poetry, 54 (1939); R. Mabile, Le miroir du merveilleux (1940); G. Lemaître, From Cubism to S. in Fr. Lit. (1941); N. Calas, Confound the Wise (1942); C. Bo, Antologia del Surrealismo (1944), Bilancio del Surrealismo (1944); J. Monnerot, La poésie moderne et le sacré (1945); M. Nadeau, Histoire du S. (1945), Documents Surréalistes (1946); M. Blanchot, "A propos du S.," L'Arche, 8 (1945), "Surréalistes étrangers," Cahiers du Sud, 280 (1946); A. Balakian, Literary Origins of S. (1947), S.: The Road to the Absolute (1959); J. Gracq, André Breton (1948); F. Alquié, "Humanisme surréaliste et humanisme existentialiste," Cahiers du Collège philosophique (1948), Philosophie du S. (1955); M. Gilman, "From Imagination to 'Immediacy' in Fr. Poetry," RR, 39 (1948); C. Mauriac, André Breton (1949); A.-M. Schmidt, "Constances baroques dans la littérature française," Trivium, 7 (1949); A. Bosquet, Surrealismus (1950); W. Fowlie, Age of S. (1950); M. Carrouges, André Breton et les données fondamentales du S. (1950); L. Lesage, Jean Giraudoux, S., and the German Romantic Ideal (1952); R. Warnier, "Trente ans après . . . le s.," Romanische Forschungen, 67 (1956); H. M. Block, "S. and Modern Poetry: Outline for an Approach," JAC, 18 (1959); J. Hardré, "Present State of Studies on Literary S.," Yearbook of Comparative and General Lit., 9 (1960); "S.," YFS, 31 (1964). J.H.A.

SWEDISH-FINNISH MODERNISTS, THE. A group of significant poets in the Swed.-speaking part of Finland about and following the time of World War I. The chief members of the group were Edith Södergran (1892-1923), Elmer Diktonius (1896-1961), Gunnar Björling (1887-1960), and Rabbe Enckell (b. 1903). Although these poets were influenced by a great many foreign poetic programs, ranging from Russian futurism to Am. modernism, the principal external stimulus was provided by expressionist and futurist painting and music, from Van Gogh to Schönberg. Their aims, set forth in the two periodicals Ultra (1922) and Quos ego (1928-29), were not only to create a new revolutionary aesthetic and a new poetic technique, but also to establish the poet in a more active social role. By means of a freely associative imagery that startled and shocked, a verse following free rhythms, and a language unencumbered by external ornament, they endeavored to express both their own innermost feelings and the submerged humanity of the age. In their romantic emphasis on the instinctual and the spontaneous as well as in their free form, these poets were inspirational both to Fem unga (Five Young Poets), the surrealist Gunnar Ekelöf, and fyrtiotalisterna, q.v. ("The Poets of the Forties") in Sweden.—Voices from Finland, ed. E. Tompuri (1947); 20th-C. Scandinavian Poetry, ed. M. Allwood (1950); B. Holmqvist, Modern finlandssvensk litt. (1951); 40 år finlandssvensk lyrik, ed. S. Carlsson (1955). S.L.

SWEDISH POETRY. Very little is known about the earliest Swed. poetry, none of which has been recorded. Rune (q.v.) inscriptions, however, show that fornyrðislag (q.v.), the Edda stanza, was known, possibly also drótt-

kvætt (q.v.), the classical scaldic verse form. There is evidence that an extensive oral poetry existed, comprising pagan religious hymns and heroic and mythological poems. Traces of Sweden's heroic poetry may have been preserved in Beowulf and in the scaldic poem Ynglingatal.

The chief monuments of medieval Swed. poetry are the folk ballads, at their height in the 13th and 14th c. Strongly dramatic, the Swed. ballad in both spirit and structure approximates the Scotch ballad. Of individual poems, the versified chronicles, from Erikskrönikan (Eric's Chronicle, 1320-21) to Stora rimkrönikan (The Great Rhymed Chronicle, ca. 1500), were significant productions in kniutlvers (q.v.). Of the known poets the best was Tomas af Strängnäs (d. 1443), whose patriotic lyrics, like Frihetsvisan (The Song of Freedom), adumbrated a national tradition that was to be sustained throughout the centuries. The 16th c. (1511-1611) produced mostly theological-didactic poetry, typified by the first Swed. attempt at drama, the Bible play Tobiae comedia (ca. 1550) ascribed to Olavus Petri (1493-1552).

In the 17th c. (1611-1718) Swed. poets endeavored to create a literature in the vernacular to match the achievements of classical antiquity. The greatest of these poets was Georg Stiernhielm (1598-1672), whose principal work was the allegorical-didactic epic Hercules (1648; pub. 1658), epoch-making in respect to both form and content: it demonstrated the aptness of the Swed. language for hexameter verse and exploited a classical-mythological subject without incurring triteness and artificiality. These faults Stiernhielm avoided by nationalizing the Greco-Roman gods and by introducing vividly described personified abstractions. The resultant merging of Gothicism—or generally nationalism—and classicism established a pattern in Swed. poetry which was to remain a shaping poetic force up to the end of the 19th c., and to leave its imprint upon the style of such poets as Tegnér, Rydberg, and Heidenstam. On the whole, Stiernhielm's art was broadly realistic, a trait derived possibly from his intimate acquaintance with Dutch poets, especially Jacob Cats. Stiernhielm also introduced the sonnet, according to Fr. models composed in alexandrines, a practice abandoned only in the romantic period. Samuel Columbus (1642-79), who with Urban Hiärne (1641-1724) and a few others made up the first Swed. literary coterie, was the most important of Stiernhielm's followers. His lyric verse, best represented by Odae Sveticae (1674), is more melodious than that of Stiernhielm. Intimately personal as well as national was the inspiration of Lars Wivallius (1605-69), first in a fairly continuous line of unschooled singers who have contributed a rich store of spontaneous popular lyricism to Swed. poetry. He was followed by Lars Johansson, or Lucidor (1638-74), whose forte was the convivial song, where he provides a link between Wivallius and Bellman, the 18th-c. virtuoso of the genre.

In the late 17th c. baroque poetry found a practitioner in Gunno Eurelius Dahlstierna (1661-1709), whose Kungaskald (King-Scald, 1697) was intended as an allegorical epic in the It. style. This is proved by the use of ottava rima (q.v.), a meter Dahlstierna was the first to practice in Swed., characteristically in alexandrines. The poem, however, lacks all narrative unity, and the marinistic style is too uneven to sustain the mood. Somewhat later, Samuel Triewald (1688-1743) advocated Fr. neoclassicism, while the Finn Jacob Frese (1691-1729) became Sweden's first significant subjective-emotional poet. Frese's Christian epic Passionsstankar (Thoughts on the Passion, 1728) was fraught with a profound religiousness; after being imaginatively transformed by the romantics, the introspective emotionalism here introduced crystallized into an enduring tradition in Swed. poetry. Johan Runius (1679-1713) was a virtuoso rhymier celebrating bourgeois jocundity. Together, Triewald, Frese, and Runius sum up the tendencies that would prevail in the 18th c.: Fr. neoclassicism, sentimental romanticism, and Swed.-Carolinian poetic realism.

The outstanding event in 18th-c. Swed. poetry was the consolidation of neoclassical principles, both in epic, with its obligatory alexandrine, and in drama. The first great advocate of these principles, Olof von Dalin (1708-63), gave his age both a tragedy and an epic in the prescribed style; modern readers, however, are attracted chiefly by his excellent ballads and epigrammatic satires. In the 1750's Mrs. Hedvig Charlotta Nordenflycht (1718-63) established a literary salon, the purpose of which was to maintain, and further refine, the poetic standards of Dalin; its principal habitués were Finnish-born Gustaf Filip Creutz (1731-85) and Gustaf Fredrik Gyllenberg (1731-1808). With Atis och Camilla (1761) Creutz produced Sweden's loveliest pastoral poem. Gyllenberg, a lesser poet, was more didactic; his best work, Människans elände (The Wretchedness of Man, 1761), shows traces of Rousseau. Carl Michael Bellman (1740-1809), who continued the poetic realism of Runius, wrote poetry which was at the same time peculiarly individual and broadly national. His work exhibits a wide gamut of moods, ranging from genuine, intoxicated, and burlesque rapture to profound melancholy and sorrow; it is, however his joie de vivre that has made him a universally beloved poet. Although primarily a lyrist, Bellman was also a superb narrator and portrayer of types: his gallery of comic figures is unforgettable.

The Gustavian Age (1772–1802) was par excellence the age of Enlightenment and of Fr. taste in art and literature, enforced by such literary societies as Utile Dulci and Svenska akademien (The Swedish Academy, est. 1786). Rationalism and neoclassicism found their contrary, however, in a preromantic movement inspired by Rousseau, Eng. preromantics, Klopstock, and Sturm und Drang (q.v.). The best poet of the period was the satirist Johan Henrik Kellgren (1751–95), who, initially an advocate of neoclassicism, in his best poem, the magnificent Den nya skapelsen (The New Creation, 1789), expressed a profound idealism that foreshadowed the romantic age. But of 18th-c. poets, excepting Bellman, it is Anna Maria Lenngren (1755–1817) who has best preserved her reputation in modern times, because of her everyday subjects, simple style, and common sense. Of preromantic Gustavians one may mention Bengt Lidner (1757–93), who in Grevinnan Spastaras död (The Death of Countess Spastara, 1783) displayed a virtuoso mastery of stanzaic forms and metrical effects, and the Finn Frans Michael Franzén (1772–1847), who in Människans anlete (The Countenance of Man, 1793) employed a richly imaginative and musical style as the vehicle of an aesthetic and religious idealism.

With the 19th c., which initiated a great period in Swed. poetry, German romanticism and philosophical idealism became the chief foreign sources of poetic inspiration. Through Germany Swed. poets became acquainted with Shakespeare and with Romance Renaissance authors. Formally, therefore, the new poetry was exceedingly varied, classical and medieval measures alternating with those of Southern romance and of contemporary German verse. The first romantic group was active mainly through a literary association founded at Uppsala in 1807, Auroraförbundet (The Aurora League), whose chief organ, the periodical Phosphoros (1810–13), conferred on its members the nickname "Phosphorists." Per Daniel Amadeus Atterbom (1790–1855), who was inspired by German Jena romanticism, emerged with Blommorna (The Flowers, 1812–37) as the finest Phosphorist poet. His most ambitious work, Lycksalighetens ö (The Isle of Bliss, 1824–27), is an allegorical fairy-tale play which embodies the conflict between romantic aestheticism and an ethical-religious ideal. Closely related to Phosphorist poetry is the work of Erik Johan Stagnelius (1793–1823), one of the most gifted of Sweden's poets. Combining imaginative fervor with classical form, he is the Shelley and Keats of Swed. literature. His lyric cycle Liljor i Saron (Lilies of Sharon, 1821–23) contains moods ranging from world-weary mysticism to passionate eroticism. His last and greatest work, Bacchanterna (The Bacchae, 1822), which deals with the fate of Orpheus in the classical Gr. style, dramatizes the contrast between inspired rapture and sensual intoxication. Stagnelius first brought to full development the subjective-emotional mode in Swed. poetry. He has been vastly influential, largely because of his ability to convey intense emotion and to concretize involved abstractions.

The second group of Swed. romantics are identified by their connection with Götiska förbundet (The Gothic League), which called for a national revival in literature. Its head, Erik Gustaf Geijer (1783–1847), is significant as a poet mainly because of his artlessly simple style and his regionalism. It was Esaias Tegnér (1782–1846), one of the foremost of Swed. poets, who came closest to realizing the program of the Gothicists. Drawing upon German Heidelberg romanticism and the classicism of Goethe and Schiller, Tegnér achieved a new poetic synthesis on a national basis. His most important productions are Nattvardsbarnen (The Children of the Lord's Supper, 1820), a religious-didactic narrative in hexameter verse influenced by Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea, and Frithiofs saga (1825), which marks the high point of his achievement. The noble figure of Frithiof may lack historical verisimilitude, but his character, in its union of virility, courage, and courtliness, became the ideal of the age. The poem is a free rendering of an Old Icelandic saga in a cycle of 24 romances in various meters, a form modeled on the Danish poet Oehlenschläger's Helge. It owes much of its staying-power to the skill with which Tegnér conjured with stanzaic forms and metrical patterns to evoke the mood of the various episodes. Worthy of special mention is the poet's masterful handling of Homeric hexameter; here Tegnér was a worthy heir to Stiernhielm, whom he also recalls in his lofty dignity and exalted national fervor. The 1830's and 1840's produced only one original romantic, Byron-inspired Carl Johan Love Almquist (1793–1866), a bizarre and exotic writer whose poems are notable for their free-verse qualities and their emotional wizardry. His chief work, Törnrosens bok (The Book of the Briar Rose, 1832–51), contained lyric, narrative, and dramatic pieces—and prose. Of most enduring value are his Songes, whose deliberately artless form, musical suggestiveness, and intensely gripping tone ally Almquist to Stagnelius, with whom he also belongs as a forerunner of poetic modernism in Sweden.

The Finn Johan Ludvig Runeberg (1804–77), one of the greatest poets who ever wrote in Swed., attained in his work a perfect fusion of realism and romantic idealism. Though influenced by his countryman Franzén and classical Gr. poetry, Runeberg is in his tone and technique uniquely individual. Of his narratives may be mentioned Elgskytterne (The Elk-hunters, 1832), written in Homeric hexameter, and Kung Fjalar (1844), his best work. In the latter, a somber historical epic, influences from primitive Nordic myth, Ossian, and classical antiquity interpenetrate. But the verse forms, modeled on Nordic meters, were worked out individually by the poet himself. Runeberg, however, is best known for his immortal cycle Fänrik Ståls sägner (The Tales of Ensign Stål, 1848-60), into which both narrative and lyric elements entered. Of his purely lyric poetry, the cycle Idyll och epigram (1830-33), with its laconic verses in trochaic rhythm, displays a striking originality.

After a couple of relatively barren decades, in the 1870's Carl Snoilsky and Viktor Rydberg ushered in a period of high achievement. Snoilsky (1841-1903) was a member of Namn-lösa Sällskapet (The Nameless Society, est. 1860), a literary association with a realistic poetic program inspired by Runeberg and by contemporary Norwegian poetry. In his Dikter (Poems, 1869) Snoilsky showed a versatile talent; the keynote was a joyous love of life and freedom. His later lyricism was richer, combining, as in Afrodite och Sliparen (Aphrodite and the Knife-Grinder), an alert social awareness with the expression of personal moods. Rydberg (1828-95) harmonized in his work romantic idealism, classical form, and national inspiration; thus he appears a successor to Stiernhielm and Tegnér. But the liberal ideology of Dikter (1882, 1891)—whose loftiness and formal perfection are reminiscent of Matthew Arnold at his best—informed his lyricism of profound reflection with a distinctly modern note. Definitely social in tendency were the later poems, like Den nya Grottesången (The New Song of Grotti, 1891), with its fiery imprecations against industrial slavery.

The best poet of the 1880's was August Strindberg (1849-1912), who, primarily a prose dramatist, possessed a lyrical gift of high distinction. By its deep concern with actuality and by its free, deliberately careless rhythm, his poetry signified the final break with the ideas and the style of late romanticism. Moreover, his fresh and daring imagery became inspirational for the 1890's. Strindberg's Dikter på vers och prosa (Poems in Verse and Prose, 1883) and Ordalek och småkonst (Word-Play and Minor Art, 1902-5) contain a world of impressions, moods, and visions. Scenes from the big city coexist with family idylls, and both are effectively contrasted with chords of passion in poems like Chrysaetos and Holländarn (The Dutchman). With its loose rhythm and its mathematical-scientific imagery, his powerful hymn to the female body in the latter poem anticipated the poetry of recent decades. Like Stagnelius and Almqvist, Strindberg in his lyricism as well as in his later expressionistic plays prepared the way for the poetic modernism of the postwar period. Of other poets of the 1880's, Ola Hansson (1860-1925) renounced realism in an attempt, inspired by Poe, Nietzsche, and Mallarmé, to penetrate beneath appearances. In this endeavor he was aided effectively by a superb sense of rhythm.

In the 1890's Swed. poetry experienced a veritable renaissance. Ideologically no great novelties emerged, as the Weltanschauung remained naturalistic; and technically the new poetry inherited the minute observation and psychological analysis of the naturalists. Yet, the renaissance was decidedly neoromantic in character: sensuous beauty, the imagination, and the self were apotheosized. In the matter of the self the concern was not purely individualistic, but national as well; the decade evinced, in its choice of subjects from Swed. history as also in the deeper local patriotism expressed in the regional poetry, a desire to rediscover its roots and redefine the nation's identity. Even technically, the poets reverted to romanticism, as they desired to create a grand style and practiced a variety of forms.

Four lyrists, Heidenstam, Levertin, Fröding and Karlfeldt, were the vehicles of this poetic renewal. Verner von Heidenstam (1859-1940), originally a painter, already with his first collection, Vallfart och vandringsår (Pilgrimage and Wander-Years, 1888), created an epoch in Swed. poetry. It was written in an impressionistic, richly visual style replete with baroque images and daring coinings. This romanticism schooled in realism, later called "imaginative naturalism" by Heidenstam himself, would have been impossible without the example of Strindberg, although Heidenstam, to be sure, was no disciple. In Dikter (1895)—supported theoretically by Renässans (Renaissance, 1889) and Pepitas bröllop (Pepita's Wedding, 1890), which settled with "shoemaker realism" both in art and philosophy—the central themes of his lyricism appeared. These themes, the glories of the imagination, of his native region, and of his country, were also the basis of Ett folk (One People, 1920), a narrative cycle in which Heidenstam did homage to the knightly and heroic virtues that he considered distinctively Swed. Oscar Levertin (1862-1906), Heidenstam's friend, both as critic and poet contributed to the new movement, of whose exponents he was the most romantic. The main themes of his work, love and death, were treated in a richly textured style influenced by the Eng. Pre-Raphaelites.

Gustaf Fröding (1860-1911) is one of the greatest lyric poets of Sweden. Already Guitarr och dragharmonika (Guitar and Concertina, 1891), which had been theoretically prepared for by his essay Om humor (On Humor, 1890), displayed a fully matured talent. It was precisely its brilliant, contagiously gay humor that differentiated this collection from the rest of contemporary poetry. Nya dikter (New Poems, 1894) contained also poems that were serious, even somber, in tone, like Bibliska fantasier (Biblical Fantasies), in which a dark Weltschmerz found expression. But it was only in Stänk och flikar (Splashes and Rags, 1896) that Fröding laid bare the deepest layers of his psyche, whether in the form of Nietzschean superman fantasies, in erotic poems celebrating pagan beauty, or in harrowing personal confessions like Narkissos. Here also, in Sagan om Gral (The Grail Saga), one observes his first attempt to attain a mystical catharsis of life's paradoxes by way of metaphysical humor. The last great figure in the peculiar Swed. tradition of spontaneous realistic lyricism beginning with Vivallius, Fröding is the most beloved of all native poets in his own country, excelling both Tegnér and Heidenstam despite their openly professed national programs. He is also more immediately attractive to non-Swedes. This universal appeal is due partly to his wide range of theme and emotion, but chiefly, one suspects, to his naked intensity and the innate skill with which he exploits the lyrical potentialities of the Swed. language. This language, with its undulating rhythm, rich modulation, and great variety of expressive vowel sounds, is admirably suited for lyric poetry, and it is not surprising that the strength of Swed. poetry lies precisely in this genre. Swed. is an especially eloquent medium for the expression of surging passion and grotesque humor, and both Bellman and Fröding display a prodigious virtuosity in these modes. The latter could conjure with rhythm, rhyme, and alliteration to produce the finest nuance of melody, tone, and mood. To suggest both the qualities of Swed. and the rich music of Fröding's verse, here are a few lines from his poem En vårmorgon (A Spring Morning), in trochaic meter:

Vårens vindar äro ljuva,
glädjens vemod mildt de tala till en själ, som sört sig sjuk, livets vårfröjd kuttrar duva, kvittrar gråsparv, visslar svala, gungar björkens krona mjuk.

The winds of spring caress with love
A soul in pain from ceaseless sorrow.
Softly they speak of joys decaying.
Life's spring rapture stirs in the dove,
The chirping sparrow, the whistling swallow,
In the crown of the birch, gently swaying.

The last great poet of the 1890's, Erik Axel Karlfeldt (1864-1931), was the voice of his native region, Dalecarlia, whose landscape, people, and customs he presented in Fridolins visor (The Songs of Fridolin, 1898) and Fridolins lustgård (Fridolin's Pleasure Garden, 1901).

The writers who appeared after the turn of the century inherited both the realism of the 1880's and the neoromanticism of the 1890's; yet they worked out their own forms of expression. Bo Bergman (b. 1869), who with Marionetterna (The Puppets, 1903) initiated the pessimistic poetry of the big city, created a new style marked by clarity, everyday idiom, and simple rhythms. Vilhelm Ekelund (1880-1949), whose first poems evoked fin de siècle moods, developed a lyricism of deep reflection and showed a preference for unrhymed verse and free rhythms in the manner of Pindar, Hölderlin, and Strindberg. Anders Österling (b. 1884) kept within the limits of traditional verse and adopted in Idyllernas bok (The Book of Idylls, 1917) a moderate poetic realism inspired by the Eng. Georgian poets.

World War I affected Swed. poetry profoundly, imbuing it with pessimism and religious questing. Metaphysical unrest is evident in the work of Dan Andersson (1888-1920), who formally, however, followed the tradition of the 1890's. More significant was the early poetry of Pär Lagerkvist (b. 1891), whose manifesto Ordkonst och bildkonst (Verbal and Pictorial Art, 1913) announced a radical modernism, related to Ekelund's experiments and to expressionism in painting. In Ångest (Anguish, 1916) he expressed moods of anxiety in an unadorned, unrhymical verse of striking novelty. Slightly anticipating the Swed.-Finnish modernists (q.v.), Lagerkvist laid the groundwork for the subsequent modernist movement in Swed. poetry. Close to him intellectually was Erik Blomberg (b. 1894), whose Faustian lyric confession Den fångne guden (The Captive God, 1927) inspired younger writers. Blomberg's evolutionary humanism became an important rallying-point for poets in an age of religious skepticism. In the 1920's the melancholy idyll, related to Österling's poetry, was the predominant genre. The bourgeois idyll was dissolved, however, in the work of Erik Lindorm (1889-1941), a realistic proletarian poet of everyday city life, similar in technique to Bo Bergman. With Birger Sjöberg (1885-1929), a troubadour of disillusion not unlike Bellman, a new spirit and style came to fruition. Sjöberg's Kriser och kransar (Crises and Laurel Wreaths, 1926) expressed postwar anxiety in an idiom characterized by violent dissonances, achieved through fearless use of slang and jargon in serious and solemn contexts.

The definite breakthrough of modernism—

the development of which constitutes a central movement in 20th-c. Swed. poetry—came with the appearance in 1929 of the anthology Fem unga (Five Young Poets), two of whose contributors, Harry Martinson (b. 1904) and Artur Lundkvist (b. 1906), should be noted. These writers, whose program found a nonliterary complement in a primitivism inspired by D. H. Lawrence, reinforced Lagerkvist's emphasis on immediacy of poetic expression by demanding the use of objective visual imagery—a doctrine derived, however belatedly, from the American imagists. Spiritually akin to primitivist modernism was the work of Karin Boye (1900–41), probably Sweden's most gifted poetess. With the critical 1930's a distinction became apparent between "pure" and "engaged" poets. Of the former, Gunnar Ekelöf (b. 1907), a Swed. surrealist, further elaborated the modernistic technique by employing musical principles of poetic structure, nonlogical syntax, and verbal telescoping à la James Joyce. The leading "engaged" poets were Hjalmar Gullberg (1898–1961), Johannes Edelfelt (b. 1904), and Bertil Malmberg (1889–1958), none of whom was a programmatic modernist. But both Gullberg and Edelfelt practiced Sjöberg's disturbing reversals in rhythm and idiom; and when drawing upon classical tradition, they used it in a characteristically modern manner: to reinforce their somber probings of the contemporary psyche through ironical contrast. During the 1940's the modernist movement, headed by Erik Lindegren (b. 1910) and Karl Vennberg (b. 1910), advanced on a broad front. Encompassing the programs and techniques of both the "pure" and the "engaged" poets of the 1930's, it was in scope comparable to the Phosphorist movement, from which it differed, however, by combining universalism with a relentless social and cultural awareness. Epochal was Lindegren's Mannen utan väg (The Man Without a Way, 1942), a cycle of irregular sonnets in which the disorder of the war years was given a deliberately chaotic expression. Of fyrtyrtalisterna, q.v. ("The Poets of the Forties"), most of whom followed Vennberg, one may mention Werner Aspenström (b. 1918), Bernt Erikson (b. 1918), and Stig Carlson (b. 1920). Strongly influenced by T. S. Eliot, Vennberg's poetry is critical-analytical in method as well as in aim; but beneath his intellectual scepticism one discerns a quest for a viable Weltanschauung. In the 1950's a new aesthetic-religious romanticism appeared, in counterbalance to the largely culturally oriented poetry of the 1940's. Significant of the new intellectual climate was Bo Setterlind (b. 1923), whose objective nature poetry with symbolic overtones is pervaded with mysticism and cosmic wonder. Foremost among the numerous new poets are Folke Isaksson (b. 1927) and Tomas Tranströmer (b. 1931). Besides these may be mentioned Sandro Key-Åberg (b. 1922), Lars Forssell (b. 1928), Ingemar Gustafson (b. 1928), Paul Andersson (b. 1930), and Göran Printz-Påhlson (b. 1932). Though the 1950's were far less originative than the preceding decade, the sheer number of practicing young poets in Sweden raise high expectations of future achievement.

WORKS AND ANTHOLOGIES: Poems by Tegnér, tr. H. W. Longfellow and W. L. Blackley (1872); E. Tegnér, Fritiofs saga, ed. G. T. Flom (1909; annotated ed.); G. Fröding, Selected Poems, tr. C. W. Stork (1916); Svensk diktning, ed. J. Mauritzson (2 v., 1917; an annotated anthol.); The Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse, ed. E. W. Gosse and W. A. Craigie (1925); A Selection from Modern Swed. Poetry, ed. C. D. Locock (1930); Anthol. of Swed. Lyrics from 1750–1925, ed. C. W. Stork (1930; poems in tr.); Levande svensk dikt från fem sekel (2 v., 1945; a compreh. anthol.); Swed. Songs and Ballads, ed. M. S. Allwood (1950); 20th C. Scandinavian Poetry, ed. M. S. Allwood (1950); Lyrikboken, ed. Tage Nilsson (1951; an illustrated anthol.); 40-talslyrik, ed. B. Holmqvist (1951); 50-talslyrik, ed. B. Holmqvist and F. Isaksson (1955).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. W. Gosse, North-ern Studies (1890); A. B. Benson, The Old Norse Element in Swed. Romanticism (1914); H. Schück, Hist. de la litt. suédoise (1923); H. Boor, Schwedische Lit. (1924); O. Sylwan et al., Svenska litteraturens historia (2d rev. ed., 3 v., 1929); H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Lit. from Brandes to Our Own Day, tr. I. Anderson (1929); O. Sylwan, Den svenska versen från 1600-talets början (3 v., 1925–34) and Svensk verskonst från Wivallius till Karl-feldt (1934; studies in the formal aspects of Swed. verse); L. Maury, Panorama de la litt. suédoise contemporaine (1940); E. N. Tigerstedt, Svensk litteraturh. (1948; stimulating crit. survey); E. Bredsdorff et al., An Introduct. to Scandinavian Lit. (1951; useful short survey); C. A. D. Fehrman, Kyrkogårdsromantik: Studier i engelsk och svensk 1700-talsdiktning (1954; a comparative study, summarized in Eng.); I. Holm and M. von Platen, La Litt. suédoise (1957); E. N. Tigerstedt et al., Ny illustrerad svensk litteraturh. (5 v., 1955–58; standard lit. hist., with annotated bibliog.); G. Brandell, Svensk litt. 1900–1950 (1958); A. Gustafson, A Hist. of Swed. Lit. (1961; best-crit. hist. in Eng., with bibliog.); R. B. Wowles, "Post-War Swed. Poetry . . .," Western Humanities Rev., 15 (1961); G. C. Schoolfield, "The Recent Scandinavian Lyric," BA, 36 (1962).

S.L.

SWISS POETRY. It is extremely difficult to conceive a Swiss national literature because of the four languages—German, French, Italian, Romansh—spoken in Switzerland. The poetry of German Switzerland is a part of G. literature just as the poetry of Fr. and It. Switzerland is a part of Fr. and It. literature. Only the Romansh-speaking areas are linguistically independent and only there does the spoken language completely coincide with the language of literature (see ROMANSH POETRY), whereas in all other parts, especially in G. and It. Switzerland, the colloquial language (dialect) differs considerably from the written language. The common basis of the polylingual Swiss nation—the common political (democratic) ideals and institutions, the common history, tradition and culture—does not automatically weld four linguistic media into a national literature. There may be found, however, a unity in this diversity.

GERMAN-SWISS POETRY. In G. Switzerland a paucity of lyric poetry may be almost a characteristic feature. A vivid sense of reality, inimical to speculation and abstraction, is furthermore not conducive to purely dramatic creation, particularly in tragedy. The accent falls above all upon plastic presentation, upon the projection of images, upon display, upon spectacle. Pictorial actualization and descriptive imagery are essential stylistic characteristics of Alemannic-Swiss poetry. Significantly enough, the only important G.-Swiss handbook of poetics, the Critische Dichtkunst (1740) by J. J. Breitinger, 1701–76 (inspired by J. J. Bodmer, 1698–1783), places in the foreground the theory of “poetic painting.” The imagination of the reader is compared to an empty canvas upon which the poet paints his ideas in clear, graphic depiction. The works of nature are the prototypes of all art and must be duplicated as faithfully as possible. This proximity to nature is likewise a dominating characteristic of Swiss poets and, to an extent, may be attributed to the peasant origin of their culture. The beauty and omnipotence of nature (above all of the mountain landscape), the struggle for and against nature, have left distinct traces in Swiss poetry. (Jeremias Gotthelf, 1797–1854, exclusively a prose-writer, is the greatest representative of this peasant attachment to nature.) It is astonishing how many poet-painters are to be found in G.-Swiss literature, for example, N. Manuel, S. Gessner, G. Keller. Sheer delight in observation and a naive joy in contemplation dominate. One may regard the verses from Keller's Abendlied as a “Leitmotif” of Swiss poetry:

Augen, meine lieben Fensterlein, . . .
Lasset freundlich Bild um Bild herein.

However, Bodmer and Breitinger also permit the poet to imitate invisible nature. The poet becomes a creator when he brings an invisible reality to a tangible realization and endows it with body, hence with poetic reality. Thus there is room in this rationalistic 18th-c. theory for irrational, fantastic elements. The epic genre is most commensurable to such a background: the great poets of Switzerland have all been significant prose story-tellers. It is indicative that Bodmer's and Breitinger's poetic conceptions have been popularized and continued by J. G. Sulzer in his encyclopedic Allgemeine Theorie der schönen Künste (1771–74).

Swiss poetry is far more intimately connected with the development of the state than is G. poetry. Common political ideals are the basic strength of the Swiss nation. The growth of the confederacy was accompanied by a plethora of political songs, often of meager artistic quality, such as the songs of the legendary hero William Tell; battle songs and war ballads (e.g. the Sempacherlied); rhymed chronicles, etc. From the foundation of the confederacy, literature concerned itself, both critically and eulogistically, with the Swiss state and with Swiss customs. Note especially Wittenweiler's Ring; the epigrams of J. Grob; J. C. Lavater's (1741–1801) Schweizerlieder; and many poems of G. Keller. With J. G. von Salis (1762–1834), one of the few lyric poets, an uninterrupted series of “Heimwehdichte” (poems of homesickness) begins. From the outbreak of World War I, however, attention concentrates more and more upon the world outside Switzerland, particularly upon Europe and humanity, as, for example, in the poems of K. Stamm or R. Faesi (b. 1883):

Völker, wir wollen euch Leidgenossen, Dir, Heimat, Eidgenossen sein.

As the result of a rationalistic attitude, which concentrated upon the present and upon fitness for life, a didactic tendency may be perceived throughout the whole history of Swiss poetry, from Haller's philosophical poems to the anthroposophic mission of A. Steffen 1884–1963). Bodmer and Breitinger emphasize specifically the didactic fable as the most desirable genre of poetry. (Note the original animal fables by J. L. Meyer von Knonau, 1705–85.) The artist solely as artist is basically suspect. In the presence of such an attitude, one should not expect experiments in form. Two poets, who proved to have a true talent for form, H. Leuthold (1827–79) and Dranmor (L. F. Schmid, 1823–88), significantly enough, practiced their virtuosity not upon Swiss soil but in foreign countries.

As early as 1300, the minnesingers B. Steinmar von Klingnau and J. Hadlaub showed Swiss traits. They did their best work in the vivid description of external events rather than in introspective probing into their own souls.

H. Wittenweiler's Ring (ca. 1420), simultaneously a mirror and satire of customs and a textbook of knowledge, reveals an unusual understanding of the people. His brilliant imagination, often unbridled, is combined with humor without which it is hard to imagine any Swiss poet. In the belligerent poems of the Reformation a similar combination of realism and humanism appears (P. Gengenbach, 1480-1525; N. Manuel, 1484-1530). The Swiss contribution to the poetry of the baroque is negligible. Only the lively epigrams of J. Grob (1643-97) deserve attention. A. von Haller (1708-97) provides the most significant realization of the poetic theories of Bodmer and Breitinger: in his poem Die Alpen he was the first to describe in picturesque language and with scientific accuracy the beauty and divine scheme inherent in the mountains. In rhythmic prose S. Gessner (1730-88) adds the more gentle nature of his idylls to this rugged world.

The most prominent Swiss prose writer, G. Keller (1819-90), is also the most representative lyric poet. In his poems are combined all the features which find typical Swiss representation: a most lively imagination; a joy in external realities; a love for nature, home and humor; a sense of democracy, which is cosmopolitan in its perspective but keeps an awareness of local tradition. The aristocratic C. F. Meyer (1825-98) found in art a substitute for a vigorous contact with life. Far from crass reality, he reached out into the past and into the realm of art to create poems of great perfection. Many of them anticipated in their unified imagery the later accomplishments of symbolism. C. Spitteler's (1845-1924) relationship to his time and to democracy was one of defiance. His cosmic verse-epics (e.g. the mammoth Olympischer Frühling, 18,000 verses) give evidence of an undeniable spaciousness of thought. A fascinating grace of expression—rare in G.-Swiss literature—distinguishes the anachronistic verse-idylls of Spitteler's friend J. V. Widmann (1842-1911).

In a predominantly urbane generation, the "awakening of the heart" at the time of World War I led to a renewed prominence of lyric poetry which has lasted until today. The upheavals of the time are reflected in the rhythmically erratic, symbolic language of K. Stamm (1890-1919) and A. Zollinger (1895-1941). Many poems of the following contemporary poets demonstrate that G.-Swiss poetry is on the point of acquiring musical dimensions which it has lacked hitherto: S. Lang (b. 1887); M. Rychner (b. 1897); W. Zemp (1906-59); A. Ehrismann (b. 1908); U. M. Strub (b. 1910); Silja Walter (b. 1919); A. X. Gwerder (1923-52); H. Boesch (b. 1926).

ANTHOLOGIES: Die Schweizer Minnesinger, ed.

K. Bartsch (1886); Silhouetten, ed. P. Kägi (I, II, 1917); Historische Volkslieder der deutschen Schweiz, ed. F. Waldmann, O. v. Greyer (1922); Schweizer Balladen, ed. A. Fischli (1924); Die Ernte schweizerischer Lyrik, ed. R. Faesi (1928; G., Fr., It., Romansh, L., folk songs); Schweizer Dichtung im Querschnitt, ed. S. Lang (1938; G., Fr., It., Romansh); Schweizer Lyrik, ed. G. Zürcher (1944); Minnesangs Frühling in der Schweiz, ed. and tr. M. Geilinger (1945); Zürcher Lyrik (1955; contemporary poetry); Lyriker der deutschen Schweiz, 1850-1950, ed. H. Helmerking (1957).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: J. Bächtold, Gesch. der deutschen Lit. in der Schweiz (1892); H. E. Jenny, Die Alpen-Dichtung der deutschen Schweiz (1905); O. Walzel, Die Wirklichkeitsfreude der neueren schweizerischen Dichtung (1908); H. E. Tièche, Die politische Lyrik in der deutschen Schweiz, 1830/50 (1917); O. v. Greyer, Das Volkslied der deutschen Schweiz (1927); S. Singer, Die mittelalterliche Lit. der deutschen Schweiz (1930); J. Nadler, Literaturgeschichte der deutschen Schweiz (1932); E. Ermatinger, Dichtung und Geistesleben der deutschen Schweiz (1933; best general survey); A. Bruggisser, Heimat- und Weltgefühl in der schweizerischen Lyrik (1945); M. Blöchliger, La poésie lyrique contemporaine en Suisse Allemande (1947); A. Bettex, Die Lit. der deutschen Schweiz von heute (1950); A. Zäch, Die Dichtung der deutschen Schweiz (1951; best introd.); E. S. Trümpler, "Zur Lit. der deutschen Schweiz von heute," Monatshefte, 47 (1955); F. Ernst, Gibt es eine schweizerische Nationallit.? (1955); K. Schmid, "Versuch über die schweizerische Nationalität," Aufsätze und Reden (1957); M. Wehrli, "Gegenwartsdichtung der deutschen Schweiz," Deutsche Lit. in unserer Zeit (2d ed., 1959).—The following include other Swiss literatures as well: E. Jenny and V. Rossel, Gesch. der schweizerischen Lit. (2 v., 1909f); G. de Reynold, Histoire littéraire de la Suisse au XVIII^e siècle (1912; v. 1 Bodmer et l'Ecole suisse); J. Moser, Ch. Clerc, et al., Littératures de la Suisse (1938); H. de Ziegler, La Suisse littéraire d'aujourd'hui (1944); G. Calgari, Storia delle quattro letterature della Svizzera (1959).

DIALECT POETRY: In G. Switzerland, from the 17th c. on, a rich dialect poetry has paralleled that of the literary language. This literature possesses, to an even greater degree, the joy in reality, the nearness to the soil, the picturesque and homely elements, which appear in more elevated literature. Since this dialect poetry remains an almost closed book to the non-Swiss, mention of a few names may suffice: J. M. Usteri (1763-1827); G. J. Kuhn (1775-1849); A. Corrodi (1826-85); M. Lienert (1865-1933); Sophie Hämmerli-Marti (1868-1942); D. Müller (1871-1953); J. Reinhart (1875-1957).—ANTHOLOGIES: Silhouetten, ed. P. Kägi (III, 1918); Schwyzer Meie, ed. A. Guggenbühl, G. Thürer (3d ed., 1938); Blumen aus euserem Garte, ed. A. Guggenbühl, K. Hafner (1942).—HISTORY AND CRITICISM: O. v. Greyer, Die Mundartdichtung der deutschen Schweiz (1924); H. Trümpler, Schweizerdeutsche Sprache und Lit. im 17. und 18. Jh. (1955). E.S.T.

FRENCH-SWISS POETRY. Although the literature of Fr. Switzerland is a part of Fr. literature, the literary works produced here offer certain common characteristics. They reflect the social life and structure of small towns and small independent republics. Most often they express the uneasiness and isolation of one who feels divided in the very sources of his culture: on one side, history—on the other, language. Whenever France becomes a danger for the independence of Switzerland, the Fr.-Swiss literature stresses its essentially Swiss qualities; whenever political centralization tends to give too much influence to G. Switzerland, the Fr.-Swiss literature turns toward France and thus reveals its indestructible ties to the language. Calvinistic Protestantism offers an explanation for the fact that the problems of conscience, psychological analysis, and introspection are of chief importance.

These generalizations hold good for poetry, too. The result of political independence was at first an almost total sterility in literary matters in the 16th and 17th c. The refusal of the Fr. materialist philosophy of the 18th c. led to the so-called "helvétisme littéraire," to the admiration of rural virtues, to the imitation of Salomon Gessner. After the Federal Constitution of 1848 which brought about a greater national unity, Fr.-Swiss poetry tended once more away from G.-Swiss influence into the sphere of influence of modern Fr. poetry. The 20th c. came to be the richest period of the "poésie romande," no doubt because the pains taken with language are the starting point of all poetry. Besides, "poésie pure" (not talking about one's feelings unless by far-fetched analogies) agrees with Protestant reserve and its need for detours.

The following are the principal Fr.-Swiss poets and works from the beginnings to the present day. Middle Ages: Oton de Grandson (d. 1397) in his songs remained true to the tradition of the troubadours.—18th c.: Philippe-Sirice Bridel (1757–1845) published the Poésies helvétiques (1782) in which he pictured alpine scenes in accordance with his own program for a Fr.-Swiss national poetry.—19th c.: Some spirited poets inspired by Béranger joined in the "Caveau genevois." The least forgotten of these patriotic humorists is J. Petit-Senn (1792–1870). The Genevan romantic Jacques-Imbert Galloix (1807–28) reveals in his posthumous collection of poems Méditations lyriques (1834) an extraordinary sensitiveness. Frédéric Monneron (1813–37) wrote beautiful love songs and metaphysical poems: Poésies (1852). Juste Olivier (1807–76) gives expression to the local atmosphere in his poems Le Léman and Helvétie. Les chansons lointaines (1847) are composed of political couplets à la Béranger. The most gifted of the romantics, Etienne Eggis (1830–67), was influenced by Germany. His En causant avec la lune (1851) has been called a "sumptuous babbling." Louis Duchosal (1862–1901), under the influence of Baudelaire, Verlaine and, later, Albert Samain, at the same time managed to maintain a personal note: Rameau d'or (1894). Henry Warnery (1859–1902), an idealist preoccupied with his own salvation, abandoned the traditional versification in Sur l'Alpe (1895); in Aux vents de la vie (1904) the religious feeling springs from the contemplation of nature.—20th c.: The truly lyric Henry Spiess (1876–1940) made use of his musical talent to express the dilemma of man, torn between the desire of the flesh and the thirst of God: Les chansons captives (1910), Saisons divines (1920). The two most prominent authors of the 20th c. are C. F. Ramuz (1870–1947) and G. de Reynold (b. 1880). Ramuz, predominantly a prose writer, first tried his hand at poetry in Le Petit Village (1903). De Reynold, who made a name for himself as a historian and essayist, has been tempted to write verse as well; his poetry, collected in Aux Pays des Aïeux and Les Bannières Flammées, is mainly concerned with the military, the heroic, and the legendary in the life and history of the Swiss.

René-Louis Piachaud (1896–1941), representative of a classic art, wrote verse of admirable density in L'indifférent (1923), and in the Poème paternel (1932) Edmond-Henri Crisinel (1897–1948) strangely repeats the experience of Nerval. Pierre-Louis Matthey is the most powerful of the Fr.-Swiss poets; his poetic work can be said to be without a flaw: Poésies (1943). Gustave Roud is a man of untiring poetic quest across the country-side: Ecrits (1950). The rich literary production of Gilbert Trollet has found a large reading public: Offrande (1944), La Colline (1955). Philippe Jaccottet devotes himself to the search of new rhythms: L'Effraie (1954).

ANTHOLOGIES: Les chants du pays (1883); En pays romands, ed. Sociétés de Belles-Lettres (1883–85); Anthologie des poètes de la Suisse romande, ed. E. de Boccard (1946).—HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Gonzague de Reynold, "Evolution de la litt. romande," La Suisse une et diverse (1923); C. Clerc, "La Suisse Romande," L'Hist. de la litt. française, ed. J. Bédier and P. Hazard (2 v., 1923–24); P. Kohler, "La litt. de la Suisse Romande," L'Hist. de la litt. fr., III (1949); Weber-Perret, "La poésie," Ecrivains

Romands, 1900-1950 (1951). W.-P. (tr. E.S.T.)

ITALIAN-SWISS. It. Switzerland is an extremely small country of limited resources and with a population of hardly 200,000. It is therefore not surprising that its literary production is equally modest in size. In the 16th c. there were several humanists; then in the 17th and 18th, poets busied themselves mostly with the translation of works by poets from other countries. Francesco Soave (1743-1806) must be mentioned here. His version of Salomon Gessner's New Idylls exercised a certain influence on the preromantic movement in Italy. In the 19th and 20th c. Francesco Chiesa, born in 1871, is of foremost significance. In his prose as well as in his lyrics he keeps up throughout an essentially poetic quality. In 1897 his first collection of poetry, Preludio, appeared; ten years later, the epic trilogy Calliope, the parts of which are: La Cattedrale—symbol of the Middle Ages where religious feeling predominates; La Reggia—the palace of a Renaissance prince, here symbol of the Renaissance governed by a spirit of wordliness and splendor; La Città—representative of the modern period, in a way the synthesis of those preceding. All in all there are 220 sonnets, many of them admirable, which remind us of the Fr. Parnassians (q.v.). A little later appeared I viali d'oro (1910). But the most beautiful of his poems are found in Fuochi di primavera (1919). Although Chiesa is recognized as the greatest It.-Swiss poet, there are others who deserve to be named. Giuseppe Zoppi (1896-1952) likewise excelled in prose and verse. La nuvola bianca (1923) is his best known collection of poetry. Valerio Abbondio has left several collections noted for their delicacy of feeling and language: Betulle (1922), Cuore notturno (1947).

ANTHOLOGIES: Antologia di prose e poesie moderne, ed. P. Tosetti (1902); Scrittori della Svizzera italiana (2 v., 1936); Scrittori ticinesi da Rinascimento a oggi, ed. G. Zoppi (1936).—HISTORY AND CRITICISM: G. Zoppi, La poesia di F. Chiesa (1920) and La Svizzera nella lett. ital. (1944); G. Locarnini, Die literarischen Beziehungen zwischen der italienischen und der deutschen Schweiz (1946); G. Calgari in Storia delle quattro lett. della Svizzera (1959).

H.D.E. Z. (tr. E.S.T.)

RECENT TITLES: Holderbluescht, ed. G. Thürer (1962; dialect); Schweizer Lyrik, ed. W. Weber (1964; contemp.); W. Günther, Dichter der neueren Schweiz, I (1963); Bestand und Versuch, ed. B. Mariacher and F. Witz (1964).

E.S.T.

SYLLABA ANCEPS (L. "twofold syllable," the noun being from Gr.). A syllable which, independently of its real metrical value, can be counted as long or short, according to the requirements of the meter. This is especially true of the syllable at the end of a verse or of a few cola.—Koster; W. S. Barrett, "Dactylo-Epitrates in Bacchylides," Hermes, 84 (1956).

P.S.C.

SYLLABISM. See METER.

SYLLABLE. Linguistically, the domain of any degree of accent in spoken utterance. The s. is the smallest measurable unit of poetic sound, the fundamental building-block of metrical structure, and, in pure syllabic prosody (see METER), the only constituent to be regarded in the metrically normal line. See also PROSODY.

P.F.

SYLLEPSIS (Gr. "a taking together"). According to Herodian, the Gr. rhetorician of the 2d c. A.D. and two of his Gr. successors, the inclusive reference of a predicate to a compound subject where the predicate states a proposition true of only one part of the subject and untrue of the other part, e.g., "The north wind and the west wind that blow from Thrace" (true only of the north wind, Iliad 9.5; G. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 v., 1832-36, v. 8, p. 604; cf. pp. 720, 753). This meaning is of little but historical interest, the quotation illustrating rather a trivial rhetorical fault than any virtue. The term was applied by the Byzantine rhetorician Gregory of Corinth (12th c.) to an expression in the Iliad that is not properly a figure of speech at all (Iliad 2.226-28), wherein the poet has subtly implied the pretentiousness of Thersites by making him include himself among the Achaean military aristocrats when he tells of spoils "we Achaeans" have taken. Here the subject of the verb, though plural, is not compound, nor would the statement convey any implicit meaning to a reader not already familiar with the worthless character of the speaker (Walz, v. 8, p. 776).

Later authorities distinguish two useful definitions of the term: (1). A kind of grammatical ellipsis, usually unobjectionable, in which, for the sake of economy, one word is used to refer to two or more other words with only one of which it agrees grammatically (so Johannes Susenbrotus, Epitome troporum ac schematum, 1541, ed. of 1621, pp. 25-26; contrast zeugma, q.v.), e.g., "Good Paulina, / Lead us from hence, where we may leisurely / Each one demand and answer to his part" (Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale 5.3.151-3); "My Ladie laughs for ioy, and I for wo" (George Puttenham, The Arte of Eng. Poesie, 1589, ed. of 1936, p. 165). (2). The use of any part of speech comparably related to two other words or phrases, correctly with respect to each taken separately, as to both syntax and meaning, but in different ways, so as to produce a witty effect, e.g., "Alta petens, pariterque oculos telumque tetendit" (he looked up [at the target, a captive pigeon] with gaze and arrow alike on the stretch—Virgil, Aeneid 5.508); "Whether the nymph shall . . . / Or stain her honor or her new brocade" (Pope, The Rape of the Lock 2.105–7). See The Oxford Companion to Eng. Lit., 2d ed., 1937; H. L. Yelland and others, A Handbook of Lit. Terms, 1950.

S. should not be confused in any of the senses here defined with zeugma, q.v. H.B.

SYMBOL. The word "symbol" derives from the Gr. verb, symbollein, meaning "to put together," and the related noun, symbolon, meaning "mark," "token," or "sign," in the sense of the half-coin carried away by each of the two parties of an agreement as a pledge. Hence, it means basically a joining or combination, and, consequently, something once so joined or combined as standing for or representing in itself, when seen alone, the entire complex. This term in literary usage refers most specifically to a manner of representation in which what is shown (normally referring to something material) means, by virtue of association, something more or something else (normally referring to something immaterial). Thus a literary s. unites an image (the analogy) and an idea or conception (the subject) which that image suggests or evokes—as when, for example, the image of climbing a staircase (the difficulty involved in the effort to raise oneself) is used to suggest the idea of "raising" oneself spiritually or becoming purified (T. S. Eliot's Ash Wednesday).

A s. thus resembles what are known traditionally as "figures of speech" (cf. IMAGERY), which themselves comprise "tropes," or departures (turns) from the commonplace modes of signification, and "schemes," or artful elaborations of the forms of words and sentences. A s. is like a trope, in that a simile, metaphor, personification, allegory (qq.v.), and so on, each represent a manner of speaking in which what is said means something more or something else. But a s. is not a trope, and may be distinguished in terms of how it relates subject and analogy in a poem. In the other figures mentioned, what is said (analogy) is distinct from what is meant (subject), and their relationship is based upon a stated or implied resemblance within difference.

A s., on the other hand, puts the analogy in place of the subject (and may thus be thought of as an "expanded" metaphor—and, conversely, recurring metaphors in a given work are often spoken of as symbolic) so that we read what is said (climbing a staircase) as if that were what is meant, but are made to infer, by virtue of the associations provoked by what is said and the manner in which it is expressed, something more or something else as the additional or true meaning (spiritual purification). Thus, an idea which would be difficult, flat, lengthy, or unmoving when expressed prosaically and by itself, may be made intelligible, vivid, economical, and emotionally effective by the use of symbols.

A s., then, may be called, for purely technical purposes, a "pseudo-subject." Nor need the relationship between what is said and what is to be inferred be based, as in metaphor and simile, merely upon resemblance, for many images have become potentially symbolic not through likeness only but also through one sort of association or another—as when the loss of a man's hair symbolizes the loss of strength (Samson) or the rejection of worldly desires (monastic and ascetic practice), not because of any resemblance between them but rather because a primitive and magical connection has been established between secondary sex characteristics, virility, and desire. Of course, an associative relationship may be established having resemblance as its basis when a metaphor or simile is repeated so often, either in the work of a single author or in literary tradition, that the analogue can be used alone to summon up the subject with which it was once connected. Similarly, many interpreters have pointed out that poets tend to use the metaphors and similes of their earlier work as symbols in their later work because of the associative relations thus established. Critics rightly warn, moreover, that symbolic associations of imagery should be made neither too explicit nor too fixed, for implications of this sort are best felt rather than explained, and vary from work to work depending upon the individual context.

The first question, however, which faces the reader of a poem is whether or not a given image is indeed symbolic to begin with. This question may be answered in at least three related ways: (1) the connection between s. and thing symbolized may be made explicit in the work, as with the "Sea of Faith" in Arnold's Dover Beach; (2) the image may be presented in such a way as to discourage a merely literal interpretation, as with Byzantium in Yeats's Sailing to Byzantium, since no such thing actually exists, or to encourage a more than merely literal interpretation, as with the garden in Marvell's poem of that name, since, although it does actually exist, it is made into something more by virtue of the speaker's reactions to it; or (3) the pressure of implicit association may be so great as to demand a symbolic interpretation, as with Ulysses in Tennyson's poem of that name, since that figure has received such extensive previous treatment in myth, legend, and literature (cf. Homer and Dante). Because there is today a tendency to apply symbolic interpretation rather loosely, it bears emphasizing at this point that an image in a work is not symbolic unless a literal interpretation fails to do it justice; that is to say, a negative test often helps—an image is literal until proved otherwise, and if a literal interpretation can account satisfactorily for its place and function in the work then it is probably not symbolic.

Once the presence of symbols has been established, however, the next question is how to interpret their place and function in the work. This question may be answered in terms of at least three overlapping areas of inquiry: (1) the source of their imagery in experience, whether from the natural world, the human body, man-made artifacts, and so on; (2) the status of their imagery in a given work, whether presented literally as an actual experience (so that it symbolizes something more) or nonliterally as a dream or vision (so that it symbolizes something else altogether); and (3) the way in which their imagery has acquired associative power, whether mainly by virtue of universal human experience (see ARCHETYPE), or particular historical conventions, or the internal relationships which obtain among the elements of a given work (whereby one thing becomes associated with another by virtue of structural emphasis, arrangement, position, or development—this aspect, is, of course, involved to some degree in all works containing symbols), or some private system invented by the poet, or some combination. Regarding the third area of inquiry, examples of universally understood symbols would include climbing a staircase (or mountain) as spiritual purification, crossing a body of water as some sort of spiritual transition, sunset as death and sunrise as rebirth, and so on; examples of conventional symbols would include the transmutation of lead to gold as redemption, the lily as chastity and the rose as passion, the tiger as Christ, and so on; examples of internal-relationship symbols would include the wall as the division between the primitive and the civilized or natural chaos and human order in Robert Frost, the guitar and the color blue as the aesthetic imagination in Wallace Stevens, the island as complacency and the sea as courage in W. H. Auden, and so on; and examples of private symbols would include the phases of the moon as the cycles of history combined with the psychology of individuals in W. B. Yeats, embalment as an obstacle that cannot be overcome in the attempt to resurrect the spirit in Dylan Thomas (see Olson [bibliog.]), and so on.

In Frost's famous poem, Birches, for example, the speaker talks of climbing to the top of a birch tree and swinging on it back down to earth again in such a way that the reader is given to understand that this action means something more than just climbing up and swinging down. That is to say, in the context of this poem the action comes to mean for its speaker a temporary release from the difficulties and responsibilities of daily life (climbing up and away from earth toward heaven) and a subsequent return to those mundane limitations once again refreshed (swinging back down to earth). Climbing, then, stands for his desire to get away, while swinging down stands for his recognition that he must, after all, live out his life on earth where the gods have placed him. Thus this action, which at first seemed to be the speaker's subject, turns out ultimately to be an analogue of his subject (which in no way, of course, diminishes the value and interest of the imagery in itself).

According to the three areas of inquiry outlined above, this symbolic imagery may first be analyzed as coming from the natural world in combination with actions of the human body: earth, heaven, tree, climbing up and swinging down. It is presented, secondly, as literal occurrence. And thirdly, its associative power derives from universal experience—earth as limitation and heaven as release—in combination with internal relationships—the act of swinging from a birch as seen in this context.

Yeats's Sailing to Byzantium, on the other hand, is rather more complicated in its symbolism. Here the speaker talks of sailing the seas and coming to the holy city of Byzantium, but, because this cannot be taken literally, what he actually means (again the warning against being too specific in explaining the meaning of symbols must be recalled) is that he wants to divest himself of mortality and its limitations and dwell—probably through the forms of art—in eternity. Notice, however, in the first place, that Byzantium as a symbolic image is derived from man-made artifact (although sailing as transition is not); secondly, that it is presented as a vision and not as something which has literally happened or could literally happen; and thirdly, that, in addition to internal relationships, the associative power of this image depends for its force upon—or at least is aided greatly by—a knowledge of exactly what it meant to Yeats in his private symbology. Thus the symbolism of different writers may be distinguished, characterized, and interpreted. (Even here, however, such categories must be applied flexibly, for Yeats's Byzantium image, although it does indeed have crucial private associations, is also related to the universal image of the "holy city" [e.g., Jerusalem] as fulfillment or redemption.)

Historically, men once tended to see the physical world in terms of spiritual values, not only by way of generating universal symbols (the world as a body, for example, or man's body as a state, and so on) but also of developing—through myth, lore, legend, craft, and learning—special conventions. And it is one of the doctrines of modern criticism that, partly due to the Protestant Reformation, partly to the changes gradually effected in school curricula, partly to the growth of science, and partly to the mere passing of time, not only have many conventional symbols been rendered meaningless to poets and readers alike but also the very power of seeing the physical world in terms of spiritual values has disappeared. Thus symbolism has been called in the 20th c. the "lost" or the "forgotten" language.

Certain 20th-c. poets, following the lead of the 19th-c. Fr. "symbolists" (Baudelaire, Verlaine, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé each in his own way explored afresh the possibilities of the private symbolism of vision and dreams), and partly under the influence of a renewal of interest in Donne, Blake, and Hopkins, have attempted not only a revival of conventional religious and legendary symbolism, as has Eliot in Ash Wednesday, for example, but also have tried, in what they have felt to be a collapse of spiritual values, to invent their own symbolic conventions (Yeats is only the most obvious, with Ezra Pound, Hart Crane, Wallace Stevens, and Dylan Thomas working along similar if less systematic lines). Other poets, such as Frost, William Carlos Williams, and E. E. Cummings, have by and large been content to use natural, literal, universal, and contextual symbols.

The differences of opinion which exist today regarding the nature and function of symbolism in literature are due principally to the variety of ways in which the term is used in the service of different critical theories. This is true for many other terms as well, for a critic's use of any given term is governed by the assumptions he makes about literature and the kind of knowledge he is interested in obtaining. One cannot, therefore, compare and contrast the interpretations of different critics without first realizing what their assumptions and goals are, and consequently how they use their various terms.

Elder Olson, for example, as a neo-Aristotelian, is primarily concerned with literary works in their aspect as artistic wholes of certain kinds. Since he sees artistic wholeness in terms of the over-all effect which a work is designed to have upon the reader—whether doctrinal, as in the case of didactic works, or emotional, as in the case of mimetic works—and since a s. cannot produce such an effect apart from the poem of which it is a part, he regards symbolism as a device which is sometimes used by an author in the service of that effect (to aid in the expression of remote ideas, to vivify what otherwise would be faint, to aid in determining the reader's emotional reactions, and so on).

Other critics, however, having a more general notion of artistic form, are less precise in their definitions. Because Yeats, for example, as a symbolist, is primarily interested in the suggestive powers of poetry, he extends his definition of symbolism to include not only images, metaphors, and myths, but also all the "musical relations" of a poem (rhythm, diction, rhyme, and so on). Because Krieger, Wheelwright, Langer, Cassirer, and Urban, as anti-positivists, are concerned with defending poetry as having epistemological status, they stress in their use of the term its powers of bodying forth nondiscursive meaning, truth, or vision. Because Kenneth Burke, as a student of language in terms of human motives, deduces the form of a literary work from speculation as to how it functions in relation to the poet's inner life, he emphasizes the way in which various elements of that work symbolize an enactment of the poet's psychological tensions. Because the writers in Bryson's anthologies, as social critics, are interested in the uses of symbolism in a cultural context, they focus on the term as referring to the ways in which societal phenomena in general (insigne, designs on currency, structure of public buildings, motion pictures, and so on) serve as indicators of the values of a people.

Thus, if symbolism refers generally to the use of one thing to stand for another, then its specific meanings will vary according to the framework in which this relationship is viewed. A s. is a device of the poetic art when it refers to something in the poem as standing for something else in the poem; it is a power of poetic language when it refers to the way words and rhythms can evoke mystery; it is a function of the whole poem when it refers to the kinds of meaning a literary work can stand for; it is a form of therapeutic disguise when it refers to the ways in which a poem stands for the working out of the author's inner disturbances; and it is an index of cultural values when it refers to the ways in which man's products reveal his attitudes. Since the word is thus capable of such protean meanings—some of them overlapping at certain points—it is obviously best, when using the term, to specify the exact sense intended.

W. B. Yeats, "The Symbolism of Poetry" (1900), Ideas of Good and Evil (2d ed., 1903); H. Bayley, The Lost Lang. of Symbolism (2 v., 1912, repr. 1951, 1952); D. A. Mackenzie, The Migration of Symbols (1926); H. Flanders Dunbar, Symbolism in Medieval Thought (1929); W. M. Urban, "The Principles of Symbolism," Lang. and Reality (1939); K. Burke, The Philos. of Lit. Form: Studies in Symbolic Ac- tion (1941); Langer; C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of Symbolism (1943); E. Cassirer, An Essay on Man (1944); M. Krieger, "Creative Crit.: A Broader View of Symbolism," SR, 58 (1950); T. Mischel, "The Meanings of 'S.' in Lit.," Arizona Quar., 8 (1952); E. Olson, "A Dialogue on Symbolism," in Crane, Critics; Special Issue of YFS, no. 9 (1952-53); Special Issue of JAAC, 12 (Sept. 1953); C. Feidelson, Symbolism and Am. Lit. (1953); B. Kimpel, The Symbols of Religious Faith (1954); E. Olson, "The Universe of the Early Poems," The Poetry of Dylan Thomas (1954); Symbols and Values (1954) and Symbols and Society (1955), both ed. L. Bryson et al.; P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1954) and Metaphor and Reality (1962); W. Y. Tindall, The Lit. S. (1955); H. Levin, Symbolism and Fiction (1956); Frye; F. Kermode, Romantic Image (1957); J. W. Beach, Obsessive Images: Symbolism in the Poetry of the 1930's and 1940's (1960); Lit. Symbolism, ed. M. Beebe (1960); Metaphor and S., ed. L. C. Knights and B. Cottle (1960); B. Seward, The Symbolic Rose (1960); Symbolism in Religion and Lit., ed. R. May (1960); H. Musurillo, S. and Myth in Ancient Poetry (1961); Myth and S., ed. B. Slote (1963). N.FRIE.

SYMBOLIC ACTION is a term used by Kenneth Burke to signify, first, that poetry is different from practical action, but parallel to it and, in a sense, symptomatic of it. Poetry is a way of "acting out" tensions and symbolically resolving irresolutions in the poet. His fundamental trope in criticism is poetry as drama. The poet forms a role and then transforms it, symbolic death and rebirth being the primary pattern. At times Burke speaks of three levels of symbolic action (Philosophy of Literary Form, 36-37): biological, familistic, and abstract, but more typically he deals with "act, scene, agent, agency, purpose" as the best modes for understanding literature and philosophy. Polar oppositions (sublime-ridiculous) and image clusters (often elaborately interpreted) are important in and to his method, and synecdoche, or the part for the whole, is to him the basic literary device. The resemblance to Freudian criticism is evident, but he carefully avoids the Freudian metaphysical reduction of all levels of meaning and motive to the sexual, biological level, and attempts to interpret motive more charitably than does Freudian criticism generally.—S. Freud, Psychopathology of Everyday Life (1901; chap. 9); K. Burke, Counter-Statement (1931), The Philos. of Lit. Form (1941), "Symbol and Association," HR, 9 (1956); Y. Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947); G. Knox, Crit. Moments: Kenneth Burke's Categories and Critiques (1957). See also W. H. Rueckert, Kenneth Burke and the Drama of Human Relations (1963). P.R.

SYMBOLISM (movement). Historically, s. follows Parnassianism (see PARNASSIANS) as a continuation of the great romantic revolution in Fr. poetry of the 19th c. Its subject matter shows a return to the intimate emotional and aesthetic experience of the individual after the more objective stress of the Parnasse; but s. differs from historical Fr. romanticism in its greater subtlety and preoccupation with the inner life and in its general avoidance of sentimentality, rhetoric, narration, direct statement, description, public and political themes, and overt didacticism of any kind. It marks a fusion of the sensibility and imagination, which the romantics had restored to Fr. poetry, with the lucid craftsmanship of the Parnassians, and a turn toward music and le rêve for evocative expression. Symbolist poetry is a poetry of indirection, in which objects tend to be suggested rather than named, or to be used primarily for an evocation of mood. Ideas may be important, but are characteristically presented obliquely through a variety of symbols and must be apprehended largely by intuition and feeling. Symbolist poets use words for their magical suggestiveness—what Rimbaud termed l'alchimie du verbe and Baudelaire une sorcellerie évocatoire; and one of their essential aims is to arouse response beyond the level of ordinary consciousness, in what was called after Hartmann l'inconscient. For the symbolists the power of the Word goes far beyond ordinary denotative verbal limits through suggestive developments in syntax and interrelated images and through what may be termed the "phonetic s." of musicality and connotative sound-relationships. Profoundly evocative poetry of this sort is essentially different from that which had predominated in France since the late Renaissance; and its appearance in Fr. literature entailed a more evident renovation of lyric poetry than would have been possible in England and Germany, many of whose earlier poets had already much in common with the later Fr. symbolists.

Among the more important foreign writers and philosophers influencing or showing affinities with Fr. s. may be cited, from the British Isles: Berkeley, Coleridge, Shelley, Keats, Carlyle, Ruskin, Rossetti, Morris, Swinburne and Pater; from Germany: Schiller, Fichte, Hegel, Hölderlin, Novalis, Schelling, E.T.A. Hoffmann, Schopenhauer, and Wagner; and from the United States: Emerson, Poe, and Whitman. Wagner was especially important, not only for his music but for his insistence upon the ideal relation between music and poetry ("... the most complete work of the poet must be that which, in its final achievement, would be a perfect music"). But the greatest single influence was exerted by Poe, who came to prefigure an ideal of the poet for several of the great Fr. symbolists. More important than his poems, Poe's theories proclaimed the idea of an absolute Beauty and the importance of the poem "written solely for the poem's sake"; urged in poetry "a certain taint of sadness," the need for images with indefinite sensations, and the "absolute essentiality" and vast importance of music; and represented the poet as a thoroughly conscious artist.

Among native Fr. writers, links have been seen between the symbolists and the mystical and idealistic predecessors of the Pléiade (q.v.) in l'école lyonnaise (Antoine Héroët, Gilles Corrozet, Maurice Scève, and Louise Labé). Rousseau and Chateaubriand ("the Enchanter") may be considered precursors of s. in their use of musical and affective language. The tristesse lamartinienne with its remarkable musicality is a prelude to the more delicate music of Verlaine. In the poetry of Vigny, the function of such symbols as the waterfall (in Le cor) that establishes the strange ambience for the fall of Roland and the Peers at Roncevaux, and the sound of the weathercock en deuil (in La mort du loup), with its premonitory note of mourning, anticipate symbolist techniques. Sainte-Beuve is a precursor of Fr. s.; and Victor Hugo, in his visionary power and his evocative mingling of image and music, often shows symbolist qualities. But of all the Fr. romantic poets Gérard de Nerval (1808-55) is nearest to the new poetry, and in the compressed, musical, and difficult sonnets of Les chimères (1854) seems to anticipate the art of both Verlaine and Mallarmé.

Charles Baudelaire (1821-67) is the first great symbolist poet of France. It has become apparent that with Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du Mal (1857) Fr. poetry had assimilated the lessons of Eng. and German romanticism and rejoined the great European lyric tradition from which it had been in great part separated since the Renaissance. With Les Fleurs du Mal, Baudelaire (in his proclaimed effort to "extraire la beauté du Mal") brought to Fr. poetry a renewed sense of the magical power of words and a symbolic, mythical vision of the great modern city and of modern man ("l'héroïsme de la vie moderne"). His sonnet Correspondances describes man moving through a "forest of symbols" familiarly related to his existence, and proclaims two kinds of inter-related correspondances: (1) those (in the manner of Swedenborg and the great mystics generally since Plato) between the material world and spiritual realities, and (2) those between the different human sense modalities (see SYNÆSTHESIA). Baudelaire's memorable depiction of the "delicate monster" Ennui and of the struggle in man between Spleen and the Ideal; his Satanism; his exploiting of the various senses, especially that of smell; his interest in the "artificial paradises" (opium, hashish, wine), in dandyism, in decadence; his development of the prose poem (q.v.); his theories on correspondences and on art and the artist; his translations and adaptations from Poe; and his enthusiasm for Wagner combined with the general prestige of Les Fleurs du Mal to make Baudelaire the most significant native influence upon the rising symbolist movement in France.

Verlaine, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé, the three great symbolist poets of the later 19th c., all felt Baudelaire's influence. Paul Verlaine (1844-96), one of the most delicate Fr. lyricists, published his first volume of poetry (Poèmes saturniens) in 1866. Already in this collection, where Verlaine shows himself still influenced by Parnassian theory, such poems as Chanson d'automne and Mon rêve familier sound a characteristic note of musical nostalgia in which "the language is vaporized and reabsorbed into the melody" (Michaud). Among Verlaine's significant later volumes are Fêtes galantes (1869), La bonne chanson (1870), Romances sans paroles (1874), Sagesse (1881), and Jadis et naguère (1884). Verlaine's "Art poétique" advocates "music before everything," use of le vers impair (verse of an uneven number of syllables: 5,7,9,11 instead of the usual 6,8,10,12), and urges that ideal poetry should be as fugitive and intangible as the scent of mint and thyme on the morning wind—something very like the conception of poésie pure (see PURE POETRY) championed in the 20th c. by the Abbé Bremond. Aside from his influence on Fr. prosody, Verlaine was influential as a symbol of "decadence." His lyric gifts were personal, and his evocative poems introduced into Fr. literature an intimate impressionism hardly known before his time. Verlaine was not by nature a theorist or a poet of ideas. But he brought music and poetry into a relationship that is in itself a kind of miracle.

Arthur Rimbaud (1854-91), the precocious boy-genius among the symbolists who gave up poetry before he was nineteen, inspired a "myth" that has not yet lost its fascination and that in itself symbolizes a rebellious aspect of the modern creative mind. Rimbaud saw the poet as a mage, a seer, and wrote that "le poète se fait voyant par un long, immense et raisonné dérèglement de tous les sens." (The poet makes himself a seer by a long, immense and reasoned derangement of all the senses.) Rimbaud's Bateau ivre (September 1871), composed before his seventeenth birthday, is one of the most memorable poems of the century. Its strange rhythms, hallucinatory descriptions of land and sea, brilliant colors, and alternating violence and calms; its employment of symbols concerned with the beginning of the world (Tohu-Bohu, Behemoth, Leviathan); its powerful mingling of fresh, adolescent sensations with apocalyptic visions; and the ultimate evocation, from what seems at first a chaos of images, of impressive form and meaning combine to make the poem a masterpiece of Fr. s. The sonnet Voyelles (1871) is of less importance; but its sensational proclamation that the vowels are colored ("A noir, E blanc, I rouge, U vert, O bleu, voyelles. . ."), though not original (see AUDITION COLORÉE), aroused violent controversy and led to extreme exaggeration in such analogous attempts as René Ghil's Traité du verbe (1885) and P.-N. Roinard's Cantique des cantiques (1891). Between 1871 and 1873 Rimbaud wrote a collection of verses and prose poems (Les illuminations) published in 1886, and the autobiographical Une saison en enfer (published by Rimbaud in 1873, but never circulated; reprinted in 1892). Rimbaud's experiments with rhythm in Les illuminations (e.g., in Mouvement and Marine) have led to his being identified by some critics as the inventor of vers libre (q.v.). His influence has been enormous. Dame Edith Sitwell calls this marvelous boy "the originator of modern prose rhythms" and adds that "Rimbaud is, to modern English verse and to modern English and American prose poems, what Edgar Allan Poe was to Baudelaire and Mallarmé." In the words of Pierre Jean Jouve: "Avec Rimbaud nous entrons dans la langue moderne de la Poésie."

The last of the great Fr. symbolist poets of the 19th c. is Stéphane Mallarmé (1842-98), the exquisite, hermetic master whose Tuesday evenings in his apartment on the Rue de Rome were attended at one time or another by most of the famous symbolists of the day. Mallarmé's early poems show already the influence of Baudelaire, along with that of Hugo, Gautier, and Banville. Poems of the second period (e.g., Hérodiade and L'après-midi d'un faune) have more characteristic developments of complex suggestion, imagery and verbal music; and those of the third period become increasingly condensed and remote and culminate in the variously interpreted Un coup de dés jamais n'abolira le hasard. Mallarmé is known as one of the most difficult Fr. poets; and the bitterness of his frustration in not finding words for the ideal is seen in his symbol of the white swan with wings imprisoned in a frozen lake ("Le vierge, le vivace et le bel aujourd'hui. . ."), and in his unhappy admission to Louis le Cardonnell: "Mon art est une impasse." But Mallarmé was by no means a sterile poet. He saw life differently from those around him, and evolved his own technique of combining symbols with verbal music, typography and patterned suggestion to evoke as nearly as possible his aesthetic and metaphysical ideal. According to Mallarmé, a poem is a mystery whose key must be sought by the reader, and poetry is primarily suggestion: "Nommer un objet, c'est supprimer les trois quarts de la jouissance du poème qui est faite du bonheur de deviner peu à peu: le suggérer, voilà le rêve" (To name an object is to suppress three-fourths of the delight of the poem which is derived from the pleasure of divining little by little: to suggest it, that is the dream). A passage in "Crise de vers" (from Divagations, 1897) indicates at once the difficulties and fascination of his method: "Abolir, la prétention, esthétiquement une erreur, quoiqu'elle régit les chefs-d'œuvre, d'inclure au papier subtil du volume autre chose que par exemple l'horreur de la forêt, ou le tonnerre muet épars au feuillage; non le bois intrinsèque et dense des arbres" (Abolished, the claim, aesthetically an error, although it governs masterpieces, of including on the subtle paper of the volume anything more for example than the horror of the forest, or the silent thunder scattered through the leaves: not the intrinsic, dense wood of the trees). Although critics find Hegelian influence in Mallarmé (e.g., in Igitur), ideas in his poems are not meant to be apprehended directly by reason, but indirectly, symbolically, through poetic intuition. "Je dis: une fleur!" he writes, "et, hors de l'oubli où ma voix relègue aucun contour, en tant que quelque chose d'autre que les calices sus, musicalement se lève, idée même et suave, l'absente de tous bouquets" (I say: a flower! and, out of the oblivion into which my voice consigns every outline, apart from the known calyxes, there arises musically, the delicate idea itself, the flower absent from all bouquets).

About 1885, the year of Hugo's death, the symbolists became more widely known through such works as Verlaine's Les poètes maudits (1884), Huysmans' A rebours (1884), and the amusing parodies in Gabriel Vicaire's and Henri Beauclair's Les déliquescentes d'Adoré Floupette, poète décadent (1885). This period saw the discovery of two "decadent" poets related to s. who introduce a new note of irony into Fr. poetry: Tristan Corbière (1845-75), the author of Les amours jaunes (1875), who was brought to the attention of the public as one of Verlaine's poètes maudits (q.v.), and Jules Laforgue (1860-87) with Les complaintes (1885) and L'imitation de Notre-Dame la Lune (1886).

Between Baudelaire, Verlaine, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé and the last great symbolist poets (Claudel and Valéry) Fr. symbolists like René Ghil, Stuart Merrill, Vielé Griffin, Jean Moréas, Henri de Régnier, and Gustave Kahn seem on the whole less important than their Belgian contemporaries (Rodenbach, Verhaeren, Maeterlinck, Van Lerberghe, Elskamp). The last years of the century teemed with theoretical discussion in print and in the symbolist cafés of the Latin Quarter (Le François 1^{er}, Le Vachette, Le Panthéon, Le Procope, Le Soleil d'Or). On September 8, 1886, Le Figaro published the symbolist manifesto of Jean Moréas. Important periodicals championed the symbolist cause: La revue wagnérienne (1885-88), La Wallonie (1886-92), La plume (1889-1905), Mercure de France (1890-), L'Ermitage (1890-1906), La revue blanche (1891-1903); and s. became recognized as a movement. But the greatest symbolist poets had already done their work. In 1891, Jules Huret's famous Enquête sur l'évolution littéraire indicated the triumph of the symbolists and the fading prestige of naturalism in France.

In the 20th c., Guillaume Apollinaire echoes at times the music of Verlaine; Paul Claudel, turning to Catholicism under the influence of Rimbaud, brings a liturgical quality to his s.; and Paul Valéry, the follower of Mallarmé, in La jeune Parque and Le cimetière marin creates two of the most memorable of symbolist poems. The surrealists discovered Isidore Ducasse ("le comte de Lautréamont"), whose Chants de Maldoror (1868-69) afford another link between s. and the poème en prose. Fr. symbolists are important in the background of surrealism (q.v.) itself, as André Breton recognized in remarks on Nerval, Baudelaire, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé. Their influence is evident also in contemporary drama and brief fiction and in the novel since Flaubert. (D. Hayman has recently shown the significant influence of Mallarmé on Finnegans Wake, and Fiser identifies Marcel Proust as the greatest symbolist of all.) Thus the music, the dream, and the poetic symbol of s., like romantic lyricism and imagination in an earlier day, have invaded the most important literary genres of the present century.

Influence of the Fr. symbolists may be traced in many poets from other lands; e.g., the British Isles: in Arthur Symons, Ernest Dowson, Walter de la Mare, Lionel Johnson, Oscar Wilde, George Russell ("Æ"), and William Butler Yeats; Germany: in Stefan George and Rainer Maria Rilke; Austria: in Hugo von Hofmannsthal; Russia: in Valery Bryusov, Innokenty Annensky, Zinaida Gippius, Fyodor Sologub, Constantine Balmont, Alexander Blok, Andrey Bely, and Vyacheslav Ivanov; Spain: in Antonio Machado, Juan Ramón Jiménez, and Jorge Guillén; Portugal: in Eugenio de Castro; also, Nicaragua: in Rubén Darío; Uruguay: in Julio Herrera y Reissig; and the United States: in Amy Lowell, Hilda Doolittle ("H. D."), John Gould Fletcher, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, Hart Crane, E. E. Cummings, and Wallace Stevens. (See also NATIONAL POETRY ARTICLES.)

A. Symons, The Symbolist Movement in Lit. (1899); W. B. Yeats, "The S. of Poetry" (1900)

in Ideas of Good and Evil (2d ed., 1903); A. Barre, Le symbolisme: essai historique . . . (1911); J. Charpentier, Le s. (1927); R. Taupin, L'influence du s. français sur la poésie américaine (de 1910 à 1920) (1929); Martino; Wilson; E. L. Duthie, L'influence du s. fr. dans le renouveau poétique de l'Allemagne (1933); E. Fiser, Le symbole littéraire: essai sur la signification du symbole chez Wagner, Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Bergson et Marcel Proust (1941); C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of S. (1943); S. Johansen, Le s.: étude sur le style . . . (1945); L. Cazamian, S. et poésie: l'exemple anglais (1947); G. Davies, "Stéphane Mallarmé: Fifty Years of Research," rs, 1 (1947); A. J. Mathews, La Wallonie, 1886-1892: The Symbolist Movement in Belgium (1947); G. Michaud, La doctrine symboliste: Documents (1947) and Messager poétique du s. (3 v., 1947); T. S. Eliot, From Poe to Valéry (1948); Raymond; Lehmann; K. Cornell, The Symbolist Movement (1951) and The Post-Symbolist Period (1958); O. A. Maslenikov, The Frenzied Poets: Andrey Biely and the Rus. Symbolists (1952); G.-E. Clancier, De Rimbaud au surréalisme (1953); R. Z. Temple, The Critic's Alchemy: A Study of the Introd. of Fr. S. into England (1953); L. J. Austin, L'univers poétique de Baudelaire: s. et symbolique (1956); J. Chiari, S. from Poe to Mallarmé: The Growth of a Myth (1956); B. Gicovate, Julio Herrera y Reissig and the Symbolists (1957); H. Hatzfeld, Trends and Styles in 20th C. Fr. Lit. (1957); O. Ragusa, Mallarmé in Italy (1957); G. Donchin, The Influence of Fr. S. on Russian Poetry (1958); M. Décaudin, La crise des valeurs symbolistes (1960); H. M. Block, Mallarmé and the Symbolist Drama (1963). A.G.E.

SYMBOLS, PROSODIC. See PROSODIC NOTATION.

SYMPATHY. See EMPATHY AND SYMPATHY.

SYMPLOCE. See ANADIPLOSIS.

SYNAERESIS (Gr. "a drawing together"), often synonymous with synizesis. In Gr. and L. poetry it occurs when two adjacent vowels of a word which are ordinarily separate syllables are combined for metrical purposes into one syllable, e.g.,

theōi for theōi (Iliad 1.18) or Theūdōsiūs for Theōdōsiūs

In Eng. poetry it similarly occurs, e.g., "seest" for "seēst" or "zoo" for "zoō."—Hardie. R.A.H.

SYNAESTHESIA. Term denoting the perception, or description of the perception, of one sense modality in terms of another; e.g., perceiving or describing a voice as velvety, warm, heavy, or sweet, or a trumpet-blast as scarlet. The word occurs in 1891 in The Century Dictionary, but in the sense concerned here seems to have been first employed by Jules Millet in his thesis on Audition colorée (Montpellier, 1892). S. was popularized by two sonnets (Baudelaire's Correspondances [1857] and Rimbaud's Voyelles [in MS, 1871]) and Huysmans' novel A rebours (1884); but it had been widely employed earlier in German and Eng. romantic poetry, and it occurs in the earliest literature of the West (e.g., in Iliad 3.152, where the voices of the old Trojans are likened to the lily-like voices of cicalas; in Iliad 3.222, where Odysseus' words fall like winter snowflakes; and in Odyssey 12.187 in the honey-voice of the Sirens). In Aeschylus' Persians (line 395), "the trumpet set all the shores ablaze with its sound," Horace writes (Odes 1.24.3-4) of a liquidam vocem. Hebrews 6.5 and Revelations 1.12 refer to tasting the word of God and seeing a voice. John Donne mentions a loud perfume, Crashaw a sparkling noyse. Shelley refers to the fragrance of the hyacinth as music, and Heine to words sweet as moonlight and delicate as the scent of the rose. Silence is perfumed (Rimbaud), black (Pindar), dark ("Ossian" [Macpherson]), green (Carducci), silver (Wilde), blue (D'Annunzio), chill (Edith Sitwell), green water (Louis Aragon). For Milosz the smell of silence is "so old"; for Sartre it is like violets. Dylan Thomas writes of the light of sound and sound of light. Kipling's dawn comes up like thunder. Lorca refers to green wind and Mary Webb to the icy voices of curlews. S. has been exploited for varied purposes, but attempts to establish it as in itself a sign of illness, degeneration, or decadence seem to be inspired largely by prejudice or ignorance; for s. occurs very widely in language and literature in an apparently universal role among civilized peoples as the metaphor of the senses.—V. Ségalen, "Les synesthésies et l'école symboliste," MdF, 42 (1902); I. Babbitt, The New Laokoön: An Essay on the Confusion of the Arts (1910; chap. 6); E. v. Siebold, "Synästhesien in der . . . Dichtung des 19. Jhs.," Englische Studien, 53 (1919-20); W. B. Stanford, Gr. Metaphor (1936); G. Maurevert, "Des sons, des goûts et des couleurs: Essai sur les correspondances sensorielles," MdF, 292 (1939); S. de Ullmann, "Laws of Language and Laws of Nature," MLR, 38 (1943) and "Romanticism and S.," PMLA, 60 (1945); A. G. Engstrom, "In Defense of S. in Lit.," PQ, 25 (1946); G. O'Malley, "Literary S.," JAAC, 15 (1957). A.G.E.

SYNALOEPHA, synalepha, synalephe (Gr. "coalescing"). In Gr. and L. poetry the contraction of a long vowel or diphthong at the end of one word with a vowel or diphthong at the beginning of the next into a long syllable.—Koster; L. Brunner, "Zur Elision langer Vokale im lateinischen Vers," Museum Helveticum, 13 (1956). R.J.G.

SYNCOPATION. See COUNTERPOINT.

SYNCOPE (Gr. "a cutting up"). Omission of a letter from the middle of a word (see POETIC CONTRACTIONS). In Gr. poetry the compression of a rhythmical unit such as a trochee or dactyl into one syllable which is then felt to be exceptionally long. L. poetry appears not to do this. R.A.H.

SYNECDOCHE (Gr. "act of taking together," "understanding one thing with another"). An important figure, often quite properly regarded as a special type of metonymy (q.v.), wherein the part is substituted for the whole, or sometimes the whole for the part: elephas (ivory for elephant); melissa (honey for bee). Quintilian (Institutes of Oratory 8.6.19-21) illustrates from L.: muco (point for sword); tectum (roof for house), etc., but forbids others like puppis (stern for ship). Besides being a common device in ordinary speech and a rhetorical ornament, s. is sometimes used to describe cases where something is assumed that has not been expressed: "Arcades ad portas ruere" (The Arcadians to the gates began to rush—Virgil, Aeneid 11.142), though Quintilian considers such omission, when it creates a blemish, to be an ellipse (q.v.), a narrower definition than usual.

Generally, any internal relation of entity or concept may be used in synecdochic expression, as species for genus, material for thing made, abstract quality for being possessing it, etc., but some rhetoricians limit s. to four types: part for whole, species for genus, whole for part, genus for species, thus separating s. from merismus, or partitio, wherein the whole is distributed into its parts (Sister Miriam Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language, 1947, p. 315). Often s. assumes intricate forms: "Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats / Will not debate the question of this straw," Hamlet 4.4.25.

Kenneth Burke sees s. as implying a relation of convertibility between its terms. He emphasizes the philosophical implications of the figure, pointing out the synecdochic nature of the ancient metaphysical doctrines of microcosm and macrocosm, in which the individual entity is seen as recapitulating the nature and structure of the universe ("Four Master Tropes" in A Grammar of Motives, 1945, pp. 503f.). Lausberg investigates s. as (1) trope, (2) word-trope, (3) figure of thought (i.e., "Gedanken-Tropus"), and (4) ellipse. R.O.E.

TAGELIED

SYNTHESIS. See ANALYSIS.

SYNTHETIC RHYME results from the alteration by contraction, protraction, or distortion of one or more rhyme-fellows to produce phonetic identity or at least approximation, e.g.:

The consequence was he was lost totally,
And married a girl in the corps de bally.
(W. S. Gilbert, Patience)

Such liberties with language are not confined to light or humorous verse, common as they are in Butler, Byron, Barham, and Ogden Nash, to raise a smile. There are many, for example, in The Faerie Queene, some of them very forced; and plenty of others, less licentious perhaps, can be found in quite serious poetry at any period.

A.M.C.

SYNTHETIC RHYTHM is one maintained by repeating a word to fill up the line, or by padding it out with an expletive or extra syllable. It is common in balladry, e.g.: "He hadna gane a step, a step, / A step but barely ane . . ."

T

TACHTIGERS ('80ers, the generation of the 1880's). A group of young Dutch poets and prose writers who, in the last two decades of the 19th c., revived their country's literature from a lethargy of almost 200 years and restored it to a respectable position in European letters. In reaction against the then dominant sentimentalism, didacticism, and domesticity of Dutch poetry, the poets Kloos, Verwey, and van Eeden organized De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), a publication in which their doctrines of individualism, aestheticism, and realism were preached by precept and example. In addition to the Nieuwe Gids group, which also included the poet Herman Gorter, the short-lived Jacques Perk (1859-81) deserves mention as a Tachtiger. The T. were sensitive to a variety of foreign influences, chiefly Eng. romanticism, contemporary Fr. symbolism and naturalism, and the German Kunst für die Kunst movement. The very diversity of Tachtiger ideals prophesied the instability of any formal school of T.; the major figures of the movement developed in different directions after 1890. But their metrical and lexical innovations and, even more important, their example of artistic dedication assured the vitality

(The Ballad of Sir Patrick Spens) and in folk songs.

A.M.C.

SYSTEM (Gr. systema). In Gr. metric a sequence of cola (see COLON) in the same meter. Hephaestion (2d c. A.D.) in his longer treatise On Meters used this term instead of periodos to describe a metrical "period" of several cola. —Kolář; Koster.

R.J.G.

SYZYGY (also phonetic syzygy). A term from classical prosody used to describe the combining of two feet into a single metrical unit. Phonetic s. is a term apparently originated by Sylvester and adopted by Lanier and others to describe consonant sound patterns and repetitions not covered by the term "alliteration" (q.v.). It has been objected to by Saintsbury and other critics as unnecessary, obscure, and confusing. Such terms as "mosaic alliteration" and "colliteration," among others, have been advanced as names for the same phenomenon. See also SOUND IN POETRY.—J. J. Sylvester, Laws of Verse (1870); S. Lanier, The Science of Eng. Verse (1880); G. Saintsbury, A Historical Manual of Eng. Prosody (1910); K. Burke, The Philos. of Lit. Form (1941), pp. 369-78.

R.B.E.

of 20th-c. Dutch verse. See also DUTCH POETRY.—F. Coenen, Studiën van de Tachtiger Beweging (1924); A. Donker, De episode van de vernieuwing onzer poëzie (1929); G. Stuijveling, Versbouw en ritme in de tijd van '80 (1934); G. Colmjon, De oorsprong van de renaissance der litteratuur in Nederland in het laatste kwart der negentiende eeuw (1947).

F.J.W.

TAGELIED ("Dawn Song"). A type of medieval German love lyric, analogous to and derived from the alba (q.v.) of the troubadours. The type first appears in a poem by Dietmar von Aist (fl. 1140-70), the earliest minnesinger who seems to have an acquaintance with troubadour lyrics. But neither Dietmar's poem nor Heinrich von Morungen's so-called T. are typical of the genre; the T. is best represented by and receives its highest development at the hands of Wolfram von Eschenbach. Wolfram introduced the Prov. figure of the watchman who warns the lovers of the coming of dawn, when they must part, and he gives depth and dramatic force to his poems. Later writers of the T. include Hadlaub and Oswald von Wolkenstein. Parodies of the type also occur in the late Middle Ages, e.g., Steinmar's Lied 8.

TAIL-RHYME

According to de Boor and other scholars, the T. made its way into bourgeois-social lyrical poetry (Gesellschaftslied, q.v.), turned into the folk song, and—by way of conscious elevation to a spiritual level—took on the form of the religious song of admonition or reveille. However, a sort of later revival of the T., in a dramatic context, can be seen in the parting scenes in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet (3.5) and in Wagner's Tristan und Isolde (Act 2).—F. Nicklas, Untersuchung über Stil und Gesch. des deutschen Tageliedes (1929); Texte zur Gesch. des dt. Tageliedes, comp. E. Scheunemann und F. Ranke (1947); H. de Boor and R. Newald, Gesch. der dt. Lit. von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart, II (3d ed., 1957), III, pt. I (1962); A. T. Hatto, "Das T. in der Weltlit.," DVLG, 36 (1962); Eos, ed. A. T. Hatto (1965; a monumental coll.). A.P.

TAIL-RHYME (or tailed rhyme or, rarely, caudate rhyme) is the modern Eng. rendering of ME rime couwee, from Fr. rime couée, which in turn is from medieval L. rhythmus caudatus or versus caudati (cf. G. Schweifreim). The phrase designates a group of lines consisting of (a) a couplet, triplet, or stanza and (b) a following tail or additional shorter line. It could be applied to any such group; but it is generally reserved for a schematic recurrence. The tail may rhyme to a line in the couplet, triplet, or stanza, or to another shorter line after another couplet, triplet, or stanza; or it may be unrhymed to anything; or it may be a refrain, in the same formula throughout (as in Longfellow's Excelsior or Tennyson's Ask me no more) or in a varying formula (as in Burns's Holy Fair, "Fu' sweet that day," "Wi' fright that day," etc.). The most typical tail-rhyme is the romance-six, common in medieval romances and familiar from Chaucer's parody thereof, The Rime of Sir Thopas. Its scheme is 8,8,6,8,8,6 syllables, rhyming aabaab. Whittier in Barclay of Ury and O. W. Holmes in The Last Leaf keep the rhyme arrangement but reduce the syllables to 7,7,6,7,7,6 and 6,6,3,6,6,3 respectively. A similar grouping is Drayton's stanza in The Ballad of Agincourt, 6,6,6,5,6,6,6,5, rhyming aaabcccb. Many other arrangements of longer and shorter lines exhibit the phenomenon of tailing.—Schipper; Ker; A. McI. Trounce, "The Eng. Tail-Rhyme Romances," Medium Aevum, 1-3 (1932-34).

A.M.C.

