Over 25 years without commercial success has not diminished NRBO's eclectic sound and rollicking spirit. Albums have included covers of Chipmunks songs, requests from the group's fabled Magic Box (in which they play any song that the audience demands), and originals that have been recorded by other artists, including the Box Tops, the Carpenters, and Iain Matthews. In 1982 alone, Adams' "Me and the Boys" was recorded by Bonnie Raitt and Dave Edmunds. Edmunds also covered Adams' "I Want You Bad." NRBO has also backed Windo and country singer Skeeter Davis in concert; they recorded She Sings, They Play with Davis in 1986, and she married Joey Spampinato (they would later divorce, with Spampinato marrying singer/songwriter Kami Lyle in 2000). NRBO also recorded with its unofficial manager, professional wrestling personality Captain Lou Albano, before he became better known for his appearances with Cyndi Lauper. On Stormalong, the soundtrack of a children's cable-TV special, the group backed actor John Candy.

Adams compiled the Thelouious Monk album Always Know in 1979 (NRBO covered Monk's "Little Rootie Tootie" for the 1984 tribute album That's the Way I Feel Now, whose producer Hal Wilner also got the band to play "Whistle While You Work" for his 1988 Disney album Stay Awake), coordinated the reissue of the Shaggs' Philosophy of the World, produced albums for zydeco accordionist Boozoo Chavis and ex-Chuck Berry pianist Johnnie Johnson (who was backed by NRBO for the recording), and has toured and recorded with jazzwoman Carla Bley (who cowrote "Ida" with Adams for NRBO's debut album). In 1991 he and Anderson played on jazz-funk saxophonist David Sanborn's Another Hand, which also included several Adams tunes. In 1993 he wrote and played music on The Duplex Planet Radio Hour (East-Side Digital), an album of readings by David Greenberger from his periodical about senior citizens, Duplex Planet (Adams backed Greenberger at occasional live readings as well). NRBO joined Adams on several tracks on his 1996 solo album Terrible.

Joey Spampinato was in the backing band Keith Richards assembled for the Chuck Berry film Hail! Hail! Rock and Roll, and in 1991 he backed Eric Clapton in a series of shows at London's Royal Albert Hall. Tom Ardolino compiled Beat of the Traps, vol. 1 (Carnage Press, 1992), a vinyl-only collection of obscure vanity recordings made for people who'd answered lyric magazine advertisements promising to "set your lyrics to our music!"

In 1991 Al Anderson quit drinking and became a staff songwriter for a Nashville music-publishing house; his tunes have been recorded by such country stars as Alabama, Pam Tillis, Ricky Van Shelton, and Dennis Robbins; he's written with John Hiatt and Carlene Carter and appeared on Carter's 1993 album Little Love Letters. Anderson left NRBO in 1994, following the release of Message for the Mess Age, to pursue a full-time solo career.

By then, original NRBO guitarist Steve Ferguson had released his first solo album (Terry Adams, Joey Spampinato, and Tom Ardolino all appear on his second album). Anderson was replaced by Spampinato's brother, Johnny, a member of the Incredible Casuals who'd filled in for Anderson in the past. In 1998 Adams and Joey Spampinato played on Bonnie Raitt's album Fundamental, which included Spampinato's song "I Need Love." Aside from the children's album You're Nice People You Are, NRBO did not make a new studio recording after Message until its eponymous 1999 album (Christmas Wish had actually been recorded in 1994, just before Anderson left); You Gotta Be Loose found the Whole Wheat Horns bolstered by Tyrone Hill and Dave Gordon of Sun Ra's Arkestra, who were by then semiregular touring members. In the late '90s, NRBO also contributed songs to a pair of animated TV shows, Fox's The Simpsons (in which they appeared in both cartoon and live form) and Cartoon Network's Space Ghost Coast to Coast.

1998—'N Sync (RCA); Home for Christmas 2000—No Strings Attached (Jive) 2001—Celebrity.

With its squeaky-clean image, bubblegum-pop melodies, and heartthrob harmony vocals, the Florida-based 'N Sync—along with fellow boy-band the Backstreet Boys—dominated the teenybopper music trend of the late '90s. At first, many industry watchers assumed that 'N Sync would forever remain in the shadow of the Backstreet Boys' seemingly unmatchable success, but when 'N Sync's No Strings Attached (#1, 2000) moved an unprecedented 2.4 million copies its first week in stores—more than double the record previously set by the Backstreet Boys' Millennium in 1999—'N Sync was crowned the new, undisputed king of the genre.

Both acts were initially launched by Orlando business mogul Lou Pearlman, a cousin of singer Art Garfunkel who decided to expand his business interests (which included Trans Continental Airlines) into the music realm after taking notice of the New Kids on the Block phenomenon in the late '80s and early '90s. In 1995, two years after forming the Backstreet Boys and transporting them to Europe to hone their performance chops, Pearlman and his business partner, former NKOTB tour manager Johnny Wright, took over management of 'N Sync.

Like the Backstreet Boys before them, the members of 'N Sync all came to the group with previous entertainment experience. Justin Timberlake and JC Chavez were both veterans of the All New Mickey Mouse Club (other Mouseketeers included Britney Spears and Christina Aguilera). Lance Bass had toured with a national children's choir, and both Joey Fatone and Chris Kirkpatrick—who took the initiative in putting the group together—performed at Orlando's Universal Studios. Armed with a batch of uptempo pop songs and romantic ballads penned by Stockholm hitmakers Max Martin and Denniz PoP, 'N Sync hit the same European concert trail broken in by the Backstreet Boys and quickly netted a deal with RCA. The group's self-titled 1998 debut failed to garner much interest stateside, however, until after the group taped a concert special for the Disney Channel. A month later, 'N Sync had cracked the Top 10, where it would rise #2, eventually selling 10 million copies. Hits from the album included "I Want You Back" (#13) and "Tearin' Up My Heart" (#59). The holiday set Home for Christmas, released later that year, went to #7.

Despite having finally achieved their own chart notoriety, 'N Sync continued to trail the Backstreet Boys, both sales-wise and in their career moves, into 1999. Although 'N Sync didn't fire Wright as their manager as the Backstreet Boys had, in 1999 they successfully severed most of their ties with Pearlman and his Trans Continental Music Company. The group also left RCA for Jive Records. The Backstreet Boys, whose second Jive album, Millennium, became the fastest-selling album of all time (1.1 million copies in the first week) upon its release in the summer of '99, made little secret of their displeasure at shunning a label with a group they perceived as imitators. But the tables turned completely after 'N Sync's long-awaited Jive debut, the 14-million selling No Strings Attached, trounced the Backstreet Boys' record. The album sold strongly well into 2001, supported by a sold-out stadium tour and three Top 5 singles: "Bye Bye Bye" (#4), "This I Promise You" (#5), and "It's Gonna Be Me" (#1). More tellingly, 'N Sync lost none of its thunder when the Backstreet Boys returned in late 2000 with Black & Blue. The album moved 1.6 million copies its first week—an inconceivable figure to most acts, but compared to 'N Sync's 2.4 million record, still only second best. With total album and ticket sales revenues totaling $267 million, 'N Sync closed out 2000 as the most successful music act in America.

Ted Nugent/Amboy Dukes

Born Dec. 13, 1948, Detroit, MI

Lick 'Em* 1993—Out of Control (Epic) 1994—Spirit of the Wild (Atlantic) 1996—Motor City Madness (Sony Music Special Products) 1997—Ted Nugent/Cat Scratch Fever (Legacy) 1999—Loaded for Bear: The Best of Ted Nugent.

With the Amboy Dukes (original lineup: Nugent; Greg Arama [d. 1979], bass; Steve Farmer, gr.; Dave Palmer, drums; Andy Solomon, kybds.): 1968—The Amboy Dukes (Mainstream); Journey to the Center of the Mind 1969—The Best of the Original Amboy Dukes 1970—Marriage on the Rocks/Rock Bottom (Polydor) 1971—Survival of the Fittest/Live 1975—Call of the Wild (DiscReet); Tooth, Fang and Claw. With DamN Yankees: see entry.

As the self-proclaimed Motor City Madman, guitarist Ted Nugent fashioned a sharply defined, not-so-noble savage persona, garnering him endless publicity and resulting in multiplatinum sales in the late '70s. Since then, however, Nugent's pro-gun, pro-hunting (he eats everything he kills), anti-drink, and anti-drug lifestyle has proved to be anything but a pose (though he did confess to Behind the Music that in his younger days, he was addicted to women). Opinionated, unapologetic, and always quotable, Nugent is the anti-rock star rock star: "I have militantly defended my quality of life, and I would never compromise it in the name of hipness or acceptability of my so-called peers."

Growing up in Detroit, Nugent began bowhunting at age five and playing guitar at age eight. His first band was called the Royal High (or Hi) Boys (1960–61), followed by the Lourdes (or Lourds) (1962–64). By the time he was 14, he and the band played Cobo Hall, opening for the Supremes and the Beau Brummels. The band broke up in 1965 when Nugent's family moved to Chicago. There, he immediately formed the Amboy Dukes, who signed with Mainstream and released their debut that year. Though they had a local hit with "Baby Please Don't Go" in 1967, the band's only sizable success was "Journey to the Center of the Mind" (#16, 1968), the pro-drug message of which Nugent claims escaped him at the time. The Dukes continued in various forms until 1975, recording also for Polydor and DiscReet.

When the Dukes signed with the latter label in 1972, they became known as Ted Nugent and the Amboy Dukes. Nugent tried to boost album sales with his publicity savvy, staging guitar contests against Mike Pinera (of Iron Butterfly) and Blues Image), Wayne Kramer (MC5), and Mahogany Rush's Frank Marino. But things didn't begin to happen for Nugent until he signed a solo deal with Epic in 1975. For his new band, he retained bassist Rob Grange from the old Amboy Dukes; after this, he would go through periodic changes in personnel. He continued to tour widely, and suddenly his music was getting airplay. The national press, amused by his cartoonish caveman image (complete with loincloth), began to write Nugent up. Even if many found his music to be standard heavy-metal fare, Nugent never failed to make good copy. Free-for-All featured Meat Loaf on some vocals (Nugent rarely sings), but the real breakthrough was 1977's Cat Scratch Fever, whose double-platinum success boosted sales of the two previous LPs to 2 million each. Also out that year was Double Live Gonzo (near-2 million sales), followed by the platinum Weekend Warriors. Stern Electronics introduced a Ted Nugent pinball game. Nugent showed a slight softening of attack by covering the Beatles' "I Want to Tell You" on State of Shock; this gold LP ended his platinum streak. Also disappointing saleswise was 1980's Scream Dream, though it contained "Wango Tango" with its cars-and-garages ("My face is a Maserati," etc.) sexual imagery. Still, Nugent's LPs and concerts continued to sell respectably. In 1981 Nugent was backed by the D.C. Hawks (which included three brother lead guitarists, Kurt, Rick, and Verne Wagoner) for a four-axe attack. His first self-production, 1982's Nugent, barely grazed the chart. By that point, however, Young Ted, as he referred to himself, had reaped the rewards of having been the top-grossing tour act of 1977, 1978, and 1979.

Since 1980, he has served as a deputy sheriff near his home (on 1,000 acres of wilderness) in southern Michigan. Nugent is the author of Blood Trails: The Truth About Bowhunting and the publisher of Ted Nugent World Bowhunters Magazine. He is also a lifetime member of the National Rifle Association, a board member of MADD (Mothers Against Drunk Driving), numerous conservation organizations, and several anti-drug-abuse organizations, including Drug Abuse Resistance Education (DARE). In early 1994 Midwestern Public Broadcasting Stations aired Nugent's four Spirit of the Wild television specials.

In 1989 Nugent, along with Styx's Tommy Shaw, formed Damn Yankees [see entry]. Spirit of the Wild, his first solo album in six years, included former Nugent sideman Derek St. Holmes, ex-Brownsville Station bassist Michael Lutz, and former Heart and Coverdale/Page drummer Danny Carmassi. "I Shoot Back," "Thighraceous," and "Fred Bear, the American Hunter's Theme Song" (which sold over 100,000 copies as an independently released single) indicate that Nugent has no plans to mellow with age. Into the 21st century he has continued touring and recording, hunting, working on behalf of conservative causes, and writing.

Gary Numan

Born Gary Webb, Mar. 8, 1958, London, Eng.
1979—Tubeway Army (Atco); Replicas; The Pleasure Principle

1980—Telekon; Dance 1982—I, Assassin 1983—Warriors (Beggars Banquet, U.K.) 1984—Berserker (Numa, U.K.) 1985—The Fury 1986—Strange Charm 1988—Metal Rhythm (Illegal, U.K.) 1991—Outland (I.R.S., U.K.) 1992—Machine + Soul (Numa, U.K.) 1994—Sacrifice (Numa, U.K.) 1997—Exile (Cleopatra).

Gary Numan's synthesizer-dominated music, heavily influenced by Kraftwerk, Ultravox, and David Bowie, gave him much British success and some U.S. attention in the early '80s. Numan joined his first band in 1977 at age 19, but he soon quit. He auditioned to be guitarist for the British band the Lasers; after Numan became their frontman, they changed their name to Tubeway Army. Beggars' Banquet (a WEA subsidiary) signed the group in early 1978. On its two angry singles, "That's Not It" and "Bombers," the combo played standard post-Sex Pistols punk. Once Tubeway Army entered the studio to cut its first LP, Numan discovered synthesizers. He decided to put down his guitar and make electronics the basis of the group's sound. The other musicians (except for bassist Paul Gardner) hated the idea and regrouped as another punk act, Station Bombers. Numan completed the LP with his uncle (drummer Jess Lidyard) and Gardner. The resulting LP, Tubeway Army, was billed to Gary Numan and Tubeway Army, as was the followup, Replicas, which yielded the British #1 hit "Are Friends' Electric?" Besides its robot-loving lyrics, its "futurist" electronic sound had a solid dance beat, and it anticipated the electropop trend of 1981–82.

In 1979 Numan also played on and wrote songs for Robert Palmer's Clues album. Numan's The Pleasure Principle (now billed solo, without Tubeway Army) entered at the U.K. chart at #1 and provided the synthesized dance-rock hit "Cars," which broke Numan in the U.S., where it hit #9. He drew a lot of attention for his elaborate pyramid-shaped live stage setup, but Americans, after some initial curiosity, didn't really appreciate his stylized look and sound, and Telekon was only modestly successful (#64). Shortly after, Numan temporarily retired from performing, although he continued to record. He became a professional pilot and, in 1981, flew around the world. He was arrested in India on suspicion of spying, but the charges were soon dropped.

In the mid-'90s Numan was cited as an influence by everyone from Beck to Nine Inch Nails to Billy Corgan. Sacrifice and Exile marked a musical return to form. He married in 1997. The following year, he embarked on his first American tour since 1982; Marilyn Manson joined him onstage in L.A. Late-'90s acts such as Manson, Fear Factory, and the Foo Fighters have covered Numan's material.

Ice Cube solo: See separate entry.

With the double-platinum-selling Straight Outta Compton, N.W.A brought gangsta rap into the mainstream. The album was among the first to offer an insider's perspective of the violence and brutality in gang-ridden South Central L.A. With songs like "Fuck tha Police" and "Gangsta Gangsta" set in a chaotic swirl of siren and gunshot sounds, it also foreshadowed the 1992 L.A. riots.

In 1986 O'Shea "Ice Cube" Jackson, born and raised in a two-parent, middle-class home in South Central—and always more interested in music and books than in gangs—met Andre "Dr. Dre" Young, who shared Cube's passion for writing rap songs. The two started writing for Enc "Eazy-E" Wright, a former drug dealer who'd started Ruthless Records with his profits; Eazy needed material for a group he'd signed to the label, HBO. When HBO rejected Cube and Dre's "Boyz-n-the-Hood" about the South Central town of Compton, Eazy-E decided to record the song himself. Under his direction, the three started working together as Niggaz With Attitude (N.W.A).

After N.W.A's first collection, Cube took a year off to study drafting at the Phoenix Institute of Technology. When he returned in 1988, the group finished Eazy's solo album and started work on Straight Outta Compton. Released in 1989, the album sold 750,000 copies even before N.W.A embarked on a tour. In the meantime, a media storm had developed over the controversial "Fuck tha Police," resulting in a "warning letter" from the FBI to the group's distributor, Priority Records.

After the tour, Cube got into a financial dispute with N.W.A's manager, Jerry Heller, who Cube claimed had cheated him out of royalties. The two settled out of court in 1990, and Cube moved on to a successful solo career. N.W.A continued recording and selling records but fell out of critical favor. In June 1991 the group made history again when, in the face of strong criticism from politicians and bannings from some retail chains, EFIL4ZAGGIN ("Niggaz 4 Life" backward) reached #1 pop, #2 R&B two weeks after its release.

N.W.A: Ice Cube, Dr. Dre, Eazy-E, DJ Yella, MC Ren

Members of N.W.A made the police blotter often during the early '90s, mainly for assault charges that ended up being dismissed or settled. Dr. Dre was involved in the most notorious case when he was charged with attacking the female host of a television rap show in 1991; he pleaded no contest and paid an out-of-court settlement to the host. In 1992 Dre was arrested for assaulting record producer Damon Thomas and later plead guilty to assault on a police officer, eventually serving "house arrest" and wearing a police-monitoring ankle bracelet. Eazy-E also raised eyebrows in the rap community when he attended a fund-raising lunch for President George Bush, donating $2,500 for the privilege.

By early 1992 N.W.A was over, its members scattered to solo careers. Dre left both the group and Ruthless to cofound Death Row Records with Marion "Suge" Knight; Eazy-E later claimed in a lawsuit that Knight had negotiated Dre's exit with the help of baseball bats and pipes. MC Ren's Kizz My Black Azz EP (#12 pop, #10 R&B, 1992) went platinum. But aside from Ice Cube, Dr. Dre has had the most chart success: In 1993 The Chronic (#3 pop, #1 R&B) went triple platinum, appeared on a number of critics' year-end top-10 lists, and spawned several hits. "Nuthin' But a 'G' Thang" (#2 pop, #1 R&B) and "Dre Day" (#8 pop, #6 R&B) featured the rapper Snoop Doggy Dogg, who later in the year had his own hit album (produced by Dre), DoggyStyle (#1 pop, #1 R&B). As a sign of lingering bad feelings, Dre also used his solo album and accompanying videos to ridicule Eazy. In October 1993 Eazy responded with It's On (Dr. Dre) 187um Killa (#5 pop, #1 R&B). Eazy also found success with Ruthless nurturing the band Bone Thugs-N-Harmony, with whom Eazy recorded the single "Foe tha Love of $" (#41 pop, #33 R&B, 1995).

Two years later, Eazy-E split with longtime manager Jerry Heller. Communication among the former N.W.A members quickly improved. Soon Dr. Dre, Eazy-E, Ice Cube, and the others were talking about an N.W.A reunion project.

Though he had been the first to leave the group for a very successful solo career, Ice Cube later expressed regret that N.W.A. had never built on its early potential. Then, in 1995, Eazy-E died from complications of AIDS. Both Dre and Cube visited him in the hospital shortly before he died. The Ruthless impresario was married two days before his death, and his estate quickly became mired in a barrage of lawsuits filed on behalf of business associates and heirs (which included nine children by seven different women). A final solo album, Str8 Off tha Streetz of Muthaphukian Compton (#3 pop, #1 R&B), was released in 1996.

At Death Row, Dre enjoyed continued popular success, both as house producer and as a performer in a duet with Tupac Shakur on "California Love" (#6 pop, 1996). But Dre unexpectedly left Death Row that same year and soon formed Aftermath Entertainment (in association with Interscope). By now an outspoken critic of the highly publicized West Coast–East Coast hip-hop feud, Dre's first post-Death Row single was "Been There, Done That." Dre also discovered a white Detroit rapper named Eminem, whose Dre-produced albums made him as controversial as N.W.A. had been a decade before. As Dre prepared to release his follow-up to The Chronic, he filed suit against Death Row for copyright infringement over the label's unauthorized release of Suge Knight Presents: Chronic 2000, a compilation album of various artists that Dre felt unfairly "used" his "Chronic" title. (He later dropped the suit.) Dre's own 2001 (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1999) featured such guests as MC Ren, Snoop Dogg, and Eminem.

The long-rumored N.W.A. reunion finally began to take shape that same year. Ice Cube, Dr. Dre, and MC Ren recorded "Hell Low," the opening track on Cube's War & Peace vol. 2 (The Peace Disc), and a new track credited to N.W.A. also appeared on the soundtrack to Cube's film Next Friday. That was followed by a national arena tour in 2000 with Dre, Ren, Snoop Dogg, Warren G., and Eminem. Separately and in joint interviews, the former N.W.A. partners talked up a proposed album called Not These Niggas Again, but by 2001 any further studio recordings were not, in Dre's opinion, strong enough to release.

Laura Nyro

Born Laura Nigro, Oct. 18, 1947, Bronx, NY; died Apr. 8, 1997, Danbury, CT

1966—More Than a New Discovery (The First Songs) (Verve)
 1968—Eli and the Thirteenth Confession (Columbia) 1969—New York Tendaberry 1970—Christmas and the Beads of Sweat 1971—Gonna Take a Miracle (with Labelle) 1976—Smile 1977—Season of Lights 1978—Nested 1984—Mother's Spiritual 1989—Live at the Bottom Line (Cypress Music) 1993—Walk the Dog & Light the Light (Columbia) 1997—The Best of Laura Nyro: Stoned Soul Picnic (Sony) 2000—Live From Mountain (Blue Plate); Time & Love: Essential Masters (Sony) 2001—Angel in the Dark (Uni/Rounder).

Singer/songwriter Laura Nyro was one of the most challenging, misunderstood, and yet influential women in the history of rock. A spectacularly successful songwriter who never carried a tune of her own onto the charts, Nyro crafted and recorded highly original, dramatic gospel- and R&B-powered songs that received tremendous attention—and airplay in hit covers—in the late '60s and early '70s. Her unique, even disquieting vocal style, a sporadic release and touring history, and a reclusive, closely guarded personal life all but ensured her cult status. Her songs combined a near-religious gospel fervor, early rock & roll vocal stylings, Brill Building songcraft, and, especially later, urban jazz influences with her highly personal, evocative lyrics.

Nyro began writing songs as a young girl. Her Italian-Jewish parents were both musical; her father was a jazz trumpeter. She went to the High School of Music and Art in Manhattan and concentrated on songwriting. Her debut album, More Than a New Discovery, was recorded when she was just 19. Commercially, it went nowhere, but it included a number of songs that would be major hits for other artists: "Wedding Bell Blues" and "Blowin' Away" (the Fifth Dimension), "Stoney End" (Barbra Streisand), and "And When I Die" (Blood, Sweat and Tears). In 1967 she got a spot at the Monterey Pop Festival. It was her second concert appearance ever, and the audience was loudly unappreciative of her costume (one gossamer angel wing) and her soul revue (which included two black backup singers). But David Geffen, then a music agent, was sufficiently impressed by a tape of her performance to quit his job to become her manager; he soon landed her a deal with a then-unprecedented multimillion-dollar publishing contract with Columbia Records.

Nyro's second album, Eli and the Thirteenth Confession (#181, 1968), was produced by ex-Four Season Charlie Calello, and included "Sweet Blindness" and "Stoned Soul Picnic" (later hits for the Fifth Dimension) and "Eli's Comin' " (Three Dog Night). The album and its followup, New York Tendaberry (#32, 1969), were critical triumphs (especially Eli), lavishly praised for their poetic lyrics and gospel-soul fusion. Nyro became known for her strange, intense phrasing, unexpected rhythm changes, and distinctive, alternately whispering and wailing vocals. New York Tendaberry also contained her own well-known songs "Time and Love" and "Save the Country." Nyro's early work was distinguished from that of her female singer/songwriter contemporaries in several ways. It was rooted in black, urban musical genres as opposed to folk, and her lyrics, while sometimes impressionistic and obtuse, could also be explicit and challenging. "You were born a woman, not a slave" from "The Confession" is often cited as a feminist slogan, yet the same song promises a "super ride inside my love thing," a rare sexual boast in so-called women's rock of the time.

Nyro released two more celebrated records before she retired for the first time, at age 24. Christmas and the Beads of Sweat (#51, 1970) brought together several Muscle Shoals musicians (Barry Beckett, Roger Hawkins, Eddie Hinton, and others) as well as ex-Rascals Dino Danelli and Felix Cavaliere (who coproduced the album with Anf Mardin) and Duane Allman (whose searing lead guitar work marks "Beads of Sweat"). Gonna Take a Miracle (#46, 1971), credited to Nyro and Labelle (pre-spacesuits and "Lady Marmalade"), was produced by Philadelphia International's Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff. On it, Nyro paid tribute to the doo-wop ("The Bells," "The Wind," "Spanish Harlem"), girl-group ("I Met Him on a Sunday"), and Motown ("Jimmy Mack," "Dancing in the Street," "Nowhere to Run") traditions that would become a more prominent influence in her later years. (Christmas features "Up on the Roof" and Walk the Dog . . . contains the Impressions' "I'm So Proud", Nyro peppered her live sets with classic R&B and soul chestnuts.)

did not release any new material until the much anticipated Smile (#60, 1976). It received guarded praise but didn't sell, nor did Season of Lights (1977) (produced by ex-Rascal Felix Cavaliere) or Nested (1978), after which she retreated to her private life again. She reemerged in 1984 with Mother's Spiritual (for which Todd Rundgren provided production assistance. Nyro produced or coproduced all of her albums after Smile). With these records, Nyro's music took a quieter turn, as she wrote of lost love, motherhood (she had one son), and a nature-oriented spirituality, a feminist worldview that would prove influential on a number of woman singers and songwriters. The lyrics of "Mother's Spiritual," in fact, were exhibited on the walls of the Chicago Peace Museum. While Nyro kept a fairly low profile through the '80s, she still continued to perform in smaller venues across the country and in Europe and Asia.

Another five years passed before her next release, a live album recorded at the Bottom Line, in New York, which Columbia refused to release. Rather than acquiesce to the label's demand for a new studio album, Nyro, who was legendary for her ambivalence toward the business of the music business, took it to a smaller label. The year 1993 saw the release of the critically acclaimed Walk the Dog & Light the Light.

Notoriously private, Nyro kept her ovarian cancer a secret, so news of her death at age 49 in April 1997 came as a shock. In the months prior to her death, an all-woman tribute album, Time and Love: The Music of Laura Nyro, had been in the works. Artists including Rosanne Cash, Suzanne Vega, Phoebe Snow, Lisa Germano, the Roches, Sweet Honey in the Rock, Dana Bryant, and others recorded Nyro songs and wrote brief appreciations, none of them—including the album's producer—aware that Nyro was ill. Nyro oversaw the career retrospective The Best of Laura Nyro: Stoned Soul Picnic and heard the tracks and read the appreciations from the tribute album shortly before her death. There is believed to be at least several albums' worth of material—some new, some covers—recorded by Nyro in the '90s that has yet to be released. Angel in the Dark contains recordings from 1994 to 1995, dominated by soul and pop covers ("Walk On By," "La La Means I Love You," "Let It Be Me") with some originals.

Formed 1991, Manchester, Eng.

Noel Gallagher (b. Noel Thomas David Gallagher, May 29, 1967, Manchester), gtr., voc.; Liam Gallagher (b. William John Paul Thomas Gallagher, Sep. 21, 1972, Manchester), voc.; Paul "Bonehead" Arthurs [b. June 23, 1965, Manchester], gtr.; Paul "Guigsy" McGuigan [b. May 9, 1971, Manchester], bass; Tony McCarroll, drums.

1994—Definitely Maybe (Creation/Epic) 1995—(– McCarroll; + Alan White [b. May 26, 1972, London], drums) (What's the Story) Morning Glory 1997—Be Here Now 1998—The Masterplan 2000—Standing on the Shoulders of Giants (– Arthurs; – McGuigan; + Gem Archer, gtr.; + Andy Bell, bass); Familiar to Millions.

Formed by brothers Noel and Liam Gallagher and their Manchester mates, Oasis rose to the top of the British charts in the mid-'90s with its flair for classic psychedelic pop. The heavily Beatles-influenced rock of its debut album. 1994's Definitely Maybe, made Oasis overnight pop stars, while the Gallaghers' bravado, open drug use, and general disrespect toward other artists garnered constant media attention. Some detractors suggested that Oasis had merely mastered the musical ideas of others; regardless, the band's first release sold in the millions.

Noel Gallagher grew up in Manchester and got his first guitar at age 13 and began dabbling in songwriting. His father, who poured concrete by day and was a C&W DJ by night, left the family while Noel was still a teenager. At 18

Noel was caught burgling a house, but he soon found work as a roadie and spent the next four years touring with Inspiral Carpets. His younger brother, Liam, meanwhile, started singing in a band with friends Paul "Bonehead" Arthurs (guitar) and Paul McGuigan (bass), later enlisting drummer Tony McCarroll. When Noel returned to Manchester with a batch of new songs he had written, he offered to take creative control of the band, by now called Oasis. They agreed and began rehearsing. At an early show in Glasgow, Scotland, they were discovered by Creation Records founder Alan McGee, who immediately offered them a contract.

In 1994 Oasis released Definitely Maybe (#58 U.S., #1 U.K.), which became the fastest-selling debut album in British history at the time. The band quickly won the attention of the British music press with its blend of '60s pop, '70s glam, and the sneering attitude and bravado of punk. But some critics complained that the music was derivative, noting that "Cigarettes & Alcohol" blatantly stole the opening riff from T. Rex's "Bang a Gong." Oasis was later forced to change some lyrics to "Shakermaker" after a lawsuit filed by Coca-Cola charged the band with lifting the melody and some words from its jingle "I'd Like to Teach the World to Sing."

(What's the Story) Morning Glory? (#4, 1995) was greeted warmly by both fans and critics. It included the hits "Wonderwall" (#8, 1995) and "Don't Look Back in Anger" (#55, 1995) as well as the seven-minute epic of psychedelic pop "Champagne Supernova." Trouble loomed, however: Liam was arrested for suspicion of cocaine possession, public feuding between the Gallaghers became a frequent occurrence, and Noel quit that year's U.S. tour. Be Here Now (#2, 1997), with its '70s arena-rock sound, was met with mixed reviews and relatively disappointing sales.

The Masterplan (#51, 1998), a collection of B sides and nonalbum tracks, found the band in a holding pattern. Oasis reconvened in 1999 in France to begin recording an album with sessions now conducted under a new no-drinking policy. Before sessions were finished, however, both Arthurs and McGuigan had quit (the other original member, McCarroll, had been fired following the debut album). Standing on the Shoulders of Giants (#24, 2000) demonstrated club-culture influences and sold fewer copies than any Oasis album. For the first time, a Liam Gallagher songwriting credit found its way onto an Oasis album: the sentimental "Little James." Relations between the Gallaghers remained combative on the band's subsequent tour, with an argument in Barcelona resulting in Noel's return to England. The tour continued, with guitarist Matt Deighton (Paul Weller, Mother Earth) filling in for Noel. The absent bandleader worked on a side project called Tailgunner, but returned to Oasis in time for a pair of shows at London's Wembley Stadium, where Oasis recorded the two-disc live album Familiar to Millions, which barely dented the U.S. Top 200 album chart, in 2000.

Billy Ocean

Born Leslie Sebastian Charles, Jan. 21, 1950, Fyzabad, Trinidad, W. Indies

1975—Billy Ocean (GTO) 1980—City Limit 1981—Nights (Feel Like Getting Down) (Epic) 1982—Inner Feelings 1984—Suddenly (Jive) 1986—Love Zone 1988—Tear Down These Walls 1993—Time to Move On 1997—LIFE; Showdown.

For four years in the late '80s, singer Billy Ocean was a major contender on the pop charts, racking up seven Top 10 singles. Although he fit in comfortably with the new breed of "love men"—the slick, romantic R&B crooners who flourished then—Ocean's grittier approach set him apart, particularly on his funkier, uptempo hits.

Ocean's family moved from Trinidad to London when he was eight. As a young man he worked as a Saville Row tailor while singing at night. In 1976 his music career broke with the Motown-style "Love Really Hurts Without You," a major U.K. hit (#2) that reached #22 in the U.S. Eight years passed before Ocean had another significant American hit, but 1984's "Caribbean Queen (No More Love on the Run)," with its taut production and throbbing bass line, went all the way to #1.

Major hits followed: "Loverboy" (#2, 1984), "Suddenly" (#4, 1984), "When the Going Gets Tough, the Tough Get Going" (#2, 1986) (which was used in the film The Jewel of the Nile), "There'll Be Sad Songs (to Make You Cry)" (#1, 1986), and "Love Zone" (#10, 1986). After another #1 hit, 1988's "Get Outta My Dreams, Get Into My Car," and "The Colour of Love" (#17, 1988) Ocean's streak ended. While he continued to record in the '90s, he scored no hits.

Phil Ochs

Born Dec. 19, 1940, El Paso, TX; died Apr. 9, 1976, Far Rockaway, NY

1964—All the News That's Fit to Sing (Elektra) 1965—I Ain't a Marchin' Anymore 1966—Phil Ochs in Concert 1967—Pleasures of the Harbor (A&M) 1968—Tape From California 1969—Rehearsals for Retirement 1970—Greatest Hits 1971—Gunfight at Carnegie Hall 1976—Chords of Fame; Phil Ochs Sings (Folkways) 1986—A Toast to Those Who Are Gone (Archives Alive) 1988—The War Is Over: The Best of Phil Ochs (A&M) 1989—There but for Fortune (Elektra); The Broadside Tapes: 1 (Folkways) 1991—There and Now: Live in Vancouver, 1968 (Rhino) 1997—Fantasies & Farewells.

Folksinger/songwriter Phil Ochs was a man of contradictions: a patriotic American who came to prominence as one of the harshest critics of the Establishment in the mid-'60s folk-protest boom; a renowned folkie who "went electric" and rocked out some time after it had been newsworthy to do so.

After moving to Queens, New York, with his family, Ochs followed family tradition by attending military school in Virginia. He later studied journalism at Ohio State University. He had begun writing songs, and his first musical venture was with a late-'50s folk duo, the Singing Socialists, who became the Sundowners. Ochs then went solo, performing in Cleveland before moving to New York in 1961. Within a few years, he'd moved into Greenwich Village and the folk-protest circle that included Bob Dylan, to whom Ochs was most frequently compared.

By the time he recorded All the News (which featured guitar work by Danny Kalb, later of the Blues Project), Ochs had merged his literary/journalistic background with a songwriting style that was direct and abrasive. He hit his stride on I Ain't a Marchin'. The title tune and "Draft Dodger Rag" became antiwar anthems, despite a ban that prevented him from being broadcast on American radio and TV. During and after the ban, Ochs remained active in causes and protest movements. His "There But for Fortune" was a Top 50 hit for Joan Baez in 1965.

Harbor yielded some of Ochs' most famous tunes, such as "Outside of a Small Circle of Friends" and "The Party." After that LP's release, Ochs moved from New York to L.A., where, with top sessionmen backing him, and Van Dyke Parks producing, he recorded Tape From California. That LP also contained some rock & roll as well as more traditional folk tunes, such as "Joe Hill," and the antiwar anthem "War Is Over," as well as "When in Rome," an answer of sorts to Dylan's "Desolation Row." Rehearsals and Greatest Hits maintained the sessionmen backing, to fascinating, if not especially popular, effect. The former was a bitter, rocking examination of Ochs' own role as a '60s culture hero and saw his depression growing; the latter contained all-new material.

Gunfight saw Ochs dressed in gold lamé and backed by his L.A. sessioneers, singing his own greatest hits, as well as Merle Haggard's "Okie From Muskogee" and a medley of Elvis Presley and Buddy Holly hits; it included the audience's boos. The LP was released only in Canada. In 1973, while traveling in Africa, Ochs was the victim of a mysterious assault during which he was nearly strangled and his vocal cords were severely damaged.

During the early '70s, Ochs lived in Africa and London; he continued to perform occasionally, even though his voice had pretty much gone, and he wrote for the London periodical Time Out. In 1974 he was reunited with Dylan at a New York concert he organized in the Felt Forum to protest the military junta in Chile; just prior to that event, Ochs had released the Watergate-era protest "Here's to the State of Richard Nixon." It was the last Phil Ochs record released in his lifetime. His last public appearance was at New York's Folk City on October 23, 1975. Six months later Ochs, who suffered from severe depression, hanged himself at his sister's home. The posthumous Chords of Fame was compiled by his brother, rock-music historian and archivist Michael Ochs.

Sinéad O'Connor

Born Dec. 8, 1966, Dublin, Ire.

1987—The Lion and the Cobra (Ensign) 1990—I Do Not Want What I Haven't Got 1992—Am I Not Your Girl? 1994—Universal Mother 1997—Gospel Oak EP (EMI); So Far . . . The Best of Sinéad O'Connor 2000—Faith and Courage (Atlantic).

With her emotional delivery and confessional songs, Sinéad O'Connor has sold millions of albums. Brazenly outspoken, she was unlike any woman in pop music before her, sporting a shaven head and formless clothing. O'Connor seemed to symbolically repudiate the stereotypical female pop star's image. An unwed mother who's spiritually inclined but anticlerical, she has startled—and at times baffled—the media and fans with her provocative statements and gestures.

The third of four children of an engineer father and a dressmaker mother, O'Connor spent a difficult childhood in conservative Dublin; she later claimed abuse by her mother (killed in a 1985 car wreck), to whom she was greatly, if ambivalently, devoted. Torn by her parents' separation when she was eight, O'Connor was expelled from Catholic schools, arrested for shoplifting, and sent to reform and boarding schools. At 15, singing Barbra Streisand's "Evergreen" at a wedding, she was discovered by Paul Byrne, the drummer for In Tua Nua, a band affiliated with U2. She cowrote In Tua Nua's first single, "Take My Hand," and began singing Dylan covers in coffeehouses. Fleeing boarding school at 16, she then studied voice and piano at Dublin's College of Music. She supported herself by waitressing and delivering "kiss-o-grams" in a French maid costume.

Moving to London in the early '80s at the behest of Ensign Records, O'Connor collaborated with U2 guitarist the Edge on a film soundtrack (The Captive, 1986) while preparing her debut album. The first tapes of that project were scrapped because O'Connor despised the Celtic-derived production. She self-produced The Lion and the Cobra (its title taken from Psalm 91), which ranged from orchestral rock to folk to dance pop. The album sold well (#36, 1988), but with O'Connor's celebrity came controversy.

By then the mother of a son by her drummer, John Reynolds, O'Connor shocked the press by attacking U2 (calling the band's music "bombastic") and defending the IRA. She married Reynolds in 1988, but tumult continued with her firing of manager Fachtina O'Ceallaigh. The #1-selling I Do Not Want What I Haven't Got and its Prince-written single, "Nothing Compares 2 U" (#1, 1990), raised O'Connor's profile even higher. (In 1991 she would allege that Prince had physically threatened her.) Critics applauded her emotionally charged music (inspired by her separation from Reynolds), but British tabloids attacked her romance with black singer Hugh Harris and savaged her politics. Frank Sinatra assailed her refusal, at a 1990 New Jersey concert, to perform if the hall played "The Star-Spangled Banner," and that same year O'Connor canceled a Saturday Night Live appearance in protest against what she perceived as host Andrew "Dice" Clay's misogyny. Nominated for four Grammy Awards, she withdrew from the competition and aligned herself in interviews with rap rebels N.W.A. and Ice-T. That year, she also contributed to Red Hot + Blue, a Cole Porter tribute album to benefit AIDS charities. (Her previous outside projects had included the B side of a single by Colourfield and vocals for 1988's Stay Awake, an album of Disney film music.)

O'Connor's next studio outing, Am I Not Your Girl?, was a surprise; it was a collection of torch songs associated with such singers as Ella Fitzgerald and Billie Holiday. Controversy continued throughout 1992, though: She tore up a picture of Pope John Paul II in an appearance on Saturday Night Live, and two weeks later she was booted at a Bob Dylan tribute at Madison Square Garden. Also in 1992 the English rock paper Melody Maker reported O'Connor's imminent retirement from music; her publicist clarified that the singer was merely tired of "promoting" her career, but would in fact return to Dublin to study opera.

In 1993 O'Connor, who had appeared in a 1989 Irish film, Hush-a-Bye Baby, played Ophelia in Hamlet at Dublin's Project Arts Centre. She also toured with the WOMAD festival, organized by Peter Gabriel, with whom she was briefly romantically linked. She returned to the studio in 1994 and produced Universal Mother (#36, 1994), which mixed spoken-word political pronouncements with soft ballads and hip-hop-influenced compositions. The understated Gospel Oak EP (#128) followed in 1997, the same year as her performance as the Virgin Mary in the Neil Jordan film The Butcher Boy. O'Connor then signed to Atlantic Records, in 2000 releasing Faith and Courage, a critically acclaimed mixture of traditional Celtic sounds with modern beats recorded with producers Bnan Eno, Wyclef Jean, and Dave Stewart.

O'Connor's personal life continued to interest the tabloids: A 1999 custody battle for her young daughter ended when she agreed to joint custody with the father, Dublin journalist John Waters. Upon the release of Faith and Courage, the singer declared to various interviewers she was a lesbian, though subsequent comments were contradictory, at times declanng her love for men while claiming to be celibate. And while praising both Buddhism and the Rastafarian religions, O'Connor was ordained as a priest by a Roman Catholic splinter group called the Latin Tridentine Church, taking the clerical name Mother Bernadette Maria.

Odetta

Born Odetta Holmes, Dec. 31, 1930, Birmingham, AL
 1963—Odetta Sings Folk Songs (RCA) 1973—The Essential Odetta (Vanguard) 1987—Movin' It On (Rose Quartz)
 1992—At Town Hall (Vanguard) 1999—The Best of the Vanguard Years; Blues Everywhere I Go (MC).

As a folk-blues institution, Odetta's vocal power and clarity and rich, intense singing style have long set her apart. She has made numerous recordings for various labels—none, according to critics, capturing her live impact. (The above discography is only partial.) Influenced by Bessie Smith, she went on to influence a variety of singers including Joan Armatrading, Nick Cave, Bob Dylan, and Janis Joplin.

Upon her father's death, young Odetta Holmes assumed her stepfather's surname, Felious, and moved with her family to L.A. at age six. She sang in her junior high school glee club and worked as an amateur at Hollywood's Turnabout Theater around 1945. She then studied music at L.A.'s City College. In 1949 she began playing West Coast folk clubs as a singing and guitar-playing solo act. She steadily built up a reputation and through the mid- to late '50s was touring nationwide and in Canada.

Odetta first recorded for San Francisco's Fantasy label in 1954, before moving on to New York's Tradition label in 1956. In 1959 she married Dan Gordon; she subsequently remarried twice, to Gary Shead in the late '60s and bluesman Iverson "Louisiana Red" Minter in 1977. She played the Newport Jazz Folk Festival in 1959, 1960, 1964, and 1965; she hosted Switzerland's Montreux Jazz Festival in 1976. In the early '60s, Odetta went on her first European tour and stopped off in Nigeria on the way home. Since then, she's played Japan, Australia, New Zealand, the West Indies, Morocco, and several Western European countries.

Over the years, Odetta has performed with Count Basie, poet/playwright Langston Hughes, Pete Seeger, Sonny Terry, Jewel, Bob Dylan, the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, and Roger McGuinn. She's also appeared in films—The Last Time I Saw Paris (1954), Cinerama Holiday (1955), Sanctuary (1960), and the TV movie The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman—as well as TV shows, playing characters or as herself, in both singing and dramatic roles.

In the mid-'70s the Public Broadcasting System aired a documentary about Odetta. In early 1982 she appeared with Jackson Browne and others at a Santa Monica benefit show for Sing Out for Sight. In 1999 Odetta celebrated her 50th anniversary as a performer and released her first new studio album in 16 years, the Grammy-nominated Blues Everywhere I Go, which she supported with a successful world tour. That year she was also one of 19 recipients of the National Medal of the Arts and Humanities. Though she's never been a chart-making recording star, Odetta has certainly become a national treasure.

The Offspring

Formed 1984, Garden Grove, CA
 Bryan "Dexter" Holland (b. Dec. 29, 1966, Long Beach, CA),

voc., gtr.; Kevin "Noodles" Wasserman (b. Feb. 4, 1963, Los Angeles, CA), gtr.; "Greg K." Kriesel (b. Jan. 20, 1965, Glendale, CA), bass; Ron Welty (b. Feb. 1, 1971, Santa Ana, CA), drums. 1989—The Offspring (Nemesis) 1992—Ignition (Epitaph) 1994—Smash (Epitaph) 1997—Iknyay on the Hombre (Columbia) 1998—Americana 2000—Conspiracy of One.

Southern California's the Offspring accompanied fellow Cali punks Green Day into the mainstream when its 1994 album, Smash, became the best-selling indie-rock album in history. Many labeled the band a sellout when it moved to a major label for its followup album, but even as its music became increasingly MTV-friendly, the Offspring proved its punk mettle when it came out in support of the controversial online music-swapping software company Napster in 2000.

High school cross-country track teammates Bryan "Dexter" Holland and Greg Kriesel formed their first band Manic Subsidal, in 1984. Neither knew how to play their instruments nor seemed to fit the stereotypical mold of aspiring punk rockers. Holland, who graduated valedictorian from high school, was studying premed at USC, while Knesel, a self-proclaimed jock in high school, was also attending college. But even though they could rehearse only on weekends, they persisted with the band, which became the Offspring after the lineup settled with guitarist Kevin "Noodles" Wasserman, who had worked as a high school janitor, and drummer Ron Welty, who was still in high school when he joined the group.

The band recorded its first 7-inch single in 1987 and signed to the independent Nemesis label two years later. After releasing the 1989 self-titled debut on Nemesis, the Offspring was picked up by the larger indie, Epitaph Records, which was owned by Bad Religion guitarist Brett Gurewitz. Ignition (1992) sold enough copies to attract some major-label attention, but the Offspring remained on Epitaph long enough to deliver its 1994 breakthrough, Smash. Propelled by the melodic, punk-metal hooks of the radio hits "Come Out and Play" (#1 Modern Rock) and "Self Esteem," the album climbed to #4, eventually selling 11 million copies.

It would take three years for the Offspring to deliver a followup to Smash, the delay due in part to its legal battle with Epitaph seeking release from its contract. To the chagrin of Epitaph and punk punists, the group signed to Columbia in 1996. No doubt to the chagrin of Columbia, its first album for the label, 1997's Iknyay on the Hombre (#9), failed to come close to the success of Smash, with sales tapering off at a million. The following year's Americana (#2, 1998) proved much more successful, spawning the catchy, humorous MTV hits "Pretty Fly (for a White Guy)" (#53, 1998) and "Why Don't You Get a Job?" (#74, 1998).

In 2000, when Metallica led the music industry in a war against Napster, the Offspring jumped into the fray on the side of the underdog. Later that year, the band announced that it would make their new album, Conspiracy of One, available for free online before its commercial release. Columbia stopped the plan, however, allowing only the single "Original Prankster" to be given away. Still determined to give something back to its fans, the Offspring gave away $1 million of its own money as part of an online contest. Conspiracy of One entered the chart at #9 and was certified platinum by the end of the year.

Ohio Express

Formed 1968, Mansfield, OH

Joey Levine, voc.; Dale Powers, gtr.; Doug Grassel, gtr.; Jim Pfayler, kybds.; Dean Kastran, bass; Tim Corwin, drums.

1968—Beg Borrow and Steal (Cameo); The Ohio Express (Buddah); Salt Water Taffy; Chewy Chewy 1969—Mercy; The Very Best of the Ohio Express.

A studio bubblegum band like the 1910 Fruitgum Company (with whom they shared producers Kasenetz-Katz and vocalist Joey Levine), the Ohio Express hit in 1968 with the million-selling "Yummy Yummy Yummy" (#4) and "Chewy Chewy" (#15). They had scored some minor success in 1967 (on Cameo Records) with "Beg Borrow and Steal" (#29) and "Try It" (#83). In late 1968 they had a minor hit with "Down at Lulu's" (#33), followed in 1969 by "Sweeter Than Sugar" (#96), "Pinch Me" (#97), "Mercy" (#30), and "Sausalito" (#86) before disbanding. Levine formed a group called Reunion. Drummer Tim Corwin continues to tour with a version of the Ohio Express; guitarist Doug Grassel sometimes joins him. In the late '90s this ensemble even released a single, "Goody Goody."

The Ohio Players

Formed 1959, Dayton, OH

Best-known lineup: Billy Beck, kybds., voc.; Clarence "Satch" Satchell (b. 1940; d. Dec. 30, 1995, Dayton, OH), sax, flute, voc.; Jimmy "Diamond" Williams, drums, perc., voc.; Leroy "Sugar" Bonner, gtr., voc.; Marvin Pierce, trumpet; Marshall Jones, bass; Ralph "Pee Wee" Middlebrooks (d. 1997), trumpet, sax.

1968—First Impressions (Trip) 1969—Observations in Time (Capitol); Ohio Players 1972—Pain (Westbound) 1973—Pleasure; Ecstasy 1974—Skin Tight (Mercury); Climax (Westbound); Fire (Mercury) 1975—Greatest Hits (Westbound); Honey (Mercury); Rattlesnake (Westbound) 1976—Contradiction; Ohio Players Gold 1977—Angel; Mr. Mean 1978—Jass-Ay-Lay-Dee 1979—Everybody Up (Arista) 1980—Young and Ready (Accord) 1981—Ouch! (with Richard "Dimples" Fields) (Boardwalk); Tenderness 1984—Graduation (Air City) 1988—Back (Track) 1995—Funk on Fire: The Mercury Anthology (PolyGram) 1996—Ol' School (Intersound).

The Ohio Players enjoyed immense popularity during the mid-'70s with a percussive funk style influenced greatly by Sly and the Family Stone. The group was formed as Greg Webster and the Ohio Untouchables. For a time, they were the backing band for the Falcons, whose lead singer was Wilson Pickett. (They can be heard on the Falcons' "I Found a Love.") The Untouchables became the Players following the recruitment of three musicians from a rival Ohio band. In 1967 they served as the studio band for Compass Records, using their free time to cut demo tapes. One of these tapes won them a contract with Capitol Records and became Observations in Time.

The Players then recorded for Detroit-based Westbound Records from 1971 to 1973, gaining a #1 R&B single with "Funky Worm" (#15 pop). By the time the band signed with Mercury Records in 1974, keyboardist Junie Morrison had split for a solo career. (He later joined Parliament/Funkadelic.) The Players then embarked on a three-year run of steady hits, beginning with "Jive Turkey" (#47 pop, #6 R&B) and "Skin Tight" (#13 pop, #2 R&B) from Skin Tight (1974).

The title song from the gold #1 Fire album went #1 on the R&B and pop charts, while "I Want to Be Free" from that same album reached #6 R&B (#44 pop). The group's luck continued as the gold Honey yielded "Love Rollercoaster" (#1 pop, #1 R&B), "Sweet Sticky Thing" (#33 pop, #1 R&B), and "Fopp" (#9 pop, #9 R&B). "Who'd She Coo" in 1976 was the Players' last #1 R&B single (#18 pop); "O-H-I-O" (#45 pop, #9 R&B) in 1977 was their last big hit with Mercury. The Players cut an album for Arista Records before recording for Boardwalk Records in the early '80s. At their peak, they were also renowned for their provocative album covers, featuring half-clad, shaven-headed women in suggestive poses. The band's latter-day R&B hits include "Try a Little Tenderness" (#40, 1981) and "Let's Play (From Now On)" (#33, 1988).

Still led by singer/guitarist "Sugar" Bonner and drummer "Diamond" Williams, the Ohio Players continue to tour. Ol' School, which contains new live versions of old hits, is dedicated to saxman "Satch" Satchell, who died of a brain aneurysm in 1995. Trumpeter "Pee Wee" Middlebrooks, who remained with the group for almost 30 years, died in late 1997.

Extremely popular in California but never a national success. Oingo Boingo may be less significant for its own blend of high technique and quirky humor than as the training ground for frontman Danny Elfman, composer of scores for such high-profile films as Batman and Dick Tracy.

Composed of former members of a bizarre theater/comedy troupe calling itself the Mystic Knights of Oingo Boingo, the band began as a late-'70s new-wave outfit, notable for its horn section and for Elfman's tunes—intricately arranged, often comic songs that featured influences ranging from R&B to Balinese music. While drawing occasional comparisons to Frank Zappa and XTC, Oingo Boingo enjoyed neither critical acclaim nor significant sales as it recorded throughout the '80s ("Weird Science," #45, 1985, was the group's highest-charting release).

It was, however, sought after for soundtrack appearances (Fast Times at Ridgemoor High, Beverly Hills Cop, Weird Science). After releasing his own album, So-Lo, in 1984, Elfman continued to perform with Oingo Boingo but concentrated on television and film scores. With the music for Pee-wee's Big Adventure and The Simpsons to his credit and as chief composer for filmmaker Tim Burton (Batman, Edward Scissorhands, The Nightmare Before Christmas), he is one of Hollywood's most successful composers, his work reflecting a penchant for the strange and macabre that also characterizes Oingo Boingo. In 1993 the band signed its third major-label contract, with Giant Records, shortened its name to Boingo, and released a self-titled 1994 album.

The following year, the band, ready to call it quits, decided to go out in style by recording their annual Halloween concert as a farewell gesture. The resulting document, culled from two shows at L.A.'s Universal Amphitheatre, includes versions of such Boingo standbys as "Little Girls" and "Dead Man's Party." Elfman went on to garner Oscar nominations for his scores for the movies Men in Black and Good Will Hunting and has since signed a writing, directing, and development deal with Disney.

(Epic/Legacy) 1996—(– Best; + Eric Grant, voc.) 1997—
Love You to Tears (Global Soul/Volcano).

The O'Jays were one of the most popular black vocal groups of the '70s, when they were in effect the voice of producers Gamble and Huff

Eddie Levert and Walter Williams sang together as a gospel duo before forming a doo-wop group, the Mascots, with William Powell, Bobby Massey, and Bill Isles in 1958. In 1961 the Mascots made their recording debut with "Miracles" for the Wayco label. Cleveland DJ Eddie O'Jay liked the group and gave it career advice. As a gesture of appreciation, the Mascots became the O'Jays. They cut some songs with producer Don Davis for Apollo Records before signing with Imperial and working with producer/writer H.B. Barnum. They recorded for Imperial from 1963 to 1967 and had some minor success. "Stand in for Love" (#12 R&B, 1966) was their biggest seller of the period.

In 1965 Isles left, and the group became a quartet. The O'Jays signed with Bell and had a #8 R&B hit, "I'll Be Sweeter Tomorrow," in 1967. The members were growing discouraged and contemplating retirement when Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff signed them to their Neptune label the next year. The O'Jays released four hits, including "One Night Affair" (#15 R&B, 1969) and "Looky Looky (Look at Me, Girl)" (#17 R&B, 1970). After Neptune folded in 1971, Massey quit to start producing records.

Levert, Williams, and Powell attempted self-production with a single for Saru Records, then signed with Gamble and Huff's new Columbia-distributed label, Philadelphia International. With Gamble and Huff supplying social-commentary songs, the O'Jays began an impressive string of gold and platinum records. They had eight #1 R&B singles from 1972 to 1978, a string that included "Back Stabbers" (#3) in 1972; "Love Train" (#1) in 1973; "For the Love of Money" (#9) in 1974; "Give the People What They Want" (#45) and "I Love Music (Part 1)" (#5) in 1975; "Livin' for the Weekend" b/w "Stairway to Heaven" (#20), "Message in Our Music" (#49), and "Darlin' Darlin' Baby" (#72) in 1976; and "Use ta Be My Girl" (#4 pop, #1 R&B) in 1978. Five of their LPs of this hot streak were certified gold; three went platinum.

In 1975 Powell was debilitated by cancer and could no longer tour. Two years later, he died in the O'Jays' hometown. Sammy Strain, a member of Little Anthony and the Imperials for 12 years, replaced him. Identify Yourself was certified platinum in 1979.

Increasingly during this time, Levert and Williams assumed more active roles in the production and writing. They continued working with Gamble and Huff through Love Fever, for Let Me Touch You, producer Thom Bell worked with Gamble and Huff. The latter album featured "Lovin' You" (#1 R&B, 1987) and "Let Me Touch You" (#5 R&B, 1987). "Have You Had Your Love Today" hit #1 on the R&B singles chart in 1989, as did "Out of My Mind" (#11 R&B) and "Serious Hold on Me" (#9 R&B), all from Serious (#4 R&B, 1989). In 1991 Emotionally Yours was certified gold, it included the hits "Keep On Lovin' Me" (#4 R&B), "Don't Let Me Down" (#2

R&B), and the Bob Dylan–penned "Emotionally Yours" (#5 R&B). In 1993 Sammy Strain returned to the re-formed Little Anthony and the Imperials [see entry] and was replaced by Nathaniel Best. That year's Heartbreaker was another R&B Top 10 album, its title track went to #7 R&B. Eric Grant replaced Best before 1997's Love You to Tears (#14 R&B, #75 pop), on which the O'Jays' vocals remain classic while their music is updated by producers Keith Sweat, Gerald Levert (son of Eddie Levert), and Tony Nicholas. (Gerald Levert and his brother Sean also sing with the hit R&B trio Levert [see entry].) The O'Jays remain an enduring live and recording unit.

Mike Oldfield's Tubular Bells was the first LP released by Virgin, and it got the new company off with a bang. It was a #1 LP in the U.K. and went gold in the U.S. The title track won a 1974 Grammy for Best Pop Instrumental Performance, after being used as the theme song for The Exorcist.

Tubular Bells was some nine months in the making, as Oldfield played virtually all 28 instruments—mainly various guitars, basses, and keyboards—himself. The album was a more accessible reworking of ideas previously used by minimalist composers. Oldfield, however, used rock and folk motifs, layered in a controlled, ever-changing tapestry, to achieve something of an artistic/commercial milestone in the arranging of a 48-minute "rock" composition.

Oldfield had launched his musical career at age 14 in an acoustic-folk duo with his sister Sally. After the duo made an album, Oldfield formed a short-lived band, Barefeet, through which he met English singer/songwriter Kevin Ayers [see entry], who had just left Soft Machine. Ayers made Oldfield the bassist (later, the guitarist) in his band, the Whole World, for 1971's Shooting at the Moon.

An edited version of Tubular Bells, known as "Mike Oldfield's Single" or "Theme from The Exorcist," went to #7 in 1974, but followup LPs were unsuccessful in the U.S. Oldfield did have several more U.K. hit singles: "In Dulce Jubilo/On Horseback" (#4, 1975), "Portsmouth" (#3, 1976), "Blue Peter" (#19, 1979), and "Guilty" (#22, 1979)—the last of which saw Oldfield mating his pop-folk harmonic progressions to a disco beat, an approach furthered on the QE 2 LP. Oldfield also recorded a disco version of composer Philip Glass' "North Star." Islands was a concerted effort at pop-song construction and featured guest vocals by Kevin Ayers, Bonnie Tyler, and ex-Family Roger Chapman.

In 1992—19 years after he'd made his mark, and 17 years after he'd arranged "Tubular Bells" for a 1975 recording by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra—Oldfield collaborated with producer Trevor Horn (Buggles, ABC, Art of Noise) on Tubular Bells II, which reached #1 on the U.K. chart. With 1996's Voyager, Oldfield took a trip into Celtic territory. In 1998, on the 25th anniversary of his masterwork, the composer banged out yet another installment in the Tubular Bells series, this one a concept piece about living in a cliff-side home on the Spanish island of Ibiza. The Millennium Bell was designed to be played at Germany's Brandenburg Gate on New Year's Eve 1999.

Alexander O'Neal

Born Nov. 15, 1953, Natchez, MS
 1985—Alexander O'Neal (Tabu/Epic) 1987—Hearsay
 1988—My Gift to You 1989—All Mixed Up 1991—All True Man 1993—Love Makes No Sense (Tabu/A&M) 1998—Lovers Again (Ichiban).

Emerging from Minneapolis' black club scene, Alexander O'Neal gained fame in the late '80s as a soul crooner equally adept at hard-edged R&B.

In 1978 O'Neal joined Flyte Time, the neofunk outfit that included future producers Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis. Though O'Neal left in 1980—just as Prince discovered the band and redubbed them the Time—Jam and Lewis produced his self-titled debut. One of its singles was "Saturday Love" (1986), an R&B Top 5 duet with Cherrelle that proved him a stylistic heir to Marvin Gaye and Levi Stubbs.

Hearsay, with another Cherrelle collaboration, "Never Knew Love Like This" (#28, 1988), "Fake" (#25, 1987), and a blend of rock guitar and glossy strings, followed by All Mixed Up, a collection of remixes, ushered in O'Neal's #3 R&B album, All True Man (#49 pop, 1991). Love Makes No Sense, with Lance Alexander and Tony Tolbert replacing Jam and Lewis as producers, found O'Neal retaining his gospel-inflected style but moving in a pop direction ("Since I've Been Lovin' You," cowritten by Michael Bolton). Drug and alcohol problems plagued him mid-decade, but O'Neal's '80s career still appeared to be a smooth progression; he achieved particular success in the U.K. The '90s were more difficult for the singer, he switched labels from Tabu to Motown, which then chose not to release any of the music he recorded for it. While his music did then find American release on the smaller label Ichiban, his strongest fan base remained British.

The Only Ones

Formed 1976, London, Eng.
 Peter Perrett, gr., voc.; John Perry, gr.; Alan Mair, bass; Mike

Kellie (b. Mar. 24, 1947, Birmingham, Eng.), drums.
 1978—The Only Ones (CBS International, U.K.) 1979—Even Serpents Shine; Special View (Epic); Baby's Got a Gun 1989—Live (Skyclad) 1992—The Immortal Story (Columbia).

Though part of the British punk-rock explosion, the Only Ones had a traditional rock sound, evidenced in a ringing two-guitar attack reminiscent of the Byrds and Peter Perrett's world-weary vocals and songwriting that smacked of both Lou Reed and Ray Davies. The Only Ones, in fact, had a veteran rhythm section, Mike Kellie having drummed with Spooky Tooth, Peter Frampton, and Balls, and Alan Mair having played bass with the Beatstalkers. Perrett, meanwhile, struck up a close friendship with punk progenitor Johnny Thunders, the ex-New York Doll who was backed by the Only Ones on much of his So Alone album and who, like Perrett, battled a heroin addiction.

The Only Ones' first single was "Lovers of Today" b/w "Peter and the Pets"; the followup, "Another Girl, Another Planet," gained international acclaim (though it failed to chart in England upon release, it hit #57 in 1992) and got considerable play in America's new-wave clubs. (In the '80s, the song was frequently performed by the Replacements.) However, due to erratic live shows, Perrett's drug problems, and creative differences with its record label, the band was unable to consolidate an audience despite rave reviews for its first two albums, which were condensed for U.S. release in the Special View compilation. Penetration vocalist Pauline Murray guested on Baby's Got a Gun, after which the Only Ones drifted apart. In 1991, a year after the archival Live was released, Perrett announced that he'd kicked heroin and would re-form the band, but in place of a reunion came the Immortal Story, a compilation from the first three albums. He resurfaced in the mid-'90s, recording in the U.K. as Peter Perrett and the One. The music sounds remarkably faithful to his original vision.

The Orb

Formed 1988, London, Eng.
 "Dr." Alex Paterson (b. Duncan Robert Alexander Paterson, Oct. 15, 1959, London), synth., samplers; Jimi Cauty (b. James Cauty, 1956, Devon, Eng.), gr.
 1989—The Kiss EP (Wau! Mr. Modo, U.K.) (- Cauty) 1990—(+ Kristian "Thrash" Weston, gr., synth., samplers, perc.)
 1991—The Orb's Adventures Beyond the Ultraworld (Big Life); The Aubrey Mixes: The Ultraworld Excursions 1992—UFOrb 1993—Live 93 (Island) 1994—Pomme Fritz (- Weston; + Andy Hughes, engineer) 1995—Orbus Terrarum 1997—Orblivion 1998—U.F. Off 2001—Cydonia (MCA) (- Hughes).

In terms of significance to ambient music, few artists aside from Brian Eno rival the Orb. In the early '90s, the revolving collective led by "Dr." Alex Paterson pioneered a style known as "ambient house," which slowed down the tempo of house music, added synths and effects drawn from ambient, topped it off with a few craftily lifted samples, and provided the soundtrack for exhausted ravers' late nights/early mornings. In the process, the Orb laid the groundwork for much of '90s electronica.

A former roadie for Killing Joke and A&R man at EG Records (Eno's label, incidentally), Paterson recorded his first Orb tracks with Jimi Cauty of sampling fiends the KLF [see entry]. The single, 1988's "Tripping on Sunshine," was followed by 1989's Kiss EP, made from samples taken from New York's KISS-FM, the EP landed Paterson a gig DJ'ing at DJ Paul Oakenfold's Heaven club in London. Paterson's truly big break, however, came later that year with the 20-plus-minute "A Huge Ever Growing Pulsating Brain That Rules From the Centre of the Ultraworld." Centered around samples of chiming bells, Minnie Riperton's "Lovin' You," and a rainstorm, the track heralded the birth of ambient house. It also marked Cauty's last recording with the Orb.