TAMIL POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

TANKA (also called waka or uta). This Japanese lyric form of 31 syllables in lines of 5,7,5,7,7 syllables originated ca. 7th c. A.D., has continued to the present, and may be called the classic Japanese poetic form. Identified for centuries with the court, its diction has been traditional and elevated, and its subjects most often nature, love, laments, or such occasions as travel and felicitations.

The influence of tanka upon modern Western poetry has been vaguer and less extensive than that of haiku (q.v.) and is, therefore, more difficult to assess. The principal obstacles to fruitful understanding of t. have been ignorance—of its language, tradition, and techniques—and the fact that until recently the form has usually been viewed in terms of the exotic and poor translations of one anthology, the Hyakunin Isshu (One Poem from Each of a Hundred Poets). The exotic concept of t. merged with the impressionist view of the color print to represent Japanese poetry in terms of delicate, sensitive, coloristic, amoral, and (in theory at least) precise images. Although t. tends to treat separately its different subjects, Western conceptions and imitations of it usually merged nature, love, and the tone of the laments, in techniques borrowed from haiku.

This confusion of genres, in a haze of exoticism, often makes it difficult to distinguish the influence of one form from that of the other. This is particularly true of early Fr. interest (ca. 1905-10) and early Anglo-Am. interest (ca. 1910-15). Although none of our major poets has benefited materially from t., a few lesser figures have imitated it or translated translations (e.g., Amy Lowell, Ernest Fenollosa) or devised poetic forms on tanka lines (e.g., Adelaide Crapsey). As a model for experiment, t. was imitated by the imagists and some of their predecessors in France and England, but with less enthusiasm or profit than haiku.

Western estimation of t. probably has suffered from 19th-20th c. Japanese primitivizing of their own culture, a process which has led to a condemnation of the Court tradition of t. and to praise of the imagined greater "sincerity" of haiku. This attitude tended to keep certain of the most influential earlier translators and commentators from tanka; and although excellent Fr., Am., and German translations of this form in recent years have somewhat tempered exoticism and moderated attitudes toward these two genres, t. has not yet become as fruitful a source of poetic theory and technique as haiku and nō (q.v.). See also JAPANESE POETRY.—H. L. Seaver, "The Asian Lyric and Eng. Lit.," Essays in Honor of Barrett Wendell (1926); W. L. Schwartz, The Imaginative Interpretation of the Far East in Modern Fr. Lit. 1800-1925 (1927); E. V. Gatenby, "The Influence of Japan on Eng. Lang. and Lit.," Japan Society (London), Trans. and Proceed., 34 (1936-37); E. Miner, The Japanese Tradition in British and Am.

Lit. (1958); R. H. Brower and E. Miner, Japanese Court Poetry (1961). E.M.

TAPINOSIS (Gr. "lowering"). Abasement, diminution or deflation of something by means of degrading terms, calling someone bad names. It should not be confused with meiosis (q.v.), which means, literally, belittling and is allied with amplification. While t. is most prominent in comedy, satire, and vituperation, and in modern writing is more common in prose than in verse, it has been pointed out in a wide variety of compositions. Quintilian (8.3.48) cited the misguided tragic poet who spoke of a "stony wart on the brow of the mountain" ("saxea est verruca in summo montis vertice"). Servius called Virgil's "in gurgite vasto" (Aeneid 1.118) a t. because the poet referred to the great sea as a "gulf" (gurgis). T. has been extended to include violations of decorum: Cicero's illustration in Orator 21 of discussing cases of roof-drainage in the grand style and then using beggarly language in speaking of the majesty of the Roman people; Horace's illustration in Ars Poetica 1 of the painter who joins a human head to the neck of a horse. The clearest examples, however, are familiar, vulgar terms used in place of polite terms. Puttenham, in the Arte of Eng. Poesie, used the example of the man who said to Queen Elizabeth's coachman, "Stay thy cart, good fellow, stay thy cart, that I may speak to the Queen." The exchanges of abuse between Thersites and his fellow soldiers in Troilus and Cressida, similar exchanges between Falstaff and his friends, and Petruchio's abuse of the tailor in The Taming of the Shrew 4.3.107-12 are obvious examples. Petruchio says: "Thou liest, thou thread, / Thou thimble, / Thou yard, three-quarters, half-yard, quarter, nail! / Thou flea, thou nit, thou winter-cricket, thou! / Braved in mine own house with a skein of thread! / Away! thou rag, thou quantity, thou remnant!" M.T.H.

TASTE. The term "t." used in an aesthetic context, commonly refers (1) to a person's capacity to respond to aesthetic objects or (2) to the preferences that result from an exercise of this capacity. The capacity or the preferences may be treated factually: we have histories that describe national tastes or try to account for changes in taste from epoch to epoch; we have psychological studies of the nature of the capacity and sociological studies of the genetic, cultural, economic, and other conditioning factors that determine the aesthetic preferences of individuals or groups. However, in aesthetic theory, the term "t." frequently takes on normative overtones; it becomes synonymous with "good t." or "correct t." Thus, "He is a man of t." may mean "He is a person with the capacity for appreciating the truly excellent in art." Since theories differ as to the nature of the aesthetic experience, its value, and the kinds of reasons that justify aesthetic value judgments, the nature of the capacity to be possessed by the man of t. will inevitably differ from theory to theory. If the theory demands a precise adjustment of sound to sense, the man of t. must be one who can perceive and enjoy such an adjustment even to its finest shades. If the theory demands that a poem should have a desirable moral effect on a reader, the man of t. must be an expert judge of the quality of the message and of the power of the poem to convey this message. If the theory demands that poetry incorporate structures symbolic of archetypes in the subconscious, the man of t. must be one who is sensitive to the subconscious reverberations that such images produce.

Historically, the term "t." has been most closely associated with aesthetic theories that define their subject matter as the investigation of such qualities as beauty and sublimity, whether found in nature or the fine arts, and of the "aesthetic" responses that these qualities arouse. According to Spingarn, "t." first became an important term in European criticism in the late 17th c. Some critics, in reaction to the authority of neoclassic rules, interpreted t. as a special faculty of the mind that spontaneously and instinctively responds to aesthetic objects. Its relations, they said, are with "sentiment" or the "heart" rather than with the reason. The rules, the product of reason, hamper rather than encourage the production of certain types of valuable aesthetic effects; and the ability of an artist to create and a man of t. to perceive "the grace beyond the reach of art" (the je ne sais quoi, q.v.) was enthusiastically praised. It is the position of the "School of T." (Spingarn's term) that Reynolds had in mind when, in 1776, he said, "To speak of genius and t., as in any way connected with reason or common sense, would be, in the opinion of some towering talkers, to speak like a man who possessed neither; who had never felt that enthusiasm, or, to use their own inflated language, was never warmed by that Promethean fire which animates the canvas and vivifies the marble" (Discourses on Art, vii).

The School of T. had popularized the term "t.," and during the 18th c. a considerable amount of aesthetic discussion revolved around the term. In 1712 Addison, in his Spectator papers on t. and on the pleasures of the imagination (nos. 409, 411-421), formulated the main topics for this discussion. In these papers, he defines t. as "that faculty of the soul which discerns the beauties of an author with pleasure, and the imperfections with dislike." He points out that the term is a metaphor, found in most languages, based on a likeness of "mental t." to the "sensitive t. which gives us a relish of every different flavor that affects the palate." The chief signs of a well-developed state of this faculty are an ability to discriminate differences and to take pleasure in excellencies. Though t. is a natural faculty, it can be improved by reading the authors whose works have stood the test of time, by conversation with men of refined t., and by a familiarity with the views of the best ancient and modern critics. The critic whom Addison singles out for particular praise is "Longinus." "Longinus" is almost the only critic who has described a class of excellencies that are "more essential to the art" than the excellencies produced by adherence to "mechanical rules which a man of very little t. may discourse upon." The excellencies that Addison is particularly interested in are aesthetic qualities, which, in his papers on the pleasures of the imagination, he enumerates as novelty, beauty, and grandeur (sublimity).

An important line of 18th-c. critics (the chief of whom were Hutcheson, Hume, Gerard, Burke, Kames, Blair, Reynolds, and Alison) explored in detail this new approach to aesthetic problems. All of these critics were concerned, at least in part, with aesthetic qualities (to those listed by Addison a number of others were added, e.g., the picturesque, the witty, the humorous, the pathetic) and the nature of the faculty (t.) that perceives and enjoys them. Some of the questions concerning t. that these critics tried to answer were the following: Is t. a natural or acquired faculty? What is its relation to genius? Is it an independent faculty, a special internal sense, or is it derivative from man's other faculties? Is it a single faculty or a combination of simpler faculties? What is the relation of t. to reason, emotion, and morality? What is the relation of t. to the rules? To what extent can t. be changed or corrected and by what methods? Is there a standard that determines the correctness of t.? If there is such a standard, how can it be validated? How are divergencies in t. to be explained?

Eng. and Fr. 18th-c. critics, most of whom were empiricists, gave a bewildering variety of answers to these questions. The variety became even more bewildering when German transcendental philosophers and their followers in other countries began to speculate on beauty, sublimity, and other aesthetic qualities. The complex meaning of Kant's explanation of beauty ("purposiveness without a purpose") or Hegel's ("the sensuous appearance of the Idea") can be understood only in the light of each philosopher's transcendental assumptions. The transcendentalists also discovered faculties in the human mind undreamed of in empirical philosophy, and t. achieved a dignity that it never had before. For example, Coleridge, echoing Kant, defines "t." as "the intermediate faculty which connects the active with the passive powers of our nature, the intellect with the senses; and its appointed function is to elevate the images of the latter, while it realizes the ideas of the former"; t. is "a sense and a regulative principle, which may indeed be stifled and latent in some, and be perverted and denaturalized in others, yet is nevertheless universal in a given state of intellectual and moral culture; which is independent of local and temporary circumstances, and dependent only on the degree in which the faculties of the mind are developed" ("On the Principles of Genial Criticism," 1814).

T. remained an important concept for later beauty theorists, particularly for those who, like Poe and Pater, defended an "art for art's sake" position. Today, there are signs that this great tradition in aesthetics is coming to an end. Toward the end of the 19th c., Tolstoi severely attacked the philosophies of beauty and t. that had dominated 18th- and 19th-c. aesthetics. More recently, I. A. Richards has rejected the "phantom aesthetic state" (Principles of Literary Criticism, 1924, chap. II). And T. Munro describes the contemporary situation as follows: "Aesthetics was formerly regarded as 'the philosophy of beauty,' a subject devoted largely to explaining the nature of beauty and ugliness, with a few related ideas such as 'good taste' and 'the sublime.' These words occur much less often in contemporary discussion. There is no other small set of concepts to take their place, but a much wider range, to cope with the diverse phenomena of art and behavior toward art. . . . The psychology of art . . . is no longer limited to 'the sense of beauty,' 'good taste,' and the 'aesthetic attitude' in a narrow sense. . . . It studies a great variety of responses to art, of ways of experiencing and using it, all of which are in a broad sense aesthetic phenomena" (Toward Science in Aesthetics, 1956, p. 97; see also pp. 154-55). This new orientation, explicitly pluralistic, together with increased knowledge about the operations of the mind, has led to an abandonment or reformulation of the 18th-c. questions about t.

Throughout the history of criticism, a perennial problem has been the relation of t. (in the sense of preference or liking) to evaluation (q.v.). It is proverbial that there is no disputing about tastes ("de gustibus non est disputandum"); but the extreme position "I like this; therefore it is good" (where "I" may refer to any speaker) has seldom been defended by theoretical critics. Bentham (in The Rationale of Reward, 1825, Bk. III, chap. 1) argues that reading poetry may be for some people a less pleasurable and thus a less valuable activity than playing push-pin. Therefore, "it is only from custom and prejudice that, in matters of t., we speak of false and true." Indeed, critics like Addison, under the "pretense of purifying the public t.," have deprived "mankind of a larger or smaller part of the sources of their amusement." But then Bentham quickly adds that it is not only legitimate but necessary to speak of good and bad t. when the instrumental values of a preferred activity are included in the evaluation. Explicitly or implicitly, most theorists have placed evaluation above t. (whether the evaluative judgment is determined by the degree to which an artistic work conforms to theoretical principles or by the response of the cultivated mind of a man of good t.). They have not hesitated to call actual tastes good or bad when judged by the standards defended in their theories, nor have they hesitated to recommend that a person should make his tastes conform to what he ought to like. Thus Arnold, as part of his plea for the development of a "conscience" in intellectual and aesthetic matters, quotes Sainte-Beuve approvingly: "In France . . . the first consideration for us is not whether we are amused and pleased by a work of art or mind, nor is it whether we are touched by it. What we seek above all to learn is, whether we were right in being amused with it, and in applauding it, and in being moved by it" ("The Literary Influence of Academies," Essays in Criticism, 1865). Most theorists agree with Arnold and Sainte-Beuve. But literature has many values, and different species of literature have different values. As long as each theorist insists on building a system that prescribes a class of values that literature ought to have and excludes all of its other possible values, a universally acceptable definition of "good t." cannot be formulated.

J. E. Spingarn, Crit. Essays of the 17th C. (1908); B. Croce, Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (1909, best ed. 1922); I. Kant, Critique of Aesthetic Judgment, tr. J. C. Meredith (1911); A.F.B. Clark, Boileau and the Fr. Classical Critics in England, 1660-1830 (1925); F. P. Chambers, Cycles of T. (1928) and The History of T. (1932); E. E. Kellett, The Whirligig of T. (1929) and Fashion in Lit. (1931); E. N. Hooker, "The Discussion of T., from 1750 to 1770, and the New Trend in Lit. Crit.," PMLA, 49 (1934); L. Venturi, Hist. of Art Crit., tr. C. Marriott (1936); J. Steegmann, The Rule of T. (1936); J. Evans, T. and Temperament (1939); B. Heyl, "T.," in Shipley; H. H. Creed, "Coleridge on 'T.,'" ELH, 13 (1946); G. Boas, Wingless Pegasus (1950); F. L. Lucas, Lit. and Psychology, especially chap. xi "The Relativity of T.," (1951); H. A. Needham, T. and Crit. in the 18th C. (1952); A. Bosker, Lit. Crit. in the Age of Johnson (2d ed. rev., 1953); W. J. Hipple, The Beautiful, the Sublime and the Picturesque in 18th-C. British Aesthetic Theory (1957); B. Markwardt, "Geschmack," Reallexikon, 2d ed., I (includes extended bibliog.); B. Jessup, "T. and Judgment in Aesthetic Experience," JAAC, 19 (1960). F.G.

TECHNICAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

TELESILLEUM. An acephalous glyconic (— — — — —), named after Telesilla, a poetess of Argos of the early 5th c. B.C. Like the Reizianum (q.v.), it occurs in Pindar and Gr. drama. A hymn to the Great Mother of the gods, written entirely in this meter and dating from the 2d c. A.D., was discovered in an inscription from Epidauros.—J. U. Powell, New Chapters in the Hist. of Gr. Lit. (3d ser., 1932); P. Maas, Epidaurische Hymnen (1933); Dale; Koster. P.S.C.

TELESTICH. See ACROSTIC.

TELIAMBOS. See MEIURUS.

TELUGU POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

TENOR AND VEHICLE. Because he was dissatisfied with the traditional account of metaphor in what he conceived of as a too exclusively grammatical and rhetorical manner, I. A. Richards coined this pair of terms to improve upon the old theory of metaphor by introducing the notion of "a borrowing between and intercourse of thoughts." Since any metaphor, at its simplest, gives us two ideas, he used "t." to mean purport or general drift of thought regarding the subject of the metaphor, and "v." to mean that which serves to carry or embody the t. as the analogy brought to the subject. Although this was by no means the first modern attempt to analyze the fundamental duality of metaphor—previous writers had already distinguished between "major term" and "minor term," or "thing meant" and "thing said," or "meaning" and "picture," and so on—Richards' distinction and the terms he introduced have gained wide currency among modern critics.

Having traced out t. and v. as the essential ingredients of metaphor, Richards (and the critics who followed him) went on to distinguish between the poetic metaphor and other kinds. In attempting to show that the truly poetic metaphor is never merely decorative or logical or explanatory or illustrative, he claimed that the "transaction" which it sets up between t. and v. "results in a meaning (to be clearly distinguished from the t.) which is not attainable without their interaction." The v., he continued, "is not normally mere embellishment of a tenor which is otherwise unchanged by it but . . . vehicle and tenor in cooperation give a meaning of more varied powers than can be ascribed to either."

These peculiar powers of the poetic metaphor he ascribed to the way in which the v. brings with it, by virtue of its being an aspect of human experience outside of or different from the experience portrayed in the poem, a host of implicit associations which, although circumscribed by the t., are never quite shut out entirely. This unsuppressible range of associations closely resembles what John Crowe Ransom has called "irrelevant texture," which he (and many other modern critics) value as the very essence of the poetic art itself. Such terms and the assumptions which give rise to them reveal an approach to poetry which looks for its lines of differentiation in the special qualities of poetic language—richness, ambiguity, irony, paradox, etc.—and which locates the cause of these qualities chiefly in the tension set up in a poetic figure between the t. and the emotional, sensory, and/or conceptual overtones brought into the poem by the v. Such an approach can frequently go beyond simply ascribing emotional and imaginative powers to metaphor and claim for it a special kind of cognitive power as well.

Thus, for example, it has become very common to interpret the well-known "stiff twin compasses" simile in Donne's "Valediction" in terms of a conflict supposedly set up between the warmth and passion binding the souls of the two lovers together (t.) and the rationality and metallic coldness implied by the mechanical compasses (v.). This analysis is seen as revealing the nobility of the speaker's conceptual powers in recognizing the subtle contradictions and complexities of the experience of love, as well as explaining the cause of our pleasure in this poem in terms of the filling in of such connections between t. and v. which our minds are stimulated to do. A less ambitious interpretation, however, would begin by pointing out that the figure is based on the notion of being separate but joined—a notion which the v. exemplifies and which the speaker is using as part of the argument he is fashioning to console his lady regarding their impending separation (t.). See IMAGERY, METAPHOR.—H. W. Wells, Poetic Imagery (1924); K. Burke, "Perspective as Metaphor," Permanence and Change (1935); W. B. Stanford, Gr. Metaphor (1936); I. A. Richards, The Philos. of Rhetoric (1936); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939), pp. 1-17; J. C. Ransom, Poems and Essays (1955), pp. 159-85. N.FRIE.

TENSION. The concept of t. in imaginative literature, although not always the term itself, is found at many points in modern criticism and aesthetic theory. This, for example, is a statement by John Dewey: "Without internal tension there would be a fluid rush to a straightway mark; there would be nothing that could be called development and fulfillment. The existence of resistance defines the place of intelligence in the production of an object." A further example is this comment on the poet's imagination by T. E. Hulme: "A powerful imaginative mind seizes and combines at the same instant all the important ideas of its poem or picture, and while it works with one of them, it is at the same instant working with and modifying all in their relation to it and never losing sight of their bearings on each other—as the motion of a snake's belly goes through all parts at once and its volition acts at the same instant in coils which go contrary ways." Comparable views are to be found in Coleridge's Biographia Literaria and in Henry James's "The Art of Fiction." The concept of t. is related to the organic theory of poetry and fiction, especially to the part of the theory that emphasizes the place of mind and intelligence in imaginative literature. It is also related to Richards' doctrine of synthesis, the reconciling of inharmonious elements, and to Brooks's doctrine of irony (q.v.). The criticism preoccupied with or aware of t. in imaginative literature tries to define the relationship between intelligence and medium, to demonstrate and to evaluate the ways in which an idea is reconciled with another idea and the appropriateness with which all of it is expressed in its medium.

Allen Tate, in "Tension in Poetry," has given a somewhat special meaning to the term, which he derives by "lopping the prefixes off the logical extension and intension. . . ." He says that "the remotest figurative significance that we can derive does not invalidate the extensions of the literal statement. Or we may begin with the literal statement and by stages develop the complications of metaphor: at every stage we may pause to state the meaning so far apprehended, and at every stage the meaning will be coherent." Tate looks, for example, at The Vine by James Thomson:

The wine of love is music,
And the feast of love is song:
And when love sits down to the banquet,
Love sits long:

Sits long and ariseth drunken,
But not with the feast and the wine,
He reeleth with his own heart,
That great rich Vine.

"The language here appeals to an existing affective state; it has no coherent meaning either literally or in terms of ambiguity or implication; it may be wholly replaced by one of its several paraphrases, which are already latent in our mind." It is apparent, for example, that music might more appropriately be the feast of love, and song the wine of love. The imagery of the opening stanza bears little or no relationship to the self-intoxication of love, nor does there seem to be any appropriate relationship between love conceived as drunkard and one's ordinary reverence for love. In other words, the poem is one that cannot stand very much contemplation.

R. P. Warren has further complicated the concept of t. by discussing "pure" and "impure" poetry, asking whether certain things have to be left out of poetry if it is to be pure and other things put in. Warren says that if we added up the things that certain critics would leave out as unpoetic we would have "a list like this: 1. ideas, truths, generalizations, 'meaning.' 2. precise, complicated, 'intellectual' images. 3. unbeautiful, disagreeable, or neutral materials. 4. situation, narrative, logical transition. 5. realistic details, exact descriptions, realism in general. 6. shifts in tone or mood. 7. irony. 8. metrical variation, dramatic adaptations of rhythms, cacophony, etc. 9. meter itself. 10. subjective and personal elements. No one theory of pure poetry excludes all of these items, and, as a matter of fact, the items listed are not on the same level of importance." Warren's position is that nothing human should be legislated out of a poem, not even a chemical formula if the formula is made to function properly in its context. He says that, "other things being equal, the greatness of a poet depends upon the extent of the area of experience which he can master poetically." Warren also uses a memorable phrase, "coming to terms with Mercutio," by which he means that a piece of fiction or a poem makes a proposition, and having made it should come to terms with opposing propositions. For example, the intensely romantic love of Romeo and Juliet is subjected to the ironic barbs of Mercutio and to the basic cynicism of the Nurse. If the poet's "proposition" is justifiable it can withstand the ridicule.

This theory of literature implies a preference for the dramatic play of ideas as against the pageant, the loosely strung narrative, or the simple lyric cry. It would prefer, for example, Yeats's "We had fed the heart on fantasies, / The heart's grown brutal from the fare" to Whitman's "The blab of the pave, tires of carts, sluff of boot-soles, talk of the promenaders, / The heavy omnibus, the driver with his interrogating thumb, the clank of the shod horses on the granite floor, / The snow-sleighs, clinking, shouted jokes, pelts of snow-balls, / The hurrahs for popular favorites, the fury of roused mobs, / The flab of the curtain'd litter, a sick man inside borne to the hospital." In Yeats's lines there is a suggestion of the paradoxical, of idea that promises insight and understanding. Pushed far enough, Yeats's lines imply a subtle philosophical position. Whitman's lines, on the other hand, give the texture of the world, and, by implication, ask for, without arguing toward, a simple optimism. There are, of course, degrees in such a matter, but perhaps one can say that those by whom the theory of t. is held most dearly and closely would prefer The Tempest to A Midsummer Night's Dream and Light in August to "The Bear." It does not follow that they would find either A Midsummer Night's Dream or "The Bear" to have little or no merit.—Richards, Principles; A. Tate, "T. in Poetry," Reason in Madness (1941); R. P. Warren, "Pure and Impure Poetry," KR, 5 (1943); W. Van O'Connor, "T. and Structure in Poetry," SR, 51 (1943); Wimsatt and Brooks; W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "Poetic T.: A Summary," New Scholasticism, 32 (1958).

v.v.o'c.

TENSO(N). Prov. (Fr. tençon). See TENZONE.

TENZONE (from tenson, tençon). An amoebean type of poetic composition which matured in Provence early in the 12th c. It consists of a verbal exchange largely in the form of invective expressed through the medium of sirventes or coblas (qq.v.). The earliest example seems to be by Cercamon and Guilhelmi. Later it developed into the partimen (q.v.) or joc partit, an exchange minus the personal element, and was applied to moral, literary or political problems. In many cases the subject matter is imaginary, and often the original argument and the exchange are by the same person. The wandering troubadours carried the device into Italy where we find Lanza Marques and Alberto Malaspina making use of it in Prov. compositions. In Sicily the feigned tenzone in canzone-form called contrasto was quite popular. Giacomo da Lentino and Jacopo Mostacci, however, were among those who indulged in personal tenzoni, for which they utilized the sonnet (q.v.), thus setting the t. pattern adopted by later Italians. In Tuscany the example of Guittone d'Arezzo was extremely influential in making it common among the guittonian and the poets of the dolce stil nuovo (q.v.), including Dante.—H. Stiefel, Die italienische T. des XII Jhdts. und ihr Verhältnis zur provenzalischen T. (1914); Jeanroy; D. J. Jones, La Tenson prov. (1934).
J.G.F.

TERCET. See TRIPLET.

TERZA RIMA. A verse form composed of iambic tercets rhyming aba bcb, etc., the second line of the first tercet supplying the rhyme for the second tercet, the second line of the second tercet supplying the rhyme for the third, and so on, thus giving an effect of linkage to the entire composition. In t.r., the conclusion of a formal unit is generally signified by the occurrence of a single line which completes the rhyme structure by rhyming with the middle line of the preceding tercet, thus: xyx y.

T.r. was invented by Dante as an appropriate form for his Divina Commedia; the symbolic reference to the Holy Trinity is obvious. Furthermore, the intricate harmony which Dante achieves through his mastery of the form gives to the poem a structure at once massive and subtle, a structure which can only be suggested by any passage taken out of context. Most probably, Dante developed t.r. from the tercets of the servantes (q.v.) but, whatever the origins of the form, it found immediate popularity with Boccaccio, who used it in his Amorosa Visione, and Petrarch, who used it in his I Trionfi. The implicit difficulty of the form, however, discouraged its widespread use after the 14th c., although Monti in the late 18th and Foscolo in the early 19th wrote noteworthy poems in t.r.

The form makes even greater demands on poets who write in a language less rich in rhymes than It. T.r. was introduced into Eng. by Chaucer in his Complaint to his Lady and was used by Wyatt and by Daniel. Some of the Eng. romantics experimented with the form, Byron in The Prophecy of Dante and Shelley in Prince Athanase and The Triumph of Life. The latter poet's Ode to the West Wind is composed of five sections, each rhyming ababcbdc ded ee. In the 20th c. the form has been used, among others, by W. H. Auden (The Sea and the Mirror) and, with marked variations, by MacLeish (Conquistador). European poets of the 19th and 20th c. who employed t.r. include the Dutch Potgieter and van Eeden and the German A. W. Schlegel, Chamisso, Lilien-cron, Heyse, and von Hofmannsthal.—Schip-per; Hamer; Th. Spoerri, "Wie Dantes Vers entstand," Vox romanica, 2 (1937); V. Perni-cone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," in Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di letteratura italiana, ed. A. Momigliano, II (1948); Wilkins.

TERZA RIMA SONNET. A term sometimes used to describe a quatorzain whose rhyme scheme makes use of the interweaving characteristic of terza rima (ababcbdc, etc.). Thus a pattern ababcbdc ded ee (the form of each section of Shelley's Ode to the West Wind, it may be noted) is not unlike the development of the Spenserian sonnet with its couplet ending; but there is an excess of interweaving for so short a poem, and a theoretical demand for a five-part division instead of the normally expected four. Moreover, the principal charm of the t.r.—its cumulative melody—is lost in so short a passage. It is, however, of interest to note that the Sicilian sonnet has been suggested as the source of the t.r. as such. L.J.Z.

TETRALOGY. A set of four plays, three tragedies and a satyr play (so-called because the chorus were dressed as satyrs), dealing with the same subject matter and treating of various aspects of the same legend. This custom of dramatic presentations, which is believed to have begun with Aeschylus, was discontinued by later playwrights. In modern usage, the term is applied to a group of four connected works, e.g., dramas and operas. See TRILOGY. P.S.C.

TETRAMETER (Gr. "of 4 measures"). A line consisting of 4 measures. In classical iambic (—), trochaic (—), and anapaestic (—) verse the measure is a dipody (pair of feet). There are four classical types: iambic t. acatalectic and trochaic t. acatalectic (8 feet, 16 syllables each; see OCTONARIUS) and iambic t. catalectic and trochaic t. catalectic (7 feet, 15 syllables each; see SEPTENARIUS). A spondee (—) was allowed in the odd iambic and the even trochaic feet. Resolution of a long into 2 shorts was allowed in certain circumstances. A break (diaeresis) was compulsory after the second dipody. The catalectic types are the commoner. The iambic t. catalectic was common in L. comedy; indeed it had rather vulgar associations. The trochaic t. catalectic is one of the oldest and most popular of meters; it was used in drama for excited dialogue, and it was the rhythm of the Roman soldiers' marching-songs and of some of the most famous Christian hymns, e.g., pānge, līnguā, glōriōsi proeliū. cērtāminīs

Eng. t. (a line of 4 feet; strictly speaking the term is incorrectly used for the Eng. 4-stress line) is less strict than the classical varieties. Usually it is iambic or trochaic, or both, with accentual feet. It was used by Milton (L'Allegro, Il Penseroso) and many others, and conspicuously by Scott and Byron in long narratives.—Hardie; Beare. W.B.

TÉTRAMÈTRE. Term applied to the 12-syllable Fr. classical alexandrine (q.v.), which has 4 divisions to the line, as distinguished from the 12-syllable vers romantique or trimètre (q.v.), which has only 3. The tétramètre (unlike the vers romantique) has a caesural pause after the sixth syllable. Racine's Phèdre (1.3.306) affords a famous example: "C'est Vénus | tout entière || à sa proie | attachée."

TEXTUAL CRITICISM

The Fr. t., whose roots go back at least to Le pèlerinage de Charlemagne (12th c.), was shaped in the classical age by the firm rules of Malherbe into the form championed by Boileau and brought to perfection in the tragedies of Corneille and Racine.—M. Grammont, Le vers français (1913) and Petit traité de versification française (5^e éd. revue, 1924); G. Lote, Hist. du vers fr., II (1951) A.G.E.

TETRAPODY (Gr. "4 feet"). A group or line of 4 feet. The most common tetrapodies in Gr. dramatic poetry are the anapaestic, logaoedic, dactylic and the dactylic myuric.—Koster. TETRASTICH. A group, stanza or poem of 4 lines. A quatrain (q.v.). P.S.C.

TEXTUAL CRITICISM is the analysis of the existing forms or states of a text to determine the nature of the form or state from which they are all descended, and the emendation of the state so determined to remove as far as possible any errors it contains. It is sometimes called lower criticism to distinguish it from higher criticism, which is the analysis of the text provided by lower criticism to determine its unity or diversity of date and authorship. Textual c. may sometimes draw conclusions from information provided by explication (q.v.), but in general the relationship is reversed. It finds its chief justification as a discipline ancillary to literary history and criticism, but it has its own attractiveness as a rational exercise.

The boundary between lower and higher c. is not rigidly determined, each critic making his own decision as to how far he will carry the process of emendation. In the biblical poem of Job, for instance, many critics are convinced that the division of the speeches between Job and his three friends has been corrupted, but only a few (e.g. Moulton, Bates) have produced texts in which they set forth the speeches as they conceive the author intended. Within lower c., too, are shifting boundaries. Some critics prefer not to emend at all; others do nothing else. A text that has not been emended is an antiquarian text. One that has been produced by combining the best parts of the various states in which the text has been preserved (which is in practice nothing but emending one state on the basis of the others) is an eclectic text. A text that has been produced by the processes envisioned in the definition of textual c. given above is a critical text.

The process of producing an eclectic text of a poem is seldom employed unless the evidence as to which state is the ancestor of the others is badly confused or any connection at all between the states seems doubtful—and then the critic feels on the defensive. The work of

Wolf and Leishman illustrates careful use of the method (see bibliography; the poems in question were evidently transmitted by word of mouth before finding their way into commonplace books and into print). Kane's edition of Piers Plowman: The A Version is a major recent example.

Experience shows that if there is more than one manuscript of a poem of moderate length, each manuscript will differ from the rest. If the poem is printed, each setting of type is almost certain to differ from the rest, even with careful proofreading, and early books preserved in only a few copies may differ in every copy because of the old practice of starting to print before the completion of proofreading, the press being stopped as necessary to make corrections. Some critics are willing to assume that an extant manuscript or typesetting is an exact transcript of an earlier lost form of the text; others hold that experience prevents such an assumption.

Faced with a poem that has come down to him in more than one state, the critic asks himself how the states came to agree and how they came to differ. He reasons that some likenesses result from the desire of the copyists to transmit the text as they received it, and some differences from the failure of the copyists to accomplish their intention. He recognizes that some likenesses may result from the correction of errors recognized as such by editors, and some differences from tendentious alterations by editors; further, that some differences may result from the author's revisions, and some likeness from the author's giving up revisions in favor of his first thoughts. And he accepts the possibility that some likenesses result from chance. Experience suggests to him that on the whole it is more likely that copying has caused both likenesses and differences, and he guides himself accordingly.

A critic who follows the method introduced by Karl Lachmann first discards all states that he is satisfied descend from any other extant state. He accepts the rest as descended from one or more nonextant states. Acting on the principle that agreements in the text imply identity of source, he groups together in families those states that commonly agree together. If, as often happens, the states do not fall into clearly defined groups, he groups them on the basis of common errors, or, failing these, of striking likenesses, or, failing even these, on what seem to him the probabilities (see for example, Grierson, Gardner, and Redpath on the grouping of manuscripts in their editions of Donne). Some critics, however, maintain that looking for common errors is the basic step. Sometimes the critic may conclude that a state has two or more distinct ancestries, in other words, that the scribe compared two or more states of the poem instead of merely copying one. Individual judgment, which will rest upon the critic's experience and theories of how men behave or ought to behave, plays a large part in his decisions, and it is not too much to call the division of the states into families an art. The rest of the analysis proceeds according to rule. The critic assigns a nonextant ancestor to each family, and to these ancestors and any states belonging to no family he assigns a further ancestor, the archetype.

Dryden's "Epilogue to The Man of Mode" is found in a printed version, which may be designated A, and three manuscript versions, which may be designated B, C, and D. The date of A only is known exactly, but the others are apparently contemporary with it. None can be shown to descend from any other. Where the versions disagree, we find three agreements each of two against two in the pattern AB:CD and of three against one in the pattern B:ACD; there are four examples of C:ABD, eight of D:ABC, one of A:BC:D and two of AB:C:D. A critic following Lachmann's method will ignore the division of the states shown by AB:CD because of the large preponderance of D:ABC, and will assign an ancestor x to the family ABC, and an archetype y to x and D.

Sir Walter Greg also adopts the principle that agreements in the text imply identity of source, but he assigns an ancestor for each type of agreement. Furthermore, he does not suppose that the immediate ancestor of one family may not be a remoter ancestor of another. Most of Greg's discussion proceeds on the assumption that none of the states is the ancestor of any of the others, but he points out that if any extant state fails to stand alone against agreements in the rest, it is (unless it has a double ancestry) the ancestor of one or more of the rest, and that any state which does stand alone and is consistently superior to the rest is their ancestor, with one or more non-extant descendants between it and the rest. A critic following Greg's method will see eleven possible patterns of ancestors for the "Epilogue": (1) x for A and B, y for x and C, and z for y and D; (2) x for A and B, y for x and D, and z for y and C; (3) x for A and B, and y for x , C, and D; (4) x for A and B, y for C and D, and z for x and y ; (5) x for C and D, and y for x , A, and B; (6) x for C and D, y for x and B, and z for y and A; (7) x for C and D, y for x and A, and z for y and B; (8) x for A and B, y for x and C, and D for y ; (9) x for A and B, y for x and D, and C for y ; (10) x for C and D, y for x and A, and B for y ; (11) x for C and D, y for x and B, and A for y . If some manuscripts are measurably closer than others to what the author intended, then alternate superiority of ABC (i.e. when they agree) over D, and of D over ABC points to (1); of ABD and C to (2); of AB and CD to (4); of A and BCD to (6); and of B and ACD to (7); while consistent superiority of CD over AB points to (3); and of AB over CD to (5), of D to (8), of C to (9), of B to (10), and of A to (11).

Willard Thorp argues for (1); the text in the California Dryden is based on (11); the text in the Oxford Poets Dryden is based on (3).

Archibald A. Hill sometimes understands the evidence provided by the patterns of agreement in a different fashion from Greg. Hill asserts that a reasonable balance of AB:CD and AC:BD indicates that all the states descend independently from the archetype x ; Greg would say that one of the states had two distinct lines of ancestry. Hill maintains that a reasonable balance of AB:C:D and A:B:CD indicates an ancestor x for A and B and another, y , for C and D, one being also the ancestor of the other, i.e., the archetype; Greg would say that any state might be the archetype and the others descended from it in series, provided only that neither A nor B came between C and D and the reverse, and that if all were descendants, any of the first seven patterns above would fit the situation, depending upon the manuscripts' closeness to the author's intentions.

Hill points out that a set of states of a poem may not provide enough evidence to determine a pattern of ancestors exactly, and proposes to decide between the possibilities by weighing the assumptions implied in each. A first assumption, that an archetype exists, he regards as basic, and does not count. A second assumption, that the extant descendants were copied, he counts once for each. A third assumption, that any of these states has a nonexistent ancestor short of the archetype, he counts as a double assumption for each ancestor and as doubling the assumptions to be counted for its immediate descendants. In the patterns of ancestors for Dryden's "Epilogue," therefore, those numbered (1), (2), (6) and (7) above have 11 assumptions each, (3) and (5) have 8, (4) has 12, the rest 10. It will be seen that if the pattern of ancestors includes a nonextant state, Hill's system of weighing assumptions will prevent the choice of an extant state as the archetype. Hill admits the weights are arbitrary, but holds that the results will conform to the facts. But the results are the facts, as determined by the method, so there is no external check. In the case of Dryden's "Epilogue," Hill's method will only reduce the choice to (3) or (5), and if either of them could then be decided on, it could have been decided on without the method. Sometimes, however, the method will at once point to a single possibility.

Dom Henri Quentin's principle is that if one state of a poem agrees now with a second, now with a third, now with both, while they never or almost never agree against it, it is the descendant of one and the ancestor of the other, or it is the ancestor of both, neither being the ancestor of the other, or it is the descendant of both, neither being the descendant of the other (double ancestry); and on the other hand, if the second and third states do fairly regularly agree against the first, then the three have a common intermediary from which they radiate. Unless it is a question of the archetype, the decision as to which state is to stand at the head will depend upon which manuscript is earliest, or where this cannot be determined, upon the closeness of the states to the author's intentions. The archetype will never be an extant state if the earliest extant states radiate, but if one state is always intermediary in its triads, it is the archetype. The method is inconsistent here, and is somewhat more cumbrous than the others because the states are examined three at a time. J. Burke Severs has shown that Quentin's method of dealing with states with double ancestry is unsatisfactory.

With Dryden's "Epilogue," a critic following Quentin's method will test the four triads ABC, ABD, ACD, BCD. Because A almost never stands alone, it will be intermediary in the first three triads. The states in the last triad radiate. It follows that they radiate from A, which is then the archetype. Quentin's method will always reduce the number of nonextant ancestors to a minimum.

Vinton A. Dearing's principle is an inversion and generalization of Quentin's, namely, that if two or more states agree, no other state can come between them if they are in the same line of descent, or between them and their common ancestor if they are in different lines of descent. This way of putting the principle allows the analysis of all the states at once, and at the same time eliminates the need of a special procedure (Greg's "resolution of complex variants," not expounded here) to analyze agreements against diversity or against two or more counteragreements or both. Dearing holds that two states agree against a third not only when they differ from it in the text, but also when they are both earlier than the third, or when one has developed out of the other and the third is not an intermediate stage in the development. He chooses among the alternate patterns of ancestors on the grounds of simplicity, but estimates simplicity differently from Hill: the minimum conditions for transmission of the text are that the archetype have one descendant, itself the ancestor of a single descendant, and so on to the last descendant; and the complications of the simplest arrangement are in order of increasing weight, (1) increasing the number of immediate descendants of an ancestor, (2) introducing nonextant ancestors, and (3) giving a descendant more than one independent ancestor. Dearing weighs both the dates of the manuscripts and the closeness of the states to the author's intentions, maintaining that a good text in a late manuscript is not to be taken as a perfect copy of an earlier manuscript.

The critic who follows Dearing's method will see as the simplest possible patterns of ancestors for Dryden's "Epilogue" those numbered (8) to (11) above, and if it is possible he will chose the best state as the archetype. If, however, the best state is inferior to the others in some way, he will choose between (3) and (5), provided that one archetype is consistently superior to the other states (the readings of an archetype are those of the majority of its immediate descendants, as long as none has a double ancestry). He will choose among the others only as a last resort. If the dates of the manuscripts could be distinguished, this would also affect his choice; that is, if he were to choose from (8) to (11), the archetype would have to be the earliest of the states; if it were not, he would be limited to (1) to (7).

It will be seen that the different methods may lead to different conclusions from the same evidence; and other practicing critics have felt free to employ any amalgamation of methods. The same critic may vary his methods as his views mature. Greg has proposed a concise and clear method of expressing the patterns of difference that may occur in states of a poem, and he, Hill, and Dearing have all developed precise terminologies, but each terminology differs in some respects, and other practicing critics have never felt bound to use any standard language. As a result, close attention and considerable flexibility of mind are necessary to understand any given analysis, and mastery of one does not necessarily lead to easier understanding of another.

Manuscripts and books that are not dated may be given dates on the basis of their physical characteristics as well as by tracing the development of the text they record from one to another. Details of script or type, design, and manufacture change over the years, and once the trends are established from dated examples, undated examples may be fitted in their places. Very old manuscripts may profitably be dated by carbon-14 analysis. Occasionally details of manufacture allow identification of a specific ancestor for a given descendant. Surely the most amusing example of this is in the manuscripts of Propertius, where Laurentianus 36, 49 has for line iv. 8. 3 a blank, followed by "vetus est tutela draconis," with a marginal note, "non potuit legi in exemplari hoc quod deficit"; and Neopolitanus 268 gives the line as "non potuit legi vetus est tutela draconis."

One state may be accepted as representing the author's intentions better than another if where they differ the second state may be shown probably to have developed out of the first, but the first can be shown probably not to have developed out of the second (Dearing lists and gives examples of nonreversible types).

The critic also seeks to identify instances where only the corruption has been preserved, and to restore the original by emendation. The rules for emendation are that the change must be necessary, and that there be only one possible change. Bentley did not observe the first rule in his notorious emendations of Milton (though he thought he was observing it). The second rule is harder, for the passage may cry out for emendation when there is no way to choose among several possibilities, as for instance in the second line of Shakespeare's Sonnet CXLVI, which has lost its first two syllables. In such a case, the critic who sticks to the rule will put an ellipsis in the text, and discuss the possible emendations in his notes, but most critics would probably put one emendation into the text, say "Thrall to," and discuss the rest in the notes. It is only by intuition that many corruptions can be identified, intuition based on a deep feeling for the author being emended and a penetrating understanding of his drift in every passage; and if the critic is to hit upon the necessary corrections, he needs the same qualities, coupled with a thorough knowledge of how and what kinds of errors may creep into a poem.

Similar problems confront the critic faced with a poem revised by the author. Not all the differences between the revised and original versions are authoritative, in all probability, because copying errors are so hard to avoid, and the critic must therefore decide which changes are authoritative, which are not. Greg suggests that here the critic ask himself whether the readings are apparently authoritative; if one is and the other is not, accept the one that is; if both are, accept the later; and if neither are, accept the earlier. The result is to deny to the author any changes that the critic feels are not characteristic of him. Another procedure is to accept the revised text as it stands (only emending any corruptions). Here the result is to deny to the copyist any changes that the critic feels are not characteristic of him. Normally there will be a set of changes that might, as far as the critic can tell, have resulted equally well from the author's revision or from errors in copying, and as we have just said, very likely the set contains some of each kind. Even if it is possible to reach some conclusion as to how many of each kind are in the set, it is still impossible to identify any one as being of one kind or the other; the critic must accept all the doubtful changes or reject them all. Acceptance is usually called conservatism, but rejection is only conservatism in the other direction. At present practicing critics disagree in this, as in every aspect of textual c.

Although no detailed account exists in print, some advances have been made in automating textual c. There are now programs of instructions for computers for comparing texts, for determining patterns of descent, for compiling concordances (used in emending), and for restoring text lost through damage to manuscripts. Computers will also be necessary, in all probability, to make full use of probabilistic methods for determining patterns of descent, now being introduced especially by Antonin Hruby (see his "Statistical Methods in Textual C.," General Linguistics, 3, no. 3, suppl. [1962]). More information will be available with the publication of Dearing's Intro. to Computer Programming for Literary Students.

For Lachmann's method, see F. W. Hall, A Companion to Classical Texts (1913), K. Lake, The Text of the New Testament (6th ed., rev. S. Lake, 1928); J. P. Postgate, "Textual C.," in A Companion to Latin Studies, ed. J. E. Sandys (3d ed., 1921) and his article on the same subject in the Ency. Britannica (11th ed.), R. C. Jebb, "Textual C.," in A Companion to Gr. Studies, ed. L. Whibley (2d ed., 1906); some traces of the old method continue in P. Maas, Textual C., tr. B. Flower (1958), which otherwise forms an extremely valuable supplement to Greg's method. J. Bédier, Introduction to his ed. of Le Lai de l'Ombre (1913), etc., largely discredited textual c. among Romance philologists; a new tack, but resembling Jebb, is E. Vinaver, "Principles of Textual Emendation," in Studies in Fr. Language and Medieval Lit. (1939). W. W. Greg, The Calculus of Variants (1927); A. A. Hill, "Postulates for Distributional Study of Texts," sb, 3 (1950-51); H. Quentin, Mémoire sur l'Etablissement du Texte de la Vulgate (1922) and, with additional examples, Essais de Critique Textuelle (1926); J. Burke Severs, "Quentin's Theory of Textual C.," EIE, 1941; V. A. Dearing, A Manual of Textual Analysis (1959), with examples; for additional references see Hill. For the principles of emendation, see Hall, A. E. Housman in his editions of Manilius (1903-20), Juvenal (1906), and Lucan (1926), R. B. McKerrow, Prolegomena for the Oxford Shakespeare (1939), Greg, The Editorial Problem in Shakespeare (2d ed., 1951) and "The Rationale of Copy-Text," sb, 3 (1950-51); F. Bowers, Textual and Literary C.

(1959). A. L. Clark, The Descent of Manuscripts; McKerrow, An Introd. to Bibliog. for Literary Students; and similar works (McKerrow has a brief introd. to paleography and type design). Severs, The Literary Relations of Chaucer's Clerke's Tale (1942); J. M. Manly and E. Rickert, The Text of the Canterbury Tales (1940); cf. G. Dempster, "A Chapter in the Manuscript History of the Canterbury Tales," PMLA, 63 (1948); J. B. Leishman, "You Meaner Beauties of the Night," The Library, 4th ser., 26 (1945); E. Wolf, 2d, "If Shadows be a Picture's Excellence"; An Experiment in Critical Bibliog.," PMLA, 63 (1948). For setting out a critical apparatus, an important subject not treated in this article, see Lake, McKerrow, and Greg on Shakespeare, Dearing, and International Union of Academies, Emploi des signes critiques, disposition de l'apparat dans les éditions savantes de textes grecs et latins; conseils et recommandations (1932). V.A.D.

TEXTURE. In modern criticism "texture" usually designates the concrete, particular details of a poem as differentiated from abstract or general ideas. The term is derived from the plastic arts, where it normally refers to the surface qualities of a work as against the larger elements of form or design.

In the context of prosody, t. denotes euphony, the actual physical effects of vowels and consonants as distinguished from meter, considered as a temporal and dynamic phenomenon. T., in this sense, is a matter of great subtlety; since the judgment of phonetic qualities is necessarily subjective to a certain degree, t. is not amenable to systematic analysis. Aside from the observation of such well-established devices as assonance and alliteration, the description of t. depends on analogy with non-aural phenomena: hardness, softness; thickness, thinness; darkness, richness, sweetness, harshness. The subject of phonetic t. is further complicated by its interaction with meter; according to Edith Sitwell, it has "incredibly subtle" effects on rhythm and variations of speed.

In the field of poetics, "t." has a much broader reference, including euphony and meter but extending also to the topic of poetic language. It has a special importance in the criticism of John Crowe Ransom as one of two key terms in a general theory of poetry. Ransom has consistently opposed the tendency in modern poetics to create a unitary theory by reducing poetry to a single essence. In his view, poetry is a composite art containing three distinct and irreducible ingredients. One of these comes under the heading of structure; the others under t. The nature or condition of poetry is defined by the relationship of structure and t.

Structure is the argument of the poem, that element which is governed by logic and reason and which, since it belongs to the order of discursive language, may be extracted from the poem in the form of a prose paraphrase. Ransom maintains that without the prose argument there can be no poem, and is therefore opposed to tendencies in modern poetry which would dispense with structure and have the poem consist entirely of what he calls texture.

T. is the valuable element of poetry, since the structure exists for its sake rather than the reverse. T. includes all the local, heterogeneous detail which differentiates the poem from a prose statement. The detail is characterized by its concreteness and particularity. Furthermore, it is essentially irrelevant to the structure. Ransom's notion of t. is grounded upon empirical knowledge of the process of poetic composition. He perceived that the t. is unpredictable, that it arises adventitiously during the poetic process; generally, it retards or even impedes the argument. In adjusting the details which arise from the logical structure to the requirements of meter and euphony, the poet discovers new facts which belong to the details but not the structure. T. includes a whole realm of meanings, therefore, which exist apart from the structure. These meanings, peculiar to poetry, constitute that aspect of poetry which has occupied the interest of the majority of linguistically oriented critics.

J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1932), The New Crit. (1941), "Crit. as Pure Speculation," in The Intent of the Critic, ed. D. A. Stauffer (1941), "The Inorganic Muses," KR, 5 (1943), "Poetry: The Formal Analysis," and "Poetry: The Final Cause," KR, 9 (1947); W. Elton, A Glossary of the New Crit. (1948); R. W. Stallman, "The New Critics," Critiques and Essays in Crit. (1949); E. Sitwell, "Poetry," in Cassell's; Wimsatt and Brooks. S.F.

THAI POETRY. Thai literature possesses a written history going back to the 13th c. A.D. From the earliest period of its history one finds poetic forms and throughout Thai writing poetry is the dominant literary form. The Thai or Siamese language is a tone language with five significant tones which further complicate the structure of the various verse forms. The latter are five in number and are called chanta, kap, khlong, klon, and ray. The chanta consists of lines of unstressed and stressed words in varying combinations. A typical example is the totok which is a 4-line stanza of 12 syllables, each line consisting of 4 consecutive groups of 2 shorts and a long. Kap, which means a "poetic production," is restricted to certain types of verse and closely resembles the chanta but without adhering to long and short syllables. In kap verse, however, rhyme is significant. Khlong, meaning "to rhyme," has been the most popular among poets in spite of the fact that its requirement of rhyme renders it quite difficult to manipulate. The khlong may be of 2, 3, or even 4 stanzas but must conform to the tonal and rhyme requirements. The fourth type of verse, called the klon, conforms to a rhyming scheme only. One of the more common types is the 8-syllable klon which permits as many interior rhymes as one desires; each verse is connected with the following by the rhyme of the last syllable, which in turns falls on one of the first in the succeeding verse. The klon is much used in the theater, in popular songs and recitations. Ray, "to recite," is blank verse and is used primarily in Buddhist religious literature.

Some of the earliest Thai poetry may well have been Thai versions of the Rāmāyana, called Ramakirti (and pronounced Ramakien), but the various versions now extant date from the 16th and 17th c. and later. In most instances they are court products, often with several collaborators such as king or prince and court poets, the result being a collective composition. The Thai renderings of the Rāmāyana have become very much Thaiized in locale and proper names of the personages. Though there is a considerable body of literature, oral and written, in poetic form in the Thai language prior to the reign of P'hra Narai (1656-88), this period is generally called the 'Golden Age of Thai Poetry.' It was during this period that the famous P'hra Lo was probably composed though it may be a century earlier. This long poem is in a verse form known as lilit whose 7-meter 4-line strophes are intermixed with kāp verses. An example from P'hra Lo is the following stanza:

| | |
|------------------------|-----------------|
| Satavan van chaury ron | rew pai nung ru |
| Bok kao pra lo klai | klin choo |
| Sadet yoo asai | suan raj ni na |
| Hai jong song tao roo | ti ron ram si |

O thou wind which whirls through space, seek our prince,
Go to him, waft him to us!
And you, myriad stars, tell him to hasten,
Use lanterns and light his way.

A favorite poetic form, almost always a love poem, is the nirat meaning "separation." It sings of the charms of the loved one the poet has left behind. As he progresses on his journey he relates what he sees to memories he holds dear. In a sense, the nirat is a series of travel notes to one's beloved, interspersed with comments about her. One of the most widely imitated nirats in the 18th and 19th c. was Kham-soun by Si Prat who lived in the early 18th c. This nirat was written while the poet was on his way to exile in south Thailand. He is the author of a number of others which have become famous in the history of Thai literature.

During the reign of Thonburi (1770-82) the king himself composed certain episodes from the Rāmāyana and his successor encouraged a literary renaissance in which the latter's son Phuttaleutla (Rama II) actively participated by writing down the first sepha, an oral genre traditionally handed down from master to disciple. Entitled The Adventures of Khun Chang and Khun Phen, it is actually the work of several authors and is written in a lively and amusing style in 40,000 lines. One of the most accomplished poets was Sunthorn Bhu (1786-1855) who as a boy exhibited exceptional poetical talents. Author of several well-known nirats and assistant to Phuttaleutla in the preparation of the latter's collaborative version of the Ramayana, he is best known for his Phra Abhai Mani, a long imaginative romance, composed in a number of cantos. The first and foremost poetess was Khun Phum (1815-80). Her home was a literary salon for the last forty years of her life, and some of her poems, especially her nirats, hold an important place in Thai literature. Since her period greater contact with the West has had the effect of replacing, to a very great extent, poetry with prose, and modern Thai students of literature voice the fear that poetry will become a relic of the past. In fact, poetry in the classical style has virtually disappeared in the past twenty years but there are now half a dozen poets in their late twenties and early thirties who are variously styled "idealistic," "realistic," or "imaginary" and who are quite popular. More outlets for publication and a resurgence of interest for poetry can be noted.

ANTHOLOGIES AND TRANSLATIONS: Chrestomathie siamoise, ed. J. Burnay (1938); Magic Lotus, a Romantic Fantasy, ed. and tr. Prem Chaya (1949; Eng. adaptation of P'hra Lo); The Ramakirti (Ramakien), or the Thai version of the Rāmāyana, ed. Swami Satyananda Puri and Charoen Sarahiran (1949); Sunthorn Bhu, The Story of Phra Abhai Mani (1952); Khun S'ra Prasot, Siamsänge (1955).

HISTORIES AND CRITICISM: H. H. Prince Bidyalankarana, "Sebha Recitation and the Story of Khun Chang Khun Phan," Jour. of the Siam Society, 33 (1941); Saiyuda Bhakdi, "Siamese Lit.," in Encyclopedia of Lit., ed. J. T. Shipley, II (1946); P. Schweisguth, Étude sur la litt. siamoise (1951; the best study of Thai lit. in a Western lang.); Phya Anuman Rajadhon, Thai Lit. and Swasdi Raksa (1953); Kasem Sibunruang, "Litt. siamoise," in Histoire des littératures, ed. R. Quéneau, I (1955); P. Pura-chatra, "Thailand and Her Lit.," Diliman Review, 6 (1958); J. N. Mosel, A Survey of Cl. Thai Poetry (1959) and Trends and Structure in Contemporary Thai Poetry (1961). J.M.E.

THEORETICAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, FUNCTION OF.

THESIS. See ARSIS AND THESIS.

THRENODY (Gr. "a dirge sung over someone or something"). The ancient Gr. word for a song of lamentation, a dirge (q.v.), or a funeral song. Although originally a choral ode, it was changed to a monody (q.v.) which was strophic in form employing various metrical systems. Such a poem was not only a lamentation but also an encomium for the dead. From the 6th c. B.C. it became common in Gr. literature whence it spread to other literatures. In modern usage the term may be applied to any lyric of lamentation or memorial, e.g., Emerson's Threnody on His Young Son, or even Tennyson's In Memoriam.

R.A.H.

TIBETAN POETRY. The extreme scarcity of available material on Tib. poetry makes it almost impossible to treat the subject satisfactorily. Terms such as "poems" and "poets" are nonexistent in the Tib. language. The closest approximation to the word "poems" is glu bzhas (honorific gsungs bzhas), which means "songs." Glu bzhas are mainly folk songs; they are lively, colorful, and often naive in their simplicity and frankness. These popular songs constitute one part of the main body of Tib. poetry. The other part is to be found in various religious writings such as prayers, hymns, or ceremonious songs. Generally called dbyangs or mgur, they are the compositions of learned scholars and priests and are essentially poetic as well as intensely religious in nature. The popular songs are usually without definite authorship, and are spread mainly through oral transmission. They present extensive textual variations and are characterized by colloquialism. On the other hand, the religious songs are composed in the classical language, which was stabilized in the 8th c. with the introduction of Buddhism from India.

In the development of Tib. poetry two different traditions can be distinguished: Tib. native literary creations and Indic Buddhistic translations. In general, the secular poetry always contains an even number of syllables in each line, while the religious treatises usually contain an odd number of syllables. The former have more variations, whereas the latter are more regular in form. There is no distinction of long and short syllables in Tib. versification. The significance of the distinction between accented and unaccented syllables is doubtful. Rhyming is not universal among all types of poetry. Structurally, all poetic pieces differ from one another only in the number of syllables. Parallelism has been observed by Francke in his Ladakhi Songs.

The following is a tentative classification of Tib. poetic pieces: (1) folk songs, (2) ritualistic songs, (3) poetic passages in plays, (4) Gling glu (songs for the Kesar festival), (5) poetic passages in the Kesar Saga, (6) poetic passages in historical works, (7) historical songs, (8) religious songs, prayers, and hymns, (9) Milaraspa's Mgur 'Bum. Within the brief space of this article, only the more important types can be considered. Of folk songs there are many varieties, including work songs for sowing, harvesting, building a house, etc. Special mention should be made of the love songs attributed to the 6th Dalai Lama. Simple, fresh, artless, and imbued with great feeling for nature, they reveal the struggle between passion and propriety, from which there is no respite:

shar phyogs ri bo'i rtse nas
dkar gsal zla ba shar byung ma skyes a ma'i zhal ras yid la 'khor byas byung.

From the mountain peaks in the east,
The silvery moon has peeped out.
And the face of that young maiden,
Has gradually appeared in my mind.

The best known epic is the Kesar Saga. The Tib. versions of this epic, which is widely circulated in Central Asia and which revolves around the heroic deeds of the mystical king Kesar, are written in verses which intermingle with prose. Of religious writings, the several poetical works in the Kanjur (translated word) and the Tanjur (translated treatises) should be singled out. Faithful translations of the Sanskrit Buddhist works of India, they are composed in verse, consisting of two or four lines, each of 7-21 syllables. Many native compositions of a religious nature are modeled on the Buddhistic translations.

Milaraspa (1040-1123), a Buddhist missionary of the Bka rgyud pa sect, is above all a poet. The chief work ascribed to him is the "One Hundred Thousand Songs" (Mgur 'Bum), which comprises a narrative of a part of his wanderings, plentifully interspersed with ditties and poetical expositions of doctrine. The songs, however, number less than 200 instead of 100,000 as stated in the metaphorical title. His poetry has a personal touch which is rarely found in Tib. literature.

Trois mystères tibétains, tr. J. Bacot (1912); Milaraspa, ed. B. Laufer (1922); T. C. Yu and Y. R. Chao, Love Songs of the 6th Dalai Lama Tshang dbyangs rgya mtsho (1930; Academia Sinica, Institute of Hist. and Phil., Monographs, ser. A., no. 5); Tib. Folksongs from the District of Gyantse, ed. and tr. G. Tucci, (1949); P. Poucha, "Les vers tibétains," Archiv Orientalni, 18 (1950); J. Vekerdi, "Some Remarks on Tib. Prosody," Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae, Acta Orientalia, 2 (1952); K. Chang, "On Tib. Poetry," Central Asiatic Jour., 2 (1956); L'Épopée tibétaine de Gesar dans sa version lamaïque de Ling, tr. R. A. Stein (1956); J. W. de Jong, Mi la ras pa'i rnam thar (1959; Tib. text of the life of Milarepa); Message of Milarepa: New Light upon the Tib. Way, tr. H. Clarke (1960); The Hundred Thousand Songs. Selections from Milarepa, Poet-Saint of Tibet, tr. A. K. Gordon (1961); The Hundred Thousand Songs of Milarepa, tr. and annotated by G. C. C. Chang (2 v., 1962).

K.C.

TMESIS (Gr. "a cutting"). In Gr. syntax it means the separation of a preposition from its verb to which in postepic language it was completely joined. In Attic Gr. poetry the two elements were separated by unimportant words, e.g.,

kat' oũn žlaben for oũn katélaben for the sake of emphasis. L. poetry does the same thing, e.g., seque gregari for segregarique. In Eng. the breaking up of any compound word, e.g., "what place soever" for "whatsoever place." Another example of t. is G. M. Hopkins' "See his wind—lilylocks—laced" (Harry Ploughman).

R.A.H.

TONE. Traditionally, "t." has denoted an intangible quality, frequently an affective one, which is metaphorically predicated of a literary work or of some part of it such as its style. It is said to pervade and "color" the whole, like a mood in a human being, and in various ways to contribute to the aesthetic excellence of the work. Some of the other terms naming the same concept are "Gestalt-quality," "impression," "spirit," "atmosphere," "aura," and "accent." In Practical Criticism (1929) I. A. Richards compared t. to social manners and defined it as the reflection in a discourse of the author's attitude towards his audience. Successful management of t., on which the rhetorical effectiveness of a discourse largely depends, consists primarily in the tactful selection of content and in the adjustment of style to suit a particular audience. Other recent critics have analogized t. in literature to a quality of speech. The t. in which something is said may add to, qualify, or even reverse the meaning of what is said, as in sarcasm. Thus the t. of a speaker's voice may reveal information about his feelings, wishes, attitudes, beliefs, etc. Presumably on the assumption that vocal tones are used only or primarily to convey attitudes, critics who have adopted this analogy maintain that any indirect expression of attitude in a poem (by choice of words, imagery, slanting, syntax, etc.) is a problem of t. Thus attitudes determine t., and t. reflects attitudes. Since poetry is regarded as a specialization of language for the communication of attitudes, the determination of the exact shading of t. in a particular poem is one of the most important duties of the explicator. The t. of a poem is also a source of value judgments; a poem is deemed poor if the attitudes it expresses are vague, confused, unsustained, unjustified, unmotivated, inappropriate, simple, conventional, or sentimental. —I. A. Richards, Practical Crit. (1929); Brooks and Warren; I. C. Hungerland, Poetic Discourse (1958).

F.G.

TONE-COLOR. Characteristic auditory quality of a speech-sound or musical instrument (German Tonfarbe, Klangfarbe; Fr., Eng. timbre). Extended to cover the kinesthetic "feel" of articulation and utterance. The relations of both aspects of tone-color to sound-associations are here examined. (See also ONOMATOPOEIA, SOUND IN POETRY.)

The key to poetic tone-color is phonology. The reader who has, for instance, digested sound spectrograms in their linguistic significance, has a far clearer understanding of the bases of timbre. One such basis is the relation of the formants of a given sound to each other and to those of other sounds: formants may be crudely defined as pitch zones in which voice overtones are strengthened, owing to the voice-cavity configuration. But a sound may be abrupt or lingering, noise-like or music-like. Jakobson thinks each speech sound in a given language is recognized by its "reading" against a selection from some dozen "either-or" pairs of characteristics. Though their function is linguistic, such features can have aesthetic qualities and natural associations, while in poetry all sound qualities come in. When considering the associations of sounds, articulation is more important in stops and fricatives, timbre in vowels and final nasals or liquids; but the student should be familiar with the "vowel-polygon."

From Plato's Cratylus onward the power of sounds has been recognized. A. W. Schlegel connected each vowel with a hue and a feeling-tone; romantics and symbolists made much of universal correspondances and synaesthesias; the instrumentalists equated each vowel class with a class of musical instrument; Rimbaud's vowel/color sonnet is suspect, but Ernst Jünger elaborates a nexus of ideas for each vowel. Psychological investigators record synaesthesias, some conflicting; Gestalt theorists invoke coenesthesia, basic feelings underlying all pairs of contrasting sensations. Grammont notes asociations with emotive expression, percepts, and (metaphorically) abstracts; German writers discuss the general problem, lexical and poetic. Paget and others back articulatory "gesture." Macdermott relates Eng. vowel types predominant in verse passages, to the subject. Imitative and suggestive words have been adduced in all tongues. Wundt distinguishes noise imitation, other percepts suggested by sound, and "metaphors" in which speech sound and object arouse related feelings. Bühler distinguishes objective from relational fidelity (Relationstreue) such as that of a fever chart to the fever. The poetic vowel classifications of Grammont and Macdermott are well enough founded to be approximable with Jakobson's linguistic ones. But the most painstaking of the skeptics, P. Delbouille, in a highly critical review of theories, assigns to sound suggestion a very rare derivative rôle.

It is clear that every sound (-collocation) has multiple affinities. The whole picture is distorted by lexical associations. Thus one word (or set) may attract others in the language (swing, sway, swirl, still, swish, swash, swoop, swat, switch) and/or in verse, where Trannoy speaks of the harmony-generating word: in "Se mêlaient au bruit sourd des ruisseaux sur la mousse" (Hugo), ruisseaux is supposed to generate bruit sourd since we would expect bruit clair: over-simply, since sur and mousse also echo.

Nevertheless, potential associations are activated in certain milieux. In "And the dull wheel hums doleful through the day" (Crabbe) the monotony is conveyed by the doubled d-l, lingering l's and m, driving d's, flat British u's. In "Liberty . . . o'er Spain, / Scattering contagious fire into the sky, / Gleamed. My soul spurned the chains of its dismay" (Shelley) the release and ardor are expressed by the swishing s's, leaping sp's, flinging sk's, gay ā/ai's. In "The horrid crags, by toppling convent crown'd, / The cork-trees hoar that clothe the shaggy steep, / The mountain-moss by scorching skies imbrown'd" (Byron), the scene is suggested by the gasping h's, dark or's and ō's, rugged kr's, hard-edged k's and ag's, sweeping mount/m-own'd, abrupt -p's, dizzy sk's and spiring trees/steep. In Mallarmé's swan-sonnet the i's illuminate white bird, frozen winter, spiritual intensity, sterility. Rilke uses i-sounds similarly in the unicorn Sonnet to Orpheus, but almost confined to certain lines, set in contrast with a-sounds in the first quatrain and au in the second, and in modulation with ei in the sestet. (Tone-colors can also be used for themselves alone without "program.")

To systematize is possible. Depending on the language (see below), vowels like [e, i, y] tend to be appropriate to height, intensity, sharpness, thinness, delicacy, minuteness, insignificance, pallidity, purity, rarefaction, mobility; but such as [a, ɒ, ɔ] to the opposite notions; like [u, ɔ] to hollowness, roundness, solemnity, gloom, depth, softness, malleability, liquidity; but such as [a, æ, ɛ] to their opposites; like [y, ø, œ] to preciousness, charm, melancholy; but such as [ʌ, ɑ] to their antitheses; rounded vowels generally to interest, rich hue or form; but others to the reverse; vowels like [u, y, i] to mystery, tenderness, cool tints; but such as [a, ɔ, ɒ] to their contraries; short vowels can be brisk or trite, long vowels operatic (diphthongs plastically expressive). Consonants:—resonants (nasals, liquids) can suggest harmony, flow, protraction (especially as finals), malleability; stops: the opposites; voiceless: levity, agitation; voiced: the converse; hissing: scorn, tenuity; hushing: swarm, effusion; both the last: speed, harshness; r's: roughness, menace, warmth; labials: warm emotions; velars: cold emotions; stops juxtaposed: obstacle shapes; fricatives combined with other cons.: movement shapes. (Cf. Hevner, Macdermott, Grammont, Lockemann, Jakobson.)

But each language differs phonologically, and hence in its aesthetic resources. Thus Gr. words (cf. Norwegian, Swedish, etc.) were probably pitch-accented, L. stress-accented; Germanic tongues have forceful expiratory stress, weak syllables being often slurred, galloped over, or even dropped (today especially in S. England); Romance languages (except European Portuguese) are more evenly stressed and precisely articulated (Fr. especially); weak Rus. syllables are also phonetically reduced. Eng. and Rus. bristle with difficult consonant groups, and in general Germanic and Slavonic contrast in this respect with the simpler syllables of Romance. Danish, and partly Sp., seriously weaken noninitial "stops" (see PHONETIC EQUIVALENCE). L., Gr., early Germanic tongues, It., Finnish, Hungarian, etc., possess double-duration consonants (It. chi [s]sono, hanno) as well as vowels. In It. and Sp. few syllables end with a consonant, and there are 7 or 5 vowel sounds to England's twenty-odd. Eng., Dutch, German, etc., possess gently "falling" diphthongs (which in Eng. replace most "long" vowels); German, Fr., Dutch, etc., possess rounded front vowels; Fr., Polish, and Portuguese have their nasal vowels. Most Rus. vowels are dull and lax, and so are the "short" vowels in Eng. and other Germanic tongues; Rus. and standard Sp. have no "long" vowels. Many Slav tongues are rich in hissing and hushing consonants, and possess a palatalized set of consonants and (in effect) vowels. Romance languages possess palatal n and, usually, l. Fr., Portuguese, Icelandic, Welsh, Finnish, etc., lack affricates.

Some Germanic phonologies have perhaps more affinity with the violent, unstable, rugged, distinctive aspects of existence; Romance ones, with the harmonious, steady, smooth, reiterative. If so, the reverse aspects should be expressed more easily with less means: hardness and roughness more economically in Romance than in Germanic, e.g. by a's, r's, stops: "un choc d'armures, / Quand la sourde mêlée étreint les escadrons" (Hugo) (helped by the hiatus); fullness, peace, richness more economically in Germanic, e.g. by long sonorous syllables (Paradise Lost 4.242-50). Languor is expressible by nasal vowels in Fr., by dull vowels and final resonants in Eng.; excitement or movement by acute vowels in Fr., by sp, sw, sl, st, sh, nce in Eng. (as in Shelley). Sounds too common in discourse tend to neutralize their effects: e.g. th-, -s, [ə], [ɪ] in Eng. Grammatical like-endings bind speech or verse more monotonously together in Gr., L. (German, It., Sp., Portuguese, Slavonic, Finnish, etc.); and paucity of vowel types does the same in Sp. or It.; but Eng. and Fr. starkness is partly cluttered up through analytical syntax and particles.

W. M. Wundt, Völkerpsychologie (v. 1-2, 1904); A. I. Trannoy, La musique des vers (1929); Sir R. A. S. Paget, Human Speech (1930); H. Werner, Grundfragen der Sprachphysiognomik (1932); K. Bühler, Sprachtheorie: die Darstellungsfunktion der Sprache (1934); K. Hevner, "An Experimental Study of the Affective Value of Sounds in Poetry," Am. J. of Psych., 49 (1937); H. Lützel, "Die Lautgestaltung in der Lyrik," Zeitschrift für Aesth., 29 (1935); W. Schneider, "Über die Lautbedeutsamkeit," ZDP, 63 (1938); M. M. Macdermott, Vowel Sounds in Poetry (1940); E. Jünger, "Lob der Vokale" in his Blätter und Steine (1942); M. Grammont, Traité de phonétique (3e éd., 1946, pt. 3); R. K. Potter, G. A. Kapp and H. C. Green, Visible Speech (1947); P. Delattre, "The Physiological Interpretation of Sound Spectrograms," PMLA, 66 (1951); F. Lockemann, Das Gedicht und seine Klanggestalt (1952); J. J. Lynch, "The Tonality of Lyric Poetry," Word, 9 (1953); W. Wandruschka, "Ausdruckswerte der Sprachlaute," Germ.-Rom. Monatsschr., n.F., 4 (1954); R. Jakobson and M. Halle, Fundamentals of Language (1956); P. Delbouille, Poésie et sonorités: la critique contemporaine devant le pouvoir suggestif des sons (1961). D.I.M.

TOPOGRAPHICAL POEM. T. poetry was defined in 1799 by Dr. Johnson as "local poetry," of which the fundamental subject is some particular landscape . . . with the addition of . . . historical retrospection or incidental meditation. Known to the ancients in verse-geographies and in accounts of voyages, the genre was established in Eng. poetry by Sir John Denham's Cooper Hill (1642). Throughout the next century and a half, it flourished luxuriously in Eng. verse, where as many as nine subcategories (hills, towns, rivers, buildings, caves, etc.), each with numerous representatives, may be distinguished. Thomson, Dyer, Crabbe, and a multitude of minor poets wrote t. poetry, but its importance as a separate genre was largely outmoded by the extensive use of descriptive detail for other purposes in romantic poetry, as in Wordsworth's Tintern Abbey or Ode on Intimations of Immortality. John Betjeman has recently revived t. verse in short works with humorous effect, but no major serious works have appeared.—D. L. Durling, Georgic Tradition in Eng. Poetry (1935); R. A. Aubin, T. Poetry in 18th-C. England (1936); R. M. Thale, "Crabbe's Village and T. Poetry," JEGP, 55 (1956). S.F.F.

TORNADA. A final short stanza, comparable to the Fr. envoi, added to many Old Prov. poems as a kind of dedication to a patron or friend. In form, the t. usually reproduces the metrical structure and the rhymes of the last part of the preceding stanza. Some poems have 2 or even 3 tornadas, addressed to different persons. F.M.C.

TOUCHSTONE. A term used by Matthew Arnold in "The Study of Poetry," first published in 1880 as a general introduction to Ward's The Eng. Poets. Arnold's touchstones are "lines and expressions of the great masters" which are supposed to reveal "the presence or absence of high poetic quality, and also the degree of this quality" in poems placed beside them. Arnold advocates his touchstone method of criticism as the basis of a "real," as opposed to a "historic" or "personal," estimate of poetry. Passages have "high poetic quality" if they have high seriousness and the grand style. Of the touchstones Arnold applies in his survey of Eng. poets, three each are from Homer, Dante, and Milton, and two are from Shakespeare. Though Arnold's touchstones strikingly express certain moods, they are not essences of the poetry from which they are taken but rather of certain states of Arnold's mind. Eight of them reflect melancholy, two devotion, one courage. Even if Arnold's touchstones did convey the quality of their sources, they would have limitations as critical tools. No part conveys a whole, and Arnold's parts are themselves limited. Arnold thought of seriousness as solemnity and offered no touchstones for natural magic or merriment.

Arnold did not originate the use of the poetical fragment as a touchstone. Longinus conveyed the quality of the greatest poetry by quoting quintessential passages, and so did John Dennis and Joseph Warton.—M. Arnold, "The Study of Poetry," Essays in Crit., 2d ser.

(1888); L. Trilling, Matthew Arnold (1939); Abrams, ch. 6; J. S. Eells, Jr., The Touchstones of Matthew Arnold (1955). J.K.R.

TRADITION. To treat comprehensively the idea of t. as related to poetry would involve the whole history of poetry, since t. in the widest sense signifies consciousness of the past. Antitraditionalism is relatively rare in literary history; with the exception of the experimental school of contemporary poets and possibly the 19th-c. romantics, poets have normally emulated the achievement of their predecessors. Traditionalism is one of the constant ingredients of the classical outlook, which has survived beyond the neoclassic period in the work of such writers as Matthew Arnold and T. S. Eliot. To regard literary history as a continuous cyclical alternation of t. and revolt is inaccurate, since the proportion of innovation to t. has always been slight.

In contemporary criticism, the term is employed in two different but not unrelated senses. It refers, in one instance, not to literature, but to culture and society. A number of critics have been occupied with the problem of the poet's relation to society; the peculiar difficulties of modern poetry have been attributed to the disintegration of traditional society which has gradually been taking place since the Renaissance, and to the consequent loss of religious and moral authority.

The poets and critics who have been aware of the absence of traditional society in the modern world have also been those who have been most concerned with t. in poetry. In this context, t. usually signifies "the tradition," as in the title of Cleanth Brooks's Modern Poetry and the Tradition. The writings of T. E. Hulme and T. S. Eliot's "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1917) were largely responsible for reestablishing traditionalism as a central concept in modern poetry. Eliot's essay, appearing at a time when experimentalism in poetry was at its height, had a tremendous impact upon subsequent speculation and taste. In retrospect it appears to be a moderate enough statement of the classical point of view, stressing the continuity of the present with the past and affirming the objectivity of the work of art, hence its essential impersonality. For Eliot, t. involves the historical sense—the perception of the presence of the past as well as its pastness. He postulates, furthermore, the simultaneous existence of the works of the past. The most important statement in the essay with respect to subsequent criticism concerns the main current of Eng. poetry which, according to Eliot, does not necessarily flow through the most distinguished reputations. The t. or main current is not specified, but later essays, among them the essay on

"The Metaphysical Poets," were devoted to it. Other influential critics and poets, notably the Nashville group consisting of Allen Tate, John Crowe Ransom, and Robert Penn Warren, were also contributing to the idea of a main t. in Eng. poetry, which has since become the contemporary equivalent of "the classical tradition" of former periods.

The lines of the t. are clearly defined. The criteria for inclusion are based on a conception of a poetic sensibility capable of assimilating and fusing experiences of a widely divergent kind. Traditional poetry, sometimes called poetry of synthesis, is recognized principally by its use of metaphor, which is functional rather than decorative, involving the union of thought and sensation. Eliot perceived the current as having risen in the 16th-c. poets, having reached its climax in the late Elizabethan dramatists and the 17th-c. metaphysical poets—Donne, Crashaw, Vaughan, Herbert, Lord Herbert, Marvell, King, Cowley—and ceasing suddenly with the "dissociation of sensibility," the bifurcation of sensation and intellect, which set in with Milton and Dryden and survived throughout the 18th and 19th c. in England.

The peculiar intellectual qualities of the 16th- and 17th-c. Eng. poetry reappeared in the work of two late 19th-c. Fr. poets, Jules Laforgue and Tristan Corbière; the symbolists are assimilated into the t. available to modern poets. Cleanth Brooks's Modern Poetry and the Tradition contains the fullest exposition of the continuation of the metaphysical-symbolist t. in modern poetry. It is interesting to note that within the last generation there have been gradual changes in the outlines of the t. The exclusions are not so rigid, and several neoclassic and romantic poets who had previously been excluded are now admitted.

An objection voiced against the contemporary traditionalists is that their revision of the history of Eng. poetry was undertaken in the interests of a single school of contemporary poetry. The objection is partly anticipated in "Tradition and the Individual Talent," for there Eliot points out that the relations of the present and past are reciprocal rather than static and that the appearance of a really new work alters the "order" formed by the monuments of the past. Without providing for flexibility and change, traditionalism actually becomes as stultifying as it is imagined to be by the most violent antitraditionalist.

T. S. Eliot, The Sacred Wood: Essays on Poetry and Crit. (1921), After Strange Gods: a Primer of Modern Heresy (1934) and The Idea of a Christian Society (1939); T. E. Hulme, Speculations, ed. H. Read (1924); G. Murray, The Classical T. in Poetry (1927); J. L. Lowes, T. and Revolt (1930); A. Nicoll, "Eliot and the Revival of Classicism," Eng. Jour., 23 (1934); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation (1936); A. Tate, Reactionary Essays on Poetry and Ideas (1936) and Reason in Madness (1941); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the T. (1939); G. Hough, Reflections on a Literary Revolution (1960); J. V. Cunningham, T. and Poetic Structure (1961); S. Lucy, T. S. Eliot and the Idea of T. (1961).

S.F.

TRADUCTIO. See ANADIPLOSIS.

TRAGEDY. Courage and inevitable defeat: when we confront the great literature of t. from our everyday world, it is perhaps these two qualities that strike us most forcibly, for the first in any society is rare and the second is a prospect most men find intolerable. Without courage or endurance, the exceptional action or commitment which characterizes t. would not be undertaken or sustained; without defeat, it would not be placed in the perspective of the ordinary world. For the tragic gesture or thrust is on too grand a scale to conform to the ways of the world or to find means to alter them. After comedy and most other literary forms, life goes on; but t. stops history, it is a summit or end stage, always concerned with problems of value; it is human life seen in an ultimate perspective. The tragic protagonist's courage must seem possible—not absurd, but astonishing or praiseworthy in the extreme. Without such courage, there is no compelling example. But it must also be doomed. If not, action and thought are not internalized, character is not fully developed, values are not transformed. Courage without an overpowering challenge, moreover, can be mere bravado or foolhardiness. Defeat without a great attempt can be mere pathos. T. as a literary form demands that both be brought into a unity. Great action is probably rarer in literature, even, than it is in life, but in Greece of the 5th c. B.C. (Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides), and late 16th- and 17th-c. England (Marlowe, Shakespeare, Webster, and their contemporaries), Spain (Lope de Vega and Calderón), and France (Corneille and Racine), it recommends itself to the writer in the boldest forms.

The word "tragedy" will here be employed to refer to a form of the drama which can be distinguished from plays of mere violence or disaster in the close relationships which it establishes between character and fate and the fitness of its means to its ends. And it can be distinguished from the drama of sentiment in the stern logic of its events and the grandeur of its conceptions. Terror and pity, to use the conventional terms, should be caught in equipoise. Other elements, too, are usually in balance. The hero's struggle in t. does not seem meaningless nor his universe too ordered, for either extreme would deprive his action of its full significance. And this struggle itself, which is central, suggests, especially since the Greeks, that man's will is neither wholly predetermined nor wholly free. Strangely, t. is almost wholly a phenomenon of the Western world.

Many of the characteristics posited here for t. would seem to apply equally well, of course, to an epic like Paradise Lost, or to novels, say, by Dostoevsky or Hardy or Faulkner. The tragic view of life is clearly not limited to dramatic form. Perhaps two or three hundred years or more before Aeschylus, Homer in the Iliad seems to have established, once and for all, the broad outlines of the tragic experience. In the fierce absoluteness of Achilles' withdrawal and the terror of his return, in his mysterious collaboration with forces either divine or in nature above and beyond himself, Homer seems to have created the archetypal tragic hero. Nevertheless, it seems wise to limit our use of the word to the formal drama—to suggest structure and form as well as idea, situation, character, and tone.

T. has proved to be as flexible as the other major genres, and generalizations about the nature of the form do not of course apply in detail to the tragedies of all times and places. The Greeks did not even insist, as we see in the Philoctetes and other plays, that tragedies must always have unhappy endings. There are, however, a surprising number of similarities in form and content between the tragedies of ancient Greece and those of the modern world. All exhibit a central character (or characters) isolated from his fellows who is caught in a difficult situation, usually ending with his death. Surrounding him are various other persons who are involved with the hero in his predicament or who respond variously to his actions, with support or with bitter criticism. Their function in part is to place the hero's struggle in perspective—to afford us norms of vision or judgment by which we can appraise it. This struggle itself may take many different forms. The hero's predicament can arise primarily through elements in his own make-up, through the plotting of another or others, through the very nature of his environment, through the will or heaven, or, more probably, through a combination of these. Essentially, this predicament is part of the plot, the "given" of the play. The protagonist may respond to a challenge with energy and defiance, or he may confront his destiny more stoically. He may go through several stages or changes in the course of this experience or may fall quite suddenly from well-being to disaster. He may arrive sooner or later at a recognition of his place in the universe, of a relationship between his character and his fate, or he may apprehend less about his experience than do other characters or members of a chorus or the audience, thus creating situations of tragic irony. These alternatives are not, of course, mutually exclusive, and they may predominate variously at different times in the same play.

The relationship between character and plot in most great t. is so intimate that we speak of the "inevitability" of a series of events in this form, and of the particular challenge confronting the hero and the end to which he comes as part of his "fate." A man's fate, like his character, is usually the shape or result of a collaboration between forces working from within and from without. In the Iliad and Aeschylus, these outer forces are primarily divine in origin; in Sophocles and Euripides, often less clearly so. In Shakespeare, whether divine or infernal, superhuman forces supply primary motivation for action in two plays (Hamlet and Macbeth); in the others, external forces, when not human, are difficult to define, but they seem—as is usually true with the Greeks—either hostile to the hero's actions or indifferent to them. And forces working from within the hero, initiating or echoing those without, are often contradictory or divisive and threaten to split him apart.

The predicaments in which protagonists find themselves—men who would appear to be impervious to temptation or folly in other situations—seem calculated to baffle, try, or torture them. And opportunists or villains in t. choose their mighty victims and, like the fates, appear to manipulate the machinery of the plot to destroy them with appalling ingenuity. Indeed, the actions of these lesser persons and the movements of the plot form an instrument finely adapted to the testing and laying bare of the nature of heroism. The gods or fates, or the great tragedians, rarely select weak men for heroic destinies. Since Aristotle, students of t. have debated endlessly the character of the protagonist. Frequently, the traditional theory of the "tragic flaw" (q.v.), Aristotle's hamartia, when applied to specific cases, simplifies and indeed prejudices this character. Were it not for the protagonist's "flaw," we are told—his folly, obsessions, or crimes—he would not find himself the target of so menacing a concert of forces, in heaven, society, other individuals, and in himself. Or at least he would be able to master or transcend them.

To be sure, the tragic protagonist is rarely thought by those around him to be without fault. Among the attitudes which he exhibits when confronted with an overwhelming challenge is a courage or an inflexible dedication which easily becomes stubbornness, arrogance, foolhardiness, or blind rage, and which others inevitably think outrageous, wicked, or blasphemous. We could scarcely expect them to respond otherwise, and we may frequently ally ourselves with their point of view. The chorus in Greek t. often speaks for traditional communal and religious values which it knows are threatened by the protagonist's attitudes or behavior, especially his hybris or pride. And in t. written in Christian times, choral voices chronicling the hero's progress can speak, if occasion demands, with all of the Church's or society's sanctions against the unregenerate will or against man's assuming the prerogatives of the gods. But we rarely ally ourselves wholly with the chorus or with these voices. With his emphasis upon pity and terror, Aristotle has suggested a kind of double response in ourselves to the fate of the hero. Through a process (catharsis, q.v.) which is still debated, he speaks of our "purging" ourselves of these powerful emotions by entertaining them vicariously. It may be wiser, however, to speak of t. as enabling us to experience these heightened and contradictory emotions rather than as purging us of them.

Comedy often seems to prompt in us a degree of detachment from a person or group, t. a degree of identification with a central character. We do not identify ourselves wholly and at all times with the protagonist, nor do we fail to withdraw in amazement from his willfulness or daring. And yet we do seem to be experiencing something of the fate of the hero as we hear or read, and to see the central dilemma primarily through his eyes. A negative or moralistic approach to t. undervalues the hero's strength and in effect short-circuits the tragic experience. The "sin" or weakness of the hero is often inextricably associated with the strength which enables him to struggle or endure; it is a condition of his being. Furthermore, the disparity in t. between the protagonist's folly and its consequences in suffering, between his agonizing sense of guilt or loneliness and the remoteness of the powers that might acknowledge or forgive him, does not encourage us to form simple moral judgments. It may therefore be more helpful to speak of tragic virtue than of a tragic flaw, of the hero as a man elected or selected for his fate because of his greatness, rather than spotted for it because of his folly, and of the solemn spectacle of his experience as an exalted example—not to be pursued literally, of course—rather than as a warning. The price that the hero pays for his exceptional action is suffering and death, to be sure. But the emphasis is not only on his folly and punishment, but on the way in which he responds to the challenge which confronts him, on his daring, or on his ability to bear the worst that heaven and earth can devise. The focus is thus upon his grandness rather than his goodness. T. brings sheer power and human spirit into opposition, and it is the triumph of the latter, at whatever cost, that we admire. When during a crisis most men would make the minor or major compromises that might save them from disaster, resign themselves to numb passivity or to tears, abandon their course as sheer folly, or buckle under their burdens, the tragic protagonist frequently seems with each new challenge or stroke of fate to grow bolder or more absolute.

The periods of major t. are probably nourished by many different, even conflicting, attitudes, philosophies, and religious beliefs, and rarely can be made to conform to single systems of belief, whether Christian or pagan. It is clear that theories of "poetic justice" in literature or life—careful adjustment of the punishment to fit the crime, the reward to match the virtue—are alien to the spirit of the tragic world. And ages characterized by certain dominant attitudes—implicit trust in a universe wholly rational, predictable, or divine, in which whatever is, is right—or by a disbelief in the finality of evil—have not turned to t. as a characteristic form of expression. If the hero is fairly sure from the outset that he will be forgiven, redeemed, or even rewarded for his actions, then the bewilderment, helplessness, and transformation of values we associate with the tragic experience are greatly qualified. The grimmer attitudes of other ages also have not given rise to t. Classical fatalism alone does not provide the grounds for t., and the medieval Fortune's wheel is not an adequate image for the tragic experience—indeed, the wheel turned in an age without formal t. If the relationship between a man's acts and his consequent suffering is wholly capricious, there clearly can be little of the inevitability about his experience that we associate with t. All generalizations about this subject are hazardous, however. In Euripides, for instance, Hecuba and Heracles, who are without fault, struggle and are overwhelmed in a universe of total disorder.

In Greece, t. seems to have arisen in the 6th c. B.C. out of the festivals in honor of Dionysus, the god principally associated with the death and rebirth of the year. From the outset, its basis is communal and ritualistic, its medium poetry, and its accompaniments dance, song, and spectacle. And it is associated with a sense of mystery or wonder. As with many other forms of art, it achieves a greatness very early in its development which in certain respects has never been surpassed. Three dramatists of the 5th c. B.C. are primarily responsible for bringing the Gr. theatre to preeminence. From Aeschylus' first extant play (472 B.C. or earlier) to Euripides' last (406), the movement of Gr. t. is from ritual and a concern with the gods and fate, to a concern with the passions of everyday men and women. Over this period, t. begins to give way to tragicomedy, romance, and other forms. In Aeschylus (525–456), the chorus is of the utmost importance to the meaning and structure of the play, and the two (and later three) actors usually represent persons of divine or heroic stature. A series of related plays (three tragedies and a satyr play) form a unified work of art, like the Oresteia dealing with themes of justice, of sin, and punishment. In Euripides (480?–406), the chorus is far less significant, the plays in a series are not necessarily related, and the three or more actors move in a world of greater psychological realism. Contemporary with these two dramatists, Sophocles (496?–406), in plays like those in his Theban cycle, combines something of Aeschylus' concern for the will of the gods with Euripides' concern for more detailed probings of the heart. It is Sophocles' drama which serves as the basis for Aristotle's remarks on t. in the Poetics. Sophocles' elegant and perfected verse lies somewhere between the richly metaphoric, heroic language of Aeschylus and the restless and subtle verse of Euripides. Though he was ridiculed by Aristophanes during his lifetime, Euripides has had the greatest influence upon later writers of t., from Hellenistic times down to the 17th c. in France and beyond.

Classical t. on the highest level dies as suddenly as it is born, and it is about twenty centuries before t. is written again by men who are at once practical men of the theatre and great poets. Many of Euripides' plays are later freely revised by Seneca (4 B.C.?–A.D. 65), the Roman who is the next important tragedian whose plays we possess, now chiefly of historical significance. Roman t., throughout imitative of Gr. example, heightens the melodramatic elements in Euripides and is thus often characterized by extravagant rhetoric and violence. The Stoicism of Seneca and the dominant characteristics of his theatre—the use of revenge motifs, of ghosts and portents, and so on—exert a great influence, across some 1600 years, over the reviving drama of the Renaissance. The fact that Seneca writes a drama probably not intended for performance on a stage may partly explain why Chaucer and others, who knew him during the long medieval period when there is practically no serious drama along classical lines, consider t. a narrative with an unhappy ending merely to be read or recited.

The body of poetic t. in the late 16th and the 17th c., inspired partly by the revered example of Seneca and later the Greeks, partly by the full use of the power inherent in native folk and religious traditions (the moralities, mysteries, and miracle plays), is the richest of all of those in the Western world of which we have fairly full record. Appearing and disappearing as suddenly as did the Greek, this drama has not been surpassed in poetic power since the 17th c. In Spain, in Lope de Vega (1562-1635) and Calderón (1600-81) and others, it rarely takes the form of "pure" t., but of intrigues of love and honor, and plays on patriotic, historical, philosophical, and religious themes. But it possesses undeniable dignity and great variety, and the breadth of its appeal to the wide public which attended its performances, and its use of interlocking plots, themes, and many poetic styles are very similar to the practice of drama in Elizabethan England.