Following Cauty's departure, Paterson carried on with new partner Kris "Thrash" Weston—and several collaborators—releasing the full-length album The Orb's Adventures Beyond the Ultraworld (#29 U.K., 1991). The album contained the previously released international dance hit "Little Fluffy Clouds," which sampled Rickie Lee Jones musing about her childhood in the Anzonia desert (and for which Paterson was subsequently sued by Jones; the case was later settled out of court). The Orb's next recording, 1992's "The Blue Room," outdid the group's previous penchant for long tracks: The "single" clocked in at over 39 minutes. Nevertheless, it went to #8 in the U.K. and scored Paterson and Company a spot on the British TV show Top of the Pops—on which they engaged in a game of chess while a three-minute, prerecorded version of the single played in the background. The song reappeared on UFOrb (#1 U.K., 1992).

In 1994, the same year the Orb played Woodstock '94, Paterson and Weston recorded an album as FFWD with King Crimson guitarist Robert Fripp and Berlin-based producer/Orb collaborator Thomas Fehlmann. The Orb also released its first studio album for Island Records; titled Pomme Fritz, it saw the group incorporating industrial influences into its sound. By 1995's Orbus Terrarum—on which longtime Orb engineer Andy Hughes replaced the departing Weston as Paterson's main collaborator—the Orb had essentially abandoned ambient for a denser sound. British critics panned the album; their American counterparts hyped it. The group reverted to its previous, spaced-out style for Orblivion (#174, 1997), as well as for Cydonia. Though Hughes helped record and engineer the album, he had left the Orb fold by the time of the record's release in 2001.

One of the original, if not the most enthusiastic, Sun Records rockabilly artists, Roy Orbison went on to become one of the most distinctive singers in popular music. In his first peak period (1961–64), he vacillated between snarling blues rock and his mainstay, the romantic/paranoiac ballad with crescendoing falsetto and strings. With his twanging guitar and quavering bel canto tenor, Orbison scored a number of hits: "Only the Lonely" (#2, 1960), "Running Scared" (#1, 1961), "Crying" (#2, 1961), "Dream Baby" (#4, 1962), and "Oh, Pretty Woman" (#1, 1964). Orbison's brooding loner persona was later given resonance by the personal tragedies that befell him (his wife Claudette was killed in a motorcycle accident in 1966; two of his three children died in a fire in his Nashville home in 1968).

Orbison's songwriting and his near-operatic singing have been a prominent influence on Bruce Springsteen, Chris Isaak, and k.d. lang, among others. His ostensibly placid, introverted demeanor was offset by his trademark "look": sunglasses (contrary to popular belief, he was not blind), black leather, and a slicked-back black pompadour. Despite limited success through the late '60s and '70s, Orbison never quit, and he was in the midst of a major commercial and critical comeback when he died suddenly in 1988.

Like many other early rockers, Orbison came to rock from country music. His father played Jimmie Rodgers songs on guitar, and an uncle played the blues. By age eight, Orbison was performing on local radio shows, and while attending high school in Wink, Texas, he formed the Wink Westerners, whose repertoire consisted mainly of country and pop standards. In contrast to many early rock stars, Orbison found rock & roll relatively late in his youth, and then almost by accident. His college buddy at North Texas State College was the newly famous Pat Boone, who urged Orbison to experiment with more pop-oriented songwriting. Orbison then formed the Teen Kings from the Wink Westerners, and they recorded "Ooby Dooby." Though Orbison would later profess a greater liking at that time for slower country material than frenetic rock, the first song he sent Sun Records' Sam

Roy Orbison

Phillips—the rocking “Ooby Dooby”—impressed Phillips and in 1956 became Orbison’s first hit (#59). The Teen Kings soon disbanded, and Orbison remained under contract to Sun as a solo artist. But future hits eluded Orbison, who was never entirely comfortable with rockabilly and was unhappy with Phillips’ direction.

Orbison then moved to Nashville, where he wrote songs for Acuff-Rose Publishing. One of his first successes was “Claudette,” named for his wife, which became a hit for the Everly Brothers. Working with producer Chet Atkins, Orbison resumed his solo career, and by 1960 had signed with Monument Records. Then came the hits, starting with “Only the Lonely,” a song originally written for the Everly Brothers. Subsequent hits included “Blue Angel” (#9, 1960), “I’m Hurtin’” (#27, 1961), “Candy Man” (#25, 1961), “The Crowd” (#26, 1962), “Leah” (#25, 1962), “In Dreams” (#7, 1963), “Falling” (#22, 1963), “Mean Woman Blues” (#5, 1963), “Blue Bayou” (#29, 1963, later covered by Linda Ronstadt), Willie Nelson’s “Pretty Paper” (#15, 1963), “It’s Over” (#9, 1964), “Goodnight” (#21, 1965), and “Ride Away” (#25, 1965). He cowrote virtually all of his hits and often produced them as well. Successful in the U.S., Orbison was also a smash in Britain, where in 1963 he toured with the Beatles. Orbison’s bands during the ‘60s included guitarist Bobby Goldsboro and drummer Dewey Martin (later of Buffalo Springfield).

Following his wife’s death in 1966, Orbison’s career went on hold. He remarried in March 1969 and later had another son. When he returned to the U.K. in 1969, the adulation was overwhelming. Even in the late ‘60s, when his popularity in the U.S. was waning, he had a monthlong run at London’s Talk of the Town club. In 1975 he released a chart-topping greatest-hits compilation.

After steady but uneventful work through the ‘70s, Orbison closed the decade with an opening slot on the Eagles’ 1980 tour and a Grammy-winning duet with Emmylou Harris (1980’s “That Lovin’ You Feelin’ Again”) on the Roadie soundtrack. A 1981 comeback show in New York was a great commercial and critical success. In 1982 “Oh, Pretty Woman” was a hit for Van Halen; it would be revived again as the title theme song of the 1990 hit film Pretty Woman. Orbison’s comeback began in earnest, however, when director David Lynch used the sumptuously romantic “In Dreams” in a startling scene in his film Blue Velvet. The next year, Orbison was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame by Bruce Springsteen. The year 1987 also saw the release of In Dreams: The Greatest Hits, which presented newly recorded versions of Orbison’s classic hits, and the taping of an all-star tribute show called A Black and White Night. Taped in L.A.’s Coconut Grove nightclub, the tribute starred Orbison with all-star backing from Springsteen, Elvis Costello, Bonnie Raitt, k.d. lang, Jackson Browne, Jennifer Warnes, Tom Waits, and J.D. Souther.

In 1987 Orbison’s duet remake of “Crying” with k.d. lang hit #42 on the country chart. A chance meeting with Bob Dylan, Tom Petty, George Harrison, and Jeff Lynne resulted in the formation of the extremely successful Traveling Wilburys [see entry]. At the same time, Orbison was completing work on his next solo album, Mystery Girl, which included the hit Orbison-Lynne-Petty composition “You Got It” (#9, 1989), destined to become the singer’s first Top 20 hit in 25 years. While Lynne produced that track, several other artists, including T Bone Burnett (who had produced In Dreams), Bono, Heartbreaker Mike Campbell, and Orbison lent production assistance on various cuts. In addition, Bono and the Edge composed “She’s a Mystery to Me.”

Orbison was on the brink of a major comeback when he died suddenly of a heart attack. The posthumously released Mystery Girl (#5, 1989) became the highest-charting album of his career and was eventually certified platinum. In the wake of Orbison’s passing, a number of compilations and a collection of previously unreleased tracks (King of Hearts) were released.

Orbital

Formed 1989, Sevenoaks, Eng.

Phil Hartnoll (b. Jan. 9, 1964, Sevenoaks), synths., sequencers;
Paul Hartnoll (b. May 19, 1968, Sevenoaks), synths., sequencers.
1991—Orbital (a.k.a. Green Album) (Ffr) 1993—Orbital 2
(a.k.a. Brown Album) 1994—Snivilisation 1996—In Sides
1999—The Middle of Nowhere.

One of modern-day dance music’s longest-running groups, Orbital was crucial to the genre’s eventual acceptance by a broad audience. The duo of brothers Phil and Paul Hartnoll sprung from the acid-house movement that swept its native U.K. in the late ‘80s. Orbital’s name, in fact, is taken from the London M25, the circular highway on which ravers traveled to their late-night destinations. In the early to mid-'90s, the two revolutionized the mainstream perception of dance music by releasing full-length cohesive albums (instead of a string of singles) and by re-creating their music live rather than performing prerecorded songs.

The Hartnolls grew up in West Kent, a rural suburb of London. There they spent their youth listening to punk, electropop, and their father's film soundtracks. Electropop in particular inspired them to buy a drum machine and, later, some synthesizers; by 1988, Paul had recorded two electro pieces, which he sold to British label Ffr Their first collaborative effort as Orbital, "Chime," appeared the next year. With its undeniable beat and exuberant, chiming synth notes, the single went to #17 in the U.K. in 1990 and is still regarded as a classic dance track. It also secured the brothers a slot on the British TV show Top of the Pops, during which they played their single while wearing T-shirts emblazoned with anti-poll tax slogans. A live version of "Chime" (#73 U.K., 1991) reappeared on Orbital's untitled full-length debut, widely referred to as the Green Album in reference to its jacket color. Essentially a collection of unrelated songs, the release was a less comprehensive effort than its followup, the similarly untitled Brown Album. As the record, also known as Orbital 2, went to #28 in the U.K., the brothers played 1994's rock-centric Woodstock 2 and the second stage of England's equally rock-oriented Glastonbury Festival. Their Glastonbury performance was so successful that the Hartnolls were asked to play the festival's main stage the following year.

While Orbital's first full-lengths were rooted in acid house, 1994's Snivilisation was a darker, more challenging effort that debuted in the U.K. at #4. The album had a political slant as well, attacking the country's antirape Criminal Justice Bill. Also containing its share of political platforms (this time advocating energy conservation), 1996's In Sides debuted at #5 in the U.K., while its 28-minute single "The Box" went to #11. Its successor, 1999's The Middle of Nowhere, was slighted by critics but went Top 5 in the U.K. and was the first Orbital album to crack the Top 200 in the States. Orbital's next projects included recording the "Beached" single with Angelo Badalamenti (#36 U.K., 2000) and remixing techno godfathers Kraftwerk in 2000.

Andy McCluskey (b. June 24, 1959, Heswall, Eng.), synth., kybds., electronics, voc.; Paul Humphreys (b. Feb. 27, 1960, London), synth., kybds., electronics, voc.; David Hughes, bass, kybds.; Malcolm Holmes, drums.

1980—Orchestral Manoeuvres in the Dark (Dindisc/Virgin); Organisation (- Hughes; + Martin Cooper, kybds., sax)

1981—Architecture and Morality (Virgin/Epic) 1983—Dazzle Ships 1984—Junk Culture (Virgin/A&M) (+ Neil Weir, horns; + Graham Weir, horns) 1985—Crush 1986—The Pacific Age (- N. Weir; - G. Weir) 1988—In the Dark/The Best of OMD 1989—(group disbands) 1991—(group re-forms: McCluskey, synth., bass, voc.) Sugar Tax (Virgin) (+ Nigel Ipinson [b. 1970, Eng.], kybds.; + Phil Coxon [b. 1959, Eng.], kybds.; + Stuart Kershaw, drums) 1993—Liberator 1996—Universal.

One of England's longest-running and poppiest postpunk electropop bands, Orchestral Manoeuvres in the Dark was originally formed by Paul Humphreys and Andy McCluskey, two Kraftwerk fans who had first had a duo called VCL XI in 1976, then joined such little-known larger groups as Hitlers Underpantz and the Id. In 1978 they adopted the name Orchestral Manoeuvres in the Dark, recording and performing with 4-track tapes they made and played back on a tape deck they called "Winston."

In June 1979, the trendy Manchester label Factory released the duo's debut single, "Electricity," a classic piece of hooky, percolating synth pop. It was a Top 40 British hit and got significant play in American new-wave clubs. Humphreys and McCluskey soon replaced their rhythm-box percussion with a live rhythm section (drummer Malcolm Holmes had been in the Id). The 1980 single "Enola Gay" (named for the plane that dropped the first atomic bomb on Japan), with a somewhat nicher sound and more romantic feel than "Electricity," was a Top 10 British hit and got more play on America's burgeoning new-wave club and radio circuit.

The critically acclaimed Architecture and Morality barely charted in the U.S. (#144, 1982), and Dazzle Ships and Junk Culture were critically dented as overly indulgent, but OMD made a comeback with Crush (#38, 1985), which added the Weir brothers' horn section and yielded the group's first U.S. hit singles, "So in Love" (#26, 1985) and "Secret" (#63, 1985). OMD scored its biggest hit with "If You Leave" (#4, 1986), from the teen-romance movie Pretty in Pink. The Pacific Age (#47, 1986) yielded a hit single in "(Forever) Live and Die" (#19, 1986), and the best-of In the Dark (#46, 1988) produced a hit in the new track "Dreaming" (#16, 1988). The band then broke up, with Humphreys leaving McCluskey to form Listening Pool. McCluskey restarted OMD in 1991 and recorded Sugar Tax, which failed to chart—though it sold 2 million copies worldwide—followed by the less successful Liberator. A subsequent album, Universal, was released in 1996.

The Orioles

Formed 1946, Baltimore, MD

Sonny Til (b. Earlington Tilgham, Aug. 18, 1925; d. Dec. 9, 1981), lead voc.; George Nelson (d. ca. 1959), lead and baritone voc.; Alexander Sharp (d. ca. 1970s), tenor voc.; Johnny Reed, bass voc.; Tommy Gaither (d. 1950), grt.

1950—(- Gaither; + Ralph Williams, grt., baritone voc.) 1953—(- Nelson; + Gregory Carol; + Charlie Hayes)

N.A.—Greatest Hits (Collectable) 1981—Sonny Til and the Orioles Visit Manhattan Circa 1950s (Collectables).

The Orioles are cited by many rock historians as the first rhythm & blues vocal group and a harbinger of the '50s doo-wop sound. As teens, they were known as the Vibrinaires. A local saleslady/songwriter, Deborah Chessler, managed the group and landed them a spot on Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts television program in 1948. They lost, but became regulars on Godfrey's national broadcast.

The group joined Natural Records in 1948, and then changed its name to the Orioles. Contrary to popular misconception, the group did not name itself for the baseball team. The Orioles made the R&B chart with several singles, including "It's Too Soon to Know" (#13 pop, #1 R&B, 1948)—the first stylistically black, or, to use the industry term of the time, "race," record to place that high on the pop chart. Their later hits include "Lonely Christmas" (#8 R&B, 1949) and "Tell Me So" (#1 R&B, 1949). The latter is considered most significant because it used "a wordless falsetto doing a kind of obligato to the lead vocal," according to critic/disc jockey Barry Hansen. This technique would later be a staple of doo-wop vocals. Other R&B hits followed: "A Kiss and a Rose" (#12 R&B, 1949), "Forgive and Forget" (#5 R&B, 1949), and "What Are You Doing New Year's Eve" (#9 R&B, 1949). In 1950 Gaither was killed in an automobile accident that seriously injured Nelson and Reed. "Pal of Mine" is a tribute to Gaither.

Nelson quit, and two new members made the group a quintet. This lineup recorded "Crying in the Chapel" (#11 pop, #1 R&B, 1953), which was one of the first R&B songs to cross over to the pop market and a #3 hit for Elvis Presley in 1956. Its followup, "In the Mission of St. Augustine," was the Orioles' last hit. The original Orioles disbanded in 1954, though over the years various groups have performed and recorded under the name. The year Sonny Til died, 1981, saw the release of Sonny Til and the Orioles Visit Manhattan Circa 1950s, which contained new versions of doo-wop oldies. By then only Reed and Williams of the original lineup were still alive. The group was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1995.

Tony Orlando and Dawn

Tony Orlando (b. Michael Anthony Orlando Cassavitis, Apr. 3, 1944, New York), voc.; Telma Louise Hopkins (b. Oct. 28, 1948, Louisville, KY), voc.; Joyce Elaine Vincent-Wilson (b. Dec. 14, 1946, Detroit, MI), voc.

1970—Candida (Bell) 1973—Tuneweaving 1974—Prime Time 1975—Tony Orlando and Dawn/Greatest Hits (Arista) 1998—The Definitive Collection.

Tony Orlando and Dawn had many MOR hits in the early '70s, including "Tie a Yellow Ribbon 'Round the Ole Oak Tree," the largest-selling single of 1973. In 1981 it became something of a theme song for the return of U.S. hostages from Iran; the yellow ribbon has become a national symbol for any homecoming, whether from a war or a kidnapping.

At age 16 Orlando auditioned for producer Don Kirshner, who teamed him up with songwriter Carole King. Kirshner produced and King wrote Orlando's first hits, all in 1961: "Halfway to Paradise" (#39), "Bless You" (#15), and "Happy Times (Are Here to Stay)" (#82). In a short while, though, Orlando stopped singing, in part because Kirshner sold his company to Screen Gems, which was more interested in publishing than recording. For a while, Orlando worked in promotion, and in 1967 he became manager of April-Blackwood Music, the publishing arm of Columbia Records.

In early 1970 Bell Records producer Hank Medress (a former member of the Tokens) asked Orlando to sing lead over a demo he had received from Telma Louise Hopkins and Joyce Elaine Vincent, a duo calling itself Dawn. The two Detroit-based singers had previously backed Johnnie Taylor, Edwin Starr, Freda Payne, Frijid Pink, and others. Hopkins had also been part of Isaac Hayes' Hot Buttered Soul and later sang on "Shaft." Orlando's voice was dubbed over the original, and "Candida" shot to #3 in 1970. (Supposedly, he didn't meet Dawn until after it hit.) An alternate account claims that Orlando recorded both "Candida" and its followup, "Knock Three Times" with session singers and that Hopkins and Vincent were not hired until after these were hits.

Orlando kept his day job until after their second single, "Knock Three Times," hit #1 in 1971. Then he signed with Bell, and the group (then called Dawn, featuring Tony Orlando) finally started touring in September 1971. In 1973 they returned to the charts with the #1 hit "Tie a Yellow Ribbon 'Round the Ole Oak Tree." Other hits included "Say, Has Anybody Seen My Sweet Gypsy Rose?" (#3, 1973), "Steppin' Out (Gonna Boogie Tonight)" (#7, 1974), and "He Don't Love You (Like I Love You)" (#1, 1975).

After that, their hits stopped, though the group still played many concert dates and hosted a musical-variety television series that ran intermittently for two and a half years on CBS. In July 1977, during a show in Massachusetts, Orlando shocked Dawn and the audience by announcing his retirement and claiming that he was giving up show business for Jesus Christ. Orlando's decision followed the death of his sister and suicide of comedian Freddie Prinze, a close friend. Orlando also had a cocaine problem and suffered from manic depression. In November 1977 he made a solo comeback, playing Las Vegas, and later signed with Casablanca, though only one chart hit, "Sweets for My Sweet" (#54, 1979), followed. He appeared on Broadway in Barnum in 1980. The two women worked unsuccessfully as Dawn. Hopkins later went into acting; she has appeared on television's Bosom Buddies, Gimme a Break, and Family Matters.

Beginning in the late '80s, Orlando cohosted Jerry Lewis' Labor Day Telethon to benefit the Muscular Dystrophy Association. In 1988 Orlando, Hopkins, and Vincent-Wilson briefly re-formed Dawn. In the early '90s Orlando relocated to Branson, Missouri, where he performs regularly at his Tony Orlando Yellow Ribbon Music Theater.

Lance Hoppen (b. 1954, Bayshore, NY), bass; Wells Kelly (d. Oct. 30, 1984, London, Eng.), organ, voc., drums; Larry Hoppen, voc., kybds., gtr.; Jerry Marotta, drums, perc.; John Hall (b. Oct. 25, 1947, Baltimore, MD), gtr., voc.

 1979—Forever (Infinity) 1982—One of a Kind (Radio/Atlantic)
 1990—Still the One (Elektra); Orleans Live (Major) 1996—Ride (Dinosaur Entertainment) 1997—Dance With Me: The Best of Orleans (Elektra/Rhino).
 John Hall solo: 1970—Action (CBS) 1978—John Hall (Asylum)
 1979—Power (Columbia) 1981—All of the Above (EMI America) 1983—Search Party 1992—On a Distant Star (Pioneer, Jap.) 1998—Recovered (Siren Song).

Orleans had a few pop hits in the mid-'70s written by leader/guitarist John Hall and his wife, Johanna. The group was founded by John Hall (among whose songwriting credits is Janis Joplin's "Half Moon"), Larry Hoppen, and Wells Kelly. Larry's brother Lance joined later in the year. Through the next year they became a popular East Coast club attraction. They signed with ABC in 1973 and cut their eponymous debut with producers Barry Beckett and Roger Hawkins at Alabama's Muscle Shoals studio.

In 1974 Orleans recorded a self-produced album at Bearsville studio, but ABC rejected it and dropped the group from the roster. Elektra-Asylum picked up Orleans and released its Chuck Plotkin-produced Let There Be Music (#33, 1975) late in the year. "Dance With Me" (#6, 1975) was the group's first big hit. Waking and Dreaming (#30, 1976) contained "Still the One" (#5), which the ABC television network used as its theme song for the year.

In 1977 Hall left to begin a solo career. He signed to Elektra Records and soon became a spokesman for the anti-nuclear power movement, playing a key role in organizing MUSE (Musicians United for Safe Energy) and writing its anthem "Power."

Orleans continued on through various personnel changes and in 1979 had a #11 hit with "Love Takes Time" from Forever (#76, 1979). By this time, the band had moved to MCA's Infinity label, which in 1980 went bankrupt. The group stayed together and appeared in clubs through 1981, and in 1982 released One of a Kind. In 1984 Wells Kelly died in London after choking on his own vomit as a result of heroin and cocaine intoxication. The band kept on going with the three early members and various guest drummers—four different ones appear on the 1996 album Ride.

Beth Orton

Born Dec. 14, 1970, East Dereham, Norfolk, Eng.
 1996—Trailer Park (Heavenly, U.K.) 1997—Best Bit EP
 1999—Central Reservation (Deconstruction/Arista).

Beth Orton first grabbed attention with a sly mixture of acoustic folk and trip-hop beats backing her haunted and soulful lyrics. Though her second album was a step toward more traditional folk, Orton's passionate, if understated, music has been hailed as setting the trend for a new generation of singer/songwriters.

Orton, whose father died when she was 11, was raised with two older brothers in Norfolk, England, by her mother, a writer and activist for improved child-care laws. In the mid-'80s the family moved to London, where Orton studied acting and eventually joined a traveling theater company. Involved in London's dance-music scene, Orton met producer William Orbit, who was so taken by Orton's speaking voice that he invited her to record in his studio. As a duo called Spill, Orton and Orbit recorded a cover of John Martyn's "Don't Wanna Know About Evil" and released SuperPinkyMandy in Japan.

After guesting on a variety of albums—including the Chemical Brothers' Exit Planet Dust—Orton spent three and a half months meditating at a Buddhist monastery in Thailand. She returned to find various record companies interested in her music. The downbeat folk and modern textures of her solo debut, Trailer Park, earned wide acclaim and sales of 300,000 copies worldwide. For 1999's Central Reservation (#110), Orton dropped many of the overt techno beats, moving toward a folkier sound. Ben Harper played guitar on the album, which was coproduced by David Roback of Mazzy Star.

Jeffrey Osborne

Born Mar. 9, 1948, Providence, RI
 1982—Jeffrey Osborne (A&M) 1983—Stay With Me Tonight
 1984—Don't Stop 1986—Emotional 1988—One Love—One Dream 1990—Only Human (Arista) 1997—Something Warm for Christmas (Modern) 1999—Ultimate Collection (Hip-O) 2000—That's for Sure (Private).

Singer/songwriter Jeffrey Osborne's soulful baritone and romantic R&B ballads were first heard in the '70s, when he fronted the group L.T.D. (Love, Togetherness, Devotion) and later in his highly successful solo work.

He grew up in New England, one of 12 children of an accomplished amateur trumpeter father. Learning the trumpet and then drums at an early age, Osborne played in bands throughout high school before signing on as drummer for the Greensboro, North Carolina-based L.T.D. at age 22 in 1970. Formerly the backup band for Sam and Dave, the 10-piece horn-driven outfit encouraged Osborne's singing, and on their six albums and such hits as "Love Ballad" (#20, 1976) and "(Every Time I Turn Around) Back in Love Again" (#4, 1977), he displayed the influence of Motown, Johnny Mathis, and Sarah Vaughan.

After a decade with L.T.D., Osborne went solo, enlisting veteran jazz-rock fusion keyboardist George Duke as producer. With "On the Wings of Love" from his self-titled debut scoring #29 in 1982, Osborne blueprinted the glossy soul-music approach that would become his mainstay. In 1986 his "You Should Be Mine (The Woo Woo Song)" reached #13; a year later, his Burt Bacharach-written duet with Dionne Warwick, "Love Power," became a #12 hit. He recorded "She's on the Left," a #1 R&B (#48 pop, 1988). Since then, while his singing style has provoked comparisons to Teddy Pendergrass and Luther Vandross, he has yet to deliver on the potential for first-rank stardom he displayed with L.T.D. His self-produced 2000 release, That's for Sure, found him in fine ballad style.

Joan Osborne

Born July 8, 1962, Anchorage, KY

1991—Soul Show (Womanly Hips Music) 1993—Blue Million Miles EP 1995—Relish (Blue Gorilla/Mercury) 1996—Early Recordings 2000—Righteous Love (Interscope).

Born and raised outside of Louisville, Kentucky, Joan Osborne moved to New York in the mid-'80s to study film at New York University. She shifted to music after being coaxed by friends to sing an old gospel standard at a jam session at a local club. Proving a natural at blues belting in the style of Etta James and Janis Joplin, she returned the following week and was soon performing with her own band.

After two releases on her own Womanly Hips label (the live Soul Show and the EP Blue Million Miles), Osborne began writing songs with producer Rick Chertoff and former Hooters members Eric Bazilian and Rob Hyman in 1993. The results became Relish (#9, 1995), which was released on Chertoff's Mercury-distributed Blue Gorilla label. "One of Us," a Bazilian song imagining God as "a slob like one of us," climbed to #4. The album went triple platinum and was nominated for seven Grammys in 1996. (It won none.)

Apart from the Early Recordings (1996) compilation, Osborne would take five years to release her followup to Relish, in part because Mercury dropped her after rejecting the album she turned in. In the interim, she toured with Sarah McLachlan's Lilith Fair festival, studied Qawwali singing with Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan in Pakistan, and recorded a duet of "Chimes of Freedom" with Bob Dylan for the TV miniseries The '60s. The time off the radio took its toll, however, when Osborne returned with the Mitchell Froom-produced Righteous Love (on new label Interscope) in 2000, it peaked at #90. Concurrent with the album's release, Osborne launched her online women's interest magazine, Heroine Magazine.

Ozzy Osbourne

Born John Osbourne, Dec. 3, 1948, Birmingham, Eng.

1980—Blizzard of Ozz (Jet) 1981—Diary of a Madman 1982—Speak of the Devil 1983—Bark at the Moon (CBS Associated) 1986—The Ultimate Sin 1987—Tribute 1988—No Rest for the Wicked 1990—Just Say Ozzy

1991—No More Tears (Epic) 1993—Live & Loud 1995—Ozzmosis 1997—The OzzFest, vol. 1: Live (Red Ant); The Ozzman Cometh.

With Black Sabbath: see entry.

Onetime lead singer with Black Sabbath [see entry], Ozzy Osbourne traded on his former band's legacy of loud hard rock and mystical/occult trappings, and his own propensity for grossly outrageous acts, to become one of heavy metal's best-loved and most successful frontmen.

"I'm not a musician," Osbourne once claimed, "I'm a ham." In 1981, at an L.A. meeting of Columbia Records executives, Ozzy bit the head off a live dove; a few months later he bit the head off a bat tossed to him by a fan at a Des Moines concert. (Osborne claims to have thought it was a rubber toy.) The latter incident resulted in the singer receiving a series of rabies shots.

Osbourne has said there was "a lot of insanity" in his family: that he'd made several suicide attempts, as early as age 14, "just to see what it would feel like"; that at one point he and Black Sabbath drummer Bill Ward took acid every day for two years; and that his last months with Black Sabbath in 1978 were "very unhappy I got very drunk and very stoned every single day."

Osbourne's first two solo LPs went double platinum, and in 1981 "You Can't Kill Rock 'n' Roll" garnered heavy FM-AOR airplay. Then, on March 19, 1982, near Orlando, Florida, Ozzy's tour plane, which was buzzing his tour bus, crashed. Osbourne and most of his band were in the bus and unhurt, but his guitarist, Randy Rhoads; hairdresser Rachel Youngblood, and pilot/bus driver Andrew Aycock were all in the plane, and all were killed. Rhoads was replaced within a few weeks by Brad (Night Ranger) Gillis, and the show went on. Later that year, Osbourne married his manager, Sharon Arden. He also recorded a live album, Speak of the Devil, at the Ritz in New York. Each of his succeeding albums, except for the 1990 Just Say Ozzy, went at least platinum (Bark at the Moon and No More Tears went double platinum). Tribute (#6, 1987) included live recordings featuring Randy Rhoads, from 1981.

For Osbourne, 1986 was particularly eventful. In April he was fined several thousand dollars by the New Jersey Meadowlands after his fans trashed the arena during a concert, that summer, he made his movie debut as an antirock minister in the horror film Trick or Treat, and toward the end of the year, he disappeared for three weeks—eventually turning up at California's Betty Ford Clinic, where he'd checked in to battle his alcoholism.

A favorite whipping boy of the religious right, Osbourne was the target of an antirock sermon delivered in early 1990 by New York City's John Cardinal O'Connor. Between 1985 and 1990, Osbourne was sued by three different sets of parents (two from Georgia, one from California), all claiming his song "Suicide Solution," from Blizzard of Ozz, had induced their sons to commit suicide. (Lamenting the death of AC/DC's Bon Scott, the song is clearly antialcohol and anti-suicide.) Osbourne prevailed in every suit.

In 1991 Osbourne announced his No More Tours Tour to support No More Tears—an alleged farewell jaunt, during which he broke a foot while jumping around onstage in Chicago and later caused a near-riot in Irvine, California, when he invited his audience onstage. (That show, billed as a benefit to fund replacement of Randy Rhoads' graffiti-covered tombstone, broke even once Osbourne paid damages to the venue.) In October 1992 the tour brought Osbourne to San Antonio, Texas—the first time he'd played there since February 1982, when he'd been banned from the city for urinating on the Alamo. (Osbourne has also been banned, for various reasons and lengths of time, from Boston, Baton Rouge, Corpus Christi, Las Vegas, and Philadelphia.) Osbourne's two tour-ending shows in Costa Mesa, California, were opened by Black Sabbath—with Judas Priest's Rob Halford replacing Sabbath singer Ronnie James Dio, who refused to open for his predecessor. Osbourne did a four-song miniset with Sabbath at the final show. The tour produced the Live & Loud album, which earned Osbourne his first Grammy nomination, for Best Metal Performance for the track "I Don't Wanna Change the World."

Only weeks after the tour ended, Osbourne's publicists said he might indeed tour again, but not as a solo act. Alleged financial bickering scuttled subsequent negotiations for a 1993 Ozzy-Sabbath reunion tour. In spring 1994 he recorded a version of Sabbath's "Iron Man"—originally recorded when he was still in the band—with Irish band Therapy? for the Sabbath tribute album Nativity in Black. His next album was Ozzmosis, which sold 3 million copies and hit #4 in 1995. With the subsequent tour a major success, Osbourne in 1996 launched Ozzfest, a heavy rock-themed package tour that grew into one of the top summer concert attractions of the late '90s and helped to boost the careers of acts such as Marilyn Manson and Pantera. An album, The OzzFest, Vol. 1: Live documented the tour's inaugural dates. By 1997, the event prompted a Black Sabbath reunion. A double CD, Reunion, was released the next year, and the group headlined a 1999 tour to promote it.

Osibisa was by no means the first band to play a cross between Western pop and African traditional music, but it was the first to become more popular in the West than in Africa. The band was made up of both African and Caribbean musicians.

Teddy Osei's career began over a decade before he formed Osibisa in England; in the late '50s and early '60s, he played sax with a highlife band, the Comets, in Kumasi, Ghana. In 1962 he went to England on a Ghanaian government scholarship to study at the London College of Music. He led a number of bands in London, among them Cat's Paw in the late '60s; that band included Ghanaian younger brother Mac Tontoh's longtime friend Sol Amarfo, with whom Osei recorded a film soundtrack in London in 1969. They formed a quartet with Nigerian drummer Remi Kabaka, until Kabaka joined Ginger Baker's Air Force.

By 1970, West Indians Wendell Richardson and Robert Bailey had joined, and they named themselves with the West African Akan word for a certain dance rhythm. Spartacus R., a West Indian, and Loughy Amao, a West African, joined in time to record a demo tape that BBC radio aired before record companies heard it. The music was an original fusion of polyrhythmic African percussion, rock guitar, keyboard riffs, and R&B-style horn charts: songs were in Akan and in English.

After a series of London club dates, Osibisa signed with Decca. The group's debut album, produced by Tony Visconti, made the U.K. Top 10 and the U.S. Top 60. In the next year, Osibisa toured Europe, North America, and Africa, and in the following year traveled to the Orient and Australia. Everywhere, the colorfully costumed band appeared on television; in Great Britain, the BBC devoted a special to Osibisa. Its music was further spread by the soundtrack to Superfly TNT and by Art Garfunkel's 1973 cover of Amarfo's "Woyaya."

By 1973, when Osibisa signed with Warner Bros., half of the original group had left. Richardson sat in for Paul Kossoff on Free's 1973 U.S. tour, then made a solo album, Pieces of a Jigsaw, before rejoining Osibisa in 1975. In 1976, after moving to Island Records' Antilles label, the group had its biggest hit, "Sunshine Day" (#17 UK.), from Welcome Home, but the members disbanded the following year. In 1980 Osei, Amarfo, and Tontoh reunited for Mystic Nights, made with session musicians. Osibisa continued to tour internationally.

The Osmonds are the longest-running—not to mention the largest—family dynasty in show business. Beginning in 1962, when brothers Alan, Wayne, Merrill, and Jay got their first professional break, until the present, few years have passed without at least one Osmond on the charts, the television, or the stage. In 1972 alone, the Osmonds received more gold records in a single year than any other group in history, including the Beatles. Between January 24, 1971, and November 6, 1978, the RIAA certified a total of 23 gold discs recorded either by the Osmonds or by Donny and Marie Osmond as solo acts or as a duo: five LPs and three singles by the Osmonds; four LPs and five singles by Donny; one single by Marie; and four LPs and one single by Donny and Marie. But their recording success, coming as it did nearly 15 years after the group formed, proved anything but a fluke. And although at one time or another various Osmond family members seemed down for the count careerwise, they never fail to rebound. In addition to the Osmond Brothers (which also now includes Jimmy), Donny Osmond, and Marie Osmond, the family has produced a second generation of performers destined to carry the Osmond name into the sixth decade.

All of the Osmond progeny were taught music by their parents, George and Olive, and raised in a strict Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS, or Mormon) environment. They began singing religious and barbershop-quartet songs with their parents, Alan, Wayne, and Merrill, later joined by Jay, originally began performing locally to earn money to finance the two-year religious missions the boys planned to serve after completing high school. Their mastery of barbershop harmony impressed even professional singers. Their big break came when in 1962 the Osmond Brothers (at the time, Alan, Jay, Merrill, and Wayne) went to Disneyland wearing identical suits and were invited to perform by the house barbershop quartet. They made their national television debut on "Disneyland After Dark," a taped musical segment shown occasionally on Walt Disney's Wonderful World of Color. On the recommendation of his father, Jay, Andy Williams auditioned them and invited them on to his TV variety series, where they were regulars from 1962 to 1971 (Donny joined in 1963). During their tenure with Williams, they performed every type of music imaginable, often in intricately choreographed numbers involving everything from tap dancing to roller-skating. So well rehearsed were they that they became known throughout the industry as "the one-take Osmonds." In the mid-'60s, the five Osmonds also did TV shows with Jerry Lewis and toured with Pat Boone and Phyllis Diller.

By the time the boys began recording, they'd all learned to play instruments and, through diligent touring, had become a mammoth MOR attraction, performing in top theaters as well as in hotel showrooms throughout the country, including in Las Vegas. As successful as they were, the older brothers, led by Alan, loved rock & roll and were intent on changing with the times, even though this posed a major career risk. In 1970 producer Mike Curb teamed the group with Fame Studios producer Rick Hall, known for his work with Aretha Franklin, Wilson Pickett, and other soul giants. In Muscle Shoals, Alabama, he produced the first in a string of hits, including their gold debut effort, the Jacksons-style "One Bad Apple" (#1, 1971). The group was criticized in some quarters for "imitating" the Jacksons; ironically, Jackson patriarch Joseph had his children study the Osmonds on the Williams show in their preprofessional days. Other 1971 hit singles for the Osmonds included "Double Lovin'" (#14), "I Can't Stop" (#96), and the million-selling "Yo-Yo" (#3). The Osmonds' record company then decided to cash in on young Donny's popularity with preadolescent girls and, against the wishes of Donny and his brothers, began recording him as a solo artist. Donny's million-selling debut single, "Sweet and Innocent" (#7) set the pattern for bubblegum success. Donny's solo singles were not only teenybopper fodder, but—unlike the hits of his teen-magazine "nval" David Cassidy—they were teenybopper classics of an earlier era. Donny hit gold again with "Go Away Little Girl" (#1). The year 1972 brought more hits: Donny's "Hey Girl/I Knew You When" (#9) and the Osmonds' hard-rocking original "Down by the Lazy River" (#4) both went gold. The Osmonds had further hits with "Hold Her Tight" (#14, 1972) and "Goin'

Home" (#36, 1973). Donny hit with the singles "Puppy Love" (#3), "Why" (#13), and "Too Young" (#13) in 1972, and "The Twelfth of Never" (#8, 1973) and "A Million to One/Young Love" (#23, 1973). Four of their albums—Osmonds, Phase-III, The Osmonds "Live," and Crazy Horses—were Top 20 and, along with Homemade (#22, 1971), gold.

While their success was indisputable, critics had a field day trashing their wholesome, "unhip" image. To their credit, the group remained true to their religious and personal values, and were not shy about discussing their beliefs, though they did not proselytize. Interestingly, in most other parts of the world in the early to mid-'70s, the Osmonds were considered a bona fide rock band, far better known for the heavy-metal crunch of "Crazy Horses" than Donny's bubblegum hits. In England, particularly, "Osmond mania" reached Fab Four proportions with fans overrunning Heathrow Airport to greet the boys. In France, where "Crazy Horses" was a major hit, their audience comprised hippies and bikers.

In 1973 the brothers released The Plan (#58, 1973), their first of six albums not to go gold. The group's pet project, this concept album explains man's spiritual evolution from an LDS perspective (although anyone unfamiliar with LDS beliefs would not discern that). Delivered to select FM stations without the group identified, The Plan did receive some airplay—until programmers realized it was an Osmonds album. After Love Me for a Reason (#47, 1974), none of the group's albums cracked the Top 100 again.

In 1973 Marie, who had toured and performed with her brothers sporadically through the years (she made her television debut on The Andy Williams Show at age four), made her recording debut with the #1 country & western hit "Paper Roses" (#5 pop, 1973). Little Jimmy Osmond began recording, too. His debut LP and single, "Long Haired Lover From Liverpool," made the U.S. Top 40 in 1972 and topped the U.K. chart for six weeks. But he was most successful in the foreign market, particularly in Japan, where he was known affectionately as "Jimmy Boy" and later had his own television series. By the early '90s, Jimmy (who was doing his own business tax returns before he was old enough to drive) had become the family's business mastermind with a financial empire built on savvy real estate investments and events production.

Following a guest-host stint on Mike Douglas' show, Donny and Marie were offered their own weekly musical variety series by ABC. Reluctantly, they agreed, in part because the family viewed the series as a way to get away from the near-constant touring that had dominated their lives (the entire family traveled together) for the past decade. Donny and Marie were just 18 and 16 respectively when The Donny and Marie Show debuted in test episode in November 1975. Though the pair was out front, it was a very much a family effort, with various brothers producing, directing, and overseeing the music. To do so, they put their music career on hold with it, it turned out, disastrous results. Partway through the show's three-year run, the family decided to relocate back to Utah. There they invested their considerable fortune in a state-of-the-art television and recording studio, from which the show was produced. When the series was canceled after three years, the studio failed to bring in the projected business. That and other business mishaps resulted in the family losing literally everything they had. (Some estimates place losses as high as $70 million.) Though because of the way the business partnership was structured, individual family members were personally liable for debts, father George Osmond flatly refused to consider declaring bankruptcy, which he considered dishonorable. Instead, the family hit the road.

Through the '80s, Marie emerged as the star of the family. She continued her success on the country charts with a number of hits, including the C&W #1 singles "Meet Me in Montana" (a duet with Dan Seals, 1985), "There's No Stopping Your Heart" (1985), and "You're Still New to Me" (a duet with Paul Davis, 1986). In the mid-'90s, she toured in The Sound of Music, and made her Broadway debut in The King and I.

Meanwhile, Donny's career was in a nosedive. In March 1982 he appeared on Broadway in George M. Cohan's musical Little Johnny Jones, which closed on opening night. He headed his own production company for a number of years before returning to recording in the late '80s. Peter Gabriel invited Osmond to record in his Bath, England, studio and helped him secure a deal with Virgin (U.K.). Released in 1988, Donny Osmond (#54, 1989) looked like a flop. Donny was ready to start a home-security business in Utah when a program director at New York's WPLJ started playing "Soldier of Love" without identifying the singer. After several weeks of suspense, the "mystery artist" was revealed, and the single hit #2 in 1989. Other charting singles from that album were "Sacred Emotion" (#13, 1989) and "Hold On" (#73, 1989). Eyes Don't Lie didn't make the Hot 100, but it contained "My Love Is a Fire" (#21, 1990). Osmond, by then anxious to shirk his old teenybopper image, surprised many people by speaking out against the PMRC in 1985 and gently mocking his old image in the video for Jeff Beck's "Ambitious." In 1992 he joined a Canadian company of Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat in the title role. Over his six years in the role, the production broke records in several cities. Ten years after "Soldier of Love," Donny was back. During that time, however, he began experiencing severe panic attacks that nearly ended his career, and he was diagnosed with social phobia. Since going public with this, in 1998, he has worked to raise awareness about anxiety disorders.

The Osmond Brothers, sans Donny and plus Jimmy, turned to country music with instant success. They were named Billboard's top new singles group in 1982, after "I Think About Your Lovin'" (#17 C&W, 1982) put them back on the chart (until 1986, they would chart 10 more C&W singles). In Branson, Missouri, they own, operate, and perform at the Osmond Family Theater, one of the town's top attractions. Alan, who has multiple sclerosis, speaks about the disorder and has written children's books. Wayne was cured of brain cancer in the mid-'90s.

The family founded the Osmond Foundation for the deaf (two of the group's older brothers, Virl and Tom, were born deaf). In the early '80s, the foundation was expanded and is affiliated with the Children's Miracle Network Telethon, which was cofounded by Marie and actor John Schneider and raises money for children's hospitals.

In 1998 Donny and Marie returned to television with their syndicated talk show, Donny & Marie. Produced by Dick Clark, the series fared better than many competitors but ran for only two seasons. In the summer of 1999, Marie experienced severe postpartum depression following the birth of her seventh child. In 1999 Donny published his best-selling autobiography, Life Is Just What You Make It: My Story So Far (cownritten with Patricia Romanowski). In 2001 the family authorized a made-for-television movie of their rock & roll era, The Osmonds, which further revealed the triumphs and tragedies of a family that has seen more of both than most. In her 2001 best-selling autobiography, Behind the Smile, Marie revealed that she had been sexually abused as a child (by someone outside her family) and discussed her bouts with postpartum depression.

In 2000 Donny played Joseph in the David Mallett-directed video version of Dreamcoat, costarring Sir Richard Attenborough and Joan Collins. Also that year he duetted with housewife-turned-pop-star Suzy K on her hit "Now I Know." The following year, he released his collection of Broadway and pop standards, This Is the Moment. It debuted at #10 in the U.K. and peaked at #64 in the U.S.

Johnny Otis

Born John Veliotes, Dec. 8, 1921, Vallejo, CA
 1969—Cold Shot (Kent) 1970—Cuttin' Up (Epic) 1971—Live at Monterey; The Original Johnny Otis Show (Savoy)
 1981—The New Johnny Otis Show (Alligator) 1989—The Capitol Years (Capitol) 1993—Spirit of the Black Territory Bands (Johnny Otis and His Orchestra) (Arhoolie) 1995—Too Late to Holler (Night Train/City Hall) 1997—Johnny Otis R&B Dance Party, vol. 1 (J&T) 1998—Johnny Otis Blues and Swing Dance Party, vol. 1 1999—Blues, Bounce, Beat, Boogie, Bebop and Ballads (Blue Boar); The Complete Savoy Recordings (Savoy) 2000—Cold Shot (J&T).

As a talent scout and bandleader, Johnny Otis was a central figure in the development of rhythm & blues and rock & roll in the early '50s. He was born of Greek-American parents, but from his childhood, he lived among blacks and in fact considered himself black. As he later wrote in his autobiography, Listen to the Lambs, "I did not become black because I was attracted to Negro music. My attitude was formed long before I moved into the music field."

In his Berkeley neighborhood, Otis became interested in blues, gospel, and swing, and in his teens became an accomplished drummer, dropping out of high school to play in the Bay Area and tour the Southwest with various swing bands. In 1941 he married his wife, Phyllis, a black woman; they had five children. By the mid-'40s Otis had his own big band, but when the big-band format lost popularity, he stripped his crew down to a nine-piece group with small horn and rhythm sections, which became a standard rhythm & blues lineup. In 1945 he had his first regional hit with a version of "Harlem Nocturne." That year he also played drums on Johnny Moore's Three Blazers hit "Drifting Blues." In 1951 he discovered a group called the Royals (that would later be known as Hank Ballard and the Midnighters). In 1948 Otis and a partner, Bardu Ali, opened a popular Watts nightclub, the Barrelhouse Club. It closed in the early '50s after Otis made a series of R&B hits featuring singers he had discovered in L.A.: Little Esther Phillips, Mel Walker, and the Robins, who would later become known nationally as the Coasters.

"Double Crossing Blues" (#1 R&B), "Mistrustin' Blues" (#1 R&B), "Deceivin' Blues" (#4 R&B), "Dreamin' Blues" (#8 R&B), "Wedding Boogie" (#6 R&B), "Far Away Christmas Blues" (#4 pop, #6 R&B), and "Rockin' Blues" (#21 pop, #2 R&B) were all hits in 1950. In 1952 "Sunset to Dawn," sung by Mel Walker, was a #10 R&B hit. From 1950 to 1954, the Johnny Otis Rhythm and Blues Caravan touring revue traveled across the U.S. with then-unknown performers including Hank Ballard, Little Willie John, Big Mama Thornton, and Jackie Wilson. Otis heard Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller's "Hound Dog," and he produced Thornton's version of it. "Every Beat of My Heart," written by Otis in the early '50s, became Gladys Knight and the Pips' first hit in 1961 and has been covered regularly ever since.

In 1954 Otis quit the road for a DJ spot at L.A.'s KFOX, later landing a television show in the late '50s. But he hadn't given up music, and in 1958 he had his biggest hit with the Bo Diddley-style "Willie and the Hand Jive" (#9 pop, #5 R&B). For most of the '60s, Otis' musical career was dormant, though he was very active in the civil-rights movement and politics. His mid-'60s book, Listen to the Lambs, concerned the 1965 Watts riot and also told the story of his life.

With his guitarist son Johnny Otis Jr., or "Shuggie," Johnny Otis returned to recording with Cold Shot (1969), Cuttin' Up (1970), and The Johnny Otis Show Live at Monterey (1971), a double album reuniting his old band and singers. Otis recorded a number of early R&B artists for his Blues Spectrum label, including Louis Jordan, Charles Brown, Big Joe Turner, Eddie "Cleanhead" Vinson, Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, and himself. In 1978 Otis became an ordained minister and founded the nondenominational Landmark Community Church in L.A. He is also an accomplished painter, author, and sculptor. His 1993 Spirit of the Black Territory Bands featured a '40s-style big band. For a time he performed in his Johnny Otis Cabaret in California, which has since closed. In 1994 he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. He continues to tour, and he remains a presence on the radio. As of 2000 he was teaching a course about African-American music at the University of California at Berkeley.

Shuggie Otis

Born Johnny Otis Jr., Nov. 30, 1953, Los Angeles, CA
 1969—Kooper Session: Al Kooper Introduces Shuggie Otis (Columbia) 1970—Here Comes Shuggie Otis (Epic) 1971—

Freedom Flight 1975—Inspiration Information; Preston Love's Omaha Bar-B-Q (Kent); Shuggie's Boogie: Shuggie Otis Plays the Blues (Epic/Legacy).

Johnny Otis' son Shuggie was a prodigy, playing bass professionally with a jazz band in San Diego at 12 and joining his father's band as guitarist and doing session work on guitar, bass, organ, piano, and harmonica by 13. Cold Shot, which featured Shuggie on guitar, brought him to the attention of Al Kooper, who teamed up with Shuggie for the loose jam of Kooper Session. The younger Otis played bass on Frank Zappa's Hot Rats and guitar on violinist SugaCane Harris' first solo LP. After three more albums he retired in 1975 at age 22; in 1977 his "Strawberry Letter 23" was a Top 5 hit for the Brothers Johnson. An appearance on The New Johnny Otis Show in 1981 was his first recording in several years, aside from session work on his father's Blues Spectrum label. He and his brother Nick, a drummer, still play in their father's band. Shuggie Otis' '90s backing band, the Otis Connection, also features Nick, as well as Shuggie's son, Lucky. In 2001 a repackaged version of Inspiration Information (released by David Byrne's Luaka Bop label) spurred a rediscovery of Otis.

John Otway

Born Oct. 2, 1952, Aylesbury, Eng.

1977—John Otway + Wild Willy Barrett (Polydor, U.K.)

1978—Deep and Meaningless 1979—Where Did I Go Right?

1980—Way and Bar; Deep Thought (Stiff) 1982—All Balls and No Willy 1989—The Wimp and the Wild 1995—Premature Adulation (Amazing Feet).

One of the great eccentric footnotes to rock history, John Otway's only hit came on his 1977 single, "(Cor Baby, That's) Really Free" (#27 U.K.). He has spent the rest of his career trying to replicate that success with a combination of constant touring in England, lunatic, hyperactive performances, and a series of ever more bizarre publicity stunts. The Who's Pete Townshend signed Otway and partner Wild Willy Barrett to Track Records in 1974 and produced two flop singles. Otway was signed by Polydor during the punk explosion of 1977, even though his sound was closer to pub rock. The label suggested he recut "Cor Baby" in a more anarchic style, and Otway had "the Hit." His followup, "Geneve," a ballad recorded with an orchestra, puzzled his fans and disappeared without a trace, as did his three Polydor albums. When the label dropped him, Otway staged "Polython," a benefit concert that raised £1,500 for his former employers. He moved on to Stiff in 1980. To promote his cover of Gene Pitney's "The Man Who Shot Liberty Valence," the label pressed three copies without Otway's vocal; he would personally visit the homes of fans who bought the instrumental versions and add the vocal "live." After two albums Stiff, too, dropped him. Undeterred by his lack of success, Otway plowed on. He "signed" Warner Bros. as his record label in 1986, sending them a £200 advance and releasing "Jerusalem" with a counterfeit Warner label. Warners eventually released a legitimate version of the single, which sold about 50 copies. In 1990 he wrote an autobiography, Cor Baby. It's Really Me (Rock and Roll's Greatest Failure). It sold more copies than any of his records. In 1995 Otway released his first album of new material in 12 years, Premature Adulation. Four years later, Otway received unexpected vindication when BBC listeners placed his song "Beware of the Flowers Cause I'm Sure They're Going to Get You Yeh"—the B side of his sole hit—seventh in a poll to find the nation's favorite lyrics. He finished ahead of Leonard Cohen, Paul Simon, and Bob Dylan. Otway remains active; by 1999, he estimated he had played more than 3,000 shows.

OutKast

Formed 1993, Atlanta, GA

Dré (b. Andre Lauren Benjamin, May 27, 1975, Atlanta), voc.; Big Boi (b. Antwan Andre Patton, Feb. 1, 1975, Savannah, GA), voc.

1994—Southernplayalisticadillacmuzik (LaFace) 1996—

ATLiens 1998—Aquemini 2000—Stankonia.

Inspired by the Afrocentric psychedelics of George Clinton and Sly Stone, OutKast created an idiosyncratic sound blending funk and Southern bump. Dré and Big Boi met during the 10th grade at Tri-Cities High School in Atlanta. Shortly before Big Boi graduated (Dré dropped out during his junior year to focus on music), OutKast signed with LaFace as the label's first rap act and began working on its debut album Southernplayalisticadillacmuzik (#20 pop, #3 R&B, 1994). The album's first single, "Player's Ball" (#37 pop, #12 R&B, 1994), went gold and helped put Atlanta on the map as a hip-hop city.

The group's sophomore effort, ATLiens (#2 pop, 1996), yielded the catchy "Elevators (me & you)" (#12 pop, #5 R&B, 1996) and peaked at #1 on the R&B albums chart. The Grammy-nominated Aquemini (#2 pop, #2 R&B, 1998) distinguished Dré and Big Boi as capable producers/songwriters, and featured funk forefather George Clinton on the song "Synthesizer." Another Aquemini track, "Rosa Parks" (#55 pop, #19 R&B, 1999), spawned some legal controversy when the civil-rights heroine sued OutKast for using her name to promote their music (the suit was dismissed in 1999). In 2000 OutKast released Stankonia (#2 pop and R&B), its most critically acclaimed album. Stankonia's "Ms. Jackson" was inspired by Dré's breakup with his longtime girlfriend, singer Erykah Badu.

OutKast

Henry Paul Band: 1979—Grey Ghost (Atlantic) 1980—Feel the Heat 1981—Anytime 1982—Henry Paul.

Tampa's Outlaws built a solid audience by merging Eagles-style country rock and vocal harmonies (Eagles' producer Bill Szymczyk produced Hurry Sundown) and Allman Brothers-style twin-guitar Southern rock. The Outlaws were managed by Alan Walden, who felt it an impropriety to enter a business relationship with his brother Phil, who ran Capricorn; the Outlaws became Clive Davis' first Arista signing. Their name notwithstanding, the Outlaws were considerably smoother-sounding than fellow Southern rockers Molly Hatchet and 38 Special, with whom they shared an initial audience and touring circuit. The Outlaws appeared sporadically on the pop chart with "There Goes Another Love Song" (#34, 1975), two minor hits, and "(Ghost) Riders in the Sky" (#31, 1980). Henry Paul led his own band after leaving the Outlaws in 1977, but in 1983 he rejoined the group. Ghost Riders, Bring It Back Alive, and Outlaws all went gold. In 1993 Paul formed Blackhawk. In 1994 the Outlaws mounted the Southern Spirit package tour with the Marshall Tucker Band and 38 Special. Jones and O'Keefe died within weeks of one another in 1995. Guitarist Hughie Thomasson has been active in the latter-day version of Lynyrd Skynyrd. Former guitarist Freddie Salem opened a club in his native Akron, Ohio.

Buck Owens

Born Alvis Edgar Owens Jr., Aug. 12, 1929, Sherman, TX 1961—Under Your Spell Again (Capitol) 1963—On the Bandstand 1964—Best of Buck Owens; Together Again 1965—I've Got a Tiger by the Tail 1966—Dust on Mother's Bible; The Carnegie Hall Concert 1967—Buck Owens and His Buckaroos in Japan; Your Tender Loving Care 1968—The Best of Buck Owens, vol. 2 1972—Too Old to Cut the Mustard 1976—Buck 'Em! (Warner Bros.) 1979—Our Old Mansion 1981—Love Don't Make the Bars (Capitol) 1988—Hot Dog!; Buck Owens and the Buckaroos Live at Carnegie Hall (Country Music Foundation) 1990—All-Time Greatest Hits, vol. 1 (Curb) 1992—The Buck Owens Collection 1959–1990 (Rhino).

Chief purveyor, along with Merle Haggard, of the honky-tonk music dubbed the Bakersfield Sound (after his California home base), Buck Owens was a top-selling country artist in the '60s and cohost of the country comedy television show Hee Haw from 1969 to 1986. Emerging from semiretirement in 1987, he gained a new audience with longtime fan and neotraditionalist Dwight Yoakam when the pair released a Top 10 country single, "The Streets of Bakersfield."

Owens nicknamed himself Buck after a favorite mule when he was just three. His farming family settled in Arizona in the '30s. At 16, he was marned and an accomplished guitarist; he moved to Bakersfield at age 21. As a session player in nearby L.A., he worked with Gene Vincent, Sonny James, and Stan Freberg. He formed the Schoolhouse Playboys in 1951 and recorded rockabilly using the name Corky Jones.

Signed to Capitol, he released under his own name the #4 hit "Under Your Spell Again" in 1959; its success kicked off an astonishing run of 75 charting country singles that continued into the early '80s (42 made the Top 10; 20 reached #1). Among his #1 sellers, delivered in an appealing, almost pleading tenor voice and backed by his crack band the Buckaroos, were 1963's "Act Naturally" (covered later by the Beatles), "I've Got a Tiger by the Tail" (1965), "Waitin' in Your Welfare Line" (1966), and "Open Up Your Heart" (1966). Resisting the string-laden, pop-oriented productions of contemporary Nashville, the Buckaroos favored a rootsy style confined to drums, pedal steel, two guitars, and the occasional fiddle; Owens' 1969 version of Chuck Berry's "Johnny B. Goode" revealed his rockabilly beginnings and the populist sympathies of the Bakersfield Sound. His songs have been covered by artists as diverse as Ray Charles ("Crying Time") and Emmylou Harris ("Together Again"), and Owens himself has released over 100 albums.

By his own account overexposed during his 16 years with the hugely popular but critically derided Hee Haw, Owens spent the latter '70s in semiretirement. During that time, he mourned the loss of Buckaroos guitarist Don Rich, who was killed in a 1974 motorcycle wreck. He concentrated on his business affairs, which included running several radio stations and a recording studio, until Dwight Yoakam encouraged him in the late '80s to return to active performing. The resulting albums, 1988's Hot Dog! and a box set, 1992's The Buck Owens Collection 1959-1990, revived interest in Owens, an interest confirmed in 1996 by his induction into the Country Music Hall of Fame and the Nashville Songwriters Hall of Fame. Around that time, he opened the $8 million Crystal Palace, a nightclub-museum in Bakersfield. The business venture proved successful, adding to his reported $100 million fortune. Owens joined Yoakam again in 2000, singing on tracks on Yoakam's Tomorrow's Sounds Today.

Supe and the Sandwiches (with Michael Granda): 1997—The Springfield Chronicles (Missouri Mule Music).

The Garbonzos (with Michael Granda): 1998—Eat Our Beans (Missouri Mule Music).

Growing out of a Springfield assemblage called Cosmic Corncob and His Amazing Mountain Daredevils, this unusually eclectic country-rock unit first came to national attention with "If You Wanna Get to Heaven" (#25, 1974). Mixing Appalachian and hillbilly string music with Southern boogie and country pop, the Ozark Mountain Daredevils released three fairly successful albums. Their 1973 eponymously titled debut went gold and peaked at #26. It'll Shine When It Shines, which included "Jackie Blue" (#3, 1975), was their highest-charting album, at #19.

The group's hold on the pop chart slipped after that, however. Chowning left in 1976 for a solo career. As of early 2001, Cash, Dillon, and Granda (with additional members) continue to perform throughout the U.S., they released a new studio album, 13, in 1997. Starting in the '80s, Granda—now based in Nashville—developed his solo work, participating in groups such as the Dog People, Supe and the Sandwiches, and the Garbonzos. Latter-day drummer Steve Canaday died in a plane crash.

Augustus Pablo

Born Horace Swaby, ca. 1953, Kingston, Jam.; died May 18, 1999, Kingston

Dub producer, composer, arranger, keyboardist, Augustus Pablo is one of the most distinguished names in reggae. He was equally renowned as the foremost exponent of the melodica, which has been used by numerous reggae artists as well as by Joe Jackson, the Clash, Gang of Four, and Cyndi Lauper's onetime backing band, the Hooters.

While still calling himself Horace Swaby, Pablo taught himself piano at Kingston College School and played organ at the local church. One day, he borrowed a melodica from a girlfriend and became fascinated by it. Bob Marley took young Swaby into his Kingston studios, where in 1969–70 Swaby contributed melodica lines to Lee Perry-produced Wailers tracks such as "Sun Is Shining," "Kaya," and "Memphis." Pablo has also led backing bands for Jimmy Cliff and Burning Spear and was at one time a member of Sly Dunbar's Skin, Flesh and Bones Band.

In 1971 producer Herman Chin-Loy gave Pablo his nom de disc, and the following year Pablo had his first hit single, "Java," which established his distinctive sound: Reggae rhythms supporting sinuous minor-key melodica and organ lines, and exotic modalities that Pablo termed "Far Eastern." He had reportedly claimed the influence of Modern Jazz Quartet vibraphonist Milt Jackson.

Around 1973, Pablo came under the sway of King Tubby, who with Lee Perry was one of the first dub producers. Pablo's King Tubby Meets Rockers Uptown is a landmark of dub; tunes are remixed almost beyond recognition. Pablo's most formidable trait was his unique (within dub) focus on melody; he made a long-running practice of dubbing such pop tunes as "Fiddler on the Roof" (in both Uptown's "Say So" and East of the River Nile's "Jah Light"), "Old Man River" (This Is Augustus Pablo's "Jah Rock"), Rod McKuen's "Jean" (Pablo Nuh Jester's "Fat Jean"), and Bill Withers' "Ain't No Sunshine" (Original Rockers' "Thunder Clap"), as well as following standard dub practice revamping reggae hits (including Marley's "Dem Belly Full" as "Pablo Meets Mr. Bassie," on the album of the same name).

Pablo's penchant for melodicism, and the near-New Age pastoral lyricism of his arrangements, set him further and further apart from the reggae mainstream through the '80s and '90s. Only on Rockers Comes East did Pablo flirt with the synth-heavy computer-rhythm sound that had come to dominate dub. On his next album, 1990's Blowing With the Wind, he returned to his trademark plaintive riffs, mellow grooves, and melodic/string-synth/vibraphone colorations. Pablo normally spent most of his time seeking inspiration in the remote hillsides outside of Kingston. In 1985 he played a rare U.S. concert at the Kitchen in New York City, and he undertook his only full-scale U.S. tour a year later. Valley of Jehosaphat would be his last new studio album: Within weeks of its release, Pablo died of complications from the degenerative nerve disorder myasthenia gravis. Obituaries noted his influence on such trip-hop units as England's Massive Attack.

Formed 1973, San Francisco, CA

Dave Jenkins (b. FL), gr., bass, voc.; Cory Lerios (b. CA), kybds., voc.; Bud Cockrell (b. MS), bass, voc.; Steve Price (b. CA), drums.

1975—Pablo Cruise (A&M) 1976—Life Line 1977—A Place in the Sun (- Cockrell; + Bruce Day [b. CA], bass, voc.) 1978—Worlds Away 1980—Part of the Game (- Day; + John Pierce, bass, voc.; + Angelo Rossi, gr., voc.) 1981—Reflector (- Price; + David Perper, drums, voc.; - Rossi; + Stef Birnbaum, gr.) 1983—Out of Our Hands 1984—(group disbands) 1988—Classics, vol. 26 1997—(group re-forms: Jenkins; Cockrell; + James Henry, perc.; + Billy Johnson, drums; + Kincaid Miller, kybds.).

A band with a string of tunes that have become favorites on AM and FM radio and TV, Pablo Cruise exemplified the wholesome, ultrasmooth California sound. Indeed, its music has been called "music to watch sports by," and Pablo Cruise songs have been used as soundtracks for ABC's Wide World of Sports, CBS's Sports Spectacular, and NBC's Sportsworld, as well as for a surfing documentary called Free Ride. The band has also contributed to the soundtracks of the films An Unmarried Woman and Dreamer.

Pablo Cruise comes by its California heritage honestly. Dave Jenkins, Cory Lerios, and Steve Price were formerly with Stoneground, while Bud Cockrell came from It's a Beautiful Day. When Cockrell left to pursue a musical career with his wife, Pattie Santos (ex-It's a Beautiful Day), he was replaced by Bruce Day, formerly of Santana (Santos died in a car accident in December 1989 at age 40). The band first drew attention for such instrumentals as "Ocean Breeze" (from its debut LP) and "Zero to Sixty in Five" (from Life Line), both of which became FM-radio favorites. The band's first big hit was "Whatcha Gonna Do?" (#6, 1977), but Pablo Cruise really made it with Worlds Away, which contained three hit singles: "Love Will Find a Way" (#6, 1978), "Don't Want to Live Without It" (#21, 1978), and "I Go to Rio" (#46, 1979). The LP sold a million copies within a year of its release, as did A Place in the Sun. In 1981 Pablo Cruise scored again with its final hit, "Cool Love." The group disbanded in 1984, and Jenkins went on to join ex-Creedence Clearwater Revival Stu Cook and two ex-Doobie Brothers, John McFee and Keith Knudsen, in Southern Pacific Around 1997. Cockrell and Jenkins re-formed Pablo Cruise with new members. The group continues to perform.