The great period of Eng. t. is very brief—on the highest level about twenty-five years, all told about fifty. Toward the end of the 16th c., traditions of the classical theatre (especially Seneca) and native Eng. subject matter and forms are crossed very swiftly, and a wide variety of tragedies suddenly appears—of revenge, of honor, of ambition, of love, pride or blind heroism, and of many other kinds. The large casts of characters in these plays, their complicated balancing of tragic and comic elements, plot and subplot, hero and fool, their vivid and violent action and frequent passages of philosophical reflection, and their richly metaphoric blank verse, interspersed with rhymed verse and songs, render these plays in many ways unique in the history of world theatre. Though Shakespeare's tragedies—from Romeo and Juliet (ca. 1595) to Coriolanus (1608)—are the masterpieces of this period, many writers, from Marlowe through Webster, Beaumont and Fletcher, Middleton, and so on, produce tragedies of great poetic power. Like Shakespeare, they often employ a language which ranges from lyric to rhetoric, from prose to formal couplets and blank verse, from simple exposition to a highly embellished figurative style.

Fr. t., like the Gr., focuses upon a few characters, usually historical or mythological, confronting one another at a moment of crisis. It is unlike the Eng., which pursues the development of several characters through a variety of events and changes of mood. Though the first Fr. writers of t. share something of the native linguistic exuberance of earlier writers like Rabelais, the triumph of the unities in France, under the influence of Richelieu and others, prompts tragedians to turn toward matter drawn from Spain, Rome, and Greece, and toward discipline and decorum in style. The Golden Age of Fr. t. develops from Le Cid of Corneille (1606-84), with its emphasis upon conflicts between love and duty, to the more perfectly proportioned tragedies of Racine (1639-99), with their psychologically subtle studies of irresistible passion, conveyed in masterfully controlled alexandrines. In the 18th and 19th c., the heroic figures of 17th-c. t. become either more commonplace or more extravagant. In the drame tragique and the drame bourgeois, Fr. classical t. is replaced, as t. is in England, by various forms of melodrama and tragicomedy, and poetry is almost wholly replaced by prose. Among the few remaining writers of verse t., Voltaire combines 17th-c. forms with 18th-c. attitudes, and Hugo heralds the triumph of romanticism. In the 18th and early 19th c., several writers in other countries of Europe produce verse t., or near-t., of great power, especially the It. Alfieri (1749-1803), the Rus. Pushkin (1799-1837), and the Germans Goethe (1749-1832) and Schiller (1759-1805), followed by Kleist, Grillparzer, and others.

Since the 17th c., t. throughout the Western world has undergone several fundamental changes. The assumptions of neoclassicism, romanticism, and of related movements of the past hundred years or so, such as naturalism or realism, are in varying ways quite different from those that underlie both ancient t. and that of the 16th and 17th c. With a vanishing of a pervasive belief in and of images for the interrelatedness of all things, the dramatist's placing of man's struggle in a mysterious cosmos at once of nature, of human society, and of the divine becomes increasingly difficult. After the 17th c. and the disappearance of the partly communal or ceremonial function of the drama—a function which prompted audiences to seek edification as well as entertainment, through a heightened and compressed poetic language—there has developed an enormous new reading public for the novel, and thus new writers who wished to explore the basic problems in more relaxed and expansive forms. This new public has often sought dramatic forms that are less demanding—images of itself less aristocratic or uncompromising than those provided by earlier t., and less unsentimentally detached than those provided by much earlier comedy. This is not to say, of course, that Ibsen and Strindberg, Chekhov, Hauptmann, Shaw, Pirandello, O'Neill, and other dramatists, writing chiefly in prose during the last century or so, have not written great or at least impressive plays. But, with the possible exception of Ibsen, the work of these playwrights cannot be said to equal in scope and expressive power the work of the greatest of modern novelists, who have attempted and achieved something commensurate with earlier verse t. In a world skeptical, as it has had to become, of "heroes" or of innate superiority founded upon birth or class, and often distrustful of independent action which threatens the fabric of society, the novelists have probably managed to create the only images of human life in our time worthy to be set alongside those of Aeschylus, Racine, or Shakespeare. In another form of theatre in the 19th c., t. has come to fullest expressiveness in opera, especially in the work of Wagner and Verdi. The work of the few modern dramatists who have written something like verse t. in recent times—Yeats, Synge, Eliot, Claudel, Brecht, Lorca, and others—may, however, lead to further experimentation and achievement.

A. E. Haigh, The Tragic Drama of the Greeks (1896); A. C. Bradley, Shakespearean T. (1904); G. Norwood, Gr. T. (1920); M. de Unamuno, The Tragic Sense of Life, tr. J.E.C. Flitch (1921); F. Nietzsche, "The Birth of T.," Complete Works, I (1924); W. B. Yeats, "Tragic Theatre," Essays (1924); H. C. Lancaster, A Hist. of Fr. Dramatic Literature in the 17th C. (1929-42); A. A. Tilley, Three Fr. Dramatists (1933); H.D.F. Kitto, Gr. T. (1939); D. L. Savory, Jean Racine (1940); M. E. Prior, The Language of T. (1947); M. Turnell, The Cl. Moment (1947); L. Spitzer, Linguistics and Lit. Hist. (1948); C. Leech, Shakespeare's Tragedies and Other Studies in the 17th C. Drama (1950); A. Sewall, Character and Society in Shakespeare (1951); C. Whitman, Sophocles (1951); Tragic Themes in Western Lit., ed. C. Brooks (1955); T. R. Henn, The Harvest of T. (1956); H. J. Muller, The Spirit of T. (1956); Frye; L. Lowenthal, Lit. and the Image of Man (1957); R. Langbaum, The Poetry of Experience (1957); R. Lattimore, The Poetry of Gr. T. (1958); R. B. Sewall, The Vision of T. (1959); D. D. Raphael, The Paradox of T. (1960); R. Ornstein, The Moral Vision of Jacobean T. (1960); G. Steiner, The Death of T. (1961); E. Olson, Tr. and the Theory of Drama (1961). See also J. Jones, On Aristotle and Gr. T. (1962); Le Théâtre tragique, ed. J. Jacquot (1962); T.: Modern Essays in Crit., ed. L. Michel and R. B. Sewall (1963). R.J.D.

TRAGIC FLAW. The defect in character which brings about the ruin of the protagonist. Before tragedy had been differentiated from ritual, there was no need to "understand" the fall of the hero. He fell because the ceremony demanded his fall, much as a dancer performs a pirouette because the choreographer calls for one. The first step in the transition from ritual to problem play is the idea that characters suffer because of "fate" or "destiny." The tragedies of Aeschylus, still close to the primitive myths which inspired them, emphasize fate. When fate is identified with the will of the gods, as in Prometheus Bound, the gods necessarily emerge as cruel taskmasters who derive pleasure from the agonies of the hero.

Aristotle's Poetics contains the first—and still a basic—discussion of t.f. (Gr. hamartia), although critics disagree concerning the interpretation of several of his remarks and the proper definition of hamartia. According to Aristotle the tragic hero must have nobility (be "better than" ourselves, but he must also have a defect: "... the intermediate kind of personage, a man not pre-eminently virtuous and just, whose misfortune, however, is brought upon him not by vice and depravity but by some error of judgment. . . ." It should be noted that this is not a moral flaw. The Aristotelian definition takes us one step beyond the tragedy of fate, but it does not justify interpreting the tragic catastrophe as the just punishment of some crime committed by the protagonist. It combines two discordant elements, nobility and proneness to error, without reconciling them. It thus suggests the element of paradox which seems essential to the greatest tragedy.

Later critics tended to destroy the Aristotelian balance by eliminating the paradox. In consonance with the pervasive classical theory of paideia (literature as education), they emphasized the moral implications of the t.f. The t.f. became a vice—usually hamartia was interpreted as "pride"—and the fall of the protagonist served to illustrate the folly of succumbing to vice. To Sir Philip Sidney, for example, tragedy "openeth the greatest wounds, and showeth forth the ulcers that are covered with tissue, that maketh kings fear to be tyrants, and tyrants manifest their tyrannical humors. . . ." Something like this view of tragedy can be found in germinal form in Euripides (Medea, Hippolytus), and in less attractive but more consistent form in Seneca (e.g., Thyestes, Hercules Furens). Despite its logical soundness, it was damaging to tragedy in the Hellenistic and late Roman period. The more vice was emphasized, the less noble became the tragic hero. In Seneca, the hero's fall is generally so well deserved that it fails to move the reader any more than a newspaper report announcing the execution of a convicted criminal.

Traces of classical theory persisted during the Middle Ages in authors like Euanthius, Isidore of Seville, and Vincent of Beauvais, but tragedy itself was a dead form. Its rebirth began with medieval religious dramas (Quem quaeritis, the Corpus Christi plays), which were like the earliest Gr. dramas in being ritualistic. The first theory of tragedy to be found in medieval writers resembles Gr. fatalism. According to the tradition traced by Willard Farnham (The Medieval Heritage of Elizabethan Tragedy) from Boccaccio, Chaucer, and Lydgate through The Mirror for Magistrates, a tragedy was defined as the fall of a great man from high station because of fickle fortune. At first, character was unimportant. Men rose or fell as Fortune turned her wheel, not because of virtues or defects of character.

TRAGICOMEDY

Although this view persisted in the 16th c. and even had some influence on Shakespeare (Romeo and Juliet, Lear), it gradually gave way to the theory of the t.f.

16th-c. theory was dominated by two forces, humanism and Christianity. These combined to emphasize the moral purpose of literature (a revived paideia), and the didactic theory of tragedy prevailed until the late 18th c. Aristotle's Poetics was read to conform to this theory by critics such as Robortello, Maggi, and Varchi; and the moral theory of t.f. appears in numerous eclectic works such as Tasso's Discorsi, Minturno's De Poeta, Corneille's prefaces, Sidney's Defense, and Dryden's essays. The practice of Shakespeare and his Eng. contemporaries tends to conform to critical theory in a general way (e.g., Macbeth and Othello can be read as exemplary, the one illustrating the folly of ambition, and the other, of jealousy), but the didacticism is never simple, and there are many mythic and irrational elements which were unknown to the critics. In fact, several scholars have denied that Aristotle is applicable to Shakespeare. Neoclassic drama (Garnier, Racine, Corneille, Dryden) is somewhat more explicitly didactic, and becomes still more so in the 18th c. (Voltaire, Addison). During this period tragedy degenerated into pompous moralizing seen at its dull best in a work like Addison's Cato, and at its worst in Lillo's London Merchant.

During the romantic period writers consciously rebelled against neoclassic rationalism. Shakespeare's and Aeschylus were praised at the expense of Corneille and Euripides; and there was a marked effort to produce a tragedy with mythic overtones. The most successful example of this effort is Goethe's Faust, in which the convention of t.f. is employed with something of an Aristotelian balance between nobility and error, and myth and morality; however, the works of Schiller (Wallenstein) and Kleist (Penthesilea) also deserve mention. Fr. and Eng. romantics (e.g. Hugo, Shelley, Browning) worked in the same direction as the Germans but were less successful. Modern dramatists from Ibsen and Strindberg through Eliot and Arthur Miller have generally followed the romantics in avoiding a simple, moral explanation of the t.f. At times (especially Yeats and Synge) they have gone behind Aristotle to the mythic roots of tragedy. Both tendencies have been healthy. They illustrate the paradox that the t.f. is both a necessary element in first-rate tragedy, and a factor which can destroy tragedy if not used with great care. O.B.H.

For bibliography see TRAGEDY.

TRAGICOMEDY. The term "t." came from Plautus' facetious reference to the unconventional mixture of kings and gods and servants in his own Amphitryon as tragicocomoedia. The idea of t. as poetic drama that combined elements of both tragedy and comedy was at least as old as Euripides and Aristotle; Euripides wrote tragedies with a happy ending, e.g. Alcestis and Iphigenia in Tauris, and Aristotle remarked in the Poetics that the popular audience preferred tragedy with a double ending—"an opposite issue for the good and bad personages"—to a single unhappy issue. Moreover, Aristotle admitted that a successful tragedy could be based on a fictitious argument, like that of comedy, although most tragic poets used plots drawn from historic or legendary matter.

T. in modern times stemmed from two sources: (1) classical theory and practice, (2) the "people's choice," namely, the reward of virtue and the punishment of vice. There was some overlapping, but the two branches can be distinguished, the classical one springing from classical tragedy and the popular one from the native mysteries, miracles, moralities, and chronicle plays which freely mingled kings with clowns, tears with mirth. Neoclassical t. developed in Italy under the guidance of Giraldis Cinthio, who wrote several tragedies with a happy ending which he called mixed tragedies (tragedie miste). Cinthio distrusted Plautus' tragicocomoedia, but admitted that his own Altile (1543) could be called a tragicomedia. His mixed tragedies combined plots patterned after those of the comic poet Terence with the royal or noble characters of tragedy and attempted the lofty style of Seneca and Euripides. The author justified his violation of the classical prescription for separate tragic and comic genres by citing the authority of Aristotle and the example of Euripides. Popular t., on the other hand, developed as an extension of medieval practice, which more often than not ignored classical prescriptions, and this popular t. appeared as "tragical comedies" or "comical tragedies" or "histories," with serious main plots and comic subplots. The L. school plays of the Christian Terence and vernacular tragicomedies flourished side by side in France, Holland, Germany, and England.

These classical and popular branches grew together before the end of the 16th c. While Cinthio catered to the popular taste for poetic justice, he never admitted comic incidents, sentiments, or diction in his mixed tragedies. One of his successors, Giovanni Battista Guarini, drawing upon still another tradition which lent itself to t., i.e. the pastoral, wrote the best known t. of the century, the Pastor fido, and then prescribed formulas for the "new" genre in the critical controversy that followed the appearance of his play. Like Cinthio, Guarini mingled the great personages and lofty sentiments of tragedy with the comic order of plot; unlike Cinthio, he admitted some comic incidents, characters, sentiments, and diction as well. In his Compendio della poesia tragicomica (1601), he carefully explained what he was trying to do. Of special interest is his insistence upon a middle style of poetry between tragic grandeur and comic plainness: "In the Pastor fido the verse is not turgid, not noisy, not dithyrambic. Its periods are not prolonged, not short, not intricate, not hard, not difficult to understand; they need not be re-read many times. Its figures of speech are taken from significant qualities, from proper and not from remote qualities. Its diction is clear but not low, proper but not vulgar, figurative but not enigmatical, beautiful but not affected, sustained but not inflated, pliant but not languishing; and, to conclude in a word, such as is not remote from common speech and yet not close to that of the common herd."

Guarini's own style hardly realized this ideal, but both his critical prescriptions and his "Faithful Shepherd" exerted a widespread influence in France and England as well as in Italy. Jean de Mairet in France and John Fletcher in England, for example, reproduced both the theory and the practice of Guarini. Moreover, leading dramatic poets of both these countries—e.g. Garnier, Hardy, Mairet, Corneille, Du Ryer, Rotrou, Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakespeare, Marston, Thomas Heywood, Massinger, Shirley, Dryden, Davenant—wrote tragicomedies.

When poetic drama went out of fashion, as it did in the 18th c., i. in the old sense disappeared except for an occasional tour de force like Rostand's Cyrano, and was succeeded in the theatre by the prosaic drame and problem play. It might be said, however, that the spirit of t., with its mingling of tragic and comic genres, continues in poetry under the heritage of "metaphysical" poetry, which unites wit with seriousness and often employs in one way or another the old device of "tragic king-comic people."—H. C. Lancaster, The Fr. T. (1907); F. H. Ristine, Eng. T. (1910); W. Empson, Some Versions of Pastoral (1935); E. M. Waith, The Pattern of T. in Beaumont and Fletcher (1952); M. T. Herrick, T. (1955); K. S. Guthke, Gesch. und Poetik der deutschen Tragikomödie (1961).

M.T.H.

and will seem an unshakable truism to anyone whose conception of poetry is limited to those kinds. The extent to which a poetic effect relies on the sound of words, or on their tricks of context or association, is a measure of its resistance to the translating process; on the other hand, quite complicated structures of imagery will often metaphorphose virtually intact, and the gnomic and aphoristic can come through with remarkable force. The first scientific statement about this subject was made by Ezra Pound in 1933, when he remarked of his three "components of poetry," phanopoeia, melopoeia, and logopoeia, that the first can be translated and the second cannot, while the third, though it is untranslatable, implies an attitude of mind, a "tone," which will frequently pass through paraphrase. Obviously a great deal depends on what the translator regards as the main strand of the original, and what he is willing to modify or abandon as secondary; it was because the 18th c. chiefly prized the classical poets as transmitters of moral wisdom that it failed to suppose them untranslatable, the translator's task being chiefly to supply an Eng. mode of elegance which should correspond to the concision inherent in the original tongues. The epigraphs to Johnson's essays afford a handy anthology of this genre.

On the other hand, just as "Forlorn! The very word is like a bell" achieves an effect restricted to the Eng. language, so one could hardly expect Homer's poluphloisboio thalasses to survive a divorce from the Gr.; and anyone preoccupied with the Homeric "surge and thunder" or the Virgilian cello sonorities will naturally find prose translations less offensive than any verse which perforce scamps these qualities. It follows that a very large class of distinguished translations serve to define the aspects of the originals which the translators found not merely reproducible but essential. Dryden's Aeneid, for instance, doesn't provide an impression of Virgil's effects but an analysis of them; there is, typically, a separate word for each nuance Dryden could discover in the original: he rendered "varium et mutabile semper femina" by "Woman's a various and changeful thing" to register the presence of neuter adjectives. Pope's Iliad, on the other hand, represents a highly selective understanding of Homer, in whom Pope seems to have permitted himself to perceive only what his exceptionally supple and substantial idiom could regenerate. Into yet a third species fall the fidelities obtained when some affinity of temperament, or some intuition of analogous historical situations, underlies the translator's ability and willingness to confront the theme his author confronted and write, as if for the first time, an analogous poem by pursuing analogous processes. The best parts of Marianne Moore's Fables of La Fontaine reproduce his stanzaic schemes not because they are part of the problem set but because analysis has disclosed their expressive appropriateness; the idiom remains sufficiently Miss Moore's to sustain an illusion that, given the theme, she would have written the poem she did if La Fontaine had never existed.

These three kinds of tr., differing in their manner of apprehending the original, all have the air of lying within the compass of the translator's normal idiom. Another kind of translator entirely—Marlowe in the Amores or Pound in the Seafarer—is concerned neither with domesticating the familiar classics nor with giving his reader some idea of the contents of the unfamiliar, but with enhancing the resources of his own language by incorporating into it poetic qualities hitherto foreign. (This motive is to be distinguished from, say, Pope's, who was less concerned with extending the Eng. language to encompass the strangeness of Homer's than with consolidating Eng. literature by incorporating an Iliad within it.) The Seafarer isn't a performance with an existing Eng. idiom into which the sense of the original is put; it is the continuous invention of an idiom necessary to accommodate the Anglo-Saxon, and henceforth available to other poets for other uses. Much Renaissance song-writing, with an eye on L. or It. models, constitutes invention of this order; so do Chaucer's translations and adaptations from the It. and Fr.

In a final category we have the transfusion of foreign blood into the veins of an independent creation: the passages of L. rescription in Pound's Homage to Sextus Propertius, the intermittently intimate paraphrases of the Filostrato in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde, Shakespeare condensing whole paragraphs of Plutarch (North's Eng. Plutarch, it is true) into his late plays. These examples serve to emphasize the place of tr. in the system of allusion by which, from Virgil to Eliot, literature has always grown.

The misunderstandings that make for bad tr. are worth enumerating. Inadequate acquaintance with the original will naturally lead to mistakes, but what prevents an inferior tr. from holding the reader's interest is less likely to be inaccuracy than incompetence in managing the new language, or an imperfect idea of its resources. Though he cannot know his original too well, it is easy for the scholarly translator to be too familiar with it. Familiarity blunts his sense of when it is best to be literal; though all his predecessors had registered the adjective in one way or another, Pound was the first to notice that Sophocles was calling Nessus an "old ruffian with hair on his chest."

A tr., so far as the reader is concerned, is a poem written in his own language. He cannot be expected to take an interest in the translator's sense of duty toward the original, though this commonly accounts for dead passages. The first mistake of the inept translator is unwillingness to leave anything out, though reflection will show the wisdom of not admitting into the new poem what one can't cause to function within it. The classic instance is the usual tr. of Aeschylus, rendered unreadable through a determination to reproduce Gr. syntax, though Eng. word order is thereby rendered impenetrable and a host of words incorporated whose function in the original is wholly syntactic. The second cause of failure is uncertainty about why the original is worth translating: not why it has some claim on the attention of a specialist, but why it is needed in the economy of the new language or in the paideuma of the new reader. The third is unsuitable choice of idiom: T. S. Eliot noted in 1920 that Gilbert Murray, having "stretched the Greek brevity to fit the loose frame of William Morris, and blurred the Greek lyric to the fluid haze of Swinburne," had "interposed between Euripides and ourselves a barrier more impenetrable than the Greek language." To this is related the not uncommon supposition that an idiom once chosen is simpler to sustain than it is. To the acres of mechanical couplets turned out in the shadow of Pope may be added the reams of "free verse" to which 20th c. translators have had recourse under the impression that it is a form so unexact as to be no more difficult than bad prose.

While it is a fallacy to suppose that any tr. can be definitive, it is equally fallacious to suppose that a new tr. eclipses an old one solely by being "up to date." The translations in the following list are not offered as standard versions; they are either of historical or technical interest, like Browning's versions of Euripides, or else they uphold certain criteria for the writing of Eng. verse better than do other or later versions of the same works. Versions of single short poems, like Ben Jonson's Come, my Celia, have not been included, nor have works like Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat which occupy an ambiguous ground between tr. and original composition.

SOME SIGNIFICANT TRANSLATIONS INTO ENG.: A. Golding, Ovid's Metamorphoses (1565-67); C. Marlowe, Ovid's Elegies (1590); G. Chapman, Homer's Iliad (1598-1611); J. Dryden, Poems of Virgil (1697); A. Pope, Homer's Iliad (1715-20); R. Browning, Balaustion's Adventure (1871) and Aristophanes' Apology (1875); E. Pound, The Translations of Ezra Pound (1953) and "The Women of Trachis," in HR, 6 (1954); M. Moore, The Fables of La Fontaine (1954).

HISTORICAL AND THEORETICAL: J. Dryden,

Preface to Ovid's Epistles Translated by Several Hands (1680); W. Dillon, Earl of Roscommon, An Essay on Tr. Verse (1684); J. Dryden, Dedication to The Works of Virgil (1697); A. Pope, Preface to The Iliad of Homer (1715); T. Parnell, Preface to Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice (1717); J. Spence, An Essay on Mr. Pope's Odyssey (1726-27); W. Benson, Letters Concerning Poetical Translations (1739); A. F. Tytler, Baron Woodhouselee, Essay on the Principles of Tr. (1791); M. Arnold, On Translating Homer, Three Lectures (1861); J. Conington, "Eng. Translations of Virgil," QR, 110 (1861); O. L. Hatcher, "Aims and Methods of Elizabethan Translators," Englische Studien, 44 (1910); C. Whibley, "Translators," Cambridge Hist. of Eng. Lit., iv (1909) and "Tudor Translators," in his Lit. Studies (1919); F. R. Amos, Early Translations of Tr. (1920); J. W. Draper, "The Theory of Tr. in the 18th C.," Neophil, 6 (1920); D. Bush, "Eng. Translations of Homer," PMLA, 41 (1926); R. C. Whitford, "Juvenal in England, 1750-1802," PQ, 7 (1928); F. O. Matthiessen, Tr., an Elizabethan Art (1931); E. Pound, ABC of Reading (1933) and Lit. Essays (1954); H. J. C. Grierson, Verse Tr. (1949); W. Frost, Dryden and the Art of Tr. (1955); On Tr., ed. R. A. Brower (1959); The Craft and Context of Tr., ed. W. Arrowsmith and R. Shattuck (1961).—See also The Poem Itself, ed. S. Burnshaw (1960) for an interesting approach to the problem of tr. H.K.

TRIAD. In Gr. lyric poetry (e.g., the odes of Pindar and Bacchylides) a combination of strophe, antistrophe, and epode (qq.v.). K.M.A.

TRIBE OF BEN, sons of Ben. A name adopted by a group of Eng. poets of the first half of the 17th c. who wrote lyric poetry strongly influenced by the precept and example of Ben Jonson (1572-1637). Most of them imbibed Jonsonian wit and classicism in highly informal meetings at various London taverns frequented by their master. In their lyrics, the sons of Ben cultivated a tight and chiseled form, modeled on the lyrics of the Gr. Anthology, and employed, in general, shorter lines and crisper rhythms than their Elizabethan predecessors. Their preference for the genres of epigram and satire also indicates their classical orientation. The Jonsonian "school" represents one direction of revolt from the Italianate and moralistic aspects of the "school of Spenser" (q.v.), the other being represented by the "metaphysical poetry" (q.v.) initiated by Donne. The greatest of the tribe of Ben was Robert Herrick (1591-1634), who praised his master in An Ode for Ben Jonson (1637). Others include Carew, Suckling, Lovelace, Randolph, Cartwright, and Godolphin.—K. A.

McEuen, Cl. Influence upon the Tribe of Ben (1939).

TRIBRACH (Gr. "of 3 short syllables"). Such a foot (~~~) in Gr. and L. verse was usually a resolved iamb or trochee. It is seldom found as an independent foot. The ictus, as a rule, falls on the second syllable if it replaces an iamb and on the first if it replaces a trochee.—Koster. P.S.C.

TRIHEMIMERAL. See CAESURA.

TRIOLOGY. A group of 3 tragedies presented by each poet at the dramatic festivals in Athens. The general name for such a group was didascalía, "a teaching." However, if the 3 tragedies dealt with the same subject matter and were combined into a single and connected whole, they were referred to as a trilogy. This practice is said to have been introduced by Aeschylus, whose Oresteia is the only complete t. that has come down to us, but later dramatists, beginning with Sophocles, abandoned it in favor of single plays each dealing with a different story. In modern usage, the term is applied to a literary (or operatic) work, written in 3 parts, each of which is in itself a complete unit. Shakespeare's Henry VI, Schiller's Wallenstein, and O'Neill's Mourning Becomes Electra are examples in the field of drama.—A. E. Haigh, The Attic Theatre (1907); R. C. Flickinger, The Gr. Theater and its Drama (4th ed., new impression, 1960). P.S.C.

TRIMETER (Gr. "of 3 measures"). Line composed of 3 measures, each measure being in classical verse a pair of iambic feet (~~~), or else a spondee followed by an iambus (---). Developed (probably) by Archilochus of Paros, the t. is the usual meter for invective and for dialogue in Gr. drama. A caesura (q.v.) was obligatory in the inside of the third or fourth foot. Resolution (q.v.) of a short into 2 longs gave Gr. tragedy the possibility of an anapaest (~~~) in the first foot, a dactyl (---) in the first and third, and a tribrach (~~~) in any of the first 4. In comedy, resolution was more freely allowed. The L. modification of the t., the senarius (q.v.), is the characteristic dialogue meter of Old L. drama. In the senarius of the drama of the republican period and popular verse of later times the Gr. distinction between the even and odd feet was abandoned; spondees were allowed in the first 5 feet, and resolution was carried to its extreme (thus giving the proceleusmatic [~~~~] as another possible form). This Roman disregard of the "Dipody Law" (that the alternate feet should not exceed the value of 3 morae or shorts) is thought by some to be explicable only in terms of Roman regard for word-accent. A semiaccidental form of the t. was popular in the Middle Ages:

TRIPLET

O tu qui servas || armis ista moenia
(Carmen Mutinense)

Eng. t. (a 3-foot line; strictly speaking, the term is incorrectly used for the Eng. 3-stress line) tends to be monotonous. Variation is often secured by the use of a dimeter (as in Browning's A Woman's Last Word) or tetrameter in a trimeter pattern. See IAMB.—Hardie; J. Descroix, Le trimètre iambique (1931).

W.B.

TRIMÈTRE. Term applied to the 12-syllable vers romantique or romantic alexandrine, which has 3 divisions to the line, as distinguished from the 12-syllable classical alexandrine or tétramètre (q.v.), which has 4. A memorable example of the trimètre occurs in Baudelaire's Que diras-tu ce soir: "A la très belle, | à la très bonne, | à la très chère . . ." The t. often appeared in the 16th c. in the rather free alexandrines of the Pléiade and survived the classical period especially in the comedy and secondary genres, where it was used by Molière and La Fontaine. It came back into more general favor with the romantic poets of the 19th c. who developed its rhythms, employed it more widely, and championed its use as part of their moderate reform of Fr. versification.—M. Grammont, Le vers français (1913) and Petit traité de versification française (5^e éd. revue, 1924).

A.G.E.

TRIOLET. A Fr. fixed form. It is composed of 8 lines and uses only 2 rhymes, disposed in the following scheme: AB aA ab AB (a capital letter indicates a repeated line): "Easy is the triole, / If you really learn to make it! / Once a neat refrain you get, / Easy is the triole. / As you see!—I pay my debt / With another rhyme. Deuce take it, / Easy is the triole, / If you really learn to make it!" (W. E. Henley). The challenge of the form lies in managing the intricate repetition so that it seems to be natural and inevitable, and in achieving in the repetitions a variety of meaning or, at least, a shift in emphasis.

According to O. Bloch and W. von Wartburg (Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française, 3d ed., 1960), the word "triolet" is not found until 1486, but the poem, as we know it, is much older and, as the simplest form of the rondel (q.v.), can be traced back to the 13th c., e.g., in the Cléomadès of Adenet-le-Roi. Subsequently, the form was cultivated by such medieval poets as Deschamps and Froissart. It began to be neglected toward the end of the 15th c. and fell into disuse during the 16th, although it had a brief vogue as revived by Vincent Voiture and Jean de La Fontaine in the 17th c. It was revived again in the 19th c. by Alphonse Daudet and, particularly, by Théodore de Banville.

With the exception of a few religious triplets composed in 1651 by the obscure devotional poet Patrick Carey, there were no triplets written in Eng. before recent times. Introduced by Robert Bridges, the form enjoyed considerable favor in the later years of the 19th c. The modern writers of triplets—Austin Dobson, H. C. Bunner, W. E. Henley and others—recognized, on the whole, the suitability of the form to light or humorous themes.—Kastner; P. Champion, Hist. poétique du XV^e s. (2 v., 1923); M. Françon, "La pratique et la théorie du rondeau et du rondel chez Théodore de Banville," MLN, 52 (1937); states that triplets, rondels, and rondeaux are a single genre with variations; L. Spitzer, "T.," RR, 39 (1948).

A.P.

TRIPLE METER. (1) Any poetic measure consisting of 3 units, such as a foot of 3 syllables. Hence anapestic, dactylic, tribrachic, cretic, bacchiac feet, etc. are a sort of t.m. (2) Also any larger unit consisting of 3 feet or measures; thus a tripod is a measure of 3 feet. Fr. 12-syllable trimètre (q.v.) is an example of t.m. Spenser's "Iambic Trimetrum" (cf. correspondence with Gabriel Harvey) also employs a variety of t.m., which is more common in quantitative than in syllabic verse, especially L. hymns.

R.O.E.

TRIPLE RHYME. See MULTIPLE OR POLY-SYLLABIC RHYME.

TRIPLET, tercet. A verse unit of 3 lines, usually containing rhyme, employed as a stanzaic form, as a variation from couplet structure, or, occasionally, as a complete poem in itself. Known to It. poetry as the terzina (see TERZA RIMA). "Triplet" is a generic term; "tercet" generally implies the use of rhyme. The sestet (q.v.) of a sonnet is frequently made up of two triplets. The interlinking sestine of Dante's Divina Commedia are certainly the outstanding example of triplet composition; other noteworthy users of the t. include Donne, who wrote most of his verse epistles in monorhymed iambic triplets; Herrick, whose Whenas in Silks my Julia Goes is written in the same stanza form; and Shelley, who employed terza rima in his Ode to the West Wind and The Triumph of Life. William Carlos Williams has used free verse arranged in irregular triplets in some of the poems of his volume The Desert Music. A special use of the t. is exemplified in the heroic couplet writings of the Eng. poets of the Augustan

TRIPODY

Age. In the poems of Dryden and, to a lesser degree, in those of Pope, the heroic couplets are sometimes varied by the interposition of 3 rhyming lines: "A fiery Soul, which working out its way, / Fretted the Pigmy Body to decay: / And o'r inform'd the Tenement of Clay" (Dryden, Absalom and Achitophel). The t. has never been used as widely as the couplet or the quatrain (qq.v.).

TRIPODY (Gr. "3 feet"). Three metrical feet treated as one. The most common tripodies in classical poetry are the dactylic, trochaic, iambic and anapaestic. TRISTICH. A group or stanza of 3 lines. See also TRIPLET. P.S.C.

TRISEMIC (Gr. "of 3 time-units"). Term applied to the principle whereby musical theorists like Aristoxenus (4th c. B.C.) and Aristides Quintilianus (3d or 4th c. A.D.) postulated the existence of syllables equivalent in length to 3 morae. See CLASSICAL PROSODY, DISEMIC, and MORA. R.J.G.

TROBAR CLUS. The intentionally difficult or hermetic style cultivated by many Old Prov. poets, in contrast to the trobar leu or easy style of less sophisticated writing. It may be divided into the trobar clus proper and the trobar ric. Both are difficult, but not to the same degree or for the same reasons. Exponents of the t.c. (e.g., Marcabru) had, or fancied that they had, something profound to say; and they increased the profundity of their subject by cloaking it in enigmatic words, deliberately designed to keep out the uninitiated. Adepts of the t.r. (e.g., Arnaut Daniel) make no pretense of profundity, but perform incredible feats of virtuosity in juggling with rare rhymes and in overcoming other technical obstacles. The result is sometimes amusing, often ingenious, and usually quite superficial.—Jeanroy, II. F.M.C.

TROCHEE, choree (respectively from Gr. "running" and "belonging to the dance"). A metrical unit, in quantitative verse, of a long syllable followed by a short:

—; antē

The rhythm of the trochaic foot was therefore the reverse of the iambic (q.v.), i.e. "falling" instead of "rising." In Gr. and L. verse, where the feet could be varied by the use of spondees or tribrachs (less often by dactyls or anapaests), trochaic measures were used from the time of Archilochus onward, particularly in lyric and drama. (In comedy especially they lent themselves to rapid movement and dancing). Most common was the trochaic tetrameter catalectic, i.e., $7\frac{1}{2}$ trochees or their variations called septenarius (q.v.) by the Romans. The term has been adopted into Eng. for the accentual foot of a stressed followed by an unstressed syllable:

˘ ˘
˘ x; silver

Though common in ME verse, the trochaic base was almost wholly absent from Eng. poetry until the end of the 16th c. when it was employed both in lyric and in dramatic monologues and songs:

Honour, | riches, | marriage | -blessing
(Shakespeare, Tempest 4.1.106)

The 4-foot line remained predominant until Blake, whose innovations in length and variation opened up the way for subsequent developments. The 19th c. saw more frequent and broader use, chiefly, however, as substitution in predominantly iambic lines; but by itself it has never been a favorite in Eng., owing no doubt to the difficulty of finding words or phrases to begin the line with a stressed syllable (cf. the variations in Milton's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso). Used mechanically, as in Hiawatha, the trochee becomes monotonous; but in short passages it is often handled with success.—J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); Baum; Hamer; Crusius; U. v. Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958). D.S.P.

TROPE. Ancient rhetoric in treating elocution or style as the presentation of thought and feeling in "decent and comely order" classified the language so arranged in schemes and tropes. Schemes are figures or patterns of speech which are out of the ordinary; they include figures of thought, which in the 16th c. were called figures of sentence or amplification, and figures of words. Tropes were figures also, but different in nature to the degree that they used words or phrases in senses that were not proper to them. These classifications were easy to maintain as such, but there was much confusion concerning the placing of particular figures. Antithesis was at once a scheme and a figure of thought. Periphrasis was sometimes classified as a trope and sometimes as a scheme. Metaphor, metonymy, synecdoche, and irony were central tropes. In the 16th c. metaphor and metonymy were regarded as tropes of words, and allegory, irony and hyperbole were tropes of sentences. The basis of these distinctions are in Aristotle and Isocrates, and a summary of the ancient teaching on tropes is made by Quintilian (8.6).

Elocution and style from early times were understood to belong equally to the arts of oratory and poetry, but the difficulty of maintaining the distinction in the nature of figures used by arts of different purpose increased with the sophistication of rhetorical practice and teaching and the allegorization of poetry in later Antiquity and the early Christian period. The root of the confusion lay in the doctrine that the orator himself must be moved, for in the extreme this was taken to justify ornament and figures for their own sake, a development of the emphasis of the pseudo-Ciceronian Ad Herennium. In the Middle Ages the Venerable Bede's work on schemes and tropes, which became a standard medieval text, initiated a tradition of stylistic rhetoric in England. From his analysis there led such doctrines that neither the Middle nor Low styles permitted the use of tropes, but that the High Style allowed ten of them, which were called "difficult ornaments." The treatment of tropes in the Renaissance went no farther than the extreme stylistic interpretation of Ramus, where schemes and tropes were regarded as the whole of elocution from which even considerations of grammar were excluded. It was not till the 18th c. and Vico that the base of the analysis was radically changed, with the doctrine that tropes belonged to the primitive imagination and were the necessary means of communication.

A special development in the use of tropes in the Middle Ages had spectacular consequences. An elaboration of the liturgy that is associated with the Carolingian Renaissance, and particularly in the rituals of Easter and the days preceding it, has been shown to have given rise to church drama itself. These tropes have been defined as verbal amplifications of passages in the authorized liturgy made to adorn the text, to enforce its meaning, and to enlarge its emotional appeal. One of the earliest examples is in the amplification of the Kyrie eleison:

Kyrie,
magnæ Deus potentia,
liberator hominis,
transgressoris mandati,
eleison.

The Introit of the Mass at Easter, "Quem quaeritis," developed into a completely dramatized form and detached from the Mass became, first, part of the Procession, then of the Matins, and later still was made into a representation of the Visitation.—A. Sorrentino, La Retorica e la Poetica di Vico (1927); W. G. Crane, Wit and Rhetoric in the Renaissance (1937); K. Burke, "Four Master Tropes," KR, 3 (1941); D. L. Clark, John Milton at Saint Paul's School (1948) and Rhetoric in Greco-Roman Education (1957); K. Young, The Drama of the Medieval Church (1951); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500-1700 (1956). J.A.

TROUBADOUR (from Prov. trobar, "invent"). A Prov. poet of the high Middle Ages. The troubadours flourished between 1100 and 1350 and were attached to various courts in the south of France. Their contributions to European poetry, which concern both subject matter and form, were of incalculable importance.

The troubadours made sexual love their almost exclusive theme, and developed the social phenomenon of courtly love (q.v.), which left its stamp on European culture for centuries. The principal features of the love extolled by the troubadours were: an attitude of subservience and fidelity to a cold and cruel mistress, exorbitant and quasi-religious praise of the lady's beauty, and a requirement that the love be extramarital. Though the love celebrated by the troubadours was sensual, their ideal of "pure" love prohibited sexual intercourse between the lovers—at least in theory. This prohibition had the effect of endowing any casual contact, gesture, or token with enormous erotic significance, and thus bequeathed to later European love poetry a whole vocabulary and grammar of amorous symbol. Most t. lyrics are, thus, amorous in the extreme, but some are satirical or political.

The major genres cultivated by the troubadours, who were at once poets and composers of music, were the canço d'amor (see CHANÇO), a love song, the pastorela (see PASTOURELLE), an account of the attempted seduction of a shepherdess by a poet, the alba (q.v.), a lament of lovers who must separate at the coming of dawn, the tenso, partimen, or joc-partit (qq.v.), debates on the fine points of the code of love, and the sirventes (q.v.), a political invective or satire. These genres were expressed in a variety of metrical forms, some of them, like the sestina (q.v.), of extraordinary complexity.

Among the troubadours whose work has come down to us are Guillaume d'Aquitaine, Arnaut Daniel, and Bertrand de Born. Some of the troubadours, such as Sordello, were Italians, although they composed in the Prov. established by tradition.

The t. influence on Dante and Petrarch was immense, in both theme and form. Indeed, the example of the troubadours quickened and formed the lyrical impulse throughout western Europe, as expressed in the poetry of the trouvères and Minnesinger (qq.v.) as well as in that of late medieval Portuguese and Sicilian poets.

F.J.W.; A.P.

For bibliog. see PROVENÇAL POETRY.

TROUVÈRE. Medieval poet of Northern France, especially Picardy. Contemporary of the troubadour (q.v.), who composed his poems in the langue d'oc of the South (or Prov.), the trouvère wrote in the langue d'oïl, which prevailed and became the Fr. language. In addition to courtly lyrical poetry, which shows the influence of the troubadour in form and sentiment, the trouvère composed chansons de geste (q.v.) and romans bretons. Notable trouvères include Jean Bodel, Blondel de Nesle, the Châtelain de Coucy, Conon de Béthune and Thibaud de Champagne.—Jeanroy, Origines; Minnesinger et trouvères, ed. I. Frank (I, texts, 1952) and J. M. Müller-Blattau (II, music, 1956); R. Dragonetti, La Technique poétique des trouvères dans la chanson courtoise (1960).

TRUNCATION (catalexis). The omission of the last (generally unstressed) syllable or syllables in a line of conventional metrical structure. A line lacking one syllable of the normal number is called catalectic; one lacking two is called brachycatalectic. (When no syllable is lacking, the line is acatalectic and when there are one or more syllables in excess of the normal number, the line is said to be hypercatalectic or hypermetrical, q.v.) Truncation is frequent in trochaic verse, where the line of complete trochaic feet tends to create an effect of monotony. The following trochaic lines exhibit t.: "Simple maiden, void of art, / Babbling out the very heart" (Ambrose Philips). T. is also frequently employed in dactylic lines to avoid an effect of excessive bounciness; Hood's second line is truncated: "Take her up tenderly, / Lift her with care." T. in the blank verse of the 17th-c. drama is frequently encountered in passages representing informal utterance: "Good morrow to this fair assembly" (Much Ado About Nothing 5.4). The term "initial t." is used to describe the omission of the first syllable of a (generally iambic) line. A line so truncated is also called a "headless" (acephalous) line. See also DEFECTIVE FOOT, LINE ENDINGS. P.F.

TRUTH AND POETRY. See BELIEF, PROBLEM OF; MEANING, PROBLEM OF; CRITICISM, FUNCTION OF (COGNITIVE THEORIES).

TUMBLING VERSE. A phrase first used by James I in his Reulis and Cautelis (1585) to apply to 4-foot trisyllabic (anapaestic or dactylic) verse in Eng. which goes back through the alliterative verse of the Middle Ages to the Old Germanic alliterative verse and probably even further to a common Indo-European meter: "I was wery forward and went me to rest." The meter was reinforced by the 6/8 dance tune of popular song and was much used in Elizabethan poetry (e.g., Tusser, Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, 1557). Aside from England the only European country in which this meter was prominent was Spain where, as the arte mayor (q.v.), it was used for the most serious poetry. Juan de Mena (ca. 1411–56), the most famous poet to use this measure, employed it in his chief work, El Laberinto.—Ker.

R.P.APR.

TURKISH POETRY. There is sufficient data i.e. vestiges of epics, to indicate that poetic sensibility must have dawned in the Turk. consciousness several centuries before Christ. However, the actual beginnings of the Turks' poetic tradition lie in the period between late 9th and mid-11th c. A.D. when Turk. tribes moved into and settled parts of Anatolia. The Oğuz Turks brought with them a dialect already rich in expressive resources and a developed popular literature. At the time, however, Anatolia was under the influence of Islam and of Arabic and Persian cultures. By the end of the 11th c., Turks became converted to Islam and imbibed its prevalent culture, including its philosophy and literature. Out of this assimilation came the first poetic work of stature that clearly bears the imprint of the new literary tradition with which the Turks became familiar: Kutadgu Bilig (1069 or 1070) by Yusuf Has Hacib. Composed in aruz (Arabic-Persian prosody), Kutadgu Bilig (The Knowledge of Bliss), which consists of close to 6,500 couplets, is a vast philosophical treatise in verse on government, justice, and ethics. Kâşgârlı Mahmut's Divan ü Lûgat-it Türk, a dictionary and grammar of the Turk. language, written in the period 1071–77, included many specimens (some fragmentary) of pre-Islamic and early Islamic Turk. poetry particularly in the epic, lyric, and didactic genres.

From the end of the 13th c., when the Ottoman state came into being through the mid-19th c., three main traditions of Turk. poetry evolved: (1) Persian-influenced Divan (classical) poetry, (2) Religious or Tekke poetry, (3) Indigenous folk poetry. From mid-19th c. through the present day, Turk. poetry has gone through an extensive European orientation.

DIVAN (CLASSICAL) POETRY. Divan poetry (also referred to as Court poetry), whose course ran almost parallel to the glories and decline of the Ottoman Empire, spanned over six centuries. Composed by and for an intellectual elite mostly affiliated with the Court, its main vehicle of expression was Anatolian Turk., with the Çağatay and Azeri dialects also boasting of some distinguished output. From beginning to end, classical Turk. poetry remained under the impact of Persian and Arabic poetry: It imitated and tried to emulate the verse forms, rhyme-and-rhythm patterns, meters, and mythology used by Persian and Arab poets. It also adopted a substantial portion of their vocabulary. Aruz, the quantitative prosody originated by Arabs, dominated Divan poetry. Aruz afforded a definite structure of its own and to suit its metric requirements Divan poets often deliberately distorted Turk. vowels or employed words of Arabic and Persian origin which lent themselves better to Aruz. Divan poetry also used the major verse forms of Persian and Arabic literature: gazel, kaside, mesnevî, rubâî, tuyûğ, sarkı (originally murabba), musammat, tarih (chronogram), etc.

Form reigned supreme over Divan poetry, with content of secondary importance. Content, most Divan poets felt, was the self-generating substance of a literary tradition whose concepts and values were not to be questioned, let alone renovated. At best, originality was considered fortuitous; they preferred to achieve perfection in craftsmanship and to equal, if not excel, their Turk. or Persian rivals by using the same subject matter as competently or more effectively.

Despite the tyranny of form, prominent Divan poets often attained a profound spirituality, a trenchant sensitivity, an overflowing eroticism. Perhaps no Divan poet can be said to show a broad range of poetic sensibilities. Tradition sanctioned not range, but depth. Between the given extremes of the continuum of subject matter, the masters, i.e. Fuzulî, Baki, Şeyh Galip et al., achieved an impressive profundity of passion expressed with gripping power—from self-glorification to self-abnegation, from agony to ebullient joy, from fanatic continence to uninhibited hedonism. Islamic mysticism, as the human soul's passionate yearning to merge with God, formed the superstructure of most of Divan poetry. In the hands of the first-rate poets, the Divan tradition produced a corpus of exquisite lyric and mystic poetry which has retained and will retain its impressive literary significance.

Early Divan masters were Şeyhî (d. ca. 1431), Ahmedî (1334-1413), Ahmet Paşa (d. 1497), Ahmed-i Dâî (15th c.), and Necatî (d. 1509). The greatest figures of the Divan tradition emerged in the period of the Ottoman Empire's grandeur. Fuzulî (1494-1556) stands as the most impressive creative artist of classical Turk. literature. He published three Divans (major collections of poems), one in Turk., one in Arabic, and one in Persian, in addition to several mesnevîs (verse narratives). His masterpiece, Leylâ vü Mecnun is a mesnevî of close to 4,000 couplets, in which Fuzulî made a philosophical and dramatic exploration into worldly and mystic love. Perhaps no other poet exerted as much influence as Fuzulî on the Divan poetry of the following centuries. Among his most memorable lines are: "Min cân olaydı kâş men-i dilşikestede / Tâ her biriyle bir gez olaydım fedâ sana" (I wish I had a thousand lives in this broken heart of mine / So that I could sacrifice myself for you once with each life). Fuzulî chose to write his Turk. poems in the Azerî dialect in the manner of Nesimî (d. 1404). Baki (1526-99) achieved wide fame for the aesthetic perfection of his secular gazels and kasides. Baki's lines and couplets often had an epigrammatic concentration; the following line, his best-known, has become a proverb among Turks: "Baki kalan bu kubbede bir hoş sedâ imiş" (What endures in this dome is but a pleasant sound). Hayalî (d. 1557) and Taşlıcalı Yahya Bey (d. 1582) attained renown for their craftsmanship and sensitive lyricism. Rûhî-i Bağdadi (d. 1605) composed a Terhib-i Bend, which still stands as a masterpiece of social and philosophical satire with a strong moral concern. The supreme satirist of the Divan tradition, however, was Nef'î (1582-1635) who, in his masterful kasides, courageously lampooned hypocrisy and affectation. Şeyhülislâm Yahya (1552-1644) produced refined gazels, while Nailî (d. ca. 1666) won renown for his elegant, delicate lyrics. Intellectual exploration and social commentary abounded in the poetry of Nâbî (1642-1712). Nedim (d. 1730) sang the joys of living and the beauties of nature (particularly in the city of Istanbul). He contributed to Divan poetry a lilting, entrancing style derived mainly from the colloquial Istanbul Turk. of his day. The last master of Divan poetry was Şeyh Galip (1757-99) who, in addition to a superb Divan, produced Hüsn ü Aşk (Beauty and Love), an allegorical work of passionate mysticism. Although the classical tradition continued until the early part of the 20th c., after Şeyh Galip it fostered no major figures and produced no work of literary significance.

RELIGIOUS OR TEKKE POETRY. Religious poetry flourished among the mystics, Muslim clergy, and the adherents of various doctrines and denominations. Members of the tekkes (theological centers) were particularly prolific in the domain of religious poetry, which drew upon and overlapped both Divan and folk traditions. Ahmet Yesevî (d. 1166) and Ahmet Fakih (d. ca. 1250) were early masters. Perhaps the greatest figure of religious literature was the poet-saint Mevlânâ Celâleddin-i Rumi (1207-73) who wrote a six-volume Persian mesnevî of nearly 26,000 couplets about the ways of mysticism. In late 13th and early 14th c., Sultan Veled (Mevlânâ's son), Aşık Paşa and Gülşehrî achieved distinction. The most renowned Turk. masterpiece to come out of the religious tradition was Mevlid-i Şerif (1409), composed by Süleyman Çelebi (d. 1422). Mevlid, an adulation of the Prophet Mahomet, is chanted as a requiem among Muslim-Turks. Two folk poets, Kaygusuz Abdal (15th c.) and Pir Sultan Abdal (16th c.), have made substantial contributions to Turk. religious poetry. Their poetry represents the Alevî-Bektâşî movement (long considered heretical), and is a deviation from and a reaction against some of the tenets of traditional Islam.

INDIGENOUS FOLK POETRY. Parallel to Divan poetry, Turk. folk poetry has run its own evolutionary course. Its roots lay in the epic tradition of the pre-Islamic times of the peripatetic Turk. tribes which handed down various epics. Although most of these epic poems became lost or did not remain intact, one major epic entitled Oğuznâme reveals that Turks had a developed poetic faculty long before they came under the influence of Islam-oriented Persian and Arabic cultures. The Dede Korkut Tales of the Oğuz tribes contain poems in rather free renditions which also stand at the source of the folk tradition. Folk poetry was created and kept alive to our day by the ozans, saz şairleri (poet-musicians) and âşiks. It has voiced, in its spontaneous, sincere, and often matter-of-fact fashion, the poetic sensibilities of the uneducated classes, in contrast to classical poetry which was composed and read by the intellectual elite. In indigenous verse forms, i.e. türkü, koşma, manî, destan, semâi, varsâğı, etc., mostly extemporized and sung to music, replete with assonances and inexact rhymes, and composed in simple syllabic meters, folk poetry harped on the themes of love, heroism, beauties of nature, and, at times, Islamic mysticism. Unsophisticated and unpretentious, folk poetry evolved a serene realism, an earthy humor, and a mellifluous lyric quality. Although the poems often lose part of their euphony when taken out of their musical context, the folk tradition still remains alive in Turkey's rural areas as well as among devotees of literature. It has exerted an appreciable influence on the Turk. poetry of modern times. In fact, many verse-makers in the late 19th and 20th c. have adopted the vivid rhythms and much of the vocabulary and idiom of folk poetry, not to mention its flair and flavor. One genius emerged out of the folk tradition: Yunus Emre (1238-1320/1). Equally at home with folk and Divan verse, he created a voluminous body of poetry (some of it is extinct) rich in philosophical content, intensely mystical, steeped in the best folk idiom, melodious, full of vivid imagery and fresh metaphor. Later centuries, dominated by Yunus Emre's impact, witnessed the first-rate works of Karacaoğlu (ca. 1606-1679/80), a poet of love and pastoral beauty, Âşık Ömer (d. 1707), Gevherî (d. ca. 1740), Dadaloğlu (1785-1868), Dertli (1772-1845), Bayburtlu Zihni (d. 1859), Erzurumlu Emrah (d. 1860) and Seyrani (1807-1866).

EUROPEANIZATION OF TURK. POETRY. Ottoman

Empire's decline reached a critical point by the middle of the 19th c. Younger Turk. intellectuals started seeking the Empire's salvation in technological development, political reform, and cultural progress fashioned after European models. The so-called Tanzimat (Transformations) of the 1840's aimed at realizing some of these far-reaching changes. A new orientation toward Europe (France, in particular) brought the younger poets into contact with the aesthetic theories and verse forms of French poetry. While aruz was not abandoned, experiments were undertaken with forms, rhythms, and styles. A reaction set in against words of Arabic and Persian origin. Poetry acquired a social awareness and a political function in the hands of some poets who endeavored to establish freedom within the country and to gain independence from external political domination. Ziya Paşa (1825-80), Şinasi (1826-71) who ushered new concepts and genres into Turk. literature, and Namik Kemal (1840-88) emerged as champions of nationalism. Recaizade Ekrem (1847-1914) and Abdülhak Hâmit Tarhan (1852-1937) echoed the French romantics. The latter, a prolific poet and author of numerous verse dramas, gained stature as a ceaseless renovator. His poetry, which covered a wide range of topics, had a philosophic bent as well as dramatic impact.

In the late 19th and early 20th c., under Sultan Abdülhamit's suppression, most Turk. poets retired into a world of innocent, picturesque beauty, where, in a mood of meek sentimentality and lackadaisical affection, they attempted to forge the aesthetics of the simple, the pure, and the delectable. Their lyric transformation of reality abounded in new rhythms and imaginative metaphors expressed by dint of a predominantly Arabic-Persian vocabulary and an appreciably relaxed aruz. A French-oriented group of poets, referred to as Servet-i Fünun after the literary magazine they published, became prominent on the literary scene. Its leader Tevfik Fikret (1867-1915) also wrote angry political poems against the Sultan's despotism and the Empire's crumbling institutions. His poetry represented a new direction for the formal and conceptual progress of Turk. poetry. Together with Cenap Şahabettin (1870-1934), Fikret furthered the Europeanization of modern verse.

In the same period, many traditions and forms of Turk. poetry were alive and active on the literary scene. Divan poetry was continued by a few minor poets. Folk poetry not only maintained much of its vigor but also exerted considerable influence on many younger poets who were striving to create a pervasive national consciousness and to purify the Turk. language by eliminating Arabic and Persian loan words. Ziya Gökalp (1875–1924), social philosopher and poet, wrote poems expounding the ideals and aspirations of Turk. nationalism. Mehmet Emin Yurdakul (1869–1944) and Rıza Tevfik Bölükbaşı (1869–1949) used folk meters and forms as well as an unadorned colloquial language in their poems. Mehmet Akif Ersoy (1873–1936), a meticulous craftsman and a deft master of aruz, wrote mainly of Turk. glory and of Islam's sumnum bonum. Eşref (1846–1912) emerged as Turkey's best satirical poet in the past hundred years. The Fecr-i Âti movement contributed in some measure to the strides toward the creation of a poetry that Turks could claim as their own.

The Turk. Republic came into being in 1923 to supersede the Ottoman Empire. It consolidated national unity and moved swiftly to eliminate Islamic elements from Turk. life. Emphasis was placed on Westernization, including the introduction of the L. alphabet. In the early part of the Republican era, poetry served primarily as a vehicle for the propagation of nationalism. Younger poets branded Divan forms and meters as anathema. Native forms of verse and syllabic meters gained popularity. Intense efforts were undertaken toward a systematic purification of Turk. Beş Hecceler (Five Syllabic Poets), Faruk Nafiz Çamlıbel (1898–), who was equally adept at aruz, Orhan Seyfi Orhon (1890–), Enis Behiç Koryürek (1898–1949), Halit Fahri Ozanoş (1891–) and Yusuf Ziya Ortaç (1896–) produced simple, unadorned poems celebrating love, the beauties of nature, and the glories of the Turk. nation.

Some poets, however, shied away from chauvinism and evolved individualistic world-views and styles. Symbolism attained success in the consummate poetry of Ahmet Hâşim (1884–1933), who employed aruz freely. Neoclassicism gained considerable popularity under the aegis of Yahya Kemal Beyatlı (1884–1958). A supreme craftsman, Beyatlı wrote of love, nostalgia for the Ottoman past, the beauties of Istanbul, and the metaphysics of life and death in poems which are memorable for their refined language and melodiousness. Necip Fazıl Kısakürek (1905–) engaged in teleological explorations into modern man's agony. Ahmet Muhip Dranas (1909–) and Ahmet Hamdi Tanpınar (1901–61) wrote some of the best lyric poems to come out of modern Turkey. Nazım Hikmet Ran (1902–63) became an exponent of the Communist ideology. It was Ran who introduced free verse as adapted from Mayakovski. However, the wide popularity of free verse was to materialize through the efforts of younger poets who imported it from France.

In the years following the end of World War II, poets furthered most of the experiments and renovations started in the preceding decades. After surrealism cast a brief spell on the literary scene, a new school emerged setting forth what may be defined as poetic realism. Introduced by Orhan Veli Kanık (1914–1950), Oktay Rifat (1914–), and Melih Cevdet Anday (1915–) and subscribed to by a cluster of others, including Bedri Rahmi Eyüboğlu (1913–) and Cahit Külebi (1917–), this doctrine placed the poet in the center of the complex system of society. It made poetry's function a utilitarian one. In the late 1940's, most Turk. poets served as standard-bearers of the social problems of their day. Their verse reflected the frustrations and aspirations of the man in the street. Poetry became a vehicle for the expression, not of subjective experience, but of objective truth. Written in free verse (occasionally in folk forms and meters), postwar poems drew on all that was alive, vivid and colorful in the Turk. idiom. One critic, Nurullah Ataç (1898–1957), played a major role in setting the directions of modern poetry in the 1940's and 1950's. In the same period, Cahit Sıtkı Tarancı (1910–56) produced impeccable lyrics expressing universal human sentiments. Fazıl Hüsni Dağlarca (1914–) emerged as a superior poet of impressive range. His is the poetry of philosophical quest, and it displays a wealth of metaphor and a sonority almost unequalled in 20th-c. Turk. verse. Asaf Halet Çelebi (1907–58) gave some early, if deficient, specimens of surrealist poetry, while Behçet Necatigil (1916–) writes poems rich in intellectual substance. Salâh Bırsel (1919–) interfuses ingenious verbal patterns and sonic capers.

The latest development in Turk. poetry is the abstract movement (also referred to as "meaningless poetry") which started in the mid-1950's. It seeks to mobilize all the imaginative resources of Turk. and explores abstract phenomena and formulations. İlhan Berk (1916–), Atilla İlhan (1925–), Turgut Uyar (1926–), Edip Cansever (1928–), and Cemal Süreya (1931–) are the protagonists. By the end of the present decade, a new Turk. poetry may be expected to develop wherein the aesthetics of form and the emotive power of substance will converge into a unity. Consequently, modern Turk. poetry may soon move from national significance to a universal level.

ANTHOLOGIES: E. J. W. Gibb, Ottoman Lit. —The Poets and Poetry of Turkey (1901); The Star and the Crescent, ed. D. Patmore (1946); Başlangıcından Bugüne Türk Şiiri Antolojisi, ed. V. M. Kocatürk et al. (4 v., 1949); Anthologie des poètes turcs contemporains, ed. N. Arzik (1953); N. Menemcioglu, "Modern Turk. Poetry," Western Review, 23 (1959); The Literary Review, 4 (1960–1961; Turk. issue); Contemp. Turk. Poetry, ed. T. S. Halman (1965).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. M. Koltsova-Masalskaya, La Poésie des Ottomans (1871); J. W. Redhouse, On the History, System and Varieties of Turk. Poetry (1879); E. J. W. Gibb, A Hist. of Ottoman Poetry (6 v., 1900-1909); G. Jacob, Türkische Volkliteratur (1901); K. J. Basmadjian, Essai sur l'histoire de la litt. Ottomane (1910); T. Menzel, Die türkische Lit. (1915); O. Hachtmann, Die türkische Lit. des 20. Jh. (1916); I. Kunos, De la poésie populaire turque (1925); F. Köprülü, Türk Edebiyatı Tarihi (1926; hist. of Turk. lit.), "Ottoman Turk. Lit.," Encyclopædia of Islam, IV (1934) and Türk Dili ve Edebiyatı hakkında Araştır- malar (1934; Studies on Turk. language and lit.); J. G. Blanco Villalta, Literatura turca contemporánea (1940); H. A. Yücel, Ein Gesamtüberblick über die türkische Lit. (1941); A. S. Levend, Divan Edebiyatı (1943; Divan Lit.); N. S. Banarlı, Resimli Türk Edebiyatı Tarihi (1948; illustrated hist. of Turk. lit.); H. T. Gönensay, Türk Edebiyatı Tarihi-Tanzimattan Zamanımıza Kadar (1949; Hist. of Turk. lit. from Tanzimat to present); A. Bombaci, Storia della letteratura turca (1956). T.S.H.

TZ'U. See CHINESE POETRY.

U

UBI SUNT (L. "where are . . . ?"). A motif of great vogue in medieval L. poetry. Beginning the poem and sometimes every stanza with the phrase, the poet proceeded to list, often at interminable length, the names of those who were dead or gone. Hence the name for the motif. The lists are generally of two sorts, though sometimes combined in the same poem: the names of heroes who fought and died nobly and of beautiful women who have since perished. The Bible with its genealogical lists may be the source for the former type; pagan tradition, particularly L. love elegy, for the latter. The motif emphasized the transitoriness of life, the fragility of beauty, and could also suggest the degeneracy of the current age by harking back to a glorious epoch. Villon's "Mais ou sont les neiges d'antan?" is perhaps the greatest medieval example of the motif. Although not very popular today, occasionally it recurs as in Edgar Lee Master's Spoon River Anthology.—J. L. Lowes, Convention and Revolt in Poetry (1919); E. Gilson, Les Idées et les lettres (1932); L. J. Friedman, "The Ubi Sunt, The Regrets and Effictio," MLN, 72 (1957). R.A.H.

UKRAINIAN POETRY. The old Kievan state established by the 9th c. extended its rule over all the Eastern Slavs but it collapsed after the Tatar invasion and came under the control of its eastern and western neighbors, the Russians and the Poles. The struggle of the Ukr. people to escape this domination has left a deep mark upon Ukr. poetry.

Their folk songs, which reflect all the many rites of the old Ukr. agricultural cycle, seem in some cases to point back to pagan customs existing before the introduction of Christianity from Byzantium at the end of the 10th c., but the "Christmas songs," the Kolyady and Shchedrivky, have been influenced by Christianity and so have the laments and the many songs dealing with all the events of life and death.

The old epic poetry dealing with the court of the Grand Prince Volodymyr (Vladimir), a sort of Table Round, apparently vanished from Ukr. lands by the late 16th c. and, with the rise of the Zaporozhian Kozaks to a commanding position, there developed a new type of oral poetry, the dumy. These are sung to a kind of recitatif. They appear to date from the 16th and later centuries and deal with the leaders of the Kozaks (e.g. Bayda Vyshonovetsky, who was captured and tortured by the Turks), their wars (the Kozak wars with Poland at the time of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky in the 17th c.) and later sufferings, or with tragic situations of nameless heroes during the same period. Yet they are more than mere chronicles of historical songs and form a distinct Ukr. contribution to folk poetry and music.

Kiev accepted Christianity and learning from Constantinople but did not remain without contacts with the Scandinavian north and with western Europe in the early days. Religious works were accepted in the Church Slavic language, but soon translators and original writers began to insert purely Ukr. forms. The artificial language thus formed continued with varying stresses on the Church Slavic and native elements until the end of the 18th c., when the use of the vernacular commenced.

There was little pure poetry in the written literature of the pre-Tatar period. The outstanding poetic work is the Slovo o Polku Igoreve (The Tale of the Armament of Igor), an account of an attack in 1185 by Prince Igor Svyatoslavych of Novgorod Siversky and his allies on a horde of Polovtsy, his defeat, capture, and escape. It was apparently written soon after the events and shows close contact with both the oral poetry and the Chronicles. The author is unknown, and we are perhaps not justified in treating it merely as a type of the secular court poetry of the day, although the author alludes to other poets who sang the praise of various princes such as Boyan. The poem (it is really a prose poem) is a strong plea for cooperation among the princes. Nature plays an active role, and there is a scarcely veiled paganism in many passages. With all of its virtues the work stands alone and offers many problems, for the one late manuscript, apparently from Pskov, was burned before it was adequately studied. However, there are obvious references to the poem in some works of the next centuries.

Poetry returned in the late 16th c. It was fostered by the Jesuit Uniat colleges under Polish influences and by the Orthodox Mohylanska Academy in Kiev which was developed by the great Orthodox metropolitan, educator and theologian, Peter Mohyla, into the leading Orthodox institution north of Constantinople. It produced a large number of spiritual songs of every character, a mass of secular lyrics and historical poetry, and many eulogies to the various Hetmans, some of whom like Ivan Mazepa were themselves not inconsiderable poets. The great majority of the lines are based on Polish usage and written in syllabic verse, a line with a varying number of syllables divided by a caesura and with the rhymes almost invariably feminine. Much of the poetry is in a baroque style with an abundance of classical references, but it is still in the old mixture of Church Slavic and the vernacular. A good example is the elegy on the death of Hetman Sahaydachny. The theme of death is treated from all angles (sometimes in a form reminiscent of the dumy by Kyrylo Trankvilion Stavrovetsky).

There were also dramas based on Polish models as the Volodymyr of Teofan Prokopovych (1687-1736) dedicated to Mazepa but later changed after his defeat at Poltava, and the anonymous Love of God. There are also many religious dramas based on the lives of the saints, the Christmas drama of St. Dmytro Tuptalo, bishop of Rostov, etc. Both Prokopovych and Tuptalo were later lost to Rus. literature as were many of the better educated Ukrainians, especially in the 18th c. Comedy was represented especially in the intermedia, short scenes of a comic character representing well-known and standard national types, which were inserted in more serious performances often at the will of the producers and carried around the country by wandering scholars during vacation periods. These had a great effect on the development of the popular puppet shows.

With the defeat of Ukr. hopes for liberation after the battle of Poltava (1709), Russian influence increased both on the thought and language, and even Hryhori Skovoroda (1722-94), with his shorter poems written more or less under the influence of the Enlightenment, did not oppose prevailing tendencies. A new movement began when in 1798 Ivan Kotlyarevsky (1769-1838) published his travesty on Virgil's Aeneid, the Eneida, in the colloquial language of Poltava. In this, the first book printed in the vernacular, he parodied the Aeneid by representing Aeneas and his fellows as Zaporozhian Kozaks wandering around the world in search of a new home after the fall of Troy. Whatever his intentions, Kotlyarevsky started the modern Ukr. movement and later contributed to it with his musical comedy Natalka Poltavka (1819), in the same colloquial style. He abandoned syllabic verse for iambic pentameter. His example was followed by various minor writers such as Vasyl Hohol-Yanovsky (d. 1825)—father of the more famous Nikolay Gogol—with comedies like Roman and Parashka; and Petro Hulak-Artemovskyy (1790-1865) with his still popular operetta Zaporozhets za Dunayem (The Zaporozhian across the Danube) and many odes written as travesties. In general this early Ukr. literature was "incomplete," for it lacked any attempt to produce the higher forms of literature and it portrayed the peasants often in a sentimental manner.

The revival of the vernacular spread to the Western Ukr. lands under Austria in the early days of romanticism. In Western Ukraine it began among students of the Uniat theological seminaries such as Fr. Markiyon Shashkevych (1811-43) who after some preliminary work brought out in Budapest the Rusalka Dnistrovaya (The Rusalka of the Dniester), a collection of romantic poems with the vernacular taking predominance over Church Slavic. He was helped by the other members of the so-called Rus. Triad, Ivan Vahylevych (1811-66) and Yakiv Holovatsky (1814-88), though the two last were soon lost to Ukr. literature, one to Polish and the other to Russian. Their work was continued by Mykola Ustyianovych (1811-85) in the same tradition.

On the other hand extensive work was done in the populist and ethnographical fields in the Eastern Ukraine by the collection and adaptation of Ukr. folk songs by such men as I. Sreznevsky (1812-80), Lev Borovykovsky (1806-89) and by the verse of Amvrosi Metlynsky (1814-70) and Mykola Kostomarov (1817-85), later a distinguished historian.

Ukr. poetry reached its maturity in the work of Taras Shevchenko (1814-61). Born a serf on the Right Bank of the Dnieper, he was liberated because of his artistic talents by a group in Petersburg headed by the poet Zhukovsky and the painter Karl Bryulov. Eight years later, for his participation in the idealistic Brotherhood of Sts. Cyril and Methodius in Kiev, he was arrested and confined for ten years in a Rus. disciplinary battalion in Central Asia and was only liberated as a broken man in 1857. His first collection of poems Kobzar (the Bard) appeared in 1840 in a marked romantic vein, stressing typical romantic motifs and the exploits of the Zaporozhian Kozaks against the Poles. His Kateryna is an exceptional poem on the sufferings of a Ukr. girl seduced by a Russian. In 1841 came the Haydamaky, an account of the Ukr. uprising against the Poles in 1768. Later, after his return to the Ukraine in 1843, he poured out the sufferings of his people at the hands of the Russians in a long series of poems in various forms—Son (The Dream), Kavkaz (The Caucasus), and Velyky Lyokh (The Great Grave)—while in his shorter poems he gave lyric expression to the deepest sentiments of his people and their love of freedom:

Bury me and then rise boldly,
Break in twain your fetters
And with the foul blood of foemen
Sprinkle well your freedom (Testament)

To these sentiments he added appeals to his people for love and toleration of one another. On his return from Asia, his versions of the Psalms and Old Testament Prophets spoke for a humanity outraged by human cruelty. His songs now became more universal in character, but his more personal notes of devotion to country still sounded as did his desire to have a home on the Dnieper banks in the Ukraine.

Shevchenko's successors, such as his friend P. Kulish (1819-97) who was primarily a romanticist, began experimenting with realism, but they were hampered by tsarist decrees in 1863 and 1876 which practically forbade the publication of books in Ukr. The next important figure was the Western Ukr. Ivan Franko (1856-1916), who displayed an amazing energy in all fields, poetry, drama, novels, and stories. His poems, starting with a stress on the need for reform, culminated in Ivan Vyshtensky and Moses, in which he spoke as the undisputed leader of his people. A newer sense of contact with Europe appeared in the work of Lesya Ukrainka (pen name of Larysa Kvitka-Kosach, 1872-1913). A hopeless invalid with a broad knowledge of foreign languages, she composed poems and verse dramas largely on world themes but applicable to the Ukraine; and in The Forest Song she gave beautiful expression to Ukr. folklore and traditions.

In the 1890's modernism and symbolism appeared, especially in the works of Oles (pen name of Ol. Kandyba, 1878-1944). Oles was really the poet of the Revolution of 1905, but he also wrote important poems in 1917 and then finally emigrated and died in Prague. With him we may group Hryhori Chuprynka (1879-1921) who published several collections before World War I.

With the Revolution of 1917, the establishment of the Ukr. National Republic and the final triumph of the Soviets, the older writers died, emigrated, or became silent. Yet during the 1920's a younger group appeared to reflect the changed conditions and the newer developments in world poetry. The foremost melodically was Pavlo Tychyna (b. 1891), an adherent of symbolism; Mykhaylo Semenko (1892-1937) was the leader of futurism. The neoclassicists Mykola Zerov (1890-1937), Pavlo Fylypovych (1891-1937), Mykhaylo Dray-Khmara (1889-1937), Oswald Burghardt (Yuri Klen, 1891-1947), and Maksym Rylsky (b. 1895) appealed for high art and a return to the European sources of world culture. In addition there were proletarian poets who warmly supported the Soviet system, expressionists like Todos Osmachka (1895-1962) and Mykola Bazhan (b. 1904), as well as neoromantic authors like Dmytro Falkivsky (1898-1934) and Oleksa Vlyzko (1908-34).

In the early 1930's, in connection with the artificial famine in the Ukraine, orders were issued to force all authors into a Union of Soviet Writers. The vast majority of the Ukr. poets disappeared in the labor camps of the far north and Siberia. The only authors who survived were those who, like Tychyna, Rylsky, Bazhan, and Volodymyr Sosyura (b. 1898), put themselves at the disposal of the regime and wrote at its command without regard to the standards of art.

Meanwhile a significant literature developed in the Western Ukraine under Polish rule (1919-1939). Especially noteworthy is Bohdan Lepky (1872-1941), a delicate lyricist, and there were several groups reflecting the various political and artistic developments of the time. Among the writers we can mention Yuri Lypa (1900-1944) and Yevhen Malanyuk (b. 1897) and above all the Lemky poet Bohdan Ihor Antonych (1909-37), a poet somewhat pantheistic in his expression of himself as the brother of the universe but with a strong sense of the joy of life, which was ended for him all too soon. We must mention also from World War II two poets who died at the hands of the Germans, Oleh Olzhych Kandyba (1909-44), a vivid exponent of the cruelty of the day, and

UNANIMISM

Olena Teliha (1907-42), a truly intimate and heroic writer who was shot in Kiev while working in the Ukr. liberation movement.

There was another flowering of poetry in the camps in Germany after the war, but most authors who wrote in Germany have found new homes in America, e.g., Vasyl Barka, Yar Slavutych, M. Orest, and many others.

The ways of the poets in Eastern Ukraine have been hard especially during the last years of the cult of Stalin as Sosyura found out when he received a Stalin Prize for a poem Love Ukraine and then was bitterly attacked a few years later for the same work on ideological grounds. Of the poets who became prominent we may mention L. Pervomaysky (b. 1908), a poet with a broad palette of colors for modern Soviet literature, and A. Malysko, who follows the general classical pattern. Since the "thaw," which affected Ukr. poetry only slightly, a new group of poets has arisen. These have been born and educated under Soviet conditions, and in the last five years such writers as Lina Kostenko, Mykola Vinhranovsky, Vitali Koryotych, and above all Ivan Drach (b. 1936) have developed some originality and a proper appreciation of modernism; and despite political criticism, they have shown themselves able to strike new notes in the long history of Ukr. poetry.

It may be questioned today whether Ukr. poetry is better represented by the poets who have emigrated or those at home. It is hard to foresee the next step, but as the last years have shown, poetry has revived whenever there has been a relaxation of pressure, and we cannot doubt that it will do so again in the future.

ANTHOLOGIES: Struny, antologiya ukraïnskoy poeziyi, ed. P. Lepky (1922); Gelb und blau, moderne ukrainische Dichtung in Auswahl, ed. and tr. W. Derzhawin (1948); Die ukrainische Lyrik, 1840-1940, ed. and tr. H. Koch (1955); V. Slavutych, The Muse in Prison (1956); Weinstock der Wiedergeburt, moderne ukr. Lyrik, ed. and tr. E. Kottmeier (1957); The Ukr. Poets, 1189-1962, ed. C. H. Andrusyshen and W. Kirkconnell (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: M. Tyszkiewicz, La Littérature ukrainienne (1919); M. Hrushevsky, Istoriya ukraïnskoy literatury (5 v., 1923-26); S. Efremov, Ist. ukr. lit. (1924); V. H. Kowalski, Ukr. Folksongs (1925); A. P. Coleman, Brief Survey of Ukr. Lit. (1936); C. A. Manning, Ukr. Lit. (1944); Y. Slavutych, Modern Ukr. Poetry, 1900-1950 (1950); V. D. Chyzhevsky, Ist. ukr. lit. (1956); G. Luckyj, Lit. Politics in the Soviet Ukraine, 1917-1934 (1956) and "Ukr. Lit., the last 20 Years," BA, 30 (1956); G. Luznycky, Ukr. Lit. within the Framework of World Lit.: A Short Outline of Ukr. Lit. from Renaissance to Romanticism (1961). C.A.M.

ULTRAISM. Hispanic literary movement (1919-1923) which best reflected the postwar emotional crisis among writers in the Sp. tongue. Gerardo Diego, Juan Larrea, and, in particular, Guillermo de Torre of Spain, César Vallejo of Peru, and Jorge Luis Borges of Argentina are the best known writers of the Hispanic aspect of U. Strange new metaphors, strings of metaphors tumbling out, and strenuous avoidance of the old patterns of language are characteristic of the ultraistic style. For example, "The guitar is a well with wind in place of water," wrote Gerardo Diego. And, "No one knows that the sky is a garden."

The movement began in Spain in 1919 among the younger poets who owed dual allegiance to Juan Ramón Jiménez and to Ramón Gómez de la Serna, but who also kept their ears keenly attuned to the series of literary "isms" that rapidly arose and fell in France in an attempt to capture the agony of the times. Creationism (q.v.), a prior movement brought to Spain by Vicente Huidobro of Chile in 1918, was also blended with U. in the peninsula. By 1923 U. was dead, and all that remained was the name. The only present value of the movement lies in the individual worth of the poets who briefly espoused its cause. Federico García Lorca of Spain, least touched by the extremes of U., was the finest poet of the generation.—J. L. Borges, "Ultraísmo," Nosotros (Buenos Aires), 15 (1921); G. de Torre, Las literaturas europeas de vanguardia (1925) and La aventura y el orden (1948); R. Cansinos-Assens, La nueva literatura, III (1927); G. Videla, El ultraísmo (1963). J.A.C.

UNANIMISM. Term applied by Jules Romains [Louis Farigoule, 1885-] to his ideal of human participation in collective life, in group rhythms, and group consciousness. According to his own account, Romains' first overwhelming intuition of u. came one evening in October 1903 while he was walking with a friend, Georges Chennevière: "I am in Amsterdam Street like a cell in the flesh of a man or in the leaves of a tree. And I am at the moment the only one conscious of this. It is up to me to grasp all the life in the street, in its thick mass of carriages and passers-by. It is up to me to bring it into the light of consciousness, beyond the explosions of its motors and the movements and thoughts of each of its individuals." The unanimist conception of the group and its ambience is related to the earlier imaginative representations of collective experience in such writers as Hugo, Whitman, and Zola, and to the vision of the great industrial city in Verhaeren; but u. entails an empathic absorption of individual wills, and sees the resulting union of experience as a consolation for man's loss of belief in immortality.

Such early volumes as La vie unanime (1908) and Odes et prières (1913) exemplify the inspiration of u. in Romans' lyric verse. Notable here among his individual poems is the Ode à la Foule. Romans is best known, however, not for his poetry but for his long stream of novels published under the title Les hommes de bonne volonté. In the theatre, his unanimist verse-plays (L'armée dans la ville [1911] and Cromedeyre-le-Vieil [1920]) have an early predecessor in Lope de Vega's Fuente Ovejuna. Cromedeyre-le-Vieil, admittedly one of its author's favorites, is concerned with the unanimist hero Emanuel's shaping the collective consciousness of his village and with the surrender to its rhythms and the unity of its psychic life by the women from outside abducted into it. Romans writes of this strange play, which has caught with haunting poetry a sense of the unanimist ideal: "It offers the image of a humanity still very close to its origins . . . of a humanity reduced to the fierce unity of the tribe." Romans and Georges Chennevière experimented with new rhythms for unanimist poetry and published in 1923 their Petit traité de versification, among whose most notable innovations was the theory of the accord (q.v.).—A. Cuisinier, Jules Romans et l'unanimité [1] (1935) and L'art de Jules Romans (1948); S. A. Rhodes, The Contemporary Fr. Theatre (1942); P. Jolivet, "Le théâtre poétique de Jules Romans," Orbis Litterarum, 9 (1954); P. J. Norrish, Drama of the Group: A Study of U. in the Plays of Jules Romans (1958); B. F. Stoltzfus, "U. Revisited," MLQ, 21 (1960).

A.G.E.

UNDERSTATEMENT. See LITOTES; MEIOSIS.

UNITY is the most fundamental and comprehensive aesthetic criterion, upon which all others depend. Plato first among Western thinkers proposed an artistic doctrine of u.; in the Phaedrus he perceived an analogy between u. of discourse and the organic u. of a living creature. In the Symposium he suggested in connection with the musical scale that u. is a reconciliation of opposites or discords. Organic u. is obtainable by means of conscious arrangement of parts. Aristotle's Poetics provides our first great statement on dramatic u. Aristotle emphasizes functionalism; tragedy is superior to epic because of its tighter internal relationships (5.23–24). U. is an ideal relationship of beginning, middle, and end. The ideal tragedy is an imitation of a unified action, large enough to be perspicuous and small enough to be comprehensible. Aristotle's conception of u. is closely related to his artistic requirements of probability and necessity, as they constitute the criteria for the connection of parts (6–9). The famous "three unities" of action, time and place were often ascribed to the Poetics though he actually sponsors the u. of action only.

Aristotle is concerned with dramatic action; Horace's looser, more informal Art of Poetry deals indiscriminately with action, words, metaphor, and poetic or rhetorical devices. The Art of Poetry contains the definitive neoclassic statement: "I shall aim at a poem so deftly fashioned out of familiar matter that anybody might hope to emulate the feat, yet for all his efforts sweat and labor in vain. Such is the power of order and arrangement; such the charm that waits upon common things." Horace conceives of u. as an effect of harmony, obtained by skillful "order and arrangement," analogous either to music or more significantly to the harmonious blending of colors, light, and shadow in painting ("ut pictura poesis"). Pope's Essay on Criticism in the 18th c. is a classic adaptation of Horace, as Boileau had a little earlier adapted "Longinus." Longinus' On the Sublime is the most useful ancient document on lyric poetry. The conception of u. presented in it is relatively romantic, although in its account of arrangement and oratorical "amplification" it has affinities with both Plato and Horace. In his analysis of Sappho's Ode Longinus detects an organic u. derived from intensity of feeling and thought, which manifests itself as a reconciliation of opposing elements, and which artistically declares itself as a process of selection (10).

From antiquity to the end of the 18th c. theories of u. have been primarily theories of dramatic u., with the three unities of "the rules" the dominant issue. The It. Castelvetro has generally been credited or taxed with them in his translation and commentary on Aristotle's Poetics (1570). U. for Castelvetro is a quasi-legal consequence of the limitation of a dramatic action to twelve hours; by way of artistic satisfaction, it displays the skill of the poet in doing much with little (Gilbert, Literary Criticism, pp. 309–10, 318–19, 354). In general, the larger purposes of the three unities throughout their reign were to foster verisimilitude (q.v.) and to obtain artistic concentration, and for these purposes, as T. S. Eliot has remarked in "A Dialogue on Dramatic Poetry" (1928), there is much to be said for them. Under them grew up the great Fr. classical drama of the 17th c., despite the occasional grumblings of Corneille. For whatever reason, the three unities were never entirely naturalized in England, although the "regular" play received due critical respect. Whether because of the whole trend of native Elizabethan and Jacobean drama, or the great counterexample of Shakespeare, or, as Englishmen were wont to maintain, because of the superior independence and originality of the Eng. mind, the unities were only casually observed. Dryden's An Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668, 1684), with its brilliant defense of the Eng. use of subplot (Essays, 1.69-71), is a full and fair discussion of the issues. Dr. Johnson was to strike a semifinal blow against the unities by denying their claims to "nature" and verisimilitude ("Preface to Shakespeare," 1765), and Coleridge completely demolished their philosophical and psychological pretensions, as had A. W. von Schlegel, in his lectures on Shakespeare (Shakespearean Criticism, 1).

Up to the second half of the 18th c. theories of poetic u. for the most part dealt with drama, with some attention to epic (Le Bossu, Traité du Poème Épique, or Addison's Spectator papers on Paradise Lost, for example) and to narrative poetry in general. Such theories were usually objective, since their subject matter was external action, and analytical, since they were concerned with the known components of recognized genres. With the rise of psychological aesthetics in the 18th c., however, came ideas better suited to lyric poetry, or capable of application to all poetry. New and enlarged conceptions of poetic imagination and a general shift from a mechanical to a vitalist world-view brought forth the romantic organic u., which had various aspects; it appeared as u. of feeling, u. as a vision of a vital, sentient nature, u. as an imitation of the poet's mind in the act of creation, and imaginative u., with the imagination the shaping, unifying, and reconciling power (Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, chap. 14).

20th c. theories of u., although they are often direct reactions against romanticism, are nevertheless basically romantic. The concept of u., especially of organic u., has never been more important than in the formalist, the psychological, and the mythicist criticism of the last twenty years, both as a standard of judgment and a method of exposition. Thus poetic u. has been explained by I. A. Richards in Principles of Literary Criticism as a reconciliation of impulses, by Cleanth Brooks and others as a reconciliation of thought and feeling manifested in the interaction of theme with language and metaphor, by the surrealists as a unifying of the total mind by freeing the unconscious, by the Freudians through dream-pattern and Freudian symbol, and by the Jungians by detection of archetypal myth-motifs (T. S. Eliot, The Waste Land, Maud Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry). All 20th-c. versions of u., however, can be distinguished from their romantic predecessors by their common radicalism and their common effort to banish the subject-object problem of external reference.

Plato, Dialogues, tr. B. Jowett, I and III (4th ed., 1953); S. H. Butcher, Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and Fine Art (4th ed., 1911, 1932, 1951); Longinus, On the Sublime, tr. W. Rhys Roberts (1907); T. R. Henn, Longinus and Eng. Crit. (1934); L. Castelvetro, Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata et sposta (1571); H. B. Charlton, Castelvetro's Theory of Poetry (1913); R. Le Bossu, Traité du poème épique (1675); Treatise of the Epick Poem, tr. "W. J." (1695); J. Dryden, The Essays of John Dryden, ed. W. P. Ker (2 v., 1926); S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, ed. J. Shawcross (2 v., 1907); Coleridge's Shakespearean Crit., ed. T. M. Raysor (2 v., 1930); I. A. Richards, Principles; M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934) and Studies of Type-Images in Poetry, Religion, and Philosophy (1951); J.W.H. Atkins, Lit. Crit. in Antiquity (1934); Lit. Crit., Plato to Dryden, ed. A. H. Gilbert (1940); C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947); S. E. Hyman, The Armed Vision (1948); Abrams; Wellek; Wimsatt and Brooks. See also G. F. Else, Aristotle's Poetics (1957). R.H.F.

UPAJATI. A mixed meter which combines varieties of the 11- and 12-syllable measures, especially the former. The 11- and 12-syllable classes called tristubh and jaṭati were popular in the Veda, and from these many classical meters evolved. In the Mahābhārata particularly, several forms of this "11-12 syllable meter" are found. The u., one of these forms, is also called ākhyānakī, showing that it was used for epic and heroic narratives. The normal u. mixes an indravajrā and a upendravajrā, which, between them, differ only in the opening pair of syllables: the former starting on a trochaic unit and the latter on an iambic (cf. opening stanza of Kālidāsa's Kumārasambhava). For bibliog., see INDIAN PROSODY. V.R.

URDU POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

URUGUAYAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

UT PICTURA POESIS. Few expressions of aesthetic criticism have led to more comment over a period of several centuries than u.p.p., "as is painting so is poetry" (Horace, Ars Poetica 361). Even with partial explanation (362-65, 1-47, 343-45), the Horatian comparison of painting and poetry was as tentative as the proper Augustan wished it to be. The notion that poetry and painting are alike had had some currency even before Horace, who probably knew—even if he may not have assumed that his audience would recall—the more explicit earlier statement of Simonides of Keos (first recorded by Plutarch, De gloria Atheniensium, 3.347a, more than a century after Ars Poetica): "Poema pictura loquens, pictura poema silens" (poetry is a speaking picture, painting a silent [mute] poetry).

The views of Aristotle—especially that poetry and painting as arts of imitation should use the same principal element of composition (structure), namely, plot in tragedy and design (outline) in painting (see Poetics, 6.19-21)—furnished additional authority for Renaissance and later attempts to measure the degree and the nature of the kinship of the arts (the "parallel" of the arts) and to determine the order of precedence among them (the "paragone" of the arts). Moreover, as Rensselaer W. Lee observed in his illuminating analysis of the humanistic theory or doctrine of painting for which the Horatian dictum served as a kind of final sanction, "writers on art expected one to read [u.p.p.] 'as is poetry so is painting.'"

The Horatian simile, however interpreted, asserted the likeness, if not the identity, of painting and poetry; and from so small a kernel came an extensive body of aesthetic speculation and, in particular, an impressive theory of art which prevailed in the 16th, 17th, and most of the 18th c. While a few poets assented to the proposition that painting surpasses poetry in imitating human nature in action as well as in showing a Neoplatonic Ideal Beauty above nature, more of them raided the province of painting for the greater glory of poetry and announced that the preeminent painters are the poets. Lucian's praise of Homer as painter (Eikones 8) gave ancient authority for that view, which Petrarch and others reinforced. Among the poets described as master-painters have been Theocritus, Virgil, Tasso, Ariosto, Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton, not to mention numerous later landscapists in descriptive poetry, the Pre-Raphaelites, and the Parnassians. Painter and critic, Reynolds instanced Michelangelo as the prime witness to "the poetical part of our art" of painting (Discourse 15, 1790). Thus a "poetical" or highly imaginative painter could be compared with the "painting" poets.

U.p.p. offered a formula—the success of which "one can hardly deny," René Wellek remarked—for analyzing the relationship of poetry and painting (and other arts). However successful, the Horatian formula proved useful—at least was used—on many occasions as a precept to guide artistic endeavor, as an incitement to aesthetic argument, and as a basic element in several theories of poetry and the arts. Alone and with many accretions, modifications, and transformations, u.p.p. inspired a number of meaningful comments about the arts and poetry and even contributed to the [actual] work and theory of several painters, most notably, "learned Poussin."

Moreover, like other commonplaces of criticism, the Horatian formula stimulated and attracted to itself a variety of views of poetry and painting that are hard to relate to the original statement.

Another part of the story of the Horatian simile concerns adverse criticism and opposition. In Plastics (1712) Shaftesbury warned, "Comparisons and parallel[s] . . . between painting and poetry . . . almost ever absurd and at best constrained, lame and defective." The chief counterattack came in Laokoön (1766), with Lessing contending that the theories of art associated with u.p.p. had been the principal, if not the only, begetter of the confusion of the arts which he deplored in the artistic practice and theory of the time. R. G. Saisselin has lately shown that the "relations between the sister arts . . . were more complex than a reading of Lessing might lead one to believe" (JAAC, Winter 1961). Since then similar charges have been raised occasionally, as in Irving Babbitt's The New Laokoön: An Essay on the Confusion of the Arts (1910), a stumbling block until very recently.

On the other hand, from late in the 19th c. the kinship of poetry and painting appeared in a more favorable light in connection with the arts of the East—in generalizations about the "poetic feeling" of Oriental painting and the pictorial characteristics of Chinese and Japanese poetry and, with the ever-increasing knowledge of Eastern art, in historical and critical studies setting forth the close relationships between Oriental poetry and painting. In China poets were often painters; and critics, particularly in the 11th and 12th c., stated the parallelism of poetry and painting in language close to that of Simonides and Horace. According to Chou Sun, "Painting and writing are one and the same art." Writing implied calligraphy, which linked painting with poetry. Thus, a poet might "paint poetry," and a painter wrote "soundless poems."

These Eastern views led a number of poets in Europe and America to follow Japanese rules for poems and Chinese canons of painting and even to write-paint "Oriental" poems—"images" directly presented to the eye, "free" impressions in a few strokes of syllables and lines, evocations of mood, lyrical epigrams, and representations rather than reproductions of nature. Yet the poems reflecting the Eastern tendency to regard poetry and painting as "two sides of the same thing" were experimental and specialized works that included only a few of the resources of the two arts. Moreover, the critical analysis of "the same thing," with its "two sides" of painting and poetry, remains at least as difficult as the explanation of the Horatian observation, "as is painting so is poetry."

Today, painters and poets seldom study the Horatian simile and the expanded "texts" of the It., Fr., and Eng. treatises on the humanistic theory of painting, and few artists care whether painting ever had a superior, an elder, or any sister. Oriental theories of the blending, not to say confusion, of art forms are more likely to arouse interest in the kinship and rivalry of poetry and painting. If painting now seems too varied to allow anyone to define it precisely, the same is true of poetry. Whatever painting is, poetry is the same! Since the Horatian proposition may be useful again, it had best remain unresolved: if poetry and painting are the same and were born at one and the same time, they may together fall.—W. G. Howard, "U.P.P.," PMLA, 24 (1909); and (ed.) Laokoön: Lessing, Herder, Goethe (1910; full bibliog.); I. Babbitt, The New Laokoön (1910); E. Manwaring, It. Landscape in 18th C. England (1925); C. Davies, "U.P.P.," MLR, 30 (1935); R. W. Lee, "U.P.P.," Art Bull., 22 (1940) and "U.P.P." in Shipley; Wellek and Warren (2d ed., chap. 11); H. H. Frankel, "Poetry and Painting: Chinese and Western Views of their Convertibility," CL, 9 (1957); J. H. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts (1958); R. G. Saisselin, "U.P.P.: Du Bos to Diderot," JAAC, 20 (1961).

S.A.L.

UTA. See TANKA; JAPANESE POETRY.

V

VALUE. See EVALUATION.

VEHICLE. See TENOR AND VEHICLE.

VENEZUELAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

VENUS AND ADONIS STANZA. So called from its use by Shakespeare in the poem Venus and Adonis. A 6-line stanza in 5-foot iambic lines, rhyming ababcc, it did not originate with Shakespeare, but had been used earlier, e.g., by Sidney in his Arcadia and by Spenser in the January eclogue of his Shepherd's Calendar. Shakespeare employed this form again in Romeo and Juliet, Love's Labour's Lost, and other plays. The stanza proved particularly attractive to American poets, e.g., Freneau, To Sylvius on His Preparing to Leave the Town, Bryant, Lines on Revisiting the Country, and Lowell, April Birthday at Sea.

R.O.E.

VERISIMILITUDE. The doctrine that poetry should be "probable" or "likely" or "lifelike." Almost all critical theory has in some measure accepted the idea, though differences in strictness and laxness of interpretation are major.

The primary source is the concept of to eikos (the probable, the verisimilar) in Aristotle's Poetics. It is closely related to his fundamental notion of the imitation of nature. If a poem is not lifelike (at least in some sense), it can hardly be called an imitation. Aristotle's account is perceptive, brief, and left a good bit to the judgment of later critics. He says, in Chapter 9, that the poet describes not historical actions but "the kind of thing that might happen . . . as being probable or necessary." Historical occurrences may or may not be probable in this sense, and in tragedy the marvelous or astonishing must be included and the supernatural may be included. He gives some scope, though not very much, in Chapter 15, to propriety of character, as he allows "consistent inconsistency," and a great deal of scope, in Chapter 25, to the impossible so long as it is "convincing," and even some allowance to the improbable, since it is probable that some improbable events will happen. And the writer may depart from representation of common reality in depicting the ideal or in following common opinion. What he insists on is universality and the apparent moral and psychological consequentiality of actions. Cicero, Quintilian, Plutarch, Horace accept the idea and tend to restrict it somewhat more than did Aristotle, in the direction of the ordinary and the commonly probable.

In Renaissance thought, theorists from Scaliger through the "querelle du Cid" and later, take the concept very seriously and debate its range and meaning. Propriety of character, where Aristotle himself gave little enough freedom, is interpreted so strictly that stock characters tend to become the exclusive ideal (most notoriously in Thomas Rymer's animadversions against Shakespeare), though in one notable instance Dryden defends the character of Caliban in a brilliant argument, on strict grounds of propriety and verisimilitude (Essays of John Dryden, ed. W. P. Ker, I, 219-20). Somewhat more freedom is allowed in the handling of the marvelous (Christian critics being hardly willing to deny supernature a place in serious literature), though there is major disagreement here. Castelvetro, Maggio, Chapelain, and d'Aubignac discriminate between ordinary and extraordinary verisimilitude. Rymer, and later—rather surprisingly—Johnson, take a conservative view with respect to this point, Dryden and Rapin take moderate positions, and Chapelain (who wants a more Christian poetry) a radical one.

It was on grounds of vraisemblance that the Academy censured The Cid of Corneille. Corneille and Racine accepted the principle of vraisemblance or verisimilitude quite genuinely, and the struggle in each of them between the abstracted rules and the pressures of their artistic habits and desires was, for both, fruitful.

Though the term has had much less use in the last two centuries, the idea, as a perennial and inescapable demand, persists in various, often implicit, forms: Wordsworth's turning to the common realities and the language of men, Coleridge's frequent appeals to "good sense," Arnold's "criticism of life," and the New Critics' concern for paradox, irony, "toughness" as giving an adequate, which is to say verisimilar, image of our experience.—R. M. Alden, "The Doctrine of Verisimilitude," Matzke Memorial Volume (1911); Bray; P. van Tieghem, Petite histoire des grandes doctrines littéraires en France (1946); Tuve, esp. chap. 9; B. Weinberg, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the It. Renaissance (2 v., 1961).

P.R.

VERS. A kind of song in Old Prov., fundamentally indistinguishable from the chanso (q.v.). But v. was the older term, in use before the literature became rigidly formalized; consequently, it was used more loosely than chanso, sometimes designating poems on almost any subject, and not exclusively love poems. The v. is also apt to have shorter and less complicated stanzas, but more of them.—Jeanroy, II.

F.M.C.

VERS DE SOCIÉTÉ. See LIGHT VERSE.

VERS LIBRE. Rhymed, syllabic verse, mainly the product of the Middle Ages, was not to remain long unchallenged: the versi sciolti (q.v.) of the It. Renaissance, prosodic experiments by Antoine de Baïf, alternations of verse lengths in La Fontaine begin a loosening which is climaxed by the v.l. of 19th-c. France. Whitman's free verse may have served as model, but the form appears in the Illuminations (1873?) of Rimbaud, who was probably unaware of the Leaves of Grass (1855) which, anyhow, seem closer to the verset (q.v.) than to v.l. The two v.-l. poems of Rimbaud were first printed in the review La Vogue in 1886. Gustave Kahn, the editor, published his own

v.l. there shortly afterwards, and haughtily insisted that he was nowise influenced by Rimbaud, to whose v.l. he, moreover, denied that appellation. About this time Jules Laforgue, Kahn's friend, produced his—infinately superior—v.l., to be followed (it would seem) by that of Jean Moréas. These men have claimed, or been credited with, inventing the form; but it is fairer to say the form invented itself through them, the tyrannical strictures of Fr. versification eliciting a strong, if gradual, reaction—first in poetic prose, then prose poem (q.v.), then vers libéré, and finally v.l. "This last can be defined as verse in which neither syllable nor metrical rules obtain, and only rhythm matters. Though rhyme (as opposed to most Eng. free verse) may persist, the traditional Fr. regulations for caesura, hiatus, counting of mute e's, etc., are ignored. Consecutive lines may vary greatly in length, or may not, and the only unity generally maintained is one of sense or syntax.

The key problem is rhythm: how can it be defined—or at least demonstrated—in v.l., so as to justify the form's claim to poetic status? According to Herbert Read (following Professor Sonnenschein), we have in v.l. the substitution of the "element of proportion . . . for the element of regularity." Edouard Dujardin, himself an early verslibriste, sees it as "a form able to rhythmify or derhythmify itself instantaneously," and so suited to changes of mood in longer, particularly dramatic, poems. Professor V. Černý views v.l. as the spontaneous expression of inner rhythm, fighting "against formalism and, implicitly, for the self-assertion of poetic content" (a characteristically leftist position). One could adduce numerous further descriptions from scholars or practitioners, but it may be safely asserted that v.l. defies precise definition. Whatever is put on paper as free verse and moves us as poetry is v.l.: the rhythm may be simply a question of emotional and intellectual response.

Among other early verslibristes should be mentioned Vielé-Griffin, Henri de Régnier, Maeterlinck, and Verhaeren (the first half-Am., the last two Belgians). The movement spread to other countries. It was imported into Italy both by the futurists and the post-symbolist Gabriele d'Annunzio in his plays. In Spain, the "Generation of '98" produced some admirable v.l., especially, perhaps, Juan Ramón Jiménez. The so-called freien Rhythmen of Germany go back to Klopstock and the 18th c., and come down through Goethe, Hölderlin, and others; but they have been especially popular in the modern period. Rilke's Duino Elegies and the lyrics and dramas of expressionism are the best-known examples. There is probably no occidental literature now without its variety of v.l. The theatre has proved especially receptive to the flexible but effective form. It has also been used frequently in poetry of spiritual (e.g., Francis Jammes, P.-J. Jouve) or socio-political (e.g., V. Mayakovsky, Bert Brecht) exaltation. At present v.l. is a vigorous and developing form. A recent innovation (E. E. Cummings) has been the shift of the line breaks away from the natural speech rests, creating an effect of syncopation. See also FREE VERSE.

G. Kahn, "Préface," Premiers poèmes (1897); C. C. Clarke, Concerning Fr. Verse (1922; last ch.); M. M. Dondo, V.L., a Logical Development of Fr. Verse (1922); J. Hytier, Les Techniques modernes du vers français (1923); E. Dujardin, "Les Premiers poètes du v.l.," Mallarmé par un des siens (1936); H. Morier, Le Rythme du v.l. symboliste (3 v., 1944); A. Gloss, Die freien Rhythmen in der deutschen Lyrik (1947); P. M. Jones, The Background to Modern Fr. Poetry (1951; part two, best introd. to the subject); W. Ramsey, Jules Laforgue and the Ironic Inheritance (1953; ch. 9); V. Černý, Verhaeren a jeho místo v dějinách volného verše (Prague, 1955; the Communist view). J.S.

VERSE AND PROSE. Words are used (1) for ordinary speech, (2) for discursive or logical thought, and (3) for literature.

Discursive language makes statements of fact, is judged by standards of truth and falsehood, and is in the form of prose. Literature makes no real statements of fact, proceeds hypothetically, and is judged by its imaginative consistency. Literature includes a great deal which is written in some form of regular recurrence, whether meter, accent, vowel quantity, rhyme, alliteration, parallelism, or any combination of these, and which we may call verse. All verse is literary, and philosophical or historical works written in verse are almost invariably classified as literature. We can exclude them from literature only by some kind of value-judgement, not by a categorical judgement, and to introduce value-judgements before we understand what our categories are is only to invite confusion. But although verse seems to be in some central and peculiar way the typical language of literature, all literature is not verse. The question thus arises: what is the status of literary prose? The best way to distinguish literary from non-literary prose is by what we may call, cautiously and tentatively, its intention. If it is intended to describe and represent facts and to be judged by its truth, it normally belongs in some nonliterary category; if it is to be judged primarily by its imaginative consistency, it normally belongs to literature. We say normally, because it is quite possible to look at some works, such as Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, from either point of view.

A subordinate problem also arises in passing: what is the meaning of the word poetry? Aristotle remarked in the Poetics that meter was not the distinguishing feature of "poetry." But Aristotle also remarked that the work of literary art as such, whether poem or play or essay, is "to this day without a name," and to this day, 2,500 years later, the statement is still true. The word "poetry" has always meant primarily "composition in meter," so that while Tom Jones, for instance, is certainly a work of literature, nobody would call it a poem.

The first point to get clear about prose is that the language of ordinary speech is not prose, or at least is prose only to the extent that it is not verse. Ordinary speech, especially colloquial or vulgar speech, is a discontinuous, repetitive, heavily accented rhetoric which is as readily distinguishable from prose as it is from regular meter. Any fiction writer who is a close observer of common speech will show in his dialogue a markedly different rhythm from what he himself uses in narration or description. Prose is ordinary speech on its best behavior: it is the conventionalization of speech that is made by the educated or articulate person when he is trying to assimilate his speech to the patterns of discursive thought. Anyone listening to the asyntactic prolixity of uneducated speech, or to the chanting or whining of children, can see that regular meter is in fact a much simpler way of stylizing ordinary speech than prose is, which explains why prose is normally a late and sophisticated development in the history of a literature.

There are, then, at least two ways of conventionalizing ordinary speech: the simple and primitive way of regularly recurring meter, and the more intellectualized way of developing a consistent and logical sentence structure. When recurrent rhythm takes the lead and the sentence structure is subordinated to it, we have verse. When the sentence structure takes the lead and all patterns of repetition are subordinated to it and become irregular, we have prose. Literary prose results from the imitation for literary purposes of the language of discursive thought. Of all the differentia between prose and verse, the only essential one is this difference of rhythm. Verse is able to absorb a much higher concentration of metaphorical and figurative speech than prose, but this difference is one of degree; the difference in rhythm which makes the higher concentration possible is a difference of kind.

This division between prose and verse is however complicated by the various forms of "free verse," which are unmistakably literary and yet are not in meter or any other form of regular recurrence. The naive assumption that any poetry not in some recognizable recurrent pattern must really be prose clearly will not do, and we have to assume the existence of a third type of conventionalized utterance. This third type has a peculiar relation to ordinary speech, or at least to soliloquy and inner speech. We may call it an oracular or associational rhythm, the unit of which is neither the prose sentence nor the metrical line, but a kind of thought-breath or phrase. Associational rhythm predominates in free verse and in certain types of literary prose, such as "stream of consciousness" prose.

A historical treatment of this threefold division of verbal rhythm—discursive, metrical, and associational—would require an encyclopaedia in itself. It will be best if we proceed inductively, confining our examples to the single language of Eng., and look at some of the literary phenomena which may be explained by it. Each of the three rhythms, in literature, may exist in a relatively pure state or in combination with either of its neighbors.

VARIETIES OF PROSE RHYTHM. Prose, we have said, is typically either the language of discursive thought or an imitation of that language for literary purposes. In pure prose the logical or descriptive features are at a maximum, and the stylistic, or rhetorical, features at a minimum. The rhythm of the sentence predominates; all repetition, whether of sound or rhythm, is eliminated as far as possible, and recurring rhetorical devices, or tricks of style, are noticed only with irritation. The aim is to present a certain content or meaning in as unobtrusive and transparent a way as possible. When prose is like this it is at the furthest possible remove from metrical or associative influences. Pure prose has two chief types of rhythm: the more informal and colloquial type which represents the rhythm of educated speech transferred to the printed page, and the more formal type which is thought of from the beginning as something to be read in a book. Let us take a passage from Darwin's Origin of Species: "The great and inherited development of the udders in cows and goats in countries where they are habitually milked, in comparison with these organs in other countries, is probably another instance of the effects of use. Not one of our domestic animals can be named which has not in some country drooping ears; and the view which has been suggested that the drooping is due to the disuse of the muscles of the ear, from the animals being seldom much alarmed, seems probable." This passage plainly does not lack either rhythm or readability; there is certainly a literary pleasure in reading it. The pleasure however is in seeing prose expertly used for its own descriptive purposes, and from our confidence that such alliteration as "the drooping is due to the disuse" is purely accidental. Let us compare Darwin's prose with a passage from Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire:

"The mystic sacrifices were performed, during three nights, on the banks of the Tiber; and the Campus Martius resounded with music and dances, and was illuminated with innumerable lamps and torches. . . . A chorus of twenty-seven youths, and as many virgins, of noble families, and whose parents were both alive, implored the propitious gods in favour of the present, and for the hope of the rising generation; requesting in religious hymns, that, according to the faith of their ancient oracles, they would still maintain the virtue, the felicity, and the empire of the Roman people." Here, along with the information given about the secular games of Philip, we are aware of certain tricks of style, such as antithetical balance and doubled adjectives. If we are intent only on the history, the tricks of style obstruct our path. But we notice that a specifically literary intention is visible in Gibbon beside the descriptive one. He is suggesting a meditative interest in the decline of Rome, and for this meditative interest a certain formal symmetry in the style is appropriate.

We notice also that the more obtrusive stylizing of Gibbon's prose makes it more oratorical, a quality of deliberate rhetoric being present. Another step would take us all the way into oratorical prose, where the formalized style is of equal importance with the subject matter. This is the normal area of all great oratory, as from Cicero down to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address and Churchill's 1940 speeches, the most memorable passages of oratory have usually been passages of formal repetition. Samuel Johnson's letter to Chesterfield provides similar examples:

"The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it." With the increase of the rhetorical or symmetrical element in the style, the prose is taking on an increasingly metrical quality, and is moving closer to verse. This metrical quality is strongly marked in Cicero's prose, in the long formal sentences broken in two by an "and" out of which the 17th-c. character books are constructed, in the deliberately symmetrical arrangements of phrases and clauses in Sir Thomas Browne's Urn Burial and Jeremy Taylor's Holy Dying.

A slight exaggeration of this metrical element would take us into the area of euphuism, which is a deliberate attempt to give to prose

the rhetorical features of verse, including rhyme and alliteration as well as metrical balance. Here is a sentence from Robert Greene's euphuistic romance The Carde of Fancie: "This loathsome lyfe of Gwydonius, was such a cutting corasive to his Fathers carefull conscience, and such a haplesse clogge to his heavie heart, that no joye could make him in-joye any joye, no mirth could make him merrie, no prosperitie could make him pleasant, but abandoning all delight, and avoyding all companie, he spent his dolefull dayes in dumps and dolours, which he uttered in these words." Here we are almost as far away as we can get from anything that we now think of as prose: the predominating rhythm is still the sentence, but the writer has done everything that a descriptive prose writer would try to avoid. Euphuism is of course an intensely rhetorical form of prose: one would expect to find it in sermons, where it has been prominent from Anglo-Saxon times; and in euphuist stories the writer strives for situations where the characters may write letters, lament, or harangue. We notice that the sentence quoted above leads up to a harangue.

Now let us return to the type of pure prose that is more informal and colloquial, designed to suggest good talk rather than good exposition, of which perhaps the greatest practitioner is Montaigne. Let us take a passage from one of Bernard Shaw's Prefaces:

"After all, what man is capable of the insane self-conceit of believing that an eternity of himself would be tolerable even to himself? Those who try to believe it postulate that they shall be made perfect first. But if you make me perfect I shall no longer be myself, nor will it be possible for me to conceive my present imperfections (and what I cannot conceive I cannot remember); so that you may just as well give me a new name and face the fact that I am a new person and that the old Bernard Shaw is as dead as mutton." As compared with the Darwin passage, there is here some influence of an associational rhythm: we can see the easy use of parenthesis, the imaginary conversation with the reader, and similar signs of the associative process of speech. But everything here is on an impersonal plane, the conscious mind and logical argument being assumed to be in charge. Continuous prose, or writing with a logical shape, assumes an equality between writer and reader. The writer buttonholes his reader, so to speak, when he talks to him continuously. If he wishes to suggest aloofness or some barrier against his reader, or if he simply wishes to suggest that there are greater reserves in his mind than he is ready to display all at once, he would naturally turn to a more discontinuous form.

We find such a form in the series of aphorisms of which many prose works, such as books of recorded table talk, are constructed. Philosophers in particular seem to be fond of it: Pascal, Bacon, Spinoza, Wittgenstein, Nietzsche, are a few random examples. The aphorism is oracular: it suggests that one should stop and ponder on it. Like oratorical prose, it suggests meditation, but the reader is being directed into the writer's mind instead of outward to the subject. In such discontinuous and aphoristic prose the associational rhythm can be clearly heard. Donne's Devotions Upon Emergent Occasions provide examples, especially in those passages cast in the form of prayer, where the reader is not being directly addressed: ". . . thou callest Gennezareth, which was but a Lake, and not salt, a Sea; so thou callest the Mediterranean Sea, still the great Sea, because the inhabitants saw no other Sea; they that dwelt there, thought a Lake, a Sea, and the others thought a little Sea, the greatest, and wee that know not the afflictions of others, call our owne the heaviest."

A step further in this direction takes us toward the oracular and associational prose poem of which Ossian is the best known Eng. example, though there is so little intellectual or logical interest in Ossian that there is not much sense of prose left. Eng. does not provide as clear examples of the aphoristic prose poem as German has in Nietzsche's Also Sprach Zarathustra or as Fr. has in Rimbaud's Saison en Enfer. But it is clear that in the opening of Dylan Thomas's Under Milk Wood prose is being as strongly influenced by an associational rhythm as it can well be and still remain prose: "It is Spring, moonless night in the small town, starless and bible-black, the cobblestreets silent and the hunched, courtiers'-and-rabbits' wood limping invisible down to the sloeback, slow, black, crowblack, fishing-boat-bobbing sea."

VARIETIES OF VERSE RHYTHM. This subject really belongs to PROSODY, but a few additional suggestions may find a place here. In Eng. such forms as the stopped heroic couplet and the octosyllabic couplet represent the rhythm of metrical verse at its purest, equidistant from prose and from the associational rhythm. The following passage from Pope is typical:

Alike in ignorance, his reason such,
Whether he thinks too little, or too much:
Chaos of Thought and Passion, all confus'd;
Still by himself abus'd, or disabus'd;
Created half to rise, and half to fall;
Great lord of all things, yet a prey to all;
Sole judge of Truth, in endless Error hurl'd:
The glory, jest, and riddle of the world!

The one recurrent sound is the rhyme; assonance and alliteration are kept to a minimum, and even the sentence structure tends to fall into the suggested metrical unit; hence the inevitable and unforced use of antithesis and the regular fall of the caesura. In Dryden and Pope, in the octosyllabics of Marvell, in the simple quatrains of Housman, where a strictly controlled meter makes the words step along in a precise and disciplined order, the predominant sense is one of conscious wit. This sense arises from the technical dexterity displayed in neutralizing prose sense with associative sound, on approximately equal terms.

In blank verse, so easy to write accurately and so hard to write well, we move much further in the direction of prose. For in blank verse there is little place for the metrical absorption of the sentence structure: a long series of blank-verse lines in which the sentence structure closely followed the iambic pentameter would produce intolerable singsong. Hence blank verse tends to develop syncopation and run-on lines, and as it does so a second prose rhythm is set up beside the metrical one. This process may continue until the pentameter approximates prose. The following passage from Browning's Ring and the Book has been chosen as less extreme in its approximation than many that might have been selected:

So

Did I stand question, and make answer, still
With the same result of smiling disbelief, Polite impossibility of faith
In such affected virtue in a priest;
But a showing fair play, an indulgence, even,
To one no worse than others after all—
Who had not brought disgrace to the order, played

Discreetly, ruffled gown nor ripped the cloth
In a bungling game at romps . . .

In such discursive or narrative blank verse as the above the listener hardly hears a definite pentameter at all: what he hears is a rhythm that seems just on the point of becoming prose, but is prevented from achieving the distinctively semantic rhythm of prose by some other rhythmical influence. The rhythm of Jacobean blank-verse drama has its center of gravity somewhere between verse and prose, so that it can move easily from one to the other at the requirements of dramatic decorum, which are chiefly the mood and the social rank of the speaker. In The Tempest, especially the speeches of Caliban, and in some late plays of Webster and Tourneur, the barrier between verse and prose often comes near dissolving, and hence the third associational rhythm peeps through, as in this passage from The Tempest:

I will stand to, and feed,
Although my last: no matter, since I feel

The best is past. Brother, my lord the Duke, Stand to, and do as we.

A strong bias toward a prose sentence structure combined with a more elaborate rhyming scheme often produces the kind of intentional doggerel that is a regular feature of satire, as in Hudibras or Don Juan, or in Ogden Nash today. Wordsworth, who stressed the identity of language between verse and prose, sometimes had trouble in keeping the simple flat sentences in the Lyrical Ballads from sounding like doggerel. One of Donne's Satire (the fourth) opens as follows:

Well; I may now receive, and die; My sinne
Indeed is great, but I have beene in A Purgatorie, such as fear'd hell is A recreation to, and scarce map of this.

Nobody hearing these lines read aloud would realize that they were pentameter couplets: the whole metrical scheme is parody, and as such it fits the satirical context.

In relation to prose, associational writing shows itself chiefly in a change of direction in meaning, away from the logical and toward the emotional and private. In relation to verse, it shows its influence chiefly in an increase in sound patterns. We notice this particularly in stanzaic verse, for the natural tendency of the stanza is to develop elaborate rhyming patterns, often supported by alliteration, assonance, and similar devices. Words tend to echo each other, and an evocative rhythm is superimposed on the metrical one, as in this lovely madrigal from The Faerie Queene:

Wrath, gealosie, griefe, loue do thus expell:
Wrath is a fire, and gealosie a weede,
Griefe is a flood, and loue a monster fell;
The fire of sparkes, the weede of little seede,
The flood of drops, the Monster filth did breede:
But sparkes, seed, drops, and filth do thus delay;
The sparkes soone quench, the springing seed outweed,
The drops dry vp, and filth wipe cleane away:
So shall wrath, gealosie, griefe, loue dye and decay.

A further step in this direction would make the sound-patterns obsessive, as happens occasionally, by way of experiment, in The Faerie Queene itself. Edgar Allan Poe, who made the discontinuity and the evocative effect of verse his "poetic principle," shows in such experiments in sound as The Bells and in such lines as the famous "The viol, the violet and the vine" the permeation of meter by associative sound. In Hopkins a similar unifying of metrical and associative rhythms takes place, but in a much more intellectualized context:

'Some find me a sword; some
The flange and the rail; flame
Fang, or flood' goes Death on drum,
And storms bugle his fame.

But we dream we are rooted in earth—Dust!
Flesh falls within sight of us, we, though our flower the same,

Wave with the meadow, forget that there must

The sour scythe cringe, and the blear share come.

This passage illustrates another important principle. As associational patterns increase, and as alliteration and assonance appear beside rhyme, a more vigorous rhythm than a strict meter may be required to prevent the poem from becoming a soggy mass of echolalia. The rhythm in the Hopkins passage is accentual rather than metrical: like the rhythm of music, which it closely resembles, it sets up a series of accented beats, with a good deal of variety in the number of syllables that may intervene between beats. The sixth line of the above passage begins with an accentual spondee, though the prevailing rhythm of the line is anapestic. This accentual rhythm, usually with four main beats to a line, has run through Eng. from Anglo-Saxon alliterative verse to our own day, and often syncopates against the metrical rhythm. Thus "Whan that Aprill with his shoures soote," "To be or not to be, that is the question," and "Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit" are all iambic pentameter lines with four accented beats.

VARIETIES OF ASSOCIATIONAL RHYTHM. It is only in the more experimental writing of the last century or so, with its strongly psychological bias and its interest in the processes of creation, that any serious attempts have been made to isolate the associational rhythm in literature. Owing to this late development, its earlier manifestations have fallen within the normal categories of prose and metrical verse.

The associational rhythm has always been a feature of oracular writing, as in the Koran and in many parts of the Bible, as well as a regular literary device for expressing insanity, as in some of the Tom o' Bedlam speeches in King Lear. These uses are solemn or tragic, yet associative rhythms and mental processes have also a close connection with the comic, and, in the form of puns and malapropisms, have been one of the chief sources of humor. The conscious wit that was mentioned as an effect of expertly handled meter is quite distinct from associational wit, which results rather from an involuntary release from the subconscious. The most striking examples of associational rhythm at its purest before our own day are dramatic attempts to render the speech of uneducated or confused people who make no effort to organize their language into prose, such as Mistress Quickly in Shakespeare or Jingle and Mrs. Nickleby in Dickens. This curious duality of the oracular and the comic is peculiar to associational rhythm, and has been illustrated in passages quoted above.

Rabelais is the great progenitor of associational prose, especially in passages depicting drunkenness or other oracular states of mind, as in the fifth chapter of Gargantua. But of course in Eng. the tradition of associational prose writing was established by Sterne. Almost any page of Sterne, notably the famous opening page of the Sentimental Journey, illustrates the lightning changes of mood and rhythm and the dislocation of the ordinary logic of narrative or thought that are characteristic of associative style. Modern "stream of consciousness" writing is heavily indebted to Sterne. In such passages as this from Ulysses we can see the predominance of what we have called the "thought-breath" rhythm of association as distinct from the poetic line and the prose sentence: "Confession. Everyone wants to. Then I will tell you all. Penance. Punish me, please. Great weapon in their hands. More than doctor or solicitor. Woman dying to. And I schschschschschsch. And did you chachachachacha? And why did you? Look down at her ring to find an excuse. Whispering gallery walls have ears. Husband learn to his surprise. God's little joke. Then out she comes. Repentance skindeep. Lovely shame. Pray at an altar. Hail Mary and Holy Mary." The speed of this is andante and the monologue of Molly Bloom at the end of the book presto, but the rhythmical units are the same.

Associational prose develops in two directions, which may be called the disjunctive and the conjunctive. In disjunctive writing, as illustrated most typically by Gertrude Stein, and also found in Hemingway, Faulkner, and D. H. Lawrence, there is a technique of deliberate prolixity, a hypnotic repetition of words and ideas. In dialogue this may express simple inarticulateness or fumbling for meaning: in short, the original naive speech out of which associational writing grows. In more sophisticated contexts it expresses rather a breaking down of the more customary logical prose structures preparatory to replacing them with the psychological and emotional structures of associational prose. In conjunctive writing the aim is the reverse: to pack into the words as great a concentration of association as possible, whether of allusion, of sound (as in punning or paronomasia), or of ideas. The logical culmination of this process is Finnegans Wake, where the dream language used shows the influence of Freud's demonstrations of the incredible associative complexity of states of mind below consciousness.

In verse, associational rhythm very seldom predominates over meter before Whitman's time: about the only clear examples are poems written in abnormal states of mind, such as Christopher Smart's Jubilate Agno. Whitman's own rhythm shows many formalizing influences, such as that of biblical parallelism, and the relation to prose is also often close. But in Whitman's oracular lines, with a strong pause at the end of each and with no regular metrical pattern connecting them, the distinctive associational rhythm has been fully emancipated. Whitman's natural tendency is disjunctive, and in some later free verse, especially in imagism (q.v.), this tendency is developed. Thus Amy Lowell:

Lilacs, False blue,
White,
Purple,
Color of lilac,
Heart-leaves of lilac all over New England,
Roots of lilac under all the soil of New England,
Lilac in me because I am New England . . .

But the prevailing tendency in modern associational verse is conjunctive or evocative, as it is in the erudite literary allusiveness of Eliot and Pound, in the catachresis (q.v.) metaphors of Hart Crane and Dylan Thomas, or in the symbolic clusters of the later Yeats.

In pure prose, where the emphasis is on descriptive meaning, figures of speech are used sparingly, an occasional illustration or analogy being normally the only figuration employed. The more rhetorical the prose, the more naturally figurative the style becomes. In Jeremy Taylor, for instance, there appear elaborately drawn-out similes, and in euphuism similes from natural history (or what then passed as such) are a regularly recurring feature. Verse also, when it steers its middle course between prose and associational rhythm, often finds its figurative center of gravity in the illustrative simile, so prominent in the classical epic. But in verse, words are associated for sound as well as sense, rhyme being as important as reason, and the more intensified the sound patterns are, the greater the opportunities for puns and similar verbal echoes. Associational writing, when conjunctive, tends to violently juxtaposed metaphor and to a thick figurative texture.

S. Lanier, The Science of Eng. Verse (1880); T. S. Omond, A Study of Metre (1903) and Eng. Metrists (1921); G. Saintsbury, A Hist. of Eng. Prosody (3 v., 1906-10) and A Hist. of Eng. Prose Rhythm (1912); Schipper;

L. Abercrombie, Poetry and Contemporary Speech (1914; Eng. Assoc. pamphlet no. 14); Baum; D. L. Clark, Rhetoric and Poetry in the Renaissance (1922); C. P. Smith, Pattern and Variation in Poetry (1932); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (2d ed., 1952); M. Boulton, Anatomy of Poetry (1953) and Anatomy of Prose (1954); J. Thompson, The Founding of Eng. Metre (1961). N.FR.

VERSE DRAMA. See DRAMATIC POETRY.

VERSE PARAGRAPH. Like prose, poetry tends to move forward in units which may be called, by analogy, v. paragraphs. The tendency is particularly strong in narrative and descriptive poetry, where the paragraphs are often indicated by indentation or spacing between lines. Elaborate stanzaic forms like the Spenserian stanza or ottava rima are often developed as v. paragraphs, and in inferior poetry the result is usually monotonous. If a paragraph is defined as one or more sentences unified by a dominant mood or thought, many lyrics could be described as single v. paragraphs, a point especially obvious in the case of the sonnet.

By general consent, the greatest master of the v. paragraph is John Milton. Many of the characteristic effects of Paradise Lost—its majesty, its epic sweep, its rich counterpoint of line and sentence rhythms—are produced or enhanced by Milton's v. paragraphs. To sustain his paragraphs Milton employed enjambment ("the sense variously drawn out from one Verse into another"), interruption, inversion, and suspension, or Spannung, the device of the periodic sentence whereby the completion of the thought is delayed until the end of the period.—G. Hübner, Die stilistische Spannung in Milton's P.L. (1913); E. Smith, The Principles of Eng. Metre (1923); J. H. Hanford, Milton Handbook (4th ed., 1946); J. Whaler, Counterpoint and Symbol: An Inquiry into . . . Milton's . . . Style (1956).

VERSET. A form derived from the "verses" of the Bible (especially The Song of Songs, Psalms, Prophets). Its earliest application, accordingly, is in religious or mystical works of biblical inspiration, like the 15th-c. Imitations of Christ (Thomas à Kempis?). More recently, the form appears in parts of Hölderlin's Hyperion (1797-99) and throughout two apocalyptic works: The Books of Polish Pilgrimage by Adam Mickiewicz and its immediate offshoot, Lamennais' Paroles d'un croyant (1834). The charismatic character of both books stems largely from the v.: the long line—actually perhaps several lines of print—is a powerful, rhythmic verbal surge corresponding roughly to one outpouring of breath from full lungs.

Alliteration and assonance, possibly rhyme, anaphora and other types of repetition, rhetorical figures like antithesis, parallelism etc., bolster the verset's aural and emotional suasion. Inasmuch as maximum freedom (this side of the prose poem, q.v.) is allowed in the number of words per unit, an exciting oscillation obtains between vers libre and poetic prose, depending on the greater or lesser symmetry in a sequence of versets.

The fervor of the v. is usually religious or patriotic—Péguy, Claudel; or the (not altogether different) opposite—Nietzsche's Also sprach Zarathustra; it can accommodate also the pure passions of Paul Fort (Ballades françaises) and the cloudier ones of St. John Perse. It has found favor with the inward-echoing receptivity of impressionism (e.g. Max Dauthendey), as with the intensified expansiveness of expressionism (Werfel, Ernst Stadler). The poetic drama made excellent use of the v.: Claudel and Péguy again, and expressionists like Walter Hasenclever (Der Sohn). Here its rousing quality can prove most felicitous.

P. Fort, "Préface," Le Roman de Louis XI (1898); L. Spitzer, "Zu Charles Péguy's Stil," Stilstudien (2 v., 1928); P. Claudel, "Réflexions et propositions sur le vers français," Positions et propositions (2 v., 1928); E. Dujardin, "Les premiers poètes du vers libre," Mallarmé par un des siens (1936); W. Weintraub, "A Gospel for the Refugees," The Poetry of Adam Mickiewicz (2 v., 1954); F. Martini, "Also sprach Zarathustra," Das Wagnis der Sprache (2d ed., 1956). J.S.

VERSI SCIOLTI. Also, endecasillabi sciolti. Hendecasyllabic lines with principal accent on the tenth syllable and without rhyme. They were used as early as the 13th c. (in the Mare amoroso) but were first cultivated during the Renaissance as the It. equivalent of classical epic hexameter. Trissino used them in his epic Italia liberata dai goti, and his tragedy Sofonisba. Despite his lack of success a controversy arose between the advocates of classical austerity and the advocates of rhyme. In the 16th c. rhyme won the day, but in the 18th c. and thereafter, v.s. were used with great success, particularly by Parini (Il Giorno), Foscolo (I Sepolcri), and Manzoni (Urania). Alfieri almost singlehanded made them the standard meter for tragedy. More recently the dramatist Sem Benelli used them in several dramas, and Pascoli adopted them for all but the last of his Poemi conviviali. Endecasillabi sciolti are equivalent to blank verse (q.v.) and may have influenced the development of that form in Eng.—F. Flamini, Notizia Storica dei Versi e Metri Italiani . . . (1919). L.H.G.

VERSIFICATION. See PROSODY.

VERSO PIANO. Also, endecasillabo. In It. prosody applied to any line that has a feminine ending with the accent on the next-to-last syllable. In particular, a line of 11 syllables with principal accent on the tenth. V.p. is the standard narrative line in It. corresponding to iambic pentameter in Eng. It was used in the earliest It. (and Sicilian) poetry in the first half of the 13th c. The opening line of the Divine Comedy is a famous example: "Nel mezzo del cammin di nostra vita." See also VERSI SCIOLTI; VERSO TRONCO. L.H.G.

VERSO SDRUCCIOLO. Also, endecasillabo sdrucchiolo. In It. prosody a line with the principal accent on the tenth syllable and ending in a parola sdrucchiola, a word accented on the antepenultimate syllable, giving the verse a dactylic ending as well as actually 12 syllables. An example from Dante's Divine Comedy (Inferno 24.64) is: "Parlando andava per non parer fievole." This line was cultivated in the 16th c. instead of the L. iambic trimeter. Ariosto used it in his Comedies to imitate the meter in the Theater of Plautus and Terence. Monti used it later in the Canto d'Apollo, in his Prometeo; and Carducci, still later, in his Canto di Marzo, wherein he tried to reproduce the accents and pauses of the L. iambic trimeter. This system applies to the It. settenario verse as well.—F. Flamini, Notizia Storica dei Versi e Metri Italiani . . . (1919); C. H. Grandgent, Introd. to Dante's Divina Commedia (1933). L.H.G.

VERSO TRONCO. Also, endecasillabo tronco. In It. prosody applied to any line ending with an accented syllable; in particular, a line with principal accent on the tenth syllable and with a masculine ending. Because the final unstressed syllable has been dropped (tronco, from troncato, lopped off), the endecasillabo has 10 rather than the usual 11 syllables. Dante may have used v.t. (Inferno 4.60), but uncertainty about his pronunciation makes it impossible to decide definitely. In the generation after Dante, Antonio Pucci began a sonnet with a v.t.: "Caro Sonetto mio, con gran pietà." In another of his sonnets, versi tronchi are used throughout the octave. Later poets sometimes used them as a metrical stunt. See VERSO PIANO. L.H.G.

VERSUS POLITICUS. A verse of 15 accentual iambic syllables, rare before the 10th c. A.D. but common from the late Byzantine period to the present day. It consists of two cola, one of 8 and one of 7 syllables, with a caesura after the eighth syllable. It has two main accents, one on the eighth or sixth and one on the fourteenth syllable. The origin of the verse is not very certain but, in all probability, it goes back to the beginning of the Eastern Roman Empire. Eustathius thought that it originated in the ancient trochaic tetrameter and Krumbacher considered it a mixture of the two most popular ancient meters, the trochaic and iambic tetrameter. The widespread use of the verse in late Byzantine and modern Gr. folk poetry argues in favor of its popular origin.—K. L. Struve, Ueber den politischen Vers der Mittelgriechen (1828); K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur (2d ed., 1897); P. Maas, Gr. Metre, tr. H. Lloyd-Jones (1962). P.S.C.

VERSUS PYTHIUS. Name given to the dactylic hexameter, e.g., by Aphthonius (3d c. A.D.), because it was the meter used in the Pythian (i.e., Delphic) oracles. Combinations of hexameters and iambic dimeters or trimeters were called pythiambs, examples of which are provided by Horace, Epodes 14, 15, and 16.

R.J.G.

VERSUS SPONDAICUS. Roman grammarians differ as to whether this was a verse (notably hexameter) consisting entirely of spondees, e.g., Ennius, Annales 169 (Vahlen):

cīvēs | Rōmā|nī tūnc | fāctī | sūnt Cām|pānī, or a dactylic hexameter with a spondee in its fifth foot, i.e., a spondaic verse (q.v.). The latter meaning is generally adopted by modern metricians (e.g., Kolář) for versus spondaicus (cf. the Gr. [stichos] spondeiazon as attested by Cicero, Epistulae ad Atticum 7.2.1). R.J.G.

VIETNAMESE POETRY. The earliest forms of Viet. poetry show the influence of Chinese domination over a long period and indeed were written in the Chinese language. What might be called the classical form was subject to the rigid rules of versification found in Chinese poetics. A common verse form was the poem of 8 lines of 7 syllables each. Since Viet., like Chinese, is a tonal language, each line provided a fixed position for various tones with little variation permitted. The 8 lines consisted of 4 couplets which, as Cung-giu-Nguyễn phrases it, "served successively to introduce, describe, discuss and conclude." This Chinese influence and the Sino-Viet. literature were ultimately replaced to a very large extent by a national literature in Viet. The outstanding representative of the national literature is Nguyễn-Du (1765–1820) who adapted and composed in poetry a Chinese novel, called in Viet. by the names of its three chief characters Kim-vân-Kiều. This the Viet. people consider the national poem of their country and the masterpiece of their literature. Besides this work, Viet. literature possesses two other poetic masterpieces, Cung oan Ngâm Khúc (Lament of a Lady of the Palace), and Chinh phu Ngâm (Lament of a Warrior's Wife). The first was written by the well-known poet On-nhu-Hau (1741–98), the second by one of the several outstanding poetesses in Viet. literature, Đoàn-thi-Điêm (1705–46). On-nhu-Hau depicts the sad fate of a beautiful woman whom he compares with the sunflower which is born with the sun and with the sun it dies. This poem still remains one of the most popular in all Vietnam. Đoàn-thi-Điêm's masterpiece of Viet. poetry was first written in Chinese by another Viet. Her version in the vernacular of her country has made her famous and rendered the poem among the best-loved in her country. It is the plaint of a young and beautiful woman waiting for her husband, who is away at war and in the end does not return.

Some reaction to the classical poetic tradition began to appear shortly after the turn of the century and in 1930 La Fontaine's Fables were translated into Viet. in free verse. The new poetry of the younger writers which began to appear from 1930 on was sharply criticized by the older poets who deplored the break with the classical verse forms and the inability or unwillingness to compose according to the long-established rules of versification. A famous classical poet of a later generation was Nguyễn-khac-Hiêu (1889–1939), better known by the name Tan-Da, a Bohemian by nature, whose poems reflect the unhappiness of one who is unable to make his way in the world and retreats to live frugally, detached from the mainstream of life. Another is Trần-tuan-Khai who sings in classical style of his homeland and of its great heroes. As late as 1940 Quach Tan published a collection of poems in the same style but the younger generation exhibited no enthusiasm for them.

In 1936 Thê Lu's poems in modern rhythms, new to the Viet. ear, appeared. Pessimistic in tone, they charmed the younger generation of listeners. Several of his poems are considered masterpieces of modern Viet. literature. In the same year the first collection of poems by a leper, Hàn-măc-Tù (1913–40), appeared. Entitled Gái-Quê (Country Maidens), they were written in free verse and sing of the simplicity of rustic life and people. Though suffering greatly from his malady and withdrawn from society, he continued to compose until his death in September 1940. An example of his poetry is this stanza describing his imminent death:

One of these mornings, near a limpid source,
With the stars and the dew I shall die like the moon

Finding none of these beautiful fairies to weep for me,
Embrace me and heal the wounds of my heart.

Viet. poets did not limit themselves to composition in Chinese and the vernacular of their country. So strong was Fr. influence that several Viet. poets became well known in France. One of these is Pham-van-Ky (1913-) who shows the influence of Baudelaire in his collection called Une Voix sur la Voie (A Voice Along the Way). One of the more successful modern poets in Viet. has been Vu-hoang-Chuong who has been publishing his work since 1940. He is regarded as an example of one who has been able to bridge the ancient and the modern as well as the Eastern and the Western. Some of his poems have been translated into Eng. and Fr.

ANTHOLOGIES: Morceaux choisis d'auteurs annamites . . ., ed. and tr. G. Cordier (2d ed., 1935); Poésies de l'Extrême-Orient, tr. Tran-van-Tung (1945); Vu-hoang-Chuong, Communion: Poems (1960).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Pham-Quynh, La poésie annamite (1931); G. Cordier, Étude sur la litt. annamite (3 v., 1933-40; best general survey); Tran-cuu-Chan, Étude critique du Kim-văn-Kiêu, Poème national du Viêt-Nam (1948), Essais sur la litt. vietnamienne (1950) and Les grandes poétesses du Viêt-Nam (1950); Thai-van-Kiem, Un grand poète vietnamien: Hàn-mặc-Tù (2d ed., 1950) and Étude littéraire, philosophique et scientifique du "Kim-văn-Kiêu" (1951); R. Maran, "Three Indo-Chinese Poets," BA, 21 (1947); Cung-giu- Nguyen, "Contemporary Viet. Writing," BA, 29 (1955); M. Durand, "Litt. Vietnamienne," in Histoire des littératures, ed. R. Queneau, I (1955). J.M.E.

VILLANCICO. The v., a Sp. song form of popular origin, has come to mean simply a carol, particularly now a Christmas carol or a popular song on some other religious theme. Formerly the theme was not so restricted in subject matter. According to P. Henríquez Ureña, "... the line may be of any length, regular or variable, although the typical compositions are in octosyllables or hexasyllables, and have an estribillo (refrain) of two, three, or four lines, and stanzas of six, plus the retornelo (chorus) alternating with them." Rengifo describes the Golden Age form thus: "The lines [pies] of each strophe of the v. ordinarily are six. The first two are called the first mudanza [change], and the following two, second mudanza, because in them the sonada [tune] of the cabeza [introductory stanza presenting the theme] is varied and changed. The last two are called vuella [return], because in them one returns to the first tono [tune], and after them is repeated the last line or the last two lines of the represa [repetition]. The rhyme-scheme of the pies [lines] will follow that of the cabeza. Thus when in the cabeza of the v. there are four lines rhyming first with fourth and second with third, the mudanzas will have the same rhyme scheme and the vuella will be like the last two lines of the cabeza." Le Gentil classifies the v. as a form developed from the cantiga.—Rengifo, Arte poética española (1592); P. Henríquez Ureña, Versificación irregular en la poesía castellana (2d ed., 1933); P. Le Gentil, La poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise . . . 2^e partie: Les formes (1953) and Le virelai et le villancico (1954); Navarro. D.C.C.

VILLANELLE. A Fr. verse form, derived from an It. folk song of the late 15th-early 17th c. and first employed for pastoral subjects. According to L. E. Kastner (History of Fr. Versification, 1903), Fr. 17th c. prosodists such as Richelet reserved the term "villanelle" for one of the rustic songs by Jean Passerat (1534-1602). Although the earlier forms show considerable variation, the v. has since Passerat retained the following pattern: usually 5 tercets rhyming aba, followed by a quatrain rhyming abaa, with the first line of the initial tercet serving as the last line of the second and fourth tercets and the third line of the initial tercet serving as the last line of the third and fifth tercets, these 2 refrain-lines following each other to constitute the last 2 lines of the closing quatrain. If we let a^1 and a^2 stand for the first and third lines of the first tercet, we may schematize the form thus: $a^1ba^2\ aba^1\ aba^2\ aba^1\ aba^2\ aba^2$.

Like the older Fr. forms, the v. was employed in 19th-c. Eng. poetry primarily as a light verse form by such experimental dilettantes as Andrew Lang. However, Leconte de Lisle used it in 19th-c. France as a vehicle for philosophical content, and in the 20th c. E. A. Robinson's House on the Hill achieved a somber effect. More recently, Dylan Thomas' Do not go gentle into that good night restored a majestic seriousness to the v.

VIRELAI (also called chanson baladée, and vireli). Fr. medieval lyric. Originally a variant of the common dance song with refrain of which the rondeau (q.v.) is the most prominent type. This form developed in the 13th c. and at first may have been performed by one or more leading voices and a chorus. It begins with a refrain; this is followed by a stanza of 4 lines of which the first 2 have a musical line (repeated) different from that of the refrain. The last 2 lines of this stanza use the music of the refrain. The opening refrain, words and music, is then sung again. The v. usually continues with 2 more stanzas presented in this same way. A v. with only 1 stanza would be a bergerette. In Italy the 13th c. laude, and in Spain the cantigas, follow the same form. The syllables vireli and virelai were probably meaningless refrains which later designated the type.—F. Gennrich, Rondeaux, Virelais und Balladen (2 v., 1928). For additional information, see P. Le Gentil, La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge, 2^e partie. Les Formes (1953) and Le V. et le villancico (1954); M. Francon, "On the Nature of the V.," Sym., 9 (1955; briefly surveys various schemes and proposes own formula).

U.T.H.

VOLTA, or volte. A turn or a repetition (used also of music, dance, etc.). In sonnet development the word was used in Italy to refer to the tercets of the sestet, either because of the repetition of the tercet or, more probably, because of the "turn of thought" which followed the close of the octave. The term would thus be applicable to any point in the thought development, regardless of the sonnet type, where such a turn might occur, as in Shakespeare's Sonnet 18, line 9: "But thy eternal summer shall not fade . . ." or in Keats's On First Looking Into Chapman's Homer, line 9: "Then felt I like some watcher of the skies. . . ." It is more than coincidence that both of these occur in line 9, inasmuch as the organization of thought within the limited scope of the form invites (though it does not demand) a division at that point. See SONNET.

L.J.Z.

VORTICISM. Though essentially a manifestation of certain ideas and developments in the visual arts, v. is related directly to modern poetry through Ezra Pound's interest in it and his claim for it as a movement parallel to imagism (q.v.) in poetry. Organized by Wyndham Lewis in 1914, v. was in short-lived reaction to the romantic and vitalist theories of futurism (q.v.), and stood most positively and clearly for the abstract and nonrepresentational in art. Abstraction was important, of course, as a reflection of certain qualities of a machine-age consciousness; and in the criticism of T. E. Hulme it occasionally and for different reasons assumes a status roughly equal to that of the absolutes of metaphysics. Its value for the vorticist, however, lay in its forcing the artist upon his own invention, in its inhibiting his tendency to make art an imitation of nature which would necessarily be inferior to the original. The vortex or whirlpool is energy, but it is energy that has undergone a metamorphosis into form; the two are inextricable in this analogy, but the significant point is the creation of a form that is still and yet moving, a paradox that is central to modern poetics from Hulme's "analogy" to Pound's "Image" to the formalist theories of the New Criticism (q.v.) and the speculations of Burnt Norton. The abstract demanded that the artist invent rather than copy and put a premium on the intellect rather than the emotions; but vorticism's relation to poetry is through its suggestion of a symbolist concept of form and structure.—Blast 1 (1914) and 2 (1915); E. Pound, "V.," The Fortnightly Review, 96 (1914), "Affirmations," The New Age, 16 (1915), Gaudier-Brzeska: A Memoir (1916), The Letters of E. P., ed. D. D. Paige (1950); W. Lewis, Time and Western Man (1928), Blasting and Bombardiering (1937), Wyndham Lewis the Artist (1939); H. Kenner, The Poetry of E. P. (1951); S. K. Coffman, Imagism (1951); T. E. Hulme, Further Speculations, ed. S. Hynes (1955); G. Wagner, Wyndham Lewis: a Portrait of the Artist as the Enemy (1957).

S.K.G.

VOWEL RHYME. Used by some writers instead of the terms "assonance" or "assonantal rhyme," to describe that rhyme which requires phonetic identity only in the ultimate accented vowel (e.g., roof, tooth). Others use it to describe rhyme in which "any vowel is allowed to agree with any other" (Deutsch), for example, "falling, it."—E. Guest, A Hist. of Eng. Rhythms (1838, new ed., 1882); C. Wood, The Art and Technique of Writing Poetry (1945); Deutsch.

R.B.E.

W

WAKA. See TANKA; JAPANESE POETRY.

WEAK ENDING. See LINE ENDINGS.

WEDGE VERSE. See RHOPALIC VERSE.

WELSH POETRY has a history of 14 centuries from the odes of Taliesin and Aneirin to the present day. We learn from Gildas' attack on the bards of Maelgwn Gwynedd's court (d. A.D. 547) that theirs was a secular tradition of panegyric, a thing apart from ecclesiastical learning and music, and having its high moments in feastings and on public occasions. Basically this remained true in succeeding ages although the influence of L. rhetoric, ars poetica, and other forms of medieval culture became marked.

Most of the extant poetry prior to the loss of Welsh independence in 1282 is found in the Black Book of Carmarthen, the Book of Taliesin, the Book of Aneirin, the Red Book of Hergest, and the Hendregadredd MS. Modern W. scholarship has led to the unraveling of several strands. The earliest is the Hengerdd (old-song). This includes the historic odes of Taliesin in praise of the rulers of Rheged (in S. W. Scotland) and North Wales, and also the poetry of Aneirin—a series of poignant and graphic elegies to the young men of the retinue of Mynyddog, a ruler of Edinburgh late in the 6th c., who had nearly all been destroyed by superior numbers of Northumbrians in an attempt to recover Catraeth (Catterick), a place of strategic importance. The Hengerdd, short poems of strong feeling, terse antitheses, and graphic description, became the chief models of W. poetry for hundreds of years, both for the outlook on life which they presented and for metrical form and ornament. The bardic tradition was molded around them.

There is no strong tradition of W. narrative poetry; prose was long considered to be the proper medium for story-telling (e.g. the Mabinogion). But the story-teller would break into verse at peak moments of tension. The 9th-c. poetry about Llywarch the Aged, and of Heledd and her brothers, are all that remains of tales of W. rulers who are depicted as having held sway over rich low-lying lands around Shrewsbury before being driven to the hills by the Eng. These englynion (see ENGLYN) of unknown authorship, with terse economy of words, and stark directness of expression, show great dramatic perception and maturity of reflection.

Y deilen honn, neus kennired gwynt.
Gwae hi o'e thynghet!
Hi hen; eleni ganet.

This leaf, driven by the wind,
Woeful her fate!
She is old; born only this year.

The taunting of brave sons by a garrulous aging father, the pathos of the old man's lonely helplessness after the death to which he had driven them, the desolation of the burnt-out hall of Cynddylan, and the tortured conscience of Heledd who feared that her lack of charity had provoked the powers that be—

these are among the permanent things of W. poetry.

The precariousness of national existence led to much vaticinary poetry. The Prophecy of Britain (ca. A.D. 900) is a notable example. Goaded by the exactions of Athelstan, a Glamorgan poet who was a master of vigorous expression envisages a grand coalition of Cornish, W., Clydesmen, Gaels, and Dublin Norse who are destined to force the Eng. back on Sandwich whence they would reembark and leave the island in peace! Most of the prophetic poems up to the 13th c. however are in a more nostalgic strain, and are attributed to Myrddin (Merlin) to whose mind, deranged by the horrors of war, is attributed the gift of prophecy. These short poems have a touching tenderness as when he talks to his little pig, but also a stark directness: he sees his people crushingly defeated in a battle fought on a Wednesday, but assures them that "Thursday will come."

There is much early nature poetry, mostly in englyn meters: graphic and sensitive, with a rare economy of words closely knitted with alliteration and internal rhyme ("Wind keen, hill bare, ford unsafe, pool frozen, man can stand on a single straw-stump"). Most of this verse dates from the 9th to the 12th c., and some of it seems to have been composed by hermits. Often the scenes from nature are interspersed with gnomic phrases. The earliest religious poems are englynion to the Son of Mary (9th c.). The Black Book of Carmarthen contains a number of varied religious poems, typically medieval, including a debate between soul and body.

Norman aggression in Wales was repulsed in the 12th and 13th c. under the leadership mainly of the House of Gwynedd, following the return of Gruffudd ap Cynan from exile in Ireland. He brought in Ir. influences and reestablished the W. bardic orders. His dynasty (together with rulers of Powys and the South) were the patrons of the Gogynfeirdd, composers of court panegyric, modeled on the hengerdd, but more ornate, complex, and verbose. The penceirddiaid (chiefs of song) sang odes of praise to God and to the prince. Below them were the household bards, who sang in somewhat simpler style to the court ladies and the prince's chosen warriors. Nature, love, and vaunting themes lend variety, and the freshest poems are by two of the rulers themselves (1) Prince Owain Cyfeiliog who emulates Aneirin in stirring descriptions in awdl meters of forays (Covered with sweat were they all when they returned, and lol valley and long hillside were full of sun) and (2) Prince Hywel ab Owain Gwynedd, of mixed W. and Ir. blood, in whose joyous love poems, Continental influences blend with a percipient delight in the W. countryside and community. The greatest of the court panegyricists were Cynddelw (12th c.), Llywarch ap Llywelyn, Dafydd Benfras, and Bleddyn Fardd (13th c.). They were men of high office in the inner circles of the princes, and they depict well the tensions and ideals on which the fate of the nation depended. This with the artistry of their awdlau gives to their verse dignity and reality.

Cistercian houses were established in the heart of Wales by her princes. The content of Gogynfeirdd religious poetry benefits by this contact. After the fall of the native princes (1282), several of the abbots became active patrons of the poets; the Ars Poetica was introduced to Wales through the influence of the church, and as a result, from the 14th to the 16th c., disquisitions in verse on matters of poetic theory—such as the sincerity of panegyric, the source of the poetic gift, etc.—were to become a marked feature. It culminated in a long verse discussion in cywydd meter (q.v.) between Edmwnd Prys and William Cynwal, on the respective merits of the medieval and Renaissance viewpoints on the function of poetry. Franciscan influence appears late in the 12th c. in Madog ap Gwallter, particularly in the fresh visual imagery and tenderness of his nativity poem. After 1282 patronage devolved mainly on the numerous small estate-holders. Stratification of bards into functional grades became far less rigid. Lower orders emerge with their simpler diction and meters such as the traethodl. Then appeared Wales's greatest poet, Dafydd ap Gwilym, who seized this meter and embellished it with the rich ornament of cynghanedd (q.v.), thus creating a fitting medium for expressing energetically the exciting miracle of creation which with his untiring eye for detail he saw daily renewed. Love and the exuberance of nature were his twin themes, and through the device of dyfalu (q.v.) he tirelessly strings together a chain of comparisons. His new cywydd meter became the normal form for two centuries, was ably revived in the 18th, and is still popular.

He had many imitators, and although panegyric was reestablished in the 15th c., a new sensuousness had come into W. poetry. Domestic comfort had increased, and householdership became the main theme of the bards. A more mellifluous style prevailed, and during the grand siècle, 1435–1535, delight in fine houses, gardens, and the arts of domesticity, tasteful appreciation of poetry and harp music in the homes of the small estate-holders, love of horses and treasured possessions of fine craftsmanship were the main themes. In eisteddfodau—bardic assemblies—meters and cynghanedd were given their final form, and emphasis was on artistic perfection. A challenge to the prevailing outlook, however, was provided by the school of Siôn Cent in reminders of mortality and in a demand for a more chastening “reality.” Not only was it a period of great masters of verse like Dafydd Nanmor, Dafydd ab Edmwnd and Tudur Aled, but the general level of literary competence had never been higher, and as the poets “perambulated” the country they were a cohesive force, maintaining a refined literary tongue and a unity of outlook.

The growth of the Renaissance was hindered by the social changes of the Tudor period. Landed families became anglicized. Dr. Gruffydd Robert, of Milan, and Edmwnd Prys, less radical than du Bellay, wished to pour new wine into the old bottles of strict meters (q.v.). Prys urged the poets to turn for their themes to the wonder of man's growing knowledge and command over nature. A new questioning spirit is felt, but with the generation of Siôn Phylip (early 17th c.) the old bardic life of perambulation, patronage and the practice of poetry as a profession comes to an end. The Tudor period, however, saw the growth of much popular verse closely akin in form and content to similar types in England. Ballads and songs of the sea and of various aspects of the life of the common people were greatly in favor, and the impulse of the Reformation is best seen in the fine W. metrical Psalter of the scholarly Edmwnd Prys. The 17th c. saw much decay but a new kind of poetic life emerged. Owen Gruffydd, of Llanystumdwy, marks the appearance of the local poet, untrained in bardic schools, but inheriting many scraps of the tradition, who sings the daily affairs of his own village in free meters (q.v.) but garnished with much alliteration and internal rhyme. Huw Morus, was foremost in borrowing the meters of popular song-tunes and decorating them in the same manner, in a loose version of cynghanedd. This “manner of Huw Morris” remained popular for two centuries, and poems for watchnight services at Christmastide were generally in this style.

The long decline was arrested in the second half of the 18th c. by the classical revival and by the hymn-writers. Lewis Morris, Goronwy Owen, and Ieuan Fardd studied the best W. poetry of former ages in manuscripts, and restored awdl and cywydd to their former excellence. They combined an Augustan outlook with their medievalism. The letters of Goronwy Owen were the greatest influence in W. literary criticism down to the time of Sir John Morris-Jones, and the standards of the Eisteddfod throughout the 19th c. derived from them. Another aspect of 18th-c. classicism were the pastorals of Edward Richard in "three-stroke" meter. Free-meter poetry untrammelled by the old poetic ornament came into its own with the hymns of Pantycelyn and others, and it is from the hymn that the 19th-c. W. lyric grew. The 18th c. also saw in the interludes of Twm o'r Nant the best dramatic verse in W. before the work of Saunders Lewis. Blank verse and very long free-meter narrative and descriptive poems first appear in W. from the pen of Pantycelyn. Many awdlau and pryddestau (qq.v.) were composed throughout the 19th c. with eisteddfod chairs and crowns in view, but a deterioration set in as the century advanced. Notable among long free-meter poems are those of Islwyn, with their reflection on life, profound and moving at best, but often turgid. Much good lyrical poetry was written in the 19th c., patterned on hymn meters and also on Eng. lyric forms. The song lyrics of Ceiriog, nostalgic and melodious, were immensely popular.

As the century drew to its somewhat dull close, there was little to show that the next half-century was destined to be one of the greatest periods of W. poetry. Verse was derivative, a spent force, feebly pietistic, the language without freshness and purity of idiom, horizons narrow through lack of contact with the great ages of the past and with Europe. The challenge was met, however, at every point. Sir John Morris-Jones, the leading critic of the early 20th c. led men back to the fine qualities of medieval and 18th-c. cynganedd, purified idiom, translated Heine and other European lyric poets, and led other poets to find inspiration in themes of Celtic romance. The new age was heralded at the Bangor Eisteddfod (1902) by the appearance of T. Gwynn Jones's Passing of Arthur, W. J. Gruffydd's Tristan and Iseult and Eifion Wyn's lyrics. T. Gwynn Jones wrote a number of long poems in cynganedd on the romance of the Celtic past with a mastery over words and metrical forms which led him to experiment with new adaptations of the old bardic forms culminating in his application of cynganedd to vers libre. Gruffydd expresses his deep feeling for the present-day community life and characters of Caernarvonshire in free-meter forms. The sonnet makes a late appearance in Wales but is powerfully used by R. Williams-Parry, T. H. Parry-Williams, and D. Gwenallt Jones. The ferment of 20th-c. W. poetry has taken many forms, old and new. The later work of Gwenallt Jones shows bold metrical experiment in an effort to capture the rhythms of impassioned speech. Of recent years new ground has been broken by Saunders Lewis in his verse-plays, where he has closely studied ways of reproducing speech rhythms within various verse patterns.

ANTHOLOGIES (in W.): The Myvyrian Ar- chatalogy of Wales, ed. O. Jones and others (3 v., 1801-7); Ceinion Llenyddiaeth Gymreig (Beauties of W. Lit.), ed. O. Jones (4 v., 1876); Cywyddau Cymru, ed. A. Hughes (1908); Blodeüglum o Englynion, ed. W. J. Gruffydd (1920); Y Gelfyddyd Gwta. Englynion a Phenillion, ed. T. Gwynn Jones (1929); Y Flodeugerdd Gymraeg (The W. Anthol.), ed. W. J. Gruffydd (1931); Cywyddau Iolo Goch ac eraill, ed. H. Lewis and others (2d ed., 1937); Blodeugerdd o'r Ddeunawfed Ganrif, ed. D. G. Jones (4th ed., 1947; 18th c. anth.); The Oxford Book of W. Verse, ed. T. Parry (1962).

ANTHOLOGIES (in translation): H. I. Bell, Poems from the W. (1919); K. H. Jackson, A Celtic Miscellany (1951); D. M. and E. M. Lloyd, A Book of Wales (1953); G. Williams, The Burning Tree (1956) and Presenting W. Poetry (1959).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: S. Lewis, Braslun o Hanes Llenyddiaeth Gymraeg hyd 1535 (1932); H. I. Bell, The Development of W. Poetry (1936); G. Williams, An Introduction to W. Poetry (1953); Parry.

PROSODY: J. Loth, La Métrique galloise (3 v., 1900-1902); Morris-Jones.

D.M.L.

WELSH PROSODY. See CELTIC PROSODY.

WHEEL. See BOB AND WHEEL.

WIT. In Aristotle's Rhetoric, w. is treated as the ability to make apt comparisons, and also (1389^b) as "well-bred insolence." The L. term (ingenium) meant unique personal characteristics, or "genius" in the 18th-c. sense of the term. It was used by the rhetoricians to mean "cleverness" or "ingenuity." During the Renaissance it was used in a sense similar to the classical meaning, with perhaps more emphasis on ingenuity and the ability to create the bizarre, the extraordinary, and the unique. Renaissance discussions of invention (e.g. Leonardi, Dialoghi dell'Inventione) tended to identify w. with the ability to discover and amplify new subjects; while in discussions of style, particularly during the 17th c., it was identified with the ability to discover brilliant, paradoxical, and far-fetched figures, especially metaphor, irony, paradox, pun, antithesis, etc. (e.g., Baltasar Gracián, Agudeza y arte de ingenio, 1642; Emmanuele Tesauro, Il Canonicchio Aristotelico, 1654). Among the many terms used for w. are It. ingegno; Sp. ingenio, argudeza; Fr. esprit, ingénuité; G. Witz, Geist; and Eng. wit. (Cf. J. E. Spingarn, Crit. Essays of the 17th C., 1, xxiv).

The high point in the career of w. came in the latter half of the 17th and the first two decades of the 18th c. in the wake of such "witty" poetic movements as It. marinism, Sp. gongorism, Fr. préciosité, and Eng. metaphysical style (qq.v.). Thomas Hobbes used the term in Human Nature (1650), as follows: "And both Fancie and Judgement are commonly comprehended under the name of Wit, which seemeth to be a Tenuity and Agilitie of Spirits, contrary to the resitnes of the Spirits supposed in thou that are dull." And in Leviathan (1651): "Naturall Wit, consisteth principally in two things; Celerity of Imagining. (that is, swift succession of one thought to another;) and steddy direction to some approved end." Sir William Davenant's Discourse upon Gondibert (1650) associates w. with memory; and Dryden, in the preface to his opera The State of Innocence (1684), says, "The definition of Wit . . . is only this: That it is a Propriety of Thoughts and Words; or in other Terms, Thoughts and Words elegantly adapted to the Subject." In general, authors of the early 17th c. consider w. an essential quality of poetry. Emmanuele Tesauro, for example, believed that the process of divine creation is the defining example of w. and the more w. an author reveals, the more godlike he becomes. Later authors, particularly such rationalists as Hobbes, regarded w. as a psychological faculty.

As the 17th c. progressed, discussions of w. became numerous. Any list would have to include Cowley ("Of Wit," 1656), Dryden (numerous comments throughout the critical works), Flecknoe (Discourse, 1664), Boyle (Reflections, 1665), Sheffield (Essay on Poetry, 1682), Pope (Essay on Criticism, 1711), Addison (numerous Spectators; e.g., 58-61), Richard Blackmore (Essay upon Wit, 1716), Gay (The Present State of Wit, 1711), Corbyn Morris (Essay towards Fixing the True Standards of Wit, 1744), and others. It is impossible to reduce the mass of material on w. to any simple form. W. was sometimes contrasted to fancy or judgment; sometimes identified with one or the other faculty. At times it was contrasted to humor, raillery, satire, and ridicule; at times compared to them. "True w." was often contrasted with "false w." (generally, writing which dazzles without appealing to the understanding). As William Empson has pointed out (see bibliography), Pope uses w. no less than 46 times in the Essay on Criticism, and with at least six different meanings. At times w. suggests concealed style (argudeza); at times it is quickness at invention in the rhetorical sense of that term; at times it is "Nature to advantage dressed;" and at times it is apt expression. As is natural, the vagueness of the term eventually led critics to suspect its validity. Dr. Johnson attacked Cowley in his Lives (1779) for his "heterogeneous ideas . . . yoked by violence together. . . ." Hazlitt ("Wit and Humour," 1819) contrasted w., which is artificial, with imagination, which is valid. On the other hand Schiller's concept of the Spieltrieb (Über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen, 1793) would seem to be a revival of the notion that w. (in the sense here of the play-impulse) is an essential ingredient of poetry.

During the 19th c. imagination was used to designate the capacity to see resemblances, ability to invent, etc.; and w. became associated with levity. Matthew Arnold rejected Chaucer and Pope from his list of the greatest poets because of their wittiness: they lacked "high seriousness." But T. S. Eliot, placing Donne and Marvell high in the hierarchy of Eng. poets, insisted upon the rightness of "a tough reasonableness beneath the slight lyric grace," and he said that these poets were successful by virtue of their "alliance of levity and seriousness (by which the seriousness is intensified)." Most modern critics, from I. A. Richards to Cleanth Brooks, have agreed with him. And modern poets have insisted upon allowing w. a place in their conceptions of the nature of poetry. The meaning of the term, however, seems not to have come quite full circle: it is not commonly associated with imagination or conceptual power; on the other hand, it is associated with irony, and irony is associated with them.

Crit. Essays of the 17th C., ed. J. E. Spingarn, 1 (1908; see intro.); M. A. Grant, The Ancient Rhetorical Theories of the Laughable (1924); T. S. Eliot, "The Metaphysical Poets," and "Andrew Marvell," Selected Essays (1932); W. G. Crane, W. and Rhetoric in the Renaissance (1937); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); W. Empson, "W. in the Essay on Criticism," The Structure of Complex Words (1951); A. Stein, "On Elizabethan W.," Studies in Eng. Lit., 1 (1961); G. Williamson, The Proper W. of Poetry (1961); S. L. Bethell, "The Nature of Metaphysical W.," Discussions of John Donne, ed. F. Kermode (1962). w.v.o'c.

WORD ACCENT. See ACCENT.

WRENCHED ACCENT. See ACCENT.

Y

YIDDISH POETRY. 1. SHIFTING FUNCTION OF POETRY IN THE CULTURE. Modern Yidd. poetry recognizes no circumscription on its scope: it lays claim to every type of subject and technique known in the literatures of Europe and America, and derives an extra measure of cosmopolitanism from the enormous geographic base lent it by a readership distributed over all five continents. But out of its combined prehistory and history of nearly a millennium, only the past two or three generations have witnessed this unrestricted flourishing. In traditional Ashkenazic culture, it was rather study—the continuous interpretation of basic Talmudic law in the light of changing conditions of life—that absorbed the creative passions of the society. Literary expression in the “Western” sense was unimportant, and Jewish poetry (Yidd. as well as Hebrew) of the pre-modern period stands out, for all its diversity, by its generally ancillary character. Then, with the revolutionary upheavals in East European Jewry in the late 19th and 20th c.—urbanization, industrialization, internal migration and emigration, political organization and eventual civic emancipation, attended by widespread secularization and thorough “Europeanization” of Jewish culture—Jewish poetry in both languages was lifted to the very top of the cultural values of the group. It attracted a mass of talent which in previous centuries would have been otherwise engaged, and, in accordance with the increased receptivity of its writers and readers to outside influences, it set out on a forced march to catch up with the common European accomplishments. Yidd. poetry “in one grand leap landed in the general twentieth century” (Hrushovski). Developments came too fast, and in an age too amorphous in its tastes, to allow a normative poetic to form except in its barest outlines; yet a certain all-European poetic standard was automatically taken for granted. The call of I. L. Peretz (d. 1915) “to barter, not to beg . . . [for] the crossing of cultures is the only possibility of human development,” was put into effect. Even in its treatment of specifically Jewish themes in an imagery full of traditional allusions, Yidd. poetry became avowedly and factually part and parcel of modern European-American poetic culture: “. . . Mízhakh-zere máyrevdik tsheshtrómt iz undzer dor. / Shtendik iz er—tsi geyankevt, tsi gelovnt—/ a gemísh fun mórgnland mit land fun ovnt” (Leyeles). (Our generation is Eastern seed aflo the Western way. Always—whether going the ways of Jacob or of Laban—it is a blend of the Orient and the Occident.)

2. PRE-19TH C. VERSE. The beginnings of Yidd. literature have been lost, but early contemporary references to it as well as the developed poetic technique of the recently discovered oldest dated works (A.D. 1382) indicate several centuries of prehistory. Prior to the 19th c., Yidd. literature, the bulk of which is in verse, was written in an idiom based predominantly on Western Yidd. dialects, a standardized language which functioned without interruption until it fell into disuse in Western Europe about 1800 and was superseded by a rapidly evolving new standard on an East European interdialectal base. The influence of medieval German poetic traditions and a stylistic irradiation from the intentionally literal Bible translations caused literary Yidd. to be highly stylized, only an indirect reflection of contemporary colloquial speech. Much of this verse was for oral performance, by professional minstrels or by laymen; even after the introduction of printing, the tune was often specified at the beginning or end of a work. Epic poems, both of the general European repertoire (King Arthur, Gudrun, etc., with specifically Christian references deleted as offensive) and on Old Testament themes (Samuel, the Sacrifice of Isaac, etc.) are available in 14th- and 15th-c. recensions which show relatively strict meters and, generally, “long-line” stanza structure of the xaxa xxbx type. Beginning with two verse novels by Elye Bokher (d. 1549), composed under It. influence, the elaborate ottava rima (abababcc) was established in Yidd. well over a century before it was tried in German poetry. It also seems that Elye Bokher was the first to use accentual iambs in any European poetry.

With the decline of the minstrel tradition, the meters decreased in regularity until the number of syllables per measure of music varied widely, and occasionally grew quite high. This is in evidence not only in the collections of 16th- and 17th-c. popular songs (which reflect a convergence of traditional with current German models), but also in the religious lyrics, in the many verse chronicles and dirges describing historical (usually disastrous) events; and in the satirical or moralizing occasional pieces. Yidd. verse of early modern times thus corresponds in its free-tonic basis to most contemporary German verse. Drawing on the Hebrew liturgical tradition, Yidd. verse sometimes made use of acrostic devices and ornamental extravagances such as making all lines of a longish poem end in the same syllable.

3. THE 19TH C. Through most of the century the folk song flourished and the recitative improvisation, narrative (on biblical subjects) or moralizing (by wedding jesters), remained productive genres. Meanwhile Yidd. literature made a new beginning, centered this time in Eastern Europe and carried by the emigrations toward the end of the century to England, the United States, and the far corners of the earth. The new writers were stimulated mostly by the Haskalah (Enlightenment) movement, which encouraged familiarity with European (especially German and Rus.) literature and made the Jewish writers increasingly self-conscious about the "underdeveloped" state of their languages, Yidd. and Hebrew, for the purposes of high-level social criticism, philosophy of national history, and the spread of secular education. While Hebrew literature toyed with a biblical manner, Yidd. writers explored the culturally specific framework offered by the folk song, which was noticed at last after a "submerged" existence of hundreds of years during which it was neither recorded nor reflected in literature. The Yidd. folk song favored an xaxa stanza and a free-tonic meter (usually 4 stresses per line) in which, compared with German folk song, the use of unstressed syllables to fill the musical measures was increased, probably as a result of the Slavicized prosodic structure of the language. However, more "European" standards of song construction and song phrasing introduced more elaborate rhyme patterns (abab and aabccb became widespread), and strict syllabo-tonic meters became de rigueur in the theatre and quasi-theatre songs. The rising labor movement furnished a new public for poetry to be sung, but also for declamatory verse—an additional factor conducive to the establishment of regular syllabo-tonic meters in the literature.

In the 1890's Yidd. poetry seems to have hit its stride at last. Though it lagged noticeably behind the development of prose—particularly of the shorter forms of prose—it now became the vehicle of truly lyrical expression (S. Frug [d. 1916], I. L. Peretz, M. Rosenfeld [d. 1923]). These authors, who had all complained about the lexical and stylistic "inadequacy" of Yidd., now laid the foundations of its modern poetry by their efforts to master a lyrical viewpoint and by experimenting with a variety of imagery and constructional patterns.

4. THE 20TH C. The existence of a new intelligentsia with secular education, some of it acquired in Yidd. language schools up to the college level, cast Yidd. poetry in this period of its culmination into the mainstream of the problems of contemporary world trends. Yidd. literature now showed itself more sensitive than ever to developments in other literatures with which it was in contact through multilingual reading and diversified and intensified translation. There were the interest and the formal means to attempt modernism along Am., German, and Rus. lines. At the same time, in the poetic culture of growing firmness there appeared genuine internal responses to innovations. The Yunge (Young Ones) in America (Mani Leib [d. 1953], Z. Landau [d. 1937], and others) early in the century reacted to the political tendentiousness and rhetoric of the labor poets by trying to write poetry that would be "more poetic" in diction and subject matter, more individual in its sentiments. They in turn called forth the protest of Inzikh (Introspectivists), a group (A. Leyeles [b. 1889], J. Glatstein [b. 1896], N. B. Minkoff [d. 1958], et al.) which, inspired by Yehoyosh [d. 1927], denied in principle the distinction between the intellectual and the emotional and opened the door of its poetry wide to all themes, all words, all rhythms no matter how free or how regular, as long as they embodied the personal experience of the poet.

As the cumulative effect of a growing corpus of poetic writing made itself felt, requirements of originality pushed Yidd. poets into new paths. Assonance as a rhyme substitute was explored (e.g. by P. Markish [d. about 1950] and other Soviet poets). Sonnet sequences and works in the most difficult "romance forms" were successfully created (L. Naydus [d. 1918] and others). Syntactic parallelism, etymological figures, and consonance were mobilized to recreate biblical effects in a new Jewish medium. Epic poems, verse novels, and poetic plays (especially by H. Leivick [d. 1962]) were produced and acclaimed. Interest in Old Yidd. poetry was awakened and several writers attempted new works in 16th-c. language. The poems of S. Etinger, a forgotten modernist who died in 1856, were published posthumously. The folk song reappeared, but this time in subtly stylized forms (e.g. by M. L. Halpern [d. 1932], I. Manger [b. 1901]). Regional constellations like Yung-Vilne set themselves specialized tasks against a common literary background. The sweet awareness of a poetic tradition being formed was reflected in poetic allusions to well-known poems. A standardized literary language came into use in which dialectal rhymes and expressions grew ever rarer.

In this period, the "discovery of the mother tongue," now emancipated in its functions, was completed. Poets by the scores, following the major prose writers of the late 19th c., learned to use the language to the full extent of its inherent possibilities. Yidd. prosodic structure, Germanic but remodeled presumably along Slavic lines, was employed to create easy triple and even paeonic meters. The syntax of conversational folk Yidd. was channeled into poetry (notably by E. Shteynberg [d. 1932]), and by its idiomatic character refreshed the more conventional styles. The pernicious etymologizing approach of the past was dead: words were used according to their precise Yidd. phonology and semantics, without reference to—and sometimes in defiance of—their form and meaning in the stock languages. Sound frequencies typical of a particular component of Yidd. were forged into a new poetic device, making it possible, for instance, to suggest “Slavicness,” and hence village earthiness, by an accumulation of ž- and č sounds (thus M. Kulbak [d. about 1940]). The common European intellectual and technical vocabulary was absorbed into Yidd. At the same time, the idiom of traditional Jewish study was annexed to the modern literary language; it found employment not only when it was required by the subject (e.g. in the poetry of a M. Boraishe [d. 1949], A. Zeitlin [b. 1889] or Kh. Grade [b. 1910]), but also in thematically unspecialized writing, where it functions simply as a flexible abstract vocabulary. Above all, the many derivational patterns of Yidd. grammar were exploited for the self-enrichment of the language. New coinages abound in the works of most poets, and some, like umkum (violent death) or vogl (restless wandering), have become common elements of the language. J. Glatstein and A. Sutskever [b. 1913] have achieved particular virtuosity in novel derivation.

With the genocide of six million Jews by Germany and her collaborators, Jewish cultural life in most of Eastern Europe was destroyed; it received another deadly blow through the total ban on Yidd. culture and the physical destruction of Yidd. writers in the USSR after 1949. The catastrophe of the war years naturally became the central theme of Yidd. literature not only in the Nazi-made ghettos themselves, but everywhere else. After 1948, the rebirth of a Jewish state opened new subjects, descriptive, psychological, and ethical, to Yidd. poetry in Israel as well as in other countries. The technical brilliance of Yidd. poetry has never been greater than in the postwar period. In its rhythmic features, however, postwar writing seems to have retreated from the experimentation of the previous period. As Leyeles put it: “Ven keyn grenets iz nishtró far di yesurem, / Veytik oys a syog fun shtreng getsoymtn furem” (When there are no bounds to suffering, create, through pain, a ritual fence [i.e. a preventive measure] of rigorously restrained patterning).

ANTHOLOGIES: Antologye: finf hundert yor yidishe poezye, ed. M. Bassin (2 v., 1917); Naje jidiše dichtung, ed. Ch. Gininger et al. (Cernauti, 1934; in L. transcription); Modern Yidd. Poetry, ed. S. J. Imber (1927; Eng. prose versions); The Golden Peacock, ed. J. Leftwich (1939, 2d ed., 1961; Eng. verse tr.); Naye yidishe dikhtung, ed. Y. Paner and E. Frenkl (Bucharest, 1946); Dos lid iz geblibn, ed. B. Heller (Warsaw, 1951); Mivhar Shirei Yidd., tr. into Hebrew by M. Basuk (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: L. Wiener, A Hist. of Yidd. Lit. in the 19th C. (1899); I. Goldberg, [Notes on the Poetic Style of the Yidd. Folk Song], Tsaytskrift far yidisher geschikhte . . ., I (Minsk, 1926); M. Weinreich, Bilder fun der yidisher literatur-geshikhte (Vilna, 1928); D. Hofshsteyn and F. Shames, Literatur-kentenish (poetik) (2 v., Moscow, 1927, 1928); M. Erik, Di geshikhte fun der yidisher lit. . . (Warsaw, 1928); Z. Reyzen, Leksikon fun der yidisher lit. . . (4 v., Vilna, 1928ff.); Y. Tsinberg, Di geshikhte fun der lit. bay yidn, VI (Vilna, 1935); N. B. Minkoff, Yidishe klasiker poeten (2d ed., 1939); A. A. Roback, The Story of Yidd. Lit. (1940) and Contemporary Yidd. Lit. (1957); Y. Mark, “Yidd. Lit.,” Encyclopedia of Lit., ed. J. T. Shipley, II (1946) and “Yidd. Lit.,” The Jews, ed. L. Finkelstein, II (1949); N. B. Minkoff and J. A. Joffe, “Old-Yidd. Lit.,” The Jewish People Past and Present, III (1952); S. Niger, “Yidd. Lit. of the Past 200 Years,” ibid.; B. Hrushovski, “On Free Rhythms in Modern Yidd. Poetry,” The Field of Yidd.: Studies in Yidd. Language, Folklore, and Lit., ed. U. Weinreich (1954); Leksikon fun der nayer yidisher literatur (1956ff.); N. B. Minkoff, Pyonern fun yidisher poezye in Amerike (3 v., 1956); U. Weinreich “On the Cultural Hist. of Yidd. Rime,” in Essays on Jewish Life and Thought, ed. J. L. Blau (1959); B. Hrushovski, “The Creation of Accentual Iambs . . .,” For Max Weinreich on his 70th Birthday: Studies in Jewish Languages, Lit., and Society (1964); S. Liptzin, The Flowering of Yidd. Lit. (1964).

UR.W.

YOUNG VIENNA. A group of poets and writers in Vienna around 1900. United in their rejection of the naturalism of Northern Germany, they tended toward impressionism and symbolism in their works, with some of them writing decadent poetry. Within German letters these authors express best the European fin de siècle atmosphere. They excel in the sensitive recording of delicate emotional changes. The group found an enthusiastic advocate of new literary movements in Hermann Bahr, who is best known for his critical essays and light comedies. Arthur Schnitzler, the author of subtle sketches of the Viennese society, and particularly Hugo von Hofmannsthal, whose versatile genius was to surpass all other members of the group, form the center of Young Vienna. The group met at cafés, as did so many intellectual circles in Vienna. Other writers associated with Young Vienna were Peter Altenberg, Richard Beer-Hofmann, and Felix Salten.—Deutsch-Österreichische Literaturgesch., ed. J. W. Nagl, J. Zeidler, and E. Castle, iv (1937), 1649–1930. C.E.S.

YUGOSLAV POETRY. The natural aptitude of the Yugoslav peoples for poetic invention throughout their history is demonstrated by the wealth and beauty of their traditional folk poetry. This poetry is of two kinds, "heroic" or epic, and lyric. The lyric poems, with lines of varying lengths and meters, express every emotion and every aspect of the life of the people. There are ritual and ceremonial songs, dirges, love songs, and songs sung at work or to accompany dancing or various celebrations and customs. The majority of the epic (heroic) songs relate events from the country's past. Mythological or semi-legendary themes occur in those of earlier origin: the more recent the ballad the more authentic its subject. The ballads with historical subjects deal for the most part with the struggles against the Turks. The cycle describing incidents connected with the disastrous battle of Kosovo in 1389 has the greatest aesthetic value and is the most moving. A regular example of the line of the majority of the epic ballads is decasyllabic, with a caesura after the fourth syllable, and a clearly expressed tendency to trochaic distribution of stresses and with a quantitative close: ~-~-. (When stressed, the ninth syllable is usually long, and the eighth and seventh are short.) The basis of this meter is thus both stress and quantity, and is a matter for detailed study. There is little or no rhyme. The line of a small minority of epic ballads consists of 15, 16, or even more syllables, with varying meters.

As regards written verse, the earliest consisted principally of 13th- and 14th-c. translations of hymns and other poems of an ecclesiastical nature. The liturgical verse of the Orthodox Church, influenced by Byzantium, was mostly translated from Gr., and was written in Serbian recensions of Old Church Slavonic in the Cyrillic alphabet. That of the Roman Catholic church, in the Glagolitic alphabet, was similar in character, but Catholic religious verse, not purely liturgical, was also written in the vernacular. The earliest extant records of this poetry date from the 15th c.

When the cultural development of the peoples of the interior was suppressed under foreign domination, conditions were favorable for the cultivation of literature only in the free republic of Dubrovnik (Ragusa) and elsewhere in Dalmatia. Here poetry began to flourish in the 15th c. under the influence of the It. Renaissance. The Petrarchan lyric was imitated in Dubrovnik first by the "troubadour" poets Šiško Menčetić (1457–1527) and Džore Držić (1451–1501), of whom the latter was less imitative and more sincere. These poets favored a slightly modified form of the strambotto (q.v.) as well as the Petrarchan sonnet. The conceits employed by the It. lyricists were introduced with ingenuity into this poetry, which yet retained some indigenous elements and certain reminiscences of folk ballads. Love is the predominant motive, but other themes such as patriotism and religion occur. The meter is usually a dodecasyllabic line with internal rhyme, but an octosyllabic line was also employed by certain of the innumerable subsequent poets and versifiers who kept alive the poetic tradition thus established. Songs of a similar character, sung by shepherds, were introduced into the "pastoral novel" Planine (The Mountains) by Petar Zoranić (b. 1508?) of Zadar. Another aspect of It. influence is seen in imitations of Florentine carnival poetry. Of these, Jedjupka (The Gypsy) by Mikša Pelegrinović (d. 1563) of Hvar, has the greatest charm and originality. (This work was until recently attributed to Andrija Cubranović, of Dubrovnik, who is now proved only to have altered it slightly and contributed its final section.) The earliest epic was Judita (1501) by Marko Marulić of Split. Using the dodecasyllabic line, and in verse in which fashionable adornments are not absent, he relates the biblical story of Judith, suggesting an analogy between its background and his own country's perils. Other notable poetic works of the 16th c., in the same meter, are Robinja (The Slave-girl) by Hanibal Lucić, (1485–1553) of Hvar, the earliest secular dramatic work in Croatian literature, though a narrative poem in dialogue form rather than a drama; and Ribanje i ribarsko prigovaranje (Fishing and Fishermen's Talk) by Petar Hektorović, (1487–1572) also of Hvar. Although this poem, describing a fishing expedition, is to some extent reminiscent of It. piscatorial eclogues, it is one of the most original and realistic works of the period. Folk epic songs sung by fishermen in the poem represent the earliest written record of Yugoslav traditional poetry. The lyrical, contemplative, and epic poetry of Mavro Vetranović (1482–1576), often with a moralizing purpose, was relatively free from foreign influences but generally of little aesthetic value. New metrical forms, imitated or adapted from It. lyrics, were introduced to Ragusan poetry by Dinko Ranjina (1536–1607) and Dinko Zlatarić (1558–1609), whose work as translators of Gr. and L. verse also reflects the revival of interest in classical literature in Italy.

With the works of Ivan Gundulić (1588-1638) Ragusan literature is generally considered to have reached its "Golden Age." The influence of the Renaissance had given way to that of the Counter-Reformation; national consciousness, a moral purpose, religious feeling, and philosophical meditations—elements to be found among the works of most of his predecessors—are supreme in those of Gundulić. His Suze sina razmetnoga (The Tears of the Prodigal Son), in 3 cantos, is a confession of sin and a meditation on the transitoriness of earthly things. In his greatest work, the epic Osman, a poem inspired by his faith in the Slavs and Christianity, Gundulić weaves a complex pattern of incidents around his central theme—an event in the contemporary war between Poles and Turks. The epic is akin to those of Tasso and Ariosto, with marinistic traits of style. It is composed in stanzas of 4 octosyllabic lines rhyming abab.

The Ragusan love lyric continued to flourish, in the verse—with characteristics of marinism—of Stijepo Djurdjević (1579-1632), best known for his satirical Derviš, describing the emotions of an elderly dervish in love; and in the exquisite, concise, and erotic poems of Ivan Bunić (1594-1658). Both Bunić and the last great Ragusan lyricist, Ignjat Djurdjević (1675-1737), in whose work the baroque influence predominates, also treated the subject of the repentant Mary Magdalene in longer works inspired by Gundulić.

As literature slowly revived elsewhere in the Yugoslav lands, verse was at first put to practical uses. Employing the convenient decasyllabic line of the epic folk ballads A. Kačić-Miošić (1704-60), of central Dalmatia, wrote a chronicle of the South Slavs, and M. Reljković (1732-98), a Slavonian, composed his admonitory poem Satir (The Satyr). The Serb Jovan Rajić (1726-1801) composed, among other works, an allegorical-historical epic Boj zmaja s orlovi (The Battle of the Dragon with the Eagles) in the artificial rusko-slovenski language cultivated by Serbian writers of his period. The didactic element, characteristic of the literature of this time, is present in the pseudo-classical lyric poetry of the Serb Lukijan Mušicki (1777-1837). Meanwhile the foundations of Slovene poetry were laid by Valentin Vodnik (1758-1819), the first Slovene poet to write in the vernacular.

With the romantic movement came the revival of poetic composition as an art and the inspiration derived from the indigenous folk poetry, vast collections of which were made in the first half of the 19th c. by Vuk Karadžić (1787-1864), to whom future Serbian and Croatian writers were also indebted for his linguistic reforms. The folk poetry element is a characteristic of the work of S. Milutinović (1791-1847), whose epic and lyric poetry, glorifying the Serbs, is a confusion of realism and fantasy. It is also a characteristic of the work of the great Serbian poet, Petar Petrović Njegoš (1813-1851), Prince-Bishop of Montenegro. Njegoš's lyric and epic poetry, composed in intellectual isolation, expresses his intense patriotic emotion and his groping for a solution to the philosophical problems which tormented him. His Luča mikrokozma (The Torch of the Microcosm) treats a subject similar to that of Milton's Paradise Lost; his greatest work, Gorski vijenac (The Mountain Wreath), is an epic in dramatic form, and a synthesis of aspects of Montenegrin life. The epic Smrt Smail-Age Čengića, by the Croat Ivan Mažuranić (1814-90), also in the style of the epic songs, graphically and powerfully depicts the sufferings of Montenegrins under Turkish oppression. The sonnet was introduced to the Croatian literature of the period by Stanko Vraz (1810-51), who wrote also in the style of the folk ballads. Both he and Petar Preradović (1818-72) composed moving love lyrics at a time when poetic output in Croatia consisted mainly of patriotic verse.

The work of Slovenia's greatest poet, France Prešeren (1800-49) showed for the first time the potentialities of Slovene as a literary language. His sonnets, sincere expressions of emotion, are examples of perfect harmony of form and theme.

New inspiration was brought to Serbian poetry by the fresh, spontaneous lyrics of Branko Radičević (1824-53). The meter is again often that of the folk ballads, but the themes are very diverse. Lyric poetry became the principal literary product of young Serbian writers after the middle of the century: J. Jovanović Zmaj (1833-1904) wrote simple and moving subjective lyrics, and later poured out verses commenting on contemporary events; Djura Jakšić (1833-78) composed patriotic verse whose stridency contrasts with the tone of his melancholy emotional poems, e.g. his poignant Na Liparu (In the Lime-grove). The last of the great Serbian romantic poets was Laza Kostić (1841-1910), a translator of Shakespeare and composer of "Shakespearean" dramas in verse, and of lyric poetry.

The cultivation of lyric poetry, in various forms, continued in Slovenia. That of Fran Levstik (1831-87) is sincere and expressive; Josip Stritar (1836-1923) skillfully experimented with various meters and poetic forms. This concern with form is seen also in the lyrics of Simon Gregorčič (1844-1906), expressing his love of nature and his longing to promote kindness and tolerance. The influence of folk poetry is evident in the lyrics of Simon Jenko (1835-69), a poet of patriotism, nature, and love; and the historical ballads which Anton Aškerc (1856-1912), nationalist and social critic, made the vehicle for the expression of his principles were sometimes composed in the decasyllabic line; but no one meter can from this period onward be considered as characteristic of Yugoslav verse.