With the Firm (Page, gr.; Paul Rodgers [b. Dec. 17, 1949, Middleborough, Eng.], voc.; Chris Slade, drums; Tony Franklyn, bass): 1985—The Firm (Atlantic) 1986—Mean Business.

One of rock's most important and influential guitar players, writers, and producers, Jimmy Page has alternated between solo projects and collaborations with other superstars since the demise of Led Zeppelin [see entry] in 1980. But surpassed by new trends and technology, Page's later work has been as bound to classic rock as his legendary past accomplishments. In 1994 he rejoined vocalist Robert Plant to perform Zeppelin songs, along with new compositions, for an MTV Unplugged performance, entitled Unleaded, and an album, No Quarter.

After Zeppelin drummer John Bonham's death, Page didn't touch a guitar for nine months. His first collaborative project after that, with Yes' Chris Squire and Alan White, never made it out of the studio. His soundtrack for the film Death Wish II is a predominantly instrumental album that at points found him playing fitfully with synthesizers. A 1983-84 ARMS benefit tour brought Page to the concert stage for the first time since 1980. He also contributed to former band mate Robert Plant's first solo album, Pictures at 11, in 1982.

Two years later Page founded the Firm with former Free and Bad Company vocalist Paul Rodgers. Page once referred to the band as a vehicle to show people he wasn't the drug user oft rumored. In the fall of 1984, however, he was arrested for possession of cocaine, his second offense, and his personal life continued to remain shrouded in mystery, colored by rumors of an interest in the occult and a period of heroin addiction.

The Firm released two albums and toured once, to lukewarm critical and mixed fan response. Then, because he wanted to "avoid routine," Page released his first nonsoundtrack studio album, Outrider (#26, 1988), which featured vocals by John Miles, Chris Farlowe, and Plant. Outrider earned Page a Grammy nomination for best rock instrumental and sent him on his first solo tour. For his next album, Page paired up with former Deep Purple and Whitesnake vocalist David Coverdale, whose similarities to Rodgers and Plant have provoked the ex-Zep singer to call him "David Coverversion." The Page-Coverdale collaboration is a solid if somewhat generic contribution to the hard rock Page pioneered (the album peaked at #5 in 1993).

Page and Plant put their differences aside in 1994 when they reunited to record a new album, No Quarter, in Wales, Morocco, and London, where Unleaded the MTV Unplugged special, was taped. A mix of Led Zep and new songs, the album featured musicians from Marrakech, India, and Egypt. Page and Plant embarked on a 1995 tour to promote the album.

In 1998 Page and Plant released Walking Into Clarksdale, the first album of new material they had recorded together in two decades. "Most High," a single, recalled Zep's hypnotic "Kashmir," but the album (its title an allusion to the cradle of the Delta blues) was more wistful than bombastic. Page was also featured on Sean Combs' "Come With Me," a song from the movie Godzilla that set rap lyrics to the melody from "Kashmir." In 1999 Page toured with the Black Crowes, performing a mix of Zep and Crowes material, as well as old blues covers. Live at the Greek, a tour document, came out in 2000.

Robert Palmer

Born Robert Alan Palmer, Jan. 19, 1949, Batley, Eng.
 1974—Sneakin' Sally Through the Alley (Island) 1975—Pressure Drop 1976—Some People Can Do What They Like 1978—Double Fun 1979—Secrets 1980—Clues 1982—Maybe It's Live 1983—Pride 1985—Riptide 1988—Heavy Nova (EMI Manhattan) 1989—"Addictions" vol. 1 (Island) 1990—Don't Explain (EMI) 1992—Ridin' High; "Addictions" vol. 2 (Island) 1994—Honey; The Very Best of Robert Palmer (EMI) 1999—Rhythm & Blues (Pyramid/Rhino); Disturbing Behavior (EMI).

During the first part of his recording career, white soul singer Robert Palmer was equally renowned for his taste in rock and R&B cover songs as for his impeccably tailored suits. By the mid-'80s, however, Palmer had achieved mainstream stardom through a series of records that pitted his cool, understated vocals against smooth, catchy pop songs or overtly hard rockers.

Palmer spent most of his childhood on the island of Malta. Back in Britain as a teenager, he first sang in the band Mandrake Paddle Steamer, then went professional with the Alan Bown Set in 1968. The next year, he joined Dada, which changed its name to Vinegar Joe, releasing three albums (Vinegar Joe and Rock 'n' Roll Gypsies, both 1972, and Six Star General, 1973) When the band broke up, Palmer went solo.

Sneakin' Sally Through the Alley featured backup and songs by members of Little Feat and the Meters; the title track was by Allen Toussaint. Little Feat also had a hand in Pressure Drop, featuring the Toots and the Maytals' title cut and Palmer's own "Give Me an Inch." After making Some People Can Do What They Like, Palmer moved to Nassau, Bahamas. He had his first U.S. hit with ex-Free Andy Fraser's "Every Kinda People" (#16, 1978) from Double Fun, it was followed by Moon Martin's "Bad Case of Loving You (Doctor, Doctor)" (#14, 1979) from Secrets, the first album Palmer produced himself.

Clues, with a band including Chris Frantz (Talking Heads) and Gary Numan and material by Numan, found Palmer, on such cuts as "Johnny and Mary" and "Looking for Clues," moving into smooth synthesizer-driven pop. He followed his first Top 20 British hit, "Some Guys Have All the Luck," with Maybe It's Live.

Palmer's profile was raised considerably by his 1985 tenure in Power Station, a group consisting of Duran Duran's John Taylor and Andy Taylor and Chic's Tony Thompson. "Bang a Gong" and "Some Like It Hot" (#6, 1985) saw him rocking out more than before, unwilling to tour with the band, however, he soon departed.

The sleek rock he'd debuted with Power Station fostered his breakthrough, Riptide "Addicted to Love" (#1, 1986) and "I Didn't Mean to Turn You On" (#2, 1986) were guitar-powered confections with instant mainstream appeal; boosted by videos featuring deadpan elegant models mimicking the role of backup band, they established Palmer as an ironic sex symbol, an MTV-era Cary Grant.

Moving with his family to Switzerland, Palmer contributed to the film Sweet Lies before releasing Heavy Nova and its hits, "Simply Irresistible" (#2, 1988) and "Early in the Morning" (#19, 1988). Its styles ranging from bossa nova to '40s-style balladeering, the album also demonstrated Palmer's continuing eclecticism. A collaboration with UB40 on Bob Dylan's "I'll Be Your Baby Tonight" enlivened Don't Explain, and on Ridin' High, Palmer turned in a credible collection of Tin Pan Alley and cabaret standards. The world beat-influenced Honey was inspired by Palmer's fondness for the great African singer King Sunny Ade. Palmer then reunited with John Taylor in a version of Power Station for 1996's Living in Fear. In 1999 he returned to soul music with Rhythm & Blues, an album on which he played virtually all the instruments.

Charlie Parker

Born Charles Christopher Parker, Aug. 29, 1920, Kansas City, KS; died Mar. 12, 1955, New York, NY
 1953—The Greatest Jazz Concert Ever (Fantasy) 1978—The Complete Savoy Studio Sessions (Savoy) 1988—Bird: The Complete Charlie Parker on Verve (Verve); Bebop & Bird, vol. 1 (Rhino); Bebop & Bird, vol. 2 1989—The Legendary Dial Masters, vols. 1 & 2 (Stash) 1995—Bird With Strings: The Master Takes (Verve) 1997—Yardbird Suite: The Ultimate Charlie Parker Collection (Rhino).

Alto saxophonist Charlie Parker was the most important figure in bebop, the musical form that revolutionized jazz in the mid-'40s. Also known as "Bird" or "Yardbird" (the stonies vary as to how the nicknames came to be), Parker's innovative conceptions of jazz harmony and rhythm, along with an incredible command of his instrument, made him the most venerated musician of his time and a legend before his untimely death at age 35.

Born in the right time and the right place, Parker grew up listening to the great bands and soloists who made Kansas City, Missouri, their stomping ground in the early '30s. Hearing tenor saxophonist Lester Young with Count Basie's band inspired the precocious Parker, who had begun playing saxophone at age 11. By 17, after intensive practice, Parker had honed his skills and found work with the Kansas City band of Buster Smith, an altoist who exerted a strong influence on Parker's playing.

In 1938 and 1939, Parker spent time in New York, where he got to observe advanced musicians such as pianist Art Tatum and further define his burgeoning style. In 1940 Parker returned to Kansas City and joined Jay McShann's big band, with which he did his first recordings. Parker stayed with McShann for two years, but the lure of New York, with its coetere of forward-thinking musicians, proved too strong.

Due to a musicians' union strike that lasted for the next few years, Parker's rapid growth went undocumented. In 1943 Parker played in pianist Earl Hines' band and then in an offshoot band led by Hines' singer Billy Eckstine. Both of these bands were important proto-bop bands whose players were on the cusp of jazz's next wave. During this time, Parker was also attending the monumental Harlem jam sessions led by pianist Thelonious Monk and drummer Kenny Clarke, where seeds of bop's development were also being sown.

The breakthrough came in 1945 when Parker, alongside trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie—the only other player in the same virtuosic league as Parker—made a series of recordings that included "Shaw 'Nuff," "Salt Peanuts," and "Hot House" and defined the new music. A session under Parker's leadership soon after produced "Now's the Time," "Billie's Bounce," and "Koko." Bebop was a whole new ball game: The harmonies were more complex, the rhythms varied and unpredictable, the tempos ultrafast. Seemingly overnight, jazz went from dance-oriented music to art music designed for listening only.

Parker and Gillespie, whose band had been the rage in New York, headed for California in late 1945 for what turned out to be a disastrous sojourn. Bebop was unpopular with the West Coast public, Parker and Gillespie quarreled, and Parker slid full force into a drug problem that had plagued him since his teens. By July 1946, Parker had suffered a mental collapse and was institutionalized at the Camarillo State Hospital for seven months.

On his release, Parker was again at the top of his form, cutting more brilliant sides that included "A Night in Tunisia," "Relaxing at Camarillo," "Ornithology," and "Yardbird Suite," before heading back to New York. There, he put together a first-rate band with drummer Max Roach and trumpeter Miles Davis, whose recordings for Dial are among Parker's greatest work. By this time, Parker was the most acclaimed and influential jazz musician alive. Over the next few years, though, Parker's exceptional music contrasted with the downward swing of his personal life; heroin addiction and alcoholism destroyed whatever semblance of order Parker tried to impose on his life. In 1949 Parker made a triumphant tour of Europe; in New York, a popular nightclub, Birdland, was named in his honor.

Throughout the '50s, Parker continued making exceptional music with his own groups, on tour with Jazz at the Philharmonic, as a solo performer, and at occasional reunions with Dizzy Gillespie, who had gone on to become a star; but his behavior became increasingly erratic. In 1954, following the death of Parker's daughter Chan, the bottom fell out of his life. His excessive behavior mangled an all-star performance at Birdland in early 1955, leading him to be banned from the club. Depressed and in ill health, Parker took refuge at the New York apartment of jazz patron Baroness Nica de Konigswarter. While watching TV there, Parker died of a hemorrhage related to pneumonia.

One of the most critically acclaimed graduates of the mid-'70s British pub-rock scene, singer/songwriter Graham Parker was compared to Bob Dylan and Bruce Springsteen for the best of his angry, eloquent songs. Yet the commercial success he always seemed to deserve remained, for the most part, just outside his grasp.

Until 1975, Parker lived off a succession of odd jobs, including gas-station attendant and breeder of mice and guinea pigs for a scientific institute. He had also spent time in a cover band playing in Gibraltar and Morocco in the late '60s.

In 1975 Dave Robinson (who would found Stiff Records in 1977) heard some Parker demos and became his manager, backing him with a band of pub-rock veterans: The Rumour [see entry] included guitarist Brinsley Schwarz and keyboardist Bob Andrews from the band Brinsley Schwarz [see entry] (which also included Nick Lowe, who produced Parker's first and third LPs), guitarist Martin Belmont from Ducks Deluxe, bassist Andrew Bodnar, and drummer Steve Goulding from Bontemps Roulez. Parker's first two LPs with the Rumour won mammoth critical acclaim but sold barely respectably in the U.S.

Parker had many run-ins with his label, Mercury, accusing it of poor distribution and promotion that resulted in the mediocre sales (Heat Treatment did best, selling some 60,000 copies and peaking at #169). Stick to Me (#125, 1977), which had to be quickly rerecorded after the original tapes were mangled, sold about as much, though Parker's club audiences had grown, thanks to the emergence of punk. In 1978 Parker rushed out the live Parkerilla (#149, 1978), reportedly in order to escape his Mercury contract. Parker wrote the scathing "Mercury Poisoning" about the label's alleged incompetence; it was released as the B side of a promotional 45 by his new label, Arista, and did not turn up on album until the 1993 Anthology.

Arista signed Parker after an intense music-industry bidding war. His first Arista LP, Squeezing Out Sparks (#40, 1979), stands as probably his finest artistic and commercial achievement; it made the Top 40, with "Local Girls" and "Passion Is No Ordinary Word" garnering heavy FM-radio play. Parker's star continued to rise with a live cover of the Jackson 5's "I Want You Back" (never included on an album until Anthology) that was widely played on college radio. But Parker was unable to consolidate that incipient success. The Up Escalator (#40, 1980; produced by Jimmy Iovine) and Another Grey Area (#51, 1982; produced by Jack Douglas) met with mixed response and unexceptional sales; and by then the Rumour had released a couple of LPs on its own. Various studio musicians and others, including Nicky Hopkins and Hugh McCracken, backed up Parker. Bruce Springsteen sang on Escalator's "Endless Night." Various Rumour members, meanwhile, worked with Nick Lowe and Garland Jeffreys.

Parker had a minor hit single with "Wake Up Next to You" (#39, 1985), but since then, only 1985's Steady Nerves (#57) and 1988's The Mona Lisa's Sister (#77) made the Top 100. His subsequent albums have all received favorable notices: 12 Haunted Episodes, the first of his recordings on U.S. independent Razor & Tie, is a lovely, primarily acoustic set; Acid Bubblegum found Parker in his more rocking, angry guise: Following its release, he played a slew of fiery live shows, backed by the spirited young punk-pop band the Figgs. Loose Monkeys was initially available only on the Internet. Since 1988, Parker has been living in the Woodstock, New York, area, where he began devoting some of his time to prose writing (contributing to ROLLING STONE'S Alt-Rock-a-Rama [1996] and THE ROLLING STONE Book of the Beats [1999]) and doing spoken-word performances. Parker's first work of fiction, Carp Fishing on Valium, was published by St. Martin's Press in 2000.

Junior Parker

Born Herman Parker, Mar. 3, 1927, West Memphis, AR; died Nov. 18, 1971, Blue Island, IL
 1960—Driving (Duke) 1961—Blues Consolidated 1964—Junior Parker (Bluesway) 1967—Like It Is (Mercury) 1970—Outside Man (Capitol) 1972—Blue Shadows Falling (Groove Merchant); Good Things Don't Happen Everyday 1973—You Don't Have to Be Black . . . (People); The Best of Junior Parker (MCA) 1974—Love Ain't Nothing but Business 1976—Love

My Baby EP (Charly) 1978—Legendary Sun Performers 1992—Junior's Blues: The Duke Recordings, vol. 1 (MCA).

A highly respected blues vocalist and harmonica player, Junior Parker may be best known as the author of Elvis Presley's 1955 classic "Mystery Train." But Parker had a long, noteworthy career of his own, which included stints with blues performers like Sonny Boy Williamson II, Howlin' Wolf, B.B. King, and Johnny Ace.

Parker's career began in 1948 at a Sonny Boy Williamson show, where Parker responded to Williamson's request for a harmonica player from the audience; Parker ended up playing with Williamson for the rest of his tour and leading the band when Williamson had solo commitments. In 1949 Parker played with Howlin' Wolf and, two years later, after Wolf had temporarily retired, took over that band, which also included pianist Ike Turner and guitarist M.T. Murphy. Parker then moved to Memphis and joined the Beale Streeters, which also included B.B. King, Bobby Bland, Johnny Ace, and Rosco Gordon. In 1952 Parker formed his own band, the Blue Flames, with whom he made his first recordings for Modern. He then moved to Sun Records, where he had a massive hit, "Feelin' Good," in 1953. His second Sun release, "Mystery Train," was a minor hit; Presley had much more success with it. In 1954 Parker began a four-year association with Houston's Duke Records.

In 1953 Parker had joined the Johnny Ace Revue, which also included Big Mama Thornton. When Ace died (losing a game of Russian roulette) in 1954, Parker took over the Revue, renaming it Blues Consolidated, and toured with it through 1961. He also toured with Bobby Bland and Joe Hinton.

Among Parker's many R&B hits were "Next Time You See Me" (#7, 1957), "Driving Wheel" (#5, 1961), "In the Dark" (#7, 1961), and "Annie Get Your Yo-Yo" (#6, 1962). Some of his better-known earlier performances were "Mother-in-Law Blues" and "Barefoot Rock." On some of these early recordings, Parker's guitarist, Pat Hare, can be heard experimenting with unusually uptempo driving rhythms and distorted solos. As late as 1971, Parker was still having minor R&B hits, among them "Ain't Gon' Be No Cutting Loose" and "Drowning on Dry Land," and had recorded for Blue Rock, Mint, and Capitol. His death came after surgery for a brain tumor.

Born Feb. 14, 1943, Kinston, NC

1970—Doing Their Own Thing (House of the Fox) 1974—Us (People) 1975—Funky Music Machine (El Cello) 1990—For All the King's Men (4th and Broadway); Pea Wee, Fred & Maceo (Gramavision); Roots Revisited (Verve) 1991—Mo' Roots 1993—Life on Planet Groove; Southern Exposure (RCA/Novus) 1998—Funk Overload (What Are?) 2000—Dial M-A-C-E-O.

If only for his soulful work with James Brown, saxophonist Maceo Parker's place in R&B history is secure. Parker began his musical career playing tenor saxophone in local bands in his native North Carolina, early groups included the Junior Blue Notes, which Parker formed in elementary school with his brothers, trombonist Kellis and drummer Melvin.

In 1962 James Brown heard Melvin at a club and offered him an open invitation to join his band. Two years later, when he approached Brown to take him up on his offer, Melvin brought along Maceo, and Brown hired them both. During his tenure with Brown, Parker—who played tenor and baritone saxophones—became one of the band's chief soloists. Brown's cry, "Maceo, blow your horn" would be the prelude for Parker's funky statements.

Parker left Brown's band in 1970 and worked in a series of groups including Maceo and the Macks, Maceo and All the King's Men, and Fred Wesley and the JB's. When Parker rejoined Brown in 1973, he switched to alto saxophone. Although Parker freelanced throughout the next 20 years with George Clinton's P-Funk conglomerations and Bootsy's Rubber Band, his main gig was with Brown. When Brown was imprisoned in 1993, Parker struck out on his own to remarkable acclaim. His first two solo recordings on Verve reached #1 on the jazz chart. Parker found that he had achieved near-legendary stature: New bands including Deee-Lite, 10,000 Maniacs, De La Soul, and Living Colour used him on their recordings, and rappers continuously sampled his work with Brown. In 1998 he returned to funkier fare after his Verve jazz excursions, collaborating with Prince and Ani DiFranco and featuring his son Corey Parker as resident rapper in his band.

Van Dyke Parks

Born Jan. 3, 1943, Hattiesburg, MI

1989—Tokyo Rose 1998—Moonlighting: Live at the Ash Grove.

Brian Wilson and Van Dyke Parks: 1995—Orange Crate Art (Warner Bros.).

Even by Hollywood standards, Van Dyke Parks is an oddball. His specialty—in his over two decades in the music business as songwriter, lyricist, arranger, and producer—is dense aural and verbal montages, which are most easily sampled in his lyrics for the Beach Boys' "Heroes and Villains" or "Surf's Up."

Parks moved with his family to Hollywood at age 13 and became a child actor while studying classical piano and composition. In the early '60s, he reportedly signed with a major studio to write soundtracks. Instead, he began writing his own songs, one of which, "High Coin," has become a folk-rock standard and was covered by Bobby Vee, Harper's Bizarre, and the Charlatans (San Francisco), among others. In the mid-'60s, he produced such hits as the Mojo Men's cover of Stephen Stills' "Sit Down I Think I Love You" and Harper's Bizarre's cover of Cole Porter's "Anything Goes."

In 1966 Parks began collaborating with Brian Wilson of the Beach Boys on the never-released Smile LP; some of the songs appeared on later Beach Boys albums. He also produced Judy Collins, Randy Newman, Ry Cooder, Phil Ochs, Arlo Guthrie, and others, becoming something of an L.A. local legend for his mysterious, meticulous methods. His first solo LP, an ambitious and eclectic project four years in the making, earned him the reputation of "the first art rocker."

Parks was made director of audiovisual services for Warner Bros. in 1970, a post he quit a year later. He also played keyboards on sessions with Judy Collins and with the Byrds (on "5D [Fifth Dimension]"), and in the score for Robert Altman's Popeye, in which he briefly appeared onscreen. His two other solo LPs showcased his love of calypso music, both featured the Esso Trinidad Steel Band. He has also scored Goin' South and The Two Jakes. Neither Jump!, which was centered around the fictional character of Uncle Remus, nor Tokyo Rose, an examination of US-Japanese relations, sparked much interest. Although his records never sold very well when originally issued, they were all rereleased on CD in 1990.

Then, in 1995, nearly 30 years after their ill-fated collaborations on Smile, Parks and Wilson started working together again on an album entitled Orange Crate Art. Wilson provided all lead and most backing vocals for the dozen new songs (mostly about California and its mythological appeal) that Parks wrote, arranged and produced. Critics were generally enthusiastic about the album's nostalgic pop, but there was little commercial interest.

Alan Parsons Project, formed 1975, London, Eng.

1976—Tales of Mystery and Imagination—Edgar Allan Poe (Arista) 1977—I Robot 1978—Pyramid 1979—Eve 1980—The Turn of a Friendly Card 1982—Eye in the Sky 1983—The Best of the Alan Parsons Project 1984—Ammonia Avenue 1985—Vulture Culture 1986—Stereotomy 1987—Gaudi 1992—Try Anything Once 1996—On Air (River North) 1999—The Time Machine (Miramar).

Alan Parsons is mainly a producer/engineer. He worked on the Beatles' Abbey Road and Paul McCartney's Wildlife and Red Rose Speedway. He also produced Pink Floyd's The Dark Side of the Moon and Al Stewart's Time Passages. He plays keyboards and sometimes sings with the Alan Parsons Project, a loose collection of English session players interpreting Parsons' and lyricist/manager Eric Woolfson's arty, highly synthesized and orchestrated concepts.

Vocalists on his LPs have included Arthur Brown, Steve Harley of Cockney Rebel, Allan Clarke of the Hollies, and ex-Zombie Colin Blunstone. I Robot, Card (about a gambling obsession), and Eye all went platinum. These and Parsons' other LPs have yielded an array of hits: "Games People Play" (#16, 1980), "Time" (#15, 1981), "Eye in the Sky" (#3, 1982), and "Don't Answer Me" (#15, 1984) all went Top 20. Following the gold Ammonia Avenue, the group's releases have been of more interest to die-hard fans than to casual listeners. The "Project" was dropped from the ensemble's name for 1992's Try Anything Once. The following year, Parsons produced an album by Yes with the London Philharmonic Orchestra. He embarked on his first-ever tours in 1994 and 1995. Released in 1996, On Air is a concept work about flying that features Christopher Cross and Eric Stewart of 10cc. In 1999 comedian Mike Myers dubbed his villain's death ray "The Alan Parsons Project" in the hit comedy Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me; flattered, Parsons sampled the movie's dialog on his H.G. Wells-inspired album The Time Machine.

Gram Parsons

Born Ingram Cecil Connor III, Nov. 5, 1946, Winter Haven, FL; died Sep. 19, 1973, Joshua Tree, CA
 1973—GP (Reprise) 1974—Grievous Angel 1976—Sleepless Nights (A&M) 1979—Gram Parsons: The Early Years 1963–1965 (Sierra/Briar) 1982—Gram Parsons and the Fallen Angels—Live 1973 (Sierra) 2000—Another Side of This Life (Sundazed) 2001—Sacred Hearts & Fallen Angels: The Gram Parsons Anthology (Rhino).
 With the International Submarine Band: 1968—Safe at Home (LHI).
 With the Flying Burrito Brothers: see entry.

Georgia-bred singer/songwriter Gram Parsons brought traditional country music to the rock & roll audience. With his wracked, emotive vocals and his compelling C&W songcraft, he was a major influence on a variety of artists ranging from Emmylou Harris to Keith Richards to Elvis Costello. Though he hated the term "country rock" and the kind of music the term came to define, Parsons undoubtedly pioneered the genre, via his groups the International Submarine Band and the Flying Burrito Brothers, one album with the Byrds, and his solo recordings. Though none of the bands he started or the albums he made was ever commercially successful, he has achieved near-mythic status since his 1973 death at age 26. In the '90s his work continues to be embraced by a new generation of artists, many of them alt-country artists and alt-rockers.

Ingram Cecil Connor spent much of his childhood in Waycross, Georgia. The son of a Florida citrus heiress and a Tennessee-born World War II vet named Coon Dog Connor, he grew up in the lap of luxury. At age nine, he learned to play the piano, but his main musical inspiration was seeing Elvis Presley perform that year at his local auditorium. By age 12, he'd begun playing guitar. At that point, however, his life was shattered by the suicide of his father.

The family moved to his maternal grandparents' mansion in Winter Haven, Florida, the next year, his mother married Robert Parsons, who adopted Gram and legally changed his surname to Parsons. At age 14, Parsons began playing in a succession of local rock & roll bands as well as in folk groups. In 1964 his group the Shilohs made some recordings and performed throughout the Southeast. The next year, on the day Parsons graduated from high school, his mother died of alcohol poisoning. Parsons left Florida that fall for Harvard, where he spent more time playing music than studying. After one semester, he dropped out and moved from Cambridge to the Bronx with his new group, the International Submarine Band. In 1966, with a repertoire of traditional country and R&B-tinged songs, the band played a few shows in New York, then relocated to L.A. after recording an unsuccessful single for Columbia. There, the band got a cameo role in Roger Corman's The Trip, but by the time Parsons recorded the ISB album Safe at Home (for Lee Hazlewood's LHI label), the band had broken up, and Parsons made the album primarily with session players. Soon after its release, Parsons met Chris Hillman and through him joined the Byrds [see entry]. The Byrds' Sweetheart of the Rodeo included two Parsons songs, "Hickory Wind" (cowritten with Bob Buchanan) and "One Hundred Years From Now" (Parsons' lead vocals on several songs were not released until 1990, on the Byrds box set.)

After just three months in the Byrds, Parsons quit in summer 1968, refusing to join the band's tour of South Africa, reportedly because of his opposition to apartheid. In late 1968 he and Hillman (who also left the Byrds) formed the Flying Burrito Brothers [see entry]. Parsons played a strong role on the Burritos' first LP, but left the band in April 1970, just before Burritos Deluxe came out.

In 1970 Parsons, after recovering from injuries sustained in a motorcycle accident, recorded some tracks with producer Terry Melcher that were never released. He spent the next two years indulging in the rock & roll lifestyle, including a stint at his friend Keith Richards' French villa during the recording of the Stones' Exile on Main Street. Parsons did not record again until his 1973 solo debut GP, which featured Emmylou Harris [see entry] (who'd been discovered by Hillman) and backing by Rick Grech (ex-Blind Faith and Family); a friend from his Cambridge days, Barry Tashian (of Barry and the Remains fame); and three members of Elvis Presley's touring band, Glen D. Hardin, James Burton, and Ronnie Tutt.

Following a brief tour with his band, the Fallen Angels, Parsons returned to the studio to record Grievous Angel. It had just been completed when, in September 1973, Parsons overdosed on a combination of morphine and tequila while relaxing at a favorite desert retreat near the Joshua Tree National Monument. He was pronounced dead after being rushed to the Yucca Valley Hospital. A few days later, his coffin, en route to New Orleans for burial, was stolen by his friend and road manager Phil Kaufman and taken back to Joshua Tree and set afire. It was later revealed that Parsons had expressed a wish for his ashes to be scattered at Joshua Tree in the event of his death.

Parsons' legacy lived on as Emmylou Harris toured with his old band and covered and popularized his material, as did many others, including Costello on his country LP, Almost Blue. Costello also wrote liner notes for a 1982 British compilation of Parsons' work. Bernie Leadon's song "My Man," from the Eagles' 1974 On the Border, was a tribute to Parsons, and a song Richie Furay wrote about him in 1969, "Crazy Eyes," was the title track of a 1973 Poco LP.

In 1979 Sierra/Briar Records released an album of early Parsons material with the Shilohs, a live recording of a Fallen Angels gig was released by the label four years later. In 2000 Sundazed issued Parsons' 1965-66 solo acoustic demos, which included an early version of "Brass Buttons," a song that had been recorded by Parsons' Florida buddy Jim Carlton. The Gram Parsons Notebook, also released in 2000, featured bluegrass-style songs composed of music set to Parsons' lyrics found in one of his journals by former ISB member John Nuese.

Tribute albums have also kept Parsons' songs alive. In 1993 Rhino issued Commemorative: A Tribute to Gram Parsons, with his songs covered by the Mekons, Uncle Tupelo, Bob Mould, Peter Dinklage (R.E.M.), Peter Holsapple, Susan Cowsill, Steve Wynn, and others. Emmylou Harris was the executive producer of the 1999 tribute album Return of the Grievous Angel (Almo Sounds) featuring, among others, Lucinda Williams, Steve Earle, and Harns duets with Chrissie Hynde, Beck, and Sheryl Crow. A performance by many of the album's contributors was televised on the PBS program Sessions at West 54th Street in 1999.

Dolly Parton's girlish soprano and songs about old-time virtues made her a major country star in the early '70s. Later in that decade, she wooed the pop audience and became a household name, her playful, self-deprecating comments about her blond sex-bomb image winning hearts as her finely crafted country-pop singles yielded a succession of more than 20 C&W #1 hits. Parton wrote many of her own hits, either alone or in collaboration with Bill Owens. Among the songs she's written is "I Will Always Love You," a #1 country hit for Parton in 1974 and 1982 that sold over 4 million copies in 1992 for Whitney Houston.

Parton grew up poor on a farm in the foothills of Tennessee's Smoky Mountains, the fourth of 12 children born to a farming couple. Her sister Stella later became a singer as well, and five other siblings have worked as professional musicians. Parton sang in church as a girl, and at age 10 appeared on the Cass Walker TV show in Knoxville with members of her grade school class. She became a regular on

Dolly Parton

Walker's radio show, where she performed until age 18. Parton appeared at the Grand Ole Opry at age 12, and her first single, "Puppy Love," was released by the blues-oriented Louisiana label Goldband.

One day after graduating high school, in 1964, she moved to Nashville and signed with Monument. Her first day in town, she met Carl Dean, whom she married two years later. Early recordings, in a rock vein, were not successful. Her big break came with "Dumb Blonde," a minor hit that peaked at #24 on the country chart. In 1967 she joined singer Porter Wagoner's syndicated country-music show, and "Miss Dolly," as she was called, became very popular with viewers. She signed to RCA, and the duo had many country hits, including "Just Someone I Used to Know" (1969) and "Daddy Was an Old Time Preacher Man" (1970). While with Wagoner, she charted over a dozen solo country & western hits, including "Joshua" (#1, 1970) and "Coat of Many Colors" (#4, 1971).

In 1974 Parton left Wagoner completely, having released Jolene, the title track of which became her second #1 country hit and a minor pop crossover. Other singers began to take an interest in her work. Linda Ronstadt covered "I Will Always Love You" (which Parton wrote about leaving Porter Wagoner) in 1975 on Prisoner in Disguise, Emmylou Harris sang "Coat of Many Colors" that same year, and Mania Mulder covered "My Tennessee Mountain Home" on her first record. The covers encouraged Parton to bring her country to the pop market, which she did with New Harvest. The LP was more rock-oriented and included a version of "Higher and Higher." She also broke away from the country circuit to play rock clubs.

Parton's first major pop single was "Here You Come Again," which went gold and hit #3 in early 1978. The LP of the same name went platinum. She also hit the pop Top 20 that year with "Two Doors Down." Parton had successfully crossed over; "Baby, I'm Burnin'" (#25, 1978) even had some success in discos. Other #1 C&W hits of that time include "You're the Only One" (1979), "Starting Over Again" (1980), and "Old Flames Can't Hold a Candle to You" (1980). By 1980, Parton was a regular headliner in Las Vegas, and that year she earned an Oscar nomination for her film debut in 9 to 5 (costarring Jane Fonda and Lily Tomlin). Parton's recording of the title theme was a #1 hit in pop and country. In 1982 she costarred with Burt Reynolds in The Best Little Whorehouse in Texas. Her other film credits include Rhinestone (with Sylvester Stallone, 1984), Steel Magnolias (with Julia Roberts and Shirley MacLaine, 1989), Straight Talk (with James Woods, 1992), the made-for-television Wild Texas Wind (with Gary Busey, 1992), and The Beverly Hillbillies (1993). In 1976 she hosted a syndicated music show, Dolly; her 1987 prime-time variety show of the same name on ABC did not fare as well and was canceled after one season.

Immediately before the release of Rhinestone Cowboy, Parton began a difficult period plagued by health problems. Through the '80s she continued to score C&W #1 hits with "But You Know I Love You" (1981), "I Will Always Love You" (1982), the Bee Gees-written and -produced duet with Kenny Rogers, "Islands in the Stream" (1983), "Tennessee Homesick Blues" (1984), "Real Love" (another duet with Rogers, 1985), "Think About Love" (1985), "Why'd You Come in Here Lookin' Like That" (1989), "Yellow Roses" (1989), and "Rockin' Years" (1991), a duet with Ricky Van Shelton.

Parton's most successful album of the period was Trio, a collection of traditional country songs performed with Emmylou Harris and Linda Ronstadt. In 1987 it won a Grammy for Best Country Album by a Duo or Group with Vocal. In 1999 the long-awaited followup, Trio II, was released. It featured a Grammy-winning (Best Country Collaboration With Vocals) cover of Neil Young's "After the Gold Rush." In 1993 Parton teamed with Loretta Lynn and Tammy Wynette for Honky Tonk Angels, an album featuring the songs of country singers such as Patsy Cline and Kitty Wells (who appears on the title track).

In 1986 Parton opened Dollywood, a Smoky Mountain theme park. She has also established the Dolly Parton Wellness and Rehabilitation Center of Sevier County Medical Center as well as the Dollywood Foundation, which works to lower the high school-dropout rate in her home county. In 1994 she released her autobiography, Dolly: My Life and Unfinished Business. In 1996 Parton picked up her eighth career Country Music Association Award, for Vocal Event of the Year, for a new version of "I Will Always Love You" (#15 C&W, 1995) recorded with Vince Gill for a greatest-hits set. After 1996's Treasures, an album of covers, Parton moved to Decca and recorded Hungry Again, a rootsy collection of self-penned songs that kicked off what many critics viewed as an artistic reawakening for the veteran performer. In 1994 she was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame and cut her first bluegrass album, The Grass Is Blue, for the independent Sugar Hill label. The set featured an all-star band of bluegrass pros (including mandolin ace Sam Bush and Dobro player Jerry Douglas, among others) and went on to win Parton Album of the Year at the International Bluegrass Music Awards and a pair of Grammy nominations. She followed it in 2001 with a second bluegrass effort, Little Sparrow, which in addition to several new originals featured such left-field covers as Cole Porter's "I Get a Kick Out of You" and Collective Soul's gospel-rock anthem "Shine."

David Cassidy (b. Apr. 12, 1950, New York, NY), voc., gtr.; Shirley Jones (b. Mar. 31, 1934, Charleron, PA), voc.; studio musicians.

1970—The Partridge Family Album 1971—Up to Date; The Partridge Family Sound Magazine 1972—The Partridge Family Shopping Bag; The Partridge Family at Home With Their Greatest Hits 1989—The Partridge Family Lunchbox/Greatest Hits (Arista).

The Partridge Family, featuring teen idol David Cassidy, was more a marketing idea than a band. Their music was plugged on The Partridge Family TV series, which was about a family as traveling pop band (based loosely on the Cowsills), though only two of the actors actually sang on the group's many hit singles. The two real voices were Cassidy (who also played some guitar) and his stepmother, Shirley Jones, a veteran lead in many musicals, including The Music Man, Carousel, and Oklahoma!

Rounding out the family on the TV show were Danny Bonaduce, Brian Foster, Suzanne Crough, and ex-model Susan Dey. The show premiered on ABC on September 25, 1970, and weeks later the group's first single, "I Think I Love You," rose to #1 and went on to sell 4 million copies. Their debut, The Partridge Family Album (#4, 1970), went gold and within 12 months, the group had two more gold LPs (the total eventually would reach five), both in the Top 10. Cassidy (who played Keith Partridge) sang lead, and, by 1972, he'd begun to tour and record solo as well as with "the band." Under the Partridge Family name came three more 1971 hits: "Doesn't Somebody Want to Be Wanted" (#6), "I'll Meet You Halfway" (#9), and "I Woke Up in Love This Morning" (#13). They had three more Top 40 hits, two in 1972 and then, the next year, "Looking Through the Eyes of Love" (#39).

But the Partridge Family's popularity had waned by that time, and in 1974 the show ended. Cassidy went on to a solo career [see separate entry]. Dey continued acting; she appeared in several films, including Echo Park (with Tom Hulce) and became a regular on the popular television series L.A. Law. Bonaduce has had a checkered career, marked by run-ins with the law over drugs, several stunts as a disc jockey, and a number of publicity stunts, one of which was a boxing match with fellow ex-teen idol Donny Osmond.

Charley Patton

Born Apr. 1891, Bolton, MS; died Apr. 28, 1934, Indianola, MS. 1988—Founder of the Delta Blues (Yazoo). 1991—King of the Delta Blues. 1992—Charley Patton: The Complete Recorded Works (Peavine).

Gruff-voiced Charley Patton was an early Delta-blues singer of mythic status. In his day the most popular bluesman in Mississippi, Patton also recorded ballads and religious and ragtime songs. His acoustic guitar technique and his bottleneck slide playing—its rhythmic complexity influenced by West African drumming—his refusal to be confined to standard 12-bar blues patterns, and the emotional intensity of his songs made him a signal figure of the Delta blues, capable of both furthering the form and transcending it.

Remaining in the Mississippi Delta (the northwest corner of the state) until his death at age 43, Patton began recording for Paramount in 1929, by that time he'd already been a popular live performer among both black and white audiences for at least 15 years. "Pony Blues," "Tom Rushen Blues," and "Moon Going Down" are representative of a vast repertoire that influenced Howlin' Wolf, Big Joe Williams, and Son House. House, however, was also among a sizable camp who deduced Patton for "clownish" behavior, a charge refuted musically, at least, by the social consciousness evident in "Down the Dirt Road Blues" and its attack on racism and by the fervor of Patton's religious recordings. Clearly Patton was an outsized figure, given to his own myth making, but the thematic breadth of his songs (from tales of lust and cocaine use to political observation and finely detailed reportage) qualified him as a poetic representative of a complex Southern rural world. He died in 1934 from a chronic heart condition.

Billy Paul

Born Paul Williams, Dec. 1, 1934, Philadelphia, PA. 1970—Ebony Woman (Philadelphia International). 1971—Going East. 1972—360 Degrees of Billy Paul. 1973—Feelin' Good at the Cadillac Club: War of the Gods. 1974—Live in Europe. 1975—Got My Head on Straight; When Love Is New. 1976—Let 'Em In. 1977—Only the Strong Survive. 1979—First Class. 1983—Billy Paul's Greatest Hits. 1985—Lately (Total Experience). 1988—Wide Open (Ichiban). 1999—Me and Mrs. Jones: The Best of Billy Paul (Epic/Legacy). 2000—Live World Tour 1999 (Philly Sounds).

The success of singer Billy Paul's #1 pop and R&B hit "Me and Mrs. Jones" in 1972 helped establish Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff's then-young Philadelphia International Records and brought Paul's jazzy, unpredictable singing to its widest audience.

Paul first appeared in public at age 11, when, encouraged by friend Bill Cosby, he sang on Philadelphia radio station WPEN. As a teen, Paul had extensive musical training (Temple University, West Philadelphia Music School, Granoff Music School) and had sung with the Flamingos and the Blue Notes. He recorded as a jazz singer for Jubilee Records. One evening in the late '60s, Paul met Gamble at Philadelphia's Cadillac Club. Paul would record for Gamble's ill-fated Neptune Records before working with him again at Philadelphia International. "Mrs. Jones," written and produced by Gamble and Huff, is regarded as one of their classic records.

Though Paul's later releases never matched "Mrs. Jones," he had several soul hits through 1980, including "Am I Black Enough for You" (#29 R&B) in 1973, "Thanks for Saving My Life" (#9 R&B) in 1974, and "Let's Make a Baby" (#18 R&B) in 1976. Signed to the Philly Sounds label in 2000, he remains an active performer.

Les Paul

Born Lester Polfus, Jan. 9, 1915, Waukesha, WI. 1955—Les and Mary (with Mary Ford) (Capitol); The New Sound; Bye Bye Blues. 1956—The Hit Makers. 1959—Lover's Luau (Columbia). 1965—The Fabulous Les Paul and Mary Ford. 1968—Guitar Artistry (with the Les Paul Trio); Les Paul Now (London). 1976—Chester and Lester (with Chet Atkins) (RCA).

1978—Guitar Monsters (with Chet Atkins) 1986—Feedback (with the Les Paul Trio) (Circle) 1991—Les Paul: The Legend and the Legacy (Capitol); Les Paul Trio (LaserLight) 1992—The Best of the Capitol Masters (with Mary Ford).

Though he had a long and successful pop-jazz career, both with and without singer Mary Ford (born Colleen Summer, July 7, 1928, Pasadena, California; died September 30, 1977), guitarist Les Paul is of paramount importance to rock & roll as the creator of the solid-body electric guitar and as a pioneer in modern recording techniques such as electronic echo and studio multitracking.

Having learned harmonica, guitar, and banjo by age 13, Paul was playing with midwestern semipro country & western bands. He moved to Chicago in his late teens and became a regular on WLS. He then concentrated on performing for a few years before taking over the house band at WJJD in 1934, and he later became something of a hillbilly star under the pseudonyms Hot Rod Red and later, Rhubarb Red. He formed the Les Paul Trio—which included Chet Atkins' brother Jimmy on rhythm guitar and vocals and Ernie Newton on bass—in 1936, and with them moved to New York in 1937. They became regulars on "bandleader Fred Waring's NBC radio show and stayed with Waring's Pennsylvanians orchestra for five years.

Around this time, Paul began seriously thinking about revolutionizing the guitar. He had become interested in electronics at age 12, when he built a crystal radio set. He built his first guitar pickup from ham radio headphone parts in 1934, and by 1941 he had built the first prototypical solid-body electric guitar, a four-foot wooden board with strings, pickup, and a plug, which he called the "Log" and still uses to test against other guitars.

Meanwhile, in New York, Paul's musical aspirations moved toward jazz. He jammed informally with such greats as Art Tatum, Louis Armstrong, Ben Webster, and others, including electric (hollow-body) guitarist Charlie Christian. Paul left Waring in 1941, spent a year as music director for two Chicago radio stations, and moved to L.A. In 1942, he was drafted and worked for the Armed Forces Radio Service, playing behind Bing Crosby, Rudy Vallee, Johnny Mercer, Kate Smith, and others. Upon his discharge in 1943, he worked as a staff musician for NBC radio in L.A. He backed Bing Crosby with his trio and toured with the Andrews Sisters. With Crosby's encouragement, Paul built his first recording studio in his L.A. garage in 1945. There he began to pioneer such now-standard recording techniques as close microphone positioning ("close-miking"), echo delay, and multitracking. In 1948 he broke his right elbow in an auto accident and had it reset at a special angle so he could still play guitar.

In the late '40s, Paul met and married singer Mary Ford, and they began recording together—unsuccessfully at first—for Decca and Columbia. After moving to Capitol, they had a long string of hits, including "Mockin' Bird Hill" (#3, 1951), "How High the Moon" (#1, 1951), "The World Is Waiting for the Sunrise" (#3, 1951), and "Vaya Con Dios" (#1, 1953). These recordings—among the earliest multitracked pop songs—featured Ford's voice answering Paul's "talking" guitar. Paul also had some instrumental hits on his own: "Nola" (#9, 1950), "Whispering" (#7, 1951), "Tiger Rag" (#6, 1952), and "Meet Mister Callaghan" (#5, 1952). The couple's hits—individual and otherwise—stopped in 1961; two years later Paul and Ford were divorced. Ford died of diabetes in 1977.

By that time, Paul's interests had shifted to experimenting and innovating. He built the Les Paul Recording Guitar in the early '50s and used it on his own recordings, not allowing Gibson to market that model until 1971. Since they were first marketed in May 1952, Les Paul Gibsons have been known for their "hot" pickups, "fatter" tone, and sustaining capacity, as compared to the twangier electric guitars of Leo Fender.

In the early '50s, Paul built the first 8-track tape recorder, which helped pioneer multitrack recording, and he invented "sound-on-sound" recording, which has since become known as overdubbing. His other inventions include the floating bridge pickup, the electrodynamic pickup (both patented), the dual-pickup guitar, the 14-fret guitar, and various types of electronic transducers used both in guitars and recording studios.

In 1974 Paul returned to music making, and three years later had a hit LP in the Grammy-winning Chester and Lester, a collaboration with country guitarist Chet Atkins. A 1980 documentary, The Wizard of Waukesha, opened and closed with scenes of Les Paul in the late '70s, still playing guitar, demonstrating his latest invention: a little box called the "Les Paulvenzer," a device that could record, play back, and allow the musician to talk to anyone onstage, and which made his guitar sound like something that had inhaled laughing gas.

Paul has remained active, recording with Al DiMeola (on the latter's Splendido Hotel) and Manhattan Transfer's Janice Siegel (with whom he recorded her version of "How High the Moon" for her solo LP Experiments in Light). In 1988 Paul was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. From 1984 until 1996, Paul continued to appear once a week at Fat Tuesday's in New York; he eventually moved his weekly gig to the Indium club near Lincoln Center, where he continues to play. Slowed only slightly by arthritis, he remains an American institution. In 2001 he received a Grammy for his technical achievements.

Mixing cacophony and elegant pop, Pavement was arguably the most popular and influential "lo-fi" indie-rock band of the '90s. By the time of its breakup in 2000, the group had worked with big-name producers and traded detuned guitars and sci-fi sound effects for low-key sophistication. Pavement began in late 1988/early 1989, when primary songwriter Stephen Malkmus and longtime friend Scott Kannberg decided to self-release a single. The resulting 7-inch, Slay Tracks (1933-1969), cost $800 and received favorable notice in the alternative press. Augmented by 40-ish ex-hippie Gary Young, who owned the studio where they recorded, they continued to churn out smartly barbed 7-inch and 10-inch EPs for the Drag City label, which compiled these efforts as Westing (by Musket and Sextant).

In 1991 the trio completed Slanted and Enchanted, which sold over 100,000 copies and appeared on many critics' 1992 top 10 lists. Mark Ibold, bassist for New York noisemongers the Dustdevils, and Bob Nastanovich, a college chum of Malkmus, joined the bicoastal crew in time for its initial tours, although they weren't integrated into the studio lineup until the sessions for Crooked Rain, Crooked Rain. Pavement's early, sloppy performances often found Young on top of the drum kit rather than behind it. In 1993 he was replaced by Steve West.

Riding a wave of ecstatic press and still signed to indie powerhouse Matador Records, Pavement unveiled the more listener-friendly but still experimental Crooked Rain (#121, 1994), which yielded the catchy single "Cut Your Hair." But the quirks of the sprawling, wildly varied followup, Wowie Zowie! (#117, 1995), irked new fans who were expecting hook-filled consistency.

Produced by Mitch Easter, Brighten the Corners (#70, 1997) was the first largely subdued Pavement album. Terror Twilight (#95, 1999), overseen by Nigel Godrich (Radiohead, Beck), slides further into maturity with hints of country and '70s soft rock. Malkmus' cryptic lyrics and nasal, wavering voice remain the only links with the past.

Throughout the '90s, Malkmus, Nastanovich, and West backed poet/guitarist David Berman in the Silver Jews. Malkmus and the Seattle indie band Silkworm also recorded as the Crust Brothers. Ibold sat in with Free Kitten, a band led by Sonic Youth's Kim Gordon and ex-Pussy Galore guitarist Julia Cafritz. Young, who reunited with Pavement as a guest on a 1999 single, released a loopy 1995 solo album. Using the name Marble Valley, West completed two fractured works of his own. In early 2001, several months after Pavement announced its dissolution, Matador issued Malkmus' solo debut.

Singer/songwriter Tom Paxton and his topical songs first came to prominence along with performers such as Bob Dylan, Phil Ochs, and Joan Baez during the early-'60s Greenwich Village folk revival. Through a career that now spans over 40 years, he has continued to release albums and tour.

Paxton was raised in Oklahoma (his parents moved there when he was 10) and studied drama at the University of Oklahoma. He began writing songs, and after graduating in 1959 with a BFA, he joined the army. He later moved to New York, where he played the folk circuit. The Gaslight Club issued his first (now out-of-print) album, but his first national major release wasn't until early 1964's Ramblin' Boy.

Paxton's albums mixed increasingly topical political songs (like "What Did You Learn in School Today," "Talking Vietnam Pot Luck Blues," and, later, "Talking Watergate") with occasional love songs (like "The Last Thing on My Mind") and children's songs. He recorded seven albums for Elektra and then switched to Repnse in 1971, when he moved to England and recorded three LPs, including New Songs for Old Friends, produced by Tony Visconti and featuring Ralph McTell on guitar.

Paxton's compositions are more popularly known in versions performed by others. Peter, Paul and Mary covered "Going to the Zoo" and were among the many who covered "The Last Thing on My Mind"; John Denver did "Forest Lawn" and "Whose Garden Was This?"; other songs have been covered by Judy Collins, the Kingston Trio, and the Weavers. Paxton continues to command a loyal following and has expanded into writing music and books for children. He has written 14 children's books (published by Morrow Junior Books) and released the acclaimed children's albums The Marvellous Toy & Other Gallimaufry, Balloon-alloon-alloon, A Child's Christmas, A Car Full of Songs, Peanut But- ter Pie, and Suzy Is a Rocker, most on his own Pax label. He has hosted two series for BBC Radio, Tom Paxton's America and Tom Paxton: Still Ramblin'.

Freda Payne

Born Sep. 19, 1945, Detroit, MI

1972—The Best of Freda Payne (Invictus) 1991—Greatest Hits (HDI).

Soul singer Freda Payne's greatest recording success came at Invictus Records in the early '70s under the guidance of its owner/producers Lamont Dozier and Eddie and Brian Holland.

Payne's parents envisioned a career in the performing arts for both Freda and her sister Scherrie (who later joined a latter-day version of the Supremes). Both studied voice and piano as children at the Detroit Institute of Musical Arts; both later studied ballet. At 18, Payne moved to New York. Her best gig in the next two years was a stint in the chorus of a Pearl Bailey show. In 1965 she served as the understudy for Leslie Uggams in the Broadway musical Hallelujah, Baby! There she met Quincy Jones, with whom she toured. For the rest of the '60s, she worked as a jazz singer, performing with the top big bands, including Duke Ellington's.

After Eddie Holland left Motown, he persuaded Payne to join his new label and sing pop music. In 1970 and 1971, the Holland-Dozier-Holland production team furnished Payne with some neo-Motown music that would include two gold singles. "Band of Gold" (#3 pop, #20 R&B, 1970) and "Bring the Boys Home" (#12 pop, #3 R&B, 1971). The latter was one of the era's rare black anti-Vietnam songs. Other popular Payne records of the period were "Deeper and Deeper" (#24 pop, #9 R&B, 1970), "Chenish What Is Dear to You (While It's Near to You)" (#99 pop, #11 R&B, 1971), and "You Brought the Joy" (#52 pop, #21 R&B, 1971).

Subsequently, Payne recorded for ABC and Capitol Records. In the early '80s Payne hosted the syndicated television talk show For You Black Woman, and she continues to perform as a singer.

Peaches and Herb

Herb Fame (b. Herbert Feemster, 1942, Washington, DC), voc.; Francine Barker (b. Francine Hurd, 1947, Washington, DC), voc. 1967—Let's Fall in Love (Date) 1968—Greatest Hits (- Barker; + Marlene Mack [b. 1945, VA], voc.) 1969—(- Mack; + Barker) 1977—(- Barker; + Linda Green [b. Washington, DC], voc.) 1978—2 Hot! (Polydor) 1979—Twice the Fire 1980—Worth the Wait 1981—Sayin' Something! 1983—Remember (Columbia) (- Green) 1992—(+ Patrice Hawthorne, voc.) 1996—Love Is Strange: The Best of Peaches and Herb (Epic/Legacy).

The Peaches and Herb story is a tale of four women, two careers, and one Herb. The original team of Francine Barker and Herb Fame formed in 1965 at the urging of producer Van McCoy. At the time, Barker was lead singer of a female vocal group, the Sweet Things, and Fame was a solo act on Date Records. The Sweet Things and Fame met while on tour together. McCoy suggested that Barker and Fame form the duo, which he then produced.

The B side of their first single, "Let's Fall in Love" (#21 pop, #11 R&B), began a series of hits from 1967 to 1969 on Date: "Close Your Eyes" (#8 pop, #4 R&B), "For Your Love" (#20 pop, #10 R&B), and "Love Is Strange" (#13 pop, #16 R&B) in 1967; "United" (#46 pop, #11 R&B) in 1968; and "When He Touches Me" (#49 pop, #10 R&B) in 1969.

Marlene Mack filled in for Barker for one year, but by the time Barker returned, the duo's hits had stopped. After signing with Columbia in 1970, they suffered another dry spell and eventually quit the record business. During the '70s, Fame was a DC police officer. For a time in the mid-'70s, he and Barker released singles on their own BS label in Washington. In 1977, though, Fame found a new Peaches, Linda Green, and returned full-time to music. After a brief tenure with MCA Records, they signed to Polydor, where their "Shake Your Groove Thing" (#5 pop, #4 R&B, 1978) and the ballad "Reunited" (#1 pop, #1 R&B, 1979)—both from the platinum 2 Hot! (#2 pop, #1 R&B)—were Herb's biggest hits yet. Through the early '80s, the duo released over a half dozen more charting singles, including "We've Got Love" (#44 pop, #25 R&B, 1979), "I Pledge My Love" (#19 pop, #37 R&B, 1979), and, most recently, "Remember" (#35 R&B, 1983). Herb found yet another Peaches in 1992 and began performing more dance-oriented material.

Though it was responsible for popularizing the Seattle sound and style known as "grunge," Pearl Jam proved to be more than a flash-in-the-pan by expanding on its initial solid, guitar-heavy Led Zeppelin-influenced songs and by making good use of charismatic Eddie Vedder's impassioned vocals. Leaping from obscurity to superstardom, the band sold over 15 million copies of its first two albums. After a couple of years during which it got mired in high-profile controversies, Pearl Jam recovered and firmly established itself as a durable band working in a classic-rock mode.

Pearl Jam's roots in the Seattle scene go deep. In the mid-'80s, Jeff Ament and Stone Gossard were members of the seminal Seattle band Green River, which split in 1987. Half the band formed Mudhoney [see entry], while Gossard and Ament joined singer Andrew Wood in Mother Love Bone. One of the earliest Seattle bands to sign with a major label, Mother Love Bone seemed on the verge of breaking big when Wood died of a heroin overdose in 1990. Mercury Records wanted Gossard and Ament (with Bruce Fairweather on guitar and drummer Greg Gilmore) to record with a new singer, but the band declined. (Gossard, Ament, McCready, and Vedder, along with Soundgarden's Chris Cornell and Matt Cameron, recorded Temple of the Dog [#5, 1992], a memorial to Wood, in 1990.)

Gossard and Ament, along with Seattle veteran Mike McCready, started work on a demo tape in late 1990. They asked former Red Hot Chili Peppers drummer Jack Irons to join, giving him a copy of the tape. Irons was involved with his own band but passed the demo on to a singer he knew in San Diego, Eddie Vedder. Vedder immediately wrote lyrics to the songs and mailed back a tape that included his vocals; he was invited up to Seattle.

With the addition of drummer Dave Krusen, the new band was complete. They called themselves Mookie Blaylock, for the basketball player, but changed the name to Pearl Jam, after a psychedelic confection made by Vedder's half-Native American great-grandmother, Pearl. (The band did not forget Blaylock: Their debut album, Ten [#2, 1992], was named for his uniform number.) On the strength of its Mother Love Bone connections and a growing national interest in the Seattle scene, Pearl Jam was signed by Epic Records in early 1991. Krusen left the band after the sessions for Ten; he was replaced by Matt Chamberlain on tour, with Dave Abbruzzese filling the drum chair in the fall of 1991.

The band toured extensively, headlining small halls and opening for the Red Hot Chili Peppers, Neil Young, and U2. They headlined the 1992 Lollapalooza Tour and opened for Keith Richards on New Year's Eve 1992. Vedder, Gossard, and Ament took time out to play Matt Dillon's backing band, Citizen Dick, in the 1992 Seattle-based movie Singles.

Although Pearl Jam was originally marketed as an "alternative" band, its connection to classic rock of the '60s and '70s soon became apparent. Vedder filled in for Jim Morrison at the Doors reunion for the 1993 Rock and Roll Hall of Fame induction ceremonies; he also took part in concerts honoring Bob Dylan and Pete Townshend. The band backed Neil Young on "Rockin' in the Free World" at the 1993 MTV Video Music Awards.

It was apparent, though, that Vedder was having trouble coping with the demands of stardom: He would show up for photo sessions wearing a mask, and he was surly and uncommunicative in interviews. There were reports that he performed drunk, and in 1993 he was arrested in New Orleans for public drunkenness and disturbing the peace after a barroom brawl. None of this detracted from the band's popularity—Vs. [#1, 1993], its second album, sold a record-setting 1.3 million copies in its first 13 days of release.

Pearl Jam then canceled a summer tour when, in a public dispute over service charges against Ticketmaster, it couldn't keep admission prices as low as it wanted; band members also testified against Ticketmaster before Congress. That fight ultimately ended in retreat for Pearl Jam. The band did not make any videos to promote Vs. Instead, it went back into the studio and recorded its third album, Vitalogy. The vinyl version was released two weeks before the CD and cassette, debuting on the charts at #55—the first album to appear on Billboard's album chart solely on the basis of vinyl sales since the proliferation of the CD in the mid-'90s. Once the CD arrived in stores, Vitalogy zoomed to #1.

The following year, Pearl Jam backed Neil Young on his Mirror Ball album. The band also appeared at Young's Bridge School Benefit concert (one of several it has done over the years) as part of its increasing involvement in political activism and various charities. Indeed, over the years, Pearl Jam has supported such causes as Kosovar refugees, women's self-defense, opposition to the death penalty, and Ralph Nader's 2000 presidential campaign.

Though Pearl Jam was at the peak of its popularity in the mid-'90s, it also went through some rocky times. The holder of the drumming seat changed again as Abbruzzese was replaced by Jack Irons. The band's attempt to experiment with its sound, 1996's No Code [#1, 1996], met with tepid response. Despite its initial success, the album dropped out of the Top 20 within two months.

The band retreated to safer ground. Yield [#2, 1998] was straightforward hard rock and was accompanied by the band's first music video since Ten's "Jeremy." Pearl Jam also returned to playing mainstream arenas (many of them selling their tickets through Ticketmaster) in the summer; drummer Matt Cameron became a permanent addition that summer as well. The band members, especially Vedder, even started to look as if they were finally becoming comfortable with their status as rock stars. The group had also become strong enough to overcome a tragic accident—nine fans were crushed and suffocated during Pearl Jam's set at the Roskilde, Denmark, festival on June 30, 2000. Initially held "morally responsible" by the Danish police, the group was later cleared of all blame.

In many ways, Pearl Jam continues to defy expectations. For instance, it still plays exclusive shows for its fan-club members, who also receive limited-edition Christmas singles—one of them turning into the surprise hit “Last Kiss” (#2, 1999) when it got a wider release. And in September 2000, the band made history by self-releasing 25 live double albums in one week, and by having five of them enter the Billboard 200 simultaneously: 16/6/00: Spodek, Katowice, Poland (#103); 22/6/00: Fila Forum Arena, Milan, Italy (#125); 20/6/00: Arena di Verona, Verona, Italy (#134); 30/5/00: Wembley Arena, London, England (#137); and 26/6/00: Sporthalle, Hamburg, Germany (#175). Pearl Jam continued to release documents of its 2000 tour, reaching a total of 72 sets by mid-2001. The one triple CD, 11/6/00: Seattle, Washington, was the most popular, entering the chart at #98.

Ann Peebles

Born Apr. 27, 1947, East St. Louis, MO
 1971—Part Time Love (Hi) 1972—Straight From the Heart
 1974—I Can't Stand the Rain 1976—Tellin' It 1978—If This Is Heaven 1992—Full Time Love (Bullseye Blues) 1996—Fill This World With Love.

Soul singer Ann Peebles is best known for her 1973 hit “I Can't Stand the Rain,” but her grainy Memphis-style soul singing has influenced such stars as Bonnie Raitt. Peebles began performing at age eight when she joined the Peebles Choir, a gospel group founded by her great-grandfather. After graduating from high school, she started working at St. Louis nightclubs. In 1969 producer Willie Mitchell signed her to his Memphis-based Hi Records, where she worked with the same session band that Al Green used. Her first single, “Walk Away,” hit #22, and later hits like “Part Time Love” (#7 R&B), “I Pity the Fool” (#18 R&B), and “Breaking Up Somebody's Home” (#13 R&B) sold well, particularly in the South.

“I Can't Stand the Rain” (#38 pop, #6 R&B) was written by Peebles and her husband, Don Bryant. “‘Rain’ is the greatest record I've heard in two years,” said John Lennon at the time of its release. The song has been covered by numerous performers ranging from rock bands to disco divas. It was later included in the film The Commitments (1991). Peebles continued recording through the late '70s, after which she and her husband basically left the music business to raise their family and run a home preschool program for children. The pair also remained active on the Memphis gospel scene. In 1992 Peebles returned to recording with her first record in a decade and a half, Full Time Love. The 1996 followup, Fill This World With Love, features Mavis Staples and Shirley Brown.

Teddy Pendergrass

Born Mar. 26, 1950, Philadelphia, PA
 1977—Teddy Pendergrass (Philadelphia International) 1978—Life Is a Song Worth Singing 1979—Teddy; Teddy Live! Coast to Coast 1980—TP 1981—It's Time for Love 1982—This

One's for You 1983—Heaven Only Knows 1984—Greatest Hits; Love Language (Asylum) 1985—Workin' It Back 1988—Joy (Elektra) 1990—Truly Blessed 1993—A Little More Magic 1997—Greatest Hits (Philadelphia International); You and I (Surefire) 1998—This Christmas (I'd Rather Have Love) 2001—Greatest Slow Jams (EMD/Right Stuff).

Teddy Pendergrass is a singular voice in R&B. His gospel-influenced, sensual style is an oft-cited influence on contemporary male vocalists, and his early solo efforts placed him alongside Marvin Gaye and Al Green among the most influential singers of the era. Despite a 1982 car accident that left him partially paralyzed, Pendergrass has continued recording, writing, and garnering Grammy nominations. Already a star as lead vocalist of Harold Melvin and the Blue Notes [see entry], Pendergrass launched a solo career in 1976 that achieved R&B-to-pop crossover success at a time when the charts were becoming increasingly segregated. He also became the first black male vocalist to have four consecutive studio albums certified platinum.

The seventh and only surviving son of a deeply religious mother, Pendergrass attended a Pentecostal church seven days a week, where he sang. Though he received a calling to minister as a child, he was never ordained. His father, who had abandoned the family a month before Pendergrass' birth, was murdered 12 years later. Although Pendergrass' mother forbade him to listen to secular music, he was exposed to it on the streets of North Philadelphia, where he lived just blocks from the legendary Uptown Theater. Working with his mother at Sciolla's, a popular South Philly nightclub, Pendergrass got his first glimpse of show business close-up, watching acts like Chubby Checker. It is also where he taught himself to play the drums.

Pendergrass sang with informal groups in his teens and hit the road at 18 as a drummer with Little Royal, an R&B performer who claimed to be James Brown's brother. Afterward,

Teddy Pendergrass

Pendergrass returned to Philadelphia, where he joined the backup band for an imposter group claiming to be the Cadillac (of "Speedoo" fame). When Harold Melvin tapped the group to replace a recently dissolved Blue Notes lineup, Pendergrass came along. Sometime around 1970, Melvin promoted him to the lead-vocalist spot. A contract with Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff's Philadelphia International followed, and the group became one of the top vocal groups of the mid-'70s.