In Croatia the symbolist Silville Strahimir Kranjčević (1865-1908) wrote with great violence or pathos, his work reflecting his nationalistic, socialistic and anticlerical views, and his pessimism and bitterness. Meanwhile the Croatian critic A. G. Matoš (1873-1914), himself a poet, demanded complete freedom of expression in poetry, which should be untrammelled by any tendentious elements, and in which aesthetic value should be of supreme importance. To his teaching were added lessons in form and technique derived from the Parnassiens. Prominent among Matoš' contemporaries, the Croatian "modernists," were the poets Dragutin Domjanić (1875-1933), Vladimir Vidrić (1875-1909), and Milan Begović (1876-1948). Ljubo Wiesner (1805-1951) and Nikola Polić (1890-1960) were among those who continued the tradition of the subjective, aesthetic lyric, and an outstanding Croatian lyricist, Tin Ujević (1891-1955), with verse of great diversity of subject, emotion, expression, and form, may be counted as a disciple of Matoš. The eminent Croat Vladimir Nazor (1876-1949), optimistic and exuberant, expressed an intense love of all forms of life and nature in lyric verse or in epics with legendary or historical themes.

In Serbia Vojislav Ilić (1862-94), a pure lyricist of fertile inspiration, provided examples of poetic technique for future poets. The works of a trio of lyric poets, Aleksa Šantić (1868-1924), a writer of patriotic and emotional verse; Jovan Dučić (1871-1943), whose lyrics, exquisite in phrasing and form, show the influence of the Parnassiens, and Milan Rakić (1876-1938), equally a perfectionist but a poet of profounder ideas and emotions, represent some of the best and purest in Serbian poetry of the next decades. Meanwhile there appeared a great Serbian lyricist of another school, Vladislav Petković-Dis (1880-1917), a poet of dreams and despair, to whom the sincere expression of emotions was of more importance than a studied perfection of form. Characteristics of the "decadent" movement in Serbian poetry before the First World War are found also in the melancholy verse of the symbolist Sima Pandurović (1883-1960); Veljko Petrović (b. 1884)—now better known as a prose writer—wrote verse in which sympathy for the victims of social injustices is given expression, as well as vigorous patriotic verse, contrasting with the poetry of the majority of his contemporaries. Pessimism is again characteristic of the lyrics of the Serbs Velimir Živojinović-Massuka (b. 1886) and Dušan Vasiljević (1900-1924), the former a poet of melancholy, the latter of revolt. One of the most prominent 20th-c. Serbian poets, Miloš Crnjanski (b. 1893), now living in London, expresses his emotions and disillusionment in verses of great originality of both form and theme. The poetry of Rade Drainac (1899-1943) and of the poetess Desanka Maksimović (b. 1898) is also intimate, subjective, and emotional; but while that of the former may be bitter in tone, that of the latter is sensitive and delicate, and notable for its beauty and purity of expression. Branko Ćopić (b. 1915), both poet and prose writer, has described in realistic verse the exploits and sufferings of the Partisans during the Second World War. The works of two other of the more prominent of the younger generation of Serbian poets, Vasko Popa (b. 1922) and Stevan Raičković (b. 1928) present a striking contrast; Popa's verse, which includes patriotic poetry, is experimental and original; Raičković adheres to a more conventional poetic tradition.

Miroslav Krleža (b. 1893), the dominant figure in contemporary Croatian literature, has composed ballads and lyrics, many of which are indictments of social injustices, and are for the most part, like his prose works, vigorous and intense. The Croat Ivan Goran Kovačić (1913-43) will be remembered chiefly as a poet of the Second World War, with his impressive cycle Jama (The Pit). Gustav Krklec (b. 1899), Dobriša Cesarić (b. 1902), Nikola Šop (b. 1904), Dragutin Tadijanović (b. 1905), and—of the younger generation—Jure Kaštelan (b. 1919) and the poetess Vesna Parun (b. 1922) are prominent among those who contribute to the wealth of 20th-c. Croatian lyric poetry, remarkable for its variety, spontaneity and originality, and the directness of its appeal to the senses and intellect. The work of Krklec has been described as a "lyrical monologue," reflecting as it does the varying emotions of the poet's life; Cesarić, perhaps the greatest of contemporary Croatian poets, without striving after unconventional forms of expression has enriched Croatian poetry with works of great aesthetic value; Šop, earlier best known for his sensitive lyrics with a religious tendency, has now turned his attention to longer philosophical works inspired by poetic visions of space; the spontaneous and sincere lyrics of Tadijanović express his dreams and emotions, his love of nature and his nostalgia for the simple life in verse which, while unpretentious, is of great beauty. The works of Kaštelan—whose style has been compared with that of Walt Whitman—and of

Vesna Parun, while still subjective, are concerned with more general human problems.

Oton Župančič (1878–1949), the greatest Slovene poet of the 20th c., turned from the early influence of the symbolists to the composition of lyrics which are striking in their individuality, beauty, and variety in form and phrasing and in their originality in the expression of emotions and ideas. His influence is seen in the work of Alojz Gradnik (b. 1882). Between the wars criticism of the social system was the concern not only of Slovene prose writers but of poets; outstanding among the latter were Anton Podbešek (1898) and Mile Klopčič (b. 1905). Župančič, and the poet and dramatist Matej Bor (b. 1913) composed verse inspired by events of the Second World War. Other prominent Slovene poets of the present century are Srečko Kosovel (1904–26), Edvard Kocbek (b. 1904), and Miran Jarc (1900–1942), one of the foremost exponents of expressionism.

Lastly, mention must be made of the youngest branch of Yugoslav poetry, that of the Macedonian Slavs, which has only developed in the 20th c. and is the most fruitful branch of their literature. The revolutionary works of Kosta Racin (1909–43) between the wars were of significance on account not only of their tendentious nature but of their contribution to the cultivation of the Macedonian literary language. Among the most notable of those Macedonian poets whose work has come into prominence in the last decades are Venko Markovski (b. 1915), Slavko Janevski (b. 1920), and Blaže Koneski (b. 1921) with verse of a predominantly nationalistic character.

ANTHOLOGIES: Heroic Ballads of Serbia, tr. G. R. Noyes and L. R. Bacon (1913); Serbian Songs and Poems, tr. J. W. Wiles (1917); Kosovo: Heroic Songs of the Serbs, tr. H. Rootham (1920); Sto let slovenske lirike od Vodnika do Moderne, ed. C. Golar (1920); Ballads of Marko Kraljević, tr. D. H. Low (1922); Antologija novije hrvatske lirike, ed. M. Kombol (1934); Anthologie de la poésie Yougoslave des XIX^e et XX^e s., tr. and ed. M. and S. Ibrovac (1935); The Revolt of the Serbs against the Turks, 1804–1813, tr. W. A. Morison (1942); tr. from national ballads of the period; Antologija na makedonskata lirika (1951); Srpske narodne pjesme, collected Vuk Karadžić, I–IV (1953–58); Antologija novije srpske lirike, ed. B. Popović (9th ed., 1953); The Parnassus of a Small Nation, an Anthol. of Slovene Lyrics, tr. and ed. W. K. Matthews and A. Slodnjak (1957); Antologija dubrovačke lirike, ed. D. Pavlović (1960); An Anthol. of Modern Yugoslav Poetry, ed. J. Lavrin (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: J. Torbarina, It. Influence on the Poets of the Ragusan Republic (1931); D. Subotić, Yugoslav Popular Ballads (1932); L. Salvini, Poeti sloveni moderni (1951); A. Cronia, Storia della letteratura serbo-croata (1956); A. Slodnjak, Geschichte der slowenischen Lit. (1958); K. Taranovski, "The Prosodic Structure of Serbo-Croat Verse," Oxford Slavonic Papers, 9 (1960); A. Kadić, Contemporary Croatian Lit. (1960); R. Jakobson, "The Slavic Response to Byzantine Poetry," Congrès International des Études Byzantines, 12th, Ohrid, 1961. Rapport 18 (1961). v.j.

Z

ZÉJEL. A Sp. poem consisting of an introductory strophe containing the theme to be developed in the poem and followed by strophes each patterned as follows: a monorhymed tercet, called the mudanza, followed by the vuelta (repetition) of one line or more rhyming with the introductory stanza. The simplest form of this strophe is the 4-verse rhyming aaab, cccb, and so on, the b rhyme remaining constant throughout the poem. Multiple variations of this basic form are found. The octosyllable is a frequent verse measure, though other verse lengths are also used. The z is believed to be a song form of Arabic origin. It was popular in Spain in the late medieval period.—P. Le Gentil, "A propos de la 'strophe zéjelesque,'" RLR, 70 (1949) and Le virelai et le villancico. Le problème des origines arabes (1954); Navarro. D.C.C.

ZEUGMA (Gr. "means of binding"; cf. Gr. zeugos, "yoke"). According to a Gr. rhetorician of the 2d c. A.D., Alexander Numenius, and two of his Gr. successors of undetermined date, the use of a single verb with a compound object (C. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 v., 1832–36, v. 8, pp. 474, 686, 709), the construction called synezeugmenon by Quintilian, 1st c. A.D. (Institutes of Oratory 9.3.62), in whose examples the subject or object or both may be compound. Later rhetoricians very properly extended the definition to the "yoking" together of any two parts of speech by means of any other, normally with no breach of syntax, though some make for confusion by including cases in which the "yoking" word agrees syntactically with only one of the "yoked," thus making z. partly synonymous with sylllepsis 1., q.v. (e.g., John Smith, The Mysterie of Rhetorique Unveiled, 1657, pp. 179-81); and others, past and present, make for worse confusion by assigning to z. the meaning of sylllepsis 2.

Three varieties of z. have been distinguished, as by Johannes Susenbrotus (Epitome troporum ac schematum, 1541, ed. 1621, p. 25), according to whether the "yoking" word precedes the words it "yokes," i.e., prozeugma ("All fools have still an itching to deride, / And fain would be upon the laughing side," Pope, An Essay on Criticism 32-33); or follows them, i.e., hypozeugma ("Not marble, nor the gilded monuments / Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rime," Shakespeare, Sonnet 55); or stands between them, i.e., mesozeugma ("Much he the place admired, the person more," Milton, Paradise Lost 9.444).—Lausberg.

H.B.

SUPPLEMENT

AFRICAN POETRY, VERNACULAR: ORAL. Vernacular poetry in Africa is mostly oral, and the greater part is still unrecorded. The conventions of oral v.p. belong to the whole performance and its occasion, and are therefore not exclusively literary. Internal classifications within the society have no reference to the Western categories of prose and poetry, and Afr. definitions of "literary" do not necessarily coincide with those of Eng.-Am. culture. For instance, Afr. proverbs and riddles are major, not minor, literary forms for which the term "poetry," if it is applied, need not relate only to the forms with rhyme. The evaluation even of these identifiable genres can be made only by a complete understanding of the significance of any given member (e.g., a particular praise song) of a genre (e.g., praise poetry) within the society at the time of utterance. Convention involves not only the verbal content, but also such factors as status of the performer(s), nature of the audience, mode of performance, and character of the related arts, especially music, which act interdependently in the representation of the genre. Literary distinctions may be irrelevant in a performance which has no overt literary function. Babalola's work on Yoruba poetry, for instance, shows that the mode of performance is as significant for the Afr. critic as actual content or structure, and many other cases could be cited in support of this.

There are growing signs of a fuller appreciation of the extent and nature of Afr. v.p., but even now it is only beginning to be established as a serious field of systematic study for Afr. scholars. Where the poetic tradition is strong, oral v.p. is adapted to changing conditions, as in topical and political songs and modern praise poems. Generally speaking, however, the extensive corpus of Afr. oral v.p. which forms the basis for description and discussion today belongs to, or is derived from, traditional Afr. society. The relevant language preserves its soul, and in translation the soul is lost. The survival of Afr. v.p. in the future is dependent, among other things, upon the status of the vernacular in particular communities as the medium for both oral and written forms. At the present time evaluation of recorded texts from oral performance is heavily dependent upon nonliterary factors, but it is recognized that Afr. v.p. has its own artistic features analogous to, but not always identical with, literary forms from a literate society.

Although the question of genres has not been seriously discussed, Finnegan has drawn attention to the multiplicity of local classifications. A basic distinction must be made between ritual and nonritual forms; by far the most important are the ritual forms associated, either in origin or in present reality, with formal customary rites and activities. Modern public occasions may include traditional ritual forms suitably adapted. Nonritual forms, of course, belong to informal occasions. In either general category the creative role of the performer(s) is important, for even within customary rites the evaluation is of the contemporary performance. Ritual forms include panegyric and lyric, whereas nonritual forms include lyric and, possibly, narrative.

Panegyric is one of the most developed and elaborate poetic genres in Africa. Its specialized form is best exemplified in the court poetry of the Southern Bantu, about which there is a large literature by scholars in South Africa. These praise poems have been described as intermediary between epic and ode, a combination of exclamatory narration and laudatory apostrophizing. Similar poems occur elsewhere among the Bantu, notably among the cattle-owning peoples of East Central Africa. While praise poems can be concerned with almost anything—animals, divining bones, birds, beer, clans—the most developed forms are those in which people, living or dead, are directly praised and addressed. Praise poetry often plays an essential part in rites of passage when an individual or group moves from one status to another in society. Self-praises by boys at initiation, as among the Sotho or the Galla, are an important aspect of their claim to adulthood.

The eulogies involved in funeral dirges, as among the Akan-speaking peoples of southern Ghana, are also included in this category, as are oral poems in praise of the Prophet Mohammed by the Hausa and other Islamic societies. Finnegan has noted that one cannot always draw the line between Afr. military poetry and panegyric. Southern Bantu praise poems have war and military prowess as one of their main themes, and the same blend of praise and interest in battle heroism can be seen in the "heroic recitations" of the Ankole Hima. In Rwanda military poetry, the form called ibyvugo is panegyric, but the narrative element is more marked in a second form, called ibitekerezo, songs preserved by the court bards and taught to military recruits. Narrative poetry as a ritual form is not extensive enough, however, to be assigned a special category. In hunting songs praise and celebration are often reserved for the killing of particularly outstanding or dangerous game. A dominant theme in the Yoruba hunting poems called ijala is verbal salute and praise, but Ambo hunting poetry is lyrical poetry characterized by the mode of delivery. It is not always possible to make a firm distinction between ritual and nonritual forms. There are derived forms, like the nonritual praise songs of the Hausa itinerant singers, which are relatable to the ritual kirāri, a sung proverb, traditionally performed as court poetry.

Lyric, probably the most common genre of oral poetry in Africa, has a great variety of forms, but basically it is a short poem sung or recited either antiphonally or by an individual. As a ritual form, lyric has as its most common occasions rites of passage such as birth, child-naming, initiation, betrothal, marriage, acquiring a new title or status, and funeral ceremonies. The occasions for lyric are extended in urbanized Afr. society to informal, non-ritual occasions, like the drinking and dancing town songs of the Zulu and the Sotho in South Africa. The radio provides opportunities for nonritual lyrics to be performed. It is a common pattern for a prose narrative to be marked structurally from time to time by the inclusion of a song, led by the storyteller and sung by the audience. The song is relevant to the story, but may or may not forward the narrative. The subjects of lyric are about every conceivable topic in the Afr. experience. Songs about, or attributed to, birds are very common, but the main interest is human life and conduct. Love poetry has a rich tradition among certain peoples, and is often by women, as among the Zulu of South Africa and the Luo of Kenya. Songs to accompany rhythmic work seem to occur in all Afr. societies.

Narrative in oral v.p., in the sense of a relatively long narrative poem, is of infrequent occurrence. Finnegan considers that although many of the lengthy praise poems, particularly those of South Africa, do contain some narrative elements, narrative poetry does not seem to be a typically Afr. form. The most frequent mentions come from the equatorial areas of the Congo, but even there the traditional pattern, as exemplified in the Lianja and Mwindo epics, is of a prose narrative incorporating most of the local literary forms in both poetry and prose. The narrative poetry in these long epics is important enough, however, to be considered in its own right. The mvvet poetry of Gabon, Spanish Guinea, and the Southern Cameroons (particularly the Fang people) also includes narrative poetry sung to the accompaniment of the mvvet, a type of lyre. It is possible that other narrative poems, non-ritual in character, remain to be found, but at the present time the evidence is insufficient to establish the existence of narrative as a separate genre of Afr. oral v.p.

The Oxford Library of Afr. Literature, Oxford at the Clarendon Press, presents studies of particular Afr. traditions of oral v.p., notably in works by B. W. Andrzejewski and I. M. Lewis (Somali), S. A. Babalola (Yoruba), T. Cope (Zulu), A. Coupez and T. Kamanzi (Ruanda), D. Kunene (Southern Sotho), H. F. Morris (Ankole), and I. Schapera (Tswana).—W. R. Bascom, "Folklore and Lit." in The Afr. World: A Survey of Social Research, ed. R. A. Lystad (1965); The Mwindo Epic from the Banyanga, tr. and ed. D. Biebuyck and K. C. Mateene (1967); R. Finnegan, Oral Lit. in Africa (1970). L.H.

WRITTEN. Except for the v.p. derived directly from oral poetry and written in roman script, like the v.p. of South Africa and Ethiopia, Afr. written v.p. as a direct literary activity is a feature of Islamic societies. Arabic speakers, mostly in North Africa, outnumber the speakers of any other single vernacular on the African continent. Besides written v.p. in Arabic there is the Islamic written v.p. of non-Arabic speaking peoples, particularly the Fulani, the Hausa, and the Swahili. North Afr. written v.p. in Arabic was no doubt a vehicle for the spread of Islamic poetry in West Afr. vernaculars, while in East Africa Swahili written v.p. derives from the popular Islamic poetry of the Haḍramawt and the Persian Gulf. Some of the same popularizations are found wherever the v.p. is Islamic, as, for instance, vernacular adaptations of early Arabic maḡāzī (raids) literature occurring in North Africa (Arabic) and in East Africa (Swahili), as well as mūlū-diya, poems composed in honor of the Prophet's birth, occurring in North Africa (Arabic and Berber) and in West and East Africa (Hausa and Swahili, respectively).

In Arabic written v.p. of North Africa the term qaṣīda (q.v.) has a much wider range of application than the classical form, with replacement of classical monorhyme by a stanzaic structure and multiple rhyme scheme. The two most conspicuous features are profusion of rhyme and absence of inflection. The emphasis on rhyme in non-Arabic written v.p. is derivative from Arabic poetry. Stock themes, such as the cynegetic (tarādiya), the gnomic or didactic (ḥikam, waṣāyā), the bacchic (khama-riya), and the nostalgic (wataniya) are found in shorter v. poems. The waṭaniya, originally an expression of nostalgia for one's place of birth, has developed into patriotic poetry in Algeria and Tunisia. More subtle than the waṭaniya is the satire (ḥenk), probably derived from the lampoons of Sidi Ahmed bin Yusuf (d. 1525) and Sidi Mejdub (d. 1569). North Afr. v.p., both written and oral, is a vast field still largely uninvestigated.

In sub-Saharan Africa the best-known Islamic written v.p. is in Swahili, Hausa, and Fula. It is found in other languages, such as Wolof, Songhai, and Manding, but comparatively few texts have been published in these languages. This is the poetry of the Islamic elite, based on Arabian models, and passed on to the majority by oral transmission. (See SWAHILI POETRY and HAUSA POETRY). The script is 'ajami, modified Arabic script adapted for the relevant language. Today roman is more generally used, particularly in derivative poetry of a more secular nature in the popular press. The authors, when they are known, are not usually well-versed in Islamic classical poetry, and may not even be able to write Arabic. They are familiar with, and are called upon to copy, earlier translations of such Arabic models as al-Būṣīrī's Burdah or al-Fazzazī's Ishrīniya. Even in the more secular derived poetry the poets maintain the same conservative attitudes whereby their work is justified only if it serves to edify the faithful, but there is more freedom for the poet to choose personal themes.

As a consequence of Western education, oral poetry has been written down in various Afr. languages (e.g., in Yoruba, in the Akan languages of Ghana, in Kikongo), and in many instances this has resulted in a literary form of existing oral material rather than innovative forms deriving from oral poetry. A large part of printed v.p. from Ethiopia (since 1917) and from South Africa (since 1862) has consisted of praise poetry similar in function to oral panegyric. Among the Nguni peoples of South Africa the techniques and aims of praise poetry were transferred to the writing of Christian hymns, but the more internalized forms of lyricism were hardly practiced at all.

Works in the Ge'ez language of Ethiopia were printed in Europe in the 16th c. The first pieces of imaginative writing in modern Amharic were printed in Rome. The author was Afāwārq Gäbeä iYasus, who should be regarded as the true founder of modern Amharic literature. In Ethiopia itself, the proclamation of Ras Tafari as Regent in 1917 marked the beginning of publication in Ge'ez and Amharic, and Amharic odes in honor of the Regent and of Empress Zāwditu were among the first works to be produced at the Imprimerie Ethiopienne.

The first book to be published in Addis Ababa after the liberation of the city in 1941 was an anthology of praise poems. Ethiopia stands exceptionally high in the production in print of creative v.p., but, of course, in comparison with what is published in the Western world the Ethiopian output is still very small. The Ethiopian writer, like Afr. writers of the vernacular almost everywhere, has been valued in proportion to the edifying character and didactic significance of his message and to his skill in handling the language. Such criteria make for conformity, but in South Africa some attempts were made to innovate. Bereng's Lithothokiso tsa Moshoeshoe (The Praises of King Moshoeshoe), published in 1931, was the first collection of original poems to appear in any South Afr. language, in this case Southern Sotho, and in 1936 Jobe's Omyezo (The Orchard) was a landmark in the history of written Xhosa poetry for its experimentation in theme and structure. B. W. Vilakazi's collection of Zulu songs, Inkondlo kaZulu, printed in 1935, showed differences from traditional v.p. in themes, in emotional tenor, and in prosody. It was in South Africa that Africans first began to discuss, through the printed word, the relationship between Afr. oral v.p. and the written v.p. The discussion still continues, but before a much wider public both inside and outside Africa.

See: On South Afr. and Ethiopian written v.p.: A. S. Gérard, Four Afr. Literatures (1971). On Afr. v.p. in Arabic: J. Wansbrough, "Theme, Convention and Prosody in the V.P. of North Africa," Bull. of School of Oriental and Afr. Studies, 32 (1969). On Hausa v.p.: M. Hiskett, "Hausa Islamic Verse: Its Sources and Development Prior to 1920" (unpub. Ph.D. diss., Univ. of London, 1969). On Fula v.p.: Poésie peule de l'Adamawa, ed. P. F. Lacroix (2 v., 1965). On Songhai v.p.: B. Hama, "L'Esprit de la culture sonrhaïe," Présence Africaine, 14/15 (1957). On Swahili v.p.: L. Harries, Swahili Poetry (1962); J. Knappert, Traditional Swahili Poetry (1967) and Swahili Islamic Poetry (1971). The Johari za Kiswahili series publ. by the East Afr. Literature Bureau consists of edited tenzi (plural of utenzi, a type of heroic or narrative or homiletic poem. See SWAHILI POETRY*).

L.H.

IN ENGLISH (Recent). With the end of the colonial period, and the consequent increase of literacy and higher education came a vast efflorescence of Afr. poetry written in Eng. It displays the variety to be expected in so diverse a continent, and regional styles have arisen. Nevertheless, the most eminent poets have created an international community of values and influences.

Generally Afr. Eng. poetry eschews rhyme in favor of alliteration and assonance. Instead of metrical verse, rhythms subject to the poet's syntax, logic, emotion, or rhetoric determine the verse length. Visual poetry is rare. Ambiguity is more often syntactic than lexical. The same austerity leads to avoidance of extended fanciful conceits unless these are buttressed by hard or sardonic reason and concrete, down-to-earth imagery. Oral and other traditional poetry influences recent Eng. poems primarily in more fundamental elements such as the poet's stance as defender of communal values, his integral allusions to the history, customs, and artifacts of his culture, and the architectonic features which sometimes relate poems to traditional forms of love song, praise song, proverbial tale, epic, etc. Afr. experiments in the transmutation of traditional poetic form into Eng. are perhaps best represented by Taban lo Liyong (Uganda 1938—) and Mazisi Kunene (South Africa 1932—). In Eating Chiefs lo Liyong experiments with novel forms to convey in Eng. the original poetic effects of Lwo myth, poetry, and song. Kunene's Zulu Poems apply traditional Zulu devices and forms to original subjects and thoughts. Most other Afr. poets as well, particularly those who have resided outside of Africa, display complete mastery of the functions of form in modern Eng. and Am. poetry. One indication of their freedom from these forms is the number of dramas and novels consisting partly or entirely of poetry.

The oldest tradition of sophisticated poetry in Eng. is West Afr., particularly in Ghana and Nigeria. In recent years other regions have been profoundly influenced by West Afr. poets, particularly the Nigerians Christopher Okigbo (1932-67, Labyrinths), John Pepper Clark (1935— Reed in the Tide; Casualties) and Wole Soyinka (1934— Idandre; Shuttle in the Crypt). This poetry combines lyricism with audacious leaps of thought, and individualistic feeling with steadfast social commitment. The authors rely heavily upon references to metaphysical, religious, and social concepts of their own ethnic groups, and less upon allusions to European cultural history.

Before you, mother Idoto
naked I stand;
before your watery presence, a prodigal
leaning on an oilbean, lost in your legend . . .
(Okigbo, Heavensgate)

When social protest occurs, it is presented in a tone of intellectual and emotional complexity rather than prophetic, simplistic fervor. Two other such poets are Kofi Awoonor (Ghana, 1935— Rediscovery; Night of My Blood) and Lenri Peters (The Gambia, 1932— Satellites; Katchikali). The graceful poetry of Gabriel Okara (Nigeria, 1921—) is less obscure and idiosyncratic in its forms, allusions, and thought.

East Afr. poetry is dominated by two styles. As exemplified by Okot p'Bitek (Uganda, 1931— Song of Lawino; Song of Ocol; Song of Prisoner; Song of Malaya) and Okello Oculi (Uganda, 1942—Orphan), one style has longer, rhetorical, lucid social commentary lamenting the disruptions attending modern urbanization. The poem's speaker is usually the dispossessed, arguing with the cogent similes and vivid evocation of a more humane past. The other style, more indebted to West Afr. poetry, is a tighter nexus of subtler images and covert allusions, composing a mordant, singular vision and response to modern life. It includes a wider range of subjects and tones and is more likely to employ a narrative structure or focus on some single event. Its preeminent writers are Jared Augira (Kenya 1947— Juices; Silent Voices; Soft Corals), Richard C. Nturu (Uganda 1946— Tensions) and Taban lo Liyong (Meditations in Limbo; Franz Fanon's Uneven Rites; Another Nigger Dead; 13 Offensives against Our Enemies).

Of necessity South Afr. poetry is most concerned with social upheaval, subjugation, poverty, prisons, revolt, and the private griefs of public injustice, as in O. M. Mtshali, Sounds of a Cowhide Drum. Since most works available to the world are by poets in exile, subjects, allusions, and forms reflect British and Am. life frequently, as in the works of Keroapetse Kgositsile (1938—, Spirits Unchained; For Melba; My Name is Afrika) and the consummate poetry of Dennis Brutus (1924— A Simple Lust):

Then the keening crescendo of faces split by pain the wordless, endless wail only the unfree know . . .

Often a setting of expansive and serene nature is evoked in lyrics as a contrast to human distress. The speaker is usually an observer with a unique combination of passionate concern and reflective distance.

Despite the infinite variety of individual genius and experience which shapes Afr. writing, one can hear a distinctive, characteristic Afr. voice in Eng. poetry. It speaks of personal involvement in the culture and history of its people, their ideals, and their behavior. It is individualistic in its perceptions but not in its ethics. It often relies on allusion and logical relationships particularly obscure to those who do not share all the poet's European or Afr. cultural resources. Its style, independent of European canons, is lyrical, imagistic, prone to philosophical musing, and wary of obtrusive technique which might mitigate a tone of sincerity. In short, there is emerging an international tradition discernibly Afr. in subjects and styles, and contributing much to the variety and vigor of poetry in Eng.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: J. Jahn, Bibliog. of Neo-Afr. Lit. (1965); B. Abrash, Black Afr. Lit. in Eng. since 1952 (1967); J. Jahn and C. P. Dressler, Bibliog. of Creative Afr. Writing (1971); H. Zell and H. Silver, Reader's Guide to Afr. Lit. (1971); D. E. Herdeck, Afr. Authors (v. 1, 1973).

ANTHOLOGIES: Modern Poetry from Africa, ed. G. Moore and U. Beier (1963); Book of Afr. Verse, ed. J. Reed and C. Wake (1964); Poems from Black Africa, ed. L. Hughes (1966); West Afr. Verse, ed. D. I. Nwoga (1967); Drum Beat, ed. L. Okala (1967); Pulsations, ed. A. Kemoli (1971); Poems from East Africa, ed. D. Cook and D. Rubadiri (1971); Seven South Afr. Poets, ed. C. Pieterse (1971); Mes-sages, Poems from Ghana, ed. K. Awoonor and G. Adali-Mortty (1971); The Word Is Here, ed. K. Kgositsile (1973); Poems from Africa, ed. S. Allen (1973).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. Mphahlele, The Afr. Image (1962) and Voices in the Whirlwind (1972); Afr. Lit. and the Universities, ed. G. Moore (1965); Introd. to Afr. Lit., ed. U. Beier (1967); W. Cartey, Whispers from a Continent: The Lit. of Contemporary Black Africa (1969); Protest and Conflict in Afr. Lit., ed. C. Pieterse and D. Munro (1969); B. King, Introd. to Nigerian Lit. (1971); A. Roscoe, Mother Gold (1971); Standpoints on Afr. Lit., ed. C. L. Wanjala (1973). D.F.D.

IN FRENCH (Contemporary). Although black poetry in Fr. is a comparatively recent phenomenon, it is already possible to discern several phases in its development. Black poetry in European tongues (as opposed to traditional Afr. poetry), arose initially through the displacement of Afr. populations as a result of the slave trade and subsequently through colonization of Africa itself and has come to be spoken of by some literary historians as "neo-Afr." or "néo-nègre." Such a term would include black American, Haitian, and much of Latin Am. literature. However, Afr. poetry in Fr., as part of a cohesive and far-flung literary movement supported by a philosophical basis can be traced back only as far as the Paris of the 1930's, when black students from various parts of the Fr. colonies in Africa and the Antilles began to examine and question the concept of exclusively Fr. models of behavior, culture, and literary expression, and turned instead for inspiration to Haitian literature and also to the Harlem Renaissance* writers Langston Hughes and Claude McKay. This awakening, commonly termed Negritude, began operating and came to fruition during the years 1932-48. The postwar years 1948-60 witnessed an increasing agitation among the growing numbers of European-educated Africans, which culminated in the independence by 1960 for all of black Africa formerly controlled by France and the former Belgian Congo. In respect to poetry, this period is sometimes referred to as the period of militant Negritude. The period 1960 to the present is considered by some to have gone beyond Negritude toward new preoccupations.

The Negritude movement was launched when, in 1932, seven Martinican students published in Paris the journal Légitime Défense, in which they harshly criticized the Martinican middle class for its emulation of Western bourgeois culture. In 1934 three young poets who were to become the towering figures of Negritude—Léopold Sédar Senghor (b.1906) of Senegal, Léon Gontran Damas (b.1912) of Fr. Guiana, and Aimé Césaire (b.1913) of Martinique—established the journal L'Etudiant Noir, attracting a group of young Afr. poets and critics. Although the journal was short-lived, the group of writers which it spawned continued to be an active and cohesive unit until about 1940, when World War II disrupted their activities. Unlike its predecessor, L'Etudiant Noir addressed itself to the whole of the black community within the Fr. colonial empire, and its writers believed that ultimately their reaffirmation of Afr. values would "contribute to universal life, to the humanization of Humanity." Their poetry began also to appear in Parisian publications, such as L'Esprit. The journal, Présence Africaine, founded in 1947 by Alioune Diop, has continued to be a vital force in the development and diffusion of black literature in Fr. In 1948, Senghor published his now-famous Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française, prefaced by Jean-Paul Sartre's penetrating analysis of Negritude, "L'Orphée noir." The anthology brought together for the first time a body of poetry with aims recognizably different from those of Continental Fr. literature.

Objectively, Negritude has been defined by Senghor as the culture—that is, the sum total of the economic and political, intellectual and moral, artistic and social values—of the peoples of black Africa and of the Afr.-derived peoples of America, Asia, and Oceania. But Negritude is also a subjective state: it is the acceptance on the part of black men of their distinct culture and of themselves as perpetrators of a distinctive style and world view. In L'Orphée noir, Sartre spoke of a dialectical progression, in which the black man at first rejects the white world and the white race as a necessary prerequisite for reintegration with his personality and rediscovery of his heritage, but soon recognizes his recent slave past and suffering as a potential basis on which to create a new humanism in which the whole of mankind will ultimately participate, and therefore, Negritude will disappear into universalism. Sartre's views have provoked much debate. In any case, it seems clear that Negritude seeks to rehabilitate the black man through a point-for-point negation of white values. Thus, white civilization, based on technology and rationality, cannot reach the source of life and expends itself in senseless hurrying about. But the black soul, existing in intuitive harmony with nature, creates a civilization wherein sensitivity and authentic humanity prevail. Césaire's long epico-lyric work, Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Return to my native land) provides one of the finest examples of Negritude poetry:

Eia pour ceux qui n'ont jamais rien inventé
insoucieux de dompter, mais jouant le jeu du monde.
Eia for those who invented nothing not caring to conquer, but playing the game of the world.

David Diop (1927-60) was looked to by the first generation of Negritude poets as a promising new star on the horizon. His poetry generally continues the bitterly anti-colonialist themes of the era of militant Negritude. However, there is in a great many of his poems a consistent internal development from revolt against present oppression toward a visionary hope of future redemption. This vision of future fulfillment arises directly out of the experience of suffering on the part of the colonized Afr., and David Diop's poems thus provide perhaps the most apt illustration of Sartre's contention regarding the messianic role of the black man, and at the same time, reveal Diop's historical importance as a bridge between the militant and post-Independence eras.

With political independence, many of the social preoccupations mirrored in the poetry lost their raison d'être. The tone and themes of black Afr. poetry in Fr. have been affected accordingly. However, the profusion of small volumes, published by Art houses, by a growing number of younger poets, attests to a still vigorous movement. The more recent poetry tends to be less concerned with revolt, to use less direct language, to be less impersonal, more lyrical; the poet appears as visionary or repository of a renewed or self-renewing race. The two poets most worthy of note of the new generation are Tchicaya U Tam'si (b. 1931) of Congo-Kinshasa and Edouard Maunick (b. 1931) of Mauritius. U Tam'si and Maunick express themes of race, of the Afr. heritage glimpsed through scenes remembered from childhood, of pilgrimage, purification, and renewal, of humanist destiny and the bardic mission, the whole through a complex system of motif symbols. Militancy is still present, but addresses itself to the grief of a divided, still-warring Africa, as in U Tam'si's Epitomé or Maunick's Fusillez-moi, works which treat the Lumumba-Congo and the Biafran tragedies. Militancy in the more recent poetry enlarges itself in the humanistic way envisioned by Senghor, Sartre, and the writers of L'Étudiant Noir to include a concern for all peoples of the world, hampered by warfare and oppression from achieving true Humanity, as in Maunick's Fusillez-moi:

je continuerai à réciter Hiroshima Nagasaki et Prague et Mozambique j'apprendrai tout le reste . . .
I will continue to recite Hiroshima Nagasaki and Prague and Mozambique I shall learn all the rest . . .

ANTHOLOGIES: Poètes d'expression française, 1900-1945, ed. L. Dumas (1947); Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue fr., ed. L. Senghor (1948); Huit poètes de Madagascar, ed. J. Aubert (1959); An Anthol. of Afr. and Malagasy Poetry in Fr., ed. C. Wake (1965); Neuf poètes camerounais, ed. L. Lagneau [L. Kesteloot] (1965) and Anthol. négro-africaine, ed. L. Kesteloot (1967); Nouvelle somme de poésie du monde noir (Présence Africaine, 1966); La Poésie des noirs, ed. R. Mercier (1967); Negritude: Black Poetry from Africa and the Caribbean, ed. N. Shapiro (1970); B. J. Fouda et al., Littérature camerounaise (Kraus' reprint, 1971); Black Poets in Fr., ed. M. Collins (1972).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: J.-P. Sartre, "Orphée noir" in Anthol. de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache . . . (1948); T. Melone, De la négritude dans la littérature négro-africaine (1962); L. Kesteloot, Les Écrivains noirs de langue fr. . . . (1963; 3d ed., 1967; Eng. tr. by E. C. Kennedy in 1974); L. Senghor, Liberté I: Négritude et humanisme (1964); Negritude: Essays and Studies, ed. A. Berrian and R. Long (1967); J. Jahn Neo-Afr. Lit.: A Hist. of Black Writing (1968); J.-M. Abanda Ndengue, De la négritude au négritisme (Yaoundé, 1970); J.-P. Makouta-Mboukou, Introd. à la litt. noire (Yaoundé, 1970); J. Nantet, Panorama de la litt. noire d'expression fr. (1972); D. E. Herdeck, Afr. Authors (v.I, 1973).

C.F.G.

IN PORTUGUESE. Despite the common stamp Port. occupation gave to the culture of its different Afr. possessions—Angola, Mozambique, the islands of São Tomé and Príncipe, the Cape Verde islands and Guinea, each of these territories (with the exception of Moslem Guinea) has produced a distinctive poetry. This literature is the work of a minority of educated intellectuals cut off from their roots in Afr. culture, often educated in Portugal and with a strong sense of their mission as spokesmen and reformers. Far from rejecting the Port. language, they appreciate the common instrument it offers, though a few poets have chosen to write in Creole dialect. Curiously, some of the earliest poets came from the smallest possessions. Two were mulattoes—Caetano da Costa Alegre (1864–90) from São Tomé, whose poems, written in the last decades of the 19th c., were published in 1916; and Eugénio Tavares (1867–1930) from the Cape Verde islands, who wrote some of his poetry in Creole. However, the earliest black poet, Joaquim Cordeiro da Mata (1857–94), came from Angola. The absence of a strong Afr. culture possibly acted as an indirect stimulus on the poetry of the islands, for the verse of José Lopes da Silva (1872–1962) respects Port. tradition. “Não prostituo a língua de Camões” (I do not prostitute the language of Camões), he wrote. With the influence of Brazilian Modernism in the thirties, the problem of color began to be introduced into Cape Verdean poetry. Pedro Monteiro Cardoso (ca. 1890–1942) published some bilingual poems in Port. and Creole. With the founding of Claridade by Jorge Barbosa (1902–71), Manuel Lopes (b. 1907), and others in 1936, literature increasingly focused attention on the islands and their peoples. The sea was an all important element, for, as Barbosa wrote in his poem, To the Sea, “Nos dilata sonhos e nos sufoca desejos” (it opens up dreams and stifles desires). On the other hand, another of the founders, Pedro Corsino Azevedo (1905–42), drew on the oral traditions of the island and wrote in Creole. One of his characteristically humorous poems is a detailed description of his snuff-box: Nha tabaquero which he lovingly evokes as made “di djacrandá/co’ prata tchuquido” (of jacaranda with inlaid silver). Claridade continued to appear intermittently, though by the sixties the young Cape Verdean poets had gone beyond the discovery of their island toward social themes such as hunger and emigration. Among these poets are Gabriel Mariano (b. 1928), Ovidio Martins (b. 1928), and Onésimo Silveira (b. 1935), who have taken emigration as their major theme. That is why in his Um poema diferente, Onésimo Silveira evokes a Utopian future as against the negatives of the present, a poem “sem barcos lastrados de gente/ A caminho do Sul” (without boats crammed with people and heading for the South). In the small island of São Tomé, poetry has a strong social content and there has been some influence of the Cuban poet Nicolás Guillén on António Alves Tomás Medeiros (b. 1931) and Francisco José de Vasques Tenreiro (1921–63), the latter a prolific writer on négritude themes. A well-known woman poet of São Tomé, Alda do Espírito Santo (b. 1926) is author of an impassioned lament on the Batepa massacre of

1953—“Onde estão os homens caçados neste vento de loucura” (Where are the men pursued by this wind of madness?). The poetry of Angola and Mozambique has also arisen for the most part in response to the négritude movement and out of the social situation, though one of the earliest poets, Rui de Noronha (Mozambique, 1909–43) expressed little more than sad resignation at his colonial fate. With the founding of the reviews, Mensagem (1950) and, after its suppression, Cultura (both in Angola), there began a real movement of poetic discovery of Angola and Mozambique. Of great importance, too, because it drew together poets from different parts of Africa was the Casa dos Estudantes do Império in Lisbon, a student center which published many Afr. poets before it closed down in the 1960’s. During the years of its existence, the Casa brought together writers, intellectuals, and future leaders of the Independence movement such as Amílcar Cabral, Agostinho Neto (b. Angola, 1922), and Mário de Andrade (b. Angola, 1928). The poetry of this period begins by rediscovering the peoples of Angola and Mozambique. For instance, many of the poems of Viriato da Cruz (b. Angola, 1928) take the form of portraits of typical local characters, e.g., Só Santo, the local potentate who is presented in the language and from the viewpoint of the people: “Hum-hum/Mas deixa . . ./Quando o só Santo morrer, /Vamos chamar um kimbanda/Para ‘Nghombo nos dizer/Se a sua grande desgraça/Foi desamparo de Sandu/Ou se é já própria da Raça” (Hum, but never mind. When Mr. Saint dies, we’ll bring the sorcerer so that the Truth God will tell us whether his great misfortune was due to the Spirit having forsaken him or if it is in the blood). As in other parts of Africa, there is the emergence of certain négritude themes—the feeling of black brotherhood, for instance, in some of the poems of Agostinho Neto; of black defiance in José Craveirinha (b. Mozambique, 1922) whose Grito Negro compares his blackness to coal that will someday consume the boss; of the rape of mother Africa in the poetry of the woman poet, Noémia de Sousa (b. Mozambique, 1927). With the outbreak of armed struggle between 1961–64 many of these poets were to find themselves involved in the war—Agostinho Neto, Kalungano (Marcelino dos Santos, b. Mozambique, 1929), Jorge Rebelo (b. Mozambique, 1940) have all become leaders of the liberation movement and several others, António Jacinto do Amaral Martins (b. Angola, 1924) and José Craveirinha, have suffered periods of imprisonment. Not unnaturally in these poets, the theme of social exploitation is uppermost, and there are many poems written on the theme of war itself, for instance, the Poema quarto of Fernando Costa Andrade (b. Angola, 1936) who writes “Há sobre a terra

50,000 mortos que ninguém chorou" (There are upon the earth 50,000 unwept dead). In contrast to the poetry of the militants is that of the mulatto Mário António Fernandes de Oliveira (b. Angola, 1934) whose poetry often expresses the mystical bond between the Afr. and nature and that of Geraldo Bessa Victor (b. Angola, 1917), whose verse looks forward to a time when racial divisions will be overcome. The social and political nature of the poetry of Angola and Mozambique has had a strong influence on language and style, for it is a poetry of unequivocal statement which depends for its effect on a strong emotional tone of lament or protest. The use of Afr. words is restrained, though there is often the evocation of the drum beat.

ANTHOLOGIES: Modernos poetas cabo-verdianos, ed. J. de Figueiredo (1961); Poetas e covetistas africanos de expressão portuguesa, ed. J. Alves das Neves (São Paulo, 1963); Literatura africana de expressão portuguesa, I: Poesia, ed. M. de Andrade (Algiers, 2d ed., 1967; tr. into Fr. as La Poésie africaine d'expression portugaise [Honfleur], 1969).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: M. de Andrade, "A poesia africana de expressão portuguesa: evolução e tendências actuais" in his anthol. cited above; N. Araujo, A Study of Cape Verdean Lit. (1966); G. M. Moser, Essays in Port.-Afr. Lit. (1969); R. A. Preto-Rodas, Negritude as a Theme in the Poetry of the Portuguese-Speaking World (1970); D. E. Herdeck, Afr. Authors (v.1, 1973).

J.E.F.

AGRARIANS. See FUGITIVES, THE.

AMERICAN POETIC SCHOOLS AND TECHNIQUES (CONTEMPORARY). "Ask the fact for the form," Emerson said, but the history of Am. poetry has tended to illustrate a rival quest, which is to beg the form for the fact. Emerson urged the Am. bards to emulate his Merlin, who mounted to paradise by the stairway of surprise, but even the greatest among Emerson's immediate progeny, Whitman and Dickinson, chose to present their poetic selves through repetitive modes of continuous and overwhelming formal innovation. Am. poetry since the end of World War II is an epitome of this reverse Emersonianism: no other poets in Western history have so self-deceivingly organized themselves along the supposed lines of formal divisions. The mimic wars of "closed" against "open" formers have masqueraded as conflicts between spiritual stances and ideological commitments: closed form, governed by metric and stanza, could thus be writ large as a settled insulation from experience, whereas open form, free-style and full of vatic self-confidence, reduced all experience to a chaos. And yet if we stand back now, after a quarter-century, we behold mostly a welter of wholly shared anxieties that unite the feuding camps.

The poets who were gathered together at their first full strength ca. 1945 would include Robert Penn Warren, Richard Eberhart, Theodore Roethke, Elizabeth Bishop, Robert Lowell, John Berryman, Delmore Schwartz, J. V. Cunningham, Randall Jarrell, Richard Wilbur, Charles Olson, and Robert Duncan. They had as predecessors the most formidable group of poets in Am. tradition, one that began with Edwin Arlington Robinson and Frost and proceeded through Pound, Eliot, Moore, Williams, Stevens, Ransom, and Jeffers down to a somewhat younger trio of E. E. Cummings, Hart Crane, and Allen Tate. Almost all of the poets born in the first two decades of the 20th c. seem diminished today when juxtaposed very closely with those born in the last two or three decades of the 19th. Great achievement by the fathers sometimes exacts a price from the children, and something of the current strength of Am. poets born during the 1920's may derive from the sorrows and sacrifice of the middle generation of Roethke, Berryman, Jarrell, Lowell, and others.

We can distinguish two formal strains in the important Am. poets born during the closing decades of the 19th c. If we examine Am. poetic practice as opposed to theory in the 19th c., we see that the main British line of Spenserian-Miltonic poetry, which emerges as the romantic tradition, was carried on through Bryant, Poe, Longfellow, Timrod, and Lanier, while native strains were invented most plainly by Whitman, and more subtly by a gnomic group that includes Emerson, Thoreau, Melville, and, most grandly, Dickinson. The two strains, those of the Eng. Romantic and the Emersonian gnomic, met and mingled in Robinson and Frost.

A third strain of Whitmanian innovation ensued in the major outburst of 1915 and afterwards. The immediate influence of Whitman here—on Edgar Lee Masters, Vachel Lindsay, Carl Sandburg—was not fructifying, though these poets continue to be popular and their simplified idiom has much to do with the recent development of a quasi-folk music. However, a Whitmanian element in Pound, Williams, and even Eliot, today seems far more central and vitalizing than the European influences so directly exalted by Eliot and Pound themselves and by their followers. An even more elusive Whitmanian influence, wholly divorced from formal considerations, was crucial for Stevens, whose major formal inheritance is as close to Wordsworth, Keats, and Tennyson as ever Bryant, Poe, and Longfellow were.

Despite its enormous range and power, Stevens's poetry has waited until the late 1960's and early 1970's to find a strong disciple in John Ashbery, whose own work took a turn away from surrealism (q.v.) and automatic writing in The Double Dream of Spring, Three Poems, and a number of uncollected lyrics. In Ashbery's best poems we look back through Stevens to Whitman in the employment of a long line, and in a rather oblique use of the cataloguing effect. There is a similar background for poets whose middle range of ancestry and poetic temperament appears to be occupied by Eliot. For instance, W. S. Merwin began during the mid-1960's to experiment with a celebratory kind of neo-primitivism: in The Moving Target and The Lice, broken syntax is making the dissociation Eliot saw as historically unfortunate but necessary. Yet Merwin has recovered the consolatory strain that belonged to Whitman and decisively affected The Waste Land and Four Quartets, though Eliot in his own quite ambivalent public pronouncements had tried to eliminate Whitman from the acceptable "tradition" of poetry in the English language.

These cases illustrate the emergence during the past few years of a transcendentalism that has always been essential to Am. poetry but was for a time anxiously rejected by its surest descendants. The poets of the generation of Roethke-Lowell-Wilbur began with the sober admonition of Eliot and Auden; they were to return to closed forms, and forsake metrical innovation. They, together with their younger followers in the 1950's—Ashbery, Merwin, James Dickey, James Merrill, Anthony Hecht, James Wright, Louis Simpson, Richard Howard, John Hollander—discovered in their various ways that neither closed nor open forms could be anything but an evasion. Poets who came into their force somewhat later, such as Gary Snyder, A. R. Ammons, Galway Kinnell, and Mark Strand, were less troubled by constraints of form and so could start more comfortably from the fact. In short, never having labored under the illusion that there was some cross-cultural modern idiom to which they ought to aspire, they declared themselves from the first to be successors of Emerson and Whitman.

Among the closed formers it is Auden rather than Eliot who has been the steadiest influence. His idiom is still going strong in the most recent work of Merrill, Howard Moss, and Wilbur, had a determining effect on the early efforts of Hollander and Howard, and never left Jarrell. What separates the Am. disciples of Auden from many of their British counterparts is a revision of Auden's characteristic irony, which (as D. Davie has remarked in a slightly different context) begins to realize in it the attitude that nature strikes in confronting man: not merely a man's own pose in confronting himself. This shift is evident also in matters of detail. Wilbur can be representative: his early and late poems look very nearly the same, but their technical evenness covers a progress away from the metaphysical conceits which used to lie thick on his pages. Similarly, Jarrell in his last work moved to the Wordsworthian pathos that had been his theme all along, and wrote increasingly in a loose iambic that allowed for much of the "inclusiveness" he had explicitly admired in Whitman. Howard in his most recent volumes has written dramatic monologues after the manner of Browning, while Hollander has tended to favor syllabics or else a highly enjambed accentual verse. Such a list might go on: the point is that poets who had their beginning in Auden, and whose early work can often be mistaken for Auden's, have by whatever route found a resting place in the native tradition.

Our emphasis ought to fall on a Wordsworthian-Whitmanian subjectivity that is just and inevitable. Against this stands the mode of confessional verse, a matrix that has produced W. D. Snodgrass, Sylvia Plath, Anne Sexton, and many other figures. Confessional poetry owes its genesis to Lowell, whose earliest writing looked like a late metaphysical pastiche for which his only precursors might be Edward Taylor and Allen Tate. In Life Studies Lowell opened himself to the type of free verse pioneered by Williams, while using the form, as Williams had not done, to write his own life's story by way of the strictly clinical facts. In later works Lowell has put the same subject, himself, under a still more minute examination, reverting to the format of a diary and adopting the form of a fourteen-line entry written in flat pentameter. He is certainly the poet central to this movement, or tendency, in Am. poetry, and, though he has been a less imposing as well as a less domineering presence, he seems to be the logical successor to Eliot in the poetry of belief or anxious unbelief which ranges itself against the poetry of vision. Although the issue of form is as always bogus, the larger opposition here will probably be lasting.

Critics have ordinarily associated Lowell in this phase with the later work of Berryman, which belongs more appropriately to a consideration of Pound's influence. Berryman's Dream Songs have much of the terseness that Pound asked to be communicated from the tone of a poem to its prosody, and their way of setting an expressionistic personal stance over against imagistic hardness was also anticipated by Pound. It is only in his last and less individually realized songs that Berryman approaches Lowell.

Iris Murdoch has observed that imagism (q.v.) itself was never more than a fantastically stripped down version of late romanticism: personality was being reduced to its smallest points of perception without ever being expunged, so that a large claim for the self was at all events implicitly maintained. There was never any "extinction of personality," in Eliot's phrase. Pound recognized this when he embarked on his own private quest poem, the enormous and deliberately uncompleted Cantos, and his followers have taken roughly the same path. The Black Mountain School, including primarily Olson, Duncan, and Robert Creeley, can be counted among his most faithful. Olson's own epic was composed largely in Poundian cadences, though he professed to write according to a different rationale. Thus, projective verse* is the name given to his exhortation to future bards to write by "field"—that is, using all the resources of a typewriter to complicate what the eye sees on the written page—and at the same time to plan their metric according to breath—that is, with a respect for the full and varied possibilities of exhalation helped by the human voice. Olson felt that he was licensed in principle as in practice by the metric of Shakespeare's later plays.

As all the manifestos show, there is an obscure but profound spiritual kinship that binds together Williams, Pound, Olson, and a much younger poet, Allen Ginsberg. The self-discoveries of Ginsberg, Gregory Corso, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, William Everson, and a host of lesser eminences, who were first heard from in the mid-1950's, are occasionally referred to as making a San Francisco Renaissance. The advent of the Beat Poets (q.v.), and the writing Duncan issued out of San Francisco, may be set under the rubric of this event. Since the Beat Poets were noisiest in being reborn, have stayed active through their connection with Ferlinghetti's publishing enterprise, and compose the largest subset of this group, they have a special claim on our attention. In one sense these poets are Whitman's authentic heirs: they have his expansiveness, his belief in the democracy of the spirit, his sexual frankness, and they sing of the open road. But the myth has become a mystique in their hands, which merely to invoke is apparently to justify. In much of Ginsberg's work during the late 1950's and early 1960's, the elliptical image-making faculty of Williams has also been brought to bear, and it is to be noted that Williams associated himself with this poet's Whitmanian incarnation at its most aggressive pitch. At least one current in Williams' own poetry, however, ran directly contrary to Whitman, for Williams tended to freeze any given image in order to isolate it for contemplation, rather than immersing its solitariness in some wider flow of reverie. This is where the style of a poet and the deepest facts of his personality intersect, and on this point of style a disciple far truer to Williams than any of the "Howl"-Whitmanians has been Denise Levertov.

Williams' habit of regarding a poem as "observations," enlivened by the colloquial diction of Pound, helped to encourage Marianne Moore in one generation and Elizabeth Bishop in the next. An ingratiating element in both of these poets is that they seem to claim nothing for their role, or for their craft. The type of syllabic verse invented by Moore makes the prose of life concede very little to the poetry and sets nervousness very high among the faculties that aid perception. Similar qualities, though with a certain loosening as to form and a less jagged conception of what a poem ought to be, are notable throughout Bishop's work. The "mad exactness" that has often been remarked in her poetry is itself an exacting discipline, and may eventually be viewed as a corrective reaction against the thaumaturgical excesses of the modern tradition.

Another kind of reaction against modernism accounts for the group of New York poets in which Frank O'Hara, Kenneth Koch, James Schuyler, and Ashbery figure as significant names. The opéra bouffe of Am. silent films as well as a native surrealism is at work in the writing of this school: O'Hara's Second Avenue can be considered an exemplum of the new mode thereby brought into being, which might be described as comic phantasmagoria. Such a poetics is in the last degree an urban phenomenon, and will be found irrevocably at odds with the school of pre-Wordsworthian, or indeed—as it likes to be thought—prehistorical clarity which we connect with the names of James Wright and Robert Bly.

Sooner or later, as has been noted, the proliferation of schools and methods must be understood as an impediment, not an aid to appreciation. There are two innovations that have some importance: first, the definitive sloughing off of the Georgian diction by Pound, Frost, and a few others. That the advance took place at a certain time and place has come to seem a truism, yet it holds within it an essential truth. There is also, a bit later, Williams' reassertion in free verse of the full range of ambiguity made possible by enjambement (q.v.), when, as J. Hollander has indicated, the rhetorical flexibility of that particular feature of Eng. poetry had been allowed to lapse after Milton in the poetry of the late romantics and the Victorians. But, once we have taken these into account, the arguments within and between self-proclaiming schools are at best misleading. In the strongest and most characteristic poetry of the late 1960's and early 1970's, a transcendental synthesis of the various native strains seems to be developing, and what is emerging is clearly an expressionistic and severe version of Am. romanticism. At any rate, that is our safest generalization as we trace the continuity of individual careers. Thus Simpson, who was once allied with Bly and the mid-West clarifiers, appears in his liveliest work to have been relatively free of their defining impulse. Ashbery, sometimes categorized quite simply as one of the New York poets, instead moves together with Schuyler in an enormous ambience that includes the otherwise very diverse Merrill, Wright, Hecht, Ammons, Merwin, Hollander, Alvin Feinman, Kinnell, Strand, and many others, who are visionary, as Emerson prophesied they must be. The stance of all these poets makes impossible an expression in either closed or open phrased fields, and each has been compelled, in order to escape the fall into the confessional, to perform a deliberate curtailment of the revisionary impulse toward an endlessly journalistic scrutiny of himself, while simultaneously asking the fact for the form.

For what, finally, can poetic form mean to an Am.? Every Am. poet who aspires to strength knows that he starts in the evening-land, realizes he is a latecomer, fears to be only a secondary man.

Solitary, Patient for the last voices of the dusk to die down, and the dusk
To die down,
Listeners waiting for courteous rivers
To rise and be known . . .

. . . but in the large view, no lines or changeless shapes: the working in and out, together and against, of millions of events: this, so that I make no form of formlessness . . .

Suspended somewhere in summer between the ceremonies Remembered from childhood and the historical conflagrations
Imagined in sad, learned youth—somewhere
there always hangs
The American moment.

Burning, restless, between the deed
And the dream is the life remembered . . .

In new rocks new insects are sitting
With the lights off
And once more I remember that the beginning

Is broken

No wonder the addresses are torn . . .

Glad of the changes already and if there are more

it will never be you that minds Since it will not be you to be changed, but in the evening in the severe lamplight doubts come

From many scattered distances, and do not come too near.

As it falls along the house, your treasure Cries to the other men; the darkness will have none of you, and your are folded into it like mint into the sound of haying . . .

These are five representative poets of their generation; the excerpts have been taken at random from a recent anthology. Every passage, whether in tone, in cognitive aim, or in human stance, shows the same anxiety: to ask the fact for the form, while being fearful that the fact no longer has a form. This is what G. Hartman has called "the anxiety of demand": that which can be used can be used up. The generation of poets who stand together now, mature and ready to write the major Am. verse of the 1970's, may yet be seen as what Stevens called "a great shadow's last embellishment," the shadow being Emerson's.

ANTHOLOGIES: New Poets of England and America, ed. D. Hall, R. Pack, and L. Simpson (1957); The New Am. Poetry, ed. D. M. Allen (1960); Contemporary Am. Poetry, ed. D. Hall (1962); Poems of Our Moment, ed. J. Hollander (1968); The Contemporary Am. Poets, ed. M. Strand (1969); Preferences: 51 Am. Poets Choose Poems from Their Own Work and from the Past, comm. and introd. by R. Howard (1974). Cf. also the Yale Series of Younger Poets, the Pitt Poetry Series of the University of Pittsburgh, the Contemporary Poetry Series of the University of North Carolina Press, the Wesleyan Poetry Program.

CRITICISM: E. Pound, A.B.C. of Reading (1934); Y. Winters, Primitivism and Decadence (1937); W. Stevens, The Necessary Angel (1951); R. Jarrell, Poetry and the Age (1953); W. C. Williams, Selected Essays (1954); A. Tate, The Man of Letters in the Modern World (1955); R. J. Mills, Jr. Contemporary Am. Poetry (1965); C. Olson, Human Universe (1967); M. L. Rosenthal, The New Poets (1967); A. Alvarez, Beyond All This Fiddle (1968); D. Davie, "On Sincerity," Encounter, 31 (1968) and Six Epistles to Eva Hesse (1970); The Survival of Poetry, ed. M. Dodsworth (1970); R. Howard, Alone with America (1970); H. Bloom, The Ringers in the Tower (1971); D. Bromwich, "Some Am. Masks," Dis- sent, 20 (1973); K. Malkoff, Crowell's Handbook of Contemporary Am. Poetry (1973); L. Simpson, North of Jamaica (1973); Am. Poetry since 1960, ed. R. B. Shaw (1974); M. Bewley, D. Donoghue, R. W. Flint, R. Mazocco in The Hudson Review, The New York Review of Books, Partisan Review, passim.

H.A.B.; D.B.

AMERIND (a combination of syllables for American and Indian). See AMERICAN INDIAN POETRY.

ANIMAL EPIC. See BEAST EPIC.

ANTIMASQUE. See MASQUE.

ATTITUDE. See TONE.

B

BARDIC VERSE. See CELTIC PROSODY.

BEAST FABLE. See FABLE IN VERSE; BEAST EPIC.

BIBLICAL POETRY. See HEBREW POETRY.

BLACK MOUNTAIN SCHOOL OF POETS. See PROJECTIVE VERSE.*

BLACK POETRY, Recent (U.S.). The term, and perhaps the very concept, "Black Poetry" entered popular usage in the early 1960's along with "Black Power," "Black Nationalism," and "The Black Arts Movement." In part each of these rests on the premise of Pan-Africanism, that is, the belief that all B. communities in Africa and elsewhere share a fundamental cultural heritage and certain historical experiences and current political concerns, especially vis-à-vis Western culture. B. poetry, then, can mean poetry by persons of African descent, but more specifically it designates poetry by such persons which is addressed to the B. heritage aesthetically and to the B. community politically.

Recent B. poetry in the United States therefore continues the tradition of spirituals (q.v.) and of the luminaries such as Phillis Wheatley, George Moses Horton, Paul Laurence Dunbar, Claude McKay, Langston Hughes, Melvin B. Tolson, and Gwendolyn Brooks (see NEGRO POETRY, AMERICAN [U.S.]). It is distinguished from this tradition primarily by a heightened consciousness of alienation from non-B. audiences—a consciousness emerging from the Civil Rights and B. Power movements of the 1960's, the assassinations of Malcolm X and Martin Luther King, the big-city riots, and the rekindling of interest in B. Nationalism. It is further characterized by a consciously B. aesthetic which regards critical concepts and criteria of academic traditionalism as founded on principles alien to the B. culture. Such norms are rejected as racist, stifling, and parochial, even under the shibboleth of "universality." Such new B. poets as Don L. Lee and Clarence Major speak within a developing B. aesthetic similar to the mature one existing in music, a context where the B. artist, utterly independent of "scholarly criticism," interprets the cultural experience which he shares with his B. audience.

Since emancipation from traditional Western poetic criteria is relatively new, the formal elements of the new emphasis are quite varied and eclectic, as is indicated by the haiku (q.v.) of Etheridge Knight, the South African sort of praise poems by Keorapetse Kgotsile, the paeons of Nikki Giovanni, and the combination of music with poetry (not lyrics) by "The Last Poets" and many others. Often the figures of speech and prosody borrow from current oral folk poetry, thus continuing the tradition of "dialect poetry," "jazz poetry," and the many other written styles based on verbal art endemic to the whole B. community in America, but foreign to Euro-Am. literary tradition. Frequently, choices of orthography, vocabulary, tone, etc., seem intended precisely to contradict academically enshrined canons. Thus form itself is applied to the task of "decolonizing the mind" of both reader and writer. The poets' concept of a "colonized people" follows closely the thought of such political philosophers as Frantz Fanon and Kwame Nkrumah.

But it is in content that this poetry is most strikingly directed toward the B. community's emancipation ideologically and in every other sense. Typical is the poem B. Art by Imamu Baraka, which focuses aesthetic principles upon content—content which teaches, inspires, and hence contributes to liberation.

The recurrent themes of recent B. poetry might be provisionally categorized as either "negative" or "positive"—even though the most bleak poem may involve a subtle affirmation of B. values, and the most affirmative poem may evoke images of intense suffering. On the negative side, there are exposures of the abuses and inconsistencies of Western religion and aesthetics (Yusef Iman's Love Your Enemy, Dudley Randall's B. Poet, White Critic); demonstrations of the loss of B. selfhood which characterizes a colonial mentality (Don L. Lee's The Self-Hatred of Don L. Lee); and dramatizations of various forms of modern oppression (Carolyn Rodgers' The Last M. F., Etheridge Knight's Hard Rock Returns to Prison, Johari Amini's Upon Being B. One Friday Night in July).

On the positive side, there are explicit calls to revolt (Sonia Sanchez's A Coltrane Poem, Don L. Lee's a poem to complement other poems) as well as less militant, inward-looking affirmations. Nikki Giovanni illustrates a transition from one stance to the other, from the mid-1960's Nigger, Can You Kill? to the more recent concerns of My House. The reintegration of the B. "sense of self" is the implicit aim of many contemporary B. poems which celebrate oft-disparaged forms of B. beauty—physical, spiritual, and cultural (Conrad Kent Rivers' For All Things B. and Beautiful, Everett Hoagland's love child—a b. aesthetic, and many B. poets' tributes to B. musicians). Another important development is the effort to provide a B. and Pan-Africanist cosmology (Larry Neal's Kuntu, Sun Ra's Of Cosmic Blue Prints, Sarah Fabio's Evil Is No B. Thing).

The authors cited above probably constitute a fair list of the contemporary B. poets most celebrated by their fellow artists and the B. community. Among the most seminal are Imamu Baraka (Leroi Jones) and Don L. Lee. In addition other established poets, notably Gwendolyn Brooks, have participated in the B. poetry movement, whose centers of activity are New York and Newark, New Jersey, Chicago, Detroit, and to a lesser extent San Francisco and Los Angeles. Independence has required reliance on new publishing houses such as Jihad Productions, Broadside Press, and Third World Press, and on journals such as The Journal of B. Poetry, Soulbook, and the preexisting B. World. The determined aspiration to speak in the idiom of Blacks has so succeeded that B. poetry has generated in its intended audience an interest challenged by no other serious contemporary B. art except music, and, possibly, drama.

ANTHOLOGIES: B. Expressions: An Anthol. of New B. Poets, ed. E. Perkins (1967); B. Fire, ed. L. Jones and L. Neal (1968); I Am the Darker Brother: An Anthol. of Modern Poems by B. Americans (1968) and The Poetry of B. America: Anthol. of the 20th C. (1973), both ed. A. Adoff; The New B. Poetry, ed. C. Major (1969); Soulscript: Afro-Am. Poetry, ed. J. Jordan (1970); Dices or B. Bones: B. Voices of the Seventies, ed. A. D. Miller (1970); 19 Necromancers from Now: An Anthol. of Original Am. Writing for the 70's, ed. I. Reed (1970); We Speak as Liberators, ed. O. Coombs (1970); A Broadside Treasury, ed. G. Brooks (1971).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Bontemps, "The New B. Renaissance," Negro Digest, 11 (1961) and "The Umbra Poets," Mainstream, 16 (1963); Anger and Beyond: The Negro Writer in the United States, ed. H. Hill (1966); L. Neal, "The B. Arts Movement," Drama Rev., 12 (1968); R. Barksdale, "Urban Crisis and the B. Poetic Avant-Garde," Negro Am. Lit. Forum, 3 (1969); B. Expression: Essays by and about B. Americans in the Creative Arts, ed. A. Gayle (1969); M. Cook and S. Henderson, The Militant B. Writer in Africa and the United States (1969); C. Gerald, "The B. Writer and His Role," Negro Digest, 18 (1969); J. Lester, "The Arts and the B. Revolution," Arts in Society, 5 (1969); C. Rodgers, "B. Poetry—where It's at," Negro Digest, 18 (1969); A. P. Davis, "The New Poetry of B. Hate," CLA Jour., 11 (1970); M. Evans, "Contemporary B. Lit.," B. World, 19 (1970); The B. Aesthetic, ed. A. Gayle (1971); Dynamite Voices: B. Poetry of the 1960's, ed. D. L. Lee (1971); J. H. Bryant, "The B. Rebellion in Lit. and Music," Nation, April 24, 1972; B. Bell, "Contemporary Afro-Am. Poetry as Folk Art," B. World, 22 (1973); S. Henderson, Understanding the New B. Poetry (1973); Modern B. Poets: A Collection of Crit. Essays, ed. D. B. Gibson (1973).
D.J.

C

CALLIGRAMME. The c. takes its name from Guillaume Apollinaire's figure-poems (idéogrammes lyriques, as he first called them) in his volume Calligrammes (1918). It has been termed "both unique and non-unique, both avant-garde and historically grounded" (E. E.

George). While recognizing the personal quality in Apollinaire's use of the form, one may cite in its background the subtle metaphorical elements of the Chinese written character and, among others, such historical precedents as Alexandrian figure-poems (technopaignia) attributed to Simias of Rhodes, Theocritus, and Dosiadas; the Latin carmina figurata; Rabelais' "Dive Bouteille"; George Herbert's wings; and the mouse-tail of Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. The c. thus falls somewhere between the pattern poem (see PATTERN POETRY) and contemporary concrete poetry.* When Apollinaire shapes his verses variously into a necktie, a watch, a crown, a flower, a mandolin, a Browning pistol, the façade of Notre-Dame, a fountain, the Eiffel Tower, or a shower of rain, there is often an integral lyric quality preserved within the form. Yet the c. remains essentially a virtuosity, a visual conceit, a sort of modern blending of verse and emblem (q.v.) in one.—F. J. Carmody, Evolution of Apollinaire's Poetics 1901-1914 (1963); S. Themerson, Apollinaire's Lyrical Ideograms (1966, rev. ed., 1968); E. E. George, "Calligrams in Apollinaire and in Trakl: A Psycho-Stylistic Study," Language and Style, 1 (1968); P. Renaud, Lecture d'Apollinaire (1969); G. M. Masters, "Rabelais and Ren. Figure Poems," Etudes Rabelaisiennes, 8 (1969); A. H. Greet, "Wordplay in Apollinaire's Calligrammes," L'Esprit Créateur, 10 (1970). A.G.E.

CENSORSHIP. Compared to prose fiction, poetry has seldom been censored. C. consists of suppression before or after publication in the name of some political, religious, or moral principle invoked by a state, church, or public pressure group. For over 2,000 years the basic principle behind such suppression has been the idea asserted in Plato's Republic that susceptible minds must be protected from harm. In all this time, poetry, for various reasons, has been held relatively harmless. After Aristophanes lampooned the reigning tyrant, Athens outlawed invective from the stage (437-35 B.C.) but exempted the chorus because of its roots in religious ritual. This attitude toward poetry as a part-sacred, communal activity probably provided a measure of immunity in earlier times. Today, as censors concentrate on protecting the greatest number of people from greatest moral harm, they fear poetry only in proportion to its popularity and usually leave it alone.

Wherever c. has been public policy and poetry has been as vulnerable as any other form of expression, persecution of poets has not been as dramatic as legend would lead us to believe. The famous story of Ovid being banished for obscene poetry is fanciful. He was banished for riotous living or opposition politics, not poetry. When the infamous Restoration rake Sir Charles Sedley was jailed in 1663, it was not, as some say, for "mannerly obscene" poems, but for standing on a balcony in Covent Garden "throwing down bottles (pist in)" upon the populace below. There is little way of knowing how effectively c. inhibited poets from writing, but the record is clear that they enjoyed relative freedom until the growth of a mass reading public brought about the need for moral c. on an unprecedented scale.

Previously c. had been invoked to support the established churches or governments. With the advent of widespread printing, the Church in 1487 imposed a formal system of licensing books before publication. Charles V in 1521 made publishing without the Church's license a civil offense, and Henry VIII countered with a wholly secular licensing system under the dreaded Star Chamber. Still, no major poet is known to have suffered for his poetry even after the Church buttressed its system with an Index of Prohibited Books (1559). Frequently revised, the Index was subject to the whims of presiding authorities and at one time listed 11 lines of the Divine Comedy (from Inferno, 11 and 19), later the whole of Paradise Lost in its translation. In post-Napoleonic Austria under the "Metternich System," the Index was combined with secular restrictions to impose excessively harsh c. on poets or anyone else expressing liberal views. Yet within Catholic nations, like Spain, the Index gradually fell into disuse until formally abrogated in 1966.

Secular restrictions, however, remain, especially in nations subject to rigorous political c. Licensing and blacklisting are standard measures controlling poetry and other forms of literary expression. In the USSR, where the state publishes all books and controls all bookstores, "ideological administrators" decide what will be written and read and what will not be written or read, including books imported from abroad. The state, the party, and the powerful Writers' Union keep watch for books lacking literary or social merit. In 1947 a decree against westernizing influences on Russian culture quickly consigned "harmful" poets like Anna Akhmatova and Boris Pasternak to silence and their works to instant oblivion. In 1972, while young poets like Iosif Brodsky endure "government service" followed by exile, others are free to read abroad, hinting at some relaxation of complete, uncompromising control.

As other states have granted increasing degrees of individual freedom, political and religious c. have declined but moral c. has flourished as a concomitant of democracy. The most dramatic shift coincided with the romantic movement in England where Lord Chancellor Eldon, seeking to shelter the morals of millions among a new mass reading class, invoked the principle, still current, that a potentially harmful work can have no existence in the eyes of the law and thus no copyright protection. He permitted piracy of any work suspected of libel, blasphemy, or immorality or one written by an author whose reputation was merely suspect.

In 1817, when a pirate printed Southey's Wat Tyler, an effusion of his radical youth, Lord Eldon refused even the conservative laureate an injunction. In the same year, Eldon denied Shelley custody of his child because of the blasphemy in Queen Mab. Byron, whose wealth and power enabled him to beat off pirates of Don Juan and Cain, was yet so stunned by this injustice that he refused to go on with Don Juan. And Coleridge refused to translate Faust, fearing he would be blamed for Goethe's blasphemy and exposed to Eldon's lash. Thus for a quarter-century Eldon ruled, ably abetted in the marketplace by the Society for the Suppression of Vice, so that by the close of his career reputable publishers, like Byron's John Murray, were simply refusing to issue any new poetry as "quite unsaleable."

The Society, like its successors in America, used boycotts, blacklists, and moral suasion along with the constant threat of criminal prosecution under obscenity laws. These laws evolved with expansion of the reading public. In the U.S., the Tariff Act of 1842 banned importation of obscene books, including "classics" (exempted only in 1930), without defining obscenity. After mid-century both U.S. and British law held any book obscene that tended to corrupt corruptible minds. In 1933, in the "Ulysses case," Judge John Woolsey ruled that a book must be tested by its effect on "a person with average sex instincts," and this principle was embraced by the Supreme Court's "Roth decision" (1957) which held that the test of obscenity should be "whether to the average person, applying contemporary standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest" (354 U.S. 487).

At the same time, this landmark decision extended immunity to any book with ideas having "the slightest redeeming social importance" even though otherwise "unorthodox, controversial, or hateful to the prevailing climate of opinion"—a decision that effectively deprived pressure groups of their most formidable weapon. During 1972, however, the Court said that the test was solely whether the dominant theme of the work appealed to prurient interest, and that "an attempt at serious art" was not inevitably a guarantee against a finding of obscenity.

Then in 1973, the test was narrowed: "whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value." More, the Court also limited the scope of the test by relating it to community standards: "whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law." This revision emphasizing state jurisdiction gives pressure groups a formidable weapon for grass-roots prosecutions.

Over the past century in the free world, pressure groups and police have been notoriously unsuccessful in convicting any major poet. In fact, a judgment of obscenity against six poems in Baudelaire's Fleurs du Mal levied in 1857 was finally annulled by Fr. courts in 1949. In 1929, D. H. Lawrence cunningly arranged for British postal authorities to impound the MS of Pansies, igniting popular furore in his favor. In 1957, after U.S. Customs impounded Ginzberg's Howl and Other Poems, thousands cheered as Judge Clayton Horn threw the case out of court.

In 1970 the President's Commission on Obscenity and Pornography recommended relaxing what few restrictions remain. President Nixon rejected the Commission's report, and the mere possibility of relaxation caused pressure groups to redouble their efforts. Nevertheless, on the national level, poetry continues to enjoy immunity from their concerns as they focus on widely circulating books and the mass media. On local levels, however, great poems along with literary classics of all kinds continue to feel the occasional lash of latter-day Lord Eldons. Bimonthly the American Library Association issues a Newsletter on Intellectual Freedom, reporting harassment of bookstores, public libraries and public schools, a continuing record of democracy's voice in the republic of letters, assuring us that Plato is alive and well and living among the grassroots.

The First Freedom, ed. R. B. Downs (1960); R. W. Haney, Comstockery in America (1960); A. Craig, Banned Books of England and Other Countries (1962); M. L. Ernst and A. U. Schwartz, C.: The Search for the Obscene (1964); R. E. McCoy, Freedom of the Press (1968); D. Thomas, A Long Time Burning: History of Literary C. (1969); U. S. Commission on Obscenity and Pornography. The Report (1970).

P.M.Z.

CLOSURE, POETIC. See POETIC CLOSURE.*

COLLECTIONS, UNIFIED. Groups of poems possessing a sequential or other holistic form. Virgil's ten Eclogues and four Georgics have recently been examined in detail for their symmetrical properties, involving pairs of poems within the larger whole, passages on similar topics at similar length in similar places, etc. Such thematic forms have been shown to unify the episodes of Ovid's Metamorphoses; and some looser form has long been observed in Martial's Epigrams and Statius' Silvae. Occasionally a form was provided, as with some Renaissance editions of Juvenal dividing his sixteen satires into books.

In the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, narrative and lyric sequences were very common, often employing other devices to impart unity. Dante's Vita Nuova and Petrarch's Canzoniere give sequences of love poems in which an idealized profane love may lead by stages to divine love, and recent criticism has discovered in these collections certain calendrical or other structures that provide one version of numerological form. The sonnet sequences (see SONNET CYCLE) of Edmund Spenser (Amoretti), of Sir Philip Sidney (Astrophel and Stella) and, less certainly, of Shakespeare incorporate narrative features, along with other symptoms of order in unified collections. Two of the best Eng. examples of u.c. appeared in the 17th c.: George Herbert's collection of divine poems, The Temple, and John Dryden's collection, chiefly of narratives and translations, Fables Ancient and Modern. Varieties of linking by echoing of words, development of plot, and variations on themes assist Herbert and Dryden, the former in developing ideas of the vicissitudes of the soul in a eucharistic series; and the latter, versions of the good life. Emblem (q.v.) books frequently showed such a progression, and particularly in dealing with the vanity of earthly things or the vicissitudes of the soul. Francis Quarles treats the former topic in the first two books of his Emblemes and the latter in the last three. Because discovery of the unifying principles of such collections has come so recently, it seems most likely that further study will show that numerous other u.c. can be found in classical, Renaissance, and subsequent times.

The extraordinary features of certain Japanese collections have also become known not long ago. The first imperial collection, the Kokinshū (early 10th c.) contains 1,111 poems in twenty books. The most important groups of books are those on the seasons and on love, both of which are ordered temporally, the former on a natural basis and in relation to the Ceremonies of the Year (Nenchū Gyōji), the latter on the pattern of a courtly love affair. Implicit in the progressive integration of the Kokinshū was the possibility, partly realized in that collection, of associative linkage in terms of diction, imagery, and topic. Such possibilities were fully realized by the eighth imperial collection, the Shinkokinshū (early 13th c.), in which the twenty books of almost 2,000 poems are integrated editorially into a sequence of nearly 10,000 lines. The central feature of such integration is the art of the editors or compilers in bringing together poems written by different poets of different ages into a single whole, with integration rather than authorship or historical chronology determining order. On the model of such imperial collections, various shorter collections employing associative and progressive integration came into being. Some of these involved editorial integration: e.g., Superior Poems of Our Time (Kindai Shūka), a sequence integrated by the poet Fujiwara Teika. Other such Japanese u.c. were modeled on the imperial collections and were made up of poems composed by a single poet and editorially ordered by him (or her). The most frequent version of such u.c. was the hundred-poem sequence (hyakushūuta), out of which developed later linked forms by poets writing stanzas in alteration. The brevity of the Japanese tanka (q.v.) enabled other editorial manipulation into episodes accompanied by prose. In the 19th and 20th c. somewhat similar groupings of poems will be found in various literatures. A few examples of such include Charles Pierre Baudelaire's Fleurs du mal, Rainer Maria Rilke's Sonette an Orpheus, and Edgar Lee Masters' Spoon River Anthology.

In numerous poetic traditions, various methods of bringing two or more poems together have existed; e.g., see COMPANION POEMS.*—On Virgil, see B. Otis, Virgil: A Study in Civilized Poetry (1963) and M. J. C. Putnam, Virgil's Pastoral Art (1970). On Ovid, see B. Otis, Ovid as an Epic Poet (1966). On Dante and Petrarch, see C. S. Singleton, An Essay on the Vita Nuova (1958); T. P. Roche, "Calendrical Structure in Petrarch's Canzoniere," SP, 71 (1974). On Renaissance sonnet sequences, see T. P. Roche, "Shakespeare and the Sonnet Sequence" in Hist. of Lit. in the Eng. Language, II (1540–1674), ed. C. Ricks (1970; ch. 5). On Herbert, see L. L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954) and on Dryden, E. Miner, Dryden's Poetry (1967). On Japanese poetry, see R. H. Brower and E. Miner, Japanese Court Poetry (1961).

E.M.

COMPANION POEMS. Two poems designed to be read as complements, opposites, or replies. The best known c.p. in Eng. poetry are Milton's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, which are truly paired, in the manner of rhetorical essays preferring the rival claims of day and night, youth and age, etc., as in Milton's own academic exercises (see Prolusions, 1.7), which imply a paired oration on the other side. Because rhetorical amplification could work to augment or diminish, and because satire and panegyric shared numerous topics, such sets of opposites were common in many forms of writing. Truly paired poems are not numerous in Eng. literature. After Milton, there are Abraham Cowley's Against Hope and For Hope, the former of which was also paired with Richard Crashaw's For Hope; and John Oldham's Satyr against Virtue, with the Counterpart to the Satyr against Virtue. Such opposed poems were sometimes printed together in alternating stanzas: so Cowley and Crashaw on hope; Maria Tessel-schade Visscher's (a 17th-c. Dutch poet) Wilde en Tamme Zangster (Wild and Tame Singer); Robert Burton's Author's Abstract of Melancholy; and Edmund Waller's In Answer of Sir John Suckling's Verses, interwoven with Suckling's Against Fruition. Some of the poems paired by one author against those by another are answer poems with parodic elements. Christopher Marlowe's Come live with me and be my love excited a number of replies with parodic features.

True answer poems, implying social intercourse in verse address, will be found in large numbers in collections of Chinese, Korean, and Japanese poetry. The classical poetic traditions of those countries assumed that the persons addressed were also poets, and in fact poetry was often exchanged on occasions that today would call for prose or telephone communication. It sometimes happened that Japanese poems not actually paired were brought together editorially with a headnote describing the (imaginary) situation, leading to a genre known as "tales of poems" (uta-monogatari) of which The Tales of Ise (Ise Monogatari) is the best known example. Another Japanese example that flourished in classical times was the poetry-match (utawase), in which two or more people competed by writing poems on given topics, with a judgment given by one or more judges. Such matches often were great occasions of state, and they had a variant in the poetry-match with oneself (jikaawase), in which a single poet wrote two poems on each topic and sent them to an esteemed critic for judgment.

Poems composed over a period of time might also be paired. Recent study of Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics shows that individual poems in the former ten and latter four have symmetrical features. Other recent study has shown such symmetry to characterize larger poetic collections such as Petrarch's Canzoniere and Edmund Spenser's Amoretti. The symmetry of such collections often employs a calendrical or other numerological basis. John Donne's two Anniversaries—The Anatomy of the World and The Progress of the Soul—are c.p. more by virtue of relation and contrast in theme, tone, and occasion.

The art of c.p. is sufficiently natural for it to be continued into later times. William Blake's Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience include a number of poems set against each other and understood only by their contrasts. Similarly, Robert Browning's Meeting at Night and Parting at Morning pair two related experiences. The pairing will also be found in the works of later poets, often in question-and-answer or "straight" and parodic versions. See also COLLECTIONS, UNIFIED;* PARTIMEN; POETIC CONTESTS; PREGUNTA; TENZONE. F.J.W.; E.M.

COMPUTER POETRY. A c. is not only a calculator; it is also a data-processing machine, which can manipulate symbols of any kind. That is, it can be programmed to "generate" graphics (line drawings), musical compositions, and verbal strings such as sentences.

Simply described, a c. poem is one or more sentences generated by a specially designed c. program. One current poetic aesthetic would identify as poetic a sentence such as the following: "What did she put four whistles beside heated rugs for?" Although this sentence is syntactically well formed, it violates some of the semantic rules which govern the combination of words in Eng. Any sentence which is well formed but which is difficult to interpret, or any pair or sequence of sentences whose logical connection is obscure is likely to be interpreted as poetry: "The old horse staggers along the road. Newspapers are on sale in Wall Street. The sun will set again this evening." Although the average reader of prose would consider the sequence incoherent, the reader of modern poetry, conditioned to allusive symbolism, will seek or invent relationships to create coherence from three such random utterances. The reader of Shakespeare, Milton, or Pope, however, would not have responded in the same manner because the poetry of earlier eras was governed by a logic of discourse similar to prose. Evidently, c. poetry is possible only in the age of the c., which happens to be an age that demands more logic from prose than from poetry. For this reason, c. prose is extremely difficult to produce.

C. poems are basically of two kinds: formula and derivative. Formula poems consist of strings of generated sentences. A c.-generated sentence at the simplest level is produced by means of a formula (sentence rule) like the following:

SENTENCE = NOUN + VERB + ADVERB

Each word-class in the formula is like a bin containing a pile of cards on each of which a word is written (e.g., VERB = scavenge, misplace, corrupt, vary, yawn). When the program runs, it is as if someone had picked the top card from each successive bin and arranged the words so drawn into a sequence. If three bins each contained five cards, according to the rule given above the following sentences would be generated: 1. Craters scavenge nervously; 2. Suits misplace wrongly; 3. Messiahs corrupt ably; 4. Sentiments vary never; 5. Graves yawn hungrily. It will be noticed that the sentences produced are of quite different orders of regularity: 3 is well formed, 2 is ill formed (misplace requires an object), 4 is inverted (never normally comes before the verb), both 5 and 1 are well formed but violate semantic rules (yawn and scavenge both require mammal or animate subjects) and 5 produces an acceptable metaphor, whereas 1 creates something like a nonsense metaphor. To generate more than five of the 625 possible sentences, it is necessary to return the cards to the bins after each use but without preserving the original order. Thus any word has the chance of being drawn during any pass and all combinations will eventually occur.

To create poetic objects by such a process, it is necessary only to devise a variety of sentence rules of greater complexity along with rules for combining them. In addition, it may be desirable to place such constraints on the output as length of line, meter, and rhyme—all of which are possible but difficult. Metrical constraints require the prior syllabification of each word and the location of its stress, if it is polysyllabic. To achieve rhyming, it is necessary to recode letter symbols into phonetic equivalents so that similar sounds rather than letter combinations may be matched, although the same can be achieved on a small scale by storing sets of rhyming words. This is easier in most other languages than in Eng.

The following stanzas result from a formulaary generation:

The landscape of your clay mitigates me.
Coldly,
By your recognizable shape,
I am wronged.

The perspective of your frog feeds me.
Dimly,
By your wet love,
I am raked.

(M. Borroff)

These two stanzas, resulting from two sentence rules and one stanza rule (Sentence 1 = Nominal + Prepositional phrase + Verb + Personal Pronoun; Sentence 2 = Adverb + Prepositional phrase + Pronoun + Passive verb; Stanza = Sentence 1, Sentence 2) display the unexpectedness of juxtaposition characteristic of this process. At the same time, the repetitive structure may undermine the poetic effect by betraying the mechanical originator. The most sophisticated efforts provide variety of structure along with unusual juxtapositions.

Although documentation is lacking, it is probable that c. poetry was invented simultaneously at various locations during the 1950's by engineers occupied in language tasks (such as machine translation) who relished the opportunity of engaging in complex word play. The earliest examples appear in the pages of technical journals and represent purely sporadic efforts at entertainment. During the following decade, these developments came to the attention of poets, critics, and scholars interested in poetry with some access to c. techniques and vocabulary. They have been interested both in the possibilities offered by this new tool and by the disturbing implications of its use: its apparently superhuman inventiveness and the inability of the reader to distinguish with certainty between the machine and the human product. At the same time, a curiosity about the discoveries made possible by such activity led to derivative c. poetry.

The basic principle of derivative c. poetry is to take an existing poem or line and to alter it in some systematic way. Hamlet's "To be or not to be, that is the question" might become "To speak or not to speak, that is the riddle," "To know or not to know, that is the struggle," etc. . . . If the line were not so well known, the identification of the original might be uncertain. The following stanza is based on one from Dylan Thomas's In the beginning and is the result of marking all the nouns, verbs, and adjectives in the original, arranging them in alphabetical order, and replacing them in the poem. The result is a set of stanzas containing only Thomas's own words yet evidently not his work. Some of the collocations are as unusual as his own. Although the question of which is better need not arise, it is noteworthy that, in a number of experiments, college students have usually failed to identify the original except by chance:

In the beginning was the root, the rock
That from the solid star of the smile
Set all the substance of the sun;
And from the secret space of the signature
The smile spouted up, translating to the stamp
Three-pointed sign of spark and spark.

Dylan Thomas more than most poets strove for the exceptional collocation, even at times using mechanical means to achieve it. According to a friend, Thomas recorded likely short ordinary words in a notebook he carried with him (and called his "dictionary") and which he would consult at random when he was at a loss for a word or phrase in a poem (see bibliog.: Milic, "Possible Usefulness . . .," p. 172). That it is difficult to distinguish between his own "rooting air," "secret oils," and "letters of the void" and the computer's "rooting imprint," "secret space," and "three-pointed sign of spark and spark" perhaps reveals less about c. poetry than about his. Because words have connections with each other in our minds, certain collocations are regularly inhibited even for poets, who are freer than the norm in this regard. The complete disregard of these inhibitions in c. poetry gives it both its fresh and its outrageous character.

Derivative c. poetry is a species of parody

when it is practiced on well-known lines. As such, it calls into question the inevitability of the original: "Spring is the nepenthean desert, scrambling . . .," "April is the vacuous land, inverting. . . ." T. S. Eliot acknowledged that some of the word combinations in parts of The Waste Land were incomprehensible to him. This kind of substitution is the active principle of a program called ERATO (by L. T. Milic), which is based on a dozen opening lines by poets of the last hundred years, each of which is provided with vocabulary alternatives for key words. Cummings's "Darling! because my blood can sing" can take many forms if only the noun and verb are altered: "my mouth [life, soul, spirit, heart, hand] can [wing, play, skip, chime, leap, laugh, jump]." Each poem in the series results from the choice of a number of the original lines in random order with key words permuted, the number of lines in each poem and the degree of repetition being determined by random numbers. One example follows:

HEMS

- (1) This is my news to the multitude:
- (2) Turn to me in the chaos of the day.
- (3) I have suspected what capricious maidens say,
- (4) I strutted upon a loathsome place,
- (5) Above the new hems of the sea.
- (6) I stopped upon a loathsome station,
- (7) Still here lying beneath the roof,
- (8) Above the humid hems of the surf.

The lines by E. Dickinson (1), C. Rossetti (2), Yeats (3), S. Crane (4,6), Hart Crane (5,8), and MacLeish (7), altered as they have been, constitute a new whole still somehow related to the originals. The relation of line (1) to Emily Dickinson's "This is my letter to the world" is that of paraphrase, but this is not true of lines (4) and (6) to their original, Stephen Crane's "I stood upon a high place." The grammatical structure, especially that conveyed by the choice and arrangement of function words, signals the kinship between derivations and originals. But the new collocations are unique, even when they depart from the original in predictable ways, as lines (5) and (8) plainly connect with Hart Crane's "Above the fresh ruffles of the surf" in the imagery of the edge of the sea as a garment. ERATO evidently produces new poems, even if only in the legal sense that the publisher has no need to seek permission from the owners of the copyright of the originating poets. (It is noteworthy that existing copyright laws protect only sequences of words, not structures or ideas.)

Needless to say, only a fraction of the output of a c. poetry program is displayed as poetry. Editing is inevitable, especially in view of the mountains of paper produced by the machine. Normal poems, however, also undergo a weeding or pruning process, though c. poetry is not edited by a c., but by a person. Editing poetry by c. is not beyond possibility if the criteria for poetic acceptability could be explicitly stated. This would be not unlike defining "good" poetry.

The peculiar affinity of computers and poetry is based on the previously noted tendency of the modern reader to puzzle out a sense in the obscurest work that is called poetry. The achievement of c. poetry is in the direction of providing a more accurate notion of the workings of poetry, and especially of poetic language. No important c. poems have been produced and none are likely, though one poet (A. Turner) has found inspiration enough in the RETURNER poems, which were based on an original work of hers, to write further poems based on the derivations. The inevitable question on this subject concerns the identity of the author of c. poetry. It is unquestionable that the poet is not the assemblage of wires, transistors, and print trains called a c. The poet is the programmer, whose ideas of what poetry ought to be, whose choice of structures and of vocabulary determine to a considerable extent what the finished product will be. The poem is both the actual verse object and the program, the abstract structure of instructions and data, of which the actual output is only the incidental product. C. poetry is a new way of producing the poetry of our time. If it should ever develop its own aesthetic and break away from the mainstream, it will become a new kind of poetry.