In fall 1975 Pendergrass quit the Blue Notes. Working with manager Shep Gordon (Blondie, Alice Cooper), Pendergrass was positioned to cross over beyond the R&B market. With the release of his solo debut, he was marketed as a sex symbol and became known to his fans as Teddy Bear. "I Don't Love You Anymore" (#41 pop, #5 R&B, 1977) was the single from that platinum album (#17 pop, #5 R&B). His next LP, Life Is a Song Worth Singing (#11 pop, #1 R&B, 1978), was highlighted by the seductive "Close the Door" (#25 pop, #1 R&B, 1978), a steamy tale continued the next summer with "Turn Off the Lights" (#48 pop, #2 R&B) from Teddy (#5 pop, #1 R&B, 1979).

Backed by his Teddy Bear Orchestra, Pendergrass in concert fueled a reaction among female fans much like that of his idol, Jackie Wilson. "For Women Only" concerts were instituted, with ladies given stuffed teddy bears to fondle and chocolate teddy bear lollipops to lick during the show. Some of the excitement was captured in the gold Teddy Live! Coast to Coast (#33 pop, #5 R&B, 1979). Pendergrass' image as a confident (some would say arrogant) playboy fit offstage as well (to wit, a Main Line mansion, a collection of luxury cars, and a brief affair with Marvin Gaye's wife, Jan). Nonetheless, he turned down the heat on TP (#14 pop, #3 R&B, 1980), which featured the old-school soul classic "Love TKO" (#44 pop, #2 R&B, 1980) and a duet with Stephanie Mills on "Feel the Fire." They also collaborated on the single "Two Hearts" (#40 pop, #2 R&B, 1981). It's Time for Love (#19 pop, #6 R&B, 1981) included "You're My Latest, My Greatest Inspiration" (#43 pop, #4 R&B, 1981) and went gold. Pendergrass made his film debut in Soup for One. He also sang one song, "Dream Girl," on the Chic-produced soundtrack.

On March 18, 1982, Pendergrass' spinal cord was severely injured when his Rolls-Royce smashed into a highway divider and then a tree on a winding road outside Philadelphia. A faulty electrical system that rendered the power steering inoperable was later determined to be the cause of the crash. Pendergrass was paralyzed from the chest down and left with only limited use of arms. After months of physical therapy, he returned home to discover that Philadelphia International and CBS had no interest in continuing with him. (Two albums, This One's for You [#59 pop, #6 R&B, 1982] and Heaven Only Knows [#123 pop, #9 R&B, 1983], were compiled from the vaults.) Based on a demo of "You're My Choice (Choose Me)" (a finished version, a #15 R&B hit in 1984) produced by Luther Vandross, Elektra/Asylum's Bob Krasnow gambled on Pendergrass. The first album, Love Language (#38 pop, #4 R&B, 1984), included his comeback hit—and Whitney Houston's first big hit—in "Hold Me"

(#46 pop, #5 R&B, 1984). Pendergrass' video for the semi-autobiographical "In My Time" showed him singing in his wheelchair. Though Pendergrass had to undergo grueling physical therapy to regain his vocal strength, he persevered. In the years since the accident, Pendergrass has survived addictions to cocaine and alcohol, several life-threatening complications, a second car accident that resulted in a potentially fatal injury to his liver, and, at one point, a desire to commit suicide.

Pendergrass returned to the stage at 1985's Live Aid, performing "Reach Out and Touch (Somebody's Hand)" with his friends Nickolas Ashford and Valerie Simpson. Though his recording schedule was sporadic and his personal appearances extremely limited, his albums consistently hit the R&B Top 20: Workin' It Back (#96 pop, #6 R&B, 1985), Joy (#54 pop, #2 R&B, 1988), Truly Blessed (#49 pop, #4 R&B, 1991), and A Little More Magic (#92 pop, #13 R&B, 1993). His biggest hits from this period include "Love 4/2" (#6 R&B, 1986), "Joy" (#77 pop, #1 R&B, 1988), the Grammy-nominated "Make It With You" (#23 R&B, 1990) (from the Elektra tribute collection Rubaiyat—Elektra's 40th Anniversary), "It Should've Been You" (#1 R&B, 1991), the Grammy-nominated, Gerald Levert-written and -produced "Voodoo" (#25 R&B, 1993), and "Believe in Love" (#105 pop, #14 R&B, 1994). In an attempt to exert more control over his career, Pendergrass began writing some of his material and executive producing his albums, beginning with Workin'.

In 1996 he toured for the first time since his accident, with a 20th-anniversary revival of Vernetta Carroll's Your Arms Too Short to Box With God, for which Carroll wrote him a special part. The show and Pendergrass received rave reviews in all 22 cities they visited. The show's climax was him singing his own "Truly Blessed," an autobiographical song that also provided the title for his 1998 autobiography (cowritten with Patricia Romanowski). An activist for the rights of the disabled, Pendergrass in 1998 founded the Teddy Pendergrass Education/Occupation Alliance for the Disabled. In 2000 he performed the Blue Notes' inspirational "Wake Up Everybody" at the Republican National Convention. In 2001 he returned to the concert stage.

The Penguins

Cleveland Duncan (b. July 23, 1935, Los Angeles), lead voc.;

Curtis Williams (b. 1935), tenor voc.; Dexter Tisby (b. 1936), voc.; Bruce Tate (b. 1935), tenor voc.

1955—(– Tate; + Randolph Jones, baritone voc.) 1957—The Cool, Cool Penguins (Dootone) 1993—The Authentic Golden Hits of the Penguins (Juke Box Treasures).

After attracting a strong local following in the early '50s, the Penguins scored a big hit with a song written either by Curtis Williams and Jesse Belvin or by Belvin alone (sources vary), "Earth Angel." The song was #8 pop, #1 R&B in 1954, and has since sold an estimated 10 million copies. Unfortunately, the Crew-Cuts covered that same song a year later and made it a bigger pop hit (something they'd earlier done with the Chords' "Sh-Boom").

The Penguins switched from Dootone to Mercury (they were part of a package signing engineered by manager Buck Ram that also included the Platters) to Atlantic Records, never achieving follow-up success commensurate with their one and only hit. After one release for Atlantic and one for Sun State Records, they returned to California nearly broke and split up. Lead singer Duncan re-formed the band several times. In 1963 they recorded a song written for them by Frank Zappa and Ray Collins (later of the Mothers of Invention), "Memes of El Monte." When it failed to hit, Tisby and some latter-day members joined the Coasters. Tisby eventually moved to Hawaii. For decades the Penguins, lead by sole surviving original member Duncan, have made steady appearances at '50s revival concerts. As of 1998 Duncan was still performing.

Michael Penn

Born Aug. 1, 1958, New York, NY
 1989—March (RCA) 1992—Free-for-All 1997—Resigned
 (57/Epic) 2000—MP4: Days Since a Lost Time Accident
 (Sony/Epic).

The older brother of actor Sean Penn, Michael Penn gained some fame and success in his own right with his Beatlesque debut album, March, which earned him Best New Artist MTV Video Music Award (1990) and spawned a hit single in "No Myth" (#13, 1990).

The son of actor/director Leo Penn and actress Eileen Ryan, Penn (whose other brother Christopher also became a movie actor) was born in New York's Greenwich Village in 1958 and moved with his family to L.A. a year later. Penn grew up listening to the Beatles, and, by junior high, he had learned guitar and played in a band covering hits by David Bowie, Cream, and the Rolling Stones.

At Santa Monica High School, Penn began writing what he would later call "earnest, downbeat" songs. In the early '80s he formed a band called Doll Congress, which, despite having enough of a local following to open once for R.E.M., did not work often enough to support Penn, whose odd jobs included appearing as an extra on TV's St. Elsewhere. A year after he left the group, Penn performed on a 1987 episode of Saturday Night Live that his brother Sean hosted. Penn later said the experience made him very nervous, but he subsequently hooked up with Doll Congress keyboardist Patrick Warren and began work on the songs that would make up March.

March garnered critical raves for its thoughtful folk pop, and sparked by the success of the "No Myth" single and video, it sold well, too (#31, 1989). One of the most intriguing things about the album was Warren's extensive and resourceful use of the Chamberlin, an antiquated keyboard quite similar to the proto-sampling Mellotron in that each key activates a tape recording of a note played by an actual instrument (violin, flute, oboe, etc.). The album yielded another, lesser hit single in "This & That" (#53, 1990). Penn's follow-up album, Free-for-All, while similar in sound to March, fared far worse commercially, reaching only as high as #160 in just two weeks on the chart. Penn took five years to return with Resigned, which he recorded for Pearl Jam producer Brendan O'Brien's Atlanta-based 57 Records imprint. It was a big year for Penn, who also married singer/songwriter Aimee Mann and formed an important alliance with filmmaker Paul Thomas Anderson, through which he wrote music for the films Hard Eight and Boogie Nights. In 2000 Penn released his fourth album, MP4: Days Since a Lost Time Accident, and he joined Mann on an offbeat Acoustic Vaudeville tour.

John Renbourn Group: 1977—Maid in Bedlam.

Bert Jansch and John Renbourn: 1992—After the Dance (Shanachie).

Jacqui McShee solo: 1995—About Thyme (with Gerry Conway and Spencer Cozens) (GJS, U.K.) 2000—Passé Avant (as Jacqui McShee's Pentangle) (Park, U.K.).

With the virtuoso acoustic guitars of Bert Jansch and John Renbourn, folksinger Jacqui McShee, and the jazz-based rhythm section of Danny Thompson and Terry Cox (ex-Alexis Korner Blues Band), Pentangle achieved solid cult status with a unique repertoire that included traditional English folk songs, jazz, blues, and occasional originals, all intricately arranged. It rarely used amplification until the muted electric guitars of Cruel Sister. Pentangle's debut LP did fairly well on the U.K. chart; the rest achieved modest U.S. and U.K. success.

Upon the group's breakup in 1973, Thompson worked with Nick Drake and John Martyn, while Jansch and Renbourn reunited (they'd made a duo LP, Bert and John, in 1966) for tours and LPs. Renbourn had begun making solo LPs while with Pentangle, and he has over a dozen of his own records out and has recorded a number of albums with Stefan Grossman. McShee joined John Renbourn's band from 1974 to 1981. In 1983 the original lineup re-formed solely for Open the Door, but a newer lineup that included cofounders Jansch and McShee continued until the mid-'90s. The current band is essentially an extension of McShee's solo career. Danny Thompson toured with Richard Thompson in a quartet that included Pete Dinklage and former Fairport Convention and Jethro Tull member Dave Pegg.

Pere Ubu's music is a unique mixture of control and anarchy, incorporating driving rock, synthesized "found" sounds, falling-apart song structures, and David Thomas' careening vocals and wide-eyed lyrics.

Founding members Thomas and Laughner, both rock journalists (Laughner with Creem), named the band after the hero of Ubu Roi, a play by French absurdist Alfred Jarry. Ubu was part of the fertile Ohio rock scene that also fostered Tin Huey and Devo. Their first single, "30 Seconds Over Tokyo" b/w "Heart of Darkness," was released independently in 1975 on Hearthan and reissued on Datapanik. In early 1976 the initial lineup recorded another two-sided single, "Final Solution" b/w "Cloud 149," traveled to New York several times, and disbanded. In July they regrouped as the quintet that recorded their first three albums. Tim Wright moved to New York and joined the no-wave band DNA. In 1977 Laughner died of alcohol and drug abuse.

Though it sold only 15,000 copies in the U.S., The Modern Dance influenced an entire school of postpunk bands, including R.E.M., Hüsker Dü, and the Pixies. By touring the U.S. and, in 1978, England, Pere Ubu became well known on the burgeoning new-wave circuit and particularly popular in England. After their British shows, they signed with Chrysalis and released Dub Housing, whose dark, surreal atmosphere made it a classic underground rock album.

Herman left for solo work in 1979, making an album with some Cleveland avant-punk cohorts (Frontier Justice) before moving to Houston. He was replaced by Mayo Thompson, formerly of the Texas psychedelic band Red Crayola, with whom Pere Ubu recorded The Art of Walking. Ubu members also appeared on Crayola's Soldier Talk. Artistic and personal squabbles broke up the band again in early 1982, with Maimone and Krauss leaving to form their own group, Home and Garden.

In 1981 Thomas, an avowed Jehovah's Witness, recorded The Sound of the Sand, the first of two solo albums with British folk-rock guitarist Richard Thompson. He did a few solo concerts in 1982 backed only by prerecorded tapes and Tin Huey saxophonist Ralph Carney. By 1984, Thomas had moved to England, though he would eventually commute to Cleveland for frequent musical collaborations. The personnel on Thomas' 1987 album, Blame the Messenger, became the re-formed Pere Ubu of The Tenement Year, which included a two-drum lineup featuring Krauss, again, and British prog-rocker Chris Cutler, of Henry Cow and the Art Bears.

Longtime keyboardist Allen Ravenstine left Ubu after 1989's near-pop album, Cloudland, to become a Northwest Airlines pilot. He was replaced by Captain Beefheart sideman Eric Drew Feldman on the even more commercial-sounding Worlds in Collision, produced by Gil Norton (Pixies). Feldman left to join ex-Pixies leader Charles Thompson (a.k.a. Frank Black). In 1993 Pere Ubu recorded Story of My Life, initially titled Johnny Rivers Live at the Whisky A Go Go, with its most stripped-down lineup yet. The record failed again to attract mainstream interest, despite rave reviews. Raygun Suitcase followed two years later to an identical fate. One sign of the band's continued influence was the 1996 release of Datapanik in the Year Zero, a five-disc retrospective. (Three years later, Thomas' solo work would get similar treatment on the five-disc David Thomas, Monster.) In 1998 Thomas staged Disastrodome, a theatrical/musical performance/lecture, in London and New York. That same year, guitarist Tom Herman recorded with Pere Ubu for the first time in two decades on the acclaimed Pennsylvania. It was followed a year later by the live Apocalypse Now. David Thomas & the Pale Orchestra released Mirror Man in 1999 and featured such guests as Linda Thompson and Peter Hammill.

One of the architects of rock & roll, Carl Perkins is best known as the writer and original singer of the rockabilly anthem "Blue Suede Shoes" (#2, 1956). Along with Jerry Lee Lewis, Johnny Cash, and Elvis Presley, Perkins was one of the seminal rockabilly artists on Sam Phillips' Sun label, but a series of bad breaks, followed by personal problems, undermined his solo career. Despite that, Perkins persevered, creating a body of work that has been both critically acclaimed and extremely influential on songwriters, guitar players, and singers alike.

Perkins grew up poor in a sharecropping family that picked cotton in various northwestern Tennessee fields around Tiptonville. Perkins was first put to work at age six, and it was in the fields that he first heard gospel songs. At night, he heard hillbilly country and Delta blues over the family radio. An older, black field hand befriended Perkins and taught him to play guitar; by age 10 Perkins was entertaining his classmates. He made his radio debut with his school band, singing "Home on the Range."

He kicked off his musical career in the mid-'40s, performing at local dances with his brothers Jay and Clayton as the Perkins Brothers Band. In 1953 drummer W.S. "Fluke" Holland joined. The next year, after hearing Presley's debut Sun single, "Blue Moon of Kentucky" (a Bill Monroe song Perkins and his group had been playing since 1949), Perkins and his brothers drove to Memphis to audition for Phillips. Shortly thereafter, they signed to the label and released Perkins' first single, "Movie Magg" (a song Perkins wrote at age 13) b/w "Turn Around." In early 1955 came "Let the Jukebox Keep On Playing" b/w "Gone Gone Gone." Perkins' biggest hit came in late 1956. "Blue Suede Shoes" was an instant smash and made Perkins the first white country artist to cross over to the R&B chart as well. A country, pop, and R&B hit, "Blue Suede Shoes" alternated with Elvis Presley's first post-Sun single, "Heartbreak Hotel," for the top spots on national and regional charts. (Shortly thereafter, Presley issued his "Blue Suede Shoes"; over time, Perkins' original sold more copies.)

Perkins was at the height of his career when tragedy struck. He and his group were driving to New York to appear on Pery Como's television program when their driver fell asleep at the wheel, causing the car to hit the back of a truck before plunging into water. The driver was killed, and Carl and his brother Jay were seriously injured. Although Perkins was back on the road in about a month. Jay never fully recovered and was later diagnosed with a brain tumor, from which he died in 1958. Years later, Perkins admitted that he used his brother's death as a reason to drink. A quiet, self-effacing man, Perkins later observed, "I felt out of place when 'Blue Suede Shoes' was Number One. I stood on the Steel Pier in 1956 in Atlantic City . . . and the Goodyear blimp flew over with my name in big lights. And I stood there and shook and actually cried. That should have been something that would elevate a guy to say, 'Well, I've made it.' But it put fear in me."

In early 1958 Perkins moved to Columbia Records, where he recorded several more minor rockabilly hits, but by the early '60s, he'd hit a low point. On a British tour in 1964, Perkins was surprised to learn that the Beatles admired him and that George Harrison taught himself to play guitar by copying Perkins' records. Perkins became friendly with the Beatles and oversaw the sessions where they recorded five of his songs—"Matchbox," "Honey Don't," "Your True Love," "Blue Suede Shoes," and "Everybody's Trying to Be My Baby." Rick Nelson, Johnny Burnette, and Patsy Cline, among others, also covered his songs. Like many other rockabilly artists, Perkins turned to country material as the rockabilly trend died, and by 1965 he was part of Johnny Cash's touring troupe. In 1968 he wrote the huge hit for Cash, "Daddy Sang Bass" (#1, 1969). When Cash got his national television show in 1969, Perkins became a regular guest, and he toured and recorded with Cash as well.

As a solo artist, Perkins cut some country records and recorded an album with NRBO. After the Cash show ended, he toured as Johnny's guitarist until 1975. He then formed the C.P. Express with his sons Greg and Stan, and started his own label, Suede, on which he released two albums (The Carl Perkins Show and Carl Perkins Live at Austin City Limits). In late 1978 Perkins released a basic rock & roll LP called Ol' Blue Suede's Back, which sold 100,000 copies in England. In 1981 he did some sessions for Paul McCartney's Tug of War; in early 1982, an album entitled Survivors, recorded live in Germany with Jerry Lee Lewis and Johnny Cash, was released. Three years later Lewis, Cash, and Orbison were reunited for The Class of '55, a special event that included such Perkins disciples as John Fogerty and Rick Nelson.

Through the years, Perkins continued to record and write. He cowrote the Judds' 1989 hit "Let Me Tell You About Love," on which he played lead guitar. In 1992 Dolly Parton had a C&W hit with a song Perkins wrote for her, "Silver and Gold." In 1992 Perkins was diagnosed with throat cancer; following treatment, he was declared cancer-free a year later, and kept writing and recording. He owned two Jackson, Tennessee, restaurants; one, Suede's, is filled with his career memorabilia. In 1981 he founded the Carl Perkins Center for the Prevention of Child Abuse. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1987. Perkins' 1996 album, Go, Cat, Go! featured Willie Nelson, John Fogerty, Paul Simon, and Tom Petty. His authorized biography, Go, Cat, Go! The Life and Times of Carl Perkins, the King of Rockabilly, by David McGee, was published in 1994. Perkins suffered a series of strokes and died in 1998.

Working under many names—as well as in many capacities: disc jockey, producer, record businessman, songwriter, singer—Lee Perry has been a guiding force in the development of reggae. In addition to his own trailblazing music, he has produced hits for the Wailers, Junior Byles, Max Romeo, the Heptones, Gregory Isaacs, Junior Murvin, and the Clash. Known for his bizarre behavior and stream-of-consciousness interviews, he often dons costumes and headdresses made of found objects such as feathers, toys, playing cards, and coins.

He began his career in his teens as Little Lee Perry, a DJ for Coxson's Downbeat Sound System. When he made his recording debut with "The Chicken Scratch" on Dodd's Studio One label in the early '60s, he became known as Scratch Perry. For most of the '60s, he worked at Studio One as A&R director and producer of Jamaican hits for Justin Hines, Delroy Wilson, and Shenley Dufus, among others; he also recorded his own material like "Trials and Crosses" and "Doctor Dick."

In 1968 Perry left Dodd and worked briefly—as producer and performer—with Joe Gibbs, Byron Lee, and Clancy Eccles. With the success of Perry's first independent release, an instrumental called "The Upsetter," he acquired another sobriquet—the Upsetter. He named his label Upsetter and his studio band the Upsetters. That same year, 1968, he had a hit with "People Funny Boy," billing himself as Lee "King" Perry. An unusually slow song for its time, "People Funny Boy" was one of the first real reggae hits. Most of Perry's late-'60s hits, like "Clint Eastwood," "Live Injection," and "Return of Django" (#5 U.K., 1969), were instrumentals that set his spaghetti Western-style themes in reggae as dry, spacious, and ominous as the western desert.

In 1969 Perry began working with the Wailers. During the next three years, he oversaw their transformation from a ska vocal trio into a full-fledged five-piece reggae band—with bassist Aston "Family Man" Barrett and his drummer brother Carlton from the Upsetters—that would become the most acclaimed Jamaican group in the world. "Duppy Conqueror," "Small Axe," "Kaya," and "Sun Is Shining" were some of the Wailers' songs Perry wrote. The Wailers began producing themselves for their own label in 1971 but were reunited with Perry for occasional sessions in the late '70s.

Signed to Island in 1973, Perry and his Upsetters maintained a rocky relationship with the company on and off for several years. In 1974 he built his Black Ark Studio in the backyard of his Kingston home. Perry was one of the pioneers of the reggae instrumental studio art known as dubbing—reworking a taped track by removing some parts and exaggerating others. His use of technology such as drum machines and phase shifters gave his mixes a cutting-edge sound that had a profound influence on dub and, later, dancehall. His work in the '70s with toasters like U-Roy, Prince Jazzbo, I-Roy, Big Youth, and Dennis Alcapone established him in the forefront of toasters' dub; he would make hit after hit from the same rhythm track until the tape wore out. Perry recorded his own toasting under the pseudonym of Jah Lion. He also recorded as Pipecock Jackson and under his own name. His most popular releases in the '70s, "Station Underground News" and "Roast Fish and Corn Bread," were vocals.

Perry reportedly torched his studio in 1980 and began traveling. His musical output became more eccentric and experimental, though it remained highly respected by critics. He lived in Amsterdam in the mid-'80s, and then in London. In 1990 Perry moved to Switzerland, only occasionally returning to Jamaica, where he eventually abandoned plans to rebuild his historic Black Ark Studio. In 1997 Perry's public profile rose with the release of Arkology, a three-disc anthology. That same year the Beastie Boys invited him to appear at the Tibetan Freedom Concert in New York (where he appeared in a football helmet covered with small mirrors), followed by an extensive U.S. tour with sometime collaborator Neal "the Mad Professor" Fraser. By now he was acknowledged as a key influence on '90s trip-hop and electronic dance music. In 2000 he released the recently completed On the Wire—an album begun a decade earlier, before Perry disappeared to Switzerland with the tapes—to more critical acclaim.

The Persuasions

Formed 1962, Brooklyn, NY

Jerry Lawson (b. Jan. 23, 1944, Fort Lauderdale, FL), lead voc.; Jayotis Washington (b. May 12, 1941, Detroit, MI), tenor voc.; Joseph "Jesse" Russell (b. Sep. 25, 1939, Henderson, NC), tenor voc.; Herbert "Toubo" Rhoad (b. Oct. 1, 1944, Bamberg County, SC; d. Dec. 8, 1988), baritone voc.; Jimmy "Bro" Hayes (b. Nov. 12, 1943, Hopewell, VA), bass voc. 1968—A Cappella (Straight) 1971—We Came to Play (Capitol) 1972—Street Corner Symphony; Spread the Word 1973—We Still Ain't Got No Band (MCA) 1974—More Than Before (A&M); I Just Want to Sing With My Friends (- Washington; + Willie Daniels) 1977—Chirpin' (Elektra) (- Daniels; + Washington) 1979—Comin' at Ya (Flying Fish) 1983—Good News (Rounder) 1986—No Frills 1988—Live at the Whispering Gallery (- Rhoad) 1993—Toubo's Song (Hammer N' Nails) 1994—

Right Around the Corner (Bullseye Blues) 1996—Sincerely 1997—You're All I Want for Christmas; Man Oh Man (Capitol) 1999—On the Good Ship Lollipop (Music for Little People) 2000—Sunday Morning Soul (Bullseye Blues); Frankly A Cappella: The Persuasions Sing Zappa! (Earthbeat/Rhino); Might As Well: The Persuasions Sing Grateful Dead (Grateful Dead/Arista).

Since 1962, the Persuasions' unique brand of a cappella has made them a popular live attraction and sought-after as backup singers. Tenors Jesse Russell and Jayotis Washington, baritones Toubou Rhoad and Jerry Lawson, and nonpareil bass Jimmy Hayes started the group in Brooklyn, where all had migrated. Each had sung with gospel and secular vocal groups, and from the beginning the Persuasions have mixed doo-wop, soul, and pop into their repertoire.

The Persuasions' first recording was a single on Minit/United Artist Records in 1966. The following year they were taped at a Jersey City performance by doo-wop fan David Dashev, who got the tape to Frank Zappa, who released it as A Cappella in 1968 on his Straight Records. When Warner Bros. purchased Straight, label executives wanted to record the Persuasions with a band, but the group refused. From 1971 to 1973 the Persuasions made three records for Capitol. With MCA Records in 1973, they cut one album, We Still Ain't Got No Band. The following year Washington left the group and was replaced by Willie Daniels; Daniels left in 1977, and Washington returned that year.

Two mid-'70s albums with A&M, More Than Before and I Just Want to Sing With My Friends, included instrumental backing and resulted in two singles making the lower end of the R&B chart. "I Really Got It Bad for You" in 1974 and "One Thing on My Mind" in 1975. From 1974 on, the Persuasions worked steadily as guest vocalists behind Stevie Wonder, Phoebe Snow, Ellen McIlwaine, Don McLean, and others. They cut the critically acclaimed Chirpin' for Elektra in 1977, with Dashev producing. After backing Joni Mitchell on a 1979–80 tour, the Persuasions were featured on her Shadows and Light live album, including the single "Why Do Fools Fall in Love?" With Rhoad's death in 1988, the group became a quartet. It was featured prominently in Spike Lee's 1990 television special Do It A Cappella and on the accompanying album. In the mid-'90s director Fred Farnes completed the acclaimed film Spread the Word: The Persuasions Sing A Cappella. Extant for over 35 years, the vocal ensemble tours and records frequently. Recently the Persuasions issued an album of kids' music (1999's On the Good Ship Lollipop) and tributes to Zappa and the Grateful Dead (2000's Frankly A Cappella and Might As Well).

Pet Shop Boys

Formed Aug. 1981, London, Eng.

Neil Tennant (b. Neil Francis Tennant, July 10, 1954, North Shields, Northumberland, Eng.), voc.; Chris Lowe (b. Christopher Sean Lowe, Oct. 4, 1959, Blackpool, Lancashire, Eng.), kybds.

1986—Please (EMI); Disco 1987—Actually 1988—Introspective 1990—Behavior 1991—Discography 1993—Very 1994—Disco 2 1995—Alternative 1996—Bilingual (Atlantic) 1999—Nightlife (Parlophone/Sire).

Like the Monty Python comedy troupe, the duo Pet Shop Boys could have been conceived only by the English. Less a band per se than a musical vehicle for wry, cheeky commentary on pop culture, Pet Shop Boys—singer Neil Tennant and keyboardist Chris Lowe—won kudos for their clever, danceable synth pop and deadpan ballads, which were as tender as they were irreverent.

Lowe was an architecture student and Tennant a journalist when they met in 1981 in an electronics shop and discovered they shared a passion for synthesizers and dance music. As a youth, Tennant had been active in theater and had sung and played guitar in a band called Dust. Lowe had studied piano and trombone and had played the latter in a dance-standard band. Calling themselves Pet Shop Boys, a name taken from friends who actually worked in a pet shop, Tennant and Lowe began writing songs together. In 1983 Tennant, then an editor at the British pop music journal Smash Hits, hooked up with producer Bobby "O" Orlando while on business in New York. Orlando worked on an early version of the Boys' first single, "West End Girls."

In 1985 the finished mix of "West End Girls" shot to #1 in numerous countries, including the U.S., where Pet Shop Boys' debut album, Please, peaked at #7. Please also spawned the pop hit "Opportunities (Let's Make Lots of Money)" (#10). An album of dance remixes, Disco, followed in 1986. In 1987 Boys scored another three Top 10 singles in America: "It's a Sin" (#9), "What Have I Done to Deserve This?" (#2), a duet between Tennant and his favorite female singer, Dusty Springfield, and a remake of an Elvis standard made a hit years later by Willie Nelson, "Always on My Mind" (#4).

In the summer of 1988 Pet Shop Boys released the documentary film It Couldn't Happen Here. After putting out another album that year, Introspective, the duo produced Liza Minnelli's 1989 album, Results, which featured a high-tech rendition of Stephen Sondheim's "Losing My Mind." Later that year Tennant cowrote and sang on "Getting Away With It," the debut single by Electronic, a group formed by New Order's Bernard Sumner and ex-Smiths guitarist Johnny Marr.

Pet Shop Boys have continued to reap acclaim with the albums Behavior (#45, 1990) and Very (#20, 1993). In 1991, on the heels of a well-received single seguing U2's "Where the Streets Have No Name" with Frankie Valli's "Can't Take My Eyes Off of You," they released Discography, a singles compilation. Following the pair's production of Boy George's single "The Crying Game" in 1992, Very included a remake of the Village People's "Go West," the once-triumphant song now sounding like an elegy for AIDS victims. The next two years saw repackaged releases: 1994's Disco 2 was a dance remix album, while 1995's Alternative was a collection of B sides. The duo's next new studio release, 1996's Bilingual, explored Latin rhythms; it was not particularly successful or popular. But 1999's Nightlife (#84, 1999), backed by the Boys' first U.S. tour in eight years—and boasting an elaborate set and costumes—was a hit with the dance-club crowd, thanks to the pulsating #1 Club Play hit "New York City Boy" (#53, 1999). The album also included the straightforwardly named "You Only Tell Me You Love Me When You're Drunk" and a duet with Kylie Minogue, "In Denial," the latter from a set of songs Tennant and Lowe were writing for a stage musical about gay club life. Also in 1999, Tennant and Lowe sued conservative British author Roger Scruton for libel, based on the writer's implication in his book An Intelligent Person's Guide to Culture that the Pet Shop Boys' recordings owed more to technology in the studio than any creativity on the members' part. The Boys won an undisclosed sum in the suit.

Pete Rock and C.L. Smooth

Formed 1984, Mount Vernon, NY

Pete Rock (b. Peter Phillips, June 21, 1970, Mount Vernon), voc.; C.L. Smooth (b. Corey Penn, Oct. 8, 1968, New Rochelle, NY), DJ.

1992—Mecca & the Soul Brother (Elektra) 1994—The Main Ingredient.

Pete Rock solo: 1998—Soul Survivor (Loud/RCA).

Pete Rock and C.L. Smooth are rappers well respected for both their own work and Rock's production of other rap acts. The duo met in their teens in "money-earnin'" Mount Vernon, home of such hip-hop stars as Al B. Sure! and Heavy D. They began recording raps on Rock's cassette player after school, until Eddie F., the most popular local DJ and a budding producer, brought them to his 12-track. Eddie put Rock and Smooth on a remix of Johnny Gill's gold single "Rub U the Right Way," which eventually landed them their first gig outside their neighborhood, in Madison Square Garden with Gill.

Mecca & the Soul Brother (#43 pop, #7 R&B, 1992) was praised for its honest stories of urban romance and living and for Rock's mix of jazz, R&B, and reggae. "They Reminisce Over You (T.R.O.Y.)" (#58 pop, #10 R&B, 1992) was a #1 rap hit. The Main Ingredient followed two years later (#51 pop, #9 R&B, 1994), after which the duo called it quits. Rock has produced records by Kid n' Play, Shabba Ranks, and Heavy D and remixed singles for Public Enemy, Naughty by Nature, and Run-DM.C. Soul Survivor (#39 pop, #7 R&B, 1998), Rock's solo debut, features guest appearances by members of the Wu-Tang Clan and the Roots, as well as C.L. Smooth. In 1999 the MC rapped on "World Renown," a single by Norwegian producer Tommy Tee.

Peter and Gordon

Formed 1963, London, Eng.

Peter Asher (b. June 22, 1944, London), voc., gr.; Gordon Waller (b. June 4, 1945, Braemar, Scot.), voc., gr.

1964—A World Without Love (Capitol) 1965—Peter and

Gordon; True Love Ways 1966—The Best of Peter and Gordon 1967—Lady Godiva.

Peter and Gordon were an enormously successful British pop/folk team in the mid-'60s. After their breakup, Gordon all but vanished into obscurity, but Peter Asher has kept his name in the limelight as a manager/producer of Linda Ronstadt, James Taylor, 10,000 Maniacs, and others.

Both Peter and Gordon came from upper-middle-class families and were products of private schools, the two meeting at Westminster School for Boys in London. They worked together as a campus duo, in an Everly Brothers vein, and decided to try the London club scene. Because of their school's 9 P.M. dorm curfew, they had to sneak over a 12-foot spiked fence to do it, which they managed successfully for about a year. Eventually they left school to concentrate on music, recording demos and making the record-company rounds.

Asher and Waller landed a contract in 1963 and within a year had their first and biggest hit, "World Without Love," written by Paul McCartney, who at the time was courting Asher's sister Jane. The tune went to #1 in the U.S. and the U.K. in 1964.

Between 1964 and 1967 the duo had a string of hit singles that included: "Nobody I Know" (#12) and "I Don't Want to See You Again" (#16) in 1964; Del Shannon's "I Go to Pieces" (#9), Buddy Holly's "True Love Ways" (#14), and "To Know You Is to Love You" (#24) in 1965; and "Woman" (#14) and "Lady Godiva" (#6) in 1966.

In 1968 the duo broke up, and Asher became A&R head of the Beatles' Apple label, where he signed and produced James Taylor before moving to the United States. From the early '70s on, Asher's client roster has included Taylor, Linda Ronstadt, Carole King, Joni Mitchell, Randy Newman, and Warren Zevon, as well as such newer artists as John Wesley Harding, Iris DeMent, and Mary's Danish. In 1989 he won a Grammy for Producer of the Year for his work on Ronstadt's Cry Like a Rainstorm, Howl Like the Wind.

Peter, Paul and Mary became the most popular acoustic folk group of the '60s. They were also the first to bring commercial success to Bob Dylan, by covering his "Blowin' in the Wind," a #2 hit in August 1963.

The trio met while each was working in Greenwich Village and were encouraged by manager Albert Grossman to join forces in 1961. Yarrow had had some success as a solo folk artist. After graduating in psychology from Cornell, he toured locally and appeared on the CBS special Folk Sound U.S.A. in May 1960. Grossman spotted Yarrow there and arranged for him to perform at the Newport Folk Festival and make a national tour. Stookey was a stand-up comic in Greenwich Village and previously had led a high school rock & roll group.

Mary Travers, who grew up in Greenwich Village, had sung in school choruses and folk groups. She sang in the chorus of a 1957 Broadway flop called The Next President with Mort Sahl. In 1961 she met Stookey, who encouraged her to sing again, and Grossman decided she was right to round out the trio. They rehearsed for seven months, with Milt Okun crafting their arrangements. Soon after they played a special engagement at New York's Bitter End, they signed with Warner Bros. Records.

The group's debut LP spent seven weeks at #1 in 1962, and two songs from it, "Lemon Tree" (#35) and Pete Seeger's "If I Had a Hammer" (#10), cracked the Top 40. The latter helped bring folk and protest consciousness to the mainstream. The album remained on the Hot 100 Albums chart for three and a half years. They often toured college campuses and played at rallies. As always, they were deeply involved in the issues they sang about. They marched with Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and in 1969 Yarrow helped organize the March on Washington.

After "Blowin' in the Wind" reached #2, the trio's cover of Dylan's "Don't Think Twice It's Alright" hit #9 in October 1963. In May of that year "Puff the Magic Dragon" (#2) stirred some controversy, since it was interpreted by some as a drug song. In fact it was just one of their many children's songs. (They released a whole LP of these in 1969 called Peter, Paul & Mommy.) Peter, Paul and Mary were also known for covering songs by soon-to-be-famous singer/songwriters, including John Denver ("Leaving on a Jet Plane," a #1 smash in 1969) and Gordon Lightfoot ("For Lovin' Me," a Top 30 single in 1965, and "Early Morning Rain"). Their other hits singles were "I Dig Rock and Roll Music" (#9, 1967) and "Day Is Done" (#21, 1969).

The group decided to break up in 1970 and released a best-of collection that May. It was their 10th album (out of 11) to make the Top 20. They each pursued solo careers, with considerably less artistic and commercial success. Stookey's records (as Noel Paul Stookey) reflected his Christian religious convictions. His best-known solo song was "Wedding Song (There Is Love)" (#24, 1971), written for Yarrow's marriage. Yarrow also coproduced and wrote Mary MacGregor's 1977 #1 hit "Torn Between Two Lovers." He formed a group called the Bodyworks Band, with which he performs and records Christian-oriented music. In 1970 Yarrow was convicted of "taking immoral liberties" with a female minor; in 1981 he was granted a full presidential pardon by Jimmy Carter. Travers hosted a radio talk show for a while and later a BBC television series.

The trio reunited occasionally in the '70s, at benefits such as the 1972 George McGovern campaign fund-raiser, which also brought back Simon and Garfunkel, and Mike Nichols and Elaine May. In 1978 they re-formed; they released a new LP and toured nationally. Their music continues to reflect contemporary political and social concerns, from civil war ("El Salvador") and apartheid ("No Easy Walk to Freedom") to AIDS ("Home Is Where the Heart Is"). They have starred in four PBS specials, including one to accompany the release of their second children's album, Peter, Paul & Mommy, Too and one centered around the LifeLines album, which featured guests such as Emmylou Harris, Judy Collins, John Sebastian, and B.B. King. Around the Campfire (1998) was a collection of folk classics, while Songs of Conscience & Concern (1999) was a retrospective focusing on the band's lesser-known material. In 2000 they embarked on a 40th-anniversary tour across North America.

Ray Peterson

Born Apr. 23, 1939, Denton, TX
 1960—Tell Laura I Love Her (RCA Victor).

A late-'50s singer with a 4½-octave voice, Ray Peterson specialized in ballads like "The Wonder of You" (a hit for Elvis Presley in 1970) and the classic death-rock song "Tell Laura I Love Her," in which the hero dies in a stock-car race he'd entered hoping to win the $1,000 prize so that he could buy his girlfriend a wedding ring.

Peterson began singing while a polio patient in Warm Springs Foundation Hospital in Texas, to amuse the other patients. He started performing in local clubs and eventually moved to L.A., where he was signed by Stan Shulman of RCA Records. His first record was 1958's "Let's Try Romance," followed by "Tail Light," a cover of the R&B standard "Fever," and the hard-rocking "Shirley Purley," none of which made the chart.

Peterson's first hit was "The Wonder of You" (#25, 1959) written by Baker Knight, composer of numerous hits for Rick Nelson. He followed with "Tell Laura I Love Her" (#7, 1960), by Ellie Greenwich and Jeff Barry, the Phil Spector-produced "Corinna, Corinna" (#9, 1961); "Missing You" (#29, 1961); and "I Could Have Loved You So Well" (#57, 1962) by Gerry Goffin and Barry Mann. In 1961 Peterson formed his own label, Dunes, which released all records after and including "Corinna, Corinna," and to which he signed Curtis Lee ("Pretty Little Angel Eyes"). After some more discs for MGM failed, Peterson briefly tried a career as a country singer. He continues to record and perform.

Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers

Tom Petty (b. Oct. 20, 1950, Gainesville, FL), voc., gtr.; Mike Campbell (b. Feb. 1, 1954, Gainesville), gtr.; Benmont Tench (b. Sep. 7, 1954, Gainesville), kybds.; Ron Blair (b. Sep. 16, 1952, Macon, GA), bass; Stan Lynch (b. May 21, 1955, Gainesville), drums.

1976—Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers (Shelter) 1978—You're Gonna Get It 1979—Damn the Torpedoes (Backstreet) 1981—Hard Promises 1982—(– Blair; + Howie Epstein [b. July 21, 1955], bass) Long After Dark 1985—Southern Accents (MCA); Pack Up the Plantation 1987—Let Me Up (I've Had Enough) 1991—Into the Great Wide Open 1993—Greatest Hits 1994—(– Lynch) 1995—Playback 1996—Songs and Music From "She's the One" (Warner Bros.) 1999—Echo 2001—Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers Anthology: Through the Years (Universal).
Tom Petty solo: 1989—Full Moon Fever (MCA) 1994—Wildflowers (Warner Bros.).

In the '70s Tom Petty came up with a distillate of FM radio '60s rock—chiming Byrds' guitars, Rolling Stones rhythms, and a slurred version of Bob Dylan/Roger McGuinn vocals. First penning tales of outcasts and long-suffering lovers, he broadened his thematic range to encompass musings on his Southern heritage and to propagate a very American individualism. The Heartbreakers evolved into a classic rock & roll band, and Petty's invitation in the '80s to join Dylan, Roy Orbison, George Harrison, and Jeff Lynne in the side-project supergroup the Traveling Wilburys confirmed his stature.

Petty, the son of a Florida insurance salesman, quit high school at 17 to join one of the state's top bands, Mudcrutch, with future Heartbreakers Mike Campbell and Benmont Tench. In the early '70s they sent Petty to L.A. to seek a record contract, Denny Cordell's Shelter Records (co-owned with Leon Russell) delivered.

The group disbanded soon after moving to L.A., and while Cordell offered to record Petty solo, nothing happened until 1975, when Petty heard a demo that Campbell and Tench were working on with Ron Blair and Stan Lynch. The quintet became the Heartbreakers, inherited Petty's Shelter contract, and released a self-titled debut in 1976. At first it sold poorly.

Then the Heartbreakers toured England, opening for Nils Lofgren. Within weeks, they were headlining and the album was on the British charts. ABC then rereleased "Breakdown" in the U.S., and the single cracked the Top 40 nearly a year after its initial release. Another song, the very Byrdsy "American Girl," was recorded by ex-Byrd Roger McGuinn. The band's second album boasted the singles "Listen to Her Heart" (#59, 1978) and "I Need to Know" (#41, 1978).

Just as the Heartbreakers' career was taking off, a legal battle arose when Petty tried to renegotiate his contract after MCA bought ABC; by mid-1979 he'd filed for bankruptcy. After nine months of litigation, Petty signed to Backstreet Records, a new MCA affiliate. His triumphant return, Damn the Torpedoes, hit #2, selling over 2.5 million copies, and established Petty as a star. And his singles placed higher: "Don't Do Me Like That" (#10, 1979) and "Refugee" (#15, 1980).

In 1981 Petty again got into another record-company hassle by challenging MCA's intention to issue Hard Promises with a $9.98 list price. After he threatened to withhold the LP—or entitle it $8.98 and organize fan protest letters—the album came out at $8.98. Hard Promises went on to platinum status, with the #19 hit "The Waiting."

Petty had a #3 1981 hit in "Stop Draggin' My Heart Around," a duet with Stevie Nicks off her solo Bella Donna, on which the Heartbreakers also appeared. Also in 1981, he produced Del Shannon's comeback, Drop Down and Get Me. In 1982 "You Got Lucky" (#20) from Long After Dark, reiterated the veteran strengths of the Heartbreakers, but with Ron Blair departing, they underwent the novelty of a personnel change (ex-John Hiatt sideman Howie Epstein joined on bass). Three years in the making, Southern Accents was hard going, frustrated during its mixing. Petty punched a wall and broke his left hand. The album, coproduced by Eurythmics' Dave Stewart, found Petty achieving a new lyrical maturity and, with "Don't Come Around Here No More," sassing a #13 hit.

In 1986, right before Petty and the Heartbreakers embarked upon a world tour with Dylan, Petty's house burned down (arson was suspected). His wife and two daughters escaped, but most of his belongings were destroyed. Nineteen eighty-seven's Let Me Up (I've Had Enough) hit #20 and was certified gold, a relatively disappointing showing in view of the group's '80s success. Respite came with the 1988 release of the Traveling Wilburys (see entry) debut, working with former ELO founder/guitarist and fellow Wilbury Jeff Lynne. Petty released the masterful solo album Full Moon Fever. Its "Free Fallin'" (#7, 1989) gave him a revitalizing hit.

With most of the Heartbreakers playing on Fever, Petty retained band loyalty, and it paid off on Into the Great Wide Open, a fine collection coproduced with Lynne. In the interim Petty had released a second Wilburys album (1990's Volume 3), and his band had begun establishing themselves as sidemen, with Campbell working on Roy Orbison's Mystery Girl, cowriting Don Henley's "The Boys of Summer" and with Lynch, contributing to Henley's The End of the Innocence. Meanwhile, Tench worked with such acts as U2 and Elvis Costello, and Epstein produced his girlfriend Carlene Carter's 1990 LP I Fell in Love.

Petty's record-business controversies continued, however, with the surprise 1992 revelation that he had signed a secret $20 million, six-album deal with Warner Bros. in 1989. Reportedly he had kept the contract secret to avoid the ire of MCA, to which he owed two more albums at the time. In an unrelated dispute, in 1993 he was vindicated by the U.S. Supreme Court when they let stand a lower court's finding that Petty's "Runnin' Down a Dream" did not infringe the copyright to an earlier piece written by songwriter/plaintiff Martin Allen Fine.

A year after a #5 Greatest Hits album in 1993, drummer Stan Lynch, who had been working as a songwriter and/or producer with the re-formed Eagles, Leonard Cohen, Don Henley, and the Mavericks, departed the band. Petty returned in 1994 with a second solo album, Wildflowers, which, again, featured most of the Heartbreakers. That year also saw the release of a Petty tribute album, You Got Lucky.

In 1996 Petty and the Heartbreakers reunited and recorded songs for Ed Burns' film She's the One; they also served as "backup band" on Johnny Cash's Unchained. That year, Petty and his wife ended their two-decade-long marriage, an event that purportedly added to the darker tone of 1999's masterful Echo (#10). In 1997 Petty had acted in the Kevin Costner movie, The Postman, but by 1999, his emphasis was squarely on music in typical Petty fashion. Echo's first single, "Free Girl Now," was offered on the MP3 format, which Internet users could download free (for two days, before his label requested that he remove it); the band also refused to increase ticket prices for the Echo tour.

Liz Phair

Born Elizabeth Clark Phair, Apr. 17, 1967, New Haven, CT
1993—Exile in Guyville (Matador) 1994—Whip-Smart
1995—Juvenalia EP 1998—Whitechocolatespaceegg.

Liz Phair, the in-your-face indie sweetheart, sent up "Guyville" (i.e. the male-dominated alternative-music scene dubbed as such by Chicago rockers Urge Overkill) in her debut, Exile in Guyville—a song-by-song response to the Stones' Exile on Main Street. The album drove home the point that gender has nothing to do with whether or not an artist can rock with intelligence and sexual savvy.

Raised in a wealthy suburb of Chicago, Phair studied art at Oberlin College, where she was constantly experimenting with songwriting. A friend, guitarist Chris Brockaw, later of the band Come, prodded Phair to make a tape of her songs, which resulted in her signing to Matador and recording Guyville. Her followup, Whip-Smart (#27, 1994), revealed itself to be a more introspective album—although her melting pot of punk, folk, and pop doesn't hide her frank, often sexual lyrics. The boldness and self-assurance Phair portrayed on her albums was not so apparent during her solo concerts, however, at which Phair suffered from stage fright. She took a break in 1995, marrying Jim Staska, a Chicago film editor who worked on her videos. She released the Juvenalia EP that summer, which featured material from her homemade "Girlysound" tapes. During 1996, she began recording a new album with producer Scott Litt, shelved the project, and gave birth to a son. Working with Guyville and Whip-Smart producer Brad Wood, she later returned to the studio, releasing Whitechocolatespaceegg (#35) in 1998. Phair explained that the title came from a dream she had while she was pregnant. Though toned down from the postfeminist friskiness of her earlier albums, the songs candidly explored themes of domestic tension and parenthood. She toured that summer as part of Lilith Fair, and launched a full-scale band tour later in the year.

Little Esther Phillips

Born Esther Mae Jones, Dec. 23, 1935, Galveston, TX; died Aug. 7, 1984, Torrance, CA

1970—Burnin' (Atlantic) 1972—From a Whisper to a Scream (Kudu); Alone Again (Naturally) 1973—Black Eyed Blues
1974—Performance 1975—What a Difference a Day Makes 1976—For All We Know; Confessin' the Blues (Atlantic); Capricorn Princess (Kudu) 1977—You've Come a Long Way Baby (Mercury) 1978—All About Esther 1979—Here's Esther . . . Are You Ready 1986—A Way to Say Goodbye
(Muse) 1990—The Best of Esther Phillips (Columbia)
1997—The Best of Esther Phillips (1962–1970) (Rhino).

Throughout her long career, singer Esther Phillips covered blues, rhythm & blues, and jazz, each in her own earthy style.

As a child in Texas, Phillips sang in churches before her family moved to L.A. in the late '40s. At 13 she won a talent show at L.A.'s Barrelhouse Club, run by R&B impresario Johnny Otis. For the next three years, she recorded with Otis' orchestra as Little Esther Phillips and built a national following among black record buyers. Two duets with another Otis discovery, Mel Walker, resulted in the Top 10 R&B hits "Cupid's Boogie" (#2 R&B, 1950) and "Ring-a-Ding-Doo" (#3 R&B, 1952). As a solo singer, Phillips had a #1 R&B hit with "Double Crossing Blues" in 1950.

Because of illness, she retired in 1954 and settled in Houston. She returned to music in the early '60s with New York's Lenox Records and in 1962 enjoyed international success with "Release Me" (#8 pop, #1 R&B), a reworking of a country hit. A 1963 duet with Big Al Downing on "You Never Miss Your Water (Until Your Well Runs Dry)" is well remembered, though it was not a hit at the time. She signed with Atlantic in the mid-'60s and had success with a cover of the Beatles' "And I Love Her," done as "And I Love Him" (#11 R&B).

In the late '60s Phillips' recordings suffered as she battled a heroin addiction at Synanon, a treatment center. In 1971 she signed with Kudu Records, where she cut a series of bluesy jazz albums. Her chilling interpretation of Gil Scott-Heron's antidrug "Home Is Where the Hatred Is" (#40 R&B) is considered by many to be one of her finest efforts. "I Never Found a Man (To Love Me Like You Do)" (#17 R&B) in 1972 showed that Phillips still had commercial appeal. This fact was further demonstrated by her 1975 disco hit "What a Difference a Day Makes" (#20 pop, #10 R&B, #6 U.K.). In 1981 an album on Mercury Records was produced by jazz trumpeter Benny Golson. In 1982 she duetted with Swamp Dogg on one song from his I'm Not Selling Out, I'm Buying In.

Plagued for years by declining health and substance-abuse problems, Phillips died of kidney and liver failure

Sam Phillips

Born Leslie Phillips, June 28, 1962, East Hollywood, CA
 1983—Beyond Saturday Night (Word/Myrrh) 1984—Dancing With Danger 1985—Black and White in a Grey World
 1987—The Turning 1988—The Indescribable Wow 1991—Cruel Inventions (Virgin) 1994—Martins and Bikinis 1996—Omnipop (It's Only a Flesh Wound Lambchop) 1999—Zero Zero Zero 2001—Fan Dance (Nonesuch).

Sam Phillips has had two recording careers. The first, under her real name Leslie Phillips, was as an in-demand contemporary Christian singer/songwriter whose four albums for the Word/Myrrh label, beginning with 1984's Beyond Saturday Night, averaged sales of 200,000 copies each. But after the release of 1987's The Turning, which was produced by her future husband, T Bone Burnett, Phillips turned her back on the born-again gospel music scene, changed her professional name to Sam (a nickname since childhood), and forged a career as a critically acclaimed secular performer.

Raised in Glendale, California, Phillips turned to the church out of an early interest in philosophy and spirituality. After earning accolades for her Christian rock, however, she began to feel restrained by the genre, frustrated by what she perceived to be its right-wing agenda. She continued to explore spiritual metamorphosis in her secular albums, but she also ventured into themes of sexuality and personal relationships, her lyrics often marked by a wry sense of humor reminiscent of Randy Newman. Beginning with her first album for Virgin, 1988's The Indescribable Wow, she also revealed a strong affinity for Beatlesque pop melodies, while the Grammy-nominated Martins and Bikinis (#182, 1994) and 1996's more experimental Omnipop (It's Only a Flesh Wound Lambchop) also displayed elements of baroque, lounge, and psychedelia. Zero Zero Zero (1999) was an anthology of her Virgin recordings, highlighted by rerecordings and new songs. Burnett, whom she married in 1989, has produced all of her albums since The Turning.

In 1995 Phillips ventured into a third career, film, when she played a murderous mute terrorist in Die Hard With a Vengeance. Her first album of new material in five years, Fan Dance (also a Burnett collaboration), was another eloquent, lovely effort and her first for the Nonesuch label.

 1998—The Story of the Ghost; Phish (The White Tape) (Phish)

With Dude of Life: 1994—Crimes of the Mind (Elektra).

Trey Anastasio solo: 1996—Surrender to the Air (Elektra)
 1998—One Man's Trash (Phish) 2000—*Trampled by Lambs
 & Pecked by Doves* (with Tom Marshall).

To its fans, Phish is not just a band—it's a way of life. Although the group's studio efforts sell well enough, occasionally making high chart debuts, Phish is primarily a live phenomenon. Like thousands of Deadheads before them, Phish fans loyally follow the group from city to city, trade bootleg tapes with the band's blessings, and feverishly debate the merits of past set lists (Phish never plays the same set twice). By nurturing this grass-roots following, Phish bypassed commercial radio and evolved over the course of a decade into one of—if not the—hottest live attractions in America.

The band first came together in drummer Jon Fishman's dorm room at the University of Vermont. Fellow students Trey Anastasio and Jeff Holdsworth brought their guitars by to jam, and they were later joined by bassist Mike Gordon, who answered a bulletin-board ad posted by Anastasio. Fan Page McConnell, a student at Goddard College, joined as a keyboardist in 1985, and Holdsworth left the following year. Early performances around this time also featured percussionist Marc Daubert, as well as occasional appearances by the enigmatic singer Dude of Life (with whom the band would later record the album Crimes of the Mind). In 1988 Phish recorded its first album, Junta, which was sold as a cassette at gigs. By the time the band released its second album, Lawn Boy (1990), on the independent label Absolute A-Go-Go, Phish's growing fan base had begun to establish a presence on the fledgling Internet at Phish.Net. Elektra signed the group a year later and released A Picture of Nectar in 1992, followed by reissues of Lawn Boy and Junta.

Beginning with 1993's Rift (#51), the band's popularity began to translate into chart success. The following year's Hoist, which spawned Phish's only video (for "Down With Disease"), went to #34, followed by 1995's double disc A Live One (#18), Billy Breathes (#7, 1996), the live Slip, Stitch & Pass (#17, 1997), The Story of the Ghost (#8, 1998), the sprawling, six-disc Hampton Comes Alive (#120, 1999), and Farmhouse (#12, 2000). But it was live, not on disc, that Phish defined itself throughout the decade. In addition to the band's trademark marathon improvisational jams (drawing equally from jazz, rock, and country), fans could count on such weird variables as Fishman's vacuum-cleaner solos and the band's penchant for oddball covers; in 1994 Phish began a semi-annual tradition of performing an entire classic album live on Halloween as a "musical costume" (ranging from the Beatles' White Album to the Who's Quadrophenia and Talking Heads' Remain in Light). In 1997 the band's weekend festival, the Great Went, held in Limestone, Maine, drew an audience of 62,000. The following year's Lemonwheel Festival, also in Limestone, drew a comparable crowd. Phish ended the '90s playing for 75,000 fans at a two-night millennial concert at Florida's Big Cypress Seminole Indian Reservation.

After touring in support of 2000's Farmhouse, Phish announced an indefinite hiatus. Fans were left with Elektra's official release of The Siket Disc, a collection of studio outtakes, along with the feature-length documentary Bittersweet Motel and periodic updates on its Web site about such band member side projects as Gordon's experimental film Outside Out and Trampled by Lambs & Pecked by Doves, an album by Anastasio and Phish lyricist Tom Marshall. Other rarities offered for sale online included The White Tape, a collection of early 4-track demos recorded in 1984.

Phranc

Born Susan Gottlieb, Aug. 28, 1957, Santa Monica, CA
1985—Folksinger (Rhino) 1989—I Enjoy Being a Girl (Island)
1991—Positively Phranc 1995—Goofyfoot EP (Kill Rock Stars)
1998—Milkman (Phancy).

Phranc calls herself the "all-American Jewish lesbian folksinger" and composes music in the traditional '60s protest style of Phil Ochs, Tom Paxton, and Joan Baez. The daughter of an insurance salesman and dental hygienist, Susan Gottlieb knew early on that she was different from her friends. By 1974, she had found refuge in the local lesbian-feminist community; the following year she changed her name to Phranc, dropped out of Venice High School, and got a buzz-cut flattop.

Musically influenced by her cantor grandfather, Phranc started singing at gay coffeehouses, and by the late '70s discovered L.A.'s burgeoning punk-rock scene. By 1980, after playing in three punk bands, including Catholic Discipline, she had tired of the music's misogyny and Nazi iconography and had written "Take Off Your Swastika" (which would show up later on 1989's I Enjoy Being a Girl); she played the song at a punk show one night on her acoustic guitar so that members of the mosh pit could hear the words. Phranc decided then to return to folk music for good. Unlike most folkies, however, she has performed on bills with bands ranging from Dead Kennedys to Morrissey.

Phranc's unflinching treatment of her sexuality, as well as other aspects of her personal life and politics, has undoubtedly kept her music from gaining a wider audience. Although Folksinger was well received critically, it remained a cult item. In 1989 Island signed Phranc but never quite figured out how to market her. The label released 1989's I Enjoy Being a Girl, rereleased Folksinger in 1990, and then dropped her after the release of 1991's Positively Phranc.

Undaunted, she turned her energies toward visual art, earning exhibitions in New York and L.A. Her next musical project came in 1992: a swaggering impersonation of Neil Diamond, complete with blow-dried wig and glittering threads, calling the act "Hot August Phranc." In 1995 Phranc released the surf-themed Goofyfoot, and included deadpan covers of Bobbie Gentry's "Ode to Billy Joe" and Herman's Hermits' "Mrs. Brown, You've Got a Lovely Daughter." Her self-released Milkman, produced by Warren A. Bruleigh (Violent Femmes), was her first full-length album in seven years. The 1998 release collected minimalist songs rooted in the folk tradition, with lyrics of humor and loss, partly inspired by the murder of her brother.

Bobby "Boris" Pickett

Born Feb. 11, 1938, Somerville, MA
1962—The Original Monster Mash (Garpax).

Bobby "Boris" Pickett's ticket to fame was an ability to imitate monster-movie star Boris Karloff, something he put to good use on the novelty hit "Monster Mash," a #1 in 1962.

After three years in the Signal Corps in Korea, Pickett had drifted to Hollywood, where he attempted to establish himself as a comedian and actor. He appeared in 1967's It's a Bikini World, and he later appeared in a number of television episodes (on Bonanza, The Beverly Hillbillies, and Petticoat Junction), on television commercials, and in a few movies (The Baby Maker). After joining a singing group called the Cordials, he and group member Leonard Capizzi wrote "Monster Mash." Gary Paxton—Flip of Skip and Flip fame and the lead singer on the Hollywood Argyles' novelty hit "Alley Oop"—released it on his own Garpax label. There were a few less-successful followups: "Monster's Holiday" (#30, 1962), "Monster Motion" (1963), and "Graduation Day" (#88, 1963). His backup group, the Crypt-Kickers, included Leon Russell and Paxton.

He continued to work as an actor and has since written screenplays, but "Monster Mash" has proven the hit that will not die. A Halloween tradition now, it was revived in 1973, and hit #3 in the U.K. and #10 in the U.S. In the mid-'80s Pickett recorded a "Monster Rap" that got some airplay. According to an interview from that period, Pickett claimed to have last performed "Monster Mash" in a Sunset Strip club backed by none other than the then-unknown Van Halen. He continues to creep around on the oldies circuit.

Wilson Pickett

Born Mar. 18, 1941, Prattville, AL

Singer Wilson Pickett applied his rough, swaggering, sexy, "wicked" style to a series of stripped-down soul classics to create one of the most enduring soul legacies.

After his family migrated from Alabama to Detroit in 1955, young Pickett formed a gospel group, the Violinaires (which included Eddie Floyd and Sir Mack Rice), who were popular in local churches. In 1959 he was recruited by the R&B vocal group the Falcons. He wrote and sang lead on the Falcons' "I Found a Love" (#6 R&B, 1962). Falcons producer Robert Bateman suggested he go solo, and Pickett signed with Lloyd Price's Double L Records in 1963 and had hits with two of his songs, "If You Need Me" (#30 R&B) and "It's Too Late" (#17 R&B).

In 1964 Pickett signed with Atlantic. Following two unsuccessful singles, Atlantic executive/producer Jerry Wexler took Pickett to Memphis, where he recorded with Booker T. and the MG's. "In the Midnight Hour" (#21, 1965), credited to Pickett and guitarist/producer Steve Cropper, was a major breakthrough. Recording in a similar style with musicians in Memphis, Muscle Shoals, and Miami, Pickett had a long series of R&B hits that occasionally crossed over to pop, including "634-5789" (#13 pop, #1 R&B) and "Land of 1,000 Dances" (#6 pop, #1 R&B) in 1966; "Funky Broadway" (#8 pop, #1 R&B) in 1967; "I'm a Midnight Mover" (#6 R&B) in 1968; and the tribute record "Cole, Cooke, and Redding" (#61 pop, #4 R&B) in 1970.

Later that year he recorded in Philadelphia with the Gamble and Huff production team, scoring with "Engine Number 9" (#14 pop, #3 R&B, 1970) and "Don't Let the Green Grass Fool You" (#17 pop, #2 R&B, 1971). Pickett's last three Atlantic hits were "Don't Knock My Love" (#13 pop, #1 R&B, 1971), "Call My Name, I'll Be There" (#10 R&B, 1971), and "Fire and Water" (#24 pop, #2 R&B, 1972). In March 1971 Pickett headlined a tour of American and African musicians in Ghana. The resulting film and album, Soul to Soul, featured Pickett prominently.

Pickett signed to RCA Records in 1973, followed by stints recording for Wicked (his own label), Big Tree, and EMI-America, but none of his later releases proved as popular. In the '80s he joined Don Covay, Joe Tex, and other '60s soul legends in the Soul Clan. In 1991 he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, and in 1998 he appeared in the film Blues Brothers 2000. Though he continued to tour, he was rarely in the news except for items concerning minor skirmishes with the law. Twelve years would pass before his next album of new material, 1999's It's Harder Now (with liner notes stating that it was recorded "by actual musicians in real time without click tracks . . . samples, loops, or digital instruments").

With the release of 1973's The Dark Side of the Moon, Pink Floyd abruptly went from a moderately successful acid-rock band to one of pop music's biggest acts. The recording, in fact, remained on Billboard's Top 200 album chart longer than any other release in history. Along with 1979's The Wall, it established the band as purveyors of a distinctively dark vision. Experimenting with concept albums and studio technology and breaking free of conventional pop-song formats, Pink Floyd prefigured the progressive rock of the '70s and ambient music of the '80s.

As early as 1964, Pink Floyd's original members, except Syd Barrett, were together studying architecture at London's Regent Street Polytechnic School. With Barrett, an art student who coined the name the Pink Floyd Sound after a favorite blues record by Pink Anderson and Floyd Council, they began playing R&B-based material for schoolmates. By 1967 they had developed an unmistakably psychedelic sound, long, loud, suitelike compositions that touched on hard rock, blues, country, folk, electronic, and quasi-classical music. Adding a slide-and-light show, one of the first in British rock, they became a sensation among London's underground as a featured attraction at the UFO Club. Barrett, who was responsible for most of the band's early material, had a knack for composing singles-length bits of psychedelia, and Pink Floyd had British hits with two of them in 1967. "Arnold Layne" (#20 U.K.), the tale of a transvestite, and "See Emily Play" (#60 U.K.). The latter, however, was the last hit single they would have for over a decade; space-epic titles like "Astronomy Domine" and "Interstellar Overdrive" were more typical.

In 1968 Barrett [see entry], allegedly because of an excess of LSD experimentation, began to exhibit ever more strange and erratic behavior. David Gilmour joined to help with the guitar work. Barrett appeared on only one track of Secrets, "Jugband Music," which aptly summed up his mental state: "I'm most obliged to you for making it clear / That I'm not really here." Without Barrett to create concise psychedelic singles, the band concentrated on wider-ranging psychedelic epics.

From 1969 to 1972 Pink Floyd made several film soundtracks—the most dramatic being Zabriskie Point, in which Michelangelo Antonioni's closing sequence of explosions was complemented by Floyd's "Careful With That Axe, Eugene"—and began using its "azimuth coordinated sound system" in concert, a sophisticated 360-degree PA. With Atom Heart Mother, they topped the British chart in 1970; stateside success, however, still eluded them.