J. A. Baudot, La Machine à écrire (Montreal, 1964); Cybernetic Serendipity, ed. J. Reichardt (1969); M. Krause and G. F. Schaudt, C.-Lyrik (1969); M. Borroff, "C. as Poet," Yale Alumni Magazine, 34 (1971); L. T. Milic, "The Possible Usefulness of Poetry Generation," in The C. in Lit. and Linguistic Research (1971), Erato (1971) and "The 'Returner' Poetry Program," ITL (Institute of Applied Linguistics), 11 (1971); A. Turner, "'Returner' Re-turned," Midwest Quarterly, 13 (1972). L.T.M.

CONCRETE POETRY. A mode of graphic art, employing graphemes of a given language and selected typeface, used by themselves, in clusters, morphemes, words, or phrases, and so patterned that an evocative or witty reading of an otherwise minimal utterance may result. Alternatively, a mode of inscription poem—and hence vaguely linked to epigram—embodied totally and (imbedded irretrievably) in a unique typographical instance. In this aspect, c.p. is allied to its contemporary concept of musique concrète, in which the musical work—whether synthesized electronically, drawn directly (rather than recorded) on a cinema sound track, etc.—exists not as a text to be performed by an instrumental interpreter, but in a canonical and uninterpretable form. A self-conscious literary movement crystallized around the Constellations (1953) of the Swiss Eugen Gomringer. This volume contained minimal inscriptions of words in sanserif type, the words, perhaps significantly, being in various languages (an alienated Sprachgefühl being in some way characteristic of most c.p.). Gomringer claimed to be intensifying and authenticating linguistic experience by means of varied spatial presentations of words and other elements (a concern with reading as scanning that goes back to Mallarmé); and he and his followers have drawn elaborate and sometimes labored analogies between spatial, musical, and abstract conceptual patternings. An international movement, reminiscent in its many manifestos and group publications of futurist, surrealist and Dadaist (qq.v.) literary parties, has embraced practitioners in Brazil (the so-called Noigandres Group), France, England, the U.S., and other countries. The best known of these include Ian Hamilton Finlay (Great Britain), whose more recent inscriptions on wood or stone have fled the page entirely for the outdoors; Mary Ellen Solt (U.S.), a scholar of the movement; Augusto de Campos (Brazil), Helmut Heissenbüttel (Germany), Carlo Belloli (Italy), and Emmett Williams (U.S.).

Writers on the subject have distinguished among "type poems," "typewriter poems," "object poems," and so forth, and such sub- or related movements as Spatialisme or Lettrisme. A good rule of thumb for identifying a concrete poem might be to try and read the inscription aloud without describing the format (type style, graphic arrangement, etc.) as one might a print. A poem will yield up its heart to oral reading; if a concrete poem will not, it is because no picture will. Consider, for example, e.e. cummings' poem #1 from 95 Poems (1958):

l(a le af fa ll

s) one
l

iness

A haiku-like evaded simile is here so arranged that the vehicle is literally troped into the tenor (q.v.): "loneliness" contains the single leafall, its emblem (q.v.). This might have been done in a single horizontal line, but the vertical format graphically represents the dropping, enforces a slow scanning (and hence, reading), discovers hidden "ones" in the words (with graphic puns based on the identity of the 12th letter of the alphabet with the first arabic numeral in many typefaces), etc. Needless to say, this is more complex and sophisticated than many formal instances of c.p., and developed from cummings' lifelong experiments with format and its relation to poetic form.

There is some debate about how the many varieties of typographical experiment in modern European and Am. poetry constitute actual c.p. The shaped poems (arranged for the typewriter's one-em-per-character) of May Swenson's Iconographs (1970) and John Hollander's Types of Shape (1969) clearly belong to the tradition of the technopaignia or pattern poetry (q.v.) stretching from Hellenistic times through Apollinaire's Calligrammes;* in all these cases, the poems on being read aloud lose only the accompanying pictorial emblem made up by their shaping. More direct precursors of c.p. are: Mallarmé's Un Coup de Dés; Christian Morgenstern's Fisches Nachtgesang (composed of the metrical signs "U" and "—", so arranged as to suggest a gaping fish-mouth); the experiments of Henri Barzun; the poster-like texts of the futurists and of such Dada poets as Richard Huelsenbeck; Valéry's inscriptions for the façade of the Trocadero, etc. Then, too, there was the entire typographic ambience of modernist art, including the aesthetics of the Bauhaus, and the specific work of such designers as Jan Tschichold (in his Typographische Gestaltung, 1935). A recent and brilliant development in the area of pictured inscription has been the great graphic artist Saul Steinberg's conceptual maps, wherein groups of related pronouns, auxiliary verbs in different tenses, etc. are diagrammed out in a painted and drawn landscape, in such a way as to depict and schematize their relationship.

ANTHOLOGIES: Anthol. of C.P., ed. E. Williams (1967); C.P.: A World View, ed. M. E. Solt (2d ed., 1970); Imaged Word & Worded Images, ed. R. Kostelanetz (1970); The Word as Image, ed. B. Bowler (1970); Kon-krete Poesie, ed. E. Gomringer (1972).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Leide, Dichtung als Spiel (1963); M. Weaver, "C.P.," Lugano Review, nos. 5-6 (1966); E. Lucie-Smith, "C.P.," Encounter, 26 (1966); R. P. Draper, "C.P.," NLH, 2 (1971). J.H.

CONFESSIONAL POETRY. See AMERICAN POETIC SCHOOLS AND TECHNIQUES (CONTEMPORARY).*

CONFESSIONAL POETRY-CONTEXTUALISM

CONTEXTUALISM. The name now commonly used to describe certain critical doctrines of the new criticism and of later theoretical developments made in sympathy with new critical attitudes. The term c. can be a misleading description for these doctrines, inasmuch as there are ambiguities in it which permit it to be applied to various literary theories.

Critics have thought of themselves as contextualists who have maintained doctrines far from those of the new criticism. For example, it has always seemed appropriate to use this term to characterize those who see literature within its social context; that is, those who see a continuity of meaning flowing between the literary work and its surroundings. For such critics, all interpretation treats meaning as a function of a language that is an expression of its cultural moment. Thus the context which gives each word its meaning is seen as that total cultural-personal situation which defines and limits that word's function. Stephen C. Pepper himself termed such a theory "contextualist," though his model for it was Deweyan and instrumentalist, and not at all new critical. (See Aesthetic Quality: A Contextualistic Theory of Beauty [1938] and his later works.) Of course, the biographical critic could, similarly, see himself as a contextualist who treats each meaning within a continuity that flows among all the works of a poet as a function of his sensibility and vision, as these feed and frame those works. Or the archetypal critic could be a contextualist working from a continuity among all works of the human imagination seen as a single structure expressing a monomyth. And so the applications could go on to other methods of criticism. In each case the critic would see his interpretation controlled by, and referring to, an autonomous context made up of the continuities between the poem and the particular world of meanings of which it is a function. Indeed, we could claim that each critic's approach can be defined as we discover what constitutes the context of the work for him—which is to say, as we discover what sort of contextualist he is.

Clearly, what is today termed c. is more narrowly and exclusively defined. It refers to critics for whom the verbal structure of the properly literary work itself becomes the autonomous context that generates meanings which become self-referential. Such critics see the work as beginning with "old words" that become transformed into Mallarmé's "new word," a "total" word whose definition is provided by the internal relations of the work itself, and nowhere else. Unlike other contextualisms, which emphasize the continuity between the work and the extramural elements that determine its context, this c. begins with the need to establish the discontinuity of the work's intramural structure, its independence of all extrapoetic discourse. It assumes that the work, when it is constructed to function as a proper poem ought to, has provided such a structure.

C. has been used in this limited way since the term was taken from Murray Krieger's The New Apologists for Poetry (1956) and more broadly applied, as if to a school of critics (see the articles by Walter Sutton in the bibliog.). Krieger's use of the term was largely fashioned after Cleanth Brooks's sense of context in The Well Wrought Urn (1947). And Brooks, like Krieger's teacher, Eliseo Vivas, followed upon the work of the early I. A. Richards (from Principles of Literary Criticism [1924] to The Philosophy of Rhetoric [1936]). Richards distinguished poetry from science by employing the opposition between emotive and referential discourse. In science the verbal signs, with fixed and single meanings, were to reach out of their discourse to point to their objects; the efficacy of the discourse was tested by the accuracy of that pointing. In poetry such reference was to be blocked by the multiplication of ironic complexities which were meant to feed an emotion-seeking rather than a knowledge-seeking occasion. Brooks, shaking off what he saw as Richards' commitment to behavioral psychologism, extended his interest in complexity by conceiving of an objective poetic context, whose dramatic structure was controlled by cross-referential ironies and paradoxes: the referential-emotive dichotomy was transformed into a referential-contextual dichotomy. Poetry was defined by its capacity—through its juxtapositions of words—to generate new meanings out of old as it remade language into the unique structure composed of "the right words in the right order," as Eliot had put it.

Although Brooks had failed to do so, it had to be pointed out, by way of concession, that it was theoretically naive to claim that only poetry was contextual, that in nonpoetry signs "do not change under the pressure of context" but are "pure denotations" which "are defined in advance." Instead, all language must of course be seen as contextual; this is why there are so many possible kinds of c. But the post-new-critical contextualist still can claim that a poem is discontinuous with other forms of discourse, in that only its meaning is radically untranslatable, since that meaning is an immanent and hence inseparable feature of the poem's actual verbal configuration.

The contextualist has come a long way from Richards' subjectivism. By the time he came to The Philosophy of Rhetoric, Richards himself had turned toward the sort of c. which Brooks was to practice. But the earlier Richards had begun by limiting himself to one or another subjective experience of the poem, either from the poet's side or the reader's. He could not postulate a normative poetic context which was to be a transformation of the contexts active in either the poet's or the reader's experiences of the words prior to encountering them in the poem. For the contextualist, however, the reading of the poem must be more than the interaction of these two subjective contexts, the poet's and the reader's: the meanings of the poem cannot be reduced to either of them. The reader is rather seen to discover, in the interrelations among the features of the work, those transformations of recognizable elements which create a new and sovereign context—out there. He recognizes these elements from his own experiences in language prior to this poem, and from what his research leads him to discover about the poet's original range of contextual elements of meaning. But, as his habits of reading poems lead to his discovery of a context of transformed elements, the reader permits himself to be overcome by it, surrendering his own contexts to it. The poet has probably done much the same with his contexts while creating the poem as his completed object. In this manner—a manner consistent with Vivas' definition of aesthetic experience as "intransitive"—the context in the poem comes to be the controlling one, working to enclose the reader within his experience of the enrapturing aesthetic object. It must end by changing and enlarging his contexts (as they preexisted this poem) by imposing its own, thus making possible his education: it leads him out of himself by leading him into the fuller world of the poem.

As one would expect, such a critical doctrine must meet with wide opposition. Its claim about the poem's discontinuity with other discourse, the completeness of its contextual system, rests on the postulation of an ideal object. Such an object may seem to many to lie beyond the incompleteness of our actual experiences of poems and the imperfections of poems themselves if they should seek to seal themselves off. In their more candid moments one senses in contextualists a tension between the completed object they must heuristically postulate and their doubts that they can experience it in that wholeness. They know how they must allow the language of poetic discourse to function, and they fear for the limits of their own capacities to sustain so self-sufficient a language experience. Those who deny the power of poems to function as c. requires (see Walter Sutton in the bibliog.) simply assert the continuity of our actual language experience without seeing any need to create an ideal, discontinuous object which can direct and educate that experience. On his side, the contextualist will not forfeit the poem's chance to transform language—and its capacity to transform us.

I. A. Richards, Principles of Lit. Crit. (1924) and The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936); S. C. Pepper, Aesthetic Quality: A Contextualistic Theory of Beauty (1938) and "The Development of Contextualistic Aesthetics," Antioch Rev., 28 (1968); E. Vivas, "A Definition of the Esthetic Experience," Jour. of Philosophy, 34 (1937) and "C. Reconsidered," JAAC, 18 (1959); C. Brooks, "The Heresy of Paraphrase," The Well Wrought Urn (1947); M. Krieger, The New Apologists for Poetry (1956) and The Play and Place of Crit. (1967); W. Sutton, "The Contextualist Dilemma—or Fallacy?" JAAC, 17 (1958) and "Contextualist Theory and Crit. as a Social Act," JAAC, 19 (1961). M.K.

D

DIONYSIAN. See APOLLONIAN-DIONYSIAN.

E

ESEMPLASTIC. Coleridge (Biographia Literaria, ch. 10) coined the word ("to shape into one") "because, having to convey a new sense,

I thought that a new term would both aid the recollection of my meaning, and prevent its being confounded with the usual import of the word, imagination." Imaginatio, that is, connoted passive reception of image-impressions, and Coleridge wished to emphasize active creativity. Considering, as he did, the imagination to be "a repetition in the finite mind of the eternal act of creation in the infinite I AM" (ibid., ch. 13), he sought for metaphors to express this act. Among these the shaping or plastic power is perhaps most characteristic, and unity ("to shape into one") is the end that creation seeks. Thus in a famous illustration of imaginative power from Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis the poet achieves unity-in-variety, or "the liveliest image of succession with the feeling of simultaneousness" (ibid., ch. 15). In his early poem The Eolian Harp Coleridge describes organic unity-in-variety and the plastic power that achieves it:

And what if all of animated nature
Be but organic Harps diversely fram'd,
That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweeps
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze,
At once the Soul of each, and God of all?

S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, ed. J. Shawcross (2 v., 1907); B. Willey, Nineteenth Century Studies (1949, pp. 13ff). R.H.F.

F

FILID (pl. fili). See IRISH POETRY. Early period.

FORMALISM, RUSSIAN. See RUSSIAN FORMALISM.

G

GENERATIVE METRICS is a term used to refer to several forms of metrical theory or linguistic prosody that emerged in the middle 1960's and early 1970's as a kind of off-shoot or by-product of transformational generative linguistic theory. (See LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, to which this entry may be regarded as a supplement. See also METER and PROSODY.) The common aim of these various theories was an attempt to state descriptive "rules" of meter which would "account for" what is felt to be the "metricality" (cf. "grammaticality" in linguistic theory) of the great majority of metered lines of verse in a language, and which would include and explain those phenomena which in earlier theories had to be listed as unexplained "exceptions." Thus, for example, most varieties of g.m. account automatically for the phenomenon of initial trochees in Eng. iambic verse, whereas this phenomenon remains unexplained (i.e., must be listed as an "exception") in a "foot theory" which says that a line of iambic verse is a sequence of so many iambic feet, each of which consists of two syllables, the second of which is more accented than the first. The foot theory then has to recognize that in fact there are many (intuitively metrical) iambic lines that contain trochees, but it has no explanation why these trochees occur more often than not at the beginning of lines.

Thus it may be correct to regard g.m. as a more rigorous form of metrical theory than any that had been attempted before, just as it might be correct to say that transformational-generative linguistic theory was a more rigorous attempt to account for grammatical utterances in a language, and to distinguish between grammatical and ungrammatical ones. Both employ (and in a sense, are made possible by) the formalism of some aspects of modern mathematics. The parallelism may in some sense be extended to the set of base rules and transformations which in a generative grammar may be thought of as "generating" utterances; the metrical rules may be thought of as "generating" metrical lines of poetry. The rules of a generative grammar assign a "structural description" to a sentence; the rules of a generative metric do the same for a line of verse. The rules of the grammar are at least partially ordered; the metrical rules, being in essence rules which are "plugged in" or inserted after some contiguous bank of phonological rules in the grammar, adhere also to the ordering principle. Finally, those who have done the initial explorations in g.m. are linguists brought up in, or working in, the transformational-generative tradition.

The immediate source of g.m. was a study of Chaucer's meter by Morris Halle and Samuel Jay Keyser in 1966. Here a theory of meter was advanced (specifically, a theory of iambic pentameter) which held that a verse line should be conceived of essentially as a sequence of positions—10, in the case of iambic pentameter—where the odd positions were characterized as Weak, and the even positions as Strong. A stress maximum may not occur in a weak position. The stress maximum is defined as a linguistically assigned stress greater than that found on either adjacent syllable without intervening juncture. Conditions for occupancy of a position by more than one syllable (i.e., phenomena such as synaeresis, synaloepha, qq.v.) are also provided, as is the condition for zero occupancy (the beheaded line; see ACEPHALOUS).

The striking features of the Halle-Keyser system were the concept of the stress maximum and the conception of the line as a sequence of positions (not, that is, as a collection of feet). Such a theory would accept as metrical various configurations of stresses and syllabic disposition which one finds in well-known lines of iambic pentameter (e.g., "Silent, upon a péak in Dárien," where there are only three linguistically assigned stresses, in positions 1, 6, and 8), while rejecting as unmetrical such a line as "How many bards gild the lápes of time," with its stress maximum in position 7. It is important to note that the concept of stress is not a phonetic one, but a phonological one, and the theory is therefore in no direct sense dependent upon performance. Note also that the phrase "linguistically assigned" implies a system of grammar, a set of rules, that does assign stress to certain syllables of words, and to certain syllables within phrases, and that "greater than" (that found on adjacent syllables) implies that a final utterance will exhibit various stress levels, and that it is relativity of stress level that counts. To illustrate the foregoing sentences, a reader might place actual (i.e., phonetic) stress on the second syllable of the line "Whenever Richard Cory went down town," but a particular phonological system may not assign stress to adverbs of the type represented by "whenever" and this syllable would therefore not constitute a stress maximum, no matter how it is read.

As the original theory underwent elaboration, chiefly at the hands of those attempting to use it for stylistic analysis, certain problems presented themselves. Central among these was the discovery of a good many intuitively metrical lines where stress maxima did occur in odd position, by virtue of certain phrasal stress rules, notably the rule that assigns greater stress to the rightmost member within a syntactic unit (called by Chomsky and Halle the "Nuclear Stress Rule"). Thus in "So let the blue lump poise between my knees," greater linguistically assigned stress is found on "lump" than on either "blue" or "poise," which would establish a stress maximum in position 5. Accordingly, it was necessary either to revise the metrical theory, or to revise the phonological component of the grammar to account for such deviant stress patterns. Halle and Keyser chose the first course, and weakened the theory so that the notion of relative stress (though introduced by the phonological component of the grammar) does not figure in the metrical rules; in short, the notion "greater than" is eliminated, and stress maximum is redefined as major word stress occurring between two unstressed syllables. Beaver, who first pointed out the problem, chose the second course, and proposed that forms of rhythm-adjustment rules, much as his "stress exchange rule," should be introduced directly into the phonological component of the grammar.

Applications of g.m. to other meters than iambic pentameter have not received very full investigation. It would appear that necessary adaptations of the theory would be minor technical ones, such as that Weak and Strong would be assigned to even and odd in trochaic structures, etc. But difficulties do arise, and some of Hascall's work on triple meters suggests that the matter may not be quite that simple. As for older metrical forms, Keyser advanced a theory of Old Eng. prosody in a 1969 study in CE.

Acquaintance with the theory of g.m. spread rather quickly, and interesting work was done by Jacqueline Guéron in France (on Eng. nursery rhymes), and by Walter Bernhart in Germany. Applications to stylistics was an obvious development, and such works as those by Freeman, Beaver, and others witness to the vitality of the g.m. approach.

For historical purposes, it should be noted that adumbrations of g.m. appear in earlier metricists. Otto Jespersen had in 1903 theorized that the "foot" concept was untenable, and had offered a systematic explanation of the phenomenon of reversed initial feet in iambic meters. The notion of the verse line as a sequence of positions (rather than a sequence of feet) appeared over two centuries ago in Edward Bysshe, The Art of Poetry (1737).

Another system of metrics developing about the same time as that evolved by Halle, Keyser, Beaver, and others meets the general definition given earlier of g.m., and therefore will be touched upon briefly here, even though in some respects it differs markedly from the approach already described. Karl Magnuson and Frank Ryder, working originally in German poetry, advanced a metrical system which might be called a "Distinctive Feature" theory.

Magnuson and Ryder theorize that a syllable may be considered as a bundle of four features which figure in the realization of more and less metrical lines: $[\pm\text{Strong}]$, $[\pm\text{Weak}]$, $[\pm\text{Word Onset}]$, and $[\pm\text{Pre-Strong}]$. A syllable is $[\pm\text{Strong}]$ if it receives lexical stress assignment, or if it is the accented syllable of a non-lexical polysyllabic. A syllable is $[\pm\text{Word Onset}]$ just in case it begins a word. A syllable is $[\pm\text{Pre-Strong}]$ if it occurs anywhere in a word before a $[\pm\text{Strong}]$ syllable. The feature $[\pm\text{Weak}]$ is made necessary by the different metrical behavior in German of suffixes based on $-i$ and $-u$ ($-isch$, $-ung$, etc.) from those based on $-a$ and $-ei$ ($-sam$, $-heit$, etc.). The former are designated $[\pm\text{Weak}]$, the latter $[\pm\text{Pre-Strong}]$. This feature is carried over into English in a somewhat different manner: $[\pm\text{Weak}]$ is assigned to monosyllabic nonlexical words, all unstressed syllables of polysyllabics, and, in addition, to stressed syllables of non-lexical polysyllabics (e.g., the first syllable in many will be both $[\pm\text{Strong}]$ and $[\pm\text{Weak}]$).

Now the central assumption of the Magnuson-Ryder metric is that there exists an "Expectation Matrix," an ideal combination of features for an even (strong) metrical position and an ideal combination, or syllable type for an odd (or weak) metrical position:

| | Even | Odd |
|-----------------|-------------|------------|
| WO (Word Onset) | + | — |
| WK (Weak) | — | + |
| ST (Strong) | + | — |
| PS (Pre-Strong) | — | + |

Since the expectation matrix can never be fulfilled completely, it follows that one must assume all poetry to be unmetrical in some degree, and the task of prosody is to find the constraints upon the conditions under which a feature may occur in a nonaffirming relation to the matrix. These constraints are the Base Rules. The rules deal with relations between metrical slots: between even-odd, odd-even, even-even, and odd-odd. It is found that the even-odd relationship is "more highly governed" than any other—constraints must always be placed on occurrences in this relationship but not necessarily in the other relationships. The discovery of the rules is the goal of this metric, for within these will be found, if any, all the discriminating features of degrees of metricality that we may expect in an author, a period, or whatever provides the corpus. The prosodist tabulates all the sequences of occurring and nonoccurring syllable types in the corpus under investigation, and then deduces the rules from this data.

According to Frank Ryder, the distinctive feature metric has historical origins as far back as Philip von Zesen, a 17th-c. German poet. An especially interesting aspect of the theory, as elaborated by Magnuson and Ryder, is that the use of the feature Word Onset amounts to the claim—unique in current Eng. prosody, so far as this writer knows—that placement of word boundary is an essential element in Eng. versification.

M. Halle and S. J. Keyser, "Chaucer and the Study of Prosody," CE, 28 (1966), "Illustration and Defense of a Theory of the Iambic Pentameter," CE, 33 (1971), Eng. Stress. Its Form, Its Growth, and Its Role in Verse (1971); J. C. Beaver, "A Grammar of Prosody," CE, 29 (1968), "Contrastive Stress and Metered Verse," Language and Style, 2 (1969), "The Rules of Stress in Eng. Verse," Language, 47 (1971), "Current Metrical Issues," CE, 33 (1971), review of Halle and Keyser, Eng. Stress, in Language Sciences, 18 (1971); D. C. Freeman, "On the Primes of Metrical Style," Language and Style, 1 (1968), "Metrical Position Constituency and G.M.," Language and Style, 2 (1969); D. Hascall, "Some Contributions to the Halle-Keyser Theory of Prosody," CE, 30 (1969); K. Magnuson and F. Ryder, "The Study of Eng. Prosody: An Alternative Proposal," CE, 31 (1970), "Second Thoughts on Eng. Prosody," CE, 33 (1971); J. Maling, "Sentence Stress in Old. Eng.," Linguistic Inquiry, 2 (1971); J. Roubaud, "Mètre et vers: Deux applications de la métrique générative de Halle-Keyser," Poétique, revue de théorie et d'analyse littéraires, 7 (1971); "G.M.," special issue of Poetics, no. 11 (1974); articles by J. C. Beaver, A. W. Bernhart, J. Guéron, D. L. Hascall, W. Klein, K. Magnuson).

J.C.B.

GENERIC RHYME. See CELTIC PROSODY.

GENEVA SCHOOL, THE. The G.S. of literary criticism brings together a group of critics with varying ties to Geneva. They are united by friendship and by a common vision of literature as a network of existential expressions combining in the work to delineate the figure of an individual artistic consciousness. Marcel Raymond and Albert Béguin, the earliest members of the school, and Jean Starobinski and Jean Rousset are all directly associated with the University of Geneva; Georges Poulet, born a Belgian, taught in Switzerland for many years and was directly influenced by Raymond; Jean-Pierre Richard, a Frenchman, and J. Hillis Miller, an American, both recognize Poulet's influence on their own work. This G.S. should not be confused with an earlier G.S. of linguistic theory associated with Ferdinand de Saussure, Charles Bally, and Albert Sechehaye. Although the second G.S. is aware of and has commented on Saussure's work, the roots of their literary criticism lie not in structural linguistics but in existential and phenomenological theory (Husserl, Jaspers, and Bachelard), in the romantic tradition, in a certain academic historicism (A. O. Lovejoy), and in Bergson's analyses of perception of time.

While the Geneva critics develop highly individual critiques, they hold basically to the same philosophy of artistic creation. Reacting against "objective" views of a work (whether that of continental scholarship or Am. new criticism), they still rely exclusively on the written text as evidence. The poem must not be seen as an object, however; it is the structural record of an individual human consciousness. The author cannot be reached as an historical being, but the critic can analyze the tracery of interlocking terms left in the work, and deduce from there a pattern of individual consciousness which is no less human for being artistically created. There are many methods for arriving at this pattern of consciousness: words indicating perception of space and time can be extrapolated and juxtaposed; recurrent types of experience can be compared and followed through the text; these perceptions and experiences themselves can be seen from a more subjective (Cartesian) point of view or in an object-centered vision. Since the Geneva critics believe that literature expresses an author's attempt to formulate and cope with his experience, they often link these patterns of consciousness with larger metaphysical problems: with an awareness of true presence (Poulet), of divinity (Béguin) or an immanent reality (Miller), and of the precarious viability of expressive forms themselves (Starobinski, Miller, Rousset). A basic metaphor is that of an inner mental space, an initial void from which consciousness emerges to plot the characteristic architecture of its experience.

The Geneva critics see literature as a structure of consciousness, and therefore consider the proper poetic response an act of sympathetic reading. The reader tries to efface his own presuppositions, and awaits a "signal" from the work that will direct him to penetrate its structure from a given angle. Evidently, the poem as consciousness surpasses any one attempt to plot its coordinates; each reader finds his own way into the work, and uses each time a slightly different avenue of penetration. Since the properly literary act is a meeting of minds, there can be no judgment or evaluation according to exterior criteria be they aesthetic, psychological, sociological, or political. Again, since the critic aims at communicating with an embodied textual consciousness, he need not limit himself to separate works. Georges Poulet and Jean-Pierre Richard prefer to draw upon an author's complete works to establish his cogito, while Rousset and Miller treat individual works as well. The Geneva critics have been criticized for not keeping to the objective structures of separate texts, and for going beyond acceptable boundaries of linguistic interpretation. It is true that their analysis of the individual creative imagination can apply also to other media, and Starobinski and Rousset have written on artistic and architectural form. Only Miller regularly equates forms of perception with structures of syntax. Miller's example shows that Geneva criticism can apply to linguistic structures, and that the real distinction lies not here but in the school's assumption of an individual consciousness available in an authentically personal expression. Those who see literature as an objective pattern of greater or lesser beauty, or as an impersonal construction of language determined by transindividual coordinates, will not agree with Geneva criticism.

There is a surprising variety of methods inside the G.S. Marcel Raymond and Albert Béguin retain a traditional historical framework for their analyses of spiritual careers in Fr. symbolist and German romantic poetry. Béguin later limited his sympathetic readings to a decreasing circle of Catholic authors. Georges Poulet, the first to propose a complete methodological approach and the main figure of the modern G.S., plots with subtlety and encyclopedic knowledge the temporal and spatial coordinates of the developing creative consciousness in an author's work. Poulet envisages histories of artistic consciousness, in which he would include the works of gifted critics. In contrast with Poulet's Cartesian orientation, and like Gaston Bachelard, Jean-Pierre Richard stresses the pattern of metamorphosed objects appearing in the text's mental universe. Jean Starobinski, trained in medicine as well as in literature, is a versatile critic who describes processes of the creative imagination in art, literature, and illness. His colleague Jean Rousset is especially interested in transformations of style, and the structures of consciousness he perceives in a work are more formal and less personal than those of the other European Geneva critics. Hillis Miller blends the objective traditions of Am. new criticism with the Geneva interest in spiritual careers; like Poulet and Starobinski, Miller in his later work embarks on the criticism of criticism. Poulet, Starobinski, Rousset, and Miller locate their individual critiques inside the framework of a changing history of consciousness.

Later developments in the G.S. point to an increasing awareness of other modes of criticism, and of the work's relationship to the society from which it springs. Unchanging, however, is the group's primary attachment to patterns of individual consciousness, and to the concept of literature as an intersubjective experience fully realized only in the act of reading.

M. Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933); Genies de France (1942), Senancour, sensations et révélations (1965); A. Béguin, L'Ame romantique et le rêve (1937), Balzac visionnaire (1946), Pascal par lui-même (1952); G. Poulet, Etudes sur le temps humain I-IV (1949-1968), L'Espace proustien (1963), La Conscience critique (1971); J. Rousset, La Littérature de l'âge baroque en France (1953), Forme et signification (1962), L'Intérieur et l'extérieur (1968); J.-P. Richard, Poésie et profondeur (1955), L'Univers imaginaire de Mallarmé (1961), Onze Etudes sur la poésie moderne (1964), Etudes sur le romantisme (1970); J. Starobinski, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, la transparence et l'obstacle (1957, enl. ed., 1971), L'Oeil vivant I-II (1961, 1970), L'Invention de la liberté (1964); J. H. Miller, Charles Dickens, The World of His Novels (1958), Poets of Reality (1965), The Form of Victorian Fiction (1968), Thomas Hardy, Distance and Desire (1970); S. N. LaWall, Critics of Consciousness: The Existential Structures of Lit. (1968); J. H. Miller, "The Geneva School," Modern Fr. Crit., ed. J. K. Simon (1972).

S.N.L.

H

HARLEM RENAISSANCE. Extending roughly from the end of World War I to the onset of the Depression, the literary movement known as the H.R. represented a startling burst of creativity among Am. black writers. Most of the principal figures of the movement—Claude McKay, Jean Toomer, Langston Hughes, and Countee Cullen—were poets, and it was in the verse of the H.R. that the "New Negro" most emphatically announced his arrival. The spirit of this poetry is perhaps best exemplified in Hughes's 1926 declaration that the younger black writers "now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame."

As its name indicates, the movement was centered in New York's Harlem, swollen by the Great Migration of southern blacks into a "Negro capital," a cultural hub which attracted the young artists and intellectuals who made the Renaissance. A new stage in Am. black consciousness was evident. The experience of the war rendered many blacks less willing than ever to tolerate white racism, and the violence of postwar anti-black feeling only hardened this resolve. Moral leadership had passed from Booker T. Washington to W.E.B. DuBois, and the aims of black awareness were furthered by such organizations as the NAACP, the National Urban League, and the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History. The Universal Negro Improvement Association, founded by Marcus Garvey "to promote the spirit of race pride and love," was short-lived but very influential on the writings of the H.R.

One result of the new consciousness was a great increase in publishing opportunities for black writers. Some of the work of the H.R. writers appeared in recently launched black periodicals—e.g., the NAACP's Crisis (1910) and the Urban League's Opportunity (1923). Such established publishing houses as Knopf and Harper's recognized that there was a growing white audience for works about black life (especially when presented as the embodiment of the uninhibited sensibility popularized by the Jazz Age). Moreover, the new movements in Am. poetry associated with Poetry magazine—free verse, imagism (qq.v.), and other breaks with tradition—provided a hospitable environment for much new black writing.

The poetry of the H.R. was different in both manner and matter from the tradition of Am. black verse that had extended from Phillis Wheatley to Paul Laurence Dunbar. Most of the H.R. poets, with the major exception of Countee Cullen, made use of a markedly modernistic style: they not only took advantage of the latest formal innovations in verse, but also mined their own resources of blues and jazz, folk speech, and jive talk. The content of this poetry—stressing black pride and bold protests of racism and social injustice—also represented a new emphasis. Claude McKay's sonnet If We Must Die, published during the race riots of the Red Summer of 1919, crystallized the new consciousness in its final couplet: "Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,/ Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back!" The H.R. poets declared a kinship with blacks world-wide, sometimes expressing nostalgia for the lost African past, as in Cullen's Heritage. But they also presented realistic pictures of Am. black life from cane fields to Pullman porters' closets to Harlem cabarets, and they affirmed and celebrated their Am. folk tradition. For example, James Weldon Johnson, who had earlier praised the "black and unknown bards" who created the spirituals (q.v.), now turned the folk art of the black sermon into the literary art of his God's Trombones (1927).

Johnson—like DuBois, William Stanley Braithwaite, and, above all, Alain Leroy Locke—served as critic and mentor for many of the H.R. poets, and his 1922 anthology, The Book of Am. Negro Poetry, helped to introduce one of the movement's most important figures: Claude McKay (1890–1948). McKay was born in Jamaica and had already published dialect poetry there before coming to the United States. Spring in New Hampshire (1920) and Harlem Shadows (1922) present his major themes of militant protest and earthy lyricism. Another of the movement's major figures, Jean Toomer (1894–1967), published an extraordinary and influential collection of poetry and poetic prose in Cane (1923). But Toomer did not want to be labeled a "Negro" poet, and his subsequent (and somewhat disappointing) work stands apart from the H.R. By his own request, none of his poetry appeared in the 1931 edition of Johnson's anthology.

Langston Hughes (1902–67), who outlasted the Renaissance to become the "poet laureate" of black America, demonstrates a feeling for folk expression, folk speech, and folk music in The Weary Blues (1926) and Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), and was especially successful in his poetic adaptations of jazz and blues. On the other hand, Countee Cullen (1903–46) wrote a much more personal and conventional kind of poetry, represented in Color (1925), Copper Sun (1927), and The Black Christ (1929). Cullen's devotion to Victorian models of scansion and diction won him great respect among the major Am. critics of the 1920's, but rendered his style atypical of the H.R.

Many lesser-known poets also contributed to the sense of achievement of the H.R. Arna Bontemps, whose H.R. poems were not collected in a volume, displayed a profound philosophical and historical vision in Nocturne at Bethesda. Waring Cuney and Frank Horne presented in their work intensely personal perceptions of the black experience. And Sterling Brown, in even purer accents than Hughes, speaks with the voice of the folk Negro in such poems as Southern Road and Long Gone.

Among the women poets of the H.R., Jessie Faust and Georgia Douglas Johnson occupied themselves primarily with issues of love and the loss of love, and the concerns of the female sensibility. Anne Spencer presented more tough-minded, less subjectively romantic versions of these same themes. By contrast, Gwendolyn Bennett and Helene Johnson eschewed a specifically feminine point of view in poems imbued with black pride.

There can be no question that the H.R. was a poetic success. The distance marked by black poets in the 1920's may be measured by the two editions of Johnson's The Book of Am. Negro Poetry. Between the two editions of 1922 and 1931 there was a great burgeoning of talent: among the poets who emerged during this interval, and whose work appears in the later edition, are Cullen, Hughes, Bontemps, Horne, Cuney, and Helene Johnson. Not until the 1960's was there to be so much poetic activity and achievement by Am. black writers (see BLACK POETRY, RECENT).

Despite the charges which have been leveled at the H.R.—superficiality, lack of concern for ordinary folk and real issues, and failure to realize the potential for long-term cultural and artistic development of black people—it represents a coming of age for black Am. poetry. The H.R. liberated black expression and produced some classic figures and an enduring body of poetry. Almost all of what has come after builds on the new consciousness and literary foundations established by these poets of the H.R.

A. Gayle, Jr., "The H.R.: Toward a Black Aesthetic," Midcontinent Am. Studies Journal, 11 (1970); ["The H.R. Issue,"] Black World, 19 (1970); N. I. Huggins, The H.R. (1971); The H.R. Remembered, ed. A. Bontemps (1972); "Intro." to Afro-Am. Writing (part 3), ed. R. A. Long and E. Collier, II (1972); Modern Black Poets: A Collection of Crit. Essays, ed. D. B. Gibson (1973); J. Wagner, Black Poets of the U.S.: From Paul Laurence Dunbar to Langston Hughes, tr. K. Douglas (1973).

R.A.L.; G.T.H.

HAUSA POETRY. For the Hausa people of West Africa an essential feature of poetry (wāk'a, poem, song) is that it should have a tune. Prosodic features, such as quantitative meter, rhyme, and either couplet or 5-line stanza form, distinguish poetry from other forms of wāk'a, e.g., the songs of Mamman Shata, where normally they do not occur. Drumming is normal for popular song, but not for the sung or chanted poetry with religious and social themes.

Apart from folksong, the main pre-Islamic source for H.p. is praise-singing (kirāri), but the Islamic jihād (holy war) of Sheikh Usumanu dan Fodio in the early 19th c. introduced new themes and prosodic forms. To encourage the spread of his reforming message, the Sheikh experimented with the vernacular instead of Arabic. He and his children and successors first used their native Fula, and, later and increasingly, H. in order that their Islamic teaching should reach the common people. Of the sixteen classical Arabic meters, H. uses about twelve, including all of the common ones. H. poets are not usually conversant with the analytic terminology of Arabic prosody, but they have adhered fairly strictly to the patterns.

Thus, in his comic poem about a mālam's (scholar) experience with a bicycle, Aliyu Na Mangi, a popular modern poet, uses a wāfir (abundant) trimeter catalectic, e.g.,

zama zamaninsu ne aka zo da faifa ku'di ba masu nauyaya aljihu ba because in their day paper money was introduced not heavy for the pocket.

But a small number of purely H. deviations are often allowed so long as they do not obscure the fundamental rhythm.

The main themes of the poetry of Sheikh Usumanu and his immediate successors were: praise of the Prophet, correct Muslim doctrine, threats of hellfire and promises of Paradise, and Islamic law. Legitimization of the Fulani political order established by the jihād was also an important part of the message, but sometimes a H. poet like Muhammadu Birnin Gwari (ca. 1880) would write verse to express the opinions of H. subjects rather than those of the Fulani rulers. After the British occupation in 1903, the resentment felt against the new rulers appeared, somewhat disguised, in poetry, as, for example, in that of Aliyu dan Sidi, Emir of Zaria, who was deposed by the British in 1920. These poems, and many by less famous poets, survive in manuscripts written in ajami (Arabic script). One, the Bagauda, which contains an account of the pre-Islamic rulers of Kano and which has been attributed to Shehu Na Salga, has been translated and edited by M. Hiskett (see bibliog.). However, with the slow spread of Western education and ideas and the emergence of a new elite, first from Katsina College and later from many new schools, themes have multiplied and developed, while poetic form has remained largely unchanged. H. poets received impetus especially from the "introduction of politics" in the years between 1945 and Independence (1960) and, more recently, from the Civil War. Since the 1930's, too, poetry, previously conveyed through the memories of men or in ajami, has appeared more and more in roman script and in print, either in the newspaper Gaskiya Ta Fi Kwabo (began 1939) or in booklets emanating from the publishing center of Zaria. It is through these media and, increasingly, the radio that modern H. poets—such as Aliyu Na Mangi, Mu'azu Ha'deja, Sa'ad Zungur, Mudi Sipikin, Ak'ilu Aliyu, Salihu Kontagora, Na'ibi Wali, and many others—are becoming better known.

Modern poets have added contemporary themes, both social and political, of a communal nature. The personal, lyric note is rare, and when it occurs it is seldom passed on.

However, in praise and satire the poet's feelings often shine through, as in Na Mangi's Imfiraji (Comfort), a long poem with many hundreds of verses. Where he is praising the Prophet, he sometimes sounds a note of mysticism, love, and longing.

There is little, if any, written criticism of H.p. A good H. poet has something for all his listeners: images and tune for the less sophisticated, and, for the more sophisticated, skilled use of the language and close adherence to the metrical pattern.

COLLECTIONS: Wak'ok'in Hausa (1956; H. poems by various poets); Wak'ar Bagauda ta Kano ("The Kano Poem about Bagauda," 1969); Gangar Wa'azu ("Drum of Homily," 1969); Wak'ok'in ["Poems of"] Mu'azu Ha'deja (1970); Wak'ok'in ["Poems of"] Sa'adu Zungur (1971); Aliyu Na Mangi, Wak'ok'in Imfiraji ("Songs of Comfort," 1972); Salihu Kontagora, Kimiyya da Fasaha ("Science and Wit," 1972).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: J. H. Greenberg, "H. Verse Prosody," Jour. Am. Oriental Studies, 69 (1949); M. Hiskett, "The 'Song of Bagauda': A Hausa King List and Homily in Verse," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, 27 (1964), 28 (1965) and "H. Islamic Verse: Its Sources and Development prior to 1920" (unpubl. Ph.D. diss., Univ. of London, 1969); J. N. Paden, "Kano H. Poetry," Kano Studies, 1 (1965); D. W. Arnott, "The Song of the Rains," Afr. Language Studies, 9 (1968); A. N. Skinner, "A. H. Poet in Lighter Vein," Afr. Language Review, 8 (1969). A.N.S.

HERMENEUTICS. See INTERPRETATION; * HISTORICISM.*

HISTORICISM. Although the term h. (sometimes spelled "historism") has long been known to philosophers of history, it has only recently been widely employed by aestheticians in an effort to develop a theory of poetic interpretation. Its general usage by historiographers, however, is often vague and uninformative for poetry criticism. Benedetto Croce (History as the Story of Liberty, 1941) defines h. broadly as the philosophy or science of history. Friedrich Meinecke (Die Entstehung des Historismus, 1936) applies the term to the awakening historical consciousness which developed out of the 19th-c. rebellion against 18th-c. rationalism and empiricism, that is, as a description of a Weltanschauung. Ernst Troeltsch (Der Historismus und seine Probleme, 1922) sees h. as a synonym for intellectual history or Geistesgeschichte. Similarly, poetry critics have employed the term loosely to indicate little more than the necessity of reading any poetic text more or less as an historical document. H. is confused, therefore, with "literary history" or the various types of "historical criticism" which resemble traditional antiquarian or scholarly pursuits (see CRITICISM. TYPES). The meaning of the poem is determined by its sociohistorical milieu, and value judgments are ignored or dismissed as mere subjective responses. As a result, this approach falls into what René Wellek calls a "crippling relativism and an anarchy of values" (The History of Modern Criticism, III, xiii). The poem can mean only what it meant to the author and his contemporary audience and can express values which are valid only for the author's world; any other meanings and values are imposed upon it by the critic.

Partly as a result of this misuse, h. has also been the focal point of bitter condemnation by historians and critics alike, and these attacks reflect the inherent contradictions in the term. Karl Popper argues that h. leads to a general theory of society as "closed"; h., he claims, establishes a universal historical point of view through which the meaning and value of any particular event (or poetic text) is determined (Wesley Morris, Toward a New H., 1972, p. 5). Conversely, J. Hillis Miller states that h. eventuates in a "subjectivist" philosophy and is characterized by the absence of "any one point of view" (The Disappearance of God, 1965, pp. 10, 107). The first emphasizes the influence of Hegelian Idealism on h. and the second focuses on the origins of an h. attitude in 19th-c. aestheticism. To limit h. to either of these extremes, however, is inaccurate. Moreover, it is on the basis of these contradictions that a viable "new" h. has recently emerged in poetic theory, and this new critical school traces its origins through h. theory to the very source of these conflicting impulses in romantic poetics (see ROMANTICISM). (For arguments on much earlier sources for h. see Meinecke; and George Huppert, "The Renaissance Background of H.," History and Theory, 5 [1966], 48-60.)

Within these general definitions one can distinguish four major types of traditional h., three of which develop various aspects of the old "historical criticism." The broadest type may be labeled "metaphysical," for it derives principally from Hegelian Idealism and focuses on the transcendental continuity of historical development which allows the critic of poetry to determine the meaning of any poem by merely locating its position in the grand historical scheme. On one level this leads to an historical relativism of the type described by Wellek, but its most damning weakness for poetic theory is that it shifts the critic's attention away from the particular details of the work toward the universal meanings and values of the transcendent scheme which are reflected in that work. The second type, "naturalistic" (sometimes "positivistic" or "scientific") h., stands directly opposed to the transcendental Idealism of metaphysical h. As a methodology of poetic interpretation it forces the critic to treat the poetic text as a peculiar (and often unreliable) kind of sociological document, as a transparent key to contemporary social meanings and values. In varying degrees Sainte-Beuve, Taine, and Brunetière were the leading exponents of this theory which derived much support from 19th-c. positivism. A third type of h., originated by Michelet, Comte, Goethe, and Brandes, and adopted by a substantial portion of early 20th-c. Am. critics, can best be called "nationalistic." Like metaphysical h., nationalistic h. is characterized by the effort to place the individual poem in a general sociohistorical scheme, but the boundaries of this general context are clearly drawn according to national frontiers. Poetry, therefore, is seen as either the expression of native political ideals or as the manifestation of racial folk myths.

The fourth type of h. marks a radical departure from the first three. Designated "aesthetic" h., it is the product of the philosophy of history promoted by Croce and R. G. Collingwood (An Essay on Philosophical Method, 1950). Aesthetic h. shifts the focus of the critic's attention from the extrinsic historical or cultural context, which determines the poem's meaning, to the creative act of the poet who in writing the poem is seen to make cultural meanings and values, not merely reflect them. This type of h. emphasizes the poet's imaginative or intuitive powers as he gives form to culture through the act of poetic composition (see IMAGINATION. THE ROMANTICS).

If aesthetic h., however, directs the critic's attention away from the extrinsic meanings and values of the poet's culture, it bypasses the intrinsic meanings and values of the text itself in its haste to refocus attention on the poet as an intuitive seer. As a result, aesthetic h. finally loses the distinction between the poem and external reality by collapsing both into the poet's mind. Nevertheless, it is this emphasis on aesthetics or creativity that has most directly influenced the "new" h. in poetry criticism. Harry Levin, in what appears to be an effort to join aesthetic h. with the more traditional forms of historical criticism, claims that we must see that "literature is not only the effect of social causes; it is also the cause of social effects" (The Gates of Horn, 1963, p. 17). The poet, then, is both the maker of history and the chronicler of his times. To this dualistic position contemporary formalist schools of criticism, particularly the Am. "new criticism" (see NEW CRITICISM), have added a third important field of interest for the critic of poetry: the text as a meaningful object in itself. Thus the "new" h. critic must affirm the unique creative powers of the poet and the unique, inviolable structure of the poem while he also maintains that both poet and poem are products of their cultural-historical milieu. The "new" h. clearly develops from the many phases of romanticism, preserving in its interpretive methodology the organicist's concern with the integrity of the poem's structure and the Idealist's interest in connecting the particular poetic expression to the transcendental or sociohistorical scheme.

The varied tradition of h. is clearly problematic. Moreover, it is the tension between the tendency to seek order and meaning in external (or extrinsic) historical continuity and the emphasis on free creative activity which generates (intrinsic) meaning within the poetic text that is central to "new" h. theory. This movement has been largely the work of literary theorists; and because the primary interest here is in the interpretation of individual texts, the greatest problem is to avoid falling into the determinism of Idealistic historians like Hegel without giving up the very sensible idea that in some degree poems are always related to external sociohistorical meanings and values. "New" h. critics are consequently wary of the term "continuity" which suggests a permanent, even transcendent, historical scheme (Morris, Toward a New H.; Fredric Jameson, Marxism and Form, 1971, particularly pp. 257-79). Yet without some external linking of events history is reduced to mere random change, and the connections between individual poetic texts are merely fortuitous. The primary goal of "new" h. critics is to join the interests of "literary history," with its methodological basis in historical scholarship and its focus on cultural generalizations, and "literary criticism," with its penchant for aesthetic (and ahistorical) values and its formalist bias, into one, complete, and adequate critical activity. The practical problem, as Wellek says, is that a poem is of its own time and of the present (hence somehow above time); the poem has a "dual mode of existence" ("Periods and Movements in Literary History," EIE, 1940; Toward a New H., ch. 2).

Consciously or unconsciously, the "new" h. critic confronts in this dilemma the general problems of poetic interpretation which have been the central concern of hermeneutic philosophy. The goal is a viable interpretive methodology which allows us to understand poetic texts written in remote historical periods. Wilhelm Dilthey (Das geschichtliche Bewusstsein und die Weltanschauungen, Gesammelte Schriften, viii, 1913-67), one of the most influential philosophers of art and history to devise an answer to these problems, attempted to construct a hermeneutic theory based on his hypothesis that man's individual thoughts and expressions are universally "sharable," that understanding and communication are possible at a high level of generalization. He also argued that particular manifestations of thought (man's consciousness revealed in poetry) are subject to the determining forces of the poet's Weltanschauung (identifiable as historically meaningful psychological types). The critic or historian's task, therefore, is to read himself into the dynamic structure of the text which is an expression of the poet's age. But Dilthey's theory results in historical relativism, for the act of interpretation becomes for him no more than a "reperformance" of the author's original experience as he composed the text. In reading backward from present to past he has resigned the role of "active" interpreter; the historian becomes passive very much in the way that the phenomenologist Georges Poulet has defined the role of all readers as giving oneself up to the thoughts of another ("The Phenomenology of Reading," NLH, 1 [1969], 53-68). E. D. Hirsch, Jr., in his recent proposal of a hermeneutic theory, has preserved the relativism of Dilthey's theory in order to explain the difference between a text's "meaning" and its "significance" (Validity in Interpretation, 1967). The former is historically determined, a product of the author's conscious "will" and unconscious cultural attitudes. It is discovered by a somewhat statistically oriented interpretive methodology that measures the validity of possible "meanings" against the determining possibilities of the period. A poem's "significance" is merely a subjective evaluation made by a literary critic according to his own and his society's value system. In this approach, however, Hirsch has deepened the split between the literary historian and the literary critic.

Jean-Paul Sartre (Critique de la raison dialectique, 1960) offers a partial solution to this dilemma in seeing history as the continuity of man's acts of self-projection which create both himself and his world. History, therefore, has no metaphysical support, nor is it merely a collection of isolated acts of self-awareness. Consciousness is dialectical, and the historical process is the product of man's free, individual projections of his future which arise only through his opposition as a free consciousness to the determining forces of his own socio-economic milieu.

In bare outline Sartre's theory is much like the "new" h. proposed by some literary theorists of the 1950's and 1960's. Harry Levin's interest in poetry's effect on social change resembles a similar interest in poetry as a cultural force voiced by Lionel Trilling: that poetry makes man aware of his "opposing self," aware of the conflict between the individual and his cultural context captured in the poem (The Liberal Imagination, 1950). So, too, the phenom-enologically oriented neo-Marxism of Lucien Goldmann proposes that the creative artist is both a product of and spokesman for socioeconomic change (Pour une sociologie du roman, 1964). Roy Harvey Pearce (H. Once More, 1969) argues that the artist is a man of his times, but he is such because his own unique world vision (encompassing both his own existence and his culture) arises from the opposition between individual consciousness and social structures. The tensions developed in the artist through the dialectical nature of his self-awareness are captured in the structure of his verbal expressions; the "individual style" of the poem grows out of and yet opposes the "basic style" of the culture which produced it.

Those critics whose tradition is more in line with the theories of the Am. "new criticism" have also made efforts to develop a "new" h. Eliseo Vivas claims that the unique poetic context is at once the poet's "creation" of an aesthetic order and his "discovery" of meanings and values "existent" in his culture (Creation and Discovery, 1955). Charles Feidelson, enlarging upon the conceptions of the symbolist tradition, develops a peculiarly Am. symbolism which in its own history—and in the individual works of Am. authors—reveals the growth of an Am. poetic imagination (Symbolism and Am. Literature, 1953). Murray Krieger (The Play and Place of Criticism, 1967) sees the metaphorical structure of the poem as both a discrete, inviolable and timeless aesthetic object and a structure of meaning constituted from the elements of the artist's culturally determined language system. Krieger assumes that language always carries with it the fundamental values and meanings of society, but these "old words" are wrought into a new "Word" (the poem) under the power of the artist's creative imagination. The tension between artist and society described by Trilling and Pearce is, for Krieger, the essential tension faced by any literary artist as he confronts the cultural limitations of his language.

The renewed interest in h. in modern literary theory inevitably must confront the problems of the origin and nature of language. Historicist literary critics have turned most frequently to the philosophy of Ernst Cassirer (The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, 1953) to argue that language and cognition are so intimately related that man's perception of the world is constituted in his acts of speech, and most particularly in his creative utterances. Thus the dialectic of consciousness which establishes a dynamic relationship between the "self" of the author and the restrictive structure of his society is perhaps most immediately reflected in the similar dialectical relationship between the individual poetic expression and the language system which circumscribes all verbal utterances. This is a profound problem for both linguistic studies and poetics, but it suggests that one can read from the text into the artist's society without reducing one aspect to the other. Leo Spitzer (Linguistics and Literary History, 1948) and Eric Auerbach (Mimesis, 1953) have both approached the study of individual stylistic traits in literature with this assumption. They have attempted to link the poem to the author's perception of his world and to the cultural tradition within which he lived. Moreover, in their sympathy with h., both men have searched for a continuous pattern of such relationships, for a historical organization of the dynamic interplay between man's verbal expressions and his culture. Such an approach seems to defy the precision of a scientific methodology, but it has reopened poetry to historical interpretation without denying the other extreme of its dual mode of existence, its timeless, aesthetic value.

In addition to the works already cited, the following are useful for the study of h. For general theory see: F. Engel-Janosi, The Growth of H. (1944); D. Lee and R. Beck, "The Meaning of H.," Am. Historical Review, 59 (1954); K. Popper, The Poverty of H. (1957); C. Antoni, From History to Sociology (1959) and L'Historisme (1961); W. B. Gallie, Philos. and Historical Understanding (1964); H. White, The Uses of History (1968; comp. and ed.) and Metahistory (1973). — For works on h. and related literary problems see: V. W. Brooks, "On Constructing a Usable Past," Dial., 64 (1918); V. L. Parrington, Main Currents in Am. Thought (1927); G. Hicks, The Great Tradition (1935); A. O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being (1936); E. Wilson, To the Finland Station (1940); K. Burke, The Philos. of Lit. Form (1941); F. O. Matthiessen, Am. Renaissance (1941); M. Bewley, The Complex Fate (1952); L. Goldmann, Le Dieu caché (1955); R.W.B. Lewis, The Am. Adam (1955) and The Picaresque Saint (1959); S. Burckhardt, "Poetry, Language and the Condition of Modern Man," Century Review, 4 (1960); M. Krieger, The Tragic Vision (1960), A Window to Crit. (1964), and The Classic Vision (1971); R. H. Pearce, The Continuity of Am. Lit. (1961); G. Lukács, The Historical Novel, tr. H. and S. Mitchell (1962) and Aesthetik (pt. 1, 2 v., 1963); F. Hoffman, The Mortal No (1964); R. B. Heilman, "Historian and Critic: Notes on Attitudes," SR, 73 (1965); H. Levin, "Toward a Sociology of the Novel," JHI, 26 (1965); G. Hartman, "Beyond Formalism" and "Toward Lit. History" in Beyond Formalism (1970).

W.M.O.

I

ICON AND ICONOLOGY. Eikon appears in Aristotle's Rhetoric (3.4) in the sense of comparison or simile. To later classical and Renaissance theorists this term meant a verbal description of a person or thing, in which similes may be used either to evaluate or simply to present vividly the subject of the description: Quintilian speaks of a kind of comparison "which the Greeks call eikon, and which expresses the appearance of things and persons" (Institutio Oratoria 5.11.24); H. Peacham defines "icon" as a "forme of speech which painteth out the image of a person or thing, by comparing forme with forme, quality with quality, and one likeness with another" (The Garden of Eloquence, 1577). With the passing of the Renaissance interest in the discovery, naming, and systematic classification of stylistic and rhetorical devices, "icon" almost disappeared from poetics.

The revival of the term in modern poetics is primarily due to the influence of several articles (1939) on the nature of art written by the philosopher and semiotician Charles Morris. In these articles he sketches an aesthetics grounded on modern sign theory. The doctrine that art is a language, he says, has a history going back to Plato, but a full exploitation of this theory had to await the development of a systematic and scientific semiotic. Art differs from other forms of discourse both in the kind of sign that the artist uses and also in the kind of referent that he wishes the sign to convey. Taking his terminology from C. S. Peirce, Morris divides all signs into iconic and noniconic signs. An icon is a sign which is similar to the referent that it denotes in one or more significant respects; thus maps, blueprints, pictures, and photographs are examples of icons. Obviously, not all icons are works of art, and so Morris completes his definition by saying that the referent of the icon used in art is a human value. The iconic sign enables the artist to "present" (rather than simply assert) the value; that is, the sign provides the audience with an actual instance of the value which it denotes. Morris later (1946) modified his claim that the iconic presentation of a value is a definition of art, but he has continued to defend the position that art is a use of language for appraisive signifying and that it typically makes a generous use of iconic signs.

Morris's position attracted widespread attention among aestheticians, art historians, and literary critics. His early articles appeared at a time of growing interest, stimulated by the semantics of I. A. Richards, in the nature of the language of poetry, and his iconic hypothesis suggested a possible criterion for distinguishing the language of poetry from that used in other modes of discourse. It also appealed to critics who wished to stress the density of poetic language, the sensuous particularity of good poetry, and the crucial importance of the medium. Morris himself had discussed some of the more important iconic elements in poetry: onomatopoeia (q.v.); the general relation of sound to sense (see TONE-COLOR); the possible iconic relation of style to subject matter; and the iconicity involved in the signification of metaphors and symbols. Later theorists have explored these and other iconic elements in poetry. However, all of the issues discussed above remain highly controversial, and the fruitfulness of the iconic hypothesis is still undetermined.

"Icon," in the sense of "image" or "picture," has also had a long history of use in the criticism of the visual arts. The study of images—their origin, distribution, transformation, classification, and, particularly, the interpretation of their meaning—has been called "iconography" or "iconology." In modern use, these two terms are sometimes synonymous, sometimes defined so as to point to different concerns of the art critic (an influential distinction between the meanings of these two terms has been made by Erwin Panofsky, 1939, 1955). In recent years, some critics of poetry have discovered a fundamental similarity between their interests in poetry and the aims and methods of iconologists. Poetry, like the visual arts, uses images, and a legitimate concern of the critic of poetry is in the origin, distribution, etc. of verbal images. Furthermore, since the same image may be used in poetry and the visual arts, these critics have found a wealth of information in the writings of art historians and critics that has been of immense help in the interpretation of medieval, Renaissance, and 17th-c. poetry, especially that which employs allegorical imagery (see FINE ARTS AND POETRY).

Rosemond Tuve is a good example of a critic whose theoretical and practical criticism shows the strong influence of iconology. Like Panofsky, she assumes that the images that appear in paintings or poems are a language whose meanings must be fathomed before the work can have any aesthetic effect. When the images in an artistic work have the same meaning for all interpreters, including the artist, no problems of interpretation arise and every interpreter is his own iconologist. However, in the interpretation of poetry, especially the poetry of the distant past, this happy state is rare. The images in such poetry may have changed their meanings or may even have lost them altogether. For example, Tuve points out that George Herbert's The Sacrifice is unintelligible to a reader who does not recognize that the poem is filled with conventionalized symbolic imagery provided by a long iconographical tradition. The layers of suggested meanings, not to speak of the profound thematic center of the poem, are lost to a reader who does not know, for example, that in the medieval religious tradition Noah and Moses were types of Christ; that manna prefigured the Eucharist; that the creation of Eve from the rib of sleeping Adam was paralleled with the flowing of the sacraments from the pierced side of Christ; and that the tree of Adam's sin became the cross which bore Christ as its fruit. To support such interpretations Tuve uses Panofsky's "saturation" technique. She quotes from the Bible, the liturgy, Latin and vernacular lyrics, hymns and other church music, prayer books, sermons, missals, Biblical commentary, and the drama of the guilds; she reproduces photographs of church windows, illuminated manuscripts, and woodcuts. Her primary aim is, of course, to present the evidence on which she grounds her interpretations. But she also wants to build up an apperceptive mass in the reader's mind which will help him to respond to the poem's images with the immediacy that characterized the response of Herbert's contemporary readers. Such are the revitalizing services that iconology can render.

The adoption by some critics of iconological aims and methods has resulted in a large body of practical criticism that has thrown new light on the poetry of Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, and their contemporaries. It has also led to the further exploration of the ancient analogy of poetry and painting (see UT PICTURA POESIS). And it has created an interest in such hybrid art forms as emblems (q.v.) and a reconsideration of the aesthetics of the productions of poet-painters like William Blake.

C. W. Morris, "Esthetics and the Theory of Signs," Jour. of Unified Science, 8 (1939), "Science, Art, and Technology," KR, 1 (1939), Signs, Language, and Behavior (1946), Signification and Significance (1964); E. Panofsky, Studies in Iconology (1939), Meaning in the Visual Arts (1955); E. H. Gombrich, "Icones Symbolicae: The Visual Image in Neo-Platonic Thought," JWCI, 11 (1948); R. Tuve, A Reading of George Herbert (1952), Images and Themes in Five Poems by Milton (1957), Allegorical Imagery (1966); Wheelwright; M. Rieser, "The Semiotic Theory of Art in America," JAAC, 15 (1956); P. Henle, "Metaphor" in Language, Thought, and Culture (1958); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1958); D. W. Robertson, A Preface to Chaucer (1962); S. C. Chew, The Pilgrimage of Life (1962); J. Bialostocki, "Iconography and Iconology" in Encyclopedia of World Art (1963); J. H. Hagstrum, William Blake: Poet and Painter (1964); P. J. Alpers, The Poetry of the Faerie Queene (1967); M. B. Hester, The Meaning of Poetic Metaphor (1967); L. A. Sonnino, A Handbook to 16th-C. Rhetoric (1968); J. Aptekar, Icons of Justice: Iconography and Thematic Imagery in Book V of the Faerie Queene (1969); J. V. Fleming, The "Roman de la Rose": A Study in Allegory and Iconography (1969). F.G.

INTERPRETATION. FOURFOLD METHOD. This term, or a number of minor variations on it, is normally used to refer to the classified system of biblical interpretation dominant in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, going back to Patristic theorizing on and systematizing of biblical hermeneutics. It is by no means an exact term inasmuch as not all theories of biblical i. in either the Patristic or later periods classified in a fourfold way. The common fourfold system—the literal or historical level, the allegorical (theological), the tropological (moral) level and the anagogical (eschatological) level—was not in fact widely accepted until the 12th c.

At no time was the formula ever slavishly applied, nor does it fit all or even most biblical verses. Above all, it is more appropriate for the Old Testament than the New. A more basic and satisfactory division, which we also often find in fact, would be the literal as opposed to the spiritual or fuller ("plenior") meaning, both of which were subdivided in many ways. The basic Christian argument for Jesus' divinity and the genuineness of his claims was based in the New Testament itself on the notion of a deeper meaning in the Old Testament to be discovered in the fullness of time. Furthermore, i. of a highly regarded text was normally "allegorized" to keep it current and up to date. This last purpose is first systematically applied in the Alexandrine exegesis of Homer. Alexandria, carrying on this pagan and Rabbinic tradition especially in Philo (d. ca. A.D. 54), developed a lively school of biblical exegesis. This was christianized largely by Origen of Alexandria (d. 254). This school tended to emphasize the spiritual or allegorical meaning as opposed to the Antiochene school which emphasized the literal and textual meaning. Allegory in the text of the Bible is usually typological or figural, in which the actions and events of the Old Testament are seen to foreshadow true events in the New Testament and in the future, a kind of horizontal allegory. Allegory on the Bible is more frequently but by no means exclusively vertical in which the one, two, three, or more levels are found. However, a strict division between typological and level allegory is not always possible.

One can only briefly trace here the development of biblical exegesis. Origen had a threefold system—somatic, psychic, and pneumatic based on Hebraic and Greek psychology. Cassian (d. 435) was the first to take Origenic and triadic allegory to the West when founding southern Gaulish monasticism. Augustine in his De doctrina christiana provided justification to later times for the use of allegorical methods although his own system applied to the Bible usually refers to the way Jesus Himself taught rather than to current biblical exegesis. He, however, certainly distinguished the spiritual from the literal sense and provided an aesthetic of allegory in which the beauty of figurative and obscure biblical language is praised. Gregory the Great (d. 604), especially in his Homilies on Ezechiel and Moralia (a moralized commentary on Job), proposed a threefold method and was even more influential in medieval biblical allegorizing than Augustine. Various medieval schools of exegesis flourished and carried on the tradition: the Irish Monastic School, the Benedictines, the School of Laon, the Victorine School, Scholastic exegesis, and above all a "scientific" school from the 12th c. on which was remarkably open-minded and yet respectful toward tradition, culminating in Nicholas of Lyra of the 14th c., the great unifier of exegetical traditions for subsequent Christianity. Sermons in particular were much indebted to the exegetical biblical tradition and helped to make various interpretations well known. Pictures, illuminations, statues, and stained glass were also instrumental in educating the medieval and early Renaissance masses in traditional exegetical interpretations.

In modern literary scholarship and theory, the medieval and Renaissance use of the so-called fourfold system of allegory in literature has been much debated. Was there a "fourfold" meaning in the Romance of the Rose, in Chaucer, in Chrétien de Troyes, and so on? It is certain that any literary work worthy of the name is polysemous. That biblical symbolism and exegesis had influence on medieval and Renaissance works there can be no doubt, but the degree and extent of that influence is difficult to establish, especially in an age like ours which is seeking for both religion and relevance. See also ALLEGORY.

F. W. Farrar, Hist. of I. (1886); B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (2d ed., 1952); R. W. Frank, "The Art of Reading Medieval Personification Allegory," ELH, 20 (1953); H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale . . . (4 v., 1959–64); Crit. Approaches to Medieval Lit., ed. D. Bethurum (1960); papers from the Eng. Institute 1958–59, esp. articles by Donaldson, Kaske, Donahue); D. W. Robertson, Jr., A Preface to Chaucer: Studies in Medieval Perspectives (1962); The Cambridge Hist. of the Bible, ed. P. R. Ackroyd et al. (3 v., 1963–69; esp. II, 155–279); H. R. Jauss, Entstehung und Strukturwandel der allegorischen Dichtung (1968); J. Pépin, Dante et la tradition de l'allégorie (1971); M. W. Bloomfield, "Allegory as I.," NLH, 3 (1971–72). M.W.B.

INTERPRETATION. MODERN. In the most generally accepted sense, literary i. is explication and explanation of the meaning, theme, or significance of a work. Although sometimes used as if it were synonymous with "i.," the word "hermeneutics," traditionally associated with biblical exegesis, is now generally employed to designate interpretive theory. Some critics think that i. need not be encumbered with discussion of methods and principles, in that it is essentially an intuitive activity leading in as many directions as literary study itself. But the purpose of relating practical criticism to articulated theory is to secure agreement concerning the results of i., not to determine how it should proceed. If a distinction between "an acceptable i." and "my i." is desirable, some means must be found to decide what will count as evidence for or against interpretive statements. Of the many theories of literary i., five of contemporary importance have been selected for treatment in this article. Philosophical and empirical aspects of interpretive theory as a whole are discussed briefly in the concluding paragraphs.

Proponents of what will here be called "autonomous i." assert that literary meaning is intrinsic and can be discovered only through sensitive attention to the verbal structure of the work itself. The articles on explication, criticism—practical, imagery, and metaphor discuss doctrines and methods relevant to this theory. In the most explicit formulations of new criticism (q.v.) and contextualism,* autonomous i. is associated with the following assumptions: (1) "literary works are self-sufficient entities, whose properties are decisive in checking interpretations" (Beardsley); (2) complexity, within the limits of overall unity, is a positive aesthetic value; and (3) when properly pursued, i. leads to statements concerning the themes, situations, and attitudes embodied in literature, rather than to statements about propositional or emotive "meaning" (didactic and propagandistic works are, in this view, sub-literary). The third assumption is often accompanied by a distinction between ordinary (referential) uses of language and the language of literature, which is autonomous because it does not entail reference in the usual sense. Cleanth Brooks, W. K. Wimsatt, M. C. Beardsley, and Murray Krieger are the most articulate spokesmen of this theory of i., though important differences in their positions are perforce blurred in a skeletal exposition.

These assumptions delimit a context of i. and provide a means of validating its results. An immense variety of information may be brought to bear in discussion of a literary work; if only that contained in the work itself is considered "decisive," the problem of i. is reduced to manageable proportions. Rules governing interpretive practice are implicit in (1) and (2); the elements of a work are presumably interrelated in such a way as to attain structural unity, and the interpreter will attempt to discover their internal coherence rather than their correspondence to something outside the work. The theory enables us to discover the law whereby a literary work is a law unto itself.

The rich and diversified body of interpretive commentary produced by autonomous i. reveals that its assumptions have unanticipated consequences. In reducing the number of elements relevant to an i., assumption (1) eliminates extrinsic determinants of how these elements are to be construed (such as those that can be inferred from biography and literary history). Reduction in the quantity and determinacy of interpretive factors leads to greater ambiguity—which in turn, by virtue of assumption (2), may become a positive aesthetic value. If complexity is a desirable characteristic of literature, how can it be increased, given a text of a certain length? The obvious answer is that its elements must acquire multiple functions or meanings; and this can be achieved through ambiguity, paradox, irony, and (in general) heterogeneity. The consequent problem is to determine how such a complexity can be subsumed in the "unity" required by assumption (2), and the answer lies in assumption (3). Unity is distinguished from univocity; complexity and indeterminacy of meaning are subsumed in "situation" and "attitude." While most proponents of autonomous i. believe that it is desirable to secure agreement regarding the i. of a work, their method can lead to uncontrolled proliferation of textual commentary.

A more serious difficulty results from the literary autonomy granted in (1). As in the Kantian tradition, the literary work is seen as an object in its own right. It is not, however, seen as embodying Kantian "purposiveness";

consequently, there is nothing in the definition of the literary object to distinguish it from natural objects. Burkhardt discerningly relates autonomous i. (his term is "werkimmanente Deutung") to the interpretatio naturae of the empirical sciences in their post-Reformation development. Both presuppose that their objects (literature and nature) contain within themselves the laws in terms of which they are to be understood. However, most advocates of autonomous i., while denying the theoretical relevance of "intentions," assume in practice that literary works entail intentionality. Their explications are controlled by their awareness that although some meanings may be elusive, others are apparent, and the whole work embodies a consciously created theme. But if their theoretical statements concerning the autonomy of the literary object are considered apart from their unstated assumptions, there is reason to interpret literature as the anthropologist interprets taboos, or the psychoanalyst dreams—as human products embodying meanings of which their creators are unconscious.

These considerations lead to a definition of "i." as "explanation of the symbolic content of a text." A symbol means something more or something other than its denotation (see the articles on SYMBOL, MYTH, ARCHETYPE, and CRITICISM—PSYCHOLOGICAL, all of which are relevant to this conception of i.). Through "explanation," a particular phenomenon is seen as exemplifying a class that can be accounted for by a reference to a general law. The domains of classification involved in symbolic i. are not exclusively literary; in this respect it is opposed to autonomous i., since the latter considers the aesthetic realm sui generis. Symbolic i. is usually based on the following assumptions: (1) literary works and their elements are particular examples of forms and symbols appearing elsewhere in literature and in other sociocultural domains; (2) the purpose of i. is to identify the general categories in which particular literary works are properly subsumed; and (3) symbols and forms of cultural/literary expression themselves require explication because they are inherently equivocal and embody meanings of which their users are unaware.

The context within which interpretive problems arise offers some evidence favorable to this point of view. We undertake i. on encountering something we do not understand; otherwise it is unnecessary. Literary texts entice us toward realization by appearing to conceal their meanings. It is difficult to draw a line between the "implicit meaning" of autonomous i. and the "latent meaning" of symbolic i. because any form of expression involving concealment or duplicity raises the question of why the speaker hid what he would reveal, and this question cannot be answered within the framework of the text itself. The speaker may not be aware of why he conceals, or even what he conceals. When propositional meaning and explicit intentionality are considered inappropriate as the basis of i., all forms of cultural expression are called into question.

The 19th-c. attempt to apply the empirical methods of the natural sciences to the study of man made possible the modern emergence of symbolic i. Once conscious intentions had been eliminated as the decisive criteria governing the i. of social and cultural phenomena, the stage was set for the emergence of what Ricoeur refers to as "the hermeneutics of suspicion." Marx, Nietzsche, and Freud invented interpretive methods based on the premise that generally accepted explanations of human behavior were in fact illusions. "Henceforward," says Ricoeur, "to seek meaning is no longer to spell out the consciousness of meaning, but to decipher its expressions." While psychology, mythology, and cultural anthropology were among the earliest and remain the most influential disciplines employing this conception of i., it has recently influenced other sciences of man. M. Foucault has combined it with structural i. to identify the conceptual categories that have controlled man's perception (and hence his i.) of reality.

The diversity of the literary criticism based on what is here generically called symbolic i. results from variations in the fundamental symbolic categories employed and the indeterminacy of its assumptions. Northrop Frye, Leslie Fiedler, Gaston Bachelard, and Georg Lukács are among its best-known practitioners, but no short list of critics can indicate its varied forms. (For a discussion of the critics who have contributed to the development of a "Marxist hermeneutic," see Fredric Jameson, Marxism and Form, 1971.) Archetypal, psychoanalytic, Marxist, and mythic criticism differ in the meanings they educe from literature, but their methods—which involve finding something more or something other than enthymeme in the text—are quite similar. The terms Freud used in his discussions of multiple meaning (condensation, displacement, overelaboration, sublimation) identify specific techniques of symbolic i., and it is possible to envisage a lexicon of such terms correlated with rhetorical devices on the assumption that language, rather than culture or the psyche, is the fundamental source of plurivocity (as suggested by Jacques Lacan). However, even if one accepts the assumption that literary meaning does not differ in kind from meaning in general, symbolic i. has two besetting weaknesses. It remains speculative, none of its manifestations having gained more than skeptical tolerance in the social sciences; and the methods it employs are so indeterminate as to yield incompatible results in the hands of different practitioners.

Two reactions against symbolic i. attracted attention in the 1960's. In one of these, "i." is defined as "paraphrase; exact reproduction of a text's meaning in different words," in accordance with an accepted philosophic sense of the term. In opposition to the interpretive traditions discussed above, this one insists that a text's meaning is determined by its author's intentions, which are recoverable because the text objectifies his thought and emotions, and that literary meaning is not different in kind from nonliterary meaning. Originating in the biblical and classical hermeneutics of Schleiermacher (1768-1834) and Boeckh (1785-1867), what is here called (for convenience of reference) "exegetical i." survived in the writings of Dilthey and re-emerged in recent works by E. D. Hirsch and E. Betti.

The Cartesian premises of the 19th-c. tradition are retained in restatements of the theory. Understanding (Verstehen) is the mental act whereby the interpreter re-experiences or recognizes the text's original meaning; i. is the subsequent act of objectifying this understanding in language. Historical and linguistic knowledge of the milieu in which the text was produced, together with an understanding of the life and works of its author, are indispensable for accurate i. By knowledge of the otherness of the text, an interpreter can understand its meaning in his own time; and through knowledge of its historical context and its author, he can understand it better than did the author himself. Exegetical i. has been associated with the attempt to state rules or "canons" of i., but Boeckh and Hirsch doubt that any can be found which would be both useful and nontrivial. Most of the theorists in this tradition distinguish "i.," a restatement of inherent meaning, from "criticism," an attribution of significance to the text; the latter term would include all that is called "i." in the autonomous and symbolic traditions.

Although they provide a rationale for the methods of traditional literary scholarship, contemporary theorists of exegetical i. have had little influence on interpretive practice. Having burdened themselves with 19th-c. conceptions of "subject," "object," and "intention," they have been unable to revitalize Dilthey's distinction between the natural and humane sciences. The concept of i. as synonymous restatement of a text, which involved significant philological issues when the Bible and classical works were first subjected to textual criticism, today seems unnecessarily narrow. It would be pointless to apply i. in this sense to narrative, and impossible to apply it to much modern poetry. However, two aspects of exegetical theory are of considerable importance. One is its distinction between "explanation" and "understanding," which will be mentioned in the concluding paragraphs. The other is its assertion that since there is no logical or empirical justification for nonliteral readings of a text, "i." in the usual sense can be justified only by reference to conventions.

Structuralism (q.v.), which protean term will here be used to refer primarily to the writings of Barthes and Todorov, carries the critique of interpretive practice even further. The structuralist definition of "i." is taken from logic, in which a primitive term or sign, inherently without meaning, is accorded one arbitrarily. Where other interpreters would distinguish form from content, or fuse the two in a statement regarding "theme," the rigorous structuralist takes any identifiable meaning in a work as a locus for further formal analysis. Meaning vanishes in the multiple elaboration of structures; every content is unfolded as a form. "I." is entirely arbitrary, and by implication irrelevant to criticism. It would seem that this view constitutes a logically final step in the analysis of i. But after the effort to discover meaning has been turned inside out, the outside remains to be interpreted.

In still another of its technical uses (in philosophy and semiology—cf. Husserl, Ogden and Richards, C. W. Morris), "i." means "the act of using or construing anything as a sign." When we apprehend certain sense impressions as stimulated by a chair, or recognize certain sounds as a word, we are performing acts of i. In this sense the structuralist's structures, and language itself, are interpretations. In order to understand how i. is constituted, according to Heidegger, we must attempt to place ourselves in the moment at which we see an object as a chair, or use a word to mean something. Through hermeneutics, we elucidate "as" and "to mean." Because all experience is conditioned and mediated by language, we are endowed with an i. of reality of which we become conscious only in moments of rupture, when caught by the unexpected. Some of the literary consequences of this view, as discussed in the writings of H.-G. Gadamer, are summarized in the following paragraphs.

Because the linguistic and cultural experience which we bring to a text have constituted our very being and understanding, it is meaningless to speak of i. apart from our historical existence. "Objective" i. is impossible; we always understand literary works separated from us in time through our own mode of vision, which is largely unconscious and apart from which we do not exist. Yet since tradition has constituted our being, we can, by opening ourselves to the past, let it speak in our present. Attempts to characterize the past are vitiated by the contemporary categories we (inescapably) use in doing so, and they spring from a desire to dominate the past which distorts its voice. Meaning is always for here-and-now; it cannot be other.

Literature is misunderstood when placed in a special category called the "aesthetic"; literary and ordinary language differ only insofar as the former embodies greater intensity. Literature speaks to us by disconfirming our expectations, and in this respect it is similar to "experience," as opposed to mere habit. Herein lies the explanation of why i. always begins from something we don't understand. In such circumstances, we question the text. But the text itself is an answer; and if the question which it answers is a genuine one, we must assume that other answers were possible. True i. is the act of going beyond the text to the question that called it into being. If the interpreter opens his being to that which created the text, his i. will differ from all others—not because of his subjectivity, and not because the text has an infinite number of meanings, but because an infinity of texts and interpretive moments are the being of being from which subject and object are subsequently constituted in philosophic speculation.

Anglo-Am. philosophy has viewed the foregoing accounts of literary i. with skepticism. Linguistic analysts think that there must be some reasonable explanation of what practical critics are doing, regardless of what they think they are doing and the rationalizations of theoretical critics. C. L. Stevenson sees interpretations as based upon normative recommendations regarding modes of response. M. Weitz argues that many interpretations are in fact explanations, by virtue of their appeal to relevant general hypotheses; interpretive disagreements arise because of the variety of explanatory frameworks employed and the failure to recognize that these bear a provisional rather than essential relation to literary texts. J. Casey sees interpretations as explanations of how to construe a text; guided by the skillful critic, we come to see what he has seen. J. Margolis and S. Hampshire say that the existence of disparate interpretations of a work cannot be disallowed, so long as they are plausible. Few contemporary aestheticians argue that it is in principle possible to discover the "correct i." of a text.

Some problems that persistently vex interpretive theory deserve brief mention. Nearly all critics assume that literary works are coherent and that a satisfactory i. should be complete—i.e., that every part of a work should be accounted for in relation to an inclusive unity. Why? Burkhardt admits that only the greatest literature achieves unity; but R. M. Adams argues that many great works contain irreconcilable "strains of discord," and Ihab Hassan sees deliberate fragmentation as characteristic of contemporary literature. There is by no means agreement regarding where coherence is to be sought. An author's complete works, or his works and his life may be posited as the unity requiring explanation. Rather than attempting to integrate the surface of the oeuvre, many critics subject it to transformations in a search for deep structures. Thus it is less usual to find interpretations incompatible than to find them incommensurable.

Once a critic succeeds in showing that a work is unified, his i. may be vitiated by circularity, in that the whole has been explained by reference to the parts, and vice versa (Seeböhm has analyzed this problem in detail: see bibliog.). Quite apart from this problem, there is the widespread feeling that the proliferation of incompatible interpretations can be explained only by retreating to relativism. Alternative explanations are available (in instrumentalism, Pepper's contextualism, and phenomenology). The extent to which recent philosophic speculation concerning language, the theory of meaning, and general hermeneutics are of relevance to interpretive criticism remains problematic. If philosophy can provide a theoretical foundation for the distinction between scientific explanation and humanistic understanding, its influence on the theory of literary i. may be pronounced (see bibliog.: works by Apel and von Wright).

The history of practical criticism and of the ways in which literary scholarship has influenced i. remains to be written. Theoreticians who have little to say about scholarship should recognize that it continues to transform interpretive practice. Robertson's A Preface to Chaucer (1962) is a case in point, and it reinforces the historicist's contention that in order to understand the literature of any age, we can profit from an acquaintance with the interpretive conventions that its authors used in reading. It is evident that interpretive methods that were originally developed because of their appropriateness to the literature of a particular age are often subsequently applied, with more dubious results, to the literature of another age. An account of what contemporary interpreters of literature in fact do, regardless of what they say they do, might answer questions that have been left unresolved by theorists.

Some contemporary critics have argued that literary i. is an otiose art of divination that forestalls aesthetic response by turning it into something else. The technical innovations of contemporary literature can be seen as in part motivated by a desire to obviate i. and confute those critical theories that consider literature similar to other forms of discourse. But critics continue to prove the justice of Valéry's remark that "there is no discourse so obscure, no tale so odd or remark so incoherent that it cannot be given a meaning."

F.D.E. Schleiermacher, Sämtliche Werke, Abteil. 1, v. 7 (1838) and Hermeneutik (1959); A. Boeckh, Encyclopaedie . . . (1877; selections tr. as On I. and Crit., 1968); W. Dilthey, "Die Entstehung der Hermeneutik," Gesammelte Schriften, v (1924; tr. in NLH, 3 [1972]); C. L. Stevenson, "I. and Evaluation in Aesthetics," Philosophical Analysis, ed. Max Black (1950); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954), Hateful Contraries (1965; pt. 4); E. Betti, Teoria generale della interpretazione (2 vols., 1955), Die Hermeneutik als allgemeine Methodik . . . (1962); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958; chs. 3, 9), The Possibility of Crit. (1970); H. Lipps, Untersuchungen zu einer hermeneutischen Logik (1959); The New Hermeneutic, ed. J. B. Cobb and J. M. Robinson (1964); M. Weitz, Hamlet and the Philosophy of Lit. Crit. (1964; chs. 13-18); A. Child, I.: A General Theory (1965); H.-G. Gadamer, Wahrheit und Methode (2d ed., 1965); P. Ricoeur, De l'interprétation, essai sur Freud (1965; Eng. tr. 1970), Le Conflit des interprétations (1969); R. Barthes, Critique et vérité (1966), S/Z (1970); J. Casey, The Language of Crit. (1966); E. D. Hirsch, Validity in I. (1967); K.-O. Apel, Analytic Philosophy of Language and the Geisteswissenschaften, tr. by H. Holstellier (1967); S. Burckhardt, "Notes on the Theory of Intrinsic Meaning," Shakespearean Meanings (1968); E. Coreth, Grundfragen der Hermeneutik (1969); R. E. Palmer, Hermeneutics (1969); Hermeneutik als Weg heutiger Wissenschaft, ed. V. Warnach (1971); G. H. von Wright, Explanation and Understanding (1971); T. M. Seeböhm, Zur Kritik der hermeneutischen Vernunft (1972); NLH, 3, 4 (Winter 1972, Winter 1973). W.M.

INTUITION. Theories of poetry as a form of i. are even today somewhat alien to our ways of thinking. In his book on Benedetto Croce, G.N.G. Orsini observes that Am. literary critics are profoundly distrustful of their intuitive capacities and, one might add, of the intuitive power of poetry itself. Am. histories of aesthetics do contain clear descriptions of theories of poetry as i., but their clarity depends on their remoteness from that which they are ostensibly describing. Even when most objective, they seem to suggest that such theories are simply untenable. Of course, the theories may in truth be untenable. But because they have emerged in cultures with much richer traditions of poetry and art than our own, we should reject them only with extreme caution.

In its most fully developed form, the theory of poetry as essentially intuitive is based on the belief that lines like the following are exemplary: "the dry sound of bees/ Stretching across a lucid space" (Hart Crane, Praise for an Urn) and "As a calm darkens among water lights" (Wallace Stevens, Sunday Morning). To be sure, any line of verse, according to this theory, is poetic only if it is intuitive. But the lines quoted from Crane and Stevens seem to exhibit what is meant by poetic i. with unusual clarity and vividness. Even these lines, it is true, do not force the reader to respond to them as intuitive. The lines may be taken to be imitative of certain natural events or as illustrations of visual illusions or even as instances of rhetorical catachresis (q.v.). But if the reader takes these lines in as they really are—or so the theory goes—then he will experience them as poetic intuitions, as an immediate fusion of feeling and image. The awesome stillness and brilliance of Crane's space, strung together by the dry hum of golden immortality, is at one with the poet's anguished desire to eternalize the dead man he loves. The reader is pulled into a new place and time and becomes one with its desperate beauty. If he meditates within this intuitive moment, it will unfold his whole world, Crane's world will become his world, and he will see everything afresh, colored by a pain and lucidity as never before. In experiences such as this, life and language, the world and the word, are absolutely one. Further, the experience one has of the poetry and one's knowledge of the experience are identical. Poetry is immediate knowledge of individual experience. The poetry creates the experience—as a fusion of the world as experienced and of the person as experiencing—and gives knowledge of the experience as an identity of world and person in a single, seamless act of i.

This theory does not equate poetry with the creative act of God, for it views poetic i. not as a creation out of nothing but as the creation of man and the world, of language and being, out of a material which is its prior condition. But this condition is utterly formless; it is only a hum and buzz, or a pure flux of sensation. In effect, then, poetic i. discovers only what it creates, it knows that which it itself makes. Moreover, in this theory, poetry as we ordinarily think of it is only the highest form of that creative experience in which each of us becomes a human being living in a world. Essentially the creative-knowing act of Stevens' Sunday Morning is the same as the act of a mother singing to her baby, the very act in which the mother evokes in the baby directed love and focused vision and discriminating hearing.

Poetic i. differs from sensation because it is neither passive nor psychological; it is a oneness of person and world expressed in language;

and its language may be words or song or drawing or gesture. It is knowledge, but of an immediate kind, and thus it is prior to conceptual, judgmental, discursive knowledge. There is no claim in poetic i. that its world is either real or unreal or that that world and the experiencing person are distinct; because it is not a self-conscious experience, it does not even contain the claim that it is itself poetic i. Although it is possible to extract concepts and abstract ideas from a poem, in the poem experienced as a poem, these ideas are fused within the i. Vico, who may be credited as the father of this conception of poetry, argued that Homer conceived of Achilles not as a courageous individual or as an example of courage or as courage itself, but as an utter fusion of all of these. In poetic i., in other words, individuality and universality are identical. Poetic i., moreover, is radically distinct from perception, which is the basis of empirical knowledge. If one perceives "the green spot here and now," he observes it as part of a spatial and temporal and chromatic framework, a structure already composed by conceptual thought. It is, of course, possible to perceive rather than intuit poems, to consider their space and time as part of some large, conventional structure within which we live our days. But to do so is to miss the poems as poems. Space and time are abstractions by means of which we think and perceive the world. But poetic i. creates the world and with it our living sense of space and time. The crudeness or fineness of our very ideas of space and time is thus derivative from the quality of our poetic, intuitive experience. Finally, in its purest form, the concept of poetry as i. is at odds with the idea of poetry as self-expression. In a poetic i., self and world, subject and object, are immediately identical. This is the way the world begins. This is the way the self begins. On its basis alone we construct our distinctions, self and world, space and time, real and unreal, truth and error, even beauty and ugliness.

So long as it was believed that a person could intuit an object and then express that intuited object without his act of i. or his act of expression in any way affecting the nature of the object, i. was a useful idea, but not difficult, problematic, illuminating, or fruitful. In all naïvely realistic theories of knowledge, theories based on the belief that an object can be known, as it is, independent of its being known, i. as immediate knowledge, both of images and of ideas, occupied a comfortable but uninteresting place. Of course, such a claim can be argued, and, indeed, A. Grabar has argued that reverse perspective in medieval painting—where the artist, losing himself in the object represented, unfolds his vision out of the object rather than from his own standpoint —has its origin in Plotinus' conception of the soul's losing itself in a simple i. of all reality ("Plotin et les origines de l'esthétique médiévale," Cahiers Archéologiques, 1945). And E. Panofsky has related the emergence in the art of Giotto and Duccio of a perspectival interpretation of space to the Occamite notion that the quality of reality belongs exclusively to particular "things," to those things which can be apprehended by notitia intuitiva (Gothic Architecture and Scholasticism, 1951). Interesting as they are, these connections between theories of i. and certain forms of art have been made consciously only in our century.

Only with Vico and Kant, both of whom recognized that knowing involves making and that therefore i. must be considered as both an object and an act, does the idea of i. become helpful to our understanding of poetry and art. It is true that Baumgarten, who founded and named the discipline of aesthetics, established the aesthetic sphere as cognitio sensitiva, a clear but indistinct form of knowledge anterior to logical cognition. But he found nothing intuitive in poetry, claiming that its knowledge is simply unarticulated (clear but indistinct) logical knowledge. Even Kant, for that matter, does not make a significant connection between poetry and i. But he does explicate i. in such a way as to make it possible for others to explore that connection. According to Kant, men are incapable of intellectual intuitions and therefore cannot know noumena, or things in themselves, immediately. But men can know sensible phenomena immediately. Now it is Kant's explication of sensible, intuitive knowledge which is important for our purposes. He does, it is true, insist, in a conventionally realistic sense, that phenomena are givens, are intuitions which we simply receive. But he discovers an active element in the way we receive them. Phenomena appear to us as they do because of the way in which we receive them. We do this, he finds, according to a priori principles of space and time, principles which themselves are not concepts, but intuitions. The phenomena of a concept are outside it, beneath it, as its instances. The phenomena of space and time, as we intuit them rather than think about them, are embedded within those a priori forms. We see an object in space without reflection, immediately; space as a formative, determining principle and the given object are fused and utterly at one as we experience them intuitively. As fused with their sensible content, space and time are empirical intuitions. Taken in themselves, deprived of content, they are pure intuitions. From this innovative concept of i. as both active and passive it is no great leap to Croce's concept of poetry as pure i. or to Bergson's notion of music as pure durée. Kant did not make the leap himself, either in the Critique of Pure

Reason, where he developed the concept of i., or in the Critique of Judgment, where he considers art and poetry.

In the history of thought, often the most popular theories are not creative discoveries like Kant's, but the regressive theories composed out of fear of the originality of the great thinker. The desire to associate i. with a divine instinct by means of which we become identical with God surely did not lapse because of Kant's critical analysis of i. Schopenhauer, for example, identified artistic genius with intellectual i.—which Kant found to be outside man's capacity—with the pure contemplation of Eternal Ideas. Along with his uncritical notion of the objects of i., Schopenhauer also regressed into old-time fancy with his claim that i. has no active element, but is purely passive and contemplative. For him the agent of i. ceases, in effect, to be an agent. As a "pure knowing subject," he sees in such a way as to leave the object seen unaffected by his seeing. His is "the completest objectivity"; he strips off his individuality, becomes free of time and space, and loses himself in the object. Such a Platonic notion of the annihilation of the viewer in the vision is still to be found in certain theories of poetry as impersonally visionary.