Their breakthrough came in 1973 with The Dark Side of the Moon. The themes were unremittingly bleak—alienation, paranoia, schizophrenia—and the music was at once sterile and doomy. Taped voices mumbling ominous asides (something the band had used before) surfaced at key moments. Yielding a surprise American hit in "Money," (#13, 1973), the album went on to mammoth long-running sales success. Ultimately remaining on the Billboard Top 200 album chart for 741 weeks, Dark Side showcased the talents of Pink Floyd's chief members: Waters' lyrics, Gilmour's guitar. The two would continue to dominate the band but soon furiously contend against each other.

The group's subsequent albums explored the same territory, with Waters' songs growing ever more bitter. Wish You Were Here (#1, 1975) was dedicated to Barrett and elegized him with "Shine On You Crazy Diamond." The Wall, Waters' finest moment, topped the U.S. chart for 15 weeks, while its nihilistic hit, "Another Brick in the Wall," was banned by the BBC and in 1980 became the band's only #1 American single. Meanwhile Pink Floyd's stage shows had become increasingly elaborate. For the Dark Side and Wish tours, there were slide/light shows and animated films, plus a giant inflated jet that crashed into the stage; for Animals, huge inflated pigs hovered over the stadiums; for The Wall (due to enormous expense, performed 29 times only in New York, L.A., and London) there was that, plus an actual wall built, brick by brick, across the stage, eventually obscuring the band from audience view. Shortly thereafter, Wright left, due to conflict with Waters.

With The Final Cut (#6, 1983), subtitled A Requiem for the Postwar Dream, Waters penned his darkest work yet. It also marked the effective end of the original Pink Floyd, with Waters bitterly departing, and Gilmour and Mason cementing their alliance. (Two films related to the original band—minus Barrett—have been made: the documentary Pink Floyd Live at Pompeii [1971] and The Wall [1982]. The latter featured stunning animation by Gerald Scarfe—Bob Geldof starred in the live-action sequences—and illustrated music from Pink Floyd's LP of the same name. The first remains a cult movie; the second was a massive commercial success.)

In 1978, with Gilmour's David Gilmour and Wright's Wet Dream, Pink Floyd's members had started releasing solo albums. Mason had begun a sideline career as a producer in 1974 with Robert Wyatt, ultimately his very diverse roster included Gong, Carla Bley, the Damned, and Steve Hillage. Solo work continued into the '80s: In 1984 came Waters' The Pros and Cons of Hitch Hiking, Wright's Identity, and Gilmour's About Face (with lyrical contributions by Pete Townshend). A year later Mason released Profiles. Concurrently, Gilmour played sessions with Bryan Ferry, Grace Jones, and Arcadia; in 1986 he formed David Gilmour & Friends with Bad Company's Mick Ralphs.

In 1986 Waters brought suit against Gilmour and Mason, asking the court to dissolve the trio's partnership and to block them from using the name Pink Floyd. A year later Waters lost his suit, and the other members, as Pink Floyd, released Momentary Lapse of Reason (#3, 1987). As Waters put out his own Radio K.A.O.S., the others launched a Pink

Pink Floyd: Rick Wright, David Gilmour, Nick Mason, Roger Waters

Floyd tour that grossed nearly $30 million. (Though Wnght was included on the tour and album, he wasn't legally considered an official band member but a salaried employee.) With the live Delicate Sound of Thunder, Gilmour, Mason, and Wnght again billed themselves as Pink Floyd and went on to more successful touring, including a gig performed in Venice aboard a giant barge, which was televised worldwide.

In 1990 Waters presented an all-star cast, including Sinéad O'Connor, Joni Mitchell, and Van Morrison, in a version of The Wall performed at the site of the Berlin Wall (chronicled in The Wall—Live in Berlin). Two years later he released the dour Amused to Death.

With Wright rejoining Gilmour and Mason as a full band member, Pink Floyd garnered immediate success with The Division Bell in 1994. Named after the bell in the British House of Commons that summons members to parliamentary debate, the album featured songs written by Gilmour in collaboration with his ex-journalist girlfriend Polly Samson. Two weeks after its release, The Division Bell shot to #1 on the album chart, and in late spring the band embarked on an elaborate American tour. P.U.L.S.E. (#1, 1995) documented the '94 tour, including a live performance of Dark Side of the Moon in its entirety. In 1996 Pink Floyd was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Still antagonistic with his former band mates, Waters didn't attend the ceremonies. After a successful solo tour in 1999, he embarked upon writing a modern opera about the French Revolution, recording with an 80-piece orchestra and 100-member choir.

In the interim, Dark Side of the Moon had taken on yet new life, when certain Pink Floyd fans began playing the album while watching The Wizard of Oz and noting how the 1973 album seemed to provide an uncannily appropriate soundtrack to the 1939 film. The band itself denied that it had intended any sort of parallel between its music and the movie, but rumors persisted of an eene connection between the two. Pink Floyd also entered the new millennium by releasing a live version, from 1980, of The Wall, in double-CD format, with a lavishly illustrated history.

Gene Pitney

Born Feb. 17, 1941, Hartford, CT

1962—The Many Sides of Gene Pitney (Musicor); Only Love Can Break a Heart 1963—World-Wide Winners 1964—Gene Pitney's Big Sixteen; It Hurts to Be in Love 1965—Famous Country Duets (with George Jones); George Jones and Gene Pitney (with George Jones); Looking Through the Eyes of Love 1966—Big Sixteen, vol. 3 1968—Double Gold: The Best of Gene Pitney 1969—Sings Bacharach 1987—The Gene Pitney Anthology, 1961–1968 (Rhino); Anthology 1988—Gene Pitney; Gene Pitney, vol. 2 1995—Gene Pitney: The Great Recordings (Tomato).

Gene Pitney's long and varied career includes over 20 chart-making singles and just as many albums, spanning rock, pop ballads, and Italian-flavored country novelties, as well as work and friendship with Phil Spector, the Rolling Stones, and country singer George Jones. Best known for singing pop covers, Pitney also wrote many tunes himself. His biggest hits include "Town Without Pity" (#13, 1962), "(The Man Who Shot) Liberty Valance" (#4, 1962), "Only Love Can Break a Heart" (#2, 1962), "Half Heaven—Half Heartache" (#12, 1963), "Mecca" (#12, 1963), "It Hurts to Be in Love" (#7, 1964), and "I'm Gonna Be Strong" (#9, 1964).

Pitney studied piano, guitar, and drums while at Rockville High School in Connecticut, and by the time he graduated he'd already written and published some songs. He dropped out of the University of Connecticut and for a time enrolled in Ward's Electronic School. He began performing as the male half of the duo Jamie and Jane, then as a singer/songwriter under the name Billy Bnan. By 1961 he had written "Hello Mary Lou" for Rick Nelson. In 1962 he wrote "He's a Rebel" for the Crystals and became friends with producer Phil Spector. He also wrote for Roy Orbison and Tommy Edwards.

Yearning for a hit of his own, Pitney locked himself in a studio in 1961, played and overdubbed every instrument, and multitracked his vocals. The result was his first hit, "(I Wanna) Love My Life Away" (#39, 1961). This attracted the attention of the songwriting team of Burt Bacharach and Hal David, who cowrote "Only Love Can Break a Heart," "(The Man Who Shot) Liberty Valance," and "24 Hours From Tulsa" for him. Pitney's label, Musicor, was primarily involved in country & western music, and Pitney began recording material in that vein, including an album of duets with George Jones.

In 1964 Pitney's publicist, Andrew Loog Oldham, introduced him to the Rolling Stones, whom Oldham produced. He recorded the Jagger-Richards composition "That Girl Belongs to Yesterday" and with Phil Spector sat in on one of their 1964 recording sessions.

Though he was much more popular in England than in America, Pitney remained a prolific recording artist, putting out numerous albums per year in the mid-'60s. At that time, in response to his tremendous popularity in Italy, he began recording albums of country tunes sung in Italian. His last U.S. chart appearance was in 1969, and he continued to hit the U.K. chart until 1974.

Since the mid-'70s, Pitney has toured the U.S. infrequently but continued to work elsewhere in the world. He has recorded in Italian, Spanish, and German. In 1988 a remake of "Something's Gotten Hold of My Heart," recorded with Marc Almond, went to #1 in the U.K. Five years later, Pitney finally returned to the U.S. concert stage for the first time in nearly two decades with a sold-out appearance at Carnegie Hall. Pitney divides his time between touring (largely overseas) and managing his sizable business empire, which includes the Crystal Lake Beach and Boat Club in Connecticut, where he slung hamburgers as a teen.

As Frank Black and the Catholics: 1998—Frank Black and the Catholics (SpinArt) 1999—Pistolero 2001—Dog in the Sand (What Are Records?).

With seductive pop melodies, distorted surf riffs, extraterrestrial lyrics, a mysterious Latin flavor, and leader Black Francis' deranged shneks, the Pixies came off like Beach Boys on acid. Quintessential college rockers, the Pixies fared particularly well in England, where they attracted an impressive following and scored minor aboveground hits with singles such as "Monkey Gone to Heaven" and "Velouria" in the U.S. they remained primarily critics' darlings and a major influence on such bands as Nirvana. When the quartet split up in 1992, bassist Kim Deal went on to greater popular success with the Breeders.

Charles Michael Kitteridge Thompson IV got his first taste of pop music-making as an adolescent living in the L.A. suburbs and messing around with instruments in the garage. However, when his Pentecostal mother and stepfather moved the family to New England, rock & roll slipped to the back burner. It wasn't until the mid-'80s—six months into his stint as a U. Mass exchange student in Puerto Rico—that the astronomy-obsessed Thompson gave himself a choice: He would either go to New Zealand to see Halley's comet or form a band.

In 1986 Thompson returned to Boston and recruited former college roommate Joey Santiago, who came from one of the wealthiest families in the Philippines, to play guitar. Naming themselves Pixies in Panopoly, they took out a newspaper ad for a bassist interested in Hüsker Dü and Peter, Paul and Mary. Ohio native Kim Deal—a onetime biochemist (analyzing blood, no less)—responded and brought along her drummer friend David Lovering. On the advice of his biological father, a biker and bar owner, Thompson adopted the stage name Black Francis.

The Pixies released their debut EP on England's arty 4AD label in 1987 and followed the next year with the full-length Surfer Rosa. After much domestic college-radio play and critical raves, the band signed with Elektra in 1989 and released the landmark Doolittle (#98; #8 U.K.). But there was turmoil within the band, caused by Deal's increasing unhappiness with Thompson's creative dominance. The followup albums Bossanova and Trompe le Monde included no songs written by Deal. During a break in 1990, Deal formed the Breeders along with Throwing Muses guitarist Tanya Donelly and released the critically acclaimed Pod back-to-back with the Pixies' Bossanova.

For his first solo album under new pseudonym Frank Black, Thompson recruited Santiago, members of Pere Ubu, and various session players. The album found the eccentric songwriter moving closer than ever toward Brian Wilson territory, even doing an edgy, if respectful cover of Wilson's Pet Sounds classic, "Hang Onto Your Ego." While promoting the album, Thompson casually indicated to interviewers that the Pixies were over—before informing the rest of the band. For his third album, 1996's The Cult of Ray (#127), Thompson signed to producer Rick Rubin's American Recordings. The album sold fewer than his previous solo records, and when American began reorganizing, Thompson and a followup album already recorded were left in limbo. He finally left American and returned in 1998 with Frank Black and the Catholics, released on the small indie label SpinArt. Thompson continued to record and tour, seemingly at peace with his diminishing profile and life as a cult figure.

In 1995 Santiago and Lovering formed the short-lived Martinis. And the Breeders' second full-length album, Last Splash (#33, 1994)—recorded without Donelly, who left to form Belly—was a critical smash, spawning the single "Cannonball" (#44, 1994). A music video of the song directed by Spike Jonze and Sonic Youth's Kim Gordon became an MTV staple. Deal was joined in the newest lineup of the group by twin sister, Kelley, who was in an early teenage acoustic folk version of the Breeders. But the band's momentum was stalled when Kelley was busted for heroin and sent to rehab. After her release, she recorded a 1996 solo album as the Kelley Deal 6000 called Go to the Sugar Altar.

Meanwhile, Kim Deal had begun working on what was originally to be a solo album. Instead, she released the 33-minute Pacer in 1995 as part of a band called the Amps. Drummer Jim Macpherson was the only other holdover from the Breeders, as Deal recruited two players from Dayton, Ohio, into the Amps. Two years later, the same musicians toured as the Breeders.

Robert Plant

1982—Pictures at 11 (Swan Song) 1983—The Principle of Moments (Es Paranza) 1985—Shaken 'n' Stirred 1988—Now and Zen 1990—Manic Nirvana 1993—Fate of Nations. With the Honeydrippers: 1984—Volume One (Es Paranza). With Jimmy Page: 1994—No Quarter: Jimmy Page and Robert Plant Unledded (Atlantic) 1998—Walking Into Clarksdale.

Since Led Zeppelin's breakup in December 1980 (following the September 1980 death of drummer John Bonham), singer Robert Plant consistently refused to rest on past laurels. Instead, he has produced a series of progressive albums that have been critical and commercial successes. In the '80s and '90s, he has been musically more interested in hip-hop, punk, and world musics than the heavy metal or classic rock of Zeppelin imitators. In 1994, however, after repeatedly blocking any long-term Led Zeppelin reunions, Plant joined Page to perform Led Zep songs, along with new compositions, for an MTV Unplugged performance, entitled Unleaded, and album, No Quarter.

Plant's first returns to music after Zeppelin drummer John Bonham's death were jam sessions with a group of local R&B musicians called the Honeydrippers. He produced and wrote Pictures at 11 (#5, 1982) with Robbie Blunt on guitar, Paul Martinez on bass, and Jezz Woodruffe on keyboards. The Principle of Moments (#8, 1983) was the first release by Plant's Atlantic-distributed label, Es Paranza. Its music ranged from the artsy "Big Log" (#20, 1983) to the more traditional "In the Mood" (#39, 1983). In 1983 Plant went on his first solo tour.

In 1985 Plant undertook a couple of side projects: the Crawling King Snakes with Phil Collins, who recorded a cut for the Porky's Revenge soundtrack, and a Honeydrippers EP. The latter, which reunited Plant with Zeppelin guitarist Jimmy Page (and included Jeff Beck and Nile Rodgers), went Top 5 and produced hits with the string-drenched ballad "Sea of Love" (#3, 1984) and "Rockin' at Midnight" (#25, 1985). He and Page also played live with John Paul Jones at 1985's Live Aid benefit concert. On Shaken 'n' Stirred (#20, 1985) Plant experimented with hip-hop motifs, synthesizers, and intricate rhythms supplied by Little Feat drummer Richie Hayward. The album was stinkingly noncommercial, though it did yield the minor hit "Little by Little" (#36, 1985). Plant broke up his band after a subsequent tour. Listening to a pile of demo tapes, he discovered keyboardist Phil Johnstone, with whom he has collaborated since. Johnstone and Plant cowrote seven of the nine songs on the platinum Now and Zen (#6, 1988), which featured guitarist Doug Boyle, bassist Charlie Jones, and drummer Chns Blackwell. The album was widely acclaimed for its mix of old and new: "Tall Cool One" (#25, 1988) featured a solo from Page and samples of old Zeppelin songs. The track was partially a response to the Beastie Boys' heavy reliance on a sample of Led Zeppelin's "The Ocean" for their song "She's Crafty." "Tall Cool One" was later used in a Coke commercial.

Plant contributed the song "The Only One" to Page's 1988 Outrider album. In 1989 he recorded "Smoke on the Water" with Ian Gillan, Brian May, and Bruce Dickinson to benefit victims of a massive earthquake in Armenia. Plant worked with the same crew from Zen on Manic Nirvana (#13, 1990), which, though well received critically, went only gold. On Fate of Nations he "went back to the misty mountains," as he put it, playing folksy songs influenced by his rediscovery of '60s West Coast groups like Moby Grape. Plant continued to work with Johnstone and Jones and added guitarists Kevin Scott MacMichael (Cutting Crew) and Francis Dunery (It Bites). The album featured appearances by classical violinist Nigel Kennedy, Clannad singer Maire Brennan, and guitarist Richard Thompson. The first single was a cover of Tim Hardin's folk-rock classic "If I Were a Carpenter."

No Quarter illustrated Plant's interest in Arabic music, with two (of three) new songs recorded in Marrakech, Morocco, backed by Gnaoui musicians. Other world musicians guested on the album, including Indian ghazal singer Najma Akhtar on a new version of "The Battle of Evermore." In 1995 Plant joined Page in a tour to support the album. In 1997 Plant's Es Paranza imprint released a tribute album to the late Rainer Ptacek, a Czechoslovakian musician who contributed to Fate of Nations. The following year Plant teamed up with the Flaming Lips for a track on another tribute record, this one to former Moby Grape guitarist Alexander "Skip" Spence [see Moby Grape entry]. In 1998 Page and Plant released Walking Into Clarksdale, the first album of new material they had recorded together in two decades. "Most High," a single, recalled Zep's hypnotic "Kashmir," but the album (its title an allusion to the cradle of the Delta blues) was more wistful than bombastic.

The original Plasmatics were a sex-and-violence-touting heavy-metal band that debuted in the New York punk clubs in 1978. They were fronted by barely dressed ex-topless dancer Wendy O. Williams (W.O.W. for short), whose early act included smashing televisions with a sledgehammer, blowing up Cadillac Coup de Villes, cutting guitars in half with a chain saw, and singing.

Essentially, the band was the brainchild of manager Rod Swenson, a Yale graduate with a master's degree in fine arts. During the '70s he came to New York, dubbed himself Captain Kink, and began producing and promoting live sex shows. One of his stars was Williams (who was raised on a farm in upstate New York and ran away at 16). After his work in porn, Swenson did videos for Patti Smith and the Ramones, which inspired him to start a band, with Williams finagling herself and demolishing things up front, backed by a guitarist (Richard Stotts) with a blue Mohawk cut who wore a nurse's uniform and sometimes a tutu, plus other visual gimmicks. The band's music was all fast and loud, and the lyrics were about murder, sex, and fast food.

The Plasmatics debuted at CBGB on July 26, 1978, and immediately got lots of coverage for their antics. An audience began to grow, especially in England, where they stressed their connection to heavy metal. Williams kept up her stunts, as on September 12, 1980, when she jumped out of a brakeless car just before it plunged into the Hudson River. The band's debut album sold marginally, as did their followup Beyond the Valley of 1984. On January 18, 1981, Williams was arrested on obscenity charges in Milwaukee and on similar charges in Cleveland the next day. She and Swenson were also charged with resisting arrest and disorderly conduct after an altercation with the police, which landed both in a Milwaukee hospital. They later sued and lost their case. In 1982 the band signed with Capitol. Beauvoir joined Little Steven and the Disciples of Soul in 1982. Neither of his solo albums did well commercially.

Williams continued to tour and record, at times with a Plasmatics lineup. She briefly led Ultrafly and the Hometown Girls, an ill-advised attempt at rap. A fitness buff, health-food enthusiast, vegetarian, and animal-rights activist, she also pursued an acting career in film (Reform School Girls, 1986) and on television (McGyver, 1990). In 1991 she and Swenson moved to Storrs, Connecticut. Seven years later, Williams committed suicide by shooting herself in the head. Swenson said that his companion had been depressed for some time. She reportedly felt "past her peak" and found it "difficult to lead a normal life." Stotts went on to form the Richie Stotts Experience.

The Platters

Tony Williams (b. Apr. 15, 1928, Roselle, NJ; d. Aug. 14, 1992), lead voc.; David Lynch (b. 1929, St. Louis, MO; d. Jan. 2, 1981), tenor voc.; Herbert Reed (b. 1931, Kansas City, MO), bass voc.; Alex Hodge, baritone voc.

1954—(+ Zola Taylor [b. 1934], contralto voc.) 1955—(– Hodge; + Paul Robi [b. 1931, New Orleans, LA; d. Feb. 1, 1989], voc.) 1960—Encore of Golden Hits (Mercury)
1986—Anthology (1955–1967) (Rhino) 1991—The Very Best of the Platters (Mercury); The Magic Touch: An Anthology.

During the Platters' peak years (1955 to 1960), they were led by Tony Williams and enjoyed a series of massive crossover hits that made them the preeminent black vocal group of the time.

Original members Williams, David Lynch, Alex Hodge, and Herb Reed were signed by manager Buck Ram to Federal Records in 1953. After some of the group's unsuccessful efforts, Ram replaced Hodge with Paul Robi and added Zola Taylor, who belonged to Shirley Gunter and the Queens Ja group fronted by the sister of Cornel Gunter, of the Flairs and the Coasters. The Platters' seventh Federal single "Only You" was their first regional hit. Along with another vocal group Ram managed, the Penguins, they were signed in a package deal to Mercury.

At Mercury they became one of the nation's top vocal groups and a major nightclub attraction. A new version of "Only You" (#5) along with "The Great Pretender" which hit #1 in February 1956, made 1955 a breakthrough year. In 1956 they appeared in two rock films, The Girl Can't Help It and Rock Around the Clock.

Other major hits for the Platters were "The Magic Touch" (#4 pop and R&B), "My Prayer" (#1 pop, #2 R&B), "You'll Never Know" (#11 pop, #9 R&B) in 1956; "I'm Sorry" (#23 pop, #15 R&B) in 1957; "Twilight Time" (#1 pop and R&B) and "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes" (#1 pop, #3 R&B) in 1958; and "Enchanted" (#12 pop, #9 R&B) in 1959. The Platters were very popular in England and in Australia, where virtually all of these singles were hits as well, and "Smoke" went to #1.

In the summer of 1959, the group suffered a setback in popularity after the four male members were arrested in Cincinnati and accused of having had sexual relations with four female minors, among them, three white girls. Although the men were acquitted, public reaction to the incident led some radio stations to pull their latest single, "Where," off the air.

The Platters' last Top 10 single was 1960's "Harbor Lights," although they had several more Top 40 singles, including "If I Didn't Care" in 1961. Williams went solo and was replaced as lead singer by Sonny Turner in 1961, but Mercury continued to release old Williams-led singles through 1964. Off the charts from 1961 to 1966, the Platters changed lineup in 1962, with Sandra Dawn replacing Taylor and Nate Nelson taking Robi's spot. At the Musicor label they had a limited comeback with "I Love You 1000 Times" (#31 pop, #6 R&B, 1966) and "With This Ring" (#14 pop, #12 R&B, 1967).

There followed wholesale personnel changes and releases on United Artists before a return to Mercury in 1974. Williams and Ram battled in court during the '70s over the rights to the Platters' name. Ram won the case. There have been numerous groups of Platters performing through the years with little or no relation to the original combo. As of 2000, Herb Reed, the sole active member of the first lineup, was leading the only official version of the group, whose name and trademark he had been granted. Zola Taylor made news in the late '80s, when she was one of three women claiming to have been Frankie Lyman's widow. The Platters were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1990.

P.M. Dawn

Formed 1989, Jersey City, NJ
Prince Be "the Nocturnal" (b. Attrell Cordes, May 19, 1970, Jersey City), voc.; DJ Minutemix a.k.a. "J.C. the Eternal" (b. Jarrett Cordes, July 17, 1971, Jersey City), DJ.

1991—Of the Heart, of the Soul and of the Cross: The Utopian Experience (Gee Street/Island) 1993—The Bliss Album . . . ? (Vibrations of Love & Anger & the Ponderance of Life & Existence) 1995—Jesus Wept (Vibrations of Love & Anger & the Ponderance of Life & Existence) 1998—Dearest Christian, I'm So Very Sorry for Bringing You Here, Love, Dad 2000—The Best of P.M. Dawn.

P.M. Dawn was the most pop-oriented, psychedelic, and (with Arrested Development) popular of the wave of early '90s "alternative rap" groups. An unlikely synthesis of Brian Wilson and De La Soul—of lushly harmonized, vocal-dominated pop melodicism and exotically eclectic, flower-powered hip-hop—P.M. Dawn's critically acclaimed debut album Of the Heart, of the Soul and of the Cross found rotund, introspective vocalist and songwriter Prince Be singing (both leads and layered harmonies) as often as rapping, with equal aplomb.

Attrell and Jarrett Cordes' stepfather, a percussionist with Kool and the Gang, set Attrell's mystical course early by giving him a Donovan album. The brothers' tastes broadened through discarded 45s their garbageman uncle brought them. After graduating from high school, they became Prince Be and DJ Minutemix of P.M. Dawn (inspired by the scripture "in the darkest hour comes the light"). Tiny Warlock Records released their first single, "Ode to a Forgetful Mind," which found some success in England, where Gee Street Records signed the group.

P.M. Dawn went to London to record Of the Heart . . . (#48, 1991), on which Prince Be sang "Reality Used to Be a Friend of Mine" and rapped about reincarnation in "Even After I Die"; there were also a Delta blues slide-guitar break, a quote from the Beatles' "Baby You're a Rich Man," and samples of Dr. John, Chick Corea, Hugh Masekela, and the Doobie Brothers (P.M. Dawn once described themselves not as rappers or pop-rappers, but as "sampling artists"). The album yielded pop hits in "Set Adrift on Memory Bliss" (#1, 1991), built on a sample of Spandau Ballet's "True," and "Paper Doll" (#28, 1992).

In January 1992 hard-core rapper KRS-ONE, a founder of the Stop the Violence movement, jumped onstage to attack (but not seriously harm) P.M. Dawn at a New York City show. It was retaliation for Prince Be's late-1991 comment to a magazine that "KRS-ONE says he wants to be a teacher, but a teacher of what?" Nine months later P.M. Dawn hit with "I'd Die Without You" (#3, 1992), a romantic ballad from the soundtrack of the Eddie Murphy movie Boomerang. The Bliss Album . . . ? (#30, 1993), which included Boy George's guest vocals on "More Than Likely" and a cover of the Beatles' "Norwegian Wood," produced the hit single "Looking Through Patient Eyes" (#6, 1993). Prince Be did production and remix work for fashion model Naomi Campbell's short-lived attempt at a recording career. P.M. Dawn's music grew ever gentler and more lushly pop, but sales steadily decreased. Jesus Wept (#119), which Prince Be called a "gospel record," failed to make the R&B charts, as did its singles "Downtown Venus" (#48), based on a sample of Deep Purple's "Hush," and "Sometimes I Miss You So Much" (#95); Dearest Christian (the title addressed to Prince Be's son) failed to chart altogether, though "I Had No Right" was a minor hit (#44 pop, #82 R&B).

Country-rock band Poco started out in August 1968 with great commercial promise. Founders Richie Furay and Jim Messina were from Buffalo Springfield [see entry], and the L.A. country-rock scene was just beginning to peak. But despite steady sales, Poco never quite reached a mass audience. Rusty Young met Furay and Messina when he played pedal steel guitar on sessions for Buffalo Springfield's "Kind Woman." Young was asked to join another L.A. country-rock band, the Flying Burrito Brothers, but he chose to be in Poco. George Grantham had been a bandmate of Young's in Boon-zee Cryque, a Colorado band that went to L.A., where it broke up. And Randy Meisner came from a rival Colorado band, the Poor. Furay also auditioned Gregg Allman (then with the Allman Joys) for the band, but it didn't work out.

The new group originally called itself Pogo, but Walt Kelly, the creator of the comic strip, sued, and the members changed the name to Poco. Within a month, Meisner quit (he soon joined Rick Nelson's Stone Canyon Band, then Linda Ronstadt, and then the Eagles in 1971). Several record companies considered signing Poco following its live L.A. debut in November 1968 at the Troubadour. Furay's Springfield contract with Atlantic complicated matters, but Poco was allowed to sign with Epic after the label traded Graham Nash to Atlantic (to form Crosby, Stills and Nash) in exchange for Poco.

Pickin' Up the Pieces sold over 100,000 copies. Following Meisner's departure, the band continued as a quartet until February 1970, when Tim B. Schmit (a veteran of local folk, surf, and pop groups) joined. Schmit had originally auditioned for Poco in 1968 but lost out to Meisner. This new five-member Poco recorded Poco and the live Deliverin' before Messina quit, claiming he was tired of touring. The guitarist/producer soon teamed up with Kenny Loggins (see entry).

Messina's replacement was Paul Cotton, former lead guitarist in a Buffalo Springfield-type band, the Illinois Speed Press. This lineup lasted for three LPs. In 1973, just after recording Crazy Eyes, Furay, frustrated with the band's poor financial prospects, left to form a quasi-supergroup, the Souther-Hillman-Furay Band, which disbanded after two LPs. He then pursued a commercially unrewarding solo career before turning his full attention to religion.

Furay's departure was expected to be fatal, but Poco's next four albums as a quartet through 1977 sold somewhat better than previous efforts. During these years, the Eagles [see entry] dominated the field that Poco was expected to mine; and in 1977, after Meisner left the Eagles, Schmit replaced him. Drummer Grantham also quit, in January 1978.

With lone original member Young plus Cotton at the helm, the band finally hit in early 1979 with its 14th LP, Legend (#14). Poco now included an English rhythm section, Steve Chapman and Charlie Harrison (who'd played together for eight years with Leo Sayer and Al Stewart), plus keyboardist Kim Bullard, who'd backed Crosby, Stills and Nash. The new lineup hit #17 with "Crazy Love" and then had a Top 20 hit later that year with "Heart of the Night."

Poco's commercial success was brief, however, with subsequent albums returning to the band's previous level of sales. In 1989 the original group re-formed for an album, Legacy, which produced two Top 40 hits: "Call It Love" (#18) and "Nothin' to Hide" (#39), the latter cowritten and produced by Poco admirer Richard Marx. The group toured in 1990, but tensions soon arose between Furay, by then a minister in Boulder, Colorado, and the others. He soon left Poco, which has since continued to tour, revolving around Young and Cotton. Original drummer Grantham and mid-'80s era bassist Jack Sundrud returned in 2000. Many of Poco's members past and present have released solo albums and worked as session players.

Shane MacGowan and the Pogues: 1995—The Snake (ZTT Warner Bros.) 1997—Crock of Gold (ZTT, U.K.).

The musical equivalent of a pub crawl, the Pogues have staggered through a career that combines the instrumentation and tunes of traditional Irish music with the energy and attitude of punk. The band was formed in 1982 when Shane MacGowan, then a member of a north London punk band called the Nipple Erectors—later shortened to the Nips—saw Spider Stacy playing tin whistle in a London tube station. They hit it off and, along with Nip Jim Fearnley on guitar, began to perform traditional Irish tunes in London's streets and pubs. Calling themselves Pogue Mahone (Gaelic for "kiss my ass"), they recruited Finer, Ranken, and O'Riordan and added MacGowan's earthy, Joycean original songs to their repertoire. The sextet garnered a reputation as a drunkenly raucous live act, and in 1984 released a single, "Dark Streets of London," on their own, eponymous label. Their reputation increased when they were hired as the opening act on the Clash's 1984 tour. (Some of the Clash's political fury rubbed off, as the Pogues became vehemently anti-Thatcher.) They signed with Stiff Records that year, and released Red Roses for Me.

Rum, Sodomy & the Lash was produced by Elvis Costello, who married O'Riordan after she left the band. By then, the band had expanded to an octet. The Pogues did not record again until 1988. In the interim they appeared in Alex Cox's film Straight to Hell (1987) and moved to Island Records. Their initial release for the label, the Steve Lillywhite-produced If I Should Fall From Grace With God (#88, 1988), included the #2 U.K. hit, "Fairytale of New York," featuring singer/songwriter Kirsty MacColl (the daughter of songwriter/playwright Ewan MacColl and then the wife of Lillywhite). The three Lillywhite-produced albums expanded the group's musical palette, adding Middle Eastern sounds on "Turkish Song of the Damned" from God and jazz stylings on Peace and Love (1989).

Finer and Stacy began to take on additional singing and writing chores as MacGowan's drinking (he claimed not to have spent a day completely sober since he was 14) began to interfere with his musical duties. He missed a series of 1988 U.S. dates opening for Bob Dylan, and by 1991 he had become so unreliable he was asked to leave the band. He was replaced by former Clash singer Joe Strummer (who had produced 1990's Hell's Ditch). Strummer left in 1992, and Spider Stacy took over the vocals on 1993's Waiting for Herb. In 1994 MacGowan resurfaced, performing with a new band, the Popes, for the first time on St. Patrick's Day at a London club. That year the group recorded its first album, The Snake, filled with dark new songs by MacGowan. MacGowan toured to support its U.S. release in 1995, the same year the Pogues released its final album, Pogue Mahone, before disbanding in 1996.

The Oakland-born Pointer sisters are a vocal group whose repertoire spans pop, jazz, country, and R&B, and has evoked companions to the Supremes and the Andrews Sisters. Their biggest hits—which didn't come until the '80s—are soulful, high-powered pop. Both of the Pointer parents were ministers at the West Oakland Church of God. Singing in church was the sisters' only performing experience until Bonnie and June began singing in San Francisco clubs in 1969 as Pointers, a Pair. Anita joined them, and eventually San Francisco producer David Rubinson hired them as background vocalists on several records. In 1971 Bill Graham became their manager. From 1971 to 1973 the trio sang behind Elvin Bishop, Taj Mahal, Tower of Power, Dave Mason, Sylvester, Boz Scaggs, and Esther Phillips.

When the Pointers backed Elvin Bishop at L.A.'s Whisky-a-Go-Go, Atlantic executive Jerry Wexler signed them. Two singles were cut with R&B veteran Wardell Quezergue; one, "Don't Try to Take the Fifth," was unsuccessfully released in 1972. That year, Ruth left her job as a keypunch operator to join her sisters. Rubinson helped the Pointers get out of contracts with Graham and Atlantic and signed them to ABC's Blue Thumb label.

In 1973 their self-titled debut, featuring Allen Toussaint's

"Yes We Can Can" (#11 pop, #12 R&B) and Willie Dixon's "Wang Dang Doodle" (#61 pop, #24 R&B), brought national recognition. The sisters' neo-nostalgic penchant for '40s clothes, plus their wide repertoire, landed them on a number of national television variety shows. On tour they became the first black women to play Nashville's Grand Ole Opry and the first pop act to perform at San Francisco's Opera House. In 1974 PBS filmed a documentary on the Pointer family.

That year "Fairytale," written by Anita and Bonnie Pointer, went to #13 on the pop chart (#37 C&W) and won a Grammy as Best Country Single of 1974. The sisters' first two LPs went gold. The next year brought a #1 R&B hit, "How Long (Betcha' Got a Chick on the Side)" (#20 pop). But between 1975 and 1977, June suffered a nervous breakdown, the group filed a lawsuit against ABC/Blue Thumb for back royalties, Bonnie wanted to go solo, and the Pointer Sisters were still being identified (and categorized) as a nostalgia group.

In 1978 Bonnie signed a solo contract with Motown. She had top charting records there in 1978—"Free Me From My Freedom/Tie Me to a Tree (Handcuff Me)" (#58 pop, #10 R&B)—and in 1979, with "Heaven Must Have Sent You" (#11 pop, #52 R&B). She did not have another release until 1984, in part due to legal battles with Motown.

Her sisters signed with producer Richard Perry's Planet Records, where they enjoyed steady pop success. A cover of Bruce Springsteen's "Fire" (#2 pop, #14 R&B, 1979) started a string continued by Toussaint's "Happiness" (#30 pop, #20 R&B, 1979), "He's So Shy" (#3 pop, #10 R&B), and "Could I Be Dreaming" (#52 pop, #22 R&B) in 1980; "Slow Hand" (#2 pop, #7 R&B) in 1981, and "Should I Do It" (#13 pop), "American Music" (#16 pop, #23 R&B), and "I'm So Excited" (#30 pop, #42 R&B) in 1982.

The following year's Top 10, double-platinum Break Out (#8 pop, #6 R&B, 1983) featured "Automatic" (#5 pop, #2 R&B, 1984), "Jump (for My Love)" (#3 pop, #3 R&B, 1984), a remixed version of "I'm So Excited" (#9, 1984), and "Neutron Dance" (#6 pop, #13 R&B, 1984). The platinum Contact (#24 pop, #11 R&B, 1985) included "Dare Me" (#11 pop, #6 R&B, 1985). The trio's following albums did not fare as well, and the group took time off before releasing their 1994 SBK label debut. Unfortunately, the sisters were released from their record contract in the mid-'90s. In 1996 they joined the national tour of

The Pointer Sisters: Ruth Pointer, Anita Pointer, June Pointer

Ain't Misbehavin', a revue based on Fats Waller's life. But June missed a lot of performances, and the tour had to be cut short; she was eventually asked to leave the group in late 1999 with the stipulation that she could return only if she gave up drugs. Eventually, in mid-2000, she entered a rehab program and was treated for addiction to crack and Xanax. As of this writing, the sisters were supposed to perform together again.

One of the most successful pop-metal groups of the late '80s, Poison paved the way for less-energetic and less-glam-styled bands like Warrant and Winger. The band began in central Pennsylvania, where Bret Michaels (a diabetic, as he would reveal after Poison's rise to fame) and Rikki Rockett formed Pans with guitarist Matt Smith and bassist Bobby Dall. They drove to Hollywood and became Poison. Smith was replaced by the flamboyant C.C. DeVille, a veteran of many New York and L.A. hard-rock bands (including Roxx Regime, which became born-again metal band Stryper after he left).

Poison's popularity on the L.A. metal-club circuit led to a record deal, and the group's debut album, Look What the Cat Dragged In (#3, 1986), sold 3 million copies, thanks to such hits as "Talk Dirty to Me" (#9, 1987), "I Want Action" (#50, 1987), and the ballad "I Won't Forget You" (#13, 1987). Open Up and Say . . . Ahh! (#2, 1988) yielded "Nothin' But a Good Time" (#6, 1988), "Fallen Angel" (#12, 1988), the ballad "Every Rose Has Its Thorn" (#1, 1988), and a cover of Loggins and Messina's "Your Mama Don't Dance" (#10, 1989). Flesh & Blood (#2, 1990) produced the hits "Unskinny Bop" (#3, 1990), "Something to Believe In" (#4, 1990), "Life Goes On" (#35, 1991), and "Ride the Wind" (#38, 1991). In late 1990 Michaels cowrote and produced his girlfriend Susie Hatton's debut album, while DeVille guested on Warrant's hit single "Cherry Pie."

Swallow This Live (#51, 1991) signaled Poison's decline. In late 1991 Michaels warned DeVille and Dall, through the metal press, to stop doing so many drugs or be fired. In 1992 DeVille was replaced by Richie Kotzen, who debuted on Na- tive Tongue, which entered Billboard's pop albums chart at #16 in early March 1993, but dropped off the chart three months later, yielding only the minor hit single "Stand" (#50, 1993). By year's end, Kotzen was replaced by 21-year-old Blues Saraceno. Poison's next studio album, Crack a Smile, was to have been released in 1996, but was shelved by Capitol for four years. Saraceno split, and the band became inactive as Michaels focused on efforts for a production company he shared with actor Charlie Sheen. By 1999, however, DeVille had rejoined the group and Poison was back on the road. A new release, Power to the People, compiled recent live performances and new studio tracks, including DeVille's debut as a lead vocalist, "I Hate Every Bone in Your Body But Mine."

The Police's canny, forward-looking combination of pop hooks, exotic rhythms, blond good looks, adventurous management, and good timing won the trio a mass following in America and around the world. Its distinctive sound—songs centered on Sting's bass patterns and high, wailing vocals, with Summers' atmospheric guitar, and Copeland's intricate drumming—was among the most influential approaches since punk. While the Police seemed at first to be a white reggae band, it later incorporated ideas from funk, minimalism, Arab, Indian, and African music. But as the chief singer, songwriter, and bassist, Sting began harboring solo ambitions, which led to the band's untimely demise in 1984, following its fifth and most successful album, Synchronicity.

Sting, who got his nom de fame because of a yellow-and-black jersey he often wore as a young musician, had been a teacher, ditchdigger, and civil servant and had worked with several jazz combos in Newcastle, England, including Last Exit, before he met American drummer Stewart Copeland at a local jazz club. Copeland, the son of a jazz-loving CIA agent and an archaeologist with an appreciation for classical music, had grown up in the Middle East, attended college in California, moved to England in 1975, and joined the English progressive-rock group Curved Air.

After Curved Air broke up in 1976, Copeland formed the Police with Sting and guitarist Henri Padovani in 1977, replacing Padovani with Summers after some months of club dates. (The new trio played for several months with bassist Mike Howlett, who went on to become a record producer, in a group called Strontium 90.) Summers had played with numerous groups since the mid-'60s, including Eric Burdon and the Animals, the Kevin Ayers Band, the Zoot Money Big Roll Band, and Neil Sedaka; he had also studied classical guitar in California.

From the start, the Police distinguished itself for its maverick business practices. Before recording anything, the threesome portrayed a bleached-blond punk-rock band in a chewing-gum TV commercial—a move that drew the scorn of Britain's punks. But in punk style, the group's first single, "Fall Out" (with Padovani), was homemade and frenzied. Released in 1978 by Illegal Records Syndicate (I.R.S.)—an independent label founded by Stewart Copeland and his brother Miles (also the group's manager)—"Fall Out" sold about 70,000 copies in the U.K.

The following year, the Police signed with A&M, negotiating a unique contract that awarded the group a higher-than-standard royalty rate instead of a large advance. The Police's next unorthodox move was to tour America before releasing any records there. Through Frontier Booking International (FBI)—Stewart's brother Ian Copeland's agency—the band borrowed equipment, rented a van, and traveled cross-country to play club dates, sowing the seeds of a following that would make its first U.S. release, "Roxanne," a moderate hit (#32, 1979; it was already a British hit).

Both Outlandos d'Amour and Reggatta de Blanc entered the U.S. Top 30, while in the U.K. "Message in a Bottle" and "Walking on the Moon" went to the top of the singles chart. A 1980 world tour took the Police to Hong Kong, Thailand, India, Egypt, Greece, and Mexico—countries that rarely receive foreign entertainers. Zenyatta Mondatta (#5, 1980), which contained "De Do Do Do, De Da Da Da" (#10, 1980) and "Don't Stand So Close to Me" (#10, 1981), was the group's first U.S. platinum album. It was followed by a second million-seller, Ghost in the Machine (#2, 1981), which secured the Police among the big hitmakers of the decade with "Every Little Thing She Does Is Magic" (#3, 1981).

Meanwhile, the three musicians worked on various outside projects. Sting embarked on a film career, acting in Quadrophenia (1979), Radio On (1979), and Brimstone and Treacle (1982), which he also scored, and performing solo in The Secret Policeman's Other Ball (1982). Summers collaborated with Robert Fripp on two albums. Copeland recorded with Peter Gabriel, released a solo EP as Klark Kent, and composed the soundtrack for Francis Ford Coppola's movie Rumble Fish (1983).

The three regrouped for 1983's chart-topping Synchronicity, which spawned the monster hit "Every Breath You Take" (#1, 1983), and also produced "Synchronicity II" (#16, 1983), "King of Pain" (#3, 1983), and "Wrapped Around Your Finger" (#8, 1984). After a triumphant world tour, it was announced that the Police would take a "sabbatical" to devote time to individual pursuits, but in 1985, as Sting released a successful solo album and started touring with a new band, it became clear that the singer had no plans to reunite with Copeland and Summers. In later years, interviews revealed a playful but real tension between Sting and Copeland, causing speculation that this interaction may have played a part in the group's end as well.

Still, fans were hopeful when the group played together at several shows on Amnesty International's Conspiracy of Hope Tour in 1986. That year also brought a Police greatest-hits compilation that was supposed to include new tracks but didn't, largely because Sting wouldn't write any. Instead the trio included "Don't Stand So Close to Me '86," a subpar new version of the original hit, which peaked at #46. (Several remixes were intended, but a freak polo accident prevented Copeland from drumming.) It was the Police's last recording to date. The trio re-formed in front of an exclusive audience to perform at Sting's wedding to Trudie Styler in 1992 and sat for its first joint interview in 15 years in 1999. The group was the subject of a few tribute albums—two reggae and one rock en Español—in the late '90s. Meanwhile, Sting lent his most famous Police compositions, "Every Breath You Take" and "Roxanne," to rap producer/mogul Sean Combs for sampling and a remix, respectively, in 1997.

Copeland and Summers have enjoyed more modest solo success, at least commercially, than Sting [see entry]. In 1985 Copeland released The Rhythmist, an album documenting his experiments collaborating with African folk percussionists. More film scores followed, as well: Oliver Stone's Wall Street and Talk Radio and numerous others. The drummer also composed themes for television series, including The Equalizer (an instrumental album called The Equalizer and Other Cliff Hangers was released in 1988; it is now out of print), and released two albums with another rock band, Animal Logic, formed with jazz bassist Stanley Clarke and singer Deborah Holland. Then, after composing King Lear for the San Francisco Ballet, he presented his first opera, Holy Blood and Crescent Moon, in 1989; a second, Horse Opera, followed in 1993, with a mini-opera based on the Edgar Allan Poe short story "The Cask of Amontillado" presented in 1994. Also in '94, Copeland coordinated a tour of international percussion groups. Copeland is responsible for the eclectic, atmospheric music featured in the best-selling Spyro the Dragon videogame series.

Summers' post-Police career, while less varied, has been distinguished by adventurous rock, jazz, and fusion albums, both alone and in collaboration with such respected musicians as Fripp and British jazz guitarist John Etheridge. His 1999 solo release Green Chimneys: The Music of Thelonious Monk featured Sting on vocals of the track "Round Midnight." Also in '99, Summers participated in a cross-cultural songwriting exchange workshop in Cuba.

Jean-Luc Ponty

Born Sep. 29, 1942, Avranches, Fr.

1967—Sunday Walk (MPS) 1968—More Than Meets the Ear (World Pacific Jazz) 1969—Electric Connection; Live at Donte's; The Jean-Luc Experience 1970—Astorama (Far East) 1972—New Violin Summit (MPS); Open Strings; Live in Montreux (Inner City) 1973—Ponty/Grappelli (with Stephane Grappelli) (America) 1975—Upon the Wings of Music (Atlantic) 1976—Aurora; Imaginary Voyage 1977—Enigmatic Ocean 1978—Cosmic Messenger 1979—A Taste for Passion; Live 1980—Civilized Evil 1981—Mystical Adventures 1983—Individual Choice 1984—Open Mind 1985—Fables 1987—The Gift of Time (Columbia) 1989—Storytelling 1991—Tchokola (Epic) 1992—Puss in Boots (with Tracey Ullman) (Rabbit Ears/BMG) 1993—No Absolute Time (Atlantic); Jean-Luc Ponty With the George Duke Trio (One Way) 1995—The Rite of Strings (with Stanley Clarke and Al DiMeola) (EMD/I.R.S./Gai Saber) 1997—Live at Chene Park (Atlantic) 2000—The Very Best of Jean-Luc Ponty (Rhino).

Commercially successful jazz-rock-fusion violinist/composer Jean-Luc Ponty draws on both classical technique and sophisticated technology. He has played both acoustic and electric violin with Frank Zappa, the Mahavishnu Orchestra, Elton John, and his own bands. His solo records have featured both jazz stalwarts (Chick Corea and George Benson) and pop players (Ray Parker Jr. and Patrice Rushen). He has also worked on occasion with jazz violinists Stephane Grappelli and Stuff Smith.

Ponty's father, a music teacher, gave him his first violin at age three, and the boy's classical studies began at age five. Ponty left school at 13 to study violin on his own, practicing six hours a day, and at 15 entered the Conservatoire National Supérieur de Musique de Paris, graduating two years later at the head of his class. At age 18 he joined the Concerts Lamoureux Symphony Orchestra for three years. In 1964 he gave up the classics for jazz and played at the Antibes Jazz Festival the next year. He has since played several times at most of the major jazz festivals, including Newport, Montreux, and Monterey.

Ponty first visited the U.S. in 1967, when he took part in a violin summit at the Monterey Jazz Festival. In 1969, after having toured Europe for three years, he moved to America to play with the George Duke Trio. He returned to Europe in 1971 and formed the Jean-Luc Ponty Experience with guitarist Philip Catherine. Before leaving America, though, he had played on Zappa's Hot Rats and also recorded King Kong, an album of Zappa compositions (because of legal problems, Zappa did not get production credit).

Back in France, Ponty met Elton John and contributed violin work to the singer's Honky Chateau. In 1973 he came back to America, where he spent a year with Zappa's Mothers of Invention, followed by a year with the Mahavishnu Orchestra before forming his own band and recording a string of commercially successful jazz-rock-fusion albums. From 1971 to 1979, he consistently won the violin category in Down Beat's critics and readers polls.

In the '80s Ponty began composing on synthesizers; Fables featured groundbreaking work on the Synclavier, an electronic keyboard that interfaces with a computer. He toured extensively, playing both a traditional Barcus-Berry open-bodied violin and a Zeta electronic model, and performed his original compositions with both the Montreal Symphony and the New Japan Philharmonic Tchokola (1991), with its complex West African-based rhythms and an African band, was a marked departure from Ponty's usual sound. In the '90s, he continued recording—his music, with such rare exceptions as Rite of Strings with bassist Stanley Clarke and guitarist Al DiMeola, taking a New Age turn.

With his outrageous, cathartic, and at times dangerous stage antics, and the relentless rock & roll that accompanied them, Iggy Pop prefigured both '70s punk and '90s grunge. With his persona as that of the eternal misfit, saboteur of all convention, Pop has parlayed twisted social commentary, an affecting if limited vocal style, and unlikely survival smarts into a long career characterized by scant commercial success, sizable critical notice, and a fanatic cult.

Raised in a trailer park, James Osterberg played drums as a teen in a local garage band, the Iguanas. He dropped out of the University of Michigan in 1966 and went to Chicago, where he listened to urban blues on the South Side. He returned to Detroit as Iggy Stoooge and, inspired by a Doors concert, formed the Stooges. They debuted on Halloween 1967 in Ann Arbor and were appropriately frightening onstage: Iggy contorting his shirtless torso, letting out primal screams, rubbing peanut butter and raw steaks over his body, gouging his skin with broken glass, diving into the crowd, all while the Stooges played raw, basic rock. Some thought the band the embodiment and the future of rock; others were appalled that they were so unrepentantly primitive.

Elektra, the Doors' label, signed them in 1968. Though a decade later their first two albums would be hailed as seminal punk, they sold only moderately upon release. The band went through various personnel changes following the 1970 album Fun House, eventually breaking up, with Iggy retiring for over a year to kick a heroin addiction. Around this time, he ran into David Bowie, who resolved to resurrect Iggy's career. Bowie regrouped some of the Stooges and produced Raw Power, a critical success.

A dispute with Bowie's manager Tony DeFries forced Iggy and the re-formed Stooges onto the road without a manager. Through 1973 there was a return to drug addiction, and by the next year the band imploded. Iggy spent 1974–75 in L.A., trying to solve assorted legal problems. He committed himself to an L.A. mental hospital and was visited by Bowie (whose "Jean Genie" on the 1973 Aladdin Sane is said to be about Iggy). In 1976 Bowie took Iggy with him on his European tour, after which they settled in Berlin for three years. Concurrently, Bowie produced Pop's The Idiot and Lust for Life, meditations on modern malaise that benefitted from Bowie's professionalism; other albums of this period, like Metallic K.O. and Kill City, were semi-bootleg issues of older Stooges-era material.

playing keyboards, Blondie was their opening act. Signing to Arista in the late '70s, Iggy released New Values, an album of trenchant rock; his other Arista work, however, suggested the beginnings of self-parody and sold dismally. Publishing his autobiography, I Need More, and signing with Blondie guitarist Chns Sten's Animal label in 1982, he put out another strong collection, Zombie Birdhouse. Yet only when "China Girl," cowritten by Pop and David Bowie, appeared on the latter's 1983 Let's Dance and became a hit for Bowie did Iggy achieve a measure of financial stability and mainstream interest.

With Bowie producing and ex-Sex Pistol Steve Jones on guitar, Blah Blah Blah showed Iggy attempting his most accessible music, peaking at #75; it fared nearly as well as The Idiot (#72, 1977), but alienated some of his hard-core following. Beginning in the mid-'80s, Pop began accepting character roles in movies (Sid and Nancy, The Color of Money, Cry-Baby, the kids movie Snow Day, and Dead Man); he was sought after as punk's elder statesman, even though Iggy's outrageousness by then was less a daily reality than a determined role. Married in 1984 and a proponent of at least his version of domestic bliss, Iggy reserved his animal spirits for recording Instinct was Pop at his most metallic; Brick by Brick had him trying again for accessibility and duetting with Kate Pierson of the B-52's ("Candy"). Lauded by critics, American Caesar was his return to raw form, helped out with guest vocals on two tracks by one of his chief successors, Henry Rollins. If anything, Naughty Little Doggie rocked harder, and by the mid-'90s Pop enjoyed genuine cult-legend status. He was invoked as muse/hero in Irvine Welsh's Trainspotting and Danny Boyle's film of that novel (which used "Lust for Life" on its soundtrack); filmmaker Todd Haynes patterned Velvet Goldmine on the Pop-Bowie relationship and Bowie, and in 1997 Joan Jett and the Blackhearts and the Red Hot Chili Peppers were featured on We Formed 1994, Bristol, Eng.

Geoff Barrow (b. Dec. 9, 1971, Southmead, Eng.), kybds.; Beth Gibbons (b. Jan. 4, 1965, Keynsham, Eng.), voc.; Adrian Utley (b. Apr. 27, 1957, Northampton, Eng.), gtr.; Dave McDonald (b. June 18, 1964, Southmead), eng.

1994—Dummy (Go! Discs, U.K.) 1997—Portishead (London) 1998—Glory Times (Go! Discs, U.K.); PNYC (London).

Vocalist Beth Gibbons and keyboardist Geoff Barrow first met in a job-retraining program offered by the unemployment office in Bristol, England. Gibbons, who came from Devon, was a veteran of numerous local bands, and Barrow, who hailed from nearby Portishead, had already accumulated studio experience as a teenager, working on vocalist Neneh Cherry's Homebrew, producing a track for fellow Bristol artist Tricky, and remixing tracks for Primal Scream, Paul Weller, and Depeche Mode. Along with guitarist Adrian Utley and sound engineer Dave McDonald, Barrow and Gibbons began collaborating on new music, using odd and elaborate recording techniques, sampling bits of spy-movie soundtracks, and employing a Theremin, the electronic instrument responsible for the eerie whine in vintage sci-fi movies and the Beach Boys' "Good Vibrations." The band's first effort was a short film, To Kill a Dead Man, which Barrow and Gibbons wrote and performed in. The project and its unusual soundtrack won record-label attention. The group signed to the U.K. label Go! Discs, which released 1994's Dummy, whose unanticipated success in England popularized the style dubbed "trip-hop," an atmospheric, nearly narcotic sound, mixing hip-hop beats with the downtempo undertow of dub reggae, oddly skewed samples, and the studio experimentation of electronic music, and was first realized by the Bristol group Massive Attack. Portishead added a fixation with James Bond-ish movie soundtracks, a jazzier flow, and Gibbons' sexily mournful vocals. Released on London Records in the U.S. the next year, the album became an underground sensation, reaching #79 and selling more than 150,000 copies after a video for the single "Sour Times" ("Nobody Loves Me") (#53, 1995) garnered frequent airing on MTV.

It took two more years for the group to release its followup, Portishead (#21, 1997), which found Barrow striving to move beyond the sound that had become widely emulated, even on TV commercials. Portishead's next release was an album of remixes, Glory Times, followed by the live album, PNYC (#155, 1998), recorded at New York's Roseland Ballroom.

Prefab Sprout

Paddy McAloon (b. June 7, 1957, Durham, Eng.), voc., gtr.; Martin McAloon (b. Jan. 4, 1962, Durham), bass; Wendy Smith (b. May 31, 1963, Durham), voc., gtr.; Michael Salmon, drums. 1984—Swoon (Kitchenware/Epic) (—Salmon; + Neil Conti [b. Feb. 12, 1959, London, Eng.], drums) 1985—Two Wheels Good (a.k.a. Steve McQueen) 1988—From Langley Park to Memphis 1989—Protest Songs 1990—Jordan: The Comeback (Epic) 1992—A Life of Surprises: The Best of Prefab Sprout 1997—Andromeda Heights (Kitchenware/Columbia, U.K.).

Singer and tunesmith Paddy McAloon, the driving force behind Prefab Sprout, has been praised as an heir to the richly melodic, tenderly lyrical tradition of pop songwriting embodied by artists like Paul McCartney, Brian Wilson, and Marvin Gaye. Although grand-scale commercial success has eluded the band, Prefab Sprout is appreciated, especially in England, for its delicate but lush postmodern pop, which incorporates subtle jazz inflections (à la Steely Dan), and for the quirky literateness of McAloon's lyrics, which have paid homage to American cultural icons such as Elvis Presley and Jesse James.

While growing up in rural England, McAloon and his brother Martin listened to records by the Beatles and the Who, and to contemporary American standards by Burt Bacharach and Jimmy Webb. In 1982 a single released independently by the siblings as Prefab Sprout, "Lions in My Own Garden (Exit Someone)," caught the attention of record-store manager Keith Armstrong, who signed them to his Kitchenware Records. Then the McAloons enlisted Wendy Smith, an early fan with a breathy soprano voice, and Armstrong struck a deal with Epic Records. The band's debut album, Swoon, which debuted in the U.K. Top 20, caught the attention of electro-pop musician/producer Thomas Dolby, who produced Two Wheels Good (released as Steve McQueen outside the U.S.), hailed by American and British critics as one of the year's best albums.

From Langley Park to Memphis produced a European pop hit with "The King of Rock 'n' Roll," which rose to #7 in the U.K. The album also featured guest appearances by Stevie Wonder and Pete Townshend. Jordan: The Comeback got good notices but made little impact on the charts. The band disappeared for much of the '90s while Paddy McAloon married and had children, wrote mammoth conceptual scores that he didn't record (one ongoing project, started in 1991, is called Earth: The Story So Far), and eventually composed songs for other artists (Cher, Jimmy Nail). Meanwhile, Conti did session work, while Martin McAloon and Smith pursued new careers in music education. After a touch of renewed national recognition with a 1997 song,

"Where the Heart Is," which served as the theme to a British television series, Paddy McAloon gathered the band (sans Smith, who had recently given birth) for a rare tour throughout the UK in 2000. Around this time, Paddy McAloon was also preparing to release a largely instrumental album with some spoken-word interludes, called I Trawl the Megahertz.

Simply put, Elvis Presley was the first real rock & roll star. A white Southerner singing blues laced with country, and country tinged with gospel, he brought together American music from both sides of the color line and performed it with a natural hip-swiveling sexuality that made him a teen idol and a role model for generations of cool rebels. He was repeatedly dismissed as vulgar, incompetent, and a bad influence, but the force of his music and his image was no mere merchandising feat. Presley signaled to mainstream culture that it was time to let go. Today, over 20 years after his death, Presley's image and influence remain undiminished. While certainly other artists preceded him and he by no means "invented" rock & roll, he is indisputably its king.

As a recording artist, Presley's accomplishments are unparalleled. He is believed to have sold over 1 billion records worldwide, about 40 percent of those outside the U.S. The RIAA has awarded Presley the largest number of gold, platinum, and multiplatinum certifications of any artist in history, as of early 2001, 131. His chart performance, as tracked by Billboard, is also unmatched, with 149 charting pop singles: 114 Top 40, 40 Top 10, and 18 #1s.

Presley was the son of Gladys and Vernon Presley, a sewing-machine operator and a truck driver. Elvis' twin brother, Jesse Garon, was stillborn, and Presley grew up an only child. When he was three, his father served an eight-month prison term for writing bad checks, and afterward Vernon Presley's employment was erratic, keeping the family just above the poverty level. The Presleys attended the First

Elvis Presley

Assembly of God Church, and its Pentecostal services always included singing.

In 1945 Presley won second prize at the Mississippi-Alabama Fair and Dairy Show for his rendition of Red Foley's "Old Shep." The following January he received a guitar for his birthday. In 1948 the family moved to Memphis, and while attending L.C. Humes High School there, Presley spent much of his spare time hanging around the black section of town, especially on Beale Street, where bluesmen like Furry Lewis and B.B. King performed.

Upon graduation in June 1953, Presley worked at the Precision Tool Company and then drove a truck for Crown Electric. He planned to become a truck driver and had begun to wear his long hair pompadoured, the current truck-driver style. That summer he recorded "My Happiness" and "That's When Your Heartaches Begin" at the Memphis Recording Service, a sideline Sam Phillips had established in his Sun Records studios where anyone could record a 10-inch acetate for four dollars.

Presley was reportedly curious to know what he sounded like and gravely disappointed by what he heard. But he returned to the Recording Service again on January 4, 1954, and recorded "Casual Love Affair" and "I'll Never Stand in Your Way." This time he met Phillips, who called him later that spring to rerecord a song that Phillips had received on a demo, "Without You." Despite numerous takes, Presley failed miserably and at Phillips' request just began singing songs in the studio. Phillips then began to believe that he had finally found what he had been looking for: "a white man with the Negro sound and the Negro feel."

Phillips enlisted lead guitarist Scotty Moore and bassist Bill Black, both of whom were then playing country & western music in Doug Poindexter's Starlight Wranglers. Though some sources cite the date of their first meeting as July 4, 1954, the three had actually rehearsed for several months, and on July 5, 1954, they recorded three songs: "I Love You Because," "Blue Moon of Kentucky," and what would become Presley's debut, Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup's "That's All Right."

Two days later Memphis disc jockey Dewey Phillips (no relation to Sam) played the song on his Red Hot and Blue show on radio station WHBQ. Audience response was overwhelming, and that night Presley came to the studio for his first interview. Scotty Moore became Presley's manager, and "That's All Right" b/w "Blue Moon of Kentucky" became his first local hit. After playing local shows, Presley made his first—and last—appearance at the Grand Ole Opry on September 25. Legend has it that after his performance he was advised by the Opry's talent coordinator to go back to driving trucks.

By October Presley had debuted on The Louisiana Hayride, a popular radio program on which he appeared regularly through 1955. He made his television debut on a local television version of Hayride in March 1955. Meanwhile, "Good Rockin' Tonight" b/w "I Don't Care if the Sun Don't Shine" were hits in the Memphis area.

In early 1955 Moore stopped managing Presley, although he would continue to play in Presley's band for several years.

Presley's new manager was Memphis disc jockey Bob Neal. Colonel Thomas Parker first entered Presley's career when he helped Neal make some tour arrangements. Presley, still considered a country act, continued to perform locally, and in April he traveled to New York City, where he auditioned unsuccessfully for Arthur Godfrey's Talent Scouts program. But on May 13 his performance in Jacksonville, Florida, started a riot. Presley's first, "Baby, Let's Play House" b/w "I'm Left, You're Right, She's Gone" was released and hit #10 on the national C&W chart in July.

That September, Presley had his first #1 country record, a version of Junior Parker's "Mystery Train" b/w "I Forgot to Remember to Forget." By this time Colonel Parker, despite Presley's agreement with Neal, had become increasingly involved in his career. When RCA purchased Presley's contract from Sun for a then unheard-of $35,000, Hill and Range, a music publisher with which Parker had some connections, purchased Sam Phillips' Hi-Lo Music for another $15,000. In addition, Presley received a $5,000 advance, with which he bought his mother a pink Cadillac. (It remains among his possessions preserved at Graceland.)

Presley became a national star in 1956. He and Parker traveled to Nashville, where Presley cut his first records for RCA (including "I Got a Woman," "Heartbreak Hotel," and "I Was the One"), and on January 28, 1956, the singer made his national television debut on the Dorsey Brothers' Stage Show, followed by six consecutive appearances. In March, Parker signed Presley to a managerial agreement for which he would receive 25 percent of Presley's earnings. The contract would last through Presley's lifetime and beyond.

Presley performed on the Milton Berle, Steve Allen, and Ed Sullivan television shows. The Colonel arranged Presley's debut at the New Frontier Hotel in Las Vegas that April, but the two-week engagement was canceled after one week due to poor audience response. In August he began filming his first movie, Love Me Tender, which was released three months later and recouped its $1 million cost in three days. Elvis' hit singles that year were all certified gold; they included "Heartbreak Hotel" (#1), "I Was the One" (#19), "Blue Suede Shoes" (#20), "I Want You, I Need You, I Love You" (#1), "Hound Dog" (#1), "My Baby Left Me" (#31), "Don't Be Cruel" (#1), "Love Me Tender" (#1), "Anyway You Want Me (That's How I Will Be)" (#20), "Love Me" (#2), and "When My Blue Moon Turns to Gold" (#19). By early 1957 he was the idol of millions of teens and the perfect target for the wrath of critics, teachers, clergy, and even other entertainers (including many country performers), all of whom saw his style as too suggestive; he was nicknamed Elvis the Pelvis by one writer. Presley repeatedly claimed not to understand what all the criticism was about. On January 6, when Presley made his last of three appearances on Ed Sullivan's show, he was shown only from the waist up.

In March 1957 Presley purchased Graceland, a former church that had been converted into a 23-room mansion; the next month "All Shook Up" began an eight-week run at #1. It was preceded in 1957 by "Poor Boy" (#24), "Too Much" (#1), and "Playing for Keeps" (#21). Presley's next single was his first gospel release, "(There'll Be) Peace in the Valley (for Me)"; it went to #25.

Presley was also the first rock star to cross over into films with consistent commercial, if not critical, success. His second film, Loving You, was released in July 1957, and "(Let Me Be Your) Teddy Bear" from its soundtrack hit #1 on the pop, country, and R&B charts, as did "All Shook Up," and "Jailhouse Rock," the title song from Presley's next movie, which featured Leiber and Stoller songs. Other hit singles from 1957 were "Loving You" (#20) and "Treat Me Nice" (#18).

That December he received his draft notice but was granted a 60-day deferment to complete filming King Creole, a drama based on the novel A Stone for Danny Fisher, costarring Carolyn Jones and Walter Matthau. These first four feature films are considered his best. Early in the game, Presley truly intended to be taken seriously as an actor. Unfortunately, once he left the service, the choice of roles was left entirely up to Colonel Parker, and the results were rarely satisfactory for either the audience or Presley. However, since Presley would not tour again until the early '70s, it was through the films that most fans saw him. Despite anything that might be said of these films, that reason alone accounts for their massive success.

On March 24, 1958, Presley entered the army. The preceding months brought two hits: "Don't" (#1, 1958) and "I Beg of You" (#8, 1958). He took leave a few months later to be with his mother. Gladys Presley died the day after his arrival home in Memphis, on August 14, 1958. In later interviews Presley would call her death the great tragedy of his life. In the years since his death, much has been written about his relationship with his mother and her impact on him. She was without question the most important person in his life. At her funeral, he cried out, "You know how much I lived my whole life just for you," words that were both true in the moment and prophetic, for the absence of Gladys, and his love for her, seemed to have never really left his mind. He was shipped to Bremerhaven, West Germany, and in January 1960 was promoted to sergeant. He was discharged in March.

Colonel Parker, meanwhile, had continued to release singles Presley had recorded before his departure, ensuring that while Elvis was gone, he would not be forgotten. And he wasn't. He scored a number of hits in absentia, including "Wear My Ring Around Your Neck" (#2, 1958), "Don'tcha Think It's Time" (#15, 1958), "Hard Headed Woman" (#1, 1958), "Don't Ask Me Why" (#25, 1958), "One Night" (#4, 1958), "I Got Stung" (#8, 1958), "(Now and Then There's) A Fool Such as I" (#2, 1959), "I Need Your Love Tonight" (#4, 1959), "A Big Hunk o' Love" (#1, 1959), and "My Wish Came True" (#12, 1959). In 1958 alone, Presley earned over $2 million. Shortly after his return to civilian life in March 1960, he recorded his first stereo record, "Stuck on You" (#1), and later that month he taped a TV program with Frank Sinatra. The Frank Sinatra-Timex Special.

In July, Presley's father remarried. Vernon Presley's second wife, Davada "Dee" Stanley, and her three sons would later write Elvis: We Love You Tender, one of dozens of insiders' tell-all biographies that were published following his death. Also at this time, Presley gathered more closely around him the friends, employees, and hangers-on who would become known as the Memphis Mafia and would accompany him almost constantly until his death. Presley's world became increasingly insular.

The films G.I. Blues and Flaming Star were released in 1960, and "It's Now or Never" hit #1 in both the U.K. and the U.S. Presley had five #1 U.S. hits: "Stuck on You," "It's Now or Never," "Are You Lonesome Tonight" (1960); "Surrender" (1961); and "Good Luck Charm" (1962). Other Top 10 singles included "I Feel So Bad" (#5, 1961), "Little Sister" (#5, 1961), "(Marie's the Name) His Latest Flame" (#4, 1961), "Can't Help Falling in Love" (#2, 1961), "She's Not You" (#5, 1962), "Return to Sender" (#2, 1962), "(You're the) Devil in Disguise" (#3, 1963), and "Boss a Nova Baby" (#8, 1963). Meanwhile, over Christmas 1960, Priscilla Beaulieu, the teenage daughter of an army officer whom Presley had met in Germany, visited Graceland. In early 1961 she moved in to live, it was said, under the supervision of Presley's father and stepmother. Interestingly, the press largely went along with the spin Colonel Parker put on the story, and few seemed troubled that the King of Rock & Roll shared his domain with his teenage girlfriend.

After a live performance on March 25, 1961, at a benefit for the USS Arizona, Presley left the concert stage. He spent the next eight years making B movies: Wild in the Country; Blue Hawaii (1961); Follow That Dream; Kid Galahad; Girls! Girls! Girls! (1962); It Happened at the World's Fair; Fun in Acapulco (1963); Kissin' Cousins; Viva Las Vegas; Roustabout (1964); Girl Happy; Tickle Me; Harum Scarum (1965); Frankie and Johnny; Paradise, Hawaiian Style; Spinout (1966); Easy Come, Easy Go; Double Trouble; Clambake (1967); Stay Away Joe; Speedway; Live a Little, Love a Little (1968); Charro!; The Trouble With Girls (and How to Get Into It); Change of Habit (1969). With a few exceptions, the soundtrack music was indisputably poor. But by the mid-'60s, Presley was earning $1 million per movie plus a large percentage of the gross. Most of the movies had a concurrently released soundtrack LP. Four of them hit #1 (Loving You, G.I. Blues, Blue Hawaii, Roustabout), and an additional seven were Top 10. Presley often made his displeasure with these films known to friends and associates, but Colonel Parker would not relent in his insistence that his sole client stick with a winning formula. Years later, in 1974, Parker's shortsightedness as a manager resulted in his refusing Barbara Streisand's offer to have Presley costar with her in what became a hit remake of A Star Is Born. Parker felt Streisand didn't deserve equal billing with Presley.

Meanwhile, the younger rock audience heard Presley disciples like the Beatles more often than they heard Presley himself. But Presley did not disappear, and he was not, like most American rockers, swept away by the British Invasion, though the Top 10 became increasingly beyond his reach, with only "Crying in the Chapel" (which he recorded in 1960) at #3 (1965) making the cut. Presley turned increasingly inward, focusing on his family. On May 1, 1967, Presley and Priscilla were wed in Las Vegas; on February 1, 1968, their only child, Lisa Marie, was born. Fearing he had been forgotten, Presley made a last-gasp bid to regain his footing. He defied Colonel Parker and followed the advice of director Steve Binder for his "comeback" television special. (Parker had wanted it to be a Christmas show.) Over the summer Presley taped the surprisingly raw, powerful Elvis television special that was broadcast on December 3 to high ratings. Its soundtrack reached #8. It included his first performance before an audience in over seven years (though many portions were taped without an audience). It also spun off his first Top 15 hit single since 1965, the socially conscious "If I Can Dream" (#12, 1968). The importance of this moment in Presley's life cannot be overestimated. Years later, the '68 comeback special still stands as one of the most powerful performances in rock history.

With that success behind him, Presley turned to performing in Las Vegas. His monthlong debut at the International Hotel in Las Vegas began on July 26, 1969, and set the course for all of Presley's future performances. His fee for the four weeks was over $1 million. Riding the crest of his comeback, Presley released a series of top singles, including "In the Ghetto" (#3, 1969), "Suspicious Minds" (#1, 1969, and his first chart-topper since early 1962), "Don't Cry Daddy" (#6, 1969), and "The Wonder of You" (#9, 1970). He toured the country annually, selling out showrooms, auditoriums, and arenas, frequently breaking box-office records. Until his death, he performed a total of nearly 1,100 concerts. There were two on-tour documentaries released, Elvis: That's the Way It Is (1970) and Elvis on Tour (1972), the latter of which won the Golden Globe Award for Best Documentary.

Presley was honored with countless Elvis Presley Days in cities around the country, and the U.S. Jaycees named him one of the 10 most outstanding young men of America in 1970. His birthplace in Tupelo was opened to the public, and on January 18, 1972, the portion of Highway 51 South that runs in front of Graceland was renamed Elvis Presley Boulevard. That October, Presley had his last Top 10 hit when "Burning Love" hit #2.

Meanwhile, Presley's personal life became the subject of countless tabloid headlines. Priscilla, from whom Presley had been separated since February 1972, refused to return to Graceland, and on his birthday in 1973 he filed for divorce. Less than a week later the TV special Elvis: Aloha From Hawaii was broadcast via satellite to over a billion viewers in 40 countries, an indication of his international appeal, although (with the exception of three dates in Canada in 1957 and an impromptu performance while on leave in Paris in 1959) Presley never performed outside the U.S. The special's soundtrack album became his last #1 album, in 1973.

Outwardly, Presley appeared to have been granted a second chance. He was more popular than ever, and the fan worship that would blossom into one of the biggest personality cults in modern history was taking hold. Offstage, however, Presley was plagued by self-doubt, poor management, and a basic dissatisfaction with his life. He repeatedly threatened to quit show business, but debts and his financial obligations to his large extended family, employees, and assorted hangers-on made that impossible. Unbeknownst to the public until after his death, Presley turned to drugs. Soon after he left the army, he became increasingly wary of the public and would often rent whole movie theaters and amusement parks to visit at night. By the late '60s, he was nearly a total recluse. Among the many books written about Presley by those who knew him, Priscilla's account, Elvis and Me, goes so far as to suggest that he might have suffered a nervous breakdown. Although it now seems clear that Presley was taking drugs—namely amphetamines—while in the service (and perhaps even before), his abuse of prescription drugs, including barbiturates, tranquilizers, and amphetamines, increased during the last years of his life. Several painful physical conditions may have initiated this trend. Ironically, he remained devoutly spiritual, never drank alcohol, and publicly denounced the use of recreational drugs. In one of his few unplanned excursions from Graceland, he actually showed up at the White House in 1970 to meet President Richard M. Nixon and received an honorary Drug Enforcement Administration agent's badge. Days later he was given a special tour of FBI headquarters, where, according to FBI files made public after Presley's death, the singer offered to provide information on persons he believed were a bad influence on American youth.

Toward the end of his life, however, his onstage presence began to deteriorate. He would babble incoherently and rip his pants, having grown quite obese, and on at least one occasion he collapsed. Despite his clearly worsening health, he maintained a frantic tour schedule. This was due to the fact that in 1973 Colonel Parker had negotiated a complex deal whereby Presley sold back to RCA the rights to many of his masters in exchange for a lump-sum payment of which only $2.8 million came to him. Essentially, after 1973 Parker was earning nearly 50 percent commission (as opposed to the 10 percent industry standard). Worse, however, Presley was not earning any more royalties on sides recorded before 1973, although they continued to sell in the millions year after year. Parker's need to satisfy personal gambling debts was said to be the reason for the self-serving deal. On top of it all, Presley opposed tax shelters on principle; he naively relied on his father for business advice, and he gave away expensive gifts and cash heedlessly. The result, by the mid-'70s, was near-certain financial disaster.

Presley's last live performance was on June 25, 1977, in Indianapolis. He was reportedly horrified at the impending publication of Elvis: What Happened?, the tell-all written by three of his ex-bodyguards and Memphis mafiosi that was the first printed account of his drug abuse and obsession with firearms, to name just two headline-grabbing revelations. The book came out on August 12. On August 16, 1977—the day before his next scheduled concert—Presley was discovered by his girlfriend Ginger Alden dead in his bathroom at Graceland. Although his death was at first attributed to congestive heart failure (an autopsy also revealed advanced arteriosclerosis and an enlarged liver), later investigation revealed evidence that drug abuse may have been at least part of the cause of death. Because the family was allowed to keep the official autopsy report private, additional speculation regarding contributing factors in Presley's death has run wild. Through the years, several insiders have insisted that he was suffering from bone cancer, to name just one unsubstantiated claim. In September 1979 Presley's private physician, Dr. George Nichopoulos, was charged by the Tennessee Board of Medical Examiners with "indiscriminately prescribing 5,300 pills and vials for Elvis in the seven months before his death." He was later acquitted.

Thousands gathered at Graceland, where Presley lay in state before he was buried in a mausoleum at Forest Hill Cemetery in Memphis. After attempts were made to break into the mausoleum, Presley's body and that of his mother were moved to the Meditation Garden behind Graceland. Nearly two years later, his father, Vernon, died and was also buried there. With Vernon dead, all of Presley's estate passed on to Lisa Marie.

Court battles over the estate ended in June 1983 after 21 months of litigation with a settlement that ended four lawsuits. One of the terms of the agreement called for Parker to turn over most of his interest in Presley's audio and video recordings to RCA and the Presley family in return for a large monetary settlement. Lisa Marie's court-appointed guardian ad litem, Blanchard Tual, wrote in his report on Presley's financial affairs that Parker had "handled affairs not in Elvis' but in his own best interest." Parker died of a stroke in February 1997 at the age of 87. Priscilla Presley assumed control of the estate and through a number of business moves made the Presley estate many times more valuable than it had ever been during Elvis' lifetime. The cornerstone of the Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc. (EPE) financial empire is the Tennessee state law Priscilla Presley pushed for that guarantees to heirs the commercial rights to a deceased celebrity's image and likeness. As a result, the name Elvis Presley is, technically speaking, a trademark, and anyone selling Presley-related merchandise in the U.S. must pay EPE an advance fee plus a royalty on every item sold.

Claiming the funds were needed to maintain the property (the estate was valued at only $5 million in 1979 and the costs to maintain Graceland are estimated at nearly half a million dollars annually), Priscilla Presley opened Graceland to the public in the fall of 1982. Although it is not preserved in exactly the way Elvis Presley left it, and the second floor, where his bedroom is located, remains off-limits to the public, millions have come from all over the world to pay homage to the King of Rock & Roll. In 1991 Graceland was added to the National Register of Historic Places. At last count, 700,000 people visit Graceland annually. In the mid-'90s, the Presley estate was estimated to have been worth over $100 million. At the turn of the century, it was estimated that the presence of Graceland was responsible for bringing $100 million into the local Memphis economy. The Elvis Presley Charitable Foundation was created in 1985 by Elvis Presley Enterprises to support various causes. In 2000 ground was broken for Presley Place in Memphis, which will provide a year of free housing, child care, job training, and other services for homeless families.

Presley's sole heir, Lisa Marie, married a fellow Scientology follower, Danny Keough, in 1988. They had two children: Danielle and Benjamin Storm. In 1993 they were divorced, and in May 1994 she married Michael Jackson. They divorced in 1996, after 18 months of marriage.

To date, over 300 books about Elvis Presley have been published in the United States alone. His enduring power as a cultural force is beyond the scope of this book, but it has been examined in a number of works by authors including Dave Marsh, Greil Marcus, and Peter Guralnick, to name a few. Guralnick's award-winning two-volume biography—Last Train to Memphis: The Rise of Elvis Presley (1994) and Careless Love: The Unmaking of Elvis Presley (1999)—is perhaps the closest to a definitive account as we will ever have. In 1986 Presley was among the first 10 performers inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Though keyboardist/vocalist Billy Preston has recorded prolifically since he was a teenager, he may be best known for his performances as a sideman for Little Richard, Ray Charles, the Beatles, and the Rolling Stones. Preston's family moved to L.A. when he was two years old. At age 12 he had a cameo part in a film about W.C. Handy, St. Louis Blues, playing the composer as a child. Little Richard heard him in 1962 and invited him to appear on a European tour. There, backing Richard, Preston met Sam Cooke (who signed him to his SAR label) and the Beatles. After Cooke's death Preston moved to Vee-Jay records, where he cut an instrumental gospel album, The Most Exciting Organ Ever, his first charting record.

Preston was playing in the house band of the television show Shindig when Ray Charles recruited him for his band. George Harrison spotted Preston on a BBC Ray Charles special and contacted him. Subsequently he was signed to the Beatles' Apple Records, where he cut two Harrison-produced albums, That's the Way God Planned It (whose title cut was a minor hit and which hit #127 on rerelease in 1972) and Encouraging Words. Preston also became a valuable sideman for the Beatles, appearing on "Get Back" and "Let It Be." Following the Beatles' breakup, he performed on Harrison's All Things Must Pass and at the Concert for Bangla Desh in 1971.

Preston had several hits on A&M Records in the early '70s, including the instrumental "Outa-Space" (#2 pop, #1 R&B) in 1972, "Will It Go Round in Circles" (#1 pop, #10 R&B) and "Space Race" (#4 pop, #1 R&B) in 1973; and "Nothing From Nothing" (#1 pop, #8 R&B) in 1974. Each single went gold, and "Outa-Space" won a Grammy as Best Pop Instrumental Performance. In 1975 Preston wrote what became Joe Cocker's biggest solo hit, "You Are So Beautiful." That same year Preston was featured on the Rolling Stones' tour; he had previously recorded with them (Goats Head Soup, It's Only Rock 'n Roll, Sticky Fingers, Exile on Main Street), and he later appeared on Black and Blue and Love You Live.

Preston was active as a session musician through the late '70s and into the '80s, though his solo career declined. In 1979 he reached the Top 5 with "With You I'm Born Again," a duet with Syreeta Wright. Preston toured with Ringo Starr in 1989 and recorded for the U.K. Motorcity label in the early '90s, but he could not restart his career. In 1992 he pleaded no contest to charges of assault and possession of cocaine and was sentenced to prison and drug treatment, followed by house arrest and probation. (He later admitted that his addiction to alcohol and crack cocaine had been going on for nearly 30 years.) Preston released two gospel albums in the mid-'90s. In 1997 he was arrested for cocaine possession, accused of violating his probation, and sentenced to three years in prison. The following year he and his ex-manager were indicted in an alleged insurance-fraud conspiracy. Preston pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against the other defendants, including his former manager; he received one year in jail, which ran concurrently with his other sentence. Upon his release from prison, Preston resumed live performance.

The Pretenders

Chrissie Hynde (b. Sep. 7, 1951, Akron, OH), voc., gtr.; Pete Farndon (b. 1953, Hereford, Eng.); d. Apr. 14, 1983, London), bass; James Honeyman-Scott (b. Nov. 4, 1957, Hereford; d. June 16, 1982), gtr.; Martin Chambers (b. 1952, Hereford), drums.

The Pretenders, originally three Englishmen and an American woman, emerged at the close of the '70s as one of the new wave's most commercially successful groups. Its focal point was Chrissie Hynde, the band's songwriter, lead singer, and rhythm guitarist, whose tough songs and stage persona put feminist self-assertion into her own distinctive hard rock.

A single gig with an Akron band, Sat. Sun. Mat. (which included Mark Mothersbaugh, later of Devo), was Hynde's sole performing experience when, after three years of studying art at Kent State University, she left (with money earned as a waitress) for the rocker's life in London in 1974. She began writing savagely satiric reviews for New Musical Express; but after playing cover girl for a story on Brian Eno, she moved to France to form a band. When nothing materialized, she returned to Akron, where she joined Jack Rabbit; it broke up, and Hynde returned to France and then to England by 1976, as punk rock was burgeoning. She tried to enlist a young guitarist, Mick Jones, into her would-be group, but Jones committed himself to another new group, the Clash.

She was then hired by punk fashion entrepreneur and Sex Pistols manager Malcolm McLaren (in whose boutique, Sex, Hynde had worked when she'd first come to London) to play guitar in Masters of the Backside. After months of rehearsal, she was dismissed; the group turned into the Damned. Hynde played guitar or sang backup behind Johnny Moped, Chris Spedding, Johnny Thunders (the New York Dolls, the Heartbreakers), and Nick Lowe. With these contacts and a growing repertoire of original songs, she recorded a demo tape. Dave Hill, founder of Real Records, became her manager and advanced her the money to audition and hire a band.

Bassist Pete Farndon had recently returned to England from Australia, where he had played for two years with a popular Aussie group, the Bushwackers. He called James Honeyman-Scott, who had toured with several bands, notably Cheeks, a group led by ex-Mott the Hoople keyboardist Verdon Allen. Honeyman-Scott joined Hynde, Farndon, and drummer Gerry Mackleduff to record two Hynde compositions—"Precious" and "The Wait"—and a 1964 number penned by Ray Davies of the Kinks: "Stop Your Sobbing." Nick Lowe pegged "Stop Your Sobbing" b/w "The Wait" for a hit and offered to produce a single, which he did in one day in the fall of 1978. The next day, the Pretenders left for Paris for its debut gig and a weeklong club engagement.

Mackleduff was replaced by Cheeks' former drummer, Martin Chambers, then working as a drummer and driving instructor in London. In January 1979 "Stop Your Sobbing" was released in Britain. Soon it was in the Top 30. The followup, "Kid," written by Hynde and produced by Chris Thomas, did well, too. By spring, the Pretenders were selling out performances all over the UK. In May the band began work on an album, with Thomas producing. The Pretenders, released worldwide in January 1980, was universally lauded. "Brass in Pocket" hit #1 in the U.K. and Australia and reached #14 in the U.S. After whipping off another single, "Talk of the Town," for the British market, Hynde brought her band stateside, where its album was rising to #9.

It took the band over a year and a half to produce a followup, although a five-song EP was issued in the interim. Finally, in August 1981 Pretenders II (#10) was released to mixed reviews. It included another tune by Ray Davies, "I Go to Sleep," and Hynde showed up so frequently on the Kinks tour that summer that her relationship with Ray Davies soon became public knowledge. (The two never married but had a daughter, Natalie, in 1983.) A 1981 tour of the U.S. was postponed when, in October, Chambers badly injured his hand; the eventual tour was the last time the original Pretenders played together.

Farndon was booted from the group on June 14, 1982; two days later Honeyman-Scott died of a drug overdose. Farndon himself would die of a drug overdose the following April. Surviving members Hynde and Chambers recorded the gorgeous, wistful "Back on the Chain Gang" (dedicated to Honeyman-Scott) with ex-Rockpile guitarist Billy Bremner and Big Country bassist Tony Butler; it hit #5 in 1983. The intro to its flip side, "My City Was Gone" (also featuring Bremner), later became the theme song of Rush Limbaugh's radio program.

Another year passed, however, before the release of the aptly titled Learning to Crawl, which introduced new members Robbie McIntosh and Malcolm Foster. The album (#5, 1984) went platinum and spawned hits in "Middle of the Road" (#19, 1984) and "Show Me" (#28, 1984). In May 1984 Hynde married Jim Kerr, lead singer of Simple Minds; the two had a daughter but soon split up. Hynde got married again in 1997, to Colombian sculptor Lucho Brieva.

Since 1986's Get Close the Pretenders have consisted mostly of Hynde and a succession of musicians, with spotty results. "Don't Get Me Wrong" (#10, 1986) was the group's last Top 10 hit. McIntosh went on to play and record with Paul McCartney; former Smiths guitarist Johnny Marr stepped in for the band's remaining tour dates. For Last of the Independents (#41, 1994), the band's first album in four years, Chambers came back on board, joined by Adam Seymour, formerly of the Katydids, and ex-Primitives bassist Andy Hobson. The album spawned a Top 40 single in the ballad "I'll Stand by You," and the lineup remained intact for the acoustic live album, The Isle of View (#100, 1995) and 1999's Viva El Amor! (which also featured Hynde's hero Jeff Beck on the track "Legalize Me"). Viva El Amor!'s cover photo, featuring Hynde holding her fist in the air in the fashion of a classic Colombian propaganda poster, was taken by Linda McCartney a month before her death.

Although the long waits between LPs have dulled her group's once shining commercial career, Hynde remains an influential performer and songwriter. Her performances with the Pretenders on the 1999 Lilith Fair were regarded by many critics as the highlight of the woman-centric festival tour. Hynde is also an outspoken crusader for People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals. In March 2000 she was arrested on felony charges of third-degree criminal mischief in New York for destroying an estimated $1,000 worth of merchandise during a protest of what she termed "black-market" leather from India at a Gap clothing store (a charge the Gap disputes). Manhattan Criminal Court adjourned the case "in contemplation of dismissal," contingent upon Hynde's staying out of trouble for six months.

Born Mar. 9, 1933, Kenner, LA

1972—To the Roots and Back (GSF) 1986—Lloyd Price (Specialty); Personality Plus; Walkin' the Track 1990—Greatest Hits (Curb) 1991—Lawdy! (Specialty) 1993—Lloyd Price, vol. 2: Heavy Dreams 1994—Lloyd Price Sings His Big Ten (Capitol/Curb) 1998—Body With Nobody (KJAC).

Singer/songwriter Lloyd Price was a major figure in the early years of New Orleans rock & roll. "Lawdy Miss Clawdy" (1952), written by Price as a commercial jingle for a local radio station, was a #1 R&B hit. In the next two years, Price had several Top 10 R&B singles, "Oooh-Oooh-Oooh" (#5), "Restless Heart" (#8), and "Ain't It a Shame" (#7), before serving in Korea from 1954 to 1956. Upon his discharge, he relocated to Washington, DC. There he started KRC (Kent Record Company), one of the first black-owned labels, and recorded "Just Because." (He also started one of the first black-owned publishing companies, Lloyd & Logan Music.) Determined not to relinquish creative or financial control of his work, Price was ahead of his time in leasing his recordings to record labels to distribute as opposed to being under contract to a label. Leased to ABC-Paramount in 1957, "Just Because" reached pop #29 and R&B #3. Two years later came Price's greatest success, "Stagger Lee" (#1 pop and R&B, 1958), a reworking of the New Orleans folk song "Stagolee" (also known as "Stack-o-Lee"). The song—a tale of betrayal and violence—had been recorded in various versions dating back to the '20s.

Price's subsequent ABC recordings shifted from the rocking New Orleans style to a mainstream pop sound, as reflected by "Personality" (#2 pop, #1 R&B), "I'm Gonna Get Married" (#3 pop, #1 R&B), "Where Were You (On Our Wedding Day)" (#23 pop), "Come Into My Heart" (#2 R&B), in 1959, "Lady Luck" (#14 pop, #3 R&B) and "Ouestion" (#19 pop, #5 R&B) in 1960. Price was an enterprising businessman during the '60s, operating the Double L and Turntable labels and a New York nightclub called the Turntable. In 1969, after his partner, Harold Logan, was murdered in the Double L offices, Price briefly quit the music business. In 1972, around the same time he left the country for Nigeria, he released a new album, To the Roots and Back. In Africa he worked with Don King in promoting music events and the legendary 1974 "Rumble in the Jungle" heavyweight-title bout between Muhammad Ali and George Foreman, later commemorated in the documentary film When We Were Kings. He returned to the States in the '80s but performed rarely. In the '90s he began performing again, reactivated his Lloyd & Logan Music, and built a multitrack studio near his home in Westchester, New York. In 1998 he released Body With Nobody, his first new album in 26 years, which included hip-hop-flavored versions of "Personality" and "Stagger Lee."

Price received the Pioneer Award from the Rhythm & Blues Foundation in 1994. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1998.

Maxi Priest

Born Max Alfred Elliott, June 10, 1960, London, Eng.
 1985—You're Safe (Virgin, U.K.) 1986—Intentions 1987—Maxi (Virgin) 1990—Bonafide (Charisma) 1991—Best of Me 1992—Fe Real 1996—Man With the Fun (Virgin) 1999—CombiNation.

Maxi Priest is a soulful British reggae singer who in the late '80s and early '90s managed to win over both Jamaican musical punists and American pop radio. The son of a factory worker, Priest grew up in Southeast London. Reggae was in his genes: He is the nephew of genre pioneer Jacob Miller. Priest entered the music world through carpentry. Having built his own studio at 14, he subsequently left school and began constructing sound systems for London's Saxon International. Soon he was DJ'ing for Saxon's mobile reggae-music stations himself.

Priest's first single, "Hey Little Girl," went to #8 on the British reggae charts in 1983 and became a #1 hit in Jamaica. Virgin signed the artist and released two albums in England before Priest's U.S. debut. The record company showed marketing savvy by convincing Priest to cover Cat Stevens' "Wild World" (#25, 1988) on Maxi; with reggae stalwarts Sly and Robbie providing rhythms, the album also appealed to longtime reggae fans.

Priest made his first visit to reggae's home, Jamaica, for the recording of Bonafide. With producers including Soul II Soul, dancehall star Gussie Clarke, and Dunbar, the album covered a range of reggae styles. The single "Close to You" (#1, 1990) was Priest's biggest hit. Best of Me compiled Priest's singles. In 1991 the singer was featured on Shabba Ranks' "Housecall (Your Body Can't Lie to Me)" (#4 R&B) and Roberta Flack's "Set the Night to Music" (#45 R&B).

Priest's 1992 album Fe Real (#46 R&B) yielded two more singles, but only "Groovin' in the Midnight" (#26 R&B) was a chart success. After undergoing contractual problems and a change of labels, Priest returned with Man With the Fun (#108 pop, #43 R&B) in 1996. "That Girl," a collaboration with reggae star Shaggy that sampled Booker T. and the MG's' "Green Onions," crossed over to the pop singles charts (#20 pop, #34 R&B). In 1999 Priest released CombiNation, a ballad-heavy album that includes a cover of Stevie Wonder's "Golden Lady."

Tim "Herb" Alexander (b. Apr. 10, 1965, Cherry Point, NC), drums; Les Claypool (b. Sep. 29, 1963, Richmond, CA), bass, voc.; Todd Huth (b. Mar. 13, 1963, San Leandro, CA), gr.

 1991—Sailing the Seas of Cheese (Interscope) 1992—Miscellaneous Debris EP 1993—Pork Soda 1995—Tales From the Punchbowl 1996—(– Alexander; + Brian "Brain" Mantia, drums) 1997—Brown Album 1998—Rhinoplasty 2000—Antipop.
 Sausage (Claypool, bass, voc.); Huth, gr.; Jay Lane [b. Dec. 15, 1964, San Francisco], drums: 1994—Riddles Are Abound Tonight (Interscope).
 Les Claypool and the Holy Mackerel: 1996—Highball With the Devil (Interscope).
 Frog Brigade (Claypool; Huth; Lane; Jeff Chimenti, kybds.; Skerik, sax; Xenor, gr.): 2001—Live Frogs: Set I (Prawn Song).

A stark amalgam of spacy rhythms, roiling bass, angular guitar, cartoony vocals mixed with sea chanteys, a shot of surreal humor, and a piscine obsession, Primus is one of the leading lights of the alternative scene. The peak of the group's popularity came when it headlined the 1993 Lollapalooza Tour and entered the charts at #7 with its fourth album, Pork Soda (#7, 1993). It remains a bridge between the punk, progressive, and jam scenes.

Originally called Primate, the band was the branchchild of bassist Les Claypool (who once auditioned for Metallica and was turned down after attempting to lead them in an Isley Brothers tune), along with guitarist Todd Huth and a drum machine. Alexander was discovered through an ad. Huth left in 1989, replaced by LaLonde, who had played with Claypool in an earlier band, Blind Illusion.

Claypool's father lent the band $1,000 in 1989 to release

Primus: Tim Alexander, Les Claypool, Larry LaLonde

the live Suck on This. Caroline reissued the album and released their next, Frizzle Fry. They signed with Interscope after owner Ted Fields took them on a fishing trip. Sailing the Seas of Cheese (#116, 1993), their major-label debut, has sold over 700,000 copies to date, and the band expanded its audience after opening for Jane's Addiction, Public Enemy, Anthrax, and for U2 on the Zoo TV Tour, setting the foundation for the platinum success of Pork Soda (Primus' next release, Tales From the Punchbowl (#8, 1995), was almost as popular, benefiting from the impact of the single "Wynona's Big Brown Beaver," which was nominated for a Grammy for Best Hard Rock Performance. Further albums did not fare as well: Brown Album (#21, 1997) was the first record with longtime friend and new drummer Brian "Brain" Mantia, while Rhinoplasty (#106, 1998) was a collection of covers and two live original songs. The band recorded the theme to the South Park animated series in 1998.

In 1999 Primus showed its reach by playing on both Ozzfest (headlined by Black Sabbath) and the Family Values Tour (headlined by Korn and Limp Bizkit), and by releasing Antipop (#44), which featured an array of guest players and producers such as Tom Waits, the Police's Stewart Copeland, Metallica's James Hetfield, and Rage Against the Machine's Tom Morello. Despite the group's decreasing chart presence, it remains an extremely popular live band.

In addition to Primus, Claypool has been involved in several side projects. In 1994 he hooked up with old band mate guitarist Huth and drummer Jay Lane to record Riddles Are Aboard Tonight, which included some of their pre-Primus songs. Abetted by guest musicians, Claypool played most of the instruments on Holy Mackerel's 1996 album Highball With the Devil. Frog Brigade, which performs covers and songs by Sausage and Holy Mackerel, is mostly a live outfit. In 2000 Claypool also started performing with Stewart Copeland and Phish's guitarist Trey Anastasio under the name Oysterhead.

Prince

Born Prince Rogers Nelson, June 7, 1958, Minneapolis, MN 1978—For You (Warner Bros.) 1979—Prince 1980—Dirty Mind 1981—Controversy 1982—1999 1984—Purple Rain 1985—Around the World in a Day (Paisley Park) 1986—Parade (Music From the Motion Picture "Under the Cherry Moon") 1987—Sign 'O' the Times 1988—Lovesexy 1989—Batman (Warner Bros.) 1990—Graffiti Bridge (Paisley Park) 1991—Diamonds and Pearls 1992—The Symbol Album 1993—The Hits/The B-Sides; The Hits; The Hits 2 1994—Come (Warner Bros.); The Black Album 1995—The Gold Experience 1996—Girl 6 soundtrack; Chaos and Disorder; Emancipation (NPG/EMI) 1998—Crystal Ball; Newpower Soul 1999—The Vault—Old Friends 4 Sale (Warner Bros.); Rave Un2 the Joy Fantastic (Arista).

One of the most flamboyant, controversial, influential, and popular artists of the '80s, Prince is also one of the least predictable and most mysterious. At a time when comparable megastars such as Michael Jackson, Madonna, and Janet

Jackson were delivering an album every three years or so, Prince remained prolific to an almost self-destructive degree—and was given to wayward, self-indulgent career moves (even declaring in the '90s a name change to an unpronounceable symbol) that could alienate even his most ardent supporters. Yet his taut, keyboard-dominated Minneapolis Sound—a hybrid of rock, pop, and funk, with blatantly sexual lyrics—not only influenced his fellow Minneapolis artists the Time and Janet Jackson's producers (and ex-Time members) Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis, but also impacted much of '80s dance-pop music. And Michael, Madonna, and Janet were comparable to Prince only in terms of star power. None could match the formidable breadth of his talents, which included not just singing and dancing but also composing, producing, and playing instruments (not to mention directing videos and, however ineffectively, movies). In fact, Prince played all the instruments on his first five albums, and has produced himself since signing with Warner Bros. at age 21.

Under the name "Prince Rogers," Prince's father John Nelson was the leader of a Minneapolis-area jazz band, in which his mother was the vocalist. Prince started playing piano at age 7, guitar at 13, and drums at 14, all self-taught. By age 14 he was in a band called Grand Central, which later became Champagne. Four years later, a demo tape he made with engineer Chris Moon reached local businessman Owen Husney. In 1978 Husney negotiated Prince's contract with Warner Bros.

"Soft and Wet" (#92 pop, #12 R&B, 1978) from For You introduced his erotic approach, while "I Wanna Be Your Lover" (#11 pop, #1 R&B) and "Why You Wanna Treat Me So Bad?" (#13 R&B) from Prince (#22, 1979) suggested his musical range. Dirty Mind (#45, 1980)—a loose concept album including songs such as "Head," about oral sex, and "Sister," about incest—established Prince's libidinous image once and for all. One of its few songs that wasn't too obscene for airplay, "Uptown," went to #5 R&B, while "When You Were Mine" became Prince's most widely covered song and a minor comeback hit for Mitch Ryder in 1983 (it was later covered by Cyndi Lauper, among others, as well).

Controversy (#21, 1981) had two hits, the title cut (#70 pop, #3 R&B, 1981) and "Let's Work" (#9 R&B, 1982). Prince, Dirty Mind, and Controversy all eventually went platinum. For his second album, Prince had formed a racially and sexually mixed touring band that included childhood friend Andre (Anderson) Cymone on bass, Dez Dickerson on guitar, keyboardists Gayle Chapman and Matt Fink, and drummer Bobby "Z" Rivkin. By the Dirty Mind tour, Chapman had been replaced by Lisa Coleman. In concert Prince would sometimes strip down to black bikini underpants or finish the set doing "pushups" on a brass bed.

A double album, 1999 (#9, 1982), went platinum, bolstered by the Top 10 singles "Little Red Corvette" (#6, 1983) and "Delinoid" (#8, 1983), and the title track (#12, 1982). "Little Red Corvette" was also among the first videos by a black performer to be played regularly on MTV.

Prince "discovered" another Minneapolis band, the Time, whose first two albums went gold (the third went platinum); in turn, the Time supplied backup for Vanity 6, a female trio that had a club hit with "Nasty Girl" (Vanity would leave Prince's fold in 1983 to launch an unsuccessful solo career). Prince denied that he was the "Jamie Star" who produced albums by the Time and Vanity 6. He did take both bands on tour with him, however. After the tour, Dez Dickerson left Prince's band to launch an abortive solo career, he would be replaced by Wendy Melvoin.

Prince vaulted to superstardom in 1984 with Purple Rain, a seemingly autobiographical movie set in the Minneapolis club scene and costarring the Time and Apollonia 6 (Patricia "Apollonia" Kotero having replaced Vanity). It was an enormous hit, as was the soundtrack album, which spent 24 weeks atop the chart and sold over 10 million copies, yielding hit singles in "When Doves Cry" (#1, 1984), "Let's Go Crazy" (#1, 1984), "Purple Rain" (#2, 1984), "I Would Die 4 U" (#8, 1984), and "Take Me With U" (#25, 1985). The album marked the first time in his career that Prince had recorded with, and credited, his backing band, which he named the Revolution. The opening act on Prince's 1984 tour was another of his female protégées, Latin percussionist Sheila E. [see entry], the daughter of Santana percussionist Pete Escovedo, who hailed from Oakland, California, and whose album The Glamorous Life Prince had produced that year.

At the 1985 Grammy Awards, Prince won Best Group Rock Vocal for "Purple Rain" and R&B Song of the Year for "I Feel for You" (actually from Prince, and a hit cover for Chaka Khan in 1984). After the gala, Prince—who for all his sexual exhibitionism onstage was painfully shy offstage—declined an offer to take part in the all-star recording session for "We Are the World" (he later donated the track "4 the Tears in Your Eyes" to the USA for Africa album). That, and his fey demeanor at the 1985 Academy Awards show, where he won a Best Original Score Oscar for Purple Rain, were the first signals of Prince's personal eccentricities to his newfound mass audience. In 1985 Prince also wrote Sheena Easton's suggestive hit single "Sugar Walls," under the pseudonym "Alexander Nevermind." And Tipper Gore credited allusions to masturbation in the Purple Rain track "Darling Nikki" with inspiring her to form the Parents Music Resource Center and to launch the Senate hearings on offensive rock lyrics, which led to the record industry's "voluntary" album-stickers policy.

Prince followed up Purple Rain with the psychedelic Around the World in a Day, which topped the chart for three straight weeks but was considered a critical and commercial disappointment. Prince reportedly had to be persuaded to release singles from it, but the album did yield hits in the Beatlesque "Raspberry Beret" (#2, 1985) and the funky "Pop Life" (#7, 1985). Upon the album's release Prince's management announced his retirement from live performance (which would last for two years), and the opening of his own studio and record label, both named Paisley Park—after a track on the new album (which also included a spiritual epic, "The Ladder," which Prince wrote with his previously estranged father). Paisley Park recording acts included the Family (fronted by Wendy Melvoin's twin sister, Susannah), Mazarati (led by Cymone's replacement, Brown Mark), Madhouse (a jazz-funk band led by Prince's sax player Eric Leeds), and Jill Jones (who'd appeared, draped around Lisa Coleman, in the "1999" video). None of them ever had a hit, although the Family's Prince-penned "Nothing Compares 2 U" would later be a massive hit for Sinéad O'Connor.

In spring 1986 Prince was back atop the pop singles chart with "Kiss," a stripped-down return to his funk roots. It would be heard (briefly) in Prince's next movie, Under the Cherry Moon, a romantic trifle shot on the French Riviera, with Prince replacing music video auteur Mary Lambert (Madonna's "Like a Virgin," among others) as director midway through production. The film bombed with critics and moviegoers; its soundtrack album Parade (#3, 1986) yielded two minor hit singles in "Mountains" (#23, 1986) and "Anotherloverhenyohead" (#63, 1986). On July 1, 1986, Prince played an impromptu live set following the world premiere of Cherry Moon in Shendan, Wyoming (where the winner of an MTV movie-premiere contest lived).

In 1987 Prince fired the Revolution (Wendy and Lisa [see entry] would go on to record as a duo, scooping a minor hit single with "Waterfall") and retaining only Matt Fink, replaced them with a new, unnamed band featuring Sheila E. on drums. They debuted with the double-album Sign 'O' the Times (#6, 1987), widely hailed by critics as a return to form. It yielded hit singles in the stark title track (#3, 1987), the funky Sheena Easton duet "U Got the Look" (#2, 1987), and the poppy "I Could Never Take the Place of Your Man" (#10, 1987). Prince toured Europe with a theatrically choreographed show, but rather than touring the U.S. released a film of a concert shot in Rotterdam, Holland.

In late 1987 rumors circulated of a new Prince project, The Black Album, said to consist of musically and lyrically raw funk tracks. It was not officially released until late 1994, but until then it became one of the most bootlegged LPs in pop history (tapes were stolen from Warner's German pressing plant). His next official release was the mild Lovesexy (#11, 1988), which got lackluster reviews and yielded only one hit, "Alphabet Street" (#8, 1988), but did prompt Prince's first U.S. tour in four years, performed on a rotating stage that Prince entered in a pink Cadillac.

In 1989 Prince had his first chart-topping album in four years with his soundtrack for director Tim Burton's big-budget film Batman; "Batdance" was Prince's first #1 since "Kiss." His half-sister Lorna Nelson lost a lawsuit claiming he'd stolen her lyrics for "U Got the Look." Two months after the release of his Batman album, Prince—who'd already written and produced an album for Paisley Park signee Mavis Staples and undertaken productions for the Time's Morris Day and Jerome Benton and Batman star Kim Basinger—released Graffiti Bridge, a film that seemed to be a delayed sequel to Purple Rain, again pitting Prince against the Time on the Minneapolis club scene. Prince's love interest was played by Ingrid Chavez, who would gain greater fame for helping Lenny Kravitz write Madonna's hit "Justify My Love" (though she'd have to sue Kravitz to get a composing credit). The movie was another critical and commercial disaster; the soundtrack album (#6, 1990) yielded the hit "Thieves in the Temple" (#6, 1990) and Tevin Campbell's Prince-penned "Round and Round" (#12, 1991).

In January 1991, at his recently opened Glam Slam nightclub in Minneapolis, Prince unveiled a new band, the New Power Generation, who would not tour the U.S. until 1993. The band included an unimpressive rapping dancer (Anthony "Tony M" Mosely), in Prince's first nod to hip-hop, which had claimed a significant share of his black-pop audience and with which he never seemed comfortable musically. The following month Prince was sued for severance pay and punitive damages by his ex-managers, Robert Cavallo, Joseph Ruffalo, and Steven Fargnoli, whom Prince had fired in 1988. Eight months later he released his fifth album in five years, Diamonds and Pearls (#3, 1991), which spawned Top 10 hits in the lascivious "Gett Off" (#21, 1991), "Cream" (#1, 1991), and the title track (#3, 1992). Warner Bros. made Prince a vice president when he re-signed with the label in 1992. His next album (#5, 1992) was titled after an unpronounceable merger of the male and female gender symbols; its hit singles included "7" (#8, 1992), "My Name Is Prince" (#36, 1992), and the profane "Sexy M.F." (#66, 1992). Prince produced an album for yet another female protégée, Carmen Electra, and New York's Joffrey Ballet announced that it was choreographing a four-part ballet to Prince's music, called Billboards (it would premiere at the University of Iowa in October 1993).

In September 1993 Prince pulled the most eccentric move of his career, changing his name to the unpronounceable symbol with which he'd titled his last album. "Symbol Man," "Glyph," or "the artist formerly known as Prince"—shortened to the Artist—as he was now known, suffered widespread ridicule—followed by a business setback in February 1994, when Warner Bros. dropped its distribution deal with Paisley Park Records, effectively putting the label out of business. Two weeks later the Artist released a new single, "The Most Beautiful Girl in the World" (#3 pop, #2 R&B), not on Warners but on independent Bellmark Records, which had had a huge hit the previous summer with Tag Team's "Whoomp! There It Is"; Warners said it allowed this "experiment" at the Artist's request but would release his future product.

Come (#15 pop, #2 R&B) released later that year, was credited to "Prince (1958–1993)," and spawned two singles drawn from the label's backlog of Prince recordings: "Letitgo" (#31 pop, #10 R&B) and "Space" (#71 R&B). The legit Black Album (#47 pop, #18 R&B) was finally released two weeks before Christmas. As his relationship with the label continued to wane, the Artist began appearing with the word slave scrawled on his cheek. Warners released four more albums: The Gold Experience (#6 pop, #2 R&B, 1995), which scored a hit in "I Hate U" (#12 pop, #3 R&B) but was more notorious for the racy track "P Control"; the soundtrack to Spike Lee's movie Girl 6 (#75 pop, #15 R&B, 1996); and Chaos and Disorder (#26 pop, 1996). (The archival The Vault—Old Friends 4 Sale was released in 1999.) Meanwhile, the Artist issued the triple-CD set Emancipation (#2 R&B, 1996) on his own New Power Generation (NPG) label, which was distributed through Capitol/EMI. The album went double platinum, and a remake of the Stylistics' 1972 hit "Betcha by Golly Wow" reached #10 on the R&B chart. The Artist also wed Mayte García, a 22-year-old dancer and vocalist in his band. Their son reportedly died of a rare disorder called Pfeiffer's Syndrome shortly after birth in November 1996. Culling tracks from his archives, the Artist put out the four-CD compilation Crystal Ball (#62 pop, #59 R&B) in 1998, which he packaged in a clear plastic ball and marketed through his Web site by offering a fifth bonus disc. It sold 250,000 copies. Five months later came the more conventionally conceived single album, Newpower Soul (#22 pop, #9 R&B).

As the millennium loomed, so did the Warners rerelease of "1999" (#45 R&B, 1999) and the Artist's own 1999 (The New Master) EP. That fall, Rave Un2 the Joy Fantastic (#18 pop, #8 R&B, 1999) was released through a licensing arrangement with Arista. (Stating his displeasure with Arista's marketing of the album, the Artist would later declare his intention to release a new version through his Web site called Rave In2 the Joy Fantastic.) The album, which was produced by "Prince," featured guest appearances by folk-rock singer Ani DiFranco and rapper Chuck D—among others—both performers whom the Artist admired for distributing their music independently. With the expiration of his Warner/Chappell publishing contract on December 31, 1999, the Artist announced the following May that he was reclaiming his given name.

John Prine

Born Oct. 10, 1946, Maywood, IL

1971—John Prine (Atlantic) 1972—Diamonds in the Rough

1973—Sweet Revenge 1975—Common Sense 1976—Prime Prime—The Best of John Prine 1978—Bruised Orange (Asylum) 1979—Pink Cadillac 1980—Storm Windows 1984—Aimless Love (Oh Boy) 1986—German Afternoons 1988—John Prine Live 1991—The Missing Years 1993—Great Days: The John Prine Anthology (Rhino) 1995—Lost Dogs & Mixed Blessings (Oh Boy) 1997—Live on Tour 1999—In Spite of Ourselves 2000—Souvenirs.

John Prine is a critically acclaimed singer/songwriter who has gone from solo acoustic folk to hard country to rockabilly to soft rock, all the while maintaining his hardheaded vision of white proletarian America.

Prine learned guitar from his father and played the Chicago coffeehouse circuit while working at the post office. With his friend and sometime production cohort Steve Goodman, Prine graduated from the Chicago folk scene. Paul Anka liked some of Prine's Hank Williams-influenced songs and was instrumental in landing him a recording contract. In 1971 Prine went to Memphis and cut his debut. That LP's most notable song may have been "Sam Stone," a bleak portrait of a drug-addicted Vietnam veteran, which aptly demonstrated Prine's laconic, drawling delivery.

Though his own commercial success was meager, other artists began recording his songs: the Everly Brothers did "Paradise," and both Joan Baez and Bette Midler recorded "Hello in There." Common Sense saw Prine shocking his folk audience by using hard-rock rhythms and a guttural singing style. Bruised Orange, produced by Goodman, returned Prine to the acoustic format of Diamonds in the Rough, while Pink Cadillac was an electric rockabilly album produced by Sam Phillips and his son Knox at Sun Studios.

Prine formed his own label, Oh Boy Records, in 1983. His second album for the label, the countryish German Afternoons, earned a Grammy Award nomination for Best Contemporary Folk Recording. After releasing his first live album in 1988, Prine won the Best Contemporary Folk Grammy for The Missing Years, which was produced by Howie Epstein of Tom Petty's Heartbreakers, and had guest appearances by Petty, Bruce Springsteen, and Bonnie Raitt (who had been singing Prine's "Angel From Montgomery" in concert for years).

After starting to record In Spite of Ourselves in 1997, he discovered a cancerous growth on his neck. In 1998 George Strait got a #1 C&W hit with one of Prine's compositions, "I Just Want to Dance With You"; the ensuing financial windfall helped Prine pay his medical bills. He beat the cancer and, after an interruption of nearly two years, resumed work on the album. In a premiere for Prine, In Spite of Ourselves (#21 C&W, 1999) was made up of covers (save for the title song) and each track was a duet with a different female singer—guests included Emmylou Harris, Iris DeMent, Lucinda Williams, Patty Loveless, and Melba Montgomery. In 2000 Prine covered himself with Souvenirs, on which he offered new studio recordings of some of his classic material.

Prine made his movie acting debut with a small role in John Mellencamp's 1992 Falling From Grace, then appeared in Billy Bob Thornton's Daddy and Them (slated for a 2001 release). He retains a cult following for his down-to-earth, unadorned insights.

P.J. Proby

Born James Marcus Smith, Nov. 6, 1938, Houston, TX 1964—I Am P.J. Proby (Liberty) 1965—P.J. Proby; P.J. Proby's in Town; Somewhere 1967—Enigma; Phenomenon 1968—What's Wrong With My World; Believe It or Not 1969—Three Week Hero 1996—EP Collection (See for Miles).

P.J. Proby is a Presleyesque singer who was always more popular in England than in his native America, though even there, his chart appearances became increasingly rare after 1968. Proby's big break came when British TV producer Jack Good brought him to the U.K. for a Beatles special in 1964; he hit with the Good-produced "Hold Me" (#70 U.S., #3 U.K.), a frantic revival of a 1939 ballad. Prior to that, Proby had been living in Hollywood, doing odd jobs, playing bit parts in films, and recording demos like "Jet Powers." After "Hold Me," followups failed to generate comparable success, and he switched styles; he began singing melodramatic versions of tunes from the Broadway musical West Side Story for example.

Proby toured England in 1965 with Cilla Black but was expelled from the country later that year after a series of incidents in which he split his velvet trousers onstage. In 1967 his tour choreographer was future Runaways Svengali Kim Fowley. That year he had his biggest U.S. hit with "Niki Hoeky" (#23). By 1968, though, Proby was bankrupt. He was lured back to England by Good in 1971 to appear in Catch My Soul, a rock adaptation of Othello. Proby also played the older Elvis Presley in the West End musical Elvis in 1977. After years as a steady-drawing revival act in England, Proby unexpectedly teamed up with the Dutch classical-rock band Focus in 1978 for the Focus con Proby LP. In the '80s he recorded for the British label Savoy and did songs inspired by the Sex Pistols and David Bowie's "Heroes." By the late '90s, many of his original albums had been reissued on CD by the tiny label See for Miles.

 Matthew Fisher solo: 1973—Journeys End (RCA) 1980—Matthew Fisher (A&M).

With the 1967 worldwide smash "A Whiter Shade of Pale"—a combination of mystical lyrics, a somber tempo, and an organ line lifted directly from Bach's Suite No. 3 in D major—Procol Harum established itself, along with the Moody Blues, as an early British "classical rock" band. Though the band never matched that spectacular success, "A Whiter Shade of Pale" has outlasted the Summer of Love. It has sold over 6 million copies worldwide and has been covered in soul, jazz, and country versions.

The band—whose only other U.S. hit was an orchestrated 1972 reworking of 1967's "Conquistador"—included only one member with classical training: Matthew Fisher, who studied at the Guildhall School of Music. Procol Harum actually began as an R&B band, the Paramounts (Gary Brooker, Robin Trower, Chris Copping, and B.J. Wilson), in London's Southend section in 1963. The Paramounts made several singles, but only a cover of "Little Bitty Pretty One" achieved any local success, and they broke up in 1966.

Later that year Brooker met lyricist Keith Reid (who was always listed as a full-fledged band member on the group's albums), and they formed a band—with Fisher, Ray Royer, Dave Knights, and Bobby Harrison—to record their songs. The name Procol Harum allegedly came from the name of a friend's cat (they often jokingly referred to themselves as the "Purple Horrors"); roughly translated from Latin, it means "beyond these things." The original Procol Harum ended up recording only one single, the crucial "A Whiter Shade of Pale" (on which sessionman Bill Eyden replaced Harrison).

In the wake of the single's success (repeated to a somewhat lesser degree in the U.K. by "Homburg" in mid-1967), Royer and Harrison were replaced by Trower and Wilson, and this lineup recorded the first three Procol Harum albums.

In late 1969 Fisher and Knights departed (Fisher has since recorded solo albums) and were replaced by Copping. Home saw Trower leading the band in a harder-rocking direction. The same held true for Broken Barricades, but the guitarist's Jimi Hendrix-inspired hard-rock leanings were never fully integrated and seemed at odds with the band's stately pace and Reid's existential-visionary lyrics. Trower left in July 1971. He went on to form the short-lived Jude with British R&B singer Frankie Miller and then the highly successful Robin Trower Band, a Hendrixian power trio, whose 1973 debut, Twice Removed From Yesterday, was produced by Fisher.

With new guitarist Dave Ball, Copping concentrating on organ, and new bassist Alan Cartwright, the band recorded Live in Concert (#5, 1972) with the Edmonton Symphony Orchestra and the Da Camera Singers. The success of the symphonic "Conquistador" remake caused a minor resurgence in sales, on which the group failed to capitalize with Grand Hotel (#21, 1973), a mélange of orchestral epics and harder-rocking tunes. By the time of Hotel, Ball had left to form Bedlam and was replaced by ex-Cochise guitarist Mick Grabham. Two more albums, Exotic Birds and Fruit and Procol Ninth, went nowhere. After a two-year hiatus, the band tried one last time with Something Magic—produced by Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller—then broke up for good. After another two years, during which he played in the 1979 Concerts for Kampuchea, Brooker made a solo album, No More Fear of Flying, which was both a critical and commercial disappointment. In 1981 he played piano on Eric Clapton's LP Another Ticket, and in 1982 and 1984 he released two more solo records.

In 1991, two years after the death of B.J. Wilson, Brooker, Fisher, Reid, and Trower reunited to record The Prodigal Stranger. With Geoff Whitehorn in place of Trower, and bassist Dave Bronze and Big Country drummer Mark Brzezicki, they toured and continue to perform occasionally. Brooker also toured with the Prague Symphony. In 1995 the band released The Long Goodbye, which featured old songs rearranged for orchestra and guest Tom Jones on one song. BBC Live in Concert came out in 2000 but is a 1974 recording.

Formed 1990, London, Eng.

Liam Howlett (b. Aug. 21, 1971, Braintree, Eng.), instruments; Keith Flint (b. Mar. 27 or Sep. 17, 1969, London), voc.; Leeroy Thornhill (b. Oct. 7 or 8, 1969, Barking, Eng.), dancer; Maxim Reality (b. Keith "Keeti" Palmer, Mar. 21, 1967, Peterborough, Eng.), voc.

1991—What Evil Lurks EP (XL, U.K.) 1992—The Prodigy Experience (Elektra) 1994—Music for the Jilted Generation (Mute) 1997—The Fat of the Land (Maverick) 1999—The Dirtchamber Sessions, vol. 1 (XL/Beggars Banquet) 2000—(- Thornhill) 2001—Always Outnumbered, Never Outgunned. Maxim solo: 2000—Hell's Kitchen (XL, U.K.).

Leeroy Thornhill solo as Flightcrank: 2000—Twisted EP (Copasetik).

With the help of well-chosen samples, Prodigy took electronica-driven studio wizardry and successfully mixed it with rock's trademark sense of aggression and showmanship. Born outside London, Liam Howlett was first attracted to two-tone ska. He was in the hip-hop group Cut to Kill for a while, then discovered acid house in the late '80s, which is when he started both DJ'ing in clubs and producing home recordings. Keith Flint and Leeroy Thornhill heard Howlett spin and offered to dance at his gigs—and thus Prodigy was born in 1990. Prodigy honed its live skills by adding reggae vocalist Maxim Reality (who usually goes simply by Maxim), building upon the larger-than-life presence of Flint (who sported multiple body piercings and multicolored hair, and touring constantly—a rare occurrence for a club-bred act. One of Howlett's self-releases, the EP What Evil Lurks, was reissued by XL in 1991. The next single, "Charly," based on a cartoon sample, was a surprise Top 10 hit in the U.K. By 1992, Prodigy had enough singles to collect them on The Prodigy Experience, which went gold in England but bombed so badly in the U.S. that the band was dropped by its American label, Elektra. In 1994 Music for the Jilted Generation entered the U.K. chart at #1. Its aggressive mix of samples and break beats was also nominated for the Mercury Prize. The album did not fare as well in the U.S., peaking at #198.

Prodigy finally got its first chart-topping song in the U.K. with "Firestarter." Originally released in March 1996, it boasted lead vocals by Flint and samples of the Breeders and the Art of Noise. This success led to a bidding war in the U.S.; the group signed to Mavens. "Firestarter" (#30, 1997) became Prodigy's breakthrough single in the U.S. The Fat of the Land was released seven months afterward, but the band had kept the momentum going and, fueled by gigantic hype, the album entered the chart at #1 in the U.S. and 23 other countries; it went on to sell 2.3 million copies. In America, Prodigy became many rock fans' point of entry into dance music, offering an immediately identifiable frontman in Flint, rocklike energy and volume, sampled guitar riffs, and even a cover of L7's "Fuel My Fire." "Smack My Bitch Up" (#89, 1997), which sampled cult hip-hop band Ultramagnetic MC's, was widely criticized for being misogynistic. The group succumbed to Wal-Mart's demand that the title be bleeped on pressings sold by the chain.

For all intents and purposes Howlett is Prodigy; he's the only member of the band contracted to a label, and though it was credited as "Prodigy Present," The Ditch Chamber Sessions Volume 1 actually was a mix CD by Howlett, who put it together as both a tribute to artists who had influenced him, from Grandmaster Flash to Jane's Addiction, and as a tip of the hat to electronica contemporaries such as Fatboy Slim and the Chemical Brothers. In April 2000, with Prodigy back in the studio working on Always Outnumbered, Never Outgunned, Thornhill left to pursue a solo career as Flightcrank. That same year, Maxim released a solo album.

Professor Longhair

Born Henry Roeland Byrd, Dec. 19, 1918, Bogalusa, LA; died Jan. 30, 1980, New Orleans, LA

1972—New Orleans Piano (Atlantic) 1975—Rock 'n' Roll Gumbo (Barclay) 1978—Live on the Queen Mary (Harvest) 1980—Crawfish Fiesta (Alligator) 1981—Mardi Gras in New Orleans (Nighthawk) 1982—The Last Mardi Gras (Atlantic) 1987—Houseparty New Orleans Style (Rounder) 1989—New Orleans Piano (Blues Originals, vol. 2) (Atlantic) 1993—Fess: The Professor Longhair Anthology (Rhino).

Professor Longhair originated one of the classic styles of rock & roll piano playing, a New Orleans potpourri—ragtime, jazz, Delta blues, zydeco, West Indian, and Afro-Cuban dances—distilled into boogie-woogie bass lines in the left hand and rolling arpeggios in the right. It was the style popularized by Fats Domino, Huey "Piano" Smith, Allen Toussaint, Dr. John, and scores of others.

Henry Byrd first played piano when, as a boy, he discovered an abandoned upright in a New Orleans alley. Recalling everything he'd heard while dancing for tips outside nightclubs and behind parade bands, he taught himself to play. It was not until he was 30, however, that he began to work professionally as a musician; before then he'd had stunts as a prizefighter, a gambler and a vaudeville dancer. In 1949 he formed a quintet called Professor Longhair and His Shuffling Hunganans, which included Robert Parker on tenor sax, and recorded four songs—"She Ain't Got No Hair," "Mardi Gras in New Orleans," "Professor Longhair's Boogie," and "Bye Bye Baby"—on the Star Talent label.

The following year, the Professor was signed to Mercury and rerecorded "She Ain't Got No Hair" under the title "Baldhead," which reached #5 on Billboard's R&B chart. Longhair later recorded on over a dozen labels, while a combination of poor health and mismanagement kept his career from being established. He received virtually nothing for "Go to the Mardi Gras," his 1959 remake of his own "Mardi Gras in New Orleans," which became a theme song of the annual carnival. Although "Big Chief" was a modest hit in the Louisiana area for him and Earl King in 1964, he soon after left the music business and took up manual labor to support himself and his family.

In 1971 Longhair was rediscovered by talent scouts for the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival; thereafter he performed at every New Orleans Festival until his death and appeared on the 1976 live Festival album. His comeback also took him to the Newport Folk Festival in 1973 and to several festivals in Europe. In the last decade of his life, Atlantic released a collection of his vintage recordings, and he put out three newly recorded albums. Shortly before his death from a heart attack, he was engaged to tour with the Clash. In 1991 he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Richard Butler (b. June 5, 1956, Kingston-upon-Thames, Eng.), voc.; Tim Butler (b. Dec. 7, 1958, Eng.), bass; Duncan Kilburn (b. Eng.), sax; Roger Morris (b. Eng.), gtr. 1978—(+ John Ashton [b. Nov. 30, 1957, Eng.], gtr.) 1979—(+ Vince Ely [b. Eng.], drums) 1980—The Psychedelic Furs (Columbia) 1981—Talk, Talk, Talk (- Kilburn; - Morris) 1982—Forever Now (- Ely; + Phil Calvert, drums) 1984—Mirror Moves (- Calvert; + Paul Garisto, drums) 1987—Midnight to Midnight (- Garisto; + Ely; + Mars Williams, gtr.; + Joe McGinty, kybds.) 1988—All of This and Nothing 1989—Book of Days (+ Knox Chandler, gtr., cello) 1990—

(-Ely; + Don Yallich, drums) 1991—World Outside (group disbands) 1994—Here Came the Psychedelic Furs: B-Sides & Lost Grooves (Legacy) 1996—In the Pink (Sony Special Products) 1997—Should God Forget: A Retrospective (Columbia) 2001—Greatest Hits (Legacy).
 1994—Love Spit Love (Imago) 1997—Trysome Eatone (Maverick).

Though their name sounded psychedelic, the Furs' sound was very much a product of punk. Ironically, the group would become most closely associated with its very unpunklike "Pretty in Pink." The group began in early 1978 when leader, vocalist, and songwriter Richard Butler joined with his younger brother Tim, Duncan Kilburn, and Roger Morris. They decided on the name because it would stand out from all the S&M-named bands of the time and pay homage to their psychedelic-era idols like the Doors, the early Stooges, and the Velvet Underground.

Richard Butler had previously been an art student in college, but around his graduation he decided to pursue music, although he knew little about playing. In November 1978 John Ashton joined on second guitar, and in spring 1979 they added drummer Vince Ely. The band's early dirges (which it describes as "beautiful chaos") were played by BBC disc jockey John Peel, which led to the Furs' signing with Columbia. Their debut was produced by Steve Lillywhite and Howard Thompson, with two tracks on the U.S. version produced by Martin Hannett. Though well received, it sold only moderately, as did their 1981 followup, Talk, Talk, Talk (#89), despite its clearer lyrics and production (this time all by Lillywhite). The album is notable for containing the original version of "Pretty in Pink."

Despite significant MTV exposure and a high profile with college-radio audiences, the Psychedelic Furs sold only moderately here and at home. The group's third album, the gold Forever Now (#61, 1982), was produced by Todd Rundgren and featured brass and strings; it included the Furs' first U.S. hit, "Love My Way" (#44, 1983). Mirror Moves (#43, 1984) featured "Heaven," a U.K. Top 30 single, and the group mounted a large international tour.

Around this time director John Hughes informed the group that he'd written a movie script based on "Pretty in Pink." The Psychedelic Furs' rerecorded version of the 1981 album track hit #41 and was included on the career retrospective All of This and Nothing (#102, 1988) and the Pretty in Pink soundtrack. Previous to this, the group released its highest-charting LP, Midnight to Midnight (#29, 1987), featuring "Heartbreak Beat" (#27, 1987), its sole Top 30 U.S. single. Throughout the Psychedelic Furs' history, members have come and gone, with the Butler brothers and John Ashton the constants. Neither of the group's last two studio albums—Book of Days and World Outside—improved its fortunes, and in 1991 the Psychedelic Furs broke up.

Richard Butler, with brother Tim, started a new group, Love Spit Love. The group's debut album spent one week on the chart, at #195; the single, "Am I Wrong," peaked at #83 in 1994. Its second release, Trysome Eatone, followed three years later. In 2000 the Psychedelic Furs reunited for a summer tour before releasing a greatest-hits collection in 2001.