Contrary to the opinion of T. E. Hulme—who translated Bergson's metaphysics into an aesthetics—Bergson's notion of i. is quite different from Schopenhauer's. For Bergson the object of i. is not an Eternal Idea, but the flux of life itself. It is an "intensive manifold"; as Hulme says, it is "an absolute interpenetration," "a complex thing which yet cannot be said to have parts because the parts run into each other, forming a continuous whole" (Speculations, p. 181). Moreover, there is an active element in Bergson's i.: it is a sympathetic and instinctive compenetration of actor and object and is the very opposite of intellectual thinking, which is exterior and fragmentary ("Introduction à la métaphysique," 1893). Such a notion of i. may be found as a subordinate element in some recent Fr. criticism, notably in that of Poulet. Also related to Bergsonian i. is J. Maritain's conception of a poet's i. as "an obscure grasping of his own Self and of things in a knowledge through union or through connaturality which is born in the spiritual unconscious, and which fructifies only in the work" (Creative I. in Art and Poetry, p. 115). Maritain, however, emphasizes "things" in a way alien to Bergson; he even argues that abstract art, by "breaking away from the existential world of Nature, from things and the grasping of things," must fall short of the deepest purposes of art (p. 218). Neo-Thomism (q.v.) is evident in this twist given to i. as object. In the act of i., Maritain like Bergson finds a deep, pulsating self at work, although, unlike Bergson, he finds that the intellect, rather than being excluded from i. as analytical, is caught up in its creative surge and works in harmony with it.

Benedetto Croce brought the concept of poetry as i. to its full fruition. Like Kant, he thinks of i. as an a priori formative principle. Whereas Bergson had distinguished i. as an inner, temporal sense from the exterior, spatializing intellect, Croce conceives of i. as superior to and prior to both our sense of space and our sense of time and as creative of both. Further, he rejects Kant's notion that the a priori intuitive form receives phenomena as given. Abstractly speaking, he will call the flux of feelings the material of poetic i.; but for him the flux takes its first form only within the poetic i., and thus that i. is creative and not imitative. Even though it is creative, it is also a form of knowledge. It is the one way in which one knows (as he creates) people, things, even the world in their individuality and uniqueness. Croce emphasizes his belief that i. involves both making and knowing by means of his formula of poetry as "intuition-expression."

Throughout his career, Croce distinguishes i. sharply from anything passive, like "sensation." One has an i. only if he expresses it, only if he articulates it fully. Against all who felt that he was slighting expression, externalization, all matters of technique and media and genre, Croce insisted that an i. is itself only if fully articulated as an individual and unique expression. It could, he admits, happen in one's head; but distinctions like inner and outer, mind and body, insight and realization, are irrelevant to i. Indeed, so concerned was Croce to insist on the active, expressive element in his notion of poetic i., that from 1912 to 1917 he was advocating the idea that poetic i. is an a priori synthesis of feeling and image. This advocacy was extremely disruptive for his theory, because any such synthesis would of necessity involve mediation and resolution, whereas poetic i., just as necessarily, is nonmediate, an immediate fusion and identity. The result of Croce's effort to treat poetry as both an i. and an a priori synthesis was that the elements of the synthesis, the feeling, the image, and the i., collapsed into each other even as he sought to distinguish them, just as i. and expression were collapsed into an identity in the earliest form of his aesthetics. Croce's theory of poetry has been called an expressive theory, but because of these collapses into immediate identity, the theory is always an intuitive one, even when appearances suggest otherwise. The most significant changes in Croce's theory occurred not in the act but in the object of i. The act remains at all times an immediate awareness which is a shaping, an "intuition-expression." But the object, in 1902, is a fusion of the real and the unreal; in 1908, it is a fusion of unrealized desire and realized action, both experienced as feeling; in 1917, it is a fusion of individuality and universality; and by 1928, it is a fusion of vitality and morality, so that poets without moral preoccupations (like D'Annunzio) are found to be nonpoetic.

In Italy, Croce's theory of poetry as i. was superseded as early as 1932, with the publication of Gentile's Philosophy of Art. But with their emphasis on tradition, most Italians have sought to retain as much as possible of Croce's theory even as they went beyond him. Thus, as Bergsonian intuition works within more advanced Fr. theories of poetry, so Crocian i. is still a ferment in It. theories of poetry as non-intuitive. Such efforts to sustain past achievements when progressing beyond them are distinctive of cultures with rich traditions of poetry.

Brief mention must be made of E. Cassirer's Kantian usage of i. It provides a basis for S. Langer's notion of poetry as immediate "knowledge by acquaintance," as an imitation of the forms of psychic feeling, and also for E. Vivas' theory of poetry as creation and discovery, as an object to be apprehended intuitively, by "intransitive attention." In England R. G. Collingwood developed a theory of poetry dependent on Croce's, but he vacillated indecisively between the idea of poetry as intuitively immediate and a Gentilean notion of poetry as actively mediate. Quite recently M. Oakeshott has argued for what is a Crocean theory of poetry freed of all cognitive claims. Croce no doubt would have called this a theory of poetry as play rather than i.

A. Schopenhauer, The World as Will and Idea, tr. R. B. Haldane and J. Kemp (3 v., 1883); B. Croce, The Essence of Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (1921), Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (2d ed., 1922) and Philos., Poetry, Hist., tr. C. Sprigge (1966); T. E. Hulme, Speculations (1924); I. Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. N. K. Smith (2d print., 1933); R. G. Collingwood, The Principles of Art (1938); E. Cassirer, An Essay on Man (1944) and The Philos. of Symbolic Forms, tr. R. Manheim (II, 1953); S. Langer, Philos. in a New Key (1948); G. de Ruggiero, Da Vico a Kant (4th ed., 1952); J. Maritain, Creative I. in Art and Poetry (1953); E. Vivas, Creation and Discovery (1955); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958); H. Bergson, Oeuvres (centennial ed., 1959); M. Oakeshott, The Voice of Poetry in the Conversation of Mankind (1959); G.N.G. Orsini, Benedetto Croce (1961); J. Starobinski, L'Oeil vivant (1961); G. Svenaeus, Méthodologie et spéculation esthétique (1961); G. Gentile, The Philos. of Art, tr. G. Gullace (1972). M.E.B.

L

LAUREATE. See POET LAUREATE.

M

METACRITICISM. The best use so far found for the prefix "meta-" is that to which it has been put by contemporary philosophers and logicians: it marks a step upward in the language level, from what is talked about to what is talked in. There is the literary work, a discourse, or linguistic entity, which itself may or may not refer to the actual world and may or may not (in some sense) say something about it. There is the discourse of the critic, which refers to the literary work and (presumably) says something about it. And there is metacriticism, which is discourse about criticism. These distinctions have turned out to be no less crucial in literary study than in those fields where they were first developed and are most firmly entrenched: e.g., mathematics vs. metamathematics, science vs. philosophy of science. Nor are they invalidated even if many poems are implicitly "metapoetic," or self-referring, as argued by Rosalie L. Colie, in "My Echoing Song": Andrew Marvell's Poetry of Crit. (1970).

The task of metacriticism is the critical examination of criticism: of its technical terms, its logical structure, its fundamental principles and premises. If the critic asserts that Keats's Lamia is a masterpiece because it embodies the woman-into-serpent archetype (q.v.), the meta-critic will ask: How does the critic know this? What sorts of evidence could establish such an embodiment? Is the concept of archetype sufficiently articulated to serve as a critical tool? Why is the presence of an archetype in a literary work a reason for judging it to be great? These questions go beyond the scope of the critic's concern, which is with the work itself, and which apparently must presuppose, rather than provide, answers to them.

1. RELATIONSHIP TO OTHER DISCIPLINES. In a conveniently broad sense, literary criticism (q.v.) can be said to consist of the class of all existing statements about literary works of art, whether or not made by professional critics. And this class can be considered the subject-matter of metacriticism. But a further distinction within this class has come to be widely acknowledged and employed: that between "internal" and "external" statements. Among the remarks made about literary works are two external sorts: (1) comparative statements, noting the likenesses and differences of literary works or of literary works and other cultural products, and (2) causal statements about the influence of antecedent conditions (including biographical and political conditions as well as previous literary works), about the effects of literary works on individual readers or social processes, and about the ways in which literary works and other objects and events may be symptoms of underlying conditions. These external remarks are frequently assigned to the province of literary history, which is thus distinguished from criticism defined, in its narrower sense, as consisting of statements about the internal properties of literary works (including their semantical properties, if any). This distinction need not commit us to any assumptions about the logical connections, or lack of logical connections, between critical statements and the statements of literary history: it is merely a preliminary way of sorting things out and arranging a reasonable distribution of tasks. The task of the critic would then be to tell us what he knows (or as much as is worth imparting) about the form and content of individual works, and that of the literary historian to trace its conditions and consequences. The question is left open (it is itself a metacritical question) whether, to what extent, or in what ways, the performance of either task depends on the completion of the other.

If we think of criticism—in the narrower sense from now on—as consisting of singular statements about particular poems, short stories, etc., then we immediately wonder whether such statements can be generalized into principles of criticism and, if so, whether these principles can be brought together into a system, in which some principles are seen as logical consequences of other, more fundamental, ones. The endeavor to discover such principles and so connect them belongs to the theory of literature, which is sometimes called "poetics" (q.v.). Two very different examples of this genre are Northrop Frye's Anatomy of Crit. (1957) and Barbara Herrnstein Smith's Poetic Closure (1968). In attempting such a theory, we are still on the same language-level as the critic; we have merely moved (but it is a big move) from the particular to the general, and from isolated generalizations to system. How far criticism can be, or ought to be, systematized in this way is itself an important (metacritical) question; but it is hard to think of any eminent and productive critic who has been content to utter only singular statements, without suggesting some general principles and making an effort to justify them by appeal to other general principles.

Literary theory, moving toward the highest generality of which it is capable, impinges on music theory (e.g., L. B. Meyer, Emotion and Meaning in Music, 1956), art theory (e.g., E. H. Gombrich, Art and Illusion, 2d ed., 1961), etc. It therefore makes sense, though it may be rather bold, to inquire whether the combining of these several theories could not yield generalizations (say, about form, or expression, or meaning, or truth) that would hold for works of art in all media. The search for such a general theory of art—undertaken in very different ways, e.g., by B. Croce (Aesthetic, 1902), T. M. Greene (The Arts and the Art of Crit., 1947), and N. Goodman (Languages of Art, 1968)—is often assigned to aesthetics, as a branch of philosophy. And this is not an unreasonable way of characterizing aesthetics (see T. Munro, The Arts and their Interrelations, 1949).

There is, however, another way, now more generally accepted by philosophers in English-speaking countries who practice philosophical analysis. On this view, the problems of (philosophical, as distinct from psychological) aesthetics are precisely the general and fundamental problems of metacriticism. No one is quite happy about adopting this usage without qualification, for, in the first place, some of the problems of aesthetics can arise in reflection on, say, our tendency to ascribe various beauties and sublimities to natural objects, as well as works of art; and, in the second place, not all of the problems of aesthetics lend themselves readily to formulation as metalinguistic problems, i.e., as problems about the language of criticism. Still, we might say that the central role and dominant character of aesthetics derives from the fact that its main problems are those philosophical problems that arise when we reflect critically on the meaning and logical justification of critical statements (including, of course, literary critical statements).

We must not expect all of these borders to be precisely marked, nor require that every question we ask be instantly and confidently pigeonholed. But the sorting out is extremely important, and clarifies the nature of each of the enterprises. And developments in philosophy and logic and theory of language in recent decades have certainly enabled us to know what we are doing better than earlier theorists could. I. A. Richards' Principles of Literary Crit. (1925) was, in large part, a pioneering work in metacriticism, though it also encompassed some critical theory and some criticism. In his provocative first chapter on "The Chaos of Critical Theories," he listed a number of questions:

What gives the experience of reading a certain poem its value? How is this experience better than another? Why prefer this picture to that? In which ways should we listen to music so as to receive the most valuable moments? Why is one opinion about works of art not as good as another? These are the fundamental questions which criticism is required to answer, together with such preliminary questions—What is a picture, a poem, a piece of music? How can experiences be compared? What is value?—as may be required in order to approach these questions (pp. 5-6).

Some of these questions are not easy to classify without more context, but others clearly belong to different logical realms, and, indeed, one of the reasons for the failure of that most remarkable book is precisely that so many diverse sorts of inquiry were lumped together as though they were of the same order. Certainly, "Why prefer Pope's Rape of the Lock to Tennyson's Locksley Hall?" is precisely a question for the critic. But "What makes one opinion about a poem better than another?" is a metacritical question, since it inquires into the logic of critical judgment. And "What is a poem (i.e., what is the word 'poem' best taken to mean)?" is also a metacritical question, though, once the class of poems has been marked out (if that can be done), then the question what other properties poems always, or generally, have in common is a question for literary theory.

2. THE CLASSIFICATION OF CRITICAL STATEMENTS. Criticism, even in the narrower sense, encompasses a variety of statements, and different kinds of statement give rise to different metacritical problems. So the first, preliminary, task of the metacritic is to find the basic categories into which all critical statements can be sorted. There appear to be at least four such categories:

(a) Descriptions. A critic, or anyone else talking seriously about literary works, may say that a poem contains such-and-such words in such-and-such syntactical combinations; that a poem has a certain pattern of meter or rhyme; that a novel contains certain characters involved in certain events at a certain place and time (see ANALYSIS). More complex (and problematical) descriptions are those that classify literary works into certain genres: this is a sonnet, a tragedy, a pastoral lyric, an epic. (See, e.g., Paul Hernadi, Beyond Genre, 1972.)

(b) Interpretations. Using the term "interpretation"* in the broadest way, to encompass any statement that purports to say what a literary work means, we can distinguish several interpretational tasks, each having its own special features and problems. (i) Unraveling an obscurity or complexity in the texture of the work: saying how a syntactical construction is to be read, or unpacking the meanings of a metaphor. This is called Explication (q.v.). (ii) Interpreting implicit motives or traits of character in the fictional world. This might be called Enucleation. (iii) Interpreting the symbols (q.v.) in a literary work or (what probably comes to the same thing) identifying its themes. This might be called Thematic Elucidation. (iv) Saying what implicit propositions, philosophical or political or other, are embodied in the work. This may be called Exegesis. It has recently been argued (by Guy Sircello, in Mind and Art, 1972) that there is a fifth kind of interpretation, (v) saying what "artistic acts" are performed in the work: e.g., that the author has treated certain characters or events sentimentally, coldly, compassionately, ironically, with calm detachment or with moral indignation.

(c) Explanations. Some of the properties found in literary works are "regional qualities," in that they are qualities of the whole work or of some complex part of it: the overall metrical character, its liveliness, melancholy, or wit (for the term "regional quality," see M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics, 1958, ch. 2). Since these qualities are dependent on the (comparatively local) properties of the subordinate parts, the critic may ask: What specific features of the poem give it its metrical character, its liveliness, melancholy, or wit? A critical explanation will have the form: "It is the presence of such-and-such details (devices) that makes (or helps to make) the poem have such-and-such a regional quality."

(d) Evaluations. To say that a literary work is a good or poor one, or is a better or worse literary work (or poem, or novel, etc.) than another, is to offer an evaluation (q.v.). To say, on the other hand, "I like this poem," or "I prefer this poem to that," or "The poem moves me," is not to evaluate, though such remarks, in certain contexts, may suggest that the speaker is not merely evincing his own feelings but is making, or is prepared to make, a judgment of (literary) value. Statements attributing such regional qualities as beauty, wit, tension, paradox, integrity, power to literary works are sometimes classified as evaluations, and may indeed suggest positive judgments; but they are probably best taken to affirm the presence, not of literary goodness itself, but of grounds of literary goodness. This (basic metacritical) issue is in dispute.

3. SOME PROBLEMS OF METACRITICISM. The problems of metacriticism can be classified in terms of the kinds of critical statement that give rise to them, or, more fundamentally, in terms of the fields of philosophic inquiry into which they lead the pursuer. Instead of attempting a systematic survey here, it will be useful, and will help to clarify the concerns and methods of metacriticism, to list briefly a representative selection of metacritical problems.

(1) When explications conflict, as they sometimes do, the questions arise, first, which of the incompatible explications is correct; and, second, by what procedure the critic can show that an explication is correct or incorrect. The second question invites inquiry into the "logic of explication"—whether, for example, appeal to the author's intention (q.v.) is decisive. The intentional theory is one (but only one) of the nonrelativistic theories of explication; relativism denies that there is in fact any objective way of showing that one explication is better than another. These disputes lead into fundamental questions in the philosophy of language, such as the nature of meaning.

(2) When the novelist makes up a story about nonexistent characters, he uses declarative sentences, but his use of language differs in puzzling ways from the use of language in, say, historical narration. What is distinctive and essential in the fictional use of language? Are the sentences of a work of fiction simply false, like many sentences in works of nonfiction, or "true" in some Pickwickian way about imaginary worlds, or neither true nor false, but exempt from these semantic categories?

(3) When evaluations conflict, as they seem very often to do, is there an objective procedure by which the conflict can be resolved and one judgment can be shown to be more reasonable or more acceptable than the other? Again, the relativist metacritical theory is that no such procedure exists, at least in some cases—perhaps (depending on the kind of relativism) when the disputants are of different periods, or cultures, or simply personal tastes. Nonrelativists tend to stress the role of reasons, or criteria of evaluation, in critical discussion—noting, for example, that the discovery of a high degree of unity (q.v.) in a poem is taken by most critics to be a reason for saying that the poem is good, and is never (or practically never) taken to be a reason for condemning a poem—except, of course, that a highly unified poem may be weak on other grounds, just as a rather disorganized poem may have redeeming merits. Whether critical evaluations can be supported by genuine reasons is an extremely far-reaching problem that leads (as Richards notes in the quotation above) into fundamental problems about the nature of value, especially that kind of value sought in literature.

(4) Whether or not the explicit sentences of a work of fiction may be taken to be true or false, many literary works seem to embody implicit theses of a very general sort—religious, philosophical, etc. (see PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY). The problem of truth in literature is (consciously) whether the truth or falsity of such embodied theses has any logical bearing on the literary goodness or poorness of the work. This problem is closely connected with, though not identical to, the problem of belief (q.v.), which deals (roughly) with the connection between the reader's antecedent beliefs and his understanding and evaluation of the work.

(5) Analogous to the problem of truth is the problem of art and morality: whether any facts about moral aspects of the work (its potentially undesirable political effects, its pornographic nature) have a bearing on its literary goodness. Though the issues involved here trouble the metacritic today less than at earlier periods, they have perennial features and arise in new forms—as, for example, from time to time when Ezra Pound has come up for an award, or when the constitutional problems about obscenity are publicly debated.

4. METACRITICISM AS PHILOSOPHY. Taken most broadly, as philosophy of criticism, metacriticism deals with all aspects of criticism: its language, its procedures, its presuppositions, its functions and values. It may undertake a systematic classification of critical "approaches" or methods, or even devise and propose new strategies: see, for example, the "modes" of criticism distinguished by Richard McKeon, "The Philosophic Bases of Art and Criticism," in R. S. Crane, ed., Critics and Crit. (1953), pp. 530-45, and "Imitation and Criticism," in Thought, Action, and Passion (1954). But its central concern is with the logic of criticism, whose problems (as can be seen from the sample just presented) fall into two large groups: those arising in the attempt to understand and clarify the meaning of the key terms in which criticism is conducted, and those arising in the attempt to analyze and appraise the logical soundness of the critic's arguments in support of his statements.

If there is no such thing as a logic of criticism, in this sense, then metacriticism becomes fairly limited, though of course it is itself a philosophical question whether there is a logic of criticism. It has sometimes been suggested that language works in a special way in critical discourse, and that such key terms as "form" and "beauty" are cognitively meaningless; if such a view could be made plausible, it would eliminate the first group of metacritical problems—unless so-called "emotive meaning" be considered a kind of meaning. It has sometimes been suggested that critical statements work in a special way—are not to be taken as true or false—and that critical argument is not argument in the usual sense (i.e., the supporting of a statement by reasons), but only a way of calling attention to features of literary works and communicating a response to them. If this view could be sustained, then there would be no such thing as a logical justification for the critic's remarks, and no call for an appraisal of it. Certainly advertising literary merits and celebrating the importance of literature may be considered important critical services, but it is hard to see how critics could perform these services if they make no genuine statements or give no genuine reasons to back them up.

The metacritic's first enterprise—the analysis of meaning—raises a conflict within metacriticism (or a metametacritical issue) concerning the scope and limits of metacriticism. Semantic descriptivists take the technical terms of criticism as the critic uses them, and are content merely to study, and make explicit, the way these terms are used—the varied senses of "form," as it is contrasted with other terms; the concept of the "objective correlative" (q.v.) as introduced by Eliot and applied or modified by others. Semantic revisionists are uneasy about stopping there: they consider it part of the metacritic's job to point out where critical vocabulary goes astray (the ambiguities, the areas of vagueness, the inconsistencies in such concepts as that of the "objective correlative"), and where possible to recommend clearer definitions or new terminology (e.g., that the word "form" be used always for the set of relationships within a work). Prescriptivists do not necessarily hope to standardize all critical language, but they think that criticism would be improved and much less discussion wasted if critics could use their key terms in the same clear and explicit senses. Those who conceive of criticism primarily as a literary art are suspicious of such an aim.

The metacritic's second enterprise—the logical appraisal of critical reasoning—raises a second conflict within metacriticism, about the ultimate relationship between criticism and philosophy. Does criticism rest on philosophic (aesthetic) foundations, and does it require to be justified (i.e., to be shown to be a reasonable enterprise) by philosophic arguments? The autonomist view (the view that criticism is independent of philosophy) has been firmly stated by Robert J. Matthews (Diacritics [Spring 1972], p. 28): "Criticism is all right as it stands. It needs no justification." The meta-critic, on this view, has enough to do in getting and making clear the actual reasoning of the critic, bringing out his tacit assumptions, and perhaps even helping him understand better what he is doing. But he does not need to justify criticism itself, or any of its practices. The heteronomist view is that criticism necessarily rests on philosophical foundations whose truth, or at least reasonableness, can be established only by philosophic inquiry. If explication presupposes certain propositions about the nature of meaning, if evaluation presupposes certain propositions about the nature of truth and value, then (on this view) the critic may talk nonsense, or go wildly astray in his work, unless the propositions presupposed are philosophically sound. Some of the issues in the autonomy/heteronomy dispute are articulated by W. K. Wimsatt and T. M. Greene in a symposium, "Is a General Theory of the Arts of Any Practical Value in the Study of Literature?" JAAC (June 1950).

In addition to the works already cited, see also: S. C. Pepper, The Basis of Crit. in the Arts (1945); Abrams (ch. 1); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954) and Hateful Contraries (1965); Wellek and Warren; M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958, esp. Intro.) and (ed.) Lit. and Aesthetics (1968); Aesthetics and Language, ed. W. Elton (1959); J. Stolnitz, Aesthetics and Philos. of Art Crit. (1960); R. E. Lane, The Liberties of Wit: Humanism, Crit. and the Civic Mind (1961); J. Margolis, The Language of Art and Art Crit. (1965); J. Casey, The Language of Crit. (1966); E. Olson, "The Dialectical Foundations of Crit. Pluralism," Texas Quarterly, 9 (1966); M. C. Beardsley, The Possibility of Crit. (1970); M. Peckham, "Theory of Crit.," The Triumph of Romanticism (1970); R. Wellek, Discriminations (1970); F. Jameson, "Metacommentary," PMLA, 86 (1971); In Search of Lit. Theory, ed. M. W. Bloomfield (1972). M.C.B.

MYTH CRITICISM. Much poetry is mythical in the sense of being about supernatural characters and events or of drawing upon them as a frame of reference. And even when poetry is not overtly mythical—when it is, say, concerned with merely human characters in a world without gods—it often has covert connections with myth (q.v.), as when 20th-c. poets describe the destruction of the world, which is an ancient and widespread mythologem or archetype (q.v.). Myth makers are poets, and m. comes into being through mythopoesis, or poetic making; whether or not all poets make myths—some critics (such as R. Chase) regard "m." and "poetry" as largely synonymous—m. provides an essential matrix of all, or at least much, poetry. Focusing upon this mythical matrix, one may say that "literature is only a part, though a central part, of the total mythopoeic structure of concern which extends into religion, philosophy, political theory, and many aspects of history, the vision a society has of its situation, destiny, and ideals, and of reality in terms of those human factors" (N. Frye, 1967). Such a reflection takes one less far from poetry than might appear, since some of the basic elements that poetry derives from m. are recognizable in mathematics and the physical sciences (S. Buchanan, E. Schrödinger). The very development of philosophy required discrimination of mythos from logos, or thinking about m. But it is only recently that thinking about the mythical matrix of literature, and about mythical elements in it, assumed the form that has been called m. criticism. Such criticism expresses concerns felt strongly in the second half of the 20th c., but groundwork for it was laid by many writers earlier, including G. Vico, various of the German romantics, Friedrich Nietzsche, E. B. Tylor, J. G. Frazer, Sigmund Freud, and C. G. Jung. Indeed, since "m." embraces ancient and persistent human concerns, observations about its relation to literature are to be found among numerous earlier literary critics, for example, Samuel Johnson, who has much to say about the aesthetic value of myths incorporated in poetry. It may be useful to regard 20th-c. m. criticism as the outcome of a succession of overlapping cultural moments, which help to define its central concerns; a few names may roughly suggest this development. Richard Wagner saw himself, as an artist, faced by opposing claims of m. and history and consciously chose those of m.; and Friedrich Nietzsche's writings directly reflected kinds of experience that give rise to m. and prophesy, though Nietzsche's Zarathustra declared that God was dead. Writers exploring the possibilities of symbolism (q.v.) created hermetic personal poetry, which, according to some critics (including T. S. Eliot) drew upon the "primitive psyche" expressed in the collective m. of earlier times. Despite Frazer's positivistic assumptions, his massive Golden Bough betrayed a fascination with mythical, magical, and religious materials, which it served to retrieve from the cultural trash heap for writers reacting against positivism. James Joyce, T. S. Eliot, D. H. Lawrence, Thomas Mann, and W. B. Yeats used m. in ways that demanded explanation. And the new criticism (q.v.), in demonstrating not only the strengths but also the limits of a largely formalist approach to literature, led, as one reaction, to an emphasis upon m. in literary criticism. As a result of tendencies suggested by these names, a number of critics came to feel that literature "cannot be limited to the working out of a pattern within the framework imposed by an art form, but rather must be viewed as part of the totality of human experience. Thus the simple separation of form and content, intrinsic and extrinsic values, or the like, falls away even for the purposes of analysis—indeed, especially for such purposes. From this central assumption it is but one further step to assert that literature is part of a social situation and that literary works must be approached primarily as modes of collective belief and action. Myth and ritual, then, become essential qualities of literary expression" (H. M. Block in Vickery). And since m. and ritual also reflect the workings of the human mind, m. criticism overlaps the criticism of psychology and poetry.*

As the name of Nietzsche will suggest, much m. criticism has been directly or indirectly concerned with the origin and nature of drama. The influence of the Cambridge Anthropologists on literary criticism, heralded by G. Murray's essay on Hamlet and Orestes (1914), has been pervasive. Concern with elements of m. and ritual has led F. Fergusson, in an effective study, to see Hamlet as a celebration of the mystery of human life achieved through ceremonious invocations of the well-being of society, these invocations being themselves the means of securing that well-being. Though Hamlet is in important ways modern and skeptical, "even the most cutting ironies of Hamlet do not disavow the mystery which the rituals celebrate, or reject the purposes that inform them" (Fergusson). J. I. M. Stewart has seen Falstaff as a ritual scapegoat, and J. Holloway finds the scapegoat essential to Shakespeare's tragedies. More generally, H. Weisinger has traced the conception of tragedy back to its roots in m. and ritual in the ancient Near East. C. L. Barber has analyzed ways in which Shakespearean comedy achieves "clarification" related to that brought about by folk festivals. The early studies of C. Still (1921) and G. W. Knight (1929) initiated a continuing concern with mythical elements in Shakespeare's last plays. And various critics have studied such elements in Henrik Ibsen and more recent drama (O. Holton, K. Burkman).

Though m. criticism has been largely concerned with narrative, and especially dramatic, content rather than with details of poetic form and technique, several works of nondramatic poetry have been seen as embodying mythical motifs. Critics of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, for example, have arrived at differing views of such motifs in the poem (H. Zimmer, J. Speirs, and C. Moorman). In discussing the visionary landscape of medieval allegory, P. Pehler attempts to define allegory and its relations to m. Milton's Lycidas has been seen as conforming to a cycle of death and rebirth, expressed in vegetation sacred to fertility gods, and in a descent into water and reemergence from it, paralleling the setting and rising of the sun (R. P. Adams in Vickery). Keats's Endymion has also been seen as conforming to a cyclical m., consisting of the Call to the Quest, Acceptance and Descent into the Underworld, Fulfillment of the Quest, and Return, apotheosized by a sacred marriage (R. Harrison in Vickery). Indeed, the m.-making propensities of the romantic poets—their m.-like constructions derived not so much from inherited collective belief as from the impulse to individual symbol formation (Jung)—have received much attention (Frye, 1947, H. Bloom). And indeed, Frye has pointed to Blake as one of the main inspirations behind his own critical labors.

The interests and ideas guiding the works of exegesis reviewed till now have also found expression in the critical system elaborated by Frye, principally in his Anatomy of Crit. This work provides an all-embracing view of literature, with special attention to modes and genres, to thematic and mythical recurrence in literature, and to the ways in which literature, like m., ultimately rests on preconscious ritual. After a "Polemical Introduction," Frye's Anatomy goes on to "Historical Criticism: Theory of Modes," an essay which sees the literary past as consisting of two cycles of five periods each, with each of these periods corresponding to a "mode," defined as a measure of the strength of the hero (for example, of Achilles or of Leopold Bloom) in relation to the world of the fiction in which he occurs, this fictional world, in turn, reflecting the world of the audience for which the work was written. The second essay, "Ethical Crit.: Theory of Symbols," discusses five phases of symbolism—literal, descriptive, formal, archetypal, and analogical—paralleling the five modes of the first essay. The third essay, "Archetypal Crit.: Theory of Myths," is concerned with the ways in which myths and archetypal conventions undergo historical transformation, these elements often serving as structural principles, which may affect the audience without its awareness. The transformations of these elements parallel those of the hero and the symbol, discussed in the first essays. The fourth essay, "Rhetorical Criticism: Theory of Genres," is concerned with genre as something based on its own characteristic rhythm, which may be seen in the overall, continuous flow of the epic or in minute prosodic effects. All of the elements and processes described in the Anatomy arise from "displacements" of m., through which m. is modified by culture so as to be logical, plausible, acceptable in accordance with prevailing stylistic and other norms. But m. remains effective even in these "displacements," since "the structural principles of literature are as closely related to mythology and comparative literature as those of painting are to geometry."

The immense appeal of Frye's critical viewpoint lies, first, in its heuristic aspect—in the way in which it invites the reader to see parallels and interconnections among forms and devices and specific literary works usually regarded as discrete, and second, in its insistence on the derivation of literature from m., not simply as "poetry" but as a fundamental way of apprehending the world. Its appeal was so great that in 1966 M. Krieger could claim that "in what approaches a decade since the publication of his masterwork, he has had an influence—indeed an absolute hold—on a generation of developing literary critics greater and more exclusive than that of any one theorist in recent critical history." Frye's work has been criticized—for being overly schematic, for neglecting style, for remaining too far from a close reading of texts, for using common literary terms in idiosyncratic ways, for surreptitiously gaining vital rhetorical effects through such emotionally colored terms as "archetype" where such plain words as "model" would do as well—and some of the criticisms of Frye shade off into criticisms that have been raised against 20th-c. m. criticism in general. One of these is that m. critics find m. a flight from the reality of history, this flight expressing certain social and political attitudes (P. Rahv). Another is that current interest in m. grants pleasant glimpses of transcendence without the bother of religious commitment and of the threat to intellectual integrity that such commitment might entail. Another is that m. criticism tends to remain on the level of coarse structure, comparing works on the basis of broad similarities, without adequately accounting for specific poetic effects. And still another is that the basic concepts and issues of m. criticism have not been adequately formulated (Weisinger in H. Murray). In general, "m. criticism" names an area of interest, rather than a specific method or viewpoint; indeed, modern criticism attributes a wide range of meanings to "m."—R. Wellek and A. Warren distinguish several—and m. critics are most often heavily indebted to one or more anthropologists, cultural historians, and philosophers for their notably various approaches. Moreover, theoretical m. critics (e.g., N. Frye, R. Graves, and J. Campbell) frequently aspire to a global view—for example through the assumption of a universal Monomyth or Ur-m. that brings all m. and literature into a unity. M. criticism was especially prominent in a period which may be roughly fixed between the dates of Frye's Anatomy, 1957, and of an excellent anthology by Vickery, 1966, which includes essays most of which were written within twenty years of that date. But the mythical matrix of poetry is sufficiently well established and sufficiently important that valuable work in this area will surely continue to be done. This sanguine view is supported by such studies as that of J. Armstrong, who regards the tree and the snake in Sumerian and Greek mythology as a single form expressing a basic imaginative polarity, and with critical sensitivity traces this form in Botticelli's Primavera, in three plays of Shakespeare, in Milton's Paradise Lost, and in Coleridge's The Ancient Mariner and Kubla Khan. As Armstrong asserts, "Myths are the most accurate means that the human mind has devised of representing its own immeasurably complex structure and content. They are essentially poetic formations, and express areas of thought and feeling where, as Blake puts it, 'ideas can only be given in their minutely appropriate words.'"

J. L. Weston, From Ritual to Romance (1920); C. Still, Shakespeare's Mystery Play (1921), The Timeless Theme (1936); G. Murray, The Classical Tradition in Poetry (1927); S. Buchanan, Poetry and Mathematics (1929); G. W. Knight, M. and Miracle (1929); N. Frye, Fearful Symmetry (1947), Anatomy of Crit. (1957), "Lit. and M." [bibliog.], in Relations of Lit. Study, ed. J. Thorpe (1967); R. Graves, The White Goddess (1948); H. Zimmer, The King and the Corpse (1948); J.I.M. Stewart, Character and Motive in Shakespeare (1949); R. Chase, Quest for M. (1949); F.ergusson, The Idea of a Theater (1953); H. Weisinger, Tragedy and the Paradox of the Fortunate Fall (1953); E. Schrödinger, Nature and the Greeks (1954); Wellek and Warren; H. Bloom, Shelley's Mythmaking (1957); J. Speirs, Medieval Eng. Poetry (1957); C. L. Barber, Festive Comedy in Shakespeare (1959); C. Moorman, Arthurian Triptych (1960); M. and Mythmaking, ed. H. A. Murray (1960); J. Holloway, The Story of the Night (1961); M. and Symbol, ed. B. Slotte (1963); G. Durand, Les Structures anthropologiques de l'imaginaire (1963); G. Bachelard, The Poetics of Space, tr. M. Jolas (1964), The Psychoanalysis of Fire, tr. A. Ross (1964); P. Rahv, The M. and the Powerhouse (1965); G. Hartman, "Structuralism: The Anglo American Adventure," YES, 36-37 (1966) and Beyond Formalism

(1970); M. and Lit., ed. J. B. Vickery (1966); Northrop Frye in Modern Crit., ed. M. Krieger (1966); D. Hoffman, Barbarous Knowledge (1967); J. Armstrong, The Paradise M. (1969); W. Willeford, The Fool and His Scepter (1969); O. Holton, Mythic Patterns in Ibsen's

Last Plays (1970); H. Slochower, Mythopoesis (1970); K. Burkman, The Dramatic World of Harold Pinter (1971); P. Pichler, The Visionary Landscape (1971); W. A. Strauss, Descent and Return (1971); L. Feder, Ancient Myth in Modern Poetry (1972). w.w.

N

NEGATIVE CAPABILITY. Keats himself defines his famous phrase as "capable of being in uncertainties, Mysteries, doubts, without any irritable reaching after fact & reason." He adds, "This pursued through Volumes would perhaps take us no further than this, that with a great poet the sense of Beauty overcomes every other consideration, or rather obliterates all consideration." Earlier in the same letter he had said that "the excellence of every Art is its intensity, capable of making all disagreeables evaporate, from their being in close relationship with Beauty & Truth." Later on he was to speak of the virtues of passive receptivity, "budding patiently under the eye of Apollo and taking hints from every noble insect that favors us with a visit." Again, he says of the "poetical character," "It has no character—it enjoys light and shade; it lives in gusto, be it foul or fair, high or low, rich or poor, mean or elevated—it has as much delight in conceiving an Iago as an Imogen."

Keats's statement is an affirmation of the self-contained integrity of art. Beyond this, it is peculiarly characteristic of Keats's own honest and deliberate tentativeness of approach, and it strikingly expresses his preference for the objective and the dramatic modes of poetry.—The Letters of John Keats, ed. H. E. Rollins (2 v., 1958, I, 193, 387); W. J. Bate, Negative Capability: The Intuitive Approach in Keats (1939) and John Keats (1963). R.H.F.

NEW YORK POETS. See AMERICAN POETIC SCHOOLS AND TECHNIQUES (CONTEMPORARY).*

O

ORNAMENT. An embellishment or decoration. Its values are intrinsic rather than instrumental. It is praised for its grace, charm, beauty, its capability of producing an immediate pleasurable response in the spectator. (An o. may, of course, have incidental utilitarian values, and a basically practical object, like a piece of furniture, may have ornamental values added to it.) In certain ages and cultures, the fine arts, including poetry, have been regarded as ornaments. They have been associated with discriminating taste, refinement, leisure, and a high level of civilization. At other times, a stress on the ornamental values of poetry has connoted superficiality, frivolity, and the decadence of a period in which poets cultivate art for its own sake.

Within poetics, the term "o." has appeared regularly in the long tradition of pragmatic criticism, particularly in those forms of pragmatic criticism that see a close relationship between poetry and rhetoric (see POETRY, THEORIES OF [PRAGMATIC THEORIES]). In classical rhetoric, "o." is a part of the vocabulary of discussions of style (q.v.). After the content of a speech has been invented and outlined, it is dressed in language and, if desirable, decked out in appropriate o. An ornate style is defined as an artistic deviation of considerable degree from ordinary usage in choice of words or word orders. Such deviations, because of their artistry and novelty, give pleasure to the hearer (and may also contribute to the orator's persuasive purpose). The means for the heightening and exornation of style that apply in oratory apply even more fully to poetry. Thus classical, medieval, and Renaissance theorists spent much time in identifying and classifying these "flowers," "gems," and "colors" of expression. Distinctions were made between schemes and tropes, figures of speech (q.v.) and figures of thought, and "difficult" and "easy" ornaments (as in Geoffrey of Vinsauf; also see TROPE). Also characteristic of rhetorical poetics was the attempt to determine the kind and amount of stylistic o. that should be included in a poem. Although there always have been practitioners and admirers of the florid (a style which, since classical times, has been known as "Asiatic"; see also AUREATE LANGUAGE, EUPHUISM, and MANNERISM), most theorists sought to develop a set of principles for guiding an author in the tasteful and effective use of o. These principles involved considerations of decorum and genre and, most important, appropriateness to an author's subject, purpose, or audience. Thus, as R. Tuve has pointed out, the justification in medieval and Renaissance theory for figurative language stressed the functional as well as the ornamental values of figures. Figures are good because they catch the reader's attention, keep him in a state of pleasurable anticipation, and delight his imagination. They can also have more directly functional values; they can assist the persuasive process by clarifying and vivifying the abstract, generating emotion, and moving the will. The functional justification of figures was most complete in Platonizing thinkers of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance who considered some figures—notably allegory, symbol, and metaphor—to be the indispensable means for revealing the light, beauty, and harmony of spiritual reality; thus in a successful figure ornamental and functional values coalesce.

Neoclassical critics, particularly those who stressed the intrinsic values of poetry, continued to find use for the term "o." As in earlier criticism, o. was used to refer not only to figurative language but also to other parts of a poem. For example, the musical qualities of language are pleasing accessories or added embellishments. Dryden speaks of adorning a poem with noble thoughts. Sometimes the plot of a dramatic poem is regarded as a naked structure which is ornamented with a variety of interesting characters, moving episodes (including digressions), and finely wrought speeches. Indeed, almost any aspect of a poem which could be a separate source of pleasure could be called an o. Neoclassical critics who stressed instruction, the other of the Horatian twin aims of poetry, also continued to speak of the "beauties" or "ornaments" of poetry. Pleasure, though a secondary aim, is the necessary sugarcoating to get the audience to swallow the pill of instruction.

The theory of o. gradually disappeared during the 19th c. Romantic critics formulated theories of the interdependence or identity of form and content, thought and expression. Thus the term "o.," with its connotation of adventitiousness, was no longer applicable. Similarly, in the 20th c., theories of poetry as organism (q.v.) explicitly oppose themselves to ornamentalist views. The possible intrinsic values of any part of a poem are declared unimportant or irrelevant, and only functional values are praised. Functional values are defined in terms of the interdependence of the parts of a poem and their contribution to the organic unity of the poem. When, as in Cleanth Brooks, the organic unity is described as a structure of meanings, metaphor and other figures are said to be functional only when they contribute to this structure. Organicism refuses to praise any part of a poem as a source of independent pleasure, and the term "o." is regarded with suspicion.

G. Putterham, The Arte of Eng. Poesie (1589, esp. Book III, "Of O."); B. Croce, Aesthetic (1901); E. Faral, Les Arts poétiques du xiii^e et du xiiii^e siècle (1924); E. de Bruyne, Études d'esthétique médiévale (3 v., 1946); A. Coomaraswamy, Figures of Speech or Figures of Thought (1946); R. Tuve, Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery (1947); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500-1700 (1956); Weinberg; Geoffrey of Vinsauf, Documentum de Modo et Arte Dictandi et Versificandi, tr. R. P. Parr (1968) and Poetria Nova, tr. J. B. Kopp, in Three Medieval Rhetorical Arts, ed. J. J. Murphy (1971); W. Wetherbee, Platonism and Poetry in the Twelfth C. (1972).

F.G.

P

PERSONA. An ancient distinction, explicit in Plato and Aristotle, is between poems or parts of poems in which a poet speaks in his own person and those in which a character that he has created is speaking. Poets themselves have written in terms of this distinction: Wordsworth obviously intended that the speaker of The Prelude be taken as himself; just as obviously he intended that the speaker of The Affliction of Margaret be taken as a dramatic character.

In "The Three Voices of Poetry," T. S.

Eliot has refined upon this distinction. When a poet is speaking in his own person, he may be either speaking to himself (his meditative voice) or addressing a real-life audience (his rhetorical voice). The rhetorical voice is heard in satire and other forms of didactic poetry. It is also heard, according to Eliot, in the dramatic monologue, whose peculiar aesthetic effect is due to the reader's recognition that the poet is not creating a true dramatic personality but is merely mimicking a character, whether historical or invented. He approves of Ezra Pound's use of the term "persona" as a name for the voice of the poet heard in the dramatic monologue. He equates "p." with "assuming a role" and "speaking through a mask."

Other modern critics have asked whether it is ever legitimate or desirable to say, as Eliot does, that a poet is speaking in his own person in a poem. For example, modern objectivist critics argue that this position is a relic of romantic expressionism (Wordsworth said that the poet is a "man speaking to men"), which sends critics off on wild-goose chases after authors' intentions. Further, whether a poem, dramatic or nondramatic, reflects its author's attitudes and beliefs is a question that belongs to biography and not to criticism; frequently, particularly with older or anonymous poems, it is a question impossible to settle. And, finally, the expressionist position inevitably raises the question of the author's sincerity (q.v.), a standard of evaluation, beloved by the romantics, whose correct application, however, seems to necessitate an act of intuitive insight. Since a poem is good only if it is an entity complete in itself, criticism of the poem should proceed without reference to its author. Hence objectivist critics have recommended that all poems be regarded as dramatic fictions and that the term "p.," rather than the name of the author, be used to refer to the speaker of the poem (if it has one). Thus the lyric, which in the 19th c. meant a poem "directly expressing the poet's own thoughts and sentiments" (O.E.D.), becomes assimilated to the dramatic monologue. And the term "p." is applied indiscriminately to the speakers in Browning's My Last Duchess, Rabbi Ben Ezra, and By the Fireside.

Rhetorically oriented modern critics, like Wayne C. Booth, also recommend making a sharp distinction between the real-life author and the "implied author" (the "second self" or "p.") that the real-life author, consciously or unconsciously, incorporates into his work. The implied author, who may or may not be the narrator, is a fictional personality present in every literary work, even in a purely dramatic work like a Shakespearean play. His presence may serve many functions, but the principal one is to supply the norms in terms of which the characters and their actions are judged. The degree to which the implied author reveals himself and the nature of the norms that he espouses are dictated by the effects that the author wishes his work to have. This is clearly seen in didactic works; for example, Elder Olson shows how Pope's persuasive purpose in The Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot is served by his endowing the "p." of the poem with admirable intellectual and moral qualities. According to Booth, the author of an imaginative or mimetic work must exercise similar care in creating his implied author if his work is to secure the intended emotional response from his readers. As in objectivist criticism, considerations of the sincerity of the author and the degree to which the implied author does or does not represent the norms of the real-life author are relegated to biography.

The reaction of modern criticism to romantic expressionism is not the only cause for the present popularity of the term "p." The advantages that accrue to the artist from his use of a p. or mask or disguise have been widely discussed by Yeats and others. The mask permits the poet to say things that for various reasons he could not say in his own person or could say only with a loss of artistic detachment; the mask permits the poet to explore various life-styles without making an ultimate commitment; it is a means for creating, discovering, or defining the self; it prevents the artist from being hurt by self-exposure or being duped by the limitations of his own vision; it is a means for the expression of ideals that the poet may not be able to realize in his personal life; it is an indispensable condition for effective personal communication. Recent studies in psychology and sociology also have influenced literary critics in their use of the concept of p. Depth psychologists need the concept to talk about the relations between the conscious and unconscious parts of the psyche (Jung opposes the p., the self a man assumes to play his social role, to the anima, a man's true inner being). Behaviorist psychologists stress the importance of role-playing for the development of personality and for satisfactory adjustment to life. These ideas have required the formulation of new definitions of "self," "personal identity," "hypocrisy," and "sincerity," both for the purposes of psychology and literary criticism. See also voice.*

E. Olson, "Rhetoric and the Appreciation of Pope," MP, 37 (1939); W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Intentional Fallacy," SR, 54 (1946); T. S. Eliot, "The Three Voices of Poetry," in On Poetry and Poets (1957); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958); G. T. Wright, The Poet in the Poem (1960); W. C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961); W. J. Ong, The Barbarian Within (1962); I. Ehrenpreis, "Personae," Restoration and 18th-C. Lit., ed. C. Camden (1963); A. Cook, "Person" in his Prisms: Studies in Modern Lit. (1967); D. Geiger, The Dramatic Impulse in Modern Poetics (1967); L. Trilling, Sincerity and Authenticity (1972).

F.G.

PHENOMENOLOGY. Modern p. presents itself as an epistemologically neutral instrument for inspecting the data of consciousness. Its founder, Edmund Husserl, characterized it as a "return to experience," insofar as it tries to delineate the very textures of the lived world, the taken-for-granted orbit of immediate and concrete awareness. Husserl defined the goals of p. as twofold: (1) "a pure psychology, parallel to natural science," in which the psychical would be cleanly separated from the physical; and (2) a universal methodology for the restructuring of all the sciences, a transcendental philosophy in the sense that it would disclose the fundamental structures or permanent categories of consciousness itself.

As a starting point Husserl adapted Franz Brentano's axiom that all psychical being is "intentional": awareness exists only in terms of a relation between subject and object; mental states (even hallucinations) always have reference to a content. In Husserl's synthesis this principle means that to be conscious of something is not simply to possess that something passively, as if consciousness were merely a kind of container. While an object may have independent existence, it has no independent intelligibility; it requires a consciousness to give it genuine reality. Accordingly, Husserl's exploration of phenomena is unconcerned with a noumenal realm "behind" them: p. aims at an acausal analysis that restricts itself to exhaustive description of what is directly given in awareness.

Such analysis can begin only when we move away from the "natural attitude"—in which we remain unreflectively oriented toward the object-pole of our knowledge—and into "phenomenological meditation." Husserl proposed that p. proceed by means of a positive naïveté, a mode of scrutiny in which common-sense assumptions about reality undergo "suspension" (epoché). A phenomenon under consideration is "bracketed": all presuppositions, inferences, and judgments about it, including the issue of its spatio-temporal existence, are held in abeyance. This purifying phase of meditation frees the phenomenologist to examine the essential structure of the individual phenomenon. As he attends to the residual given, he may describe the object of consciousness in its multiple perspectives and attempt a series of "reductions," focusing awareness so as to intuit whatever reveals itself as essential in the phenomenon (eidetic reduction)—or even in the pure stream of consciousness itself (transcendental reduction). Thus, as Monroe Beardsley has commented, the term "reduction" is in one sense misleading, since the phenomenologist "proposes only to face, without management or manipulation, experience in all its richness."

P. AND POETRY. The aims and methods of p. have much in common with those of art, and of poetry in particular. First, insofar as p. explores through language the is-ness of experience and the textures of the lived world, its quest might be construed as essentially literary. P. here adumbrates an existential concern with the irreducibility of experience. Logical analysis, as a philosophical method, may be seen as a threat to the integrity of consciousness, as in Maurice Merleau-Ponty's observation, "The world is not what I think, but what I live." Merleau-Ponty, Martin Heidegger, and others influenced by p. have been led to express many philosophical insights in poetic and fictional terms, to suggest that literature may represent the truest form of philosophy, and to use art (especially poetry) as an important source of information about perception and various mental states. All literature ultimately engages in analyzing the data of consciousness, and even apparent records of subconscious activity are given in terms of conscious apprehension.

Some commentators have gone even further in pointing out the aesthetic orientation of p. Fritz Kaufman defines art as a reformation of consciousness, and thus as essentially phenomenological in converting "the natural attitude toward the experienced world" into a meditative attitude toward one's experiencing of the world. In the art work, as in p., the question of the existence or nonexistence of represented objects is "neutralized," and "reductions, methodically carried through in p., happen to find an automatic fulfillment in art." Neal Oxenhandler, in a seminal essay on Mallarmé, applies this insight more specifically to poetry. Every poet may be said to perform an epoché, suspending his belief in the spatio-temporal world "in order to consider objects anew within the field of pure consciousness." Both p. and poetry proceed from the assumption of the priority of consciousness: p. tells us that "objects can be apprehended only as correlates of intentional consciousness"; and in poetry, language "summons or creates the world to live within itself." Mallarmé provides the paradigm of the power of creative consciousness to constitute a world by means of language: "I say: a flower! and, from out of that oblivion to which my voice relegates any contour, insofar as it differs from the calices as known, musically arises, idea selfsame and suave, the one that is absent from all bouquets."

Oxenhandler claims that even literary "realism" is a form of p., because the relationship it posits between the imaginary world and the fact-world is always tentative, "as if we were directly regarding the world of contingent, factual experience." But p. would seem to have stronger affinities with literary works in which the imaginary world has no primary connection to the fact-world, but rather "a direct and immediate relationship to pure consciousness." This would account for the popularized use of the term "phenomenological" to describe some contemporary experimental literature (e.g., the fiction of Alain Robbe-Grillet) in which the experiencing mind is rendered as directly as possible, without regard to conventional psychological interpretation or to standard expectations of point of view, character, or plot. More importantly, it would account for the attraction of many phenomenologists and phenomenological critics to lyrically subjective poets (e.g., Mallarmé, Hölderlin, Wallace Stevens) whose works set up coherent imaginative universes of their own.

P. AND POETICS. The concerns of p. have influenced most modern Continental critics, especially existentialists, and have found an extremely vital application in the work of the Geneva School.* But the clearest relations between p. and poetics have been drawn by three theorists—Gaston Bachelard, Roman Ingarden, and Mikel Dufrenne—whose conclusions, although not fully consonant with one another, converge on an aesthetic orientation to literature. In the comparisons between p. and poetry cited above, certain themes—such as the active nature of all knowledge, the autonomy of the aesthetic object and its invulnerability to paraphrase, and the disinterestedness of aesthetic experience—suggest analogies to the critical position first developed by Immanuel Kant. Bachelard, Ingarden, and Dufrenne provide interesting modifications of this position, and their precise applications of p. may be examined in terms of three traditional issues.

1. Imagination. Because its descriptions of experience leave aside standard issues of causality, p. tends to use "consciousness" as an inclusive concept and to avoid the vocabulary of faculty psychologies. The term "imagination" would seem to be an exception, but it is in fact used to designate a kind of act rather than a power. In this regard, p. emphasizes a radical contrast between imagination and perception. In his early work in p., Jean-Paul Sartre characterizes all functions of imagination (including daydream images) as negations of perception (making present what is absent, and absent what is present), and he offers this capacity for "unrealizing" as evidence of human freedom. Imagination-as-freedom is a major theme in phenomenological poetics: it is a means of countering physicalist and psychoanalytical oversimplifications of experience, and of arguing that the aesthetic object can constitute a self-sufficient world of its own. Bachelard defines imagination as a fundamental openness, even a mode of "escape," and he sees its exercise as a means of psychic wholeness: "A being deprived of the function of the unreal is a neurotic just as much as one deprived of the function of the real." For Bachelard poetry can provide the fullest manifestation of imagination, but artistic functions are not qualitatively different from other imaginative acts. For Dufrenne, however, aesthetic experience is correlated with a specifically "transcendental" imagination which can create an autonomous spatiotemporal field having no connection to our previous experience. By means of imagination, an aesthetic object carries its own meaning completely within itself, so much so that all art could in a sense be characterized as non-representational.

Insofar as these theorists define imagination almost exclusively as a mode of freedom, they undercut traditional emphases on the creative faculty as an essentially unifying and synthesizing power. The fact is that phenomenological critics are generally less concerned with formal imagination than material imagination. Bachelard best exemplifies this tendency. Although he describes his total critical endeavor as a "p. of the imagination," he proposes to say nothing about how the poetic mind labors to bring a whole work to completion; in examining a poem, he restricts himself to "the level of detached images" and tries to gauge their dynamism, suggestiveness, and richness of ambivalence. His exploration of the subjective structure of material images is presented in a series of books on earth, air, fire, and water—considered not as objective substances, but as archetypal categories of lived experience. Material imagination can also be studied through its manipulation of the categories of space and time, a method epitomized in The Poetics of Space. Here Bachelard treats "images of felicitous space" in literature, examining various "worlds"—such as houses, wardrobes, and nests—as lived spaces which have been seized on by the imagination and invested with psychical values (e.g., intimacy or openness). A similar approach has been used extensively by the Geneva critics, as in Georges Poulet's Studies in Human Time or Jean Rousset's The Interior and the Exterior.

2. Poetic ontology. One analogue in American criticism to the phenomenological analysis of imagination is John Crowe Ransom's neo-Kantian emphasis on "irrelevant texture" in poetry, by means of which the fullness and richness of phenomenal particularity ("the world's body") is returned to us. But the general tendency among Ransom's fellow new critics (see NEW CRITICISM) has been toward a theory of formal imagination, and thus toward the explication of whole poems in terms of unity as an aesthetic value. Oxenhandler has observed that the new-critical conception of literary being is essentially Aristotelian—the poem as a made object, having a discrete existence and a special ontology. For phenomenological critics on the other hand, “the poem does not have an independent existence. It is simply part of consciousness; and in the measure that it appears to us, within consciousness, it has being—it is.”

This contrast accounts for some of the most striking features of Geneva criticism: unabashed affectivity; a “sympathy” that blurs the distinction between the creative and critical acts; a de-emphasis of the wholeness of any one text, in favor of the consistency and uniqueness of the imaginary universe projected throughout an author's total body of work. A sharp contrast with new criticism, however, does not fully illuminate the somewhat ambiguous positions of Dufrenne and Ingarden on the question of poetic ontology. Both propose to deal not with the “work of art” as such, but with the “aesthetic object”—i.e., the work as incarnated in experience. Both then proceed to discuss this object as if it were a coherent entity with a special mode of being. Dufrenne denies that a work of art has an ideal existence, but he asserts that the aesthetic object, unlike other objects in our phenomenal field, can step out of the ordinary world of space and time. It has not only an “outside” but an “inside”: an autonomous spatio-temporal world of its own. Moreover, it has an “expressed” world; a unique soul that permeates and gives life to the matter of the work. Thus the object is also a quasi-subject. Dufrenne, ascribing to it “the coherence of a character,” seems to grant it some measure of aesthetic integrity.

Ingarden, accused by Dufrenne of “rationalism,” goes even further toward a rapprochement with the Aristotelian conception of literary being. He claims that Aristotle was “naïve” in giving a pseudo-empirical account of literary objects, but that the Poetics is genuinely significant for its unremitting attention to general structural features of works. Aristotelian analysis is akin to p. insofar as it encourages exhaustive description of a work's inherent qualities and their organization, before attempting (if at all) to relate the work to the world external to it.

For Ingarden a poem is an “intentional object” which achieves distinctness and self-presence only as it is concretized in a direct experience by a reader or listener. But the nature of this experience is in part governed by qualities and relationships in the four “strata” of the work: word-sounds, the meanings of the words and sentences (which exist in a literary work only as quasi-meanings, because their function of affirmation has been “neutralized”), the objects represented (people, things, incidents), and schematized images of these objects (made more complete in the imagination of each reader). Ingarden explores various literary possibilities within each stratum, and he examines the progressive series of determinations—from sound to sense to representation to appearance—that gives a sense of depth to the aesthetic object. When he finally argues that the “polyphonic harmony” of all of these elements is a key aesthetic value, Ingarden establishes a standard of coherence at least vaguely analogous to that of Aristotle or the new critics.

3. Aesthetic Experience. Although p. does not encourage evaluation in criticism, it does provide an excellent set of concepts and terms for the celebration of aesthetic experience in general. First of all, it characterizes literary response as fundamentally active: a process of “bracketing” in which the reader leaves aside all presuppositions and attends to the aesthetic object as directly given, becoming fully absorbed in it. Poulet describes this openness as a healthy kind of surrender which gives at least the sense of true intersubjectivity: “When I read as I ought, i.e. without mental reservation, without any desire to preserve my independence of judgment, and with the total commitment required of any reader, my comprehension becomes intuitive and any feeling proposed to me is immediately assumed by me.” In this state “I am persuaded . . . that I am freed from my usual sense of incompatibility between my consciousness and its objects.”

These comments accord with Bachelard's presentation of imagination as a liberating transformation of our ordinary sense of reality. Bachelard discusses aesthetic experience as a mode of “reverie”—not a nebulous dream state, but a condition of repose (like phenomenological meditation) in which consciousness is fully engaged and finely focused. Moreover, he treats this experience as archetypal—a return to the primordial images and structures of consciousness—and thus as a special fulfillment and refreshment of our humanity.

Dufrenne points out the paradox in aesthetic experience of a psychological detachment coexisting with a profound involvement, and he sees this as an affirmative response of the whole self. Although meaning in art remains completely immanent, aesthetic experience is a valid form of knowledge—ultimately a self-epiphany. The object's aura of imaginative freedom evokes a response of imaginative freedom, and the object's depth reveals a corresponding depth within the self.

Ingarden's account of aesthetic experience is grounded in a consideration of representational literature. He attributes "value-qualities" to each stratum of a work, but the most important are those emanating from its represented world. Ingarden identifies them as aspects of life itself (e.g., the tragic, the seductive, the charming) which suffuse a whole work with a generic character or distinctive tone. In calling these qualities "metaphysical," Ingarden suggests that meaning in literature does not remain merely immanent. One value of aesthetic experience is that certain aspects of life, including those which might cause distress if encountered in personal experience, can be contemplated in serenity and detachment, and we may thus arrive at new insights into our existence. (Again, Ingarden's position is analogous to Aristotle's.)

The critical themes which have been sketched here—imagination as a source of freedom and as an act grounded in material categories, the literary work as an autonomous intentional object, the experiencing of the work as a humanly fulfilling meditation—all suggest the fundamentally aesthetic orientation of phenomenological poetics. This same orientation is evident in other applications of p., both direct and indirect: the lively practical criticism of the Geneva School; the elaboration in modern fictional theory of such traditional concepts as the authorial self, symbolism, and character (e.g., by J. Hillis Miller, Paul Brodtkorb, and William Gass, respectively); and analyses of arts other than literature—most interestingly, the treatments of film by Ingarden, Eugene Kaelin, and some contemporary "auteur critics." The rhetoric of p. gives priority to such aesthetic qualities as intensity or élan, novelty, universality, and complexity of texture. But equally significant is the readiness of phenomenological critics to delineate all that is given in aesthetic awareness, to speak as if even the most tenuous features of a work—what Beardsley calls "human regional qualities" (e.g., warmth, elegance, plenitude)—were no less "real" than those qualities we normally think of as objective.

E. Husserl, "P.," tr. C. V. Solomon, in Encyclopedia Britannica (14th ed., 1927), Ideas, tr. W.R.B. Gibson (1931), Cartesian Meditations, tr. D. Cairns (1960); F. Kaufman, "Art and P.," in Philosophical Essays in Memory of Edmund Husserl, ed. M. Farber (1940); G. Bachelard, L'Air et les songes (1943), The Poetics of Space, tr. M. Jolas (1964), On Poetic Imagination and Reverie, ed. and tr. C. Gaudin (1971); J.-P. Sartre, The Psychology of Imagination, tr. B. Frechtman (1948); M. Heidegger, Erläuterungen zu Hölderlins Dichtung (2d ed., 1951), Being and Time, tr. J. Macquarrie and E. Robinson (1962); M. Dufrenne, Phénoménologie de l'expérience esthétique (2 v., 1953; Eng. tr. by E. S. Casey and others in 1973), Le Poétique (1963), "Critique littéraire et phénoménologie," Revue internationale de philosophie, 69 (1964); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958), Aesthetics from Classical Greece to the Present (1966); J. H. Miller, Charles Dickens: The World of His Novels (1958); H. Spiegelberg, The Phenomenological Movement (2 v., 1960), "On Some Human Uses of P.," in P. in Perspective, ed. F. J. Smith (1970); N. Oxenhandler, "Ontological Crit. in America and France," MLR, 55 (1960), "The Quest for Pure Consciousness in Husserl and Mallarmé," in The Quest for Imagination, ed. O. B. Hardison (1971); R. Ingarden, "A Marginal Commentary on Aristotle's Poetics," tr. H. R. Michejda, JAAC, 20 (1962), Das literarische Kunstwerk (4th ed., 1972); M. Merleau-Ponty, Sense and Nonsense, tr. H. L. and P. A. Dreyfus (1964), Signs, tr. R. C. McCleary (1964); P. Brodtkorb, Ishmael's White World (1965); P. Ricoeur, Husserl, tr. E. G. Ballard and L. E. Embree (1967); S. N. Lawall, Critics of Consciousness (1968); G. Poulet, "P. of Reading," NLH, 1 (1969); E. F. Kaelin, Art and Existence (1970); W. Gass, Fiction and the Figures of Life (1971); R. Magliola, "The Phenomenological Approach to Lit.: Its Theory and Methodology," Language and Style, 5 (1972).

K.K.

PLAINT. See COMPLAINT.

POETIC CLOSURE refers most broadly to the manner in which poems end or the qualities that characterize their conclusions. More specifically, the term is used to refer to the achievement of an effect of finality, resolution, and stability at the end of a poem. In the latter sense, p.c. appears to be a universally valued quality, the achievement of which is not confined to the poetry of any particular period or nation. Its modes and the techniques by which it is secured do, however, vary in accord with stylistic, particularly structural, variables.

Closural effects are primarily a function of the reader's perception of a poem's total structure; i.e., they depend upon his experience of the relation of the concluding portion of a poem to the entire composition. The generating principles that constitute a poem's formal and thematic structure characteristically arouse in the reader continuously changing sets of expectations, which elicit from him various "hypotheses" concerning the poem's immediate direction and ultimate design. Successful closure occurs when, at the end of a poem, the reader is left without residual expectations; his developing hypotheses have been confirmed and validated (or, in the case of "surprise" endings, the unexpected turn has been accommodated and justified retrospectively), and he is left with a sense of the poem's completeness, which is to say of the integrity of his own experience of it and the appropriateness of its cessation at that point.

Closure may be strengthened by certain specifically terminal features in a poem, i.e., things that happen at the end of it. These include the repetition and balance of formal elements (as in alliteration and parallelism), explicit allusions to finality and repose, and the terminal return, after a deviation, to a previously established structural "norm" (e.g., a metrical norm). Closural failures (e.g., anticlimax) usually involve factors that, for one reason or another, leave the reader with residual expectations. They may also arise from weak or incompatible structural principles or from a stylistic discrepancy between the structure of the poem and its mode of closure. Weak closure may, however, be deliberately cultivated, and it has been observed that much modern poetry shares with modern works in other genres and artforms a tendency toward apparent "anti-closure," i.e., the rejection of strong closural effects in favor of irresolution, incompleteness and, more generally, a quality of "openness."—B. H. Smith, Poetic Closure: A Study of How Poems End (1968).
B.H.S.

POETRY AND THE OTHER ARTS. PARALLELISM AND INTERRELATIONS. At the beginning of his Poetics Aristotle sees various art-forms as having in common an essential representation of life or mimesis; and Cicero later remarks generally in his Pro Archia (1.2) upon "the subtle bond of mutual relationship" among the arts. More specifically, Simonides of Ceos (ca. 556–468 B.C.) is cited in an early work of Plutarch (De Gloria Atheniensium 3.347a) as calling poetry "a speaking picture" and referring to painting as "silent poetry." Horace, in a famous passage (Ars Poetica 361), similarly likens a poem to a picture (see UT PICTURA POESIS) and further urges "the labor of the file" (limae labor) in the fashioning of verse.

If poetry, in the terms of Horace and Simonides, thus has certain affinities with painting and the plastic arts in general, its relationships with music are deeply rooted in the very concept of lyric poetry (originally conceived among the Greeks to mean poetry sung to the accompaniment of the lyre). In medieval Europe this immediate interrelationship survived in the troubadour poets of Provence and the German minnesingers; but, with continuing development of music as a discrete art-form, music and poetry lost much of the immediacy of their earlier communion, while a somewhat confusing vocabulary of related terms (music, harmony, rhythm, etc.) survives in relation to both arts to perplex us even today. Yet music and poetry continue their mutual inspiration, and many of the parallels and interrelations between them still fascinate critical and poetic minds and challenge and puzzle philosophers.

Persistence of numerology and number-symbolism in Western thought is important in certain aspects of interrelationship between poetry and the other arts. The chapter of Mario Praz's Mnemosyne entitled "Sameness of Structure in a Variety of Media" shows the significance of the domination of Greek art by Pythagorean and Platonic ideas with their mystical cosmological number-symbolism. In such terms Hans Kayser has equated the structure of a Greek temple to music, and Praz considers it equally appropriate to compare it to the structure of a Greek tragedy. He traces in similar fashion the influence of the Pythagorean tradition during the medieval period in the building of the Gothic cathedrals and cites Willi Drost and Erwin Panofsky as seeing "a perfect correspondence between the Gothic cathedral and scholastic philosophy." According to medieval theories of numerical structure, as R. A. Peck has observed, "things measured by the same numbers were thought to be in some way correspondent" and could therefore help one to comprehend something of the patterning of God's creation. Thus numerology and number-symbolism (drawing upon the famous phrase from the Wisdom of Solomon, 11:21: "sed omnia in mensura et numero et pondere disposuisti"—"But You [God] arranged all things in proportion and number and weight") permeated medieval man's theory of poetics as well as his theory of Nature and served with their attendant religious orientation to provide a powerful uniting force between poetry and all the other arts. Ernst Robert Curtius has remarkable sections in his European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages (1953) on "Numerical Composition" and "Numerical Apophthegms" which demonstrate at least something of the superficialities of the matter and show the persistent influence of a philosophic and mystical numerically controlled form in poetry.

In a less mystical and less philosophical sense, it is obvious that poetry frequently borrows from the other arts and that they in turn borrow from poetry. A few examples will serve here to suggest how rich this interchange has been. Poetry draws striking effects from painting or the plastic arts generally in such famous examples as Homer's description of the shield of Achilles (Iliad 18.478–608) and Vergil's of the shield of Aeneas (Aeneid 8.625–731)—the paintings on the garden wall in Guillaume de Lorris's first part of Le Roman de la Rose—Dante's "visible speech" in the lovely sculpture of the Annunciation and the sculptures of David and Trajan in the tenth canto of the Purgatory—Chaucer's description of the monuments to episodes from the Aeneid in The House of Fame (1.119–467)—and, in more modern times, Keats's Ode on a Grecian Urn and Gautier's and the Parnassians' numerous transpositions d'art. Examples are limitless. Jean Hagstrum has even shown how descriptive poets created romantic landscapes by turning into verse the themes of such seventeenth-century painters as Claude Lorrain and Salvator Rosa. A gallery of pictures drawn from poetry could be similarly impressive in illustrations for the writings of such poets as Homer, Vergil, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, La Fontaine, Goethe, and Byron. Baudelaire, one of the finest of literary art critics, wrote that the best critical account of a painting may be a sonnet or an elegy and offered in his poem Les Phares eight notable impressionistic quatrains on the work of eight separate painters and sculptors.

Poets have written fine poems inspired by music, like Fray Luis de Leon's Oda a Francisco Salinas and Dryden's two Songs for Saint Cecilia's Day (1687, 1697); and innumerable poems have been set to music (as an extreme example one may cite Les papillons by Théophile Gautier for which 43 different composers are listed by Spoelberch de Lovenjoul). As for relations in poetic form, Calvin Brown has shown through a detailed analysis of Walt Whitman's When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd that, though the poem has no specific musical structure, it yet conforms to certain general structural principles which he finds "more musical than literary." Many poems (like Lamartine's Préludes) have inspired independent musical compositions; and Mallarmé's L'Après-midi d'un faune was the inspiration for illustrations by Manet, music by Debussy, and a ballet by Nijinsky which was presented in 1912 with décor, costumes and setting by Bakst, under the overall direction of the great impresario Diaghilev.

On the subject of subtle correspondences between poetry and the other arts and between the arts in general there has been long controversy, and critical and impressionistic discussion on the subject has been pursued with undiminished interest over the years. In A Parallel of Poetry and Painting (1695), Dryden equated "bold metaphors" in poetry with "strong and glowing colors" and saw similar effects resulting from certain tropes and figures in poetry and lights and shadows on a painter's canvas. Lessing, on the contrary, in his Laokoon (1766), distinguished sharply between temporal and spatial forms in art and the different effects of their internal structures, and later Irving Babbitt, in The New Laokoon (1910), inveighed against the confusion of the arts; but their obvious interrelationships continue to tempt literary critics into many winding paths.

René Wellek and G. Giovannini have shown some of the excesses to which this sort of comparison can lead, and Maurice Souriau has called for rigorous definition in such discussion and avoidance of metaphor, which he terms "[la] peste de l'esthétique comparée." Yet there are memorable parallels and correspondences expressed; and one can hardly allow the claim that the intuitive impressions of poets and critics are of no value here and that the only voices worth heeding are those of aesthetic philosophers or descriptive analysts.

Examples of supposed parallelism between poetry and other arts provide an odd assortment of plausible and implausible relationships. A. W. Schlegel, for example, saw classical literature as sculptural in nature, and modern and romantic poetry as pictorial. Pope's couplets have been elaborately compared to Palladian architecture, and relationships have been proclaimed between Gothic architecture and poems as different as Spenser's Faerie Queene and an Old Fr. epic. For Sir Herbert Read the meter of the Anglo-Saxons is comparable with their ornaments, and an early landscape by Gainsborough recalls Collins' Ode to Evening, while his later landscapes recall qualities of Wordsworth. Impressions of baroque architecture are discovered by F. W. Bateson in Thomson, Young, Gray, and Collins; and the poetry of John Keats has been compared variously with sculpture, painting, and music. The parallels between the Ode on a Grecian Urn and sculpture are obvious enough even in the poem's inspiration; but this is only a beginning. Keats's blue has been likened to the blue of Reynolds; his Ode to a Nightingale has been related to the andante movement of Brahms' First Symphony; his effects have been compared to Turner's; and Yeats once wrote to his father that Keats "makes pictures one cannot forget and sees them as full of rhythm as a Chinese painting."

In the present century Mario Praz finds remarkable parallels between painting and poetry. He sees Rimbaud and Lautréamont along with Freud in the background of Picasso and Dali, compares with surrealist painting the nine lines of Eliot's The Waste Land beginning "A rat crept softly through the vegetation," and discovers abstract art already in Apollinaire's Calligrammes.* The poems of E. E. Cummings remind him of the paintings of Mondrian, Kandinsky, and Klee; and he calls Cummings' technopaignia "poetry and painting at the same time, a new application of the Alexandrian principle ut pictura poesis. . ."

The whole problem of the interrelationships of poetry and the other arts is still unsettled and seems likely to remain so. Paul Maury, while seeing great variety in formal aspects of the different arts, would seek an explanation of their harmony in their common socio-ideological origins; but G. Giovannini contends that the relation of the fine arts to reality is very delicate and complex and that their history seems to show that "reality is often merely a suggestion for design" and is, at all events, extremely variable. René Wellek urges that current methods of comparing the arts are of little value, that they should be studied rather in the structural relations between them and not through metaphor and analogy. But this will call for a new system of aesthetics. Wellek considers misleading the once-popular idea of a unitary time-spirit pervading all the arts of a given period and notes pertinently that the arts "do not evolve with the same speed at the same time." He would stress the importance of genuine parallels between the arts, and he remarks that norms of art are "tied to specific classes" so that revolutions bring changes in aesthetic values. Clive Bell, on the other hand, implies that if the arts are one it is primarily in their absolute detachment from life.

Etienne Souriau urges that in the imitative arts it is the design rather than the representational element that gives pleasure, so that the study of harmony among the arts should be a study of their isolable formal elements. For this, according to Souriau, one must take each art in its own idiom and carefully and patiently establish the lexicon of translations and not hesitate at need to write intraduisible. Thomas Munroe in the second edition of The Arts and Their Interrelations (1967) includes a systematic classification of "Four Hundred Arts and Types of Art," which shows something of the extent and nature of the problem. In Feeling and Form (1953), Susanne Langer urges the need to recognize "the deep divisions among the arts . . . that set apart their very worlds" and to examine their differences and trace their distinctions as far as this is possible. But she sees ultimately a limit to such distinctions and expresses a belief that "the symbolic function is the same in every kind of artistic expression" and that all divisions end at a final depth in unity—a point which recalls Croce's insistence in La Poesia (1937) that the ultimate aesthetic concepts are the same in all the arts.

It seems unlikely that 20th-c. aestheticians will be able to afford for the problem anything like the encompassing framework of a Charles Batteux in the 18th c., who (in an age governed at the highest cultural level by the general idea of "taste") could reduce all the fine arts to the single principle of the imitation of "beautiful nature"—or that of medieval numerology, whose mathematical bases for the arts bound them so firmly into religion and mystical philosophy. Yet we have recurrent examples of the urge to bring the arts once more together in Pater's statement within the last century that they all aspire to the condition of music, and in the abbé Bremond's more recent rejoinder in La Poésie pure (1926) as a prelude to his Prière et poésie that, on the contrary, they all aspire to the condition of prayer.

See also Batteux, Les Beaux arts réduits à un même principe (1746); P. Maury, Arts et littérature comparés (1934); R. Wellek, "The Parallelism between Lit. and the Arts," EIE, 1941 (1942); E. Souriau, La Correspondence des arts: Eléments de l'esthétique comparée (1947); C. S. Brown, Music and Lit.: A Comparison of the Arts (1948); G. Giovannini, "Method in the Study of Lit. in Its Relation to the Other Fine Arts," JAAC, 8 (1950); H. Hatzfeld, Lit. through Art: A New Approach to Fr. Lit. (1952); J. H. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts: The Tradition of Lit. Pictorialism and Eng. Poetry from Dryden to Gray (1958); R. G. Saisselin, "Ut Pictura Poesis: Du Bos to Diderot," JAAC, 20 (1961); M. Praz, Mnemosyne: The Parallel between Lit. and the Visual Arts (1970); R. A. Peck, "Numerology and Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde," Mosaic, 5 (1972). A.G.E.

POETRY READING. The formal presentation of poetry read aloud either by its author or by an actor-interpreter. Settings for a p.r. can be a literary salon, a poetry workshop, an invitational event like Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's (1749–1832) readings from his work before the Court of Weimar, or a quasi-theatrical performance at which a poet, poets, or interpreters of poetry address a wide public. By extension to the electronic media, p. readings can also take place via radio or television broadcasts, as well as through phonograph records and electromagnetic tapes. It is assumed, however, that work presented in a p.r. has been committed to writing and may be available in published form. Thus defined, the p.r. is differentiated from oral poetry (q.v.: "composed in oral performance by people who cannot read or write"), from productions of a poet's dramatic works, and from the classroom reading of poetry for teaching purposes.

Occidental p. readings from the Greeks to the 19th c. centered on invitational performances in courtly settings. This tradition appears also in read presentations of Chinese and Japanese poetry (qq.v.) and continues in 20th c. Japan. It is likely that p. readings took place at the Alexandrian court of the Ptolemies (ca. 325–ca. 30 B.C.) and in the aristocratic residence of G. Cilnius Maecenas (d. 8 B.C.), who encouraged the work of Vergil (70–19 B.C.), Horace (65–8 B.C.), and Propertius (ca. 47–15 B.C.). Trimalchio, in the fiction of Petronius' (d. A.D. 66) Satyricon, first writes, then recites his own "poetry" to the guests at his banquet. Written poetry was recited at the 13th-c. court of Frederick II (see SICILIAN SCHOOL), in the Florentine circle of Lorenzo de'Medici (1449-92) and, according to La Bruyère (1645-96), in the late 17th-c. salons of the Princes de Condé. Within Goethe's long life, the p.r. changed from a courtly to a public function. As a young poet of the late 1770's, Goethe read his work at the Weimar court of Carl August; on the occasion of a production of Faust to commemorate his eightieth birthday in 1829, he personally coached the actors in the elocution and delivery of lines. Public recitation of their work by poets and their admirers became commonplace in the 19th c. The format was generally quasi-theatrical. Edgar Allan Poe (1809-49) in America, Victor Hugo (1802-85) in France, and Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809-92) in England are examples of major poets noted for the dramatic quality of their readings. The work of Robert Browning (1812-89) was recited in meetings of the Browning Society (founded 1881), an organization which produced hundreds of offshoots in the U.S. of the 1880's and 1890's. A Goethe Gesellschaft (founded 1885) brought readings from the poet's work to places as distant from each other as St. Petersburg, Manchester, and New York, for each of which an 1890 membership list shows a sizeable potential audience. Richard Wagner's (1813-83) opera Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (musical version, 1867) brought the late medieval German tradition of p. readings by members of craft guilds to the attention of a vast international audience. Centered on the historic figure of Hans Sachs (1494-1576), Wagner's work favors "spontaneous" oral poetry in the tradition of Greek rhapsodists, Provençal troubadours, and German minnesingers (qq.v.) over a reading of poems written by others than the poets. Wagner stresses the superiority of national over foreign idiom, of aristocratic over bourgeois poetic voices (Stolzing vs. Beckmesser), and of desirability of correlation between the physical appearance of the poet and the quality of his work.

Wagner's poetics, as expressed in Die Meistersinger, is central to symbolist conceptions of the p.r. Stéphane Mallarmé (1842-98) read his poetry to a select audience of never more than twelve, on designated "Tuesdays" at which the poet himself played both host and reader in quasi-cultic, priestly style. While Mallarmé's poetry was anything but spontaneously written, his oral presentation as part of the dramatic monologue which characterized his "Tuesdays" both personalized and socialized the work. Stefan George's (1868-1934) mode of reading poetry was consciously influenced by Mallarmé's: the audience was restricted to the poet's circle of disciples (Kreis) and the occasion of the p.r. was perceived as cultic and sacral. While George read from manuscript, he followed a self-prescribed, strict mode of rhapsodic recitation. His poetry was written to be read aloud. Disciples permitted to participate in the p.r. were obligated to follow George's style of reading both for his and for their own work. As the Kreis became, during World War I and after, ever more consciously German and xenophobic in outlook and as the poet's style of dress and demeanor grew increasingly reminiscent of Richard Wagner's, the p. readings approached ideals implied in Die Meistersinger even more closely than the practices of Mallarmé's "Tuesdays."

Some of these ideals carried over to modes of p.r. characteristic of the first half of the 20th c. William Butler Yeats (1865-1939) was much concerned with having his work sound spontaneous and natural. Though his style of reading was dramatic and incantatory, he deliberately revised some poems so that they would sound like an ordinary man talking under normal circumstances. By contrast, T. S. Eliot's (1888-1965) p. readings were aristocratic and cultic in style. The Wagnerian prescription of having the reader seem at once spontaneous in expression but, in his person, remote from an audience had its most splendid 20th c. exemplification in the p. readings of Dylan Thomas (1914-53). Thomas's regal, dramatic stance, and sacral incantations offered sharp contrast to the secular, conversational p. readings of Robert Frost (1875-1963) and W. H. Auden (1907-74), in which the poet presents himself as if in dialogue with his audience, to whom he offers commentary and asides in the course of the reading. Auden's and Frost's style of presentation became normative for many modes of p.r. developing in the second half of the 20th c.

Dadaism and surrealism (qq.v.) also helped shape the conventions of the later p.r. These vanguardistic European movements of the second and third decades of the century generated presentations in which p. readings were staged simultaneously with music, dance, or film. The at least apparently unplanned, spontaneous character of dadaist and surrealist events influenced p. readings of the 1950's and 1960's in their function as components in both multimedia presentations and random artistic "happenings." P. readings held during World War I and in the decade to follow as vehicles of social protest and as revolutionary proclamations were models for similar presentations in the second half of the century. This was true not only for dadaist and surrealist p. readings but also for those held in early post-revolutionary Soviet Russia (see RUSSIAN POETRY). Vladimir Mayakovsky (1894-1930), self-proclaimed "drummer of the October Revolution" sang its praises in lyrics written to be read aloud. Mayakovsky's dramatic p. readings attracted mass audiences not only in the U.S.S.R. but also in Western Europe and in the U.S. His use of the p.r. as a forum of political declamation has been internationally emulated into the 1970's. In the U.S.S.R. itself, the politicized p.r. has been institutionalized through the observance, since 1955, of an official, annual "Poetry Day" held in Moscow, Leningrad, and other large cities. During World War II, the B.B.C. broadcast p. readings by poets exiled from countries then occupied by the Germans for the specific purpose of sustaining national consciousness.

Since the 1950's, the p.r. on the Western side of the Iron Curtain has been overwhelmingly an Am. phenomenon. Its tone is "democratic," ranging from polite conversational idiom to street language. P. readings by one poet only have been increasingly rare; the more usual format ranges from two to six, with marathon p. readings by a multitude not uncommon. The separation of the poet from his audience has all but vanished. Conversation between stage and auditorium in the course of the p.r. is usual; "open p. readings" are events to which anyone may bring his work to read. Locales and audio-visual dimensions for p. readings are diversified: church basements, coffee houses, and public parks serve as often as theaters, college auditoriums, and private homes. In many p. readings the physical presence of either poets or live actors is unnecessary, since cassette tapes, loudspeakers, phonograph records, radios, or television sets can transmit the work presented. Moreover, language is no longer the p. reading's sole medium of communication, since jazz or rock music, electronic visual effects, and spontaneous dramatic presentations ("happenings") may accompany the event. Costumes for poets reading are arbitrary, ranging from business suits and evening dress to coveralls and, occasionally, total nudity. In spite of what may appear a partial merging of the p.r. with a variety of other social and cultural phenomena, it has not lost its sacral character. Many audiences consider the p.r. a cultic group experience, a sharing of special sentiments. Features beyond the presentation of poetry itself (e.g., reading it naked, to the accompaniment of bongo drums) are perceived as reinforcements of this sharing. Consumption of mind-altering drugs and alcohol during the p.r. is not uncommon for the same purpose.

Prominent innovators were the beat poets (q.v.), notably Allen Ginsberg (b. 1926), Gregory Corso (b. 1930), and Lawrence Ferlinghetti (b. 1919), all participants in an important 1957 San Francisco p.r. to the accompaniment of jazz. In the 1960's and 1970's, New York and San Francisco have been the two major Am. p.r. centers, with London, Amsterdam, and West Berlin constituting European counterparts, these latter marked by contacts and actual p. readings involving Ginsberg, Corso, and Ferlinghetti. The German poet Peter Rühmkorf (b. 1929), the Austrian Ernst Jandl (b. 1925), the Dutch Simon Vinkenoog (b. 1928), and the Russian Andrei Voznesensky (b. 1933) are strongly connected to European p.r. presentations in the San Francisco style.

Whatever the style or era, the problem arises whether the actual audience reception of a work coincides with its intentions (q.v.). As the examples of Dylan Thomas and Robert Frost show, a poet's own staging of his work can make it appear more meaningful and commanding than a reader might gather from the printed page. Whether the poem is read by himself or by another, there is no guarantee that a p.r. audience will hear what was "intended" in the making of the poem. Ways of assessing refraction between poetic intentions and what is heard in a p.r. have only begun to be studied. Widely different approaches to the problem by descriptive linguists (Seymour Chatman, Samuel R. Levin), on the one hand, and by phenomenological critics (Georges Poulet, Wolfgang Iser) on the other, agree that identity between poetic intentions and what emerges from the act of reading is highly unlikely. For phenomenologists a poem achieves a true existence only as it is "animated" within the consciousness of a reader. The principle applies even if the reader is the poet himself: when he approaches his poem at any moment other than that of its inception, he is incarnating the text in a new way. Linguists see the necessary choice of one particular interpretation for reading purposes as a barrier between identity of intention and performance; also, they note that phonetic differences between written text and spoken delivery, constrained by the range and pitch limitations of the human voice often make impossible oral replication of texts in the p.r. The strong 20th-c. popularity of the p.r., which seems greater than general interest in reading poems from the printed page in private, is probably more deeply rooted in the dramatic-sacral character of the event than in the literary quality of poetry presented. M. v. Boehn, "Faust und die Kunst," in J. W. v. Goethe, Faust (Centennial Ed., 1932); H. Mondor, La Vie de Stéphane Mallarmé (1941); E. R. Boehringer, Mein Bild von Stefan George (1951); K. Wais, Mallarmé (2d ed., 1952); E. Salin, Um Stefan George (2d ed., 1954); S. Chatman, "Linguistics, Poetics, and Interpretations: The Phonemic Dimension," Quarterly Jour. of Speech, 43 (1957); Evergreen Review, 1, no. 2 (1957); A. B. Lord, The Singer of Tales (1960); The Penguin Book of Russian Verse, ed. D. Obolensky (1962); S. Levin, "Suprasegmentals and the Performance of Poetry," Quarterly Jour. of Speech, 48 (1962); K. T. Loesch, "Lit. Ambiguity and Oral Performance," ibid., 51 (1965); D. Levertov, "Approach to Public Poetry Listeners," Virginia Quarterly Review, 41 (1965); E. Lucie-Smith, "Wild Night," Encounter, 25 (1965); The New Russian Poets 1953-1968, ed. G. Reavey (1966); Ein Gedicht und sein Autor, ed. W. Höllerer (1969); G. Poulet, "Phenomenology of Reading," NLH, 1 (1969); P. Dickinson, "Spoken Words," Encounter, 34 (1970); The San Francisco Poets, ed. D. Meltzer (1971); The East Side Scene, ed. A. De Loach (1972); W. Iser, "The Reading Process: A Phenomenological Approach," NLH, 3 (1972); S. Massie, The Living Mirror: Five Young Poets from Leningrad (1972); P. Turner, "Introd." to R. Browning, Men and Women 1855 (1972).

W.B.F.

POETRY THERAPY. See PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY.*

POLITICS AND POETRY. Poetry deals with man's whole sentient being, with his ideas and with his response to what is happening in the world around him, and it is not surprising that for centuries poets have attempted to shape into art their understanding of political ideas or to render permanent their perception of the political process. Briefly, political poetry may be defined as poetry that deals with public themes or public figures, with events that extend beyond the concerns of the individual self.

While such poetry has been written in various historical periods and has never been confined to any particular country, it is more abundantly called forth in times and places of intense political activity. Although the Middle Ages, for example, was, as a whole, not productive of political poetry, one particular period of political ferment, the late 12th and early 13th c. in Germany and France, produced a great concentration of political lyrics. The history and politics of these times were dominated by major struggles—feudal struggles in France, imperialistic struggles in Germany, and continuing struggles between the Pope and secular rulers. Aside from numerous minor poets who wrote political songs, the events of the time led two major poets, Bertran de Born in Southern France and Walther von der Vogelweide in Germany, to write a substantial body of political lyrics. Sometimes in response to particular events but more often to particular figures worthy of attack, Bertran and Walther wrote poetry that was intensely partisan and pragmatic.

Similarly, the nationalistic struggles and revolutions of later times generated much political poetry. The Fr. Revolution provided the master theme of the epoch for poets in England and Germany. The poetry of Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Shelley in England and of Hölderlin, Novalis, and Schiller in Germany reflects the course of events in France, moving from exalted hopes for a regained paradise to growing bitterness and disillusionment. The Gr. nationalistic movement for independence from the Turks in the late 18th and early 19th c. stirred not only the Gr. poets, Rhigas Pheraios and Dionysios Solomos, but also Byron and Shelley in England and Hölderlin in Germany. In Russia the Revolution inspired some of the poems of Alexander Blok and Andrey Bely (in which apocalyptic notes were heard). A much stronger response was that of the futurist poets, many of whom saw the revolution as a fulfillment of their dreams about the future. A response equally intense but of a different nature was inspired by the Sp. Civil War. Bitterness, indignation, and harsh condemnation of country propels the poetry of the Sp. poets, León Felipe and Luis Cernuda.

In general, of all the kinds of attitudes and situations that stimulate the writing of political poetry, the most consistently compelling forces in all ages have been love of country and response to war. Unfortunately, patriotism has more often generated the kind of strained and vociferous national ardor one finds in the works of, for example, Gabriele D'Annunzio of Italy than the reasoned patriotism of Aristophanes or the understated, tender love of country apparent in The Soldier by Rupert Brooke.

Often the pressure of war causes a poet to change his direction. In response to the Sp. Civil War, Raphael Alberti, a poet of considerable power, forsook his surrealist poetry of inner conflict for more conventional methods that would allow him to deal successfully with public events. Similarly, the fall of France and the German occupation stung the surrealist poets Louis Aragon and Paul Eluard into poetry of protest. In Aragon's case, in particular, his political poetry is far more powerful than his poems of private experience. While the contemporary Am. poet Robert Bly has always been concerned with social and political themes, the recent war in Viet Nam has driven him to substitute for his earlier expressionistic mode a poetry of more direct and plangent protest.

The degree to which politics and art mingle in any poem depends upon the approach as well as competence of the poet. When transmuted into poetry, political attitudes may merge into the texture of a poem to produce, as in Yeats's Easter, 1916, a complex blending of personal and public passion. Equally pervasive in political poetry is the specificity and explicitness one finds, for example, in the war poems of Karl Shapiro or Richard Eberhart, as in his well-known Fury of Aerial Bombardment; in Bly's current work, particularly in such a poem as The Teeth-Mother Naked at Last (1970); in most of the poetry of Yevtushenko; or in some of Aragon's poems, one of which begins, for example, "Salut à toi Parti qui nias la misère/Et montras l'homme frère à ses frères armés" ("Hail to you Party which denied misery/And showed man as a brother to his brothers in arms" [Les Yeux et la mémoire, 1954]).

Aside from obvious distinctions to be made between good or bad poets, the question that remains is what causes or constitutes the success or failure of political poetry. One may clarify the range of the relationship between politics and poetry by reference to two poems of varying success by William Wordsworth, both inspired, in part, by political responses, The Prelude, which we will discuss later, and the Ode, 1815.

In the Ode, 1815 Wordsworth's nationalistic fervor responded to Wellington's victory over Napoleon in an apostrophe to God:

But Thy most dreaded instrument,
In working out a pure intent,
Is Man—arrayed for mutual slaughter,
—Yea, Carnage is thy daughter!

(11. 106-109)

Although Wordsworth later deleted these lines, the vatic strain and the static, unreasoned attitude displayed in them and in much of the Ode, in general, is illustrative of the kind of pitfall into which a poet may fall when he writes on political subjects.

Only in Greek society, where the poet saw himself as a characteristic member of his society and where poetry acquired sufficient social status to become a determinant of social and political forces, could poetry actually derive its strength from the poet's assumption of a public manner and from his conviction that he spoke for the mass of men. In later times, and particularly after the 18th c., the poet writing upon public events has had to address an audience which may no longer share his convictions and has had to deal with a scale of action and event that exceeds the grasp of his own personal experience. Like Wordsworth in the Ode, 1815, the poet may attempt to overcome these barriers to communication by choosing to deal with standardized responses and beliefs, relying upon his display of emotion and on technical virtuosity to reach and overwhelm his audience. His assumption of a public manner allows him to cloak with an air of importance and validity the commonplace notions of political life, the actual validity of which he need not attempt to probe.