Psychic TV

Genesis P-Orridge (b. Neil Megson, May 22, 1949, Manchester, Eng.).

1988—Allegory and Self (Revolver) 1990—Towards Thee Infinite Beat (Wax Trax!); Beyond Thee Infinite Beat 1994—Hex Sex: The Singles, pt. 1; Pagan Day (Cleopatra) 1995—Godstar: The Singles, pt. 2 1996—Trip Reset 1998—Origin of the Species (Invisible) 1999—"Origin of the Species" Volume Too!; Best Ov Time's Up (Cleopatra).

Confrontational, mercurial, veering from the unlistenable to achingly pretty pop, the self-proclaimed "Temple ov Psychick Youth," Psychic TV has a mission: to provide "the most important work . . . in the popular medium." Their albums, mixtures of dada, pop, and spoken word, embrace everything from side-long excursions into white noise to wispy tunes to ethnic music to found-sound collages.

It all makes sense when you discover the "collective" is led by Genesis P-Orridge, a founding member (along with Chris Carter, Cosey Fanni Tutti, and Peter Christopherson) of Throbbing Gristle. Schooled in the same situationist thought and theories of media manipulation Malcolm McLaren used to promote the Sex Pistols, Throbbing Gristle was more a group of performance artists than a pop band in their four-year existence (1975-1979). Drawing on William Burroughs and Philip K. Dick, they viewed the world as a dysfunctional, postindustrial wasteland, and their confrontational music and multimedia performances were designed to shake listeners from their acquiescence.

Psychic TV continued Throbbing Gristle's musical and media guerrilla tactics. Originally P-Orridge With Peter Christopherson, P-Orridge then insisted the band was a collective with no set lineup. Some members (P-Orridge's wife at the time, Paula Brooking, John Gosling, and Richard Daws among them) remained through many of the band's numerous metamorphoses. While only a few Psychic TV albums have been issued in the U.S., the band's output was steady. In the mid-'80s for instance, they announced that they would release 23 live albums, one a month, on the 23rd of each month. Though they didn't quite make it, the 14 albums they managed (most of which came out in 1987) were enough to put them in the Guinness Book of World Records. Allegory and Self (1988), their first American release, contains Psychic TV's 1986 minor British hit, "Godstar" (#67 U.K.), a pop song about Brian Jones. But soon afterward, P-Orridge changed tactics. Exposed to house records in 1986, he became enamored of dance music, and with the albums Towards Thee Infinite Beat and Beyond . . . he moved into the realm of techno and rave, extended grooves with a noise overlay, accompanied in concert by video and slide shows. Often credited as introducing the term "acid house" in England. P-Orndge also released the influential Jack the Tab compilation, which actually consisted of him and collaborators such as Dave Ball (ex-Soft Cell) and Larry Thrasher under various pseudonyms. This late-'80s output was later collected on both Origin of the Species two-CD sets.

In 1992 P-Orndge's Brighton house was raided by the British authorities after a television show alleged that he was involved in a Satanic cult—an allegation based on what turned out to be nothing more than an old Psychic TV video. P-Orndge moved to the U.S., where he has been living ever since. In the mid-'90s he launched events titled "Transmedia Evenings," which consisted of multimedia collages and spoken word with Thrasher. P-Orndge ended Psychic TV in 1996 and now concentrates on two projects, Splinter Test (with Thrasher) and Thee Majesty (with various collaborators). In 1995 he was badly injured after trying to escape a fire in producer Rick Rubin's studio; he was awarded close to $2 million in damages in 1998.

Arguably the most important and politically controversial group of its time, Public Enemy introduced a hard, intense, hip-hop sound and vocal delivery that changed the course of rap and influenced a generation of artists. The group's inventive production team, the Bomb Squad, tailored a unique, noisy, layered avant-garde-inspired pop sound that incorporated sirens, skittering turntable scratches, and cleverly juxtaposed musical and spoken samples. PE's songs were characterized by lead rapper Chuck D's politically charged rhymes delivered in a booming, authoritarian voice, and his sidekick/jester, Flavor Flav, who broke in with taunts, teases, and questions.

University on Long Island, where Carlton Ridenhour studied graphic design and worked at student radio station WBAU. There he met Hank Shocklee (future branch chief of the Bcmb Squad) and Bill Stephney (future Def Jam executive), with whom he struck up a friendship, talking philosophy, politics, and hip-hop late into the night. After rapping over a track Shocklee had created, "Public Enemy No. 1," Ridenhour started appearing regularly on Stephney's radio show as Chuckie D. Def Jam cofounder Rick Rubin heard a tape of the rap and started calling Ridenhour.

At first the rapper shunned Rubin, feeling he was too old to begin a career as an entertainer. But he eventually came up with an elaborate plan that involved Shocklee as producer, Stephney as marketer, and DJ Norman Rogers on the turntables. He recruited his Nation of Islam cohort Richard Griffin to coordinate the group's backup dancers, the Security of the First World (S1W), whose members carried fake Uzis and did stufi martial-arts moves as a parody of Motown-era dancers. Ridenhour enrolled his old friend William Drayton, who as Flavor Flav would act as a foil to Chuck D's more sober character.

Calling themselves "prophets of rage," Public Enemy released their debut album, Yo! Bum Rush the Show, in 1987. A more sophisticated version of early East Coast gangsta rappers like Boogie Down Productions or Schoolly D, the group at first went nearly unnoticed except by hip-hop insiders and New York critics. The second album, It Takes a Nation of Millions to Hold Us Back, took the pop world by storm. Reaching #42 (#1 R&B, 1988), it was immediately hailed as hip-hop's masterpiece and eventually sold a million copies. Nation contained the minor hit "Bring the Noise" (#56 R&B, 1988), which foreshadowed PE's knack for controversy, with Chuck D calling Black Muslim leader Louis Farrakhan a prophet. Having referred to rap as "CNN for black culture," he castigates white-controlled media in "Don't Believe the Hype" (#18 R&B, 1988).

In May 1989, just after the group did "Fight the Power" (#20 R&B, 1989), the theme song for Spike Lee's film Do the Right Thing, Professor Griff, who had previously made racist comments onstage, dropped a verbal bomb. In an interview with the Washington Times, he said Jews are responsible for "the majonty of wickedness that goes on across the globe." PE leader Chuck D responded indecisively, first firing Griff, then reinstating him, then temporarily disbanding the group. When Griff then attacked his band mates in another interview, he was dismissed permanently. Chuck D responded to the fiasco by writing "Welcome to the Terrordome" (#15 R&B, 1990), a ferociously noisy track in which the rapper asserts "they got me like Jesus." That lyric fanned the coals of controversy yet again, with Chuck D himself being branded an anti-Semite.

PE followed with its first Top 10 album, Fear of a Black Planet (#10 pop, #3 R&B, 1990), which explored the nature of white racism in songs like "Burn Hollywood Burn" and "911 Is a Joke" (#15 R&B, 1990), and called on African-Americans to unite in "Brothers Gonna Work It Out" (#20 R&B, 1990) and "War at 33 1/3." By the end of 1990, DJ Terminator X had left for a solo career, followed by the exits of Bomb Squad members Shocklee and Stephney. But Public Enemy's momentum only accelerated. Upon its release in 1991, Apocalypse 91 shot to #4 (#1 R&B), spawning the hits "Can't Truss It" (#50 pop, #9 R&B, 1991) and "Shut Em Down" (#26 R&B, 1992). Greatest Misses reached #13 (#10 R&B) in 1992 and was criticized for its unexciting remixes. The same year, Public Enemy teamed up with trash-metal band Anthrax for a successful update of "Bring the Noise" and a joint tour. They also opened for U2's Zoo TV Tour.

PE returned in 1994 with Muse Sick-N-Hour Mess Age, which included lyrics critical of the fast-rising gangsta-rap genre and its frequent glorification of violence, drugs, and money. But, like those of other older rap artists, the album debuted fairly high on the chart only to quickly fall in sales (#14 pop, #4 R&B, 1994).

Beginning in 1991, Flavor Flav had some run-ins with the law. He was convicted of assaulting his girlfriend and served a 20-day jail sentence. In 1993 he was charged with attempted murder when he allegedly shot at a neighbor in a domestic squabble; he chose to undergo drug rehabilitation, and the charges were dropped.

By 1996, Chuck D founded the Sony-supported Slam Jamz rap label, created the Rapp Style clothing company, and released his first solo album, The Autobiography of Miss-tachuck. The following year he published a book, Fight the Power: Rap, Race and Reality, and soon reconvened the original lineup of Public Enemy to record the soundtrack album to Lee's 1998 film He Got Game. The project brought the group renewed visibility. The album reached #26 (#10 R&B), while the title track hit #78 on the R&B singles chart and won regular rotation on MTV. Chuck D closed the '90s as a typically outspoken champion of internet distribution of music, even making Public Enemy's 1999 album There's a Poison Goin' On available first as a low-cost download. Chuck D and Professor Griff's rock-rap side project, Confrontation Camp, toured and released one album in 2000.

John Lydon solo: 1997—Psycho's Path (Virgin).

Public Image arose from the ashes of the Sex Pistols, the group's original intent as much a reaction to that band as the Pistols were to '70s rock & roll before them. Former head Pistol Johnny Rotten took back his real name, John Lydon, after the last Sex Pistols show on January 14, 1978. He conceived Public Image as a group organization to create "anti-rock 'n' roll" to embody what the more conventionally rock-rooted Pistols only sang about. Lydon teamed up with Keith Levene, who was an early member of the Clash and also a classically trained guitarist and pianist, plus novice bassist Jah Wobble and drummer Jim Walker, from the Canadian group the Furys. Their original name was Carnivorous Buttock Flies, but they quickly changed to PiL (for Public Image, Limited, the "Limited" since they professed to see themselves as a company rather than a rock band). Financial advisor Dave Crowe was credited as a band member.

PiL made their live debut in London on Christmas Day, 1978, just before their first LP, First Issue, came out. It was not released in the U.S., and its slow, embittered songs got mostly negative reviews. Yet it soared to the top of the British charts. Critics caught on with 1979's Metal Box, initially released in England in a limited edition of 50,000 incorporating three 12-inch 45-rpm EPs squeezed into a film canister. It came out the next year in the U.S. as Second Edition (#171, 1980), a conventional double LP, to almost universal critical acclaim. Second Edition was characterized by a uniquely droning sound with prominent dublike bass, neopsychedelic guitar from Levene, oddly danceable rhythms, and haunting echoed vocals. Levene's dissonant guitar influenced a whole range of bands, from Killing Joke and U2 to Gang of Four. The band toured the U.S. in spring 1980 with new drummer Martin Atkins. At the end of the tour in June, Atkins was fired (he later recorded as Brian Brain and formed Pigface, a ventable industrial supergroup); a few weeks later Wobble was fired as well. Wobble had released two solo LPs during his time in the band, and group members charged he had used some PiL backing tracks on these without permission.

Later in 1980, a live LP from the band's Paris show the previous January, called Paris au Printemps, was issued in Europe only. In spring 1981 The Flowers of Romance, named for late Sex Pistol Sid Vicious' first band, was released. Atkins as drummer-for-hire played on three tracks, with Levene and Lydon handling the rest. It was a stark, mostly percussion- and vocals-oriented record with some Middle-Eastern vocal influences. Its major connection to rock & roll may have been its audacity.

In May 1981 Lydon and Levene, filling in for Bow Wow Wow, played New York's Ritz. Performing behind a video screen with a hired rhythm section, with Lee on hand to tape the proceedings (the images were projected onto the screen), the band jammed as Lydon and Levene taunted the sold-out crowd. They were pelted with beer bottles as a riot ensued. In 1983, during the recording of This Is What You Want . . ., Levene acconsciously left PiL. His guitar parts were erased, Levene released his version of the album independently as Commercial Zone. Lydon found himself with a club hit via "This Is Not a Love Song" and recruited a faceless backup band. From this point on, PiL was a de facto John Lydon solo project. In the recording studio he worked with such veterans as producer/bassist Bill Laswell, guitarist Nicky Skopelitis, and drummer Tony Williams. Enlisting producer Gary Langan on Happy? (#169, 1987) and Stephen Hague on R (#106, 1989), Lydon assembled dance music that rarely reached the bilious passion of early PiL. Backed by a revolving cast of usually uncredited musicians, he became the type of "entertainer" he claimed to detest. Lydon reclaimed the "Rotten" moniker on Happy? In 1993, working with the techno production team Leftfield, he released a dance track, "Open Up," in the U.K. His autobiography, Rotten: No Irish—No Blacks—No Dogs (written with Keith and Kent Zimmerman), was published in 1994.

In 1996 Lydon joined the original members of the Sex Pistols for a 20th-anniversary reunion tour, which was documented on the release Filthy Lucre Live, and the following year he released Psycho's Path, a solo disc recorded under his own name. He also enjoyed a stint as a video personality, hosting Rotten Television on VH1 in 2000.

Formed 1967, San Diego, CA

Gary Puckett (b. Oct. 17, 1942, Hibbing, MN), voc.; Dwight Bement (b. Dec. 1945, San Diego), sax; Kerry Chater (b. Aug. 7, 1945, Vancouver, Can.), bass; Gary Withem (b. Aug. 22, 1946, San Diego), piano; Paul Wheatbread (b. Feb. 8, 1946, San Diego), drums.
1968—Woman, Woman (Columbia); Young Girl; Incredible
1970—Greatest Hits.

Gary Puckett and the Union Gap had four gold pop-soul soundalike hits within a year, beginning in late 1967 with "Woman, Woman" (#4).

The band formed in January 1967 in San Diego, where all the members had gone to school. They played the local circuit as the Outcasts but then took the name Union Gap from a small town in Washington state near where Puckett grew up. The only member with prior professional experience was Paul Wheatbread, who, after attending San Diego's Mesa College, became a regular on Dick Clark's Where the Action Is. He had played with the Turtles, the Mamas and the Papas, Paul Revere and the Raiders, and Otis Redding.

The Union Gap's visual gimmick was to appear in blue-and-gold Civil War uniforms. After "Woman, Woman" the band hit #2 with both "Young Girl" and "Lady Willpower" in 1968. Next came "Over You" (#7, 1968). "Young Girl," a Bntish #1, became a hit (#6) a second time in England in 1974. All the Union Gap albums were produced by Jerry Fuller, author of "Young Girl," "Lady Willpower," and in 1961, Rick Nelson's #1 hit "Travelin' Man." But after 1969's "Don't Give In to Him" (#15) and "This Girl Is a Woman Now" (#9), the group's hits faded, and it disbanded in 1971.

Kerry Chater, who had written many Union Gap songs, penned tunes for Cass Elliot, Charlie Rich, and Bobby Darin.

He also did backup vocals for Sonny and Cher and The Tonight Show and recorded two solo LPs for Warner Bros.: Party Time Love and Love on a Shoestring (1978). Puckett pursued a solo career without success. In the mid-'80s he hit the nostalgia circuit with the Turtles in 1984 and the Monkees two years later. He still tours and writes songs with his brother David, and in 1992 he released a solo LP in Germany, Love Me Tonight. Puckett and his band continue to tour worldwide, performing more than 150 shows a year.

Sep. 14, 1970, Chesterfield, Eng.], gtr.) Different Class (Island) 1997—(– Senior) 1998—This Is Hardcore; Countdown—1992–1983 (Velvet).

With ooy, lanky frontman Jarvis Cocker remaining the sole constant member through a series of shifting lineups, Sheffield, England's Pulp labored for more than a decade in obscurity before peaking into the British pop mainstream with their 1994 major-label debut, His 'N' Hers. The following year's Different Class catapulted the band to headlining status at England's massive Glastonbury festival and established Cocker as English music-press royalty.

At age 15, Cocker formed Pulp (originally called Arabacus Pulp) in 1978 with a trio of school friends. After a handful of personnel changes (and abbreviating the band name), the group recorded a demo that landed it a John Peel radio session in 1981. A nearly entirely new lineup was in place by the time Pulp recorded its first album—the quiet, primarily acoustic It—the following year. The group's second album, 1987's Freaks, was with two new members, guitarist/violinist Russell Senior and keyboardist Candida Doyle, who would stay on board with Cocker for at least a decade. Separations was recorded in 1989 but not released until July 1992; by then Pulp had moved to Sheffield indie label Gift and issued "O.U. (Gone, Gone)," the first of several Gift singles. With these releases, coupled with its first tour, Pulp finally started to attract major label interest, leading to its signing with Island Records in 1993. Island collected the Gift recordings onto the PulpIntro compilation and followed it a month later with the single "Lipgloss," which went to #50 in the U.K. The song was featured on 1994's His 'N' Hers, which went to #9 on the British album chart and was nominated for the U.K.'s distinguished Mercury Prize for music. It didn't win, but Pulp's fortunes had clearly taken a turn for the better. Propelled by the #2 U.K. disco-rock single "Common People"—a sly, danceable commentary on social-class disparity later voted the best song of the '90s in a BBC/London Times poll—Different Class (1995) debuted at #1 on the British album chart. Pulp held its own against Oasis and Blur in the Brit-pop frenzy of the summer of 1995, landing a headlining spot at the Glastonbury Festival as a last-minute replacement for the Stone Roses and garnering significant tabloid coverage due to drug references in the controversial U.K. #2 single "Sorted for E's & Wizz." Cocker received even more coverage for his stunt at the 1996 BRIT Awards, in which he ran onstage to mock a messianic theatrical performance by Michael Jackson featuring children. A scuffle with one of Jackson's bodyguards (and allegations that one of the children on stage was hurt in the confusion) led to Cocker's being apprehended by police for questioning, but all charges were eventually dropped. Later that year, Different Class was awarded the Mercury Prize. In 1998, a year after the departure of Russell Senior from the band, Pulp returned with This Is Hardcore. It didn't spawn as many hit singles as Different Class, but debuted at the top of the U.K. chart and went to #114 in the U.S., where Pulp had slowly developed a cult following and rave reviews in the wake of its mid-'90s U.K. success.

James and Bobby Purify

James Purify, born May 12, 1944, Pensacola, FL; Bobby Purify, born Robert Lee Dickey, Sep. 2, 1939, Tallahassee, FL
1988—100% Purified Soul (Bell).

James and Bobby Purify's 1966 debut, "I'm Your Puppet," was laid-back soul that charmed both black and white audiences, reaching #6 pop and #5 R&B. These cousins, who had been singing together just over a year before "Puppet," had previously been members of a Florida band called the Dothan Sextet. They subsequently charted with "Shake a Tail Feather" (#25 pop, #15 R&B), "I Take What I Want" (#41 pop, #23 R&B), and "Let Love Come Between Us" (#23 pop, #18 R&B) in 1967.

In 1970 Bobby quit the act, and Ben Moore became James' new partner. This duo had a hit in the mid-'70s in the U.K. with a remake of "I'm Your Puppet," but the duo did little after 1974's "Do Your Thing" (#30 R&B).

Formed 1979, Athens, GA

Vanessa Briscoe Hay (b. Vanessa Briscoe, a.k.a. Vanessa Ellison, Oct. 18, 1955, Atlanta, GA), voc.; Randy Bewley (b. Randall Bewley, July 1955, Sarasota, FL), gr.; Michael Lachowski (b. Aug. 21, 1956, Portsmouth, VA), bass; Curtis Crowe (b. June 2, 1956, Atlanta), drums.

1980—Gyrate (DB); Pylon! EP (Armageddon, U.K.) 1983—Chomp (DB) 1988—Hits 1990—Chain (Sky).

The hardest-hitting proponents of the Athens new-wave sound, Pylon hails from the same fertile college-town scene that produced the B-52's and R.E.M. Like an apolitical answer to England's Gang of Four, Pylon played a brutally physical, stripped-down form of funk rock, with silence and subtraction used to dramatic effect, as in dub reggae.

Pylon's members came together while studying art at the University of Georgia in Athens. Their first single, "Cool" b/w "Dub," made an immediate impact on new-wave rock-club dance floors. After the well-received Gyrate, they released another powerful double-A-side single, "Crazy" b/w "M-Train." Chomp included more college/alternative radio staples, in "Beep" and "Yo-Yo." Vanessa Briscoe (originally known as Vanessa Ellison) then married Bob Hay, who played in another Athens band, the Squalls.

Pylon disbanded by mutual agreement in 1984 (footage of the band appeared in the 1987 documentary film Athens, Georgia Inside/Out). R.E.M. covered "Crazy" on its Dead Letter Office. In 1988 Pylon reunited and spent two years touring before recording Chain, which was released on the heels of the Hits collection. The new album found the group pursuing the same old danceable, muscular minimalism.

Suzi Quatro

Born Suzi Quatroccio, June 3, 1950, Detroit, MI
1973—Suzi Quatro (Bell) 1974—Quatro 1975—Your Mama Won't Like Me (Arista) 1977—Aggro Phobia (RAK)
1978—If You Knew Suzi (RSO) 1980—*Greatest Hits; Rock
Hard* (Dreamland) 1996—The Wild One: Classic Quatro
(Razor & Tie).

Suzi Quatro was a pioneer female rocker who got a lot of attention in her early-'70s heyday with her leather look and British glitter hard-pop sound. Fronting her own band and playing hard, sexual music, she was the prototype and idol of Joan Jett.

Born to a musical family (her father was a semipro jazz bandleader), Quatro began playing bongos at age eight in her father's jazz trio. Her sister Patti later played with the all-female Fanny for a while, and brother Michael released several "Jam Band" LPs in the mid-'70s. In 1965 Suzi quit high school and formed her first band with sisters Patti, Nancy, and Arlene, an all-girl unit called Suzi Soul (her stage name) and the Pleasure Seekers.

The group did some dates entertaining troops in Vietnam, and by the end of the '60s it had changed its name to Cradle. Producer Mickie Most (Donovan, Jeff Beck, the Animals) saw Cradle in Detroit, and after the group disbanded in 1970, Suzi Quatro took up Most's offer to come to England and sign with his RAK Records. She wrote her own debut single, 1972's "Rolling Stone," but it didn't sell, so Most linked her up with the highly commercial Nicky Chinn-Mike Chapman songwriting/producing team, who gave her a string of British hits in the bubblegum/hard-rock vein of Slade, T. Rex, and Gary Glitter.

"Can the Can" (#1 U.K., over 2 million sold), "Daytona Demon" (#14 U.K.), and "48 Crash" (#3 U.K.) all hit in England in 1973, as did "Devil's Gate Drive" (#1 U.K., a million-seller) and "The Wild One" (#7 U.K.) in 1974. Quatro stressed her tough image ("She hasn't owned a dress in years," claimed her bio). In 1974 Quatro tried to repeat her European triumph in the U.S. with tours that year and the next, opening for Alice Cooper. But despite heavy media coverage, commercial success was not forthcoming. "All Shook Up" and "Can the Can" were minor hits in the U.S., but during her time stateside she soon lost her British fans.

In 1977 Quatro began appearing on the hugely popular U.S. TV show Happy Days as the one-season semiregular Leather Tuscadero, who fronted the hard-rock band Leather and the Suedes. She got a new record deal with RSO and released If You Knew Suzi (still produced by Chapman), which yielded the hit "Stumblin' In" (#4, 1979), a duet with singer Chris Norman. She signed with Chapman's label Dreamland in 1980 and had a minor U.S. hit, "Lipstick" (#51, 1981).

Quatro quit touring in 1982 to have a daughter, and in the years since she's found success in TV and the stage. She hosted a British TV show called Gas in 1983; she later starred in Annie Get Your Gun in London's West End, and in 1991 she portrayed actress Tallulah Bankhead in a U.K. musical, Tallulah Who? In 1999 she was hosting Rockin' With Suzi Q, a one-hour program on the BBC's Radio 2. That year she also returned to performing and began writing music in a somewhat mellow, more contemporary style. Quatro has been married since the mid-'70s to Len Tuckey, her longtime guitarist and a former member of the group the Nashville Teens ("Tobacco Road").

The enormously popular British band Queen epitomized pomp rock, with elaborate stage setups, smoke bombs, flashpots, lead singer Freddie Mercury's half-martial, half-coy preening onstage, and highly produced, much-overdubbed music on record. Queen can be traced back to 1967, when Brian May and Roger Taylor joined singer Tim Staffell in a group called Smile. Staffell soon left to go solo, and the remaining two Smiles teamed up with Freddie Mercury (from a group called Wreckage) and later John Deacon. They played very few gigs at the start, avoiding the club circuit and rehearsing for two years while they all remained in college. (May began work on a Ph.D. in astronomy; Taylor has a degree in biology; Deacon, a degree in electronics; and Mercury had one in illustration and design.) They began touring in 1973, when their debut album was released. After a second LP, the band made its U.S. tour debut, opening for Mott the Hoople.

Queen's sound combined showy glam rock, heavy metal, and intricate vocal harmonies produced by multitracking Mercury's voice. May's guitar was also thickly overdubbed. A Night at the Opera included "God Save the Queen" rendered as a chorale of lead guitar lines. (Until 1980's The Game, the quartet's albums boasted that "no synths" were used.) Queen's third LP, Sheer Heart Attack, featured "Killer

Queen: Roger Taylor, Freddie Mercury, Brian May, John Deacon

Queen," its first U.S. Top 20 hit. The LP also became its first U.S. gold.

Heavy-metal fans loved Queen (despite Freddie Mercury's onstage pseudo-dramatics, which had more to do with his admitted influence Liza Minnelli than with Robert Plant), and the band's audience grew with its breakthrough LP, A Night at the Opera. It contained the six-minute gold "Bohemian Rhapsody" (#2, 1976), which featured a Mercury solo episode of "mama mia" with dozens of vocal tracks. "Bohemian Rhapsody" stayed at #1 in England for nine weeks, breaking the record Paul Anka had held since 1957 for his "Diana." The promotional video produced for it was one of the first nonperformance, conceptual rock videos.

Queen has had eight gold and six platinum records; through the mid-'80s only its second LP and the 1980 soundtrack to the film Flash Gordon failed to sell so impressively. The group's U.S. Top 40 singles include "Killer Queen" (#12), 1975; "Bohemian Rhapsody" (#9), "You're My Best Friend" (#16), "Somebody to Love" (#13), 1976; "We Are the Champions" b/w "We Will Rock You" (#4), 1977; "Fat Bottomed Girls" b/w "Bicycle Race" (#24), for which the group staged an all-female nude bicycle race, 1978; "Crazy Little Thing Called Love" (#1), 1979; "Another One Bites the Dust" (#1), 1980; "Under Pressure" with David Bowie (#29), 1981; "Body Language" (#11), 1982; and "Radio Ga-Ga" (#16), 1984. At first their hits were marchlike hard rock, but in the late '70s the group began to branch out, its two biggest hits were the rockabilly-style "Crazy Little Thing Called Love" and the disco-style "Another One Bites the Dust," a close relative of Chic's "Good Times," that went to #1 pop and R&B.

In 1981 Taylor released a solo album, Fun in Space, and later in the year the band recorded with an outsider for the first time, writing and singing with David Bowie on "Under Pressure," included on both their platinum Greatest Hits and Hot Space. One side of Hot Space was typically bombastic rock, while the other contained funk followups to "Another One Bites the Dust." Fans were relatively cool to Hot Space; it did not go platinum. Queen's next LP, The Works (#23, 1984), marked a return to hard-rock form. It contained the nostalgic "Radio Ga-Ga."

Queen ceased to be a commercial force in the States; its next two LPs didn't even go gold. Yet all over the world the group retained its regal status. The gold Innuendo, which went to #30 here, shot to #1 in Britain in early 1991. By then rumors were rampant that Mercury was ill with AIDS, something the group continually denied. That November he released a statement from his deathbed confirming the stories; just two days later he died of the disease in his London mansion at age 45.

On April 20, 1992, the surviving members of Queen were joined by a host of stars—including Elton John, Axl Rose, David Bowie, Def Leppard, and many other admirers—for a memorial concert held at Wembley Stadium that was broadcast to a worldwide audience of more than 1 billion. Ironically, around the time of the Wembley concert, Queen was enjoying its greatest American popularity in years, thanks to the memorable scene from the movie Wayne's World, in which main characters Wayne (Mike Myers) and Garth (Dana Carvey) and buddies sing along to "Bohemian Rhapsody" as it blares on the car radio. The rereleased single soared to #2.

A posthumous Mercury solo album was released in 1992. May continues to record solo and with the Brian May Band. Roger Taylor recorded three albums with a sideline band, the Cross, which began in 1987; he eventually resumed his solo career. In 1995 Queen finally completed its swan song Made in Heaven (#58), which features vocals recorded by Mercury during the last year of his life. In 1996 a statue of the singer was unveiled in Montreux, Switzerland. Queen was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2001.

Queen Latifah

Born Dana Owens, Mar. 18, 1970, Newark, NJ
 1989—All Hail the Queen (Tommy Boy) 1991—Nature of a Sista' 1993—Black Reign (Motown) 1998—Order in the Court.

Queen Latifah was not the first strong female rapper, but she was the first, on the heels of Public Enemy's black nationalism and in the company of her Afrocentric Native Tongues movement, to add a pro-woman activist stance to hip-hop's agenda, clearing a space for women with her declaration of "Ladies First."

Latifah (the word is Arabic for "delicate and sensitive") grew up in middle-class East Orange, New Jersey, where she was a high-school basketball star. She began her hip-hop career as a human beat-box in a group called Ladies Fresh. She then recorded tracks with her friend Mark the 45 King, who gave the demos to Fab Five Freddy, who passed them on to Tommy Boy. All Hail the Queen was a minor record sale-wise, but its impact was profound, primarily because of "Ladies First," a proud track in which Latifah supported girl love by rapping with Monie Love. De La Soul and KRS-ONE also appeared on the album. Latifah was nominated for a Grammy and named best female rapper of the year by ROLLING STONE in 1990. An informed and articulate commentator on hip-hop and youth cultures in general, La Queen became a media darling.

Latifah broke through to a larger pop audience by rapping on David Bowie's remake of "Fame" and singing with Troop and Levert on a cover of the O'Jays' "For the Love of Money," from the New Jack City soundtrack (#12 R&B, 1992). On Nature of a Sista' she moved away from her role as rap spokesperson and into more personal, soulful arenas. She wasn't surrendering—"Latifah's Had It Up 2 Here" (#13 R&B, 1992) was the opening track—but she had had "Nuff of the Ruff Stuff." She sang on a number of tracks, used live instruments, and expanded upon the house and dance rhythms she'd used on her debut, to best effect on the single "Fly Girl" (#16, 1992), which she sang with male crooners Simple Pleasure.

Latifah moved to Motown for her third and first gold-selling album, Black Reign (#15 R&B, 1994), which yielded the hits "U.N.I.T.Y." (#23 pop, #7 R&B, 1994) and "Just Another Day" (#37 R&B, 1994). "U.N.I.T.Y." also won her a Grammy for Best Rap Performance in 1994. Black Reign was dedicated to her brother, a police officer who had died the previous year in a motorcycle accident. (Latifah herself belongs to a cycle club.) Her increased popularity was aided by her starring role in Living Single. The highly rated TV sitcom has been criticized, though, for lampooning African-American lives.

Latifah has reinvested her earnings, buying a video store and starting a management and production company, Flavor Unit, whose clients include Naughty by Nature, SWV, OutKast, and L.L. Cool J. In addition to Living Single, which is now in syndication, Latifah has appeared in the films Jungle Fever, Juice, and House Party 2 and on the TV show The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air. Latifah's movie roles grew more ambitious with Living Out Loud, Sphere, and Set It Off, the last of which found her playing a lesbian bank robber.

The legal troubles depicted in Set It Off took on real-life proportions when Latifah was arrested on weapons and marijuana charges (later dropped) after being stopped for speeding in 1996. However, she bounced back with Order in the Court (#95 pop, #16 R&B, 1998), an album filled with positive messages bolstered by coproducers Pras of the Fugees [see entry] and Kay Gee of Naughty by Nature [see entry]. Latifah also toured as part of the 1998 Lilith Fair lineup.

In 1999 La Queen published Ladies First: Revelations of a Strong Woman, a book on self-esteem based on her life experiences cowritten with music journalist Karen Hunter. The rapper also began hosting Queen Latifah, a daytime talk show that explores social and interpersonal issues and attracts some 2 million viewers.

Queensrÿche

Formed 1981, Bellevue, WA

Chris DeGarmo (b. June 14, 1963, Wenatchee, WA), gtr.; Eddie Jackson (b. Jan. 29, 1961, Robstown, TX), bass; Scott Rockenfield (b. June 15, 1963, Seattle, WA), drums; Geoff Tate (b. Jan. 14, 1959, Stuttgart, Ger.), voc.; Michael Wilton (b. Feb. 23, 1962, San Francisco, CA), gtr.

1983—Queensrÿche (EMI) 1984—The Warning 1986—Rage for Order 1988—Operation: Mindcrime (EMI Manhattan) 1990—Empire (EMI) 1991—Operation: Livecrime 1994—Promised Land 1997—Hear in the Now Frontier (Capitol) 1998—(— DeGarmo; + Kelly Gray (b. June 20, 1963, Seattle) gtr.) 1999—Q2k (Atlantic) 2000—Queensrÿche: Greatest Hits (Virgin).

For almost a decade, Queensrÿche was a hard-working band whose art-metal albums won it more respect than sales. But Empire (#7, 1990) and its Top 10 hit single "Silent Lucidity" (#9, 1991) launched the group into international stardom.

The band was formed in 1981 in the Seattle suburb of Bellevue, Washington, by Chris DeGarmo and Michael Wilton. Sick of playing in cover bands, the two high school friends recruited fellow bar-band veterans Geoff Tate and Eddie Jackson. They avoided the local club scene, opting instead for extended rehearsals, culminating in the release of the self-financed EP, Queen of the Reich in 1983. It sold more than 20,000 copies and led to the band's signing with EMI. Queensrÿche (#81, 1983), the quintet's major label debut, was an expanded version of the EP.

The Warning (#61, 1984) and Rage for Order (#47, 1986) were supported by tours opening for Kiss, Bon Jovi, and Metallica. Operation: Mindcrime (#50, 1988), a concept album depicting a nightmarish future of drugs and media manipulation, brought Queensrÿche some critical plaudits. Empire, a more song-oriented mix of rockers and ballads, was languishing in the lower reaches of the album chart until MTV started running the video for "Silent Lucidity." The heavy exposure (at one point the video ran about 44 times a week) pushed the album to double-platinum status, with "Silent Lucidity" named Billboard's most popular rock song in 1991.

The band toured extensively to support its newfound popularity, joining the Monsters of Rock Tour in 1991. Queensrÿche also released Operation: Livecrime (#38, 1991), an album and video recapping the elaborate stage show that accompanied the Operation: Mindcrime song cycle in concert. Four years after Empire—and after including an original song, "Real World," on the soundtrack to the 1993 Arnold Schwarzenegger movie Last Action Hero—Queensrÿche returned with Promised Land, debuting at #3 and containing the moderately successful single "I Am I." The band's next effort, 1997's Hear in the Now Frontier, debuted at #19 on the pop album chart. However, the original lineup would undergo an abrupt change in 1998 when guitarist and frequent songwriter DeGarmo left the group, causing harsh feelings between him and the longtime friends in the band. DeGarmo was replaced by Kelly Gray, known for producing Seattle band Candlebox's debut album and who was already set to coproduce Queensrÿche's next disc: Tate had played with Gray years before in a pre-Queensrÿche group. Q2k was released in 1999, but fans of the band's distinctive art-metal sound were confused by the generic raw edges to these songs, resulting in disappointing sales. A greatest-hits collection followed in 2000.

? [Question Mark] and the Mysterians

Formed 1962, Flint, MI

Question Mark (b. 1945, Mex.), voc.; Robert Martinez, drums; Larry Borjas, gtr. Later members included: Robert Lee Balderrama (b. 1950, Mex.), gtr.; Frankie Rodriguez Jr. (b. Mar. 9, 1951, Crystal City, TX), kybds.; Francisco Lugo (b. Mar. 15, 1947, Velasco, TX), bass; Edward Serrato (b. 1947, Mex.), drums.

1966—96 Tears (Cameo); Action 1985—The Dallas Reunion Tapes: 96 Tears Forever (ROIR) 1997—96 Tears Revisited (Collectables) 1998—Do You Feel It Baby? (Norton) 1999—More Action (Cavestomp).

Question Mark and the Mysterians' one song of consequence was a 1966 #1 hit that epitomized a classic rock & roll sound. The unforgettable "96 Tears" featured leader ?'s gruff vocals and a now-famous organ line played on a Vox Continental, not, as legend has it, on a Farfisa.

The band's quick rise and fall were mirrored in the mystery surrounding its personnel. The leader was never photographed without sunglasses; he legally changed his name to simply "?". (The song is credited to Rudy Martinez, though ? has refused to say whether that's his name, and he has never revealed his background. Some believe that Martinez is a name he invented in order to collect royalties.)

What is known is that most of the band members were born in Mexico and later moved to Detroit. Two of the original players, Robert Martinez and Larry Borjas, went into the army before the Mysterians' big success. The group became local favorites in the Detroit area, and "96 Tears" was the first cut for a small Flint, Michigan, record company. It became the most requested song on Flint's WTAC and Detroit's KCLW, which led to a national deal with Cameo Records. The song went on to sell over a million copies. Later in the year the Mysterians hit #22 with "I Need Somebody," but their followups flopped, and by 1968 they'd called it quits. Mel Schacher, who became the bassist with Grand Funk Railroad, played in a later version of the combo.

In 1981, ? and the Mysterians made a low-level comeback. They toured and played oldies plus new material. The same year, Garland Jeffreys released a minor hit version of the old smash ("96 Tears" had become very popular in new-wave circles in the late '70s, seen as an early punk nugget). Joe "King" Carrasco also performed it live in 1980; in fact, he built his entire sound around the tunny-organ style that ? had helped pioneer. The Mysterians went on hiatus again in 1984.

In 1997, ?, drummer Robert Martinez, bassist Big Frank

Lugo, guitarist Robert Balderrama, and organist Little Frank Rodriguez Jr. made their first New York appearance at that year's Cavestomp! Festival. Following an avalanche of press and the release of 1998's live Do You Feel It Baby?, the Mystenians issued the double-CD More Action, their first studio album in 33 years. Like the new wavers before them, a whole new generation of alternative, neo-garage, and indie rockers connected with "96 Tears," both in concert and via the new record's Spanish version of the song.

Quicksilver Messenger Service

Gary Duncan (b. Sep. 4, 1946, San Diego, CA), gtr., voc.; John Cipollina (b. Aug. 24, 1943, Berkeley, CA; d. May 29, 1989, Greenbrae, CA), gtr.; David Freiberg (b. Aug. 24, 1938, Boston, MA), bass, voc.; Greg Elmore (b. Sep. 4, 1946, San Diego), drums; Jim Murray, voc., harmonica.

Quicksilver Messenger Service was one of the vintage acid-rock San Francisco bands of the late '60s. Its early shows and albums (featuring the heavily tremoloed guitar work of John Cipollina, plus that of second guitarist Gary Duncan) contributed some of the best-remembered instrumental jam music of the period. But as the '60s ended, Quicksilver's popularity waned, and it never achieved the national popularity of its San Francisco contemporaries, Jefferson Airplane and the Grateful Dead.

The group formed in 1965 with Gary Duncan, John Cipollina (whose godfather was classical pianist Jose Iturbi), David Freiberg, Greg Elmore, and Jim Murray. Its original guitarist was to have been Dino Valenti (a Greenwich Village folksinger and, under the name "Chester A. Powers," writer of "Hey Joe" and the Youngbloods' hit "Get Together"). But Valenti was arrested on a drug charge and jailed for 18 months.

In December 1965 the quintet began playing the local circuit, but soon after, Murray left to study the sitar. Quicksilver recorded its debut as a quartet in December 1967, and it came out in May 1968, featuring jams like the 12-minute

"The Fool." The band also provided two songs for the soundtrack of Revolution, out that year, and in late 1968 QMS recorded its part-live second LP, Happy Trails, the group's only gold album. In January 1969 Valenti got Duncan to move to New York and form a group with him; British session keyboardist Nicky Hopkins took Duncan's place and was prominently featured on Shady Grove.

In early 1970 Duncan returned, bringing Valenti with him. Valenti finally joined Quicksilver three years later (though his "Dino's Song" appears on the debut LP). The new sextet issued Just for Love, and "Fresh Air" received substantial FM airplay, helping to make the LP one of its biggest sellers (#27, 1970).

Hopkins left just before the release of What About Me, and some of the tracks featured his replacement, Mark Naftalin, formerly of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band. Cipollina also left around this time; he later formed Copperhead with early Quicksilverite Jim Murray. During 1971 Freiberg left. That year he was jailed for marijuana possession; in 1972 he began a 12-year hitch with Jefferson Airplane/Starship. The remaining Quicksilver threesome—Duncan, Elmore, and Valenti—produced two more LPs, Quicksilver and Comin' Thru, with Mark Ryan (bass) and keyboardist Chuck Steales, but these sparked little public interest. Though the band didn't break up, it was virtually inactive from 1972 to 1975. That year, Valenti, Duncan, and Elmore recorded Solid Silver with bassist Skip Olsen and keyboardist W. Michael Lewis (and with Cipollina and Freiberg making cameos). Quicksilver then disbanded.

Duncan put together another configuration in 1987 to record Peace by Piece, but the LP went nowhere, and Quicksilver called it a day once again. John Cipollina, whose younger brother Mano found fame in the '80s as bassist for Huey Lewis and the News, continued to perform with a variety of bands, including the Welsh group Man and the Dinosaurs. A longtime sufferer of severe emphysema, he died in 1989 at age 45. Duncan returned again in the mid-'90s with another incarnation of Quicksilver. Valenti died in 1994 following surgery.

Formed 1975, Burbank, CA

Kevin DuBrow (b. Oct. 29, 1955, Los Angeles, CA), voc.; Randy Rhoads (b. Dec. 6, 1956, Burbank; d. Mar. 19, 1982, Lakeland, FL), gtr.; Kelly Garni (b. Oct. 29, 1957, N. Hollywood, CA), bass; Drew Forsyth (b. May 14, 1956, Hollywood, CA), drums.
 1977—Quiet Riot (CBS/Sony, Jap.) (– Garni; + Carlos Cavazo [b. July 8, 1957, Atlanta, GA], gtr.) 1978—Quiet Riot II (– Rhoads; + Rudy Sarzo [b. Nov. 9, 1952, Havana, Cuba], bass; – Forsyth; + Frankie Banali [b. Nov. 14, 1953, Queens, NY], drums) 1983—Metal Health (Pasha/CBS) 1984—Condition Critical (– Sarzo; + Chuck Wright, bass) 1986—QR III (– Wright; + Paul Shortino, voc.; + Sean McNabb, bass) 1987—(– DuBrow) Wild Young and Crazy (group disbands) 1988—Quiet Riot 1990—(group re-forms: DuBrow; Cavazo; + Kenny Hillary, bass; + Bobby Rondinelli, drums) 1993—The Randy Rhoads Years (Rhino) 1995—Down to the Bone (Kamikaze) 1999—(- Hillary; - Rondinelli; + Sarzo; + Banali) Alive and Well (Cleopatra).

Heavy-metal band Quiet Riot was a bigger attraction on the mid-'70s Hollywood club scene than Van Halen and the Knack, yet both of them were signed to major-label recording deals before Quiet Riot. The original lineup recorded two now-out-of-print albums released only in Japan (selections from which were reissued as The Randy Rhoads Years), before its breakup was precipitated by the departure of guitarist Rhoads for Ozzy Osbourne's band. Rhoads died in a 1982 Florida plane crash a week before he was due to join the re-formed Quiet Riot in the studio.

The new Quiet Riot's first U.S. album, Metal Health (#1, 1983), became the highest-charting debut ever by an American metal band, thanks largely to heavy MTV play of the video for the Slade remake "Cum On Feel the Noize" (#5, 1983). The album yielded a second hit in "Bang Your Head (Metal Health)" (#31, 1983). Condition Critical (#15, 1984) fared worse, as did its second Slade-cover single, "Mama Weer All Crazee Now" (#51, 1984). QR III (#31, 1986) failed to produce a hit single.

In 1987 the band fired DuBrow, branding him an out-of-control egomaniac in an unusually harsh press release. After one eponymous album (#119, 1988), the new lineup disbanded. In 1990 DuBrow reunited with guitarist Carlos Cavazo to form Heat, which they soon renamed Quiet Riot for club tours. The re-formed group has remained a live attraction, while recording Down to the Bone (1995) and Alive and Well (1999).

Radiohead

Formed 1987, Oxford, Eng.

Thom Yorke (b. Oct. 7, 1968, Wellingborough, Eng.), voc., gtr.; Jonny Greenwood (b. Nov. 5, 1971, Oxford), gtr., kybds.; Colin Greenwood (b. June 26, 1969, Oxford), bass; Ed O'Brien (b. Apr. 15, 1968, Oxford), gtr., voc.; Phil Selway (b. May 23, 1967, Hemingford Grey, Eng.), drums.

1993—Pablo Honey (Capitol) 1995—The Bends 1997—OK Computer 2000—Kid A 2001—Amnesiac.

Radiohead emerged from the fading '90s Brit-pop invasion with a sound that was moody, melodic, and explosive, with roots planted firmly in both alternative culture and the art-rock legacy of such classic rockers as Pink Floyd. With the release of 1997's OK Computer, Radiohead was among the most closely watched bands of the decade, drawing on influences as varied as Queen, R.E.M., and Miles Davis. The Oxford musicians were embraced as saviors of modern guitar rock, only to resurface in 2000 with a new sound heavy with electronics, minimal vocals, and few guitars.

Singer/guitarist Thom Yorke first turned to music while growing up in Scotland and Oxford, England. Born with his left eye closed and paralyzed, Yorke endured five corrective surgeries before age six. He learned guitar while unhappy at boarding school, where he met bassist Colin Greenwood. The two formed a punk band called TNT. In 1987 they joined friends Ed O'Brien (guitar) and Phil Selway (drums) in a new band called On a Friday. Colin's younger brother, Jonny, was soon recruited on guitar. The band dissolved as members scattered to different universities. The quintet regrouped in 1991 as Radiohead, a name taken from a Talking Heads song.

Radiohead quickly built a following on the Oxford club scene, and soon drew record-company interest from London. The band signed to U.K. label Parlophone within a year, and in 1992 toured England and began recording a debut album, Pablo Honey (#32, 1993), released on Capitol in the U.S. That collection included "Creep" (#34), an intense anthem of self-loathing that blended Yorke's alternately anguished and gentle vocals ("I wish I was special . . . but I'm a creep") with Jonny Greenwood's raw spasms of guitar. It was a hit in both the U.S. and England, but Radiohead was labeled a one-hit wonder by critics. The band responded two years later with The Bends (#88), which demonstrated a growing musical scope and explored deeper levels of alienation on the songs "Fake Plastic Trees" and "High and Dry" (#78). Sales were significantly less than for the debut, but critics began to reassess the band.

With OK Computer (#21, 1997), coproduced by the band and Nigel Godrich (an engineer on The Bends), the band enjoyed wide acclaim. Though Yorke and the band denied any coherent theme to the album, various tracks—including "Karma Police" and "Paranoid Android"—examined encroaching technology and millennial anxiety. OK Computer topped many of that year's critics polls and won the Best Alternative Music Grammy. Though the album enjoyed no Top 40 singles, Radiohead built a committed following through incessant touring. (The '97-'98 tour was later depicted as a dehumanizing exercise in boredom and fatigue in Meeting People Is Easy, director Grant Gee's downbeat 1999 documentary.)

The members of Radiohead continued to work and reside in Oxford. While fans waited three years for a followup to OK Computer, a wave of Radiohead-influenced guitar bands (Travis, Coldplay) began to enjoy chart success in England and the U.S.—which made the long-awaited release of Kid A (#1, 2000) and the band's new electronic and ambient leanings more surprising. Recorded during sessions with Godrich, Kid A sent guitars deep into the background while exploring long instrumental passages and sometimes incoherent vocals. The album won mostly positive, if sometimes puzzled critical notices and a second Best Alternative Music Album Grammy. The band released no singles from the album and played few shows. A second album featuring some tracks from the same sessions, Amnesiac, debuted at #2 in June 2001.

Gerry Rafferty

Born Apr. 16, 1947, Paisley, Scot.

1971—Can I Have My Money Back? (Transatlantic) 1974—Revisited 1978—City to City (United Artists) 1979—Night Owl 1980—Snakes and Ladders 1991—Right On Down the Line: Best of Gerry Rafferty (EMI) 1992—On a Wing and a Prayer (Avalanche) 1994—Over My Head 2000—Another World (Icon, U.K.).

Though he had recorded a well-received 1971 solo album, it wasn't until five years after his former band, Stealers Wheel [see entry], had a hit with "Stuck in the Middle With You" that singer/songwriter Gerry Rafferty came into his own as a solo act. Previous to that, he was a member of the Fifth Column and then half of a Scottish folk duo called the Humblebums, with Billy Connolly. He began his solo career in 1971.

In 1978 his "Baker Street" was a huge international hit—it reached #2 in the U.S.—and the LP it came from, City to City, went platinum and topped the album chart. It also included the #12 hit "Right Down the Line." This success came after three years of post-Stealers Wheel management/record-label problems. Rafferty, who rarely performs live and then only in England and Europe, has never repeated that degree of success, although the gold Night Owl contained two hits, "Days Gone Down (Still Got the Light in Your Eyes)" (#17, 1979) and "Get It Right Next Time" (#21, 1979). He produced the Proclaimers' 1987 U.K. hit "Letter From America." He continues to perform and record.

Formed 1991, Orange County, CA

Zack de la Rocha (b. Jan. 12, 1970, Long Beach, CA), voc.; Tom Morello (b. May 30, 1964, New York, NY), gr.; Tim Commerford (b. Torrance, CA), bass; Brad Wilk (b. Sep. 5, 1968, Portland, OR), drums.

1992—Rage Against the Machine (Epic) 1996—Evil Empire

1999—The Battle of Los Angeles 2000—Renegades (—de la Rocha).

As well known for its activism as for its music, Rage Against the Machine nonetheless helped lay the groundwork for the aggression-fueled rock-and-rap genre, which, in the hands of acts like Korn and Limp Bizkit, would come to rival both teen pop and hip-hop on the mainstream charts by the late '90s. Frontman Zack de la Rocha brought the rap with his verbal flow and politically charged lyrics; the rest of the guys brought the rock with an emphasis on Tom Morello's mix of punk-metal riffs and experimental guitar sounds.

Both de la Rocha and Morello were born into activist families. De la Rocha, who grew up in suburban Irvine, California, and East L.A., is the son of a painter, Beto, who devoted his work to Chicano causes; Harlem-born Morello's parents were an African rebel-turned-diplomat and a white civil-rights activist. Morello graduated from Harvard with a social studies degree and moved to California, where he found a kindred political spirit in de la Rocha. With drummer Brad Wilk and bassist Tim Commerford (a friend of de la Rocha's since grade school), they formed Rage Against the Machine in 1991 and released a self-produced 12-song cassette the following year, which quickly won them a deal with Epic. The band did not sign until it was assured full creative control.

Rage Against the Machine (#45, 1993) landed the group a spot on the Lollapalooza Tour and spawned the MTV video "Freedom," with which the band hoped to raise support for imprisoned American-Indian activist Leonard Peltier. Other causes championed by the band over the course of their career have included death-row inmate Mumia Abu-Jamal's fight for a new trial, the plight of sweatshop workers, and the Zapatista freedom fighters in Chiapas, Mexico. Critics would often question whether or not the band's message was getting through to the majority of their fans, but the success of RATM's second album, Evil Empire (#1, 1996), proved that the music, at least, was connecting with a sizable audience. The audience was still in force three years later, with The Battle of Los Angeles debuting at #1 and the single "Guerilla Radio" reaching #69 in 1999.

The year 2000 proved to be an eventful and tumultuous one for the band. A Rhyme and Reason coheadlining tour with the Beastie Boys (in the tradition of RATM's 1997 jaunt with the Wu-Tang Clan) was scrapped due to an injury in the Beastie Boys camp, but a free concert outside the Democratic National Convention in L.A. protesting the two-party political system went off without a hitch—until a handful of protesters began a small riot with police, following the band's set. Less than a month later, Commerford was arrested and charged with assault and resisting arrest after he scaled a stage prop during the MTV Video Music Awards (both charges were dropped when he pleaded guilty to disorderly conduct). In October, shortly after the recording of the Rick Rubin-produced covers album Renegades (#14, 2000), de la Rocha announced his sudden departure from the group, citing a communication breakdown. He diverted his attention to the recording of his debut solo album, while the remaining members of the group vowed to continue with a new singer. A live album recorded with de la Rocha at the same time as Renegades was tentatively scheduled for a 2001 release. In 2001 the band went into the studio with former Soundgarden frontman Chris Cornell. It was reported that Rage members had formed a new band with Cornell, which would be getting a new name.

The Raincoats

Gina Birch (b. ca. 1956, Eng.), voc., bass; Ana Da Silva (b. ca. 1949, Portugal), voc., gtr.; Ross Crichton, gtr.; Nick Turner, drums.

1977—(– Crichton; – Turner; + Kate Korus, gtr.; + Richard Dudanski, drums) 1978—(– Korus; + Jeremie Frank, gtr.) 1979—(– Frank; + Vicky Aspinall [b. ca. 1956, Eng.], voc., violin, gtr., kybds.; – Dudanski; + Palmolive, drums) The Raincoats (Rough Trade, U.K.) 1980—(– Palmolive; + Ingrid Weiss [b. ca. 1961, Eng.], drums) 1981—Odyshape (– Weiss; + Dudanski; + Charles Hayward, drums, perc.; + Paddy O'Connell, bass, gtr., sax) 1983—The Kitchen Tapes (ROIR) 1984—Moving (Rough Trade, U.K.) (+ Derek Goddard, perc.) (group disbands) 1994—(group re-forms: Da Silva, Birch; + Anne Wood, violin; + Steve Shelley [b. June 23, 1962, Midland, MI], drums) 1995—Extended Play EP (Smells Like Records) (– Shelley; + Heather Dunn, bass, drums) 1996—Looking in the Shadows (DGC).

The Raincoats took a feminist approach to the "anyone can play" ethos of British punk, and in the process evolved musically—from the abrasive amateurism of their debut album, through the awkwardly graceful, folkish delicacy of Odyshape, to the ethno-funk inflections of Moving. The group also won critical acclaim for resolutely refusing to live out any of the traditional rock-woman stereotypes. Missing in action for a decade, the Raincoats returned in 1994—after being invoked as an inspiration by Nirvana's Kurt Cobain—to performance and recording.

After playing their first gig in 1978, opening for the punk band Chelsea in London, the Raincoats became an all-girl group in 1979 with the addition of classically trained violinist Vicky Aspinall (the only Raincoat with any musical training) and ex-Slits drummer Palmolive. This lineup recorded the Raincoats' first single, 1979's "Fairytale in the Supermarket," and the group's crude-sounding debut album. Palmolive left to follow spiritual pursuits in India (she eventually settled in Massachusetts as a born-again Christian). She was replaced by Ingrid Weiss, who shared drumming duties on Odyshape with assorted males, including former Raincoat Richard Dudanski (who'd also played with Public Image, Ltd.) and ex-Soft Machine Robert Wyatt. The Raincoats took a more deliberate and open-ended approach on Odyshape; their harmony vocals evoked traditional part- and round-singing, while Aspinall's violin recalled John Cale's viola with the Velvet Underground.

The Kitchen Tapes was recorded in 1982 on a U.S. tour. The same lineup recorded many of the same songs on Moving, acclaimed as the group's most confident-sounding effort yet. But the band broke up after its release. In February 1994 Cobain encouraged his band's label, DGC, to issue all three Raincoats albums in the U.S. A month later Da Silva and Birch (with Sonic Youth's Steve Shelley on drums) reunited the Raincoats for an East Coast tour of the U.S. (performing in New York City the night Cobain's suicide was announced). That summer, the Raincoats also released Extended Play, an EP of songs broadcast live on BBC Radio 1, DJ John Peel's show, in April 1994. The band's surprising renaissance was capped by Looking in the Shadows.

Bonnie Raitt

Born Nov. 8, 1949, Burbank, CA

1971—Bonnie Raitt (Warner Bros.) 1972—Give It Up 1973—Takin' My Time 1974—Streethlights 1975—Home Plate 1977—Sweet Forgiveness 1979—The Glow 1982—Green Light 1986—Nine Lives 1989—Nick of Time (Capitol) 1990—The Bonnie Raitt Collection (Warner Bros.) 1991—Luck of the Draw (Capitol) 1994—Longing in Their Hearts 1995—Road Tested 1998—Fundamental.

Bonnie Raitt

Singer/guitarist Bonnie Raitt's music incorporates blues, R&B, pop, and folk. Though her albums always had sold respectably (averaging several hundred thousand copies) and she had been a headliner since the mid-'70s, it was not until 1989's Nick of Time that she achieved the great commercial success critics had been predicting since she debuted in 1971.

The daughter of Broadway singer John Raitt (star of The Pajama Game and Carousel), Bonnie Raitt started playing guitar at age 12 and was immediately attracted to the blues. In 1967 she left her L.A. home to enter Radcliffe, but she dropped out after two years and began playing the local folk and blues clubs. Dick Waterman, longtime blues aficionado and manager, signed her, and soon she was performing with Howlin' Wolf, Sippie Wallace, Mississippi Fred McDowell, and other blues legends. Her reputation in Boston and Philadelphia led to a record contract with Warner Bros.

Raitt's early albums were critically acclaimed for her singing and guitar playing (she is one of the few women who play bottleneck) as well as her choice of material, which often included blues as well as pop and folk songs. Most of Raitt's repertoire consists of covers, and she has gone out of her way to credit her sources, often touring with them as opening acts. Her sixth album, Sweet Forgiveness (#25, 1977), went gold and yielded a hit cover version of Del

Shannon's "Runaway" (#57, 1977). The Glow (featuring her first original tunes since three on Give It Up) (#30, 1979) was produced by Peter Asher, but it did not sell as well as its predecessor.

A Quaker, Raitt has played literally hundreds of benefits over the course of her career. She was a founder of M.U.S.E. (Musicians United for Safe Energy), which in September 1979 held a massive concert at Madison Square Garden, with other stars like Jackson Browne, James Taylor, and the Doobie Brothers. It was later commemorated on a three-LP set. In 1982 she released her eighth LP, Green Light (#38, 1982), a harder-rocking effort aided by her backup band, the Bump Band, which included veteran keyboardist Ian MacLagan (of the Faces and the Stones; Raitt's longtime bassist and tuba-player, Freebo, remained a constant sideman through her various backup bands). They toured with Raitt in mid-1982, greeted by the usual critical acclaim. Her work also appeared on the platinum 1980 Urban Cowboy soundtrack, with the country song "Don't It Make You Wanna Dance."

When Nine Lives (#115, 1986) flopped, Raitt lost her deal with Warner Bros. Prince reportedly produced an album's worth of tracks with her, but they were never released. Instead, Raitt reemerged in 1989 on Capitol with her Don Was-produced breakthrough album Nick of Time, which smoothed out her rough bluesy edges yet avoided crass commercialism. It topped the charts, sold 4 million copies, and won an Album of the Year Grammy (one of four awards won by a thunderstruck Raitt at the 1990 gala; one was for her duet with Delbert McClinton, "Good Man, Good Woman"). The pattern held with Luck of the Draw (#2, 1991), another Was production, which included the hit singles "Something to Talk About" (#5, 1991) and "I Can't Make You Love Me" (#18, 1991). It sold over 4 million copies and netted three more Grammys, for Album of the Year, Best Female Rock Vocal, and Best Pop Vocal Performance. Raitt earned another in 1990, for Best Traditional Blues Recording, for "In the Mood," a duet with John Lee Hooker on his album The Healer. Her former label Warner Bros. capitalized on Raitt's high profile by releasing The Bonnie Raitt Collection (#61, 1990), which included live duets with Sippie Wallace and John Prine.

In April 1991 Raitt married actor Michael O'Keefe (they divorced in 1999). Raitt also cofounded the Rhythm & Blues Foundation, dedicated to raising awareness and money for influential musical pioneers left impoverished in their old age by unfair record deals and lack of health insurance. Raitt once again found success working with producer Don Was, as 1994's Longing in Their Hearts topped the chart and went platinum shortly after its release; it sold over 2 million copies. It included "Love Sneakin' Up on You" (#19, 1994) and "You" (#92, 1994). Around this time, Raitt had a hit with "You Got It" (#33, 1995) from the film Boys on the Side, and a minor hit with "Rock Steady" (#73, 1995), a duet with Bryan Adams. Road Tested (#44, 1995) is a live album. In 1995 Raitt became the first woman guitarist to have a guitar named for her. All royalties from the sale of Fender's Bonnie Raitt Signature Senes Stratocaster go to programs to teach inner-city girls to play guitar.

Her next effort, Fundamental (#17, 1998), produced by Mitchell Froom and Tchad Blake, was a less polished collection that some viewed as a return to the fine roots- and blues-based work of her earlier, hitless days. Raitt called 1982's Green Light the album's "true predecessor." Inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2000, Raitt continues to perform for and speak out on a wide range of issues, including nuclear power, reproductive freedom, and the environment.

The Ramones

Formed 1974, New York, NY

Joey Ramone (b. Jeffrey Hyman, May 19, 1951; d. Apr. 15, 2001, New York), voc.; Johnny Ramone (b. John Cummings, Oct. 8, 1951, Long Island, NY), gr.; Dee Dee Ramone (b. Douglas Colvin, Sep. 18, 1952, VA), bass; Tommy Ramone (b. Tom Erdelyi, Jan. 29, 1952, Budapest, Hungary), drums. 1976—Ramones (Sire) 1977—Ramones Leave Home; Rocket to Russia (– Tommy Ramone; + Marky Ramone [b. Dee Dee Ramone: 1995—I Hate Freaks Like You (World Service) 1997—Zonked!! (Other People's Music) 2000—Greatest and Latest (Conspiracy).

Marky Ramone: 1997—Marky Ramone and the Intruders (Thirsty Ear) 1999—Answer to Your Problems? (Zoer).

In the mid-'70s the Ramones shaped the sound of punk rock in New York with simple, fast songs, deadpan lyrics, no solos, and an impenetrable wall of guitar chords. Twenty years later, with virtually all of their peers either retired or having moved on to forms other than punk, Joey and Johnny Ramone, the band's core, continued adamantly to parlay the same determinedly basic sound. The cultural importance of the group became most apparent in 2001, when leader Joey Ramone was eulogized not only in the rock press but the New York Times and other general media.

The group formed in 1974 after the foursome graduated or left high school in Forest Hills, New York. The original lineup featured Joey on drums, Dee Dee sharing guitar with Johnny, and Tommy as manager, but they soon settled on their recording setup. Their name and pseudonym came via Paul McCartney, who had briefly called himself Paul Ramon back when the Beatles were the Silver Beatles. The Ramones gravitated toward the burgeoning scene at CBGB, where their 20-minute sets of rapid-fire, under-two-and-a-half-minute songs earned them a recording contract before any of their contemporaries except Patti Smith.

In 1976 Ramones was a definitive punk statement, with songs like "Beat on the Brat," "Blitzkrieg Bop," and "Now I Wanna Sniff Some Glue"—14 of them, clocking in at under 30 minutes. The group traveled to England in 1976, giving the nascent British punk scene the same boost they had provided to New Yorkers. Before the year was out, Ramones Leave Home had been released. As throughout its career, the band toured almost incessantly.

With their next two singles, the group began to soften their sound slightly. "Sheena Is a Punk Rocker" and "Rockaway Beach" made explicit their debt to '60s AM hit styles such as bubblegum and surf music, and both made the lower reaches of the Top 100. They were included on Rocket to Russia, which also contained their first ballad, "Here Today, Gone Tomorrow." At this point Tommy quit the group, preferring his behind-the-scenes activity as coproducer, "disguised" as T. Erdelyi (his real name).

His replacement was Marc Bell, henceforth dubbed Marky Ramone. He was formerly one of Richard Hell's Voidoids and before that a member of Dust, who recorded a pair of albums during the '60s. His first LP with the Ramones, Road to Ruin, was their first to contain only 12 songs and their first to last longer than half an hour. Despite their glossiest production yet, featuring acoustic guitars and real solos, its two singles, "Don't Come Close" and a version of the Searchers' "Needles and Pins," failed to capture a mass audience. Neither did their starring role in Roger Corman's 1979 movie Rock 'n' Roll High School.

As the 1980s began, the Ramones tried working with noted pop producers Phil Spector (End of the Century) and 10cc's Graham Gouldman (Pleasant Dreams), but commercial success remained elusive. After Subterranean Jungle, Marky Ramone departed, to be replaced by ex-Velvetees Richard Beau. As Richie Ramone, the drummer played on four albums, before Marky returned in 1987. Too Tough to Die, with Eurythmic Dave Stewart producing the pop single "Howling at the Moon," recaptured some of their '70s energy, and "Bonzo Goes to Bitburg" off Animal Boy offered cutting political satire. However, the remainder of the decade too often found them parodying their earlier strengths.

In 1989 the Ramones gained their widest exposure with the title track to the soundtrack for Stephen King's Pet Sematary, but also underwent their most significant internal shift. Dee Dee departed, first to record, as Dee Dee King, a rap album, Standing in the Spotlight, and then to form the rock group Chinese Dragons. His post-Ramones career included publishing the autobiography Poisoned Heart: Surviving the Ramones and, in the late '90s, playing with his wife, Barbara, and Marky Ramone in the Ramones spinoff unit, the Ramainz. A heroin addict and substance abuser for 14 years, Dee Dee had been the Ramones' truest punk (going solo, he also joined AA); his departure signaled the end of an era, if not a style. AWOL from the manes at the time he enlisted in the band, C.J. Ramone infused youthful energy—he was 14 years younger than Joey and Johnny—but the band's sound remained the same.

Mondo Bizarro, with a guest appearance by Living Colour guitarist Vernon Reid and songs that attacked both drugs and the PMRC's Tipper Gore, ushered the band into the '90s, their influence by then apparent in such rowdy outfits as Guns n' Roses and the Beastie Boys. In 1994 they persevered with Acid Eaters, a tribute to '60s idols like the Animals and Rolling Stones. With Joey sober since the start of the decade and Marky in recovery from alcoholism, they continued their relentless touring for two more years until their final show in August 1996. Marky formed Marky Ramone and the Intruders and has released two albums to date. Joey went on to manage the Independents, a horror-punk-ska band, to act in the indie film Final Rinse, and, in 1999, to coproduce a Ronnie Spector EP, She Talks to Rainbows. In 2001 he announced he had been diagnosed with lymphoma six years earlier and was undergoing treatment for the disease. He died that year. Little Steven Van Zandt presided over an all-star party on what would have been Joey's 50th birthday a month after his death. The U.S. Congress proclaimed May 19, 2001, Joey Ramone Day.

Formed Nov. 1991, Berkeley, CA

Tim Armstrong (b. Nov. 25), gr., voc.; Matt Freeman (b. Apr. 23, 1966, Albany, CA), bass; Brett Reed (b. July 12), drums.

1993—Rancid (Epitaph) 1994—(+ Lars Fredericksen [b. Aug. 31, Campbell, CA], gr.) Let's Go 1995— . . . And Out Come the Wolves 1998—Life Won't Wait 2000—Rancid.

Spawned from the same Bay Area latter-day hardcore punk scene as Green Day, and likewise heavily influenced by the Clash, Rancid achieved mainstream success while unabashedly celebrating the blue-collar ethic and hyper-aesthetic of classic punk—complete with Mohawks and jumpy rhythms inspired by ska music. The band came together in 1991 when guitarist Tim Armstrong was recovering from alcoholism. As part of his therapy, he started Rancid with bassist and childhood friend Matt Freeman. The pair had previously played together in Operation Ivy—a late-'80s ska-punk outfit that had been a staple of Gilman Street, the legendary East Bay punk club that also fostered Green Day—and the Dance Hall Crashers. Brett Reed, another Gilman Street regular, joined on drums, and the group released a five-song EP in 1992. Its self-titled debut album came out the next year on California punk stronghold Epitaph Records. Guitarist Lars Fredericksen, a former member of U.K. Subs, joined in time to record the band's breakthrough release Let's Go (#97 pop, 1995), which went gold. A major label bidding war erupted, and by year's end the group was contemplating a $1.5 million offer from Epic Records.

Rancid opted to stay with Epitaph, and released . . . And Out Come the Wolves (#45 pop, 1995), with two singles, "Time Bomb" (#48, 1995) and "Ruby Soho" (#63, 1995), getting heavy airplay on modern rock stations. Three years later, Life Won't Wait (#35 pop, 1998) was Rancid's most ambitious effort, as the group expanded its range to include doo-wop harmonies, soul, and rockabilly elements, and feature such guests as Buju Banton and Dicky Barrett of the Mighty Mighty Bosstones. Going back to its punk roots for its second self-titled release in 2000, Rancid capped a rags-to-riches decade with a loud-fast-rules rejoinder to its unexpected success.

Chip Kinman (b. Oct. 4, 1957, Edenton, NC), voc., gr., harmonica; Tony Kinman (b. Apr. 3, 1956, Quantico, VA), voc., bass; Alejandro Escovedo (b. Jan. 10, 1946, San Antonio, TX), voc., gr.; Slim Evans (b. Jim Evans), drums.

1982—Sundown (Slash-Warner Bros.) 1983—(- Escovedo; - Evans) 1984—Long Gone Dead 1987—Rank and File (Rhino).

Alejandro Escovedo solo: 1992—Gravity (Watermelon) 1993—Thirteen Years 1994—The End EP; Hard Road (with True Believers) 1996—With These Hands (Rykodisc) 1997—The Pawn Shop Years (with Buick MacKane) 1998—More Miles Than Money: Live 1994-1996 (Bloodshot) 1999—Bourbonitis Blues 2001—A Man Under the Influence.

Rank and File mixed energetic power pop with a country twang, kicking off the early-'80s musical hybrid called cow punk. Army-brat brothers Tony and Chip Kinman spent part of their childhoods living in North Carolina, where they were surrounded by country music. By the time they reached the West Coast in the late '70s, the brothers had discovered punk and formed the Dils, whose politically charged "I Hate the Rich" and "Class War" are considered unsung classics of West Coast punk. In 1981 Chip Kinman teamed up with former Nuns guitarist Alejandro Escovedo in New York to form

Rank and File. (The Dils and Nuns had played together in San Francisco, and there Tony Kinman and Escovedo had performed with a loose-knit group they dubbed Rank and File.) Tony joined soon after, the band dropped its rhythm section, and the three moved to Austin in 1982. There, they recruited drummer Slim Evans.

After initial cries of "sellout" from devoted Dils fans, Rank and File released Sundown to overwhelming critical praise for songs such as "Coyote," about the mistreatment of illegal aliens, and the poppy "Amanda Ruth." The Kinmans' grittier side was compared to Johnny Cash, while their harmonies were likened to the Everly Brothers. Amid dissension, Escovedo and Evans left, and the Kinmans relocated to L.A. Recorded with session players, Long Gone Dead received a lukewarm reception. The group's nontwangy Rhino album passed nearly unnoticed in 1987.

In 1986 Escovedo—whose extended family includes Santana percussionist Pete Escovedo and Pete's daughter, former Prince percussionist Sheila E.—formed True Believers with his brother Javier. The band released its critically acclaimed but commercially disappointing self-titled album, produced by Memphis sessionman Jim Dickinson (Big Star, Replacements), on Rounder-EMI. Six years later Escovedo kicked off a solo career with the critical hit Gravity, which expressed his grief over the suicide of his second wife—and the mother of two of his children. It was followed in 1994 by Thirteen Years. While he also performed with the Alejandro Escovedo Orchestra, the rock band Buick MacKane, and with the Setters (which included Walter Salas-Humara of the Silos), Escovedo won the most acclaim for his solo work. His 1996 album With These Hands included an appearance by Willie Nelson (on "Nickel and a Spoon") and featured several members of Escovedo's extended family, including Sheila E. The music set a mix of country, hard rock, and Latin rhythms against lyrics that explored family values. The more raucous Bourbonitis Blues followed in 1999. A Man Under the Influence (2001) was produced by Chns Stamey (dB's).

The Kinmans continued together as the avant-rock duo Blackbird, blending their clean harmonies and melodies with a cruder industrial sound. Between 1988 and 1993 the duo released three self-titled albums: The first two, unofficially called "the red one" and "the black one," came out on Iloki, the third, called "the orange one," was released by Scotti Brothers. The Kinmans also dabbled in a band called Cowboy Nation (Journey Out of Time, 2000), which returned the brothers to the rootsy C&W of that beloved first Rank and File album.

Shabba Ranks

Born Rexton Rawlston Fernando Gordon, Jan. 17, 1966, Saint Ann's Parish, Jam.

1991—As Raw as Ever (Epic) 1992—Rough & Ready, vol. I; X-Tra Naked 1993—Rough & Ready, vol. II 1995—A Mi Shabba 1999—Shabba Ranks and Friends.

With his deep, gruff voice and lyrics and image based firmly in "slackness" (overt sexuality) Shabba Ranks became the biggest-selling and highest-profile star of "dancehall," the reggae subgenre marked by fast rhythms and fast-talking vocals. Dancehall began in the late '60s, is credited with anticipating and influencing rap (original Bronx rap DJ Kool Herc was an emigrant from Jamaica), and gained an international audience after rap's ascendance in the late '80s.

Like Bob Marley, Ranks emerged from Saint Ann's Parish and the Trenchtown ghetto. Influenced by such "toastmasters" (reggae's version of rappers) as Josey Wales and Yellowman, he began performing in Kingston in 1980 and soon was recording Jamaican hit singles with such leading record producers as King Jammy and Bobby Digital. His 1989 "Wicked in Bed" caught on with Caribbean-music fans in America and Britain, and in 1991 he was featured on Scritti Politti's cover of the Beatles' "She's a Woman," a U.K. Top 20 hit that paved the way for a major label deal with Epic Records. As Raw as Ever (#89 pop, #1 R&B, 1991), yielded hits in "Housecall (Your Body Can't Lie to Me)" (#37 pop, #4 R&B, 1991), a duet with reggae crooner Maxi Priest, and "The Jam" (#52 R&B, 1992), a duet with rapper KRS-ONE. The album won 1991's Best Reggae Album Grammy, making Ranks the first dancehall artist so honored. Epic then released Rough and Ready, Volume I (#78, 1992), a collection of Ranks' Jamaican hits that yielded a hit single in "Mr. Loverman" (#40 pop, #2 R&B, 1992).

X-tra Naked (#64, 1992) produced another big hit in "Slow and Sexy" (#33 pop, #4 R&B, 1992), a duet with Johnny Gill, the album also included duets with rappers Queen Latifah and Chubb Rock. Ranks then guested on Eddie Murphy's Love's Alright and appeared in Murphy's video for "I Was King." In December 1992, however, Ranks told a British TV show that he agreed with dancehall star Buju Banton's controversial track "Boom Bye Bye," which advocated the killing of gay men. "If you forfeit the laws of God Almighty," declared Ranks, "you deserve crucifixion." Resulting protests by gay-rights groups led The Tonight Show to cancel Ranks' scheduled appearance in March 1993. Ranks subsequently said he regretted his remarks and that he did not "approve of any act of violence against homosexuals or any other human beings."

Whether or not the controversy impacted album sales, A Mi Shabba, released in 1995, failed to chart as highly as its predecessors, reaching #133. Its singles, "Let's Get It On" (#81 pop, #27 R&B) and "Shine Eye Gal" (#57 R&B), fared better. The 1999 package Shabba Ranks and Friends compiled the best of Ranks' hit collaborations.

Hard-rockers Rare Earth enjoyed several major hits with Motown Records in the early '70s and was reportedly the first white act signed to the black-owned company. Founding members Pete Rivera, John Persh, and Gil Bridges grew up in Detroit listening to and playing Motown hits in local bars as the Sunliners. In 1969 they became Rare Earth and added three new members. With the aid of Motown session guitarist Dennis Coffey they attracted the company's attention and in 1969 were signed to a Motown subsidiary renamed Rare Earth.

The group's first album, Get Ready (#12), was quite successful; and the title cut, a reworking of the Temptations' hit, was a #4 single. Ecology and One World in 1970 spawned "I Know I'm Losing You," another Temptations remake (#7 pop, #20 R&B), "Born to Wander" (#17 pop, #48 R&B), "I Just Want to Celebrate" (#7 pop, #30 R&B), and "Hey, Big Brother" (#19 pop, #48 R&B). Much of the group's material was produced by Motown staff producer Norman Whitfield.

After this peak period, the band continued with Motown until it released Rare Earth on Prodigal Records in 1977. Rare Earth, with Gil Bridges and Ray Monette still remaining from the early lineup, continues today. The group released an album in 1993, when the band was especially popular in Germany. In the mid-'90s original drummer Pete Rivera played with the Classic Rock All Stars, which featured Spencer Davis and members of Iron Butterfly and Sugarloaf.

The Rascals/The Young Rascals

Felix Cavaliere (b. Nov. 29, 1944, Pelham, NY), voc., kybds.; Eddie Brigati (b. Oct. 22, 1946, New York), voc.; Gene Cornish (b. May 14, 1945, Ottawa, Can.), gtr.; Dino Danelli (b. July 23, 1945, New York), drums.

Eddie Brigati solo (with David Brigati): 1976—Brigati (Elektra).

The term "blue-eyed soul" was allegedly coined for the Rascals (although none of them had blue eyes), whose approximation of mid-'60s black pop crossed the color line.

The Rascals: Felix Cavaliere, Gene Cornish, Eddie Brigati, Dino Danelli

Dino Danelli began his career as a teenage jazz drummer (he played with Lionel Hampton's band) but switched to R&B while working in New Orleans, and he returned to New York to accompany such R&B acts as Little Willie John. There he met Eddie Brigati, a pickup singer on the local R&B circuit.

Felix Cavaliere had studied classical piano before becoming the only white member of the Stereos, a group based in his suburban hometown. While a student at Syracuse University, he formed a doo-wop group, the Escorts. After leaving school, Cavaliere moved to New York City, where he met Danelli, and the two migrated to Las Vegas to try their luck with a casino house band. On their return to New York, Cavaliere joined Joey Dee and the Starlites (sometimes spelled Starlighters), which included Brigati and Gene Cornish.

The Rascals came together in 1964 after Cavaliere, Brigati, and Cornish left Dee and formed a quartet with Danelli. In February 1965 they began gigging in New Jersey and on Long Island. By year's end, they had changed their name to the Young Rascals (after the old television series) and released their first Atlantic single, "I Ain't Gonna Eat Out My Heart Anymore" (#52, 1965), sung by Brigati. The group took a turn when Cavaliere sang the followup, "Good Lovin'" (#1, 1966), one of the year's biggest hits. In the following two years, the group had nine more Top 20 hits, including "You Better Run" (#20, 1966), "(I've Been) Lonely Too Long" (#16, 1967), "Groovin'" (#1, 1967), and "A Girl Like You" (#10, 1967), most of them Cavaliere-Brigati compositions.

Established hitmakers, the group tried to get serious in 1967, dropping the "Young" from its name and the Edwardian knickers from its onstage wardrobe. With Freedom Suite, the Rascals' music took on elements of jazz, but the quartet continued to score with "How Can I Be Sure" (#4, 1967), "A Beautiful Morning" (#3, 1968), and "People Got to Be Free" (#1, 1968). Cavaliere and Brigati wrote the latter song shortly after the 1968 assassinations of Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert F. Kennedy. Though they never brandished their politics like some bands, the Rascals truly lived theirs, demanding that a black act appear on the bill at each of its concerts. The principled stand cost them dates in the South.

The Rascals never had another Top 20 hit after "People Got to Be Free." With Search and Nearness, their songs made room for lengthy instrumental tracks by jazzmen like Ron Carter, Hubert Laws, and Joe Farrell. Record sales and concert attendance plummeted. In 1971 they signed to Columbia, but Brigati and Cornish left before their label debut. Filling their shoes were Buzzy Feiten (Butterfield Blues Band), fresh from sessions for Bob Dylan's New Morning; Robert Popwell, whose session credits included work for Dylan, Aretha Franklin, Eddie Floyd, and Tim Hardin; and Ann Sutton, who had sung with various soul and jazz groups in Philadelphia. The band broke up in the early '70s.

Brigati recorded an album with his brother David in 1976; Cornish and Danelli started a group called Bulldog and later were part of Fotomaker with former Raspberries guitarist Wally Bryson. Feiten joined Neil Larsen in a duo in 1980. Cavaliere has continued as a solo artist and as a producer (Laura Nyro, Deadly Nightshade). In 1994 producer Don Was' Karambolage released the singer's first new album in nearly a decade and a half. Around the same time, Cavaliere also played keyboards for Ringo Starr's All-Starr Band. In 1982 Danelli joined Steve Van Zandt's Little Steven and the Disciples of Soul. He, Cornish, and Cavaliere reunited in 1988 for a U.S. tour, but the following year Danelli and Cornish sued Cavaliere to prevent him from using the Rascals name. In a Solomon-like ruling, a judge allowed Cornish and Danelli to call themselves the New Rascals, and for Cavaliere to advertise himself as "formerly of the Young Rascals." In 1991 Eddie and David Brigati were featured on The New York Rock and Soul Revue, an all-star live album spearheaded by Steely Dan cofounder Donald Fagen. In 1997 the original Rascals were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

The Raspberries/Eric Carmen

Formed 1970, Cleveland, OH

Eric Carmen (b. Aug. 11, 1949, Cleveland), voc., bass, gtr.; Wally Bryson (b. July 18, 1949, Gastonia, NC), gtr.; Jim Bonfanti (b. Dec. 17, 1948, Windber, PA), drums; Dave Smalley (b. July 10, 1949, Oil City, PA), bass, gtr.

1972—Raspberries (Capitol); Fresh 1973—Side 3 (- Bonfanti; - Smalley; + Michael McBride, drums; + Scott McCarl, bass) 1974—Starting Over 1991—Collectors Series 2000—Refreshed EP (Legendstar).

Eric Carmen solo: 1975—Eric Carmen (Arista) 1977—Boats Against the Current 1978—Change of Heart 1980—Tonight You're Mine 1985—Eric Carmen (Geffen) 1988—The Best of Eric Carmen (Arista) 2000—I Was Born to Love You (Pyramid).

The Raspberries, with their Beatles-like harmonies, Mod-influenced suits, and power pop, seemed very out of place when they first recorded in 1972, partly because the general trend in America at the time was toward longer FM-oriented tracks.

The Raspberries: Jim Bonfanti, Wally Bryson, Eric Carmen, Dave Smalley

The band formed in Cleveland in 1970 from several local groups. Jim Bonfanti had drummed on the Outsiders' 1966 hit "Time Won't Let Me." He was later in the Mods with Dave Smalley and Wally Bryson, who changed their name to the Choir. They became the most popular band in Cleveland, with a minor 1967 hit, "It's Cold Outside." Eric Carmen, who can both croon sensuously and scream rock & roll like Paul McCartney, joined the local Cyrus Erie as lead singer, and Bryson left the Choir to join Carmen's band. They recorded a few unnoticed singles for Epic; Carmen then recorded with a band called the Quick before going solo, writing and recording "Light the Way," later covered by Oliver.

At the turn of the decade, Carmen, Bryson, Bonfanti, and Smalley finally united in the Raspberries. In mid-1971 their demos attracted the attention of future producer Jimmy Ienner, who got them a contract with Capitol. Their debut LP had a raspberry-scented scratch-and-sniff sticker on the cover. The second single, "Go All the Way," hit #5 and sold more than 1.3 million copies. The second LP included "I Want to Be With You" (#16, 1972) and "Let's Pretend" (#35, 1973). Carmen wrote and sang most of the hits, many of which (including the three listed above) were paeans to making out.

During the recording of Side 3, internal problems developed. Bonfanti and Smalley resisted the group's teenybopper image, and by the end of the year they'd left, forming Dynamite with two ex-members of Freeport, another Cleveland band. They were replaced by Michael McBride, who had played in Cyrus Erie with Carmen, and Scott McCarl, who had sent an audition tape to Ienner. The new foursome released its fourth and final LP, Starting Over, a concept album about stardom that many critics called the best LP of 1974. Although the single "Overnight Sensation (Hit Record)" reached #18, the album flopped, and the band quit in frustration.

Carmen went on to an intermittently successful solo career as a pop balladeer. His first solo LP contained three hits:

"Sunrise" (#34, 1976), "Never Gonna Fall in Love Again" (#11, 1976), and "All by Myself" (#2, 1976), the latter of which incorporated a Rachmaninoff melody, as did several other songs by the classically trained pianist/guitarist. Carmen had only one more Top 20 hit over the next 10 years ("Change of Heart," #19, 1978) but did compose "That's Rock 'n' Roll" (#3, 1977) and "Hey Deanie" (#7, 1977), both smashes for teen heartthrob Shaun Cassidy, and "Almost Paradise (Love Theme from Footloose)," a Top 10 hit for Loverboy's Mike Reno and Heart's Ann Wilson in 1984. Three years later another film, Dirty Dancing, gave Carmen his own hit with "Hungry Eyes" (#4, 1987). A followup, "Make Me Lose Control" soared to #3 the following spring, but no new albums appeared between 1985 and 2000's I Was Born to Love You. In the interim Celine Dion's version of Carmen's "All by Myself," became an international megasmash in 1996. Also in 2000 Carmen toured with Ringo Starr's All-Starr Band while Raspberries Bryson, Smalley, and McCarl regrouped and recorded a new EP, Refreshed.

Bobby Blotzer (b. Oct. 22, 1958), drums; Robbin Crosby, gtr.; Juan Croucier (b. Aug. 22, 1959), bass; Warren De Martini (b. Apr. 10, 1963), gtr.; Stephen Pearcy (b. July 3, 1956), voc. 1983—Ratt (Time Coast) 1984—Out of the Cellar (Atlantic) 1985—Invasion of Your Privacy 1986—Dancin' Undercover 1988—Reach for the Sky 1990—Detonator 1991—Ratt & Roll 8191 1997—Collage (D-Rock) 1999—(- Croucier; + Robbie Crane, bass) Ratt (Portrait) 2000—(- Pearcy; + Jizzy Pearl, voc.; + John Corabi, gtr.).

One of the most popular L.A. '80s metal bands, Ratt concentrated mostly on the music, a standard-issue combination of Zeppelin and Aerosmith. Four out of seven albums went platinum, with two cracking the Top 10: Out of the Cellar (#7, 1984) and Invasion of Your Privacy (#7, 1985).

Ratt began in 1981 with friends Robbin Crosby and Stephen Pearcy. They met Warren De Martini on the club scene. After seeing drummer Bobby Blotzer on MTV, they tracked him down; Blotzer brought along Juan Croucier. Their friendship with Motley Crüe helped them to secure a contract with Atlantic; the label signed them after an executive saw a live show. Out of the Cellar, their debut for Atlantic, contained "Round and Round," the #12 hit that became an MTV staple (featuring a cameo appearance by comedian Milton Berle in full drag).

Ratt remained popular for the length of its career. For 1990's Detonator (#23) the group collaborated with songwriter-for-hire Desmond Child. Stephen Pearcy's departure in 1992, for the usual "artistic differences," marked the end of the band—for a time. With "hair metal" becoming a viable nostalgia act in the late '90s, Pearcy and De Martini got Ratt back together. Two new albums, Collage (1997) and Ratt (#169, 1999), didn't do well, and Ratt resorted to touring on retro bills with fellow metallers Poison. In January 2000

Pearcy quit the band again; he was replaced by ex-Love/Hate and L.A. Guns singer Jizzy Pearl. Later that year, ex-Mötley Crüe guitarist John Corabi joined the band.

Genya Ravan

Born Goldie Zelkowitz, 1942, Lodz, Pol.

1972—Genya Ravan With Baby (Columbia) 1973—They Love Me/They Love Me Not (Dunhill) 1974—Goldie Zelkowitz (Janus) 1978—Urban Desire (20th Century—Fox) 1979—And I Mean It.

During her two decades as a rock musician, Genya Ravan led one of the first self-contained all-female bands, sang hits for Ten Wheel Drive, and later became the first female producer hired by a major record label.

Growing up in the Jewish ghetto on New York's Lower East Side, young Goldie Zelkowitz developed an interest in R&B. She ran with a teenage gang and dropped out of high school for a musical career, which began in a Brooklyn lounge when she walked onstage and began singing with Richard Perry's band, the Escorts, who made her their lead singer. She sang their version of "Somewhere" from West Side Story; the record never charted nationally but made #1 in Detroit.

In 1962 she formed Goldie and the Gingerbreads, probably the first girl group in which all the women played their own instruments. They stayed together until 1967, achieving their biggest successes in England, where they eventually relocated and later toured with the Rolling Stones, the Yardbirds, Manfred Mann, and the Kinks.

In 1969 Zelkowitz changed her name to Genya Ravan and formed Ten Wheel Drive ("Morning Much Better," #74, 1970), an otherwise all-male jazz-blues band with a five-piece horn section in the mold of Blood, Sweat and Tears. She left in 1971 to form her own band, Baby, which toured with Sly and the Family Stone and backed up Ravan on her first solo album. At that time most of her material was written by Baby's guitarist, Mitch Styles, formerly of Diamond Reo.

In 1975 Ravan became the first woman producer hired by a major label when RCA had her produce cabaret act Gretchen Cryer and Nancy Ford (who wrote the feminist musical I'm Getting My Act Together and Taking It on the Road) and the debut album by Rosie (who later joined the Harlettes). A little over a year later, Ravan formed the short-lived Taxi. She also produced demos for CBGB owner Hilly Kristal, including the Shirts, a popular band at the club, as well as the debut LP by the Dead Boys, Young, Loud and Snotty. She later sang on Blue Öyster Cult's Mirrors LP and produced material by ex-Ronette Ronnie Spector. Lou Reed guested on Urban Desire, Ian Hunter on And I Mean It; both albums stuck to her hard-nosed rock vein, with many songs written by Ravan. In 1980 Ravan formed her own label, Polish Records. She appeared on The Warriors soundtrack. She is currently head of production and promotion for CBGB's in-house record label. In 1997 Goldie and the Gingerbreads performed a 30-year reunion show honoring the release of The ROLLING STONE Book of Women in Rock

Johnnie Ray

Born Jan. 10, 1927, Dallas, OR; died Feb. 24, 1990, Los Angeles, CA

1952—Johnnie Ray (Columbia) 1957—The Big Beat
1978—Johnnie Ray—An American Legend 1997—High Drama: The Real Johnnie Ray (Legacy).

Though he had started to go deaf as a youngster, Johnnie Ray still managed to become one of America's most popular male vocalists of the early and mid-'50s, with a dozen gold records. He left home for Hollywood, then ended up in Detroit in 1951. There he met blues singer LaVern Baker and her manager, Al Green (not the Memphis soul singer), who helped Ray work on his music. He was discovered by Detroit disc jockey Robin Seymour, and in 1951 he signed to Columbia's Okeh subsidiary. That year his "Whiskey and Gin" was a minor hit in the Midwest.

Ray went to New York, where, with Mitch Miller producing and the Four Lads backing, he recorded "Cry," a #1 ballad in 1952. Because he was so emotional during his performances, Ray is frequently cited as the first popular singer to break with the cool, professional stance of earlier pop crooners like Perry Como. Among critics' nicknames for him was Prince of Wails. Through the early to mid-'50s Ray had many pop hits, including "Please Mr. Sun," a cover of the Drifters' "Such a Night," "Just Walking in the Rain," "Yes Tonight, Josephine," and "You Don't Owe Me a Thing."

Although Ray's chart success ended in the U.S. nearly as quickly as it began, he was extremely popular in the U.K., where he made 29 chart appearances in the Top 40, as opposed to four here, between 1952 and 1960. He also recorded three duets with Doris Day that charted there. In the following years, Ray popped up occasionally as an oldies act both on TV and in concerts. He died of liver failure. Even in death, Ray was not forgotten by his British fans: Morrissey often wore a hearing aid onstage in an unusual tribute to Ray, and the opening line of Dexy's Midnight Runners' #1 1984 hit "Come On Eileen," mentions him.

Mac Rebennack: See Dr. John

Redbone

Formed 1968, Los Angeles, CA

Lolly Vegas (b. Fresno, CA), gtr., lead voc.; Pat Vegas (b. Fresno), bass, voc.; Anthony Bellamy (b. Los Angeles), gtr.; Peter De Poe (a.k.a. Last Walking Bear, b. Neah Bay Reservation, WA), drums. 1970—Redbone (Epic); Potlatch 1971—Message From a Drum 1973—Wovoka 1974—(- De Poe; + Butch Rillera, drums) Beaded Dreams Through Turquoise Eyes 1975—

Come and Get Your Redbone 1978—Cycles (RCA) 1994—Redbone: Live (Avenue/Rhino) 1996—Golden Classics (Collectables).

Redbone consisted of four American Indians (the band's name is a derogatory Cajun slang term for half-breed) who sometimes wore traditional dress onstage and played "swamp rock" (popularized by Creedence Clearwater) with some funk influences. "Come and Get Your Love," highlighted by Lolly Vegas' lead vocals, was its only major hit (#5, 1974).

The band formed in California in 1968. The members had all grown up poor in migrant camps. In the mid-'60s brothers Pat and Lolly Vegas (the latter became Redbone's leader) played in a band on TV's Shindig. They also did West Coast session work, backing Odetta and John Lee Hooker, and wrote "Niki Hoeky," which became a hit for P.J. Proby (#23, 1967).

Anthony Bellamy used to play flamenco guitar at his parents' restaurant and later performed with local L.A. rock & roll bands; Peter De Poe was a ceremonial drummer on the reservation where he was born. The band drummed on the L.A. club circuit, got a deal with Epic, and released its debut in January 1970, including its own version of "Niki Hoeky."

Redbone's albums never sold well, and while the group did have some catchy, soulful rock tracks like 1971's "Magpie" (#45) and 1972's Top 25 hit "Witch Queen of New Orleans," it later explored more traditional Indian roots music. By the late '70s Redbone had faded. The group continues to tour, however, and in 1994 released a live album recorded in 1977.

Otis Redding

Born Sep. 9, 1941, Dawson, GA; died Dec. 10, 1967, Madison, WI

1964—Pain in My Heart (Atco) 1965—The Great Otis Redding Sings Soul Ballads (Volt); Otis Blue/Otis Redding Sings Soul 1966—Complete and Unbelievable . . . The Otis Redding Dictionary of Soul; The Soul Album 1967—Otis Redding Live in Europe; King and Queen (with Carla Thomas) (Stax); History of Otis Redding (Volt) 1968—The Dock of the Bay; The Immortal Otis Redding (Atco); Otis Redding in Person at the Whisky-a-Go-Go 1969—Love Man 1970—Tell the Truth (Atco); Otis Redding/Jimi Hendrix Experience (Reprise) 1982—Otis Redding Recorded Live (Atlantic) 1987—The Otis Redding Story 1992—Remember Me (Stax); The Very Best of Otis Redding (Rhino) 1993—Good to Me: Live at the Whisky a-Go-Go, vol. 2 (Stax); Otis! The Definitive Otis Redding (Rhino/Atlantic) 1995—The Very Best of Otis Redding, vol. 2.

Otis Redding's grainy voice and galvanizing stage shows made him one of the greatest male soul singers of the '60s. At the time of his death, he was making his first significant impact on the pop audience after years as a favorite among blacks.

In his youth, Redding was influenced by both Little

Richard and Sam Cooke, and early in his career he was a member of Little Richard's backing band, the Upsetters. In the late '50s, he met Johnny Jenkins, a local guitarist, who invited him to join his group, the Pinetoppers, who were managed by Phil Walden. Feeling that he'd gone as far as he could go in Macon, Redding moved to L.A. in 1960. There he cut a handful of singles, including the Little Richard-esque "Gamma Lamma." Upon returning to Macon in 1961, he recorded "Shout Bamalama" and garnered some local attention.

After taking odd jobs around the South, Redding worked as a chauffeur and was working again with Jenkins when the guitarist landed a contract with Atlantic. One day in October 1962, when it seemed that Jenkins' session wasn't going anywhere, Redding hastily recorded his own ballad, "These Arms of Mine." He had accompanied Jenkins to the session with the intent of getting a chance to record. By 1963, "These Arms of Mine" had become Redding's first hit. It hit #20 on the R&B chart and established Redding as a recording artist. But it was his impassioned performances on the so-called chitlin' circuit that made him, next to James Brown, the most popular black entertainer of the mid-'60s.

Redding wrote many of his own hits, including "Mr. Pitiful" (#41 pop, #10 R&B, 1965), "Fa-Fa-Fa-Fa-Fa (Sad Song)" (#29 pop, #12 R&B, 1966), and "(Sittin' on) The Dock of the Bay" (#1 pop, #1 R&B, 1968), all co-credited to Stax session guitarist Steve Cropper; "I've Been Loving You Too Long" (#21 pop, #2 R&B, 1965), with Jerry Butler; "Respect" (#35 pop, #4 R&B, 1965), "I Can't Turn You Loose" (#11 R&B, 1965), and "My Lover's Prayer" (#61 pop, #10 R&B, 1966). He also had hits with the Rolling Stones' "Satisfaction" (#31 pop, #4 R&B, 1966) and Sam Cooke's "Shake" (#47 pop, #16 R&B, 1967). Among his LPs, Dictionary of Soul is considered one of the best examples of the Memphis soul sound.

Redding also played an important role in the careers of other singers. In 1967 he cut a duet album with Carla Thomas, King and Queen, which had a hit in "Tramp" (#26 pop, #2 R&B). Redding produced his protégé Arthur Conley's tribute "Sweet Soul Music" (#2 pop and R&B) in 1967—an adaptation of Sam Cooke's "Yeah Man"—which became a soul standard. Redding also established his own label, Jotis, and was planning to get more deeply involved in talent management, development, and production.

Redding's appearance at the Monterey Pop Festival in 1967 introduced the singer to white rock fans. His intense performance (captured in the film Monterey Pop and on the LP Otis Redding/Jimi Hendrix) was enthusiastically received. As a gesture of thanks, Redding and Steve Cropper wrote "(Sittin' on) The Dock of the Bay." It was recorded on December 6, 1967, at the end of a long session. The whistling at the end came about, Cropper claims, because Redding forgot a vocal fadeout he had rehearsed before. It would become his biggest hit, yet Redding never lived to see its release.

On December 10, 1967, his chartered plane crashed into a Wisconsin lake, killing Redding and four members of his backup band, the Bar-Kays. In early 1968 "The Dock of the Bay" hit #1 on both the pop and R&B charts. Fourteen years later his two sons and a nephew formed their own group, called the Reddings, and covered "The Dock of the Bay" (#55 pop, #21 R&B). Otis Redding was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1989 by Little Richard.

Among her many hits, singer Helen Reddy will no doubt be best remembered as the composer and singer of "I Am Woman," which went to #1 and won a Grammy in 1972. Reddy began performing at the age of four at the Tivoli Theatre in Perth, Australia, and she toured much of that country with her show-business parents. She left boarding school at age 15 to work with a road show, acting as well as singing. She eventually landed her own Australian TV show, Helen Reddy Sings, and in 1966 she won a trip to New York in the Australian Bandstand International contest, sponsored by Philips-Mercury Records.

Otis Redding

Reddy had little success in New York, but she did meet Jeff Wald, an agent with the William Morris talent agency, whom she married a year later. (They divorced in the early '80s, in 1983 she married Milton Ruth.) In 1970 Wald arranged for her to perform on The Tonight Show, and within a year Reddy had her first hit, a version of "I Don't Know How to Love Him" (#13, 1971) from the Broadway rock musical Jesus Christ Superstar.

Reddy's other hits included "Peaceful" (#12), "Delta Dawn" (#1), and "Leave Me Alone" (#3), in 1973; "Keep On Singing" (#15), "You and Me Against the World" (#9), and "Angie Baby" (#1), in 1974; "Emotion" (#22), "Bluebird" (#35), and "Ain't No Way to Treat a Lady" (#8), in 1975; "I Can't Hear You No More" (#29) in 1976; and "You're My World" (#18) in 1977. In 1973 she had her own summer-replacement variety show on NBC and for most of the rest of the '70s she was a hostess on NBC's late-night rock-variety show The Midnight Special.

By then her run at the Top 40 had ended. She did some acting, appearing in Airport 1975 (1974), the Disney children's film Pete's Dragon (1977), and Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band (1978). In the mid-'70s she served as Commissioner of Parks and Recreation for her adopted home state of California. More recently she has returned to the theater, notably on Broadway and in the West End of London in the hit musical Blood Brothers. She is one of the foremost interpreters of English playwright Willy Russell, having appeared in four productions of his one-woman show Shirley Valentine. In 2000 she guest-starred in the CBS television series Diagnosis Murder: Center Stage, a collection of show-tunes, was her first album of completely new material in 15 years.

A potent combination of L.A. skateboard cool, tattoos, thrash, and funk, the Red Hot Chili Peppers overcame personal problems to emerge as one of the early '90s premier bands with 1991's Blood Sugar Sex Magik (#3) and "Under the Bridge" (#2). Their over-the-top performances and a sometimes excessive obsession with sex have inspired accusations of both sexism and criminal behavior.

After meeting at L.A.'s Fairfax High, Flea, Slovak, and Irons, with Kiedis as MC, formed the band Anthem School. Kiedis, the son of actor and Sunset Strip personality Blackie Dammett, already had show-biz experience after playing Sylvester Stallone's son in the 1976 film F.I.S.T. Flea, an Australian-born, New York-raised musical prodigy, departed to join the L.A. punk band Fear, as well as act in Penelope Spheeris' Suburbia (1983). (He later appeared in such films as Gus Van Sant's My Own Private Idaho [1992] and Joel and Ethan Coen's The Big Lebowski [1998], he also voices the character Donny in Nickelodeon's animated series The Wild Thornberns.) Irons and the Israeli-born Slovak then formed What Is This?

In 1983 the Chilis played their first show, an impromptu one-song jam at an L.A. club. The group went over well enough to be asked back (for two songs) and soon became a popular Hollywood club attraction. The band's self-titled debut—with Flea, Kiedis, Cliff Martinez, and Jack Sherman (What Is This? had other contractual obligations)—was produced by Gang of Four guitarist Andy Gill. The album stuffed, Irons and Slovak returned, and the band took to the road, sometimes appearing onstage wearing only strategically placed tube socks.

Freaky Styley (1985), produced by George Clinton and with guest appearances by funk horn players Maceo Parker and Fred Wesley, improved matters musically if not commercially. More rock-oriented, The Uplift Mofa Party Plan (#148, 1987) sold better, and contained the band's signature tune, "Party on Your Pussy." Any optimism was shattered by the 1988 death of guitarist Hillel Slovak from a heroin overdose. Disturbed by Slovak's death and Kiedis' heroin addiction, Irons quit. An interim band with P-Funk guitarist Blackbyrd McKnight and Dead Kennedys drummer D.H. Peligro did not take hold. Kiedis recruited a Chili Peppers fan, guitarist John Frusciante, and auditions brought Chad Smith. This version of the band recorded Mother's Milk (#52, 1989). With videos for "Knock Me Down" and their cover of Stevie Wonder's "Higher Ground" on MTV, it looked like the Peppers were about to break through.

The band's lifestyle came under some attack, though, with Kiedis convicted in 1989 of indecent exposure and sexual battery in an incident following a concert in Virginia. The next year during a taping of an MTV Spring Break special in Florida, Flea and Smith jumped offstage, with Flea grabbing a woman and carrying her on his shoulders, and Smith spanking her. The two were charged, and Flea was found guilty of battery, disorderly conduct, and solicitation to commit an unnatural and lascivious act, Smith was found guilty of battery.

The Chili Peppers' next album, BloodSugarSexMagik, produced by Rick Rubin, was written and recorded in a mansion the band claimed was haunted. It sold over 4 million copies, leading to their headlining Lollapalooza in 1992. Just prior to the tour, John Frusciante left the band and was replaced by Anik Marshall. Marshall lasted only a year and, after many auditions and one false start with Jesse Tobias, was replaced by former Jane's Addiction guitarist Dave Navarro. The 1995 release One Hot Minute (#4) went platinum, but failed to generate the excitement of BloodSugar, precipitating a fallow phase in the band's career. Flea joined Navarro for a 1997 reunion tour of Jane's Addiction, and Navarro and Kiedis slipped back into old drug habits. Navarro quit the group in 1998 to pursue solo ambitions, casting the future of the band in doubt. Instead of breaking up, however, the Chili Peppers invited Frusciante to return, the guitarist having recovered from a severe drug addiction. The subsequent album, Californication (#3, 1999), was a commercial and critical triumph, with a hit single in "Scar Tissue" (#9, 1999) and a major tour that included a fateful show at Woodstock '99, where the group had the dubious distinction of performing as a fiery melee erupted.

Redman

Born Reggie Noble, Apr. 17, 1974, Newark, NJ
 1992—Whut? Thee Album (RAL) 1994—Dare Iz a Darkside
 1996—Muddy Waters (Def Jam) 1998—Doc's Da Name
 2001—Malpractice.
 Method Man & Redman: 1999—Blackout! (Def Jam).

Redman is one of the most respected lyricists in '90s hip-hop. He grew up in a rough corner of Jersey City, New Jersey, where his mother first bought him a pair of turntables at age 10. He earned his Redman moniker the following year, when his face turned red after being hit with a snowball. By 16 he switched from DJ to rapper and soon attracted the attention of EPMD mastermind Erick Sermon. After Redman's mother kicked him out for selling drugs, he moved in with Sermon and stayed for two years. During that time Redman appeared on EPMD recordings and became a member of Sermon's "Hit Squad" collective.

Whut? Thee Album (#49, 1992), coproduced by Sermon, included the rap hit "Blow Your Mind." Dare Iz a Darkside (#13) followed in 1994. The next year he collaborated with Method Man (of the Wu-Tang Clan) on "How High" (#13) from The Show soundtrack album, followed by a joint appearance on Redman's Muddy Waters (#12, 1996). It was the beginning of what would become a regular partnership. Redman's Doc's Da Name 2000 (#11) was released in 1998. The next year, Redman and Method Man teamed up for an entire album, Blackout! (#3), with tracks produced by Sermon and Wu-Tang leader, RZA. Also in 1999 Redman guested on Limp Bizkit's "N 2 gether Now" (#73).

Jerry Reed

Born Jerry Hubbard, Mar. 20, 1937, Atlanta, GA
 1971—When You're Hot, You're Hot (RCA) 1972—The Best of Jerry Reed 1976—Both Barrels 1977—East Bound and Down 1983—The Bird 1985—Collector's Series 1986—Lookin' at You (Capitol) 1995—The Essential Jerry Reed (RCA) 1996—Flyin' High (Southern Tracks) 1999—Pickin'.

Jerry Reed is known mostly among musicians for his fast-pickin' guitar style, and among the masses for his jokey, C&W-to-pop hits of the early '70s. He got a record contract with Capitol in 1955 at age 18. He had been playing in bands since his early teens and had worked in a cotton mill. Initially Reed got attention as a songwriter, especially with "Crazy Legs" (which Gene Vincent recorded in 1956) and some covers by Brenda Lee.

From 1959 to 1961 Reed served in the army, and upon his release he moved to Nashville, where he had two minor hits on Columbia, "Hully Gully Guitars" and "Goodnight Irene." Reed worked primarily as a session guitarist until 1965, when he signed to RCA. Elvis Presley began to record Reed's work, giving him his first pop chart exposure with 1968's "Guitar Man" (which became Reed's nickname; it was also a hit for Reed the year before). Presley also cut Reed's "U.S. Male."

The guitarist's albums began to place on the C&W chart, and in 1970 he had his first gold single with his pop crossover debut, "Amos Moses," a swamp-rock song (#3 pop, #16 C&W). He became a household name with regular appearances on Glen Campbell's Goodtime Hour (1970–72). In 1971 he had a Top 10 pop and #1 C&W hit with the novelty number "When You're Hot, You're Hot," which also won a Grammy. In 1973 he again hit #1 with "Lord, Mr. Ford." Reed also won critical acclaim and a Grammy for a duet LP with Chet Atkins, Me and Jerry. In 1982 he had a #1 C&W hit with "She Got the Goldmine (I Got the Shaft)."

He branched out into acting in the mid-'70s with Southern roles, first in 1975's W.W. and the Dixie Dance Kings, and then in Gator (1976), both with Burt Reynolds. Next he costarred in the popular Reynolds Smokey and the Bandit series, consisting of three feature films released between 1977 and 1983. In the meantime, Reed continued his television career, as host of The Jerry Reed When You're Hot You're Hot Hour (1972), as a regular on Dean Martin Presents Music Country (1973), playing a detective on Nashville 99 (1977), and starring in the action-adventure series Concrete Cowboys (1981). In 1998 he enjoyed a role in The Waterboy, the fifth highest-grossing film of that year. He also collaborated with Waylon Jennings, Bobby Bare, and Mel Tillis on the Old Dogs album. Pickin', released the following year, contains five instrumentals and five vocal tracks.

Jimmy Reed

Born Sep. 6, 1925, Dunleith, MS; died Aug. 29, 1976, Oakland, CA

1957—I'm Jimmy Reed (Vee-Jay) 1961—Jimmy Reed at Carnegie Hall 1974—The Best of Jimmy Reed (Crescendo) 1988—Bright Lights, Big City (Chameleon) 1994—The Classic Recordings (Tomato) 1997—Lost in the Shuffle (32 Records) 1998—Cry Before I Go (Drive Archive).

Jimmy Reed, one of the most influential blues harpists and performers, was also the composer of such standards as "Big Boss Man," "Honest I Do," "Bright Lights, Big City," and "Baby, What You Want Me to Do."

The son of a sharecropper, Reed began performing in the Chicago area in the late '40s to early '50s, and in 1953 he signed with Vee-Jay Records. His first big hit was "You Don't Have to Go" (#9 R&B) in 1955. The next year he scored with "Ain't That Lovin' You Baby" (#7 R&B). Between 1956 and 1961 he had 11 more Top 20 R&B hits, including "Honest I Do" (#10, 1957) and "Baby, What You Want Me to Do" (#10, 1960), both of which crossed over to Top 40 pop success.

Reed's work has been covered by many others, including Elvis Presley ("Baby, What You Want Me to Do"), Van Morrison and Them ("Bright Lights, Big City"), Pretty Things ("Big Boss Man"), the Rolling Stones, and Aretha Franklin, both of whom do versions of "Honest I Do."

He died at age 50 following an epileptic seizure. In 1988 his widow and their eight children filed a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against Arc Music, claiming that neither Reed nor his wife had sufficient education to comprehend a deal he signed in 1967, releasing all the rights to his songs for a flat fee of $10,000. As part of the settlement, both parties agreed not to divulge its terms.

As the lead singer and songwriter of the Velvet Underground in the late '60s, Lou Reed was responsible for a body of work that was alienated from the prevailing optimism of the day and was passionately bleak, and which remains highly influential today. He is often referred to as the godfather of punk. His solo recording career, beginning in 1972, has been more idiosyncratic and marked by sudden turnabouts in image and sound, from self-consciously commercial product to white noise to unpredictable folk rock.

Before the formation of the Velvet Underground [see entry] in 1965, Reed grew up in Freeport, Long Island, then attended Syracuse University, studying poetry (under Delmore Schwartz, to whom Reed dedicated a song on the first Velvet Underground LP) and journalism. Reed's poems were published in Fusion magazine. (In 1977 he earned an award from the Coordinating Council of Literary Magazines for his poem "The Slide" and in 1992 was awarded France's Order of Arts and Letters.) After leaving Syracuse, Reed returned to New York City and worked for Pickwick Records, taking part in the studio group that recorded various Reed-penned songs, released by the Beachnuts and the Roughnecks. During this period, he met the musicians with whom he would subsequently form the Velvet Underground. With two of them, he formed a band called the Primitives, which became the Warlocks and made one record.

Reed's 1970 departure from the Velvet Underground was bitter; he did not even stay to complete their fourth album, Loaded, though songs from that project ("Sweet Jane" and "Rock & Roll") would become permanent fixtures of his live show and reputation. He became a virtual recluse for nearly two years, until moving to England and beginning a solo career in 1971. Transformer (#29, 1972) was his pop breakthrough. Produced by Velvet Underground fan David Bowie, it yielded Reed's only Top 20 hit to date, "Walk on the Wild Side," an ode to the denizens of Andy Warhol's '60s films. With Bowie's aid, Reed made the transition to the glitter rock of the period, camping up his presumed homosexuality with bleached-blond hair and black fingernail polish. Typically, the next record, Berlin, was as grim in tone as Transformer had been playful.

Reed's recordings have continued to be unpredictable. A pair of live albums drawn from the same set of concerts (including the gold Rock 'n' Roll Animal, #45, 1974) featured streamlined heavy-metal versions of Velvet Underground material, while a later tour would pander to theatrics: Reed, for example, pretended to shoot up while performing the song "Heroin." Sally Can't Dance reached the Top 10 and was repudiated by Reed almost on release. After another live LP, he followed with Metal Machine Music, four sides of grating instrumental noise, alternately considered high art worthy of RCA's classical division and a gambit to get off the label.

Reed moved to Anista in 1976 and at first made impeccably produced, harrowing music like the title cut of Street Hassle (#89, 1978). He then entered a relatively peaceful phase, typified by album titles like Rock and Roll Heart and Growing Up in Public. He married Sylvia Morales on Valentine's Day 1980, and his songs about the seamy side of life began to appear alongside paeans to suburban life—"I'm an average guy," he sang on The Blue Mask.

In the mid-'80s Reed gained more of the spotlight when a number of postpunk bands, including R.E.M., U2, and Sonic Youth, began singing his praises and vocally claiming inspiration by the Velvet Underground. The second creative wind that began with the alternately hopeful and frightening Blue Mask continued with the more accessible New Sensations (#56, 1984) and Mistrial (#47, 1986). Reed then moved to Sire, where he hit an artistic plateau with New York, Songs for Drella, and Magic and Loss. A brutal song cycle about urban decay, 1989's New York was his first Top 40 album since Sally Can't Dance.

In 1989 Reed played guitar on former Velvet Underground drummer Maureen "Moe" Tucker's solo album, Life in Exile After Abdicaton. The same year, he reunited with another fellow VU mate, John Cale, for a work-in-progress performance of Songs for Drella, a pop requiem the two wrote for their late friend and mentor, Andy Warhol, who had died three years earlier, in 1990 an album and video were released. The Velvet Underground reunited in 1993 for some well-received European dates, but again broke up bitterly before their planned U.S. performances (reportedly because Reed insisted on producing the album of the band's upcoming MTV Unplugged appearance, which was subsequently canceled). The band reunited once more in 1996, after the death of member Sterling Morrison, to be inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and perform a tribute song to the late guitarist.

Reed's 1992 album Magic and Loss (#80, 1992), a somber meditation on the process and pain of aging and death, inspired by the cancer deaths of two friends (including songwriter Doc Pomus), was considered his most inspired work since The Blue Mask. The same year, RCA released a box set of Reed's music, Between Thought and Expression, which followed a 1991 book of selected Reed lyrics of the same name.

Throughout the '80s and into the '90s, Reed showed a newfound political-activist side, appearing at the 1985 Farm Aid benefit concert, the 1986 Amnesty International Tour, and contributing to the Artists United Against Apartheid Sun City record. In 1993 he performed at an inaugural event honoring the home state of former Vice President Al Gore. Reed had also moved into acting—in the 1980 movie One Trick Pony and advertisements for Honda scooters, which used "Walk on the Wild Side," and Wim Wenders' 1993 film, Faraway, So Close.

Over the years Reed has found affinity with some of rock & roll's romantics and mythologists: Bruce Springsteen appeared uncredited on 1978's Street Hassle, and Reed inducted Dion into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame; he also cowrote songs for Kiss and Nils Lofgren. Reed's sidemen have included Jack Bruce (ex-Cream) and jazz trumpeter Don Cherry; for The Blue Mask and Legendary Hearts, he toured with an acclaimed band that included ex-Voidoids Robert Quine on guitar and Fred Maher on drums, and ex-Jean-Luc Ponty bassist Fernando Saunders; and for New York and the Magic and Loss tour, he brought along R&B crooner Little Jimmy Scott as a backup vocalist. Split from his wife Sylvia by 1994, Reed was frequently in the company of avant-garde performance artist Laurie Anderson, with whom he began improvising instrumental pieces at home.

Anderson served as an emotional influence on 1996's Set the Twilight Reeling (#110), an album that mixed romance and nostalgia amid Reed's darker interests. That same year, Reed collaborated with theatrical director Robert Wilson on the production of Time Rocker; they collaborated again in 2000 on Poe-try, based on the works of Edgar Allan Poe.

After another wait of four years between studio albums, Reed returned in 2000 with Ecstasy, which continued his commitment to minimalist rock & roll with thoughtful, if sometimes confrontational lyrics on dreams, desire, and despair. Anderson performed electric violin on two tracks, and guitarist Mike Rathke joined Reed for the raw, droning guitar pattern of the 18-minute "Like a Possum." Reed also published Pass Thru Fire—The Collected Lyrics.

The most popular college-rock band of the '80s, R.E.M. underwent a steady, decade-long rise from underground heroes to bona fide superstars. The quartet's arty mix of punk energy, folky instrumental textures, muffled vocals, and introspective, often oblique lyrics influenced a generation of alternative-rock bands. By the time of its $10 million, five-record deal with Warner Bros. in 1988, the band had gone from playing hole-in-the-wall pizza parlors to major arenas.

Army brat Michael Stipe was an introverted child who spent much of his time hanging out with sisters Lynda and Cyndy. By 1975, he had begun reading articles about Patti Smith and the burgeoning New York punk scene, and while in high school in St. Louis, he joined a short-lived punk-rock cover band. In 1978 Stipe enrolled at the University of Georgia at Athens, where he majored in painting and photography. While shopping at the local Wuxtry record shop, he met store manager Peter Buck, a native Californian and avid pop fan who shared Stipe's interest in adventurous music. Deciding to form a band, within a year, they connected with fellow students Bill Berry and Mike Mills, childhood friends from nearby Macon who had played together in various Southern rock groups. In April 1980 the four formed R.E.M. (named for the dream state "rapid eye movement") and began rehearsing in a converted church. In July the group played their first out-of-state gig in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, where they met future manager Jefferson Holt.

Though influenced by punk and the DIY aesthetic, R.E.M. developed its own energetic folk-rock style over the next year. Buck's chiming, Byrds-like guitar, together with Stipe's cryptic vocals, became the group's signature sound. In 1981 the group recorded a demo tape of original music at Mitch Easter's Drive-In Studio in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. Two songs from those sessions, "Radio Free Europe" and "Sitting Still," were released as a 7-inch single in July on the homegrown Hib-Tone label. The driving "Radio Free Europe" attracted positive notices, and in October the band returned to Easter's studio to record its first EP. R.E.M. signed with I.R.S. in 1982 and released Chronic Town to overwhelming critical praise.

The band's first full-length album, Murmur (#36, 1983), was an instant classic, containing everything its supporters had hoped for: more layers of ringing guitar, more passionately vague vocals, more atmospheric melodies, and more seductive pop hooks. It also included a new, tighter version of "Radio Free Europe." The followup, Reckoning, failed to break new ground but managed to reach #27, spawning the minor hit "So. Central Rain (I'm Sorry)" and garnering favorable reviews. The group enlisted London-based folk producer Joe Boyd (Fairport Convention, Richard Thompson) for Fables of the Reconstruction (#28, 1985), which featured a hazy, psychedelic musical setting. Lifes Rich Pageant (#21, 1986) took that experiment further, but with more of a sheen, courtesy of producer Don Gehman (John Mellencamp), who encouraged

R.E.M.: Bill Berry, Peter Buck, Michael Stipe, Mike Mills

Stipe to sing more clearly; its single was "Fall on Me," whose video was directed by Stipe. R.E.M.'s first major hit, "The One I Love" (#9, 1987), from the band's first Top 10 album, Document (#10, 1987) was a song of betrayal that was almost universally misinterpreted as a love song. The band's major-label debut, Green (#12, 1988), yielded a hit single, "Stand" (#6, 1988), that was the simplest, most hummable song of R.E.M.'s career; the album's other single, "Pop Song 89" (#86, 1988), was a minor hit that made fun of the music business. Dead Letter Office (#52, 1987) is a collection of B sides and outtakes, and Eponymous (#44, 1988) is a greatest-hits album. Following Green, R.E.M. went on a touring hiatus.

It took three years for the band to return with the highly anticipated Out of Time, which rocketed to #1, went quadruple platinum, and included "Losing My Religion" (#4, 1991) and "Shiny Happy People" (#10, 1991). The video for the former was banned in Ireland for allegedly homoerotic imagery; the latter was a duet with Kate Pierson of the B-52's. Out of Time also featured an expanded instrumental palette of horns and mandolins. The somber Automatic for the People (#2, 1992) featured string arrangements by former Led Zeppelin bassist John Paul Jones. Its hits were "Dive" (#28, 1992), "Man on the Moon" (#30, 1993), and "Everybody Hurts" (#29, 1993).

During the latter part of the '80s, R.E.M. became activists, inviting Greenpeace to set up booths at concerts and becoming involved in local Athens politics. On his own, Stipe spoke out on such issues as the environment, animal rights, and the plight of the homeless. He also ushered other artists into the public eye, including folk painter the Rev. Howard Finster, filmmaker Jim McKay (with whom he set up the film company C-00, noted for its series of public-service announcements), and edgy artist Vic Chesnutt [see entry]. Stipe also worked with rapper KRS-ONE of Boogie Down Productions and Natalie Merchant of 10,000 Maniacs. Meanwhile, Buck produced music by such artists as Kevn Kinney of Drivin' N' Cryin' and Charlie Pickett. In 1990 Buck, Berry, Mills, and singer/songwriter Warren Zevon formed a side band, Hindu Love Gods, which put out a self-titled album on Giant-Repriase.

R.E.M. returned with Monster (#1, 1994), which combined rockers featuring heavily reverberated guitars (including that of Sonic Youth's Thurston Moore on one track) and distorted or almost glam-sounding vocals, as well as the band's more traditional-sounding fare. Its first single, "What's the Frequency, Kenneth?" reached only #21, while "Bang and Blame" reached #19 and "Strange Currencies" hit #47. Soon after, the band commenced its first world tour in five years. Within two months, Berry suffered a double brain aneurysm on stage in Switzerland and underwent emergency surgery. He recovered, and the tour resumed two months later, but more medical emergencies interrupted the tour when Mills needed abdominal surgery and Stipe had surgery for a hernia. Two weeks after the tour ended, Buck came down with pneumonia.

In 1996 New Adventures in Hi-Fi (#2) was released and R.E.M. re-signed with Warner Bros. for a reported $80 million. But the new album, recorded largely on the road during sound checks, was considered a commercial disappointment. In 1997 Berry left the band after 17 years. R.E.M. chose to continue and released the moody Up (#3, 1998), recorded with drummers Barrett Martin (Screaming Trees) and Joey Waronker (Beck), along with '70s drum machines, sequencers, and tape loops.

By now Stipe was exploring work as a filmmaker, having already appeared as a '40s hermit in the 1996 film Color of a Brisk and Leaping Day. He then formed a production company, Single Cell Pictures, which enjoyed a critical success in 1999 with the surreal Being John Malkovich. Stipe released a book of photographs taken of Patti Smith on tour, while Buck began recording with an improvisational side project called Tuatara. In 1999 R.E.M. recorded the score to the Andy Kaufman biopic Man on the Moon, a title taken from the band's own tribute song to the late comedian. The movie soundtrack included a sequel to the original song, "The Great Beyond." The next year R.E.M. traveled to Vancouver to begin work on a new album, Reveal, which debuted at #6 in 2001.

The Remains/Barry and the Remains

Formed 1964, Boston, MA

Barry Tashian (b. Aug. 5, 1945, Oak Park, IL), gtr., voc.; Bill Briggs (b. Mar. 19, 1945, Battle Creek, MI), kybds., voc.; Vern Miller (b. Jan. 31, 1945, Orange, NJ), bass, voc.; Chip Damiani (b. Rudolph A. Damiani II, June 16, 1945, Waterbury, CT), drums. 1966—(- Damiani, + N.D. Smart II, drums) The Remains (Epic) 1967—(group disbands) 1998—(original group re-forms) 2000—The Remains EP (Sundazed).

Formed by Barry Tashian along with fellow Boston University students, the Remains gained a loyal Boston following on the strength of live shows, local hits, and one classic mid-'60s garage-punk single, "Don't Look Back" (no relation to the Dylan film). They soon relocated to New York City. In 1965 they opened local concerts by the Rolling Stones, and in 1966 they opened for the Beatles on that group's last U.S. tour. But after no followup hits materialized, the Remains broke up in 1967.

"Don't Look Back" is included on the Nuggets collection. Tashian briefly regrouped the band in the mid-'70s. He later backed Gram Parsons, then joined Emmylou Harris' band. In the '90s he performed and recorded in a country duo with his wife, Holly. He also wrote Ticket to Ride, a memoir about the Beatles final tour. The Remains reunited in 1998, for the Purple Weekend, a mod festival in Leon, Spain. That same year they played New York's Cavestomp! extravaganza. In 2000 they continued to perform and recorded new material in Nashville.

Renaissance

Formed 1969, Surrey, Eng.

Keith Relf (b. Mar. 23, 1943, Richmond, Eng.; d. May 14, 1976, Eng.), voc., gtr.; Jim McCarty (b. July 25, 1943, Eng.), drums; Jane Relf (b. Eng.), voc.; John Hawken (b. Eng.), kybds.; Louis Cennamo, bass.

1969—Renaissance (Elektra) 1970—(numerous early lineup changes; - K. Relf; - McCarty; - J. Relf; - Cennamo; - Hawken; + Rob Hendry, gtr.) 1971—(+ Jon Camp, bass; + John Tout, kybds.; + Terry Sullivan, perc.; + Annie Haslam, voc.) 1972—Prologue (Capitol) (- Hendry; + Michael Dunford, gtr.) 1973—Ashes Are Burning 1974—Turn of the Cards (Sire) 1975—Scheherazade and Other Stories 1976—Live at Carnegie Hall 1977—Novella 1978—A Song for All Seasons 1979—Azure d'Or 1980—(- Sullivan; - Tout; + Peter Gosling, kybds.; + Peter Barron, drums; numerous lineup changes follow) 1981—Camera Camera (I.R.S.) 1983—Time-Line 1987—(group disbands) 1990—Tale of 1001 Nights, vol. I (Sire); Tale of 1001 Nights, vol. II 1998—(group re-forms: Haslam; Dunford; Tout; Sullivan) 2000—Tuscany (Toshiba, Jap.). Annie Haslam solo: 1977—Annie in Wonderland (Sire) 1985—Still Life (Ratpack) 1989—Annie Haslam (Epic) 1995—Blessing in Disguise (One Way) 1997—Live Under Brazilian Skies (White Dove) 2000—The Dawn of Ananda; It Snows in Heaven Too.

Illusion: (J. Relf; K. Relf; McCarty; Hawken; Cennamo) 1976—(- K. Relf) 1977—Out of the Mist (Island) 1978—Illusions.

Though Keith Relf and Jim McCarty founded Renaissance shortly after leaving the Yardbirds, their reign did not last long, and the incarnation that came to some prominence in the U.S. in the mid-'70s included neither of them. In 1969 Relf and McCarty joined Relf's sister Jane and John Hawken (ex-Nashville Teens, later with Strawbs) to form an eclectic band fusing folk, jazz, and classical influences with rock. An eponymous LP on Elektra was released later in the year, but both Relf and McCarty quickly became dissatisfied with the venture. Relf and Louis Cennamo moved on to head a harderrocking band called Armageddon. (Just before Relf's death, he, Jane, and Hawken were forming Illusion, a group not unlike the original Renaissance. After Relf's death the group continued and recorded for Island.)

By the group's 1972 release, Prologue, all of the members had changed, though Keith Relf and McCarty had remained involved with Renaissance's songwriting and business affairs. The album had a pop-classical, self-consciously refined art-rock feel highlighted by John Tout's piano and Annie Haslam's clear, high-flying soprano. The lyricist was British poet Betty Thatcher, who wrote the lyrics to fit Michael Dunford's sheet music, which she would receive by mail.

Prologue got lots of U.S. FM airplay, and the group developed a strong following, particularly in New York. Before the followup, Ashes Are Burning (#171, 1973), Rob Hendry left and was replaced by songwriter/guitarist Dunford. With Turn of the Cards (#94, 1974), Renaissance switched to Sire, and its next LP (Scheherazade [#48, 1975]) featured an entire suite complete with a full orchestra. An orchestra also played on the well-received live LP, recorded on the East Coast. Though the group was making less frequent visits to the U.S. and U.K. charts, it remained a successful concert draw in Brazil, Germany, and Japan. Haslam recorded the solo Annie in Wonderland (1977), produced by Roy Wood, formerly of the Move and the Electric Light Orchestra. In the '80s Haslam, Camp, and Dunford (along with two new members) cut Camera Camera and Time-Line for I.R.S. Haslam, Gosling, and Dunford also formed the studio group Nevada.

In 1997 Dunford debuted his theatrical adaptation of Scheherazade. As of 2000, most of Renaissance's members still performed and recorded solo, with Haslam being the most active. In 2000 a reunited band issued a Japanese studio album, which coincided with numerous live archival releases. Roy Wood appeared as a guest on the record.

REO Speedwagon

Formed 1968, Champaign, IL

Terry Luttrell, voc.; Greg Philbin, bass; Gary Richrath (b. Oct. 18, 1949, Peoria, IL), gtrs.; Neal Doughty (b. July 29, 1946, Evanston, IL), kybds.; Alan Gratzner (b. Nov. 9, 1948, Syracuse, NY), drums.

1971—REO Speedwagon (Epic) (– Luttrell; + Kevin Cronin [b. Oct. 6, 1951, Evanston], voc.) 1972—REO TWO (– Cronin; + Michael Murphy, voc.) 1973—Ridin' the Storm Out 1974—Lost in a Dream 1975—This Time We Mean It (– Murphy; + Cronin) 1976—REO (– Philbin; + Bruce Hall [b. May 3, 1953, Champaign], bass) 1977—You Get What You Play For 1978—You Can Tune a Piano