Such an approach to political poetry is sometimes apparent in the abundant political poetry of Victor Hugo and is characteristic of the poets who wrote in England in the second half of the 19th c. Filled with the available clichés of the time, the political poetry of, for example, Tennyson, Browning, or Swinburne relies on a public manner, on vatic utterances, and on emotional impact to achieve finally a kind of comfortable didacticism. The similar dependence on vague rhetoric and cliché in some of the poetry of the thirties in this c. and in much of the contemporary verse produced in the U.S.S.R. by such poets, for example, as Nikolai Aseyev, Andrei Voznesensky, or Alexander Mezhinov, springs from the same desire to reach and speak for large masses of people and again illustrates the debilitating effects of attempting to shape poetry to suit conventional public sentiment and to reflect accepted doctrine. All this is not to suggest that there is an unbridgeable gap between poetry and politics but to point out that poetry seldom submits with success to conformity of ideas or feelings.

To understand what successful political poetry seems to require, we may turn now for a brief look at those books of Wordsworth's Prelude that deal with political and social conflict. What is striking about these books is the completely personal yet wide-ranging vision against which the poet measures the political, economic, and utilitarian creeds of his time, as well as the major event of the age, the Fr. Revolution. Because Wordsworth examines doctrine and event in terms of values based on a personal vision of the potential within the human mind, the political poetry in The Prelude successfully avoids the static or cloudy attitudes of the Ode, 1815 or of Victorian political poetry and exhibits rather a susceptibility to experience and a dimension of intellectual effort that Shelley had in mind when he observed that poets are "the unacknowledged legislators of the world" (Defense of Poetry, 1821).

What Shelley seems to have meant is that poets influence politics insofar as they carry the seminal ideas that finally determine human history. Whether or not a poet writing on politics speaks to the great issues of man and answers them finally, whether or not he has the power to inform the thoughts of men in later times, the success of his political verse will depend upon the extent to which he brings both his own personal insight to bear upon public issues and a purview that extends beyond any particular issue or event.

This approach is evident in the best political poetry of all ages, in Homer and in Aeschylus; in Dante, whose Divine Comedy is as political as it is theological, and in Shakespeare, particularly in the later political plays like Richard II and Coriolanus. Milton's political sonnets are sometimes flawed by dogmatism, but Paradise Lost successfully incorporates the political issues of liberty and tyranny into the larger questions the poem raises about human nature. The Eng. romantics as a group are perhaps the most successful in their search for poetic ways of harnessing political impulse. They generally bring to their political poetry commitment, vision, and the ability to face conflicts. Political satire, pervasive in the verse of the 18th c. as well as our own, seems to create its own limitations since its end often is to carry the reader to an acceptance of a one-sided case. The strength or maturity of political satire depends on whether the poet can convey a feeling for what is attacked or a sense that he is defending values of society and civilization rather than of a particular cause or group. In this sense, Pope's political satire is more successful than that of Dryden, Auden's than that of Aragon. Generally, contemporary political poets, particularly the "committed" poets, seem each to veer between the extremes depicted in the two poems of Wordsworth. Poets like Spender, Ginsberg, Neruda, Mayakovsky, Yevtushenko, and Zbigniew Herbert, sometimes produce static political rhetoric unredeemed by imagination and sometimes poems of remarkable strength which cut through the clouded abstractions that dominate modern political life.

To paraphrase Lionel Trilling, a poet writing on public issues must organize a union between our political ideas and our imagination (The Liberal Imagination, 1953), and he succeeds in doing so to the extent that he is deeply concerned with values in the realm beyond politics. Politics itself, after all, has to do with the "binding allocation of values" (D. Easton, A Framework for Political Analysis, 1965), and it becomes the poet's task to negotiate between particular political fact and the ultimate values that politics are intended to serve.

ANTHOLOGIES: Political Poems and Songs Relating to Eng. Hist., ed. T. Wright (1859); Poems on Affairs of State, 1660-1714, i-vi (1963-72); Of Poetry and Power, ed. E. A. Gilkes and P. Schwaber (1964); The Eloquence of Protest: Voices of the 70's, ed. H. Salisbury (1972).

CRITICISM: C. Brinton, The Political Ideas of the Eng. Romantics (1926); M. Schorer, William Blake: The Politics of Vision (1946); A. P. d'Entrèves, Dante as a Political Thinker (1952); D. V. Erdman, Blake: Prophet against Empire (1954); F. M. Todd, Politics and the Poet: A Study of Wordsworth (1957); C. V. Wedgwood, Poetry and Politics under the Stuarts (1960); B. Snell, Poetry and Society in Ancient Greece (1961); C. Woodring, Politics in the Poetry of Coleridge (1961), Politics in Eng. Romantic Poetry (1971); A. W. Gomme,

More Essays on Gr. Hist. and Lit. (1962); I. Howe, A World More Attractive: A View of Modern Lit. and Politics (1963); M. Adler, Poetry and Politics (1965); A. Mazzeo, Renaissance and Revolution (1965); C. M. Bowra, Poetry and Politics 1900-1960 (1966); M. Adenreth, Commitment in Modern Fr. Lit. (1967); M. Mack, The Garden and the City: Retirement and Politics in the Poetry of Pope (1969); G. McNeice, Shelley and the Revolutionary Idea (1969); T. R. Edwards, Imagination and Power: A Study of Poetry on Public Themes (1971); K. W. Klein, The Partisan Voice: A Study of the Political Lyric in France and Germany, 1180-1230 (1971); J. Lucas, Lit. and Politics in the 19th C. (1971); V. J. Scattergood, Politics and Poetry in the 15th C. (1971); H. J. Cargas, Daniel Berrigan and Contemporary Protest Poetry (1972); L. C. Knights, Public Voices (1972). J.Q.K.

PROJECTIVE VERSE. P.v. is a kind of free verse. It is like other free verse in that it represents "open" or "field" composition. It is not "closed" verse; that is, it does not depend on meter and stanzaic patterns for its form. It differs from other free verse in that it is said to be energized by the poet's breath (his life force) and moves without excessive modification or ornamentation by a series of content-heavy lines, many of them of a run-on sort. The word "projective" suggests the propulsive character of this kind of verse. Charles Olson, the chief theoretician of the p.v. movement, declares that a poem must be a "high energy-construct and, at all points, an energy-discharge." He also insists—in his influential essay "P.V.," first published in Poetry New York in 1950—that "form is never more than an extension of content," a precept he attributes to Robert Creeley, and that "one perception must immediately and directly lead to a further perception," a dictum that he credits to Edward Dahlberg.

The birth of the verse line, according to Olson, occurs as a combined operation of the head and the heart. The head, by way of the ear, creates the syllable; it is there that logopoeia, the dance of intellect among words, takes place. The heart, by way of the breath, creates the line: "And the line comes (I swear it) from the breath, from the breathing of the man who writes, at the moment that he writes, and thus is, it is here that, the daily work, the WORK, gets in, for only he, the man who writes, can declare, at every moment, the line its metric and its ending—where its breathing, shall come to, termination."

This emphasis on breathing has produced what is called the "breath line." The poet organizes his poem in terms of breath units or explosions of breath. He pauses momentarily at the end of a line, inhales, and proceeds to the next line, with its own push of content. When reading his work aloud, the p.v. poet sometimes exaggerates this pause for breath, interrupting the natural, propulsive character of the language of the poem. A sensitive reading permits only a short pause, a "semi-comma," to use Denise Levertov's word. P.v. is sometimes called "breath-line poetry."

The poets of the p.v. movement are also called "The Black Mountain School" because the three major figures—Charles Olson, Robert Creeley, and Robert Duncan—taught at Black Mountain College in North Carolina in the early 1950's and published the Black Mountain Review there. They drew the attention of Denise Levertov and other lively talents of the time, including Paul Blackburn, Joel Oppenheimer, and Edward Dorn. And they provided the aesthetic rationale for at least one of the beat generation poets, Allen Ginsberg.

In the history of poetic movements of the 20th c., p.v. can be seen as a reaction against the new criticism (q.v.) of John Crowe Ransom, Allen Tate, and Cleanth Brooks, which had dominated Am. poetic theory and practice from 1935 to 1950 and emphasized the virtues of irony, paradox, and meter. But p.v. was not without antecedents. One can trace a line of development from the Am. transcendentalist theories of organic form—the idea that a poem should be as natural in its shape as a tree is—to the practice of such poets as Walt Whitman, Ezra Pound, William Carlos Williams, and the Objectivists (see OBJECTIVISM) of the 1930's: Louis Zukofsky, George Oppen, and Charles Reznikoff. The idea of "open" as opposed to "closed" form Olson may have derived from Poésie ouverte, Poésie fermée, a critical work by the Fr. critic René Nelli.

Some aspects of projectivist theory are shaky—especially the insistence on the "breath line," since both poet and reader breathe whenever they like, without reference to the verse line—but it has served to energize a whole generation of poets and has produced a remarkable body of poems that are much closer to the idiom and speech rhythms of the Am. people than the work of the poets of the 1940's was. If, in pragmatic fashion, one judges the consequences of theory rather than the theory itself, one must say that the p.v. movement has been a success.

S. Stepanchev, Am. Poetry since 1945: A Critical Survey (1965); M. L. Rosenthal, The New Poets, Am. and British Poetry since World War II (1967); J. Dickey, Babel to Byzantium: Poets and Poetry Now (1968). s.s.

PSALM. See HEBREW POETRY.

PSYCHIC DISTANCE. See AESTHETIC DISTANCE.

PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY. That poetry and psych. impinge upon one another is obvious, since sensations, thoughts, feelings, and fantasies provide much of the necessary stuff of poetry, and since the psyche is necessary as an organ of response to it. Less obvious are the limits of this impingement and the extent to which they demarcate a special area of critical investigation. This is so because it is difficult to draw the boundaries either of poetry or of psychology. If one regards all mental contents and processes, up to the point at which they hypothetically become either pure instinct or pure spirit, as psychic, then all of reality that can be known is psychic; and every aspect of poetry might in principle be the subject of psychological investigation. And indeed, any piece of criticism that respects "the reality of the psyche" (C. G. Jung), to which poets have borne witness throughout the ages, may in a broad but sometimes telling sense be psychological. Moreover, the meeting between psych., even in a narrower sense, and poetry has from the outset been complex. Thus when S. Freud turned to an ancient text of dramatic poetry for the name of a concept, the Oedipus complex, he was deriving psych. from literature and myth; the story and the pattern of meaning that he perceived in it not only preceded but colored the scientific concept. Matters are also complicated by the fact that many valuable psychological observations about poetry have been made in passing or by implication in works about literature not specifically poetic or in works even more generally about art and the artist. Thus "psychological" may be fairly thought to describe qualities derived from any of several forms of "knowledge of the psyche," rather than a distinct critical area or approach. But in what follows the focus will be on conscious attempts to cultivate such qualities by bringing criticism into conformity with psych. as a science striving to be empirical.

Every age has its psych. in the sense of a more or less systematic view of the workings of the human mind; such a view is either assumed or countered by the poet, and a knowledge of it may elucidate his work, for example, as knowledge of Elizabethan doctrines of the soul elucidates Shakespeare (Anderson) or as knowledge of W. James's Principles of Psychology (1890), with its treatment of "stream of consciousness," does modern poetry and fiction. And J. L. Lowes's study of S. T. Coleridge demonstrates that criticism may say much about the workings of the poetic mind without being continuously buttressed by psych. as a systematized discipline. But the bulk of criticism using psych. to illumine poetry is derived from psychoanalysis, which first came to literary attention with Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams (1900). Indeed, psychoanalysis reflects a historical moment that is also a moment in the life of literature. As K. Burke observes, "In great eras of drama, the audience know why characters act as they do," and as H. J. Muller elaborates, "Stable cultures bring stable and standard patterns of behavior; motives are as socialized as manners. Although characters may be momentarily confused and bewildered, or rebellious, they finally perceive their motives as clearly as the audience always do." In a period of cultural breakdown, in which a novelist and poet such as D. H. Lawrence could claim to be turning his attention from "the old stable ego" to "allotropic states" of the same psychic element, Freud was of enormous importance in supplying a new socialization of motives. And psychoanalysis allowed literary critics to concentrate on elements of poetic creation and response that had not received attention before.

Although Freud did upon occasion write about literary art, as in a book-length study of W. Jensen's Gradiva, much psychoanalytic theory about literature developed from suggestions in his treatment of religious and cultural history, of jokes, of slips of the tongue, of the uncanny, and especially of dreams. In approaching literature, along with other products of mental life, through the dream, Freud was following a path partly adumbrated by ideas of L. Tieck, A. Schopenhauer, J. Paul, F. Nietzsche, F. Vischer, W. Dilthey, and others, who had seen parallels between dreaming and artistic creation. In the psychoanalytic view, dreams provide hallucinatory satisfaction of instinctual impulses, and art occupies "an intermediate territory between wish-denying reality and the wish-fulfilling world of fantasy" (Freud). Like the dream, the work of art has not only manifest content but also latent content derived from the instinct-charged unconscious, and much early psychoanalytic criticism aimed at revealing the dynamism latent within the literary work. Thus Freud, and later E. Jones, saw Hamlet as being about the hero's incestuous longings for his mother and his ambivalence toward his father, and as achieving much of its dramatic and poetic effect by activating and giving expression to Oedipal feelings in the audience. Meaning, in this view, primarily serves to satisfy the mind's demand for sense and logic, thus permitting the satisfaction of forbidden wishes while allaying objections to them. Similarly, "The real pleasure in artistic form comes from illogic and nonsense, which, in turn, represent 'the economy of psychic expenditures or alleviation from the pressure of reason.' Our sense of pleasure comes from releasing or economizing on energy normally used to keep ourselves logical; we experience a sudden sense of psychic energy to spare, a sudden psychic profit from cutting down expenses" (N. Holland, 1966, summarizing Freud).

More recent criticism has reflected later developments in psychoanalytic theory, effected by Freud from the 1920's on, by A. Freud, H. Hartmann, E. Kris, M. Klein, and others. These developments have largely been concerned with the powers of the ego to maintain itself and to achieve some sort of viable balance amid the forces acting upon it from both within and without. Reflecting these interests, psychoanalytic criticism has come to see the literary work not only as a disguised expression of forbidden wishes but also as a reflection of various strategies of the ego for dealing with such wishes and with the moral feelings they awaken. Manifest content thus reflects the transformation of unconscious fantasies; and form and meaning, rather than being merely a disguise, serve the process of that transformation. Art effects the shift of psychic energy from one level to another, and this is in itself pleasurable (Kris). Moreover, these transformations and shifts resemble successful sublimations of illicit unconscious fantasy. Literary form "acts out defensive maneuvers for us: splitting, isolating, undoing, displacing from, omitting (repressing or denying) elements of the [pleasurable but anxiety-provoking] fantasy." These same principles operate more specifically in the sound structures of poetry (Holland, 1968). Among the more important psychoanalytic concepts relating to poetic form are those of condensation, when an image or character expresses more than one psychic tendency, and displacement, when one psychic tendency is given more than one embodiment, as in Freud's view (following L. Jekels) of the Macbeths as aspects of a single personality. Used with discretion, these concepts may illumine poetry, as they do in G. Hough's discussion of The Faerie Queene.

Much psychoanalytic criticism has really been a form of what has come to be called psychobiography, often occupied with ferreting out (and in moments of zeal, conjuring up) "facts" not clearly present in the biographical record but inferable in accordance with psychoanalytic theory. In some literary biographies, such as B. Meyer's of Joseph Conrad, psychoanalysis convincingly affords important glimpses into obscure parts both of the writer's life and of his work. Several poets have been treated extensively in this way, including Edgar Allan Poe by M. Bonaparte and Emily Dickinson by J. Cody, who bases his conclusions on psychoanalytic theory and on recent developments in clinical psychiatry. Suggestive refinements of the psychoanalytic approach to poetry may be found in P. Dettering's study of Rainer Maria Rilke, whose essential poetic motives are traceable not only to the classical Oedipus complex but also to the pre-Oedipal phases of development with which psychoanalysis has been concerned in recent decades. Rilke's "narcissism" is seen as a complex motivational pattern, expressed in a complex, variable and developing set of poetic symbols, including that of the angel. Moreover, such writers as Kris, Holland, and A. Ehrenzweig have in recent years dealt more subtly with questions of literary response than earlier critics had. Psychoanalysis has touched on areas still awaiting exploration that may turn out to be important for the criticism of poetry, for example, the area suggested by J.A.M. Meerloo's undeveloped hunch (in Leedy) that poetic rhythm expresses infantile archaic responses of the organism, the innate biological signal code. Another area is suggested by H. Kohut's description of a narcissistic self prefiguring and then underlying the development of the ego and, by implication, visible in certain forms of creativity and of its disturbance. Still another is suggested by Ehrenzweig's attention to ordering processes beyond conscious control that contribute to artistic form. Moreover, in the fullness of its elaboration as a system, psychoanalysis often has no rivals in offering at least some psychological explanation of important literary phenomena.

Aside from Freud, the psychologist who has figured most largely in psychological criticism is Jung, though in it he appears more often as a name for an attitude or set of ideas than as an active influence. Unlike Freud, Jung's main interest was in the transpersonal elements in literature; the focus of that interest was the archetype (q.v.). Since archetypes belong roughly to the realm of what Aristotle called formal causes, as distinct from the efficient causes studied by psychoanalytic literary criticism, the concept of the archetype may help the psychological critic to bridge lower and higher levels of poetic organization. The literary artist is for Jung vatic, and his view of art puts him in the line of Plato, Sidney, and those romantics who stress the relations between poetry and prophecy. His prospective or finalistic view of psychic processes, and his view of the unconscious as being composed of collective as well as personal elements, suggest a different relation of the poet to the unconscious than that described by psychoanalysis. It is largely the archetype, in its form-creating capacity and its numinosity, that accounts for the form of the work and its effect upon the reader (M. Bodkin). Art does not, then, gain its effects primarily through a partial lifting of repression; rather, the artist often expresses contents that have not yet been known to consciousness but that have been fully formed in the unconscious. These contents have a compensatory character, providing not only the artist but also his age with materials necessary to correct a one-sided world view and to restore contact with the life-giving unconscious matrix of consciousness. The artist may indeed have psychopathological traits, but this fact does not explain his work, which in the psychoanalytic view serves the artist's ego by strengthening its mastery over forces that threaten it. Rather, Jung sees the artist as disturbed because his gift and his calling require the exaggerated development of certain psychological functions at the neglect of others important to normal life. T. Chouinard (1971) has used Jung's concept of the anima in an analysis of T. S. Eliot's poetry—G. Hough, incidentally, has commented more generally on "Poetry and the Anima"—and Chouinard has also (1970) tried to clarify use of the term "archetype" in literary criticism and analytical psych. The Jungian approach might seem more promising for criticism than for literary biography, but K. Wilson has used Jungian ideas in a sensitive discussion of Keats's Ode to a Nightingale and of its importance in Keats's life. In her view that poem was based upon an experience of the archetype of the self, the deepest center of the personality, an experience which resulted in a transformation of Keats's view of poetry and his relation to sources of inspiration within himself. The same critic also uses Jung's typology of psychological attitudes and functions to elucidate specific qualities of Keats's poetic language. And G. Bachelard follows Jung in seeking to create a partly transpersonal "phenomenology of the soul." For Bachelard the poetic image is a product of "the dreaming consciousness," in which "the duality of subject and object is iridescent, shimmering, unceasingly active in its inversions."

The ideas of such Gestalt psychologists as K. Koffka have occasionally been used by critics (Muller), but they have not found an abiding place in literary discussion. Continuing and extending the interest of the Gestalt psychologists in the holistic qualities of perception, M. Peckham has developed a comprehensive view of art, including poetry. In his view, man "desires above all a predictable and ordered world, . . . But because man desires such a world so passionately, he is very much inclined to ignore anything that intimates that he does not have it. And to anything that disorients him, anything that requires him to experience cognitive tension he ascribes negative value. Only in protected situations, characterized by high walls of psychic insulation, can he afford to let himself be aware of the disparity between his interests, that is, his expectancy or set or orientation, and the data his interaction with the environment actually produces." Art, in Peckham's view, offers this experience. J. O. Love has analyzed mythopoetic aspects of Virginia Woolf's fiction in accordance with ideas drawn from developmental cognitive psychology. And: psycholinguistics, which has some claim to the first half of its name, has begun to be used in the criticism of poetry. Since poetry is rich with insights into the human condition, and since it evokes moods and provides models for dealing with them, poetry has been used as a means of psychotherapy (Leedy). But it is largely the consolatory, homiletic qualities that poetry shares with prose that are emphasized in these efforts, rather than the qualities of epiphany that make poetry subjunctive rather than indicative, a matter of being rather than of becoming (Lawler); the student of literature will learn very little from them.

The implicit parallels between dreaming, on the one hand, and literary creation and response, on the other, continue to be suggestive, as may be seen in the fact that both Burke and N. Frye have used "dream" as a critical term. Moreover, views of dreaming that diverge from those of Freud have been developed by Jung, A. Adler, E. S. Tauber, K. Horney, B. S. Robbins, E. Fromm, W. Bonime, and others, and these views supply a useful perspective on some psychological criticism. Thus for Jung, "The dream is an experience in self-confrontation. Its intent is to reveal rather than conceal. The symbols exist not as subterfuges and disguises but as metaphorical referents" (M. Ullman in Bonime, summarizing Jung). In Jung's view of dreams Freud's distinction between latent and manifest content is largely ignored; neither the content nor the structure is regarded as arbitrary, but both are thought to have the kind of necessity that governs the materials of drama, and the dream is thought not primarily to provide wish-fulfillment but to serve the self-regulation of the psyche, and the integration of the personality by compensating a one-sided conscious viewpoint. (Jung did not write a single, major study of dreams comparable to Freud's, but there are good systematic treatments of dreams from a Jungian viewpoint by C. A. Meier and H. Dieckmann.) For Adler and several others, "the dynamic meaning of the dream could be preserved without the concept of the unconscious as a reservoir of aggressive and libidinal impulses. . . . The peculiarities of dream thought are to be understood as a particular mode of presentation of one's experience and not as the eruption of an unconscious mode of thought" (Ullman). Such views would seem to have a bearing on the ancient analogy between dream and poetry, and more generally, upon questions concerning the sources, nature, and functions of the fantasy essential to poetry. Some of these views have had little resonance in literary discussion; this fact may suggest something of the range of possibilities yet to be explored in psychological criticism.

Psychological critics often assume more agreement about first principles than exists; infelicities of tone in some of their writings often seem expressions of defensiveness about the conflict of scientific paradigms (T. S. Kuhn). Standing his ground, the literary reader may take heart from a remark by C. S. Lewis, "that the ease with which a scientific theory assumes the dignity and rigidity of fact varies inversely with the individual's scientific education," and from Jung's contention, in his Tavistock lectures, that every psychological viewpoint contains an important element of subjective confession and that the time has not yet come for a general psychology to be possible. Moreover, the literary reader may feel that on the whole the psychological critic does better, for example, with the primitive and infantile impulses of sex and aggression in King Lear than with the level of what Aristotle would call theoria, or knowledge as a form of ethical action, in the play. But even if such qualifications sometimes deserve attention, and even if the first exhilaration of psychoanalytic criticism is past, the interrelations between psych. and poetry have by now been well established as a fruitful and abiding area of critical concern.

R. Anderson, Elizabethan Psych. and Shakespeare's Plays (1927); J. L. Lowes, The Road to Xanadu (1927); K. Burke, Counter-Statement (1931); M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934); K. Muller, Modern Fiction (1937); M. Bonaparte, The Life and Works of Edgar Allan Poe (1949); E. Jones, Hamlet and Oedipus (1949); E. Kris, Psychoanalytic Explorations in Art (1952); S. Freud, Standard Ed. (1953-64), III, IV, VIII, IX; F. Hoffman, Freudianism and the Literary Mind (2d ed., 1957); W. Bonime, The Clinical Use of Dreams (1962); G. Hough, A Preface to The Faerie Queene (1962) and "Poetry and the Anima," Spring (1973); T. S. Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (1962); W. Kiell, Psychoanalysis, Psych. and Lit. (1963; bibliog.); G. Bachelard, The Poetics of Space, tr. M. Jolas (1964); M. Peckham, Man's Rage for Chaos (1965); K. Wilson, The Nightingale and the Hawk (1965); N. Holland, Psychoanalysis and Shakespeare (1966) and The Dynamics of Lit. Response (1968); C. G. Jung, Collected Works, xv (1966) and Analytical Psych.: Its Theory and Practice (1968; the Tavistock Lectures); F. C. Crews, "Lit. and Psych." [bibliog.], in Relations of Lit. Study, ed. J. Thorpe (1967) and Psychoanalysis and Lit. Process (1970); A. Ehrenzweig, The Hidden Order of Art (1967); B. Meyer, Joseph Conrad (1967); P. Dettmering, Dichtung und Psychoanalyse (1969); J. Leedy, Poetry Therapy (1969); T. Chouinard, in the Jour. of Analytical Psych., 15 (July 1970), 16 (Jan. 1971); L. Edel, "Psych. and Lit.," in Encyclopedia of World Lit. in the 20th C., ed. W. B. Fleischmann, III (1969); J. O. Love, Worlds in Consciousness (1970); J. Starobinski, La Relation critique (1970); H. Kohut, The Analysis of the Self (1971); J. G. Lawler, in Psychiatry, 35 (Aug. 1972); C. A. Meier, Die Bedeutung des Traumes (1972); N. Holland, Poems in Persons (1973).

SELECTED READINGS: Art and Psychoanalysis, ed. W. Phillips (1957); Freud, On Creativity and the Unconscious, ed. B. Nelson (1958); Hidden Patterns, ed. L. and E. Manheim (1966).

JOURNALS: American Imago (1939—); Lit. and Psych. (1951—); valuable annual bibliog. beginning with v. 18, which covers 1964-65).

w.w.

PUERTO RICAN POETRY. The island of Puerto Rico has been a fertile ground for poetry since the early 16th c. The Sp. conquistadores and the church prelates who wrote their impressions of the land left the mark of their emotional encounter with this Caribbean colony in verse and in poetic prose. Juan de Castellanos (1522-1607) dedicated the sixth of his Elegies of Illustrious Men of the Indies to Juan Ponce de Leon and Borinquen (Puerto Rico), while the first P.R. born poet, Francisco de Ayerra y Santamaria (1630-1708), excelled as a baroque poet in Mexico. The popular ballads, couplets, and traditional religious songs dedicated to the Epiphany, the ceremonies of Passion Week and other Catholic inspired festivities, mingled with the music and the rhythms of the black slaves and the remnants of the choral Taino Areyto, survived in a rich oral folklore of poetic enchantment.

By the 19th c. Puerto Rico had developed a varied and interesting literary life in which poetry was the most important of all the genres. Young poets gathered their verse in anthologies called "Aguinaldo," "Album," or "Cancionero"; the custom of reciting poetry and improvising verse in public and official ceremonies became widespread; poetry contests were celebrated with all the adornments of the gallant art of love, and the disputes and satirical criticism provoked by social and political problems left their mark in some poems of the period. The founding of the Atheneum in 1873, to serve as the intellectual center to express the creative urge of the writers, marked a very important step in the development of poetry. Lectures and recitals were regular activities at the Atheneum, and all the important writers of that time participated in these programs. Following the trends prevalent in Spain, romantic lyricism dominated the scene, from the most passionate nuance to the most subtle and refined. Some of the best known poets wrote about love, but they also excelled in revealing their patriotism and rejoicing in the beautiful landscape of the tropical paradise. Alejandro Tapia y Rivera (1826-82), Lola Rodríguez de Tió (1843-1924), and José Gautier Benítez (1851-80), are the best representatives of the poetry of the romantic period. Tapia exalted the past and wrote the most extensive poem of the 19th c. in Puerto Rico, La Sataniada. The thirty cantos in 8-line stanzas of the composition are reminiscent of Espronceda's El Diablo Mundo. Lola Rodríguez de Tió was the first outstanding woman in the literature of the island. Her love poetry is subtle and delicate, while her patriotic verses are full of vigor and fire. She lived for some years in Caracas and in New York as an exile, and considered Cuba, where she died, her second homeland. One of her contributions to the culture of her country is the lyrics that she wrote for the national anthem, La Borinquena. Gautier Benítez was a refined and sentimental poet whose tender and moving chants to Borinquen are comparable to Bécquer's Rhymes. The lyricism of his poems expressing the melancholy of being absent from his birthplace and the happiness of the return to the shores of his homeland are considered masterpieces of romantic P.R. poetry:

Borinquen, nombre al pensamiento grato
como el recuerdo de un amor profundo
bello jardín, de América el ornato, siendo el jardín América del mundo.

Borinquen, a name loving to the mind
as the memory of an intense love, beautiful garden, flower of America,
America being the garden of the world.

At the close of the century the first impulse toward a renovation of style and an introduction of metrical innovations was already present in the works of José de Diego (1866-1918), an outstanding member of the generation that experienced the transfer of Puerto Rico from the domain of Spain to that of the United States. De Diego is celebrated for both his patriotic verse and love poems. The symbolism attached to the flag, the anthem, the birds and trees of the landscape of the island are some of his favorite topics.

Modernismo (q.v.) in Puerto Rico, besides following the aesthetic credo of Rubén Darío's musical poetry, enriched with new rhythms and beautiful imagery, served the purpose of expanding the creative horizons of the island's poets in search of universal values. Luis Lloréns Torres (1878-1944), Virgilio Dávila (1869-1943), Luis Palés Matos (1898-1959), and Evaristo Ribera Chevrement (1896—) represent this period, although they surpassed the modernistic movement and opened the way toward the Vanguard modalities after the First World War (1914-18). Lloréns Torres founded a literary magazine, Revista de las Antillas (1913), which became the vehicle for innovations in style and the defense of the Sp. cultural traditions of the land. The ideal of Antillean unity was a profound motive of inspiration present in two of his best poems: Song of the Antilles and Mare Nostrum. Luis Palés Matos became a master of Afro-Antillean poetry in his famous book Tun Tun de Pasa y Grifería (1937), in which the mythology of black culture is re-created with magical cadence and artistic enchantment.

Calabó y bambú
bambú y calabó

Es el sol de fuego que arde en Tumbuctú
Es la danza negra de Fernando Poo El alma africana que vibrando está en el ritmo gordo del mariyandá.

Calabó and bamboo
bamboo and calabó

It's the iron sun that burns in Timbuctoo
It's the black dance of Fernando Poo
The African soul that is vibrating, in the thick rhythm of the mariyandá.

In other poems Palés expresses the pessimism of his generation, and in his last days he wrote moving poems of love and death.

Many Vanguard movements, all short-lived but impressive in their manifestos, have succeeded one after the other during the decades following modernismo. Some of the theories were influenced by the European and Am. poets of the 20th c., although insistence in defending the identity of P.R. culture has never been absent from their poetry in this century. The Sp. names of some of these movements are significant: "noismo," based on the concept of the negative no; "trascendentalismo," suggesting the impulse toward the metaphysical and the beyond; and "atalayismo," a bold and forceful attempt to emphasize the extravagant side of every possible idea. The relation with ultraism, cubism, dadaism (qq.v.), and other avant-garde groups, besides the nationalistic themes used by some of the poets, characterized these movements in Puerto Rico. Among the most important poets related to them are Francisco Manrique Cabrera (1908—), author of Poemas de mi Tierra, Tierra; Julia de Burgos (1914-53), who wrote exquisite poems inspired by her childhood memories and her passionate love for P.R. independence; Juan Antonio Corretjer (1908—), political leader and poet deeply involved with the essence of the Indian and Sp. roots of the culture of Puerto Rico; Francisco Matos Paoli (1915—), a refined voice in search of spiritual and transcendental meanings, and Luis Hernández Aquino (1907—), a scholar whose poetry reveals his quest for the cultural soul of his people.

Poetry magazines published for a short time (Mester, Versiones, Lorca) and the literary reviews Asomante and Sin Nombre have served the purpose of publishing many poems by young writers who have already been acclaimed by the critics. Some P.R. poets have done their work in New York City, and this group represents the continuity of what their peers have been doing in the island. Although some may have spent most of their lives in the United States, they continue to write in Sp. and their principal concern is to express their feelings and their attachment to the homeland. Diana Ramírez de Arellano (1919—), Juan Avilés (1904—), Graciany Miranda Archilla (1910—), and Clemente Soto Vélez (1905—), have written most of their books in the United States, where a younger generation, represented by Víctor Hernández Cruz, is exploring new areas of expression, writing in Eng. but creating new speech patterns by introducing Sp. and Am.-Sp. terms.

Perfect integration of a culture leads to stagnation. Every cultural complex is itself a microcosm, in which opposing factors are constantly meeting and clashing so that sometimes one, sometimes its opposite, prevails. This is applicable to the way in which poetry has been developing in the literature of P.R., and it is evident that the theater, the essay, and modern fiction, especially the short story, have been revitalized in the 20th c. by poetry itself, the genre par excellence in P.R. letters.

ANTHOLOGIES: Poesía puertorriqueña, ed. L. Hernández Aquino (1954); Aguinaldo lírico de la poesía puertorriqueña, ed. C. Rosa-Nieves (3 v., 1957); Antología de jóvenes poetas, ed. J. M. Torres Santiago (1965); Poesía nueva puertorriqueña, ed. L. A. Rosario Quiles (1971); The P.R. Poets, ed. A. Matilla and I. Silén (1973).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: L. Hernández Aquino, Movimientos literarios del siglo XX en P.R. (1951), Nuestra aventura literaria (1966) and El modernismo en P.R. (1967; also an anthol.); E. Rivera, La poesía en P.R. antes de 1843 (1965); M. T. Babin, Jornadas literarias (1967) and The Puerto Ricans' Spirit (1971); C. Rosa-Nieves, Plumas estelares en las letras de P.R. (v. 1, 1967); J. E. González, La poesía contemporánea de P.R., 1930-1960 (1972); M. D. Hill and H. B. Schleifer, P.R. Authors: A Bibliographic Handbook (1974). M.T.B.

R

RECANTATION. See PALINODE.

ROCK LYRIC. From the middle of the 1950's to the early 1960's r.l. meant any set of words used in conjunction with r. and roll music which had as a distinguishing feature a strong, evenly accentuated beat most often in four-quarter but occasionally in three-quarter time. These lyrics rarely made any claim to poetic status. Nevertheless, taken as a whole, they projected the problems and fantasies of post-Korean war adolescence. It is in this sense that Richard Goldstein characterizes Chuck Berry as the "mythmaker" for millions of young listeners: Berry's lyrics both reflected and created a world of fast cars and sexual rivalries (Mabellene), mild protest against adult institutions (School Day), and ultimate fulfillment through the new music (Reelin' and Rockin'). Perhaps the main theme of early r. lyrics was in fact r. music itself, a celebrating of its sense of primal energy and the new kinds of dancing it made possible.

The other major theme of these lyrics was, of course, love. Most early r. songs maintained the romantic attitudes of the Tin Pan Alley popular lyric (the sorrow of unrequited love, the certainty of happiness through true love), adapting these to a teen-age audience in simple forms designed to fit a steady r. beat. But the blues tradition within r. allowed for more realistic portrayals of love relationships, and many r. lyrics (Money Honey, Hound Dog) expressed cynical, hostile, or abrasive tones previously underdeveloped in popular music. Moreover, within the blues tradition, the word "rock" (like the word "jazz") had often referred to sex (as in the traditional Rock Me, Baby), and some r. songs introduced a new sexual dimension in the popular lyric—either directly (Work with Me, Annie) or through innuendo (Let the Good Times Roll).

Through the 1960's r. lyrics continued to draw much of their vitality from the blues tradition. In England such groups as the Rolling Stones relied heavily on an earthy, frank sexuality, epitomized in Satisfaction. But in America black lyricists like Ray Charles and Otis Redding were adding new complexity to standard themes, and using the traditional blues technique of the repeated line in more intricate ways. The toughness of blues could be combined with secularized gospel lyrics to fashion a poetry of "soul"—or softened, as in the lyrics of Smokey Robinson, into romantic r. poetry. By the end of the decade black lyricists such as Marvin Gaye and Curtis Mayfield were using r. lyrics to articulate new subtleties of social awareness.

The major thematic development in the r. lyrics of the 1960's was a complete broadening of subject matter. Coexisting with the by now traditional treatments of music and love were lyrics reflecting rapid changes and dislocations in society itself, including a growing rejection of middle-class attitudes. Drug experience became a common topic in r. lyrics, as in Jimi Hendrix's Purple Haze. Lines such as the Beatles' "She's leaving home after living alone for so many years" described the actions as well as the wishful dreams of thousands of teenagers. After writing protest songs, which took on the status of anthems for the youth counter-culture (Blowin' in the Wind, The Times They Are A-Changing), Bob Dylan brought about a fusion of folk and r. Such albums as Highway 61 Revisited mingled elements of protest with nightmare visions of the modern industrial landscape. Such lyricists as Joni Mitchell and Paul Kantner often transformed protest into the vision of a new beginning, another Eden.

In addition to a broadening of themes, r. lyrics of the 1960's were distinguished by a more self-consciously literary tone. A number of traditional poems (Dover Beach, Richard Cory) were adapted to r. music, and original lyrics took on, often superficially, elements of modern poetry. (1) The use of archetypal narrative frameworks: Eric Clapton's Tales of Brave Ulysses, David Crosby's Guinnevere. (2) Alienation as objectified in a dissociated modern sensibility: Paul Simon's The Dangling Conversation, Dylan's Desolation Row (which refers specifically to Pound and Eliot). (3) A corresponding reliance on fragmentation, dissonance, and disjunction in verbal surface of the lyric: the Beatles' A Day in the Life. (4) Surrealism—used either to render a sense of social chaos (Dylan's Memphis Blues Again) or to reflect strange, perhaps psychedelic, visions (the Beatles' Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds). (5) Ambiguity and allusion, especially in dealing with drugs: the Jefferson Airplane's White Rabbit (which combines double entendres about pills and hashish with references to Alice in Wonderland). (6) Obscure, personal symbolism that resists paraphrase: the Beatles'

Strawberry Fields Forever. (7) Highly complex wordplay and intricate rhymes: Dylan's Subterranean Homesick Blues. (8) The development of an ironic mode, analogous to the dramatic monologue (Randy Newman's Political Science), and adaptable to use in serious drama (as in the interpolated sardonic rock commentary of Sam Shepard's play Operation Side-winder). (9) A tendency toward sustained compositions, in which whole groups of songs form an aesthetic unit (the Beatles' Sergeant Pepper) or even a "rock opera" (the Who's Tommy).

At the beginning of the 1970's the r. opera Jesus Christ Superstar explored two themes which were incipient in many lyrics of the 1960's, and which have since become more powerful in r. The first is an overt religious affirmation, with the r.l. serving as prayer or hymn. The second is the examination of superstardom as a contemporary cultural phenomenon, the r. star's rise and fall (together with his roles of troubadour, sex symbol, and Byronic hero) serving as a mythic paradigm. Two other recent developments in the subject matter of the r.l. are deviant sexuality and science-fiction, both exemplified in the lyrics of David Bowie. At the same time many contemporary lyricists seem to be attempting to return to the roots of r., either through 1950's nostalgia or the still vital blues tradition.

Just as at an earlier time the popular song and the blues influenced modern poets as diverse as Eliot (Fragment of an Agon) and

Auden (Refugee Blues), some contemporary poets have either been influenced by r. lyrics (William Matthews' Ball and Chain) or, like Leonard Cohen and Michael Benedikt, written r. songs of their own. At present, however, the r.l. has borrowed much more from modern poetry than vice-versa, and there remains the question of how well r. lyrics can survive on the printed page. With increasing frequency, anthologies of contemporary poetry are including lyrics by Paul Simon, Bob Dylan, and the Beatles. But Allen Ginsberg has suggested that the r.l. should be taken together with its music as a unique poetic construct: because many r. lyricists "think not only in words but in music simultaneously," they have created a new genre of "personal realistic imaginative rhymed verse."

The Age of R., ed. J. Eisen (1967); The Poetry of R., ed. R. Goldstein (1969); R. Christgau, "R. Lyrics Are Poetry (Maybe)," Cheetah, 1 (1967); H. Davies, The Beatles (1968; ch. 30); J. Carey, "Changing Courtship Patterns in the Popular Song," Am. Jour. of Sociology, 74 (1969); L. Roxon, Lillian Roxon's R. Encyclopedia (1969); Bob Dylan: A Retrospective, ed. C. McGregor (1972); F. Kermodé, S. Spender, "Bob Dylan: The Metaphor at the End of the Tunnel," Esquire, 77 (1972); R. Joffe, "Is R. 'n' Roll Really Here to Stay?" Village Voice, June 14, 1973; B. Sarlin, Turn It Up (I Can't Hear the Words) (1973); D. Swanger, The Poem as Process (1974).

S

SAN FRANCISCO RENAISSANCE. See AMERICAN POETIC SCHOOLS AND TECHNIQUES (CONTEMPORARY).*

SEMIOTICS (or semiology). The science of signs. Considering social and cultural phenomena as signs, s. studies the systems of rules and conventions which enable them to have meaning. In the field of literary criticism, s. involves the analysis of literature as a use of language which depends upon supplementary conventions and which explores the signifying properties of various modes of discourse.

Although reflection on the sign has a venerable philosophical history, s. or semiology in the modern sense dates from Ferdinand de Saussure (1857-1913), who argued that linguistics should form part of a general science of signs, which he called semiology. His contemporary C. S. Peirce (1839-1914) had independently worked out an elaborate typology of signs and a metalanguage for discussing them, but his s. was conceived as an expansion of logic, and since most work in s. has looked to linguistics rather than to logic as a model, Saussure has been the more influential figure. A behaviorist s. associated with Charles Morris has also been developed, but its stimulus-response psychology has made it less useful to the literary critic than a semiology based on linguistics.

Linguistics might serve as a model for semiology, Saussure argued, because it stresses the conventional nature of the sign and thus prevents the analyst from assuming that non-linguistic signs are in some way "natural" and require no explanation. By considering cultural phenomena as the products of various "languages" one is led to study the systems of convention which enable them to have meaning. Certain types of signs which lack this conventional basis are thus generally taken to fall outside the field of semiology. If the relationship between form (or signifier) and meaning (or signified) is causal rather than conventional (those clouds mean rain; those spots mean measles), one has an index, which is properly studied by the relevant science. If the relation be one of natural resemblance or representation (a photograph of a horse signifies a horse), one is dealing with an *icon, which might be treated by a philosophical theory of representation. If the relationship be motivated—grounded in properties of the signifier and the signified—one has a symbol, which falls within the domain of semiology but which can be analyzed by noting the basis of the relationship between individual signifier and individual signified (given the role of the cross in Christianity, it is a motivated symbol of Christianity). Finally, if the relationship is unmotivated and purely conventional (as in the case of words in natural languages), one is dealing with signs proper, which can be explained only by reconstructing the system from which they derive. The relationship between the form and meaning of "relate" is itself arbitrary, but it can be explained with reference to the morphological rules of the language which place it within a system that includes relate: relation, dictate: dictation, narrate: narration, etc.

Semiological explanation takes objects or acts as the parole (speech acts) of an underlying langue (linguistic system) whose "grammar" must be analyzed. One must attempt to isolate the minimal units which the system employs, determine the contrasts between units that produce meaning (paradigmatic relations) and the rules of combination which enable units to be grouped together as constituents of larger structures (syntagmatic relations). The semiological study of literature is an attempt to analyze literature as a system of signs and thus to determine what conventions enable literary works to have meaning. By seeing what variations in internal structure or context would produce differences of meaning, the analyst isolates the functional units and operative conventions of literature.

Poetry is a second-order semiological system in that items which are already signs in the first-order system of the Eng. or Fr. language are organized according to supplementary conventions which give them meanings and effects other than those they would have in ordinary prose. If one takes a prose sentence and sets it down on a page as verse, its linguistic meaning is not altered, but it acquires considerable literary meaning; and the task of the semiologist is to explain what are the conventions which produce the new signs responsible for this supplementary meaning. When the following sentence is set down on the page as a poem

As the cat climbed over the top of the jamclocset

first the right forefoot carefully then the hind stepped down into the pit of the empty

flowerpot

it acquires meaning it would not have as part of a description in a novel, and to account for this meaning we must try to state the conventions which enable readers or critics to give it meaning. Among those that make possible an interpretation of this poem are the following: the convention of reference—that the meaning of a lyric is not restricted by ostensible reference (e.g., to a particular cat); the convention of coherence—that all the parts should be shown to relate to the effect of the whole; the convention of mimetic form—that we may read line endings as spatial or temporal gaps (suspense, isolation, stepping down); the convention of significance—read a short, apparently banal lyric as a moment of epiphany; the convention of symbolic extrapolation—make thematic capital of the emptiness of the flowerpot and the careful stepping of the cat; the convention of self-reflexivity—one way of giving poems thematic coherence is to read them as about poetry. If the poem is given a meaning other than that of the prose sentence, it is because conventions of this sort, which constitute the institution of poetry, produce supplementary signs. A semiology of poetry attempts to analyze the signs of this particular semiotic system.

The task of a semiology of poetry would be to make explicit, as conventions of the institution of literature, the implicit assumptions which govern the production of meaning in poetry. These conventions are of various kinds: first, those which govern the ways in which formal features, such as enjambment, caesura, metrical deviation, rhyme, and repetition of sounds, may become signs and contribute to poetic effect; second, the conventions of genre, which by permitting or excluding certain subjects, tones, and linguistic modes, enable the poet to produce meaning by conforming to them or deviating from them; third, the general expectations concerning the ways in which poems may cohere or the types of structures which readers are trained to look for (e.g., the irony and paradox which new critics [see NEW CRITICISM] sought in lyrics); and finally the conventions of symbolic reading (of plausible and implausible extrapolation) which enable readers to make poems into unified structures expressing complex attitudes. The conventions which constitute poetry as a semiotic system change, of course, from one period to another. The Waste Land and Un Coup de dés seem less incoherent now than they once did because conventions for reading them have been developed. Indeed, changes in ways of reading provide semiology with some of its best evidence about the conventions operative at particular periods.

Semiological studies may thus bear on the functioning of particular poetic devices, such as metaphor, synecdoche, repetition of sounds, line endings, and on the implicit poetics of various historical periods. One important result of seminological study has been the renewal of interest in rhetoric, as an earlier attempt to formalize the operations of poetic signs, and the desire to reorganize rhetoric in accordance with modern linguistics.

A semiology of literature is interested in the ways in which literary signs differ from those of other types of discourse, and consequently one specialized form of semiology has developed which considers literature as an activity which foregrounds and questions other types of signs. This sémanalyse, as Julia Kristeva calls it, opposes the traditional theory of the sign which takes the signifier as the expression of the signified and argues instead that the reality of the sign lies in its form, its signifier, which holds out the promise of a meaning but does not express it. The meaning does not lie "behind" the signifier, as something which the speaker originally "had in mind" and which the reader must recover; rather the signifier holds out the promise of a meaning which the reader must try to produce. Literature, and especially poetry where the priority of the text to its paraphrase has long been obvious, has always explored the ways in which the "work of the signifier" could lend to the open-ended production of meanings rather than to the recovery of "a" meaning. In this sense, literature can be studied as a form of discourse which undermines the conception of the sign that seems appropriate to ordinary discourse, where the signifier is the means of access to a communicative intention. Sémanalyse is a critical semiology in that it works on systems of signs while attempting to show that both the systems themselves and the analyses of semiotic systems are based on premises which are highly questionable, though they may well be the very conditions of meaning and hence unavoidable.

F. de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale (1916); W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930); C. Peirce, Collected Papers (1931-58); C. Morris, Signs, Language and Behaviour (1946), Writings on the General Theory of Signs (1971); R. Barthes, "Eléments de sémiologie," Communications, 4 (1964), Système de la mode (1967), Sade, Fourier, Loyola (1971); T. Sebeok, ed. Approaches to S. (1964), S. (forthcoming); A. J. Greimas, Sémantique structurale (1966), Du Sens (1970), ed. Essais de sémiotique poétique (1971), ed. Sign, Language, Culture (1971); L. Prieto, Messages et signaux (1966); J. Derrida, De la grammatologie (1967), La Dissémination (1972), Marges de la philosophie (1972); U. Eco, La struttura assente (1968), "La critica semiologica," I Metodi attuali della critica in Italia, ed. M. Corte and C. Segre (1970); M. Serres, Hermès, ou la communication (1968); Hermès II: L'Interférence (1972); P. Sollers, Logiques (1968); E. Benveniste, "Sémiologie de la langue," Semiotica, 1 (1969); G. Deleuze, Logique du sens (1969); Proust et les signes (1970); N. Goodman, Languages of Art (1969); J. Kristeva, Semiotike: Recherches pour une sémanalyse (1969), ed. Essays in S. (1971); N. Mouloud, L'langage et structures (1969); C. Segre, I Segni e la critica (1969); D'A. S. Avale, L'Analisi letteraria in Italia: Formalismo, strutturalismo, semiologia (1970); J. Dubois et al. (Groupe de Liège), Rhétorique générale (1970); G. Mounin, Introd. à la sémiologie (1970); "Recherches rhétoriques," Communications, 16 (1970); P. Guiraud, La Sémiologie (1971); E. Meletinsky and D. Segal, "Structuralism and S. in the U.S.S.R.," Diogenes, 73 (1971); J. Pelc, Studies in Functional Logical S. of Natural Language (1971); G. Wienold, Semiotik der Literatur (1972); P. Zumthor, Essai de poétique médiévale (1972); Recherches sur les systèmes signifiants, ed. J. Rey-Débove (1973); J. Culler, Structuralist Poetics (1974).

JOURNALS: Centrum; Communications; Jour. of Lit. Semantics; Poetics; Semiotica; Tezisy dokladov letnej shkoly po vtorichnym modelirujushchim sistemam; Trudy po znakovym sistemam. J.D.C.

SHAPED VERSE. See PATTERN POETRY.

STANCES. Fr. verse form often confused with strophes (which are Eng. "stanzas"), but differing therefrom by its restriction to lyrical themes and, in conformity with its etymology (It. "stopping places"), a more definite pause at the end of each division. Introduced from Italy in the second half of the 16th c. to designate a less ambitious form than the ode with its strophes, st. continued well into the 19th c.

(e.g., Musset, Sully Prudhomme). They reached their climax however in the early 17th-c. theater, particularly tragedy, where they were utilized as highly organized lyric monologues; their thematic density, varied meters, and complex rhyme schemes contrasted vividly with the alexandrine couplets of dialogue. About 1660 st. were banished from the theater in the name of verisimilitude: that characters should possess such poetic skill when in the throes of violent emotion was no longer considered logical.—P. Martinon, Les Strophes (1912, appendix II); J. Scherer, La Dramaturgie classique en France (1950, 2^e partie, ch. 6). A.E.

STRUCTURALISM. In literary criticism s. is a method of analysis and a theory of literature inspired by developments in structural linguistics and structural anthropology which reached its height in France in the 1960's. It has been assimilated and developed in various ways by practitioners in other countries, but it remains, in its most distinctive and characterizable form, a Fr. movement whose principal figures are Roland Barthes, Gérard Genette, Tzvetan Todorov, Julia Kristeva, and A. J. Greimas. The work of Roman Jakobson, Gilles Deleuze, and Jacques Derrida may also be considered structuralist, and outside the literary field the leaders of the movement are Claude Lévi-Strauss, Michel Foucault, Jacques Lacan, and Louis Althusser.

In general terms, s. can be opposed to an atomism which attempts to explain phenomena individually. Ferdinand de Saussure (1857-1913), the founder of modern linguistics, distinguished between concrete speech acts (parole) and the underlying system of a language (la langue), arguing that the latter was a formal entity whose elements had no positive or essential qualities but must be defined solely in relational terms. Language must be studied as a formal system of interrelated elements. Claude Lévi-Strauss, who is regarded by many as the central figure of s., adopted this perspective in anthropology and rejected attempts to explain social and cultural phenomena in piecemeal fashion, especially by explanations of a psychological kind, preferring to treat them as manifestations of underlying formal systems. His studies of primitive logic, totemism, and myth were attempts to reconstruct a "logic of the concrete": instead of relating particular practices or tales to the beliefs they imply, one should consider them as elements in conceptual systems which enable people to think about and organize the world. The various codes by which myths operate are sets of binary oppositions drawn from different areas of experience which can be used to express a variety of contrasts, and they thus bear striking resemblance to those operative in poetic discourse. One might say, for example, that in his sonnet Two loves I have of comfort and despair Shakespeare takes the opposition good/evil and explores it through a variety of codes: the religious (angel/devil, saint/fiend), the moral (purity/pride), and the physical (fair/colored ill).

Structural analysis of this subconscious logic of the concrete is related to semiology (see SEMIOTICS), the study of sign systems. Indeed, one might say that the two fundamental insights on which s. is based are (1) that social and cultural phenomena do not have essences but are defined both by their internal structures and by their place in the structures of the relevant social and cultural systems, and (2) that social and cultural phenomena are signs: not physical events only, but events with meaning. One may try to separate the structural from the semiological—the study of patterns from the study of signs—but the most successful structural analyses isolate those structures which permit phenomena to function as signs.

S. in literary criticism began as a revolt against the particular types of erudition—literary history and biographical criticism—which dominated the Fr. university orthodoxy. S. sought to return to the text, but unlike Anglo-Am. new criticism (q.v.) it assumed that one could not study a text without preconceptions, that naive empiricism was an impossible critical position, and that in order to discover structures one required a methodological model. The goal of s. was not interpretation of texts but rather the elaboration, through encounters with particular texts, of an account of the modes of literary discourse and their operation. Roland Barthes distinguished between a criticism which places the text in a particular context or situation and assigns meaning to it and a science of literature or poetics which studies the conditions of meaning: the formal structures which organize a text and make possible a range of meanings. Translation of the Russian formalists (see RUSSIAN FORMALISM) in the late 1960's gave structuralists analogues to their own work and stimulated, in particular, the study of literature as an autonomous institution with its own modes of self-transcendence, but the principal model was linguistics. Two versions of s. can be distinguished by their different uses of linguistics: as a technique applied directly to the description of the language of texts or as the model for a poetics which would stand to literature as linguistics stands to language.

The first strain involves above all study of the patterns formed by the distribution in the text of elements defined by phonological and syntactic theory. Roman Jakobson's characterization of the poetic function of language as "the projection of the principle of equivalence from the axis of selection into the axis of combination" led to study of the ways in which items which are paradigmatically equivalent (related by membership of a grammatical, lexical, or phonological class) are distributed in linguistic sequence (on the axis of combination). Jakobson's own analyses of poems focus on symmetrical and asymmetrical patterns of distribution which unify the text and throw certain elements into relief. It has been argued that many of the patterns he discovers are irrelevant to the meaning and coherence that readers experience, but the reply would be that formal patterns need not contribute to meaning in order to have a unifying effect, albeit experienced subconsciously, and that they are objectively present in the poem. Others, such as Nicolas Ruwet and Jacques Geninasca, though working with Jakobson's theories and techniques, have preferred to concentrate on ways in which linguistic patterning supports semantic effects (see LINGUISTICS AND POETICS). This version of s., though it has revealed the intricacy of poems' formal organization, tends to separate the structural from the semiological and has been a less important mode of s. than the attempt to develop a poetics modeled on linguistics.

Structuralist poetics is founded on the belief that while literature uses language it is also itself like a language in that its meanings are made possible by systems of convention. Analyzing a literature is analogous to analyzing a language, and one must develop a series of concepts designed to account for the operation of literature as a system. The work of Kristeva, Derrida, and especially Barthes, has contributed to an elaborate metalanguage which serves both as a theory of literature and as the outline of an analytical method.

Literature is not just sentences but sentences made signs in a second-order literary system. The same sentence, for example, will have very different meanings, depending on whether it is used in a lyric poem or in a newspaper report. And thus within the literary system the sentence, itself a linguistic sign, becomes a form or signifiant whose signifié is its special meaning in literary discourse. The conventions which give the sentence additional meanings and functions are those of an écriture: a particular mode of writing which involves an implicit contract between author and reader. The system or institution of literature is made up of a series of écritures which constitute its historical or generic moments. In reading a sentence in a lyric differently from a sentence in a newspaper report one is implicitly recognizing and employing the conventions of a particular lyric écriture.

Cultures tend to naturalize their signs, to

motivate the connection between signifier and signified so that meanings seem natural and not the result of convention; literature may therefore be described according to the ways in which it resists or complies with this process. Interpretation is itself a mode of naturalization or recuperation: the attempt to bring the text within a logical discursive order by making it the expression of a meaning. We read texts in accordance with a series of codes which provide, on the one hand, models of human behavior (coherence and incoherence of personality, plausible and implausible relations between action and motive, logical and illogical chains of events), and on the other hand, models of literary intelligibility (coherence and incoherence, plausible and implausible symbolic extrapolations, significance and insignificance) which enable us to make sense of texts by organizing their elements into coherent series. These codes are models of the vraisemblable, in the broad sense in which structuralists use the term—models of the natural and intelligible—; and a work which lends itself to this process of recuperation is lisible (readable), whereas one that is unintelligible in terms of our traditional models is scriptible (writable): it can be written but not read, except in a kind of vicarious writing. A structuralist analysis of a work aims less at interpreting and thereby recuperating it than at examining the ways in which it responds to the reader's attempts to make it unified and coherent. The critic does not discover its structure so much as observe its structuration, and he therefore attends to its différance (difference/deferment): the play of its signifiers which defer meaning by offering material which is different from and in excess of meanings that can be assigned them (in poetry, meter, rhyme, and sound patterns generally are instances of the surplus of the signifier). The play of the signifier is the productivity of the text because it forces the reader to become not the passive consumer of an intelligibility he need only recognize but the active producer of meaning and participant in the exploration of possible modes of order.

This series of concepts leads to a critique of the representational aesthetic (which locates values in what is represented) and to stress on the literality or materiality of the text as linguistic surface. The play of language is valued for the ways in which it leads to a questioning of the relationship between language and experience; and hence critics attend to effects of intertextuality: the interaction within a text of various modes of discourse or of languages drawn from other literary texts and from discourse about the world. Whereas the Russian formalists saw the text as a way of "making strange" ordinary objects or activities, structuralists emphasize the "making strange" of discourses which order the world and which the work puts on display. The value of literature is thus related to its recognition of the arbitrary nature of the sign: undermining culture's attempts to make meanings natural, it asserts its own status as artifice and produces in the reader a self-conscious exploration of ways of ordering experience.

Although structuralist criticism has focused primarily on the novel, there is a body of work on poetry which may be grouped under several subheadings. (1) The reconstruction of poetic codes or systems: Gérard Genette has described baroque imagery as a system of interrelated items defined less by individual connotation than by oppositions and has analyzed images of day and night as a poetic code; Paul Zumthor has reconstructed the codes of medieval poetry, from the generic types of discourse to systems of topoi (see TOPOS), rhythmical formulae, descriptive schema, and conventionalized knowledge. (2) The correlation of particular structures with the interpretive operations they require: Michael Riffaterre has analyzed a variety of poetic devices, from the revitalized cliché to the extended metaphor of surrealist poetry; Samuel Levin's theory of couplings shows how phonological or grammatical equivalence affects semantic interpretation; A. J. Greimas and his followers have attempted to show how a level of coherence or isotopie is attained in the interpretation of poetic sequences. (3) The rehabilitation of rhetoric: Genette, the Groupe de Liège, and others have redefined rhetorical figures in linguistic terms and opened the way to a theory which would treat the figures as instructions for symbolic reading, as sets of conventional operations which readers may perform on poetic texts. (4) The reinvention of poetic artifice: Julia Kristeva, Jacques Derrida, Philippe Sollers, and poets of the Tel Quel school (Marcelin Pleyne, Denis Roche) have undertaken readings of poets designed to show how they undermine by their formal invention the traditional operations of the sign and have emphasized the need for contemporary poets to question and write against the codes and implicit contracts of poetry; Veronica Forrest-Thomson stresses the constructive rather than destructive aspect of their project, arguing that only the invention of new conventions and explicit artifice can enable poetry to play its traditional role of investigating and criticizing our unexamined ordering of experience and our assumptions about the relationship between language and the world. Generally, the structuralist study of poetry investigates the implicit conventions which enable poetry to be read and understood and focuses on the unsettled dialectical relationship between these conventions, always threatened by naturalization, and poetic texts.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: S.: A Reader, ed. M. Lane (1970); J. Harari, Structuralists and Structuralisms (1971); Roman Jakobson, A Bibliog. of His Writings (1971); Tel Quel, 47 (1971); J. Culler, Structuralist Poetics (1974).

R. Barthes, Le Degré zéro de l'écriture (1953), Mythologies (1957), Essais critiques (1964), Critique et vérité (1966), S/Z (1970); C. Lévi-Strauss, La Pensée sauvage (1962), Le Cru et le cuit (1964); S. Levin, Linguistic Structures in Poetry (1962); M. Foucault, Raymond Roussel (1963); "Recherches sémiologiques," Communications, 4 (1964); M. Pleyne, Comme (1965); "Analyse structurale du récit," Communications, 8 (1966); G. Genette, Figures (1966), Figures II (1969), Figures III (1972); A. J. Greimas, Sémantique structurale (1966); "S.," YFS, 36-37 (1966); J. Derrida, L'Écriture et la différence (1967), La Dissémination (1972), Marges de la philosophie (1972); "Structuralismes: Idéologie et méthode," Esprit, 35 (1967); "Colloque de Cluny," La Nouvelle critique, spec. issue (1968); U. Eco, La struttura assente (1968); "Linguistique et littérature," Langages, 12 (1968); M. Lotman, Lektsi po struktural'noi poetike; vvedenie, teoriia stikha [Lectures in Structural Poetics: Introduct., Theory of Verse] and Struktura khudozhestvennogo teksta [Structure of the Artistic Text] (both Providence, R.I., 1968 and 1971, Brown Univ. Slavic reprints, 5 and 9); D. Roche, Eros énergumène (1968), Le Mérit (1972); P. Sollers, Logiques (1968); Tel Quel, Théorie d'ensemble (1968); "Le Vraisemblable," Communications, 11 (1968); Qu'est-ce que le structuralisme? ed. F. Wahl (1968); J. Kristeva, Semiotike: Recherches pour une sémantique (1969); C. Segre, I Segni e la critica (1969); "La Stylistique," Langue française, 3 (1969); G. Deleuze, Proust et les signes (1970); J. Dubois et al. (Groupe de Liège), Rhétorique générale (1970); The Languages of Crit. and the Sciences of Man, ed. R. Macksey and E. Donato (1970); "Linguistique et texte littéraire," Langue française, 7 (1970); "Recherches rhétoriques," Communications, 16 (1970); "S.," Twentieth C. Studies, 3 (1970); V. Forrest-Thomson, "Levels in Poetic Convention," Jour. of European Studies, 2 (1971); J. Geninasca, Analyse structurale des Chimères de Nerval (1971); Essais de sémiotique poétique, ed. A. J. Greimas (1971); M. Riffaterre, Essais de stylistique structurale (1971); T. Todorov, Poétique de la prose (1971), "Introduction à la symbolique," Poétique, 11 (1972); F. Jameson, The Prison-House of Language: A Critical Account of S. and Russian Formalism (1972); N. Ruwet, Langage, musique, poésie (1972); P. Zumthor, Essai de poétique médiévale (1972); R. Jakobson, Questions de poétique (1973), Selected Writings, III (forthcoming); J. Culler, Structuralist Poetics (1974); R. Scholes, S. in Lit. (1974); S. around the World, ed. T. Sebeok (forthcoming).

JOURNALS: Poétique, passim; Tel Quel, passim. J.D.C.

SWAHILI POETRY. S.p. can be traced directly to Arabic models of Islamic verse from the Hadramawt and the Persian Gulf. The development of S.p. in the 19th c. shows the Africanization of a foreign medium by the coastal community of East Africa. The earliest extant S. manuscripts are from the early 18th c., namely, al-Hamziya, a S. version in 460 stanzas of al-Būṣīrī's Arabic poem Umm al-Qura (Mother of Villages [Medina]), and Tambuka or Herekali, 1,150 stanzas dealing with the war between the Arabs and the Byzantines from A.D. 628 to 636. S.p. is still written in modified Arabic script, but only for private circulation by Muslims belonging to traditional Muslim-S. society. Most S.p. now appears in roman script, in books, and in the press.

The most important prosodic features in S.p. are rhyme and fixed patterns of syllabic measure. The earliest extant wedding songs, serenades, and praise songs are in indeterminate long measure of at least 15 syllables. Another early form is the takhmis, in which each stanza is of 5 lines rhyming aaaab and with no medial rest. The Hadrami Saiyids occasionally adopted this form, e.g., the version in the British Museum (No. Or. 4534) of the Liyongo legend by Sheikh Saiyid Abdallah bin Nasir (1725-1820). The Hadrami Saiyids in descent from Sheikh Abu Bakr bin Salim, who died in A.D. 1584, had considerable influence on the development of S.p. The author of al-Hamziya was Saiyid Aidarus, great-grandson of Sheikh Abu Bakr; Sheikh Saiyid Abdallah bin Nasir also wrote the utendi poem al-Inkishafi (Self-examination), an extremely popular work on the passing of the Arab city states on the East African coast; Sheikh Saiyid Mansab showed skill in composing acrostic and homiletic poems of varied form.

The utendi verse form consists of 4 short hemistichs of which the first 3 rhyme together and the fourth carries a rhyme repeated as the terminal rhyme of each stanza. This verse form was employed for writing long narrative poems embodying oral tradition, e.g., the story of the legendary hero Liyongo, as well as for circumstantial accounts of historical and contemporary events, e.g., the Maji-Maji rebellion of 1905, or the recent struggle for independence in Kenya and Tanzania. Some of the longer tendi derive from the Arabian narratives, mostly in rhymed prose, called Maghazi literature (Arabic magāzī, raids), consisting of legendary accounts based on a modicum of historical facts dealing with the wars of the Prophet Mohammed after the Hegira. Some of the shorter tendi are related to Arabian Maulid literature, dealing with the birth and early life of the Prophet.

The most popular verse form in S. for topical and lyric themes is verse of 8 hemistichs, each of 8 syllables, with rhyming pattern abababbc, the terminal rhyme of each stanza being repeated throughout the poem. Although in the scripts verse of this type is written either as a single line or in two lines, it is generally referred to by scholars as a quatrain. There appears to be no generally accepted name for this verse form in S., and it owes much less to Arabian sources for form and subject matter than the utendi or the takhmis. There are variations in the syllabic measure, but innovation is not encouraged. The outstanding exponent of S. quatrains is Muyaka bin Haji al-Ghassaniy of Mombasa (1776-1840), who encouraged the Mazrui governors of Fort Jesus, Mombasa, in opposing the overlordship of the Sultan Muscat. Muyaka's extension of S. poetry to the expression of attitudes arising from contemporary events was an important step toward the secularization of S. verse.

Most modern S. poetry in quatrains is secular, but conservative. The prestige of Shaaban Robert (1909-62) as a transitional writer is related to the political prestige of the S. language in Tanzania. He was the first to widen the literary uses of S. in forms borrowed from Eng. literature, e.g., the essay, the novelette, the autobiography. His poetry remains conventional and therefore acceptable. Mathias Mnyampala (1919-69) was among those Tanzanian poets invited by President Nyerere in 1968 to use their talents to familiarize the peasants with national politics. Mnyampala initiated the public performance of S. song poems (ngonjera) with the express intention of teaching "good conduct, indigenous culture and national politics." This attempt to put versification into national service maintained the functional aspect of much S. poetry. In contrast, poetry sung in the S. musical clubs of coastal East Africa was, and still is, topical, deeply allusive, close to oral tradition. The female singer, Siti binti Saad (1880-1950), is perhaps the best-known S. artist from that milieu.

Ahmad Nassir bin Juma Bhalo of Mombasa is a genuine contemporary S. poet whose poetry has features common to other early literatures of the world, and yet its composition and performance on the radio is contemporary. The poems are chanted by a professional singer to a pattern of melody based on one of the Arabian modal scales, a traditional manner of presentation. The verses are heavily gnomic, and the poet has the same specialized task of

"orating" as the thyle (orator, statesman) of the Anglo-Saxon Beowulf. As he says:

walumbi háya lumbani
ni mimi simba marara ningurumaye chakani.

O orators, come then, orate!
it is I, the roaring lion I who roar in the bush.

Ahmad Nassir's poems are in the Mvita dialect, are full of local allusions, and so are difficult to interpret, even for Africans who speak S. well, but who do not belong to the S. coastal community.

The development of S.p. as a part of the national literatures of Kenya and Tanzania is largely dependent upon the status of S. as a national language. At the present time the cultural background within the national context has its counterpart only in national politics. This may not be enough to guarantee within the national context compositions of a value comparable to that of poems from S. traditional society.

COLLECTIONS: Diwani ya [Collected Works of] Muyaka bin Haji, ed. W. Hichens (Johannesburg, 1940); A. Nassir, Poems from Kenya, ed. L. Harries (1966); Mw. Shabaan et al., Waimbaji wa Juzi (Singers of Yesteryear, 1966), ed. A. A. Jahadhmy et al.; Diwani ya Shaaban, ed. J.W.T. Allen (1968); Malenga wa Mvita (Mombasan Poet, 1971), ed. S. Chiraghdin; S. Islamic Poetry (1971) and An Anthology of S. Love Poetry (1972), both tr. and ed. J. Knappert; Johari za Kiswahili (series of edited tenzi, publ. by the East Afr. Lit. Bureau).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: L. Harries, S. Poetry (1962) and "S. Lit. in the National Context," Review of National Literatures, 11 (1971); J. Knappert, Traditional S. Poetry (1967); Uchambuzi wa Maandishi ya Kiswahili (Analysis of S. Writings, 1971), ed. F. Topan. L.H.

T

TENZI. See SWAHILI POETRY.*

THEME. To speak of the t. of a poem may be only to give a brief and unsophisticated answer to the question, "What is this poem about?" But t. as subject or topic (sometimes equated with and sometimes distinguished from such concepts as motif and archetype [q.v.]) is indispensable for the folklorist, the archetypal or myth critic, the historian of culture or ideas, or any other critic whose concern is to study characters, objects, situations, images, or ideas that recur within a particular work, in the works of a single author, or in the works of various authors. In a closely related sense, t. is equivalent to a summary statement of the main course of action or line of thought and feeling that is depicted in a poem: the t. of The Prelude is the growth of a poet's mind; the t. of The Rime of the Ancient Mariner is the consequences of the killing of an albatross. Another sense of t. involves a reference not only to the subject of a poem but also to its intention: the t. of To Althea, from Prison is to define true liberty; the t. of Ode on Melancholy is to give advice to someone who finds himself in a state of depression; the t. of Paradise Lost is to justify the ways of God to man. Finally, t. is used to refer to a summary statement of the doctrinal (usually, moral, religious, or philosophical) content of a poem.

"T." in the last of the senses distinguished above has appeared in criticism under a variety of other names: "moral," "message," "precept," "thesis," "meaning," "interpretation," "sentence," "idea," "comment," etc. One or another of these terms has formed part of the vocabulary of most critics who assign a primary position to the instrumental values of poetry. Much medieval, Renaissance, and neo-classical criticism was didactically oriented. Medieval literary theory conceived of poetry as an adjunct to religion and philosophy. The aim of the poet, like that of a preacher, should be to present persuasively a valid moral precept; his means is the use of attractive parable, allegory, or exemplum. The moral precept is the "t.," "nucleus," "sentence," "fruit," or "grain" of the poem. Renaissance didactic criticism, of which Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie (1595) is a good example, was similar to the medieval position. The aim of human life, says Sidney, is virtuous action, and poetry is a discipline worthy of man's most serious attention because it is more effective than any other human learning in molding human behavior morally. Poetry is a "medicine of cherries." The center of a good poem is a moral universal, and the poem is good if it presents a correct and lively image of this universal. Neoclassical criticism, following Horace, assigned pleasure and instruction as a double aim for poetry. This position resulted in a continued stress on the instrumental values of poetry, and the terms "moral" and "t." were used to point to the final cause of a poem and to its principle of unity. Thus Dryden: "The first rule which Bossu prescribes to the writer of an Heroic Poem, and which holds too by the same reason in all Dramatic Poetry, is to make the moral of the work; that is, to lay down to yourself what that precept of morality shall be, which you would insinuate into the people; as, namely, Homer's (which I have copied in my Conquest of Granada), was, that union preserves a commonwealth, and discord destroys it; Sophocles, in his Oedipus, that no man is to be accounted happy before his death. 'Tis the moral that directs the whole action of the play to one centre; and that action or fable is the example built upon the moral, which confirms the truth of it to our experience" ("The Grounds of Criticism in Tragedy" [1679]).

Many modern critics regard with suspicion expressions such as the "moral" or the "message" of a poem. But they do talk of poetry as a kind of knowledge, and, when induced to speak of the uses of poetry, they speak of its cognitive and moral values. As a consequence, like other instrumentalist critics, they have found the term "t." (or "meaning," "significance," "interpretation," "dominant attitude," "evaluation") indispensable both for pointing to the values of poetry and for indicating the principle of unity of a poem. However, they warn that the poem, or at least the good poem, is not a rhetorical device for ornamenting the t. or making it more persuasive.

The dangers of this didactic interpretation of the nature of poetry are so great that sometimes the recommendation appears to use "t." not to point to a general formulation of the meaning realized in a poem but rather to the moral problem or human situation that is dramatized in the poem. Thus the t. of Antigone is difficult choice; the t. of Dr. Faustus is the search for knowledge; the t. of King Lear is self-discovery. The purpose of the good poet is to explore these problems or situations in a particularized and concrete context. The net result may be simply a detailed diagnosis of the nature and complexities of the problem. More often the poet comes up with a moral judgment or evaluation which is a possible solution to the problem. Such tentative solutions may also be called "themes"; however, the reader of poetry is warned to regard them only as hypotheses which the good poem clarifies, tests, qualifies, and subjects to the fires of irony. In this process of testing, the original t. may be so qualified that no general statement of it will represent it accurately. Murray Krieger uses the word "thematics" (opposing it to the older, didactic use of "t.") to stress that the meaning of a poem must be studied in this way. The good poem, then, does not assert its

t. and invite the reader's acceptance of it. Rather the poem should be regarded as a form of exploratory discourse, in which a poet explores an area of moral concern and discovers or realizes the meaning of an experience, a meaning which may or may not have universal application.

The concept of t. plays a strikingly different role in critical theories that stress the terminal rather than the instrumental values of poetry. Terminalist critics regard the poem as an end in itself, an intrinsic good, an object of beauty, a source of aesthetic experience. If they discuss t. at all, they usually consider it, along with everything else in the poem, as influencing the quality or intensity of the aesthetic experience. Edgar Allan Poe, for example, protested against the "heresy of the didactic" and insisted that poetry should be written and read "simply for the poem's sake." To read a poem for the poem's sake is to experience a pure, elevating, and intense pleasure. A t. can be a "soul-elevating" idea: "Love . . . the true, the divine Eros . . . is unquestionably the purest and truest of all poetical themes" ("The Poetic Principle" [1850]). It is so because this t., more than any other, is the means to intense aesthetic experience. More recently, M. C. Beardsley has argued in a similar fashion. Though not denying that poetry may have moral and cognitive "side effects," he recommends that poetry, like the other fine arts, should be cultivated and valued for the sake of aesthetic experience. Aesthetic value, he says, depends on unity, complexity, and the intensity of the emotive qualities of a work of art. Philosophical, religious, and moral concepts and doctrines ("themes" and "theses" in his terminology), whether explicit or implicit in the literary work, may add significantly to the unity, complexity, and intensity of the work and thus be aesthetically valuable.

Finally, the Chicago critics (q.v.) divide poems into didactic poems and presentative or mimetic poems. The critic, when faced with the task of analyzing and evaluating a didactic poem, must, of course, use the word "t." or one of its synonyms to point to the unifying principle of the work. This is the proper procedure when discussing such masterpieces of didactic art as The Divine Comedy or The Faerie Queene. Mimetic poems, however, have a principle of unity very different from didactic poems. Their final cause is aesthetic pleasure derived from the reader's contemplation of a picture of a sequence of human actions, thoughts, or feelings so structured as to give the poem moving power. In the criticism of mimetic works, "t." may be useful to point to the nature of the moral or philosophical problems which are frequently part of the depicted action of the poem. Or the term may be useful to point to the set of moral norms, implied or expressed, in terms of which the author or his narrator judges the characters and their actions. But to use "t." to point to the organizing principle of the work is, for the Chicago critics, to assimilate mimetic works to didactic works and to miss their distinctive excellence.—Crane; Frye; M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958); M. Krieger, The Tragic Vision (1960); C. Brooks, A Shaping Joy (1971).

THEME-VERBLESS POETRY

F.G.

TOPOS (pl. topoi). A commonplace appropriate for literary treatment, an "intellectual theme suitable for development and modification" according to the imagination of the individual author (Curtius). In his Rhetoric, Aristotle used an adapted sense of physical place or t. to represent a rhetorical commonplace, and such topoi became the loci communes or commonplaces of the Roman rhetoricians, sometimes retaining a degree of their original physical sense by the association, in memory-systems, of specific places at the scene of an oration with specific topics in the speech. Aristotle's use of the term in his Topics is not essentially different; in that work topoi designate the commonplaces upon which dialectic reasoning bases its arguments and through which the philosopher may effectively communicate with non-philosophers. Ernst Robert Curtius adapted the rhetorical conception to literary use in European Lit. and the Late Middle Ages, tr. W. R. Trask (1953). Examples of topoi are: the inexpressibility t., in which a poet decries his inability to do his subject justice; the "world upsidedown" (mundus inversus) t., in which the world's disorder is shown by fish in the trees, children ruling parents, etc.; and set pieces like the standardized description of an ideal garden (locus amoenus). Critics following Curtius have extended the conception of a t. to include traditional metaphors such as the world as stage, the world as book, etc. Curtius distinguished between these "metaphorics" and the other "topics," although in many instances the distinction is difficult to maintain. F.J.W.

V

VERBLESS POETRY. The function of the various parts of speech in works of literature and the fact that such categories as, e.g., the verb and the adjective have been in and out of fashion at various times and for various reasons, have been often discussed by both writers and scholars of various persuasions. The problem, however, is very elusive and no definitive study exists on the subject.

A common generalization is the assertion that there is a direct relationship between the frequency of verbs in a poem and its "dynamic" quality. Scholars invoke W. Humboldt's remarks about the verb as an energy-giving element or A. M. Peškovskij's slogan, "back to the verb" from his paper, "The Verb as a Means of Expressiveness," in which he voiced the view that the peculiar abstract aura of vagueness, "lack of outspokenness" in symbolist poetry was due to these poets avoiding verbal constructions.

Indeed, such a tendency is quite common in symbolist poetry, notably Fr. and Russian. (Verlaine's and Balmont's efforts to avoid verbs are a matter of record.) The same goes for some other earlier and later poets: "Rires oiseux, pleurs sans raisons,/ Mains indéfiniment pressées,/ Tristesses moites, pâmoisons,/ Et quel vague dans les pensées!" (P. Verlaine); "Whisper, timid breathing/ Nightingale's trills/ Silver and rippling/ Of a sleepy stream" (A. Fet); "Cold, wet leaves/ Floating on moss-colored water/ And the croaking of frogs/ Cracked bell-notes in the twilight" (Amy Lowell); "Flowers through the window/ lavender and yellow// changed by white curtains—/ smell of cleanliness// Sunshine through the afternoon—/ On the glass tray// a glass pitcher . . ." (W. C. Williams).

However, the assertions that the above-mentioned features are due to the lack of verbs are subject to question. It is possible, as pointed out by O. Jespersen ("The Role of the Verb") to quote verbless construction "giving a very definite impression of motion." And vice versa, one should add, i.e., a poem packed full with verbs may be static. Marinetti's slogan of les mots en liberté and his celebrated example of a man who, on seeing a house on fire, naturally shouts nouns (Fire! Fire!) rather than constructing sentences with verbs, was a simple statement of fact. Many of the 20th-c. poets, but notably the futurists (see FUTURISM), turned against the conventional syntax and viewed the verb as the most mechanical "conductor of grammar," and they resorted to verbless construction in search of a more striking dynamic vision of the rapidly changing world. Marinetti-ti's poem Zang-Tumb-Tuum is a good example of the violence and chaos of the bombardment of Adrianople given in a form of a "telegraphic" compression based mainly on the principle of free associations of nouns not connected by verbs (commands of officers clattering like brass plates, bang from here bang from there, boom-cling-clang fast clinkclinging-clingclang up down there around high up attention over the head clang beautiful blaze blaze blaze . . .).

O. Jespersen, "The Role of the Verb," GRM, 3 (1911); A. Lombard, Les Constructions nominales dans le français moderne (1930); N. A. Nilsson, The Russian Imaginists (Stockholm, 1970; ch. 3: "Verbless Poetry"; see also bibliog.); Z. Folejewski, "Dynamic or Static? The Function of the Verb in Modern Poetry" in Canadian Contributions to the 7th Congress of Slavists, ed. Z. Folejewski (The Hague, 1972).

Z.F.

VISION. "V." has been a favorite word in the vocabulary of poets, but it has become common in criticism only in the modern period. It is a word rich in ambiguities and overtones of meaning, which frequently generate ironies in the contexts in which it is used. There is the v. of the physical eye; there is Coleridge's "armed v.," perception guided and assisted by a higher mental faculty; and there is transfiguration, apocalypse, and the beatific v. V. suggests the vividly concrete, but also the archetypal, ideal, and spiritual. It may be a revelation granted to the semi-divine man, the poet, prophet, or saint; but it also may have connections with ghosts, witches, and madness. In dream, intuition, or trance, the visionary sees what is or what ought to be; heaven or hell; a past Golden Age, present misery, or a future brave new world. V. makes a claim to truth and invites assent, but it may also refer to that which is illusory, impractical, wild, or foolish. Its language—allegory, metaphor, symbol, and other devices for expressing depth meanings—frequently requires special skills of interpretation.

The tradition that great poets have drunk the milk of paradise or that they are gifted with mysterious and uncommon powers of perception is an ancient one (see INSPIRATION). Both poets and critics have encouraged this view. This claim has been in part an attempt to explain the wondrous creative power of the great artist and in part a rhetoric of praise to exalt the character of the poet in order to make his message more persuasive. Convention too enters here, as in the epic poet's address to his Muse.

Poetry of v. is not a recognized literary genre. However, a body of poetry exists for which the claim has been made that the content is a record of visionary experience (in one or another of the senses distinguished above) granted to the poet or to a character he has created. For example, there are the dream visions (see DREAM ALLEGORY) popular in the Middle Ages and later; in these poems the claim to visionary experience is clearly a convention—the poem is only a mimesis of a visionary experience. On the other hand, there are poets like Blake, who have analyzed carefully the conditions of visionary experience and have claimed the authority of v. for the content of what they wrote. Indeed, most of the great romantics saw themselves as chosen poet-seers; they felt themselves to belong to "the visionary company" together with great poets like Milton and the Hebrew prophets; their mission was to trumpet a prophecy of a world renewed whose forms they had seen in imaginative v. M. H. Abrams has distinguished three principal kinds of transforming perception claimed by the romantics (and earlier and later poets): to see the wonder of the old and familiar (to return to the freshness of sensation of the child); to experience an epiphany in which an ordinary object or event is seen as suddenly and transitorily charged with a mysterious significance (Wordsworth's "spots of time"); and to perceive objects as invested with values different from those that custom has accorded to them (the sublimity of the lowly and humble).

Contemporary criticism uses "v." in a variety of senses. Occasionally, "v." refers simply to a poet's visual images (see IMAGERY) as these appear in descriptive passages or figures of speech (see Zimmermann in bibliog.). On the other hand, a critic like Frye uses "v." in an extended sense as a synonym for literature itself, or at least for the thematic component of literature. According to Frye, literature is not an imitation of nature and makes no reference to reality; rather it is the dream of man, an imaginative projection of man's desires and fears. Thus all literary works, taken together, constitute a total v. ("the vision of the end of social effort, the innocent world of fulfilled desires, the free human society"), whose parts Frye sometimes classifies metaphorically as the spring v., the summer v., the fall v., and the winter v. But the sense in which "v." is most frequently used in contemporary criticism is that given to it by expressionist critics, who use the term (with or without Orphic connotations) to refer to an author's world view—his ideas, attitudes, feelings, and evaluations about God, nature, and man. It is held that a poet necessarily expresses some part of his philosophy of life in the poems that he writes and that the aesthetic experience consists in the reader's evolving insight into this v. (or "perspective" or "point of view" or "ideology") and ultimate identification with the consciousness of the author. In a poem, parts of the author's v. may be explicitly stated

(as in Wordsworth's Tintern Abbey); but much of it exists on noncognitive levels of the mind and is revealed in the structure, style, images, and figurative language of his work. The chief function of the critic is to reconstruct and clarify the poet's v. In discharging this function, the critic may not be very much concerned about traditional genre or even about the analysis of poems as discrete artistic wholes. All the works of an author express some part of his v., and the critic's aim is to display the v. in its totality. (M. Krieger has condemned visionary critics for returning to pre-new criticism positions. Although he likes the term "v.," respect for the autonomy of the literary work makes him use "v." to refer to the thematic content—richly ambiguous and resisting any simple formulation—inhering in the work's unique totality and not to a set of abstract propositions and attitudes preexisting in the mind of the author and reflected in the work he composes.)

The visionary critic's most difficult problem is that of evaluation (unless, like Frye, he excludes evaluation from criticism). Visions have been praised for being complex, deep, comprehensive, original, or authentic. They have been blamed for being simple, shallow, narrow, standardized, or inauthentic. Such criteria do not seem to be entirely adequate. Any view of life, whether dramatized in a poem or systematized in philosophy, invites serious consideration of its truth and validity (see BELIEF, PROBLEM OF). Regardless of how intuitive or emotionally grounded a v. may be, it necessarily involves some elements that seem to make assertions with respect to the universe or the ongoing course of human life. Keats's questions then seem unavoidable: How does one distinguish v. from a waking dream? How does one know that he has achieved a "power to see as a god sees"? Santayana echoes Keats's words: "The height of poetry is to speak the language of the gods." The goal of the poet and the philosopher, he says, is theoria, "a steady contemplation of all things in their order and worth. Such contemplation is imaginative. . . . A philosopher who attains it is, for the moment, a poet; and a poet who turns his practised and passionate imagination on the order of all things, or on anything in the light of the whole, is for that moment a philosopher." Santayana evaluates the poetry of Lucretius, Dante, and Goethe in terms of this standard. On the other hand, Wheelwright argues that because of the nature of reality and the limitations of the human mind, no such synoptic view is possible. All v. is necessarily partial. He is sensitive to the need for distinguishing v. from illusion, and he says that the visions of the great artists are incommensurable (the world of T. S. Eliot cannot be subsumed by or subsume the world of Blake); but he insists that the truth claims of all the great artists must be respected, as revelatory of some aspect of a complex and mysterious reality. To other critics, the multiplicity of visions expressed in literature is a sign of irremediable relativism. If men can get no ultimate answers about the nature of the universe or their destiny in it, then they are left with a variety of purely personal points of view by means of which they order their experience and structure their works of art. A poet's v. must be regarded simply as a series of hypotheses generated in a sensitive mind reacting to life's experiences. These hypotheses may have heuristic value for others, but the authority of v. cannot be called upon to support a claim to their partial or universal validity. Indeed, an artist is to be praised who fills his works with ironies and conflicting perspectives to dramatize the limitations of all visions and suggest the impossibility of any single correct view.

G. Santayana, Three Philosophical Poets (1910); P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1954) and Metaphor and Reality (1962); N. Frye, The Anatomy of Criticism (1957) and Fables of Identity (1963); M. Krieger, The Tragic Vision (1960) and The Classic Vision (1971); H. Bloom, The Visionary Company (1961); E. Zimmermann, "'V.' in Poetry" in The Disciplines of Criticism, ed. P. Demetz (1968); M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism (1971). F.G.

VOICE. To stress "v." in discussions of poetry may be simply a reminder of the large extent to which the effects of poetry depend on sound. The qualities of vocal sounds enter directly into the aesthetic experience in the witnessing of dramatic productions or listening to the oral interpretation of poetry. But there is also listening with the "inner ear" that occurs in the silent reading of poetry. The cultivation of what T. S. Eliot has called the "auditory imagination" is indispensable for the full appreciation of poetry.

More often, modern critics use "v." in a metaphorical and extended sense. A poem is regarded as a human utterance or an imitation of a human utterance. "V." is used to refer to the person or persons who utter the words that constitute the poem. The analysis of v. in a poem is an attempt to identify the v. or combination of voices that are heard in the poem (with the help of such distinctions as those suggested by T. S. Eliot in his "The Three Voices of Poetry") and then to characterize the tonal qualities, attitudes, or even the entire personality of this speaker as it reveals itself directly or indirectly (through sound, choice of diction, and other stylistic devices). The concept of v. reminds the reader that the meaning of what is said is qualified by who says it and by the attitude that the speaker takes toward his subject and audience. More important, stress on v. is a recommendation to place greater critical emphasis on the extent to which the reader's consciousness of the quality of mind and personality of a speaker determines the kind and intensity of the response that is made to what he says. V. reminds us that a human being is behind the words of a poem, that he is revealing his individuality by means of the poem, and that this revelation may be the most significant part of what we receive from the poem.

Thus, like "vision,"* "v." is an important term in the vocabulary of recent critics who wish to rehabilitate some form of romantic expressionism or return to a view of poetry as personal communication. This recommendation is usually set in explicit reaction to contemporary objectivist theories of poetry. By stressing the autonomy of poetry and recommending the neglect of the author and the reader in the analysis and evaluation of poetry, objectivism has, it is alleged, depersonalized and dehumanized poetry. Poetry, it is argued, should be brought back to human concerns out of which it has arisen and within which it has great influence. To do so, W. J. Ong, for example, using the language of modern phenomenological and personalist philosophers, suggests that all literature be regarded essentially as "a cry." The v. is the key to the "I-thou world where through the mysterious interior resonance which sound best of all provides, persons commune with persons, reaching one another's interiors in a way in which one can never reach the interior of an 'object.'" Thus the aesthetic experience must not be regarded as the contemplation of a dramatic situation that the process of art has distanced from real life. Rather, it is a participation in the dialogue that the human race has been engaged in from the beginning of history. See also PERSONA.*—T. S. Eliot, "The Three Voices of Poetry" in On Poetry and Poets (1957); W. J. Ong, The Barbarian Within (1962); F. Berry, Poetry and the Physical V. (1962).

F.G.

Y

YORUBA POETRY. See AFRICAN POETRY: VER-NACULAR.*

Z

ZULU POETRY. See AFRICAN POETRY: VER-NACULAR.*

Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics

LITERATURE

"The most comprehensive treatment of its field yet attempted. . . . The entries . . . are at once generous yet concise, erudite yet lucid, wide-ranging yet germane. It is hard, in fact, to portray the uniform excellence of this volume. . . . With intelligence, with assiduous scholarship and with a most graceful style, the Encyclopedia allows the ancients to lie down with the moderns. From the Homeric poets to the Beat poets, from beginning rhyme to end rhyme, from Chinese to Chilean poetry, the divers aspects of 'poetry and poetics' are elucidated in this extraordinarily helpful volume."—The Modern Language Journal

"It is a work of scholarship, much humour and literary value. . . . [The] Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics combines the merit of comprehensiveness with that casual readability which is the peculiar attraction of the genre."—Times Literary Supplement

"The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics may prove to be a unifying force such as poets today badly need—to insure them that they are speaking more or less the same language and, if not sharing the same assumptions, are at least in meaningful dialogue about their differences. No encyclopedia, of course, can ever be a substitute for the study of poetry itself, but this one seems to be an excellent guide to make that study as fruitful and creative as possible."—Writer's Digest

THIS COMPREHENSIVE REFERENCE WORK deals with all aspects of its subject: history, types, movements, prosody, and critical terminology. Prepared by recognized authorities, its articles treat their topics in sufficient depth to be of value to the scholar as well as to the general reader.

PRINCETON PAPERBACKS

The entries vary in length from relatively brief notices to articles of approximately 20,000 words. Most entries are accompanied by generous bibliographies.

Poetic form and technique, theory and criticism, literary history, and the relationship of poetry to other subjects are explored. Northrop Frye writes on allegory, Craig La Drière on prosody, Murray Krieger on belief in poetry, A.S.P. Woodhouse on imagination, Philip Wheelwright on myth, and John Hollander on music and poetry. Other contributors include Cleanth Brooks, Hardin Craig, R. S. Crane, and William Carlos Williams, to mention only a few of the 215 participating scholars.

THE ENLARGED EDITION includes dozens of new entries that add to the comprehensiveness of the first edition and reflect recent developments in poetry and poetics. Significant shifts in poetic practice and in the intellectual and social world that surrounds the poet's art are treated in such entries as Rock Lyric and Computer Poetry, while the increased articulateness of ethnic minorities is reflected by new entries on Black Poetry, Puerto Rican Poetry, and African Poetry. The world-wide orientation of the Encyclopedia is illustrated by its 94 articles on the history of the poetry of individual national and cultural groups.

ALEX PREMINGER is Associate Professor and former Chief of the Humanities Division, Brooklyn College Library, The City University of New York. FRANK J. WARNEK is Professor of English and Comparative Literature, University of Washington. O. B. HARDISON, JR., is Director of The Folger Shakespeare Library and a former Professor of English, University of North Carolina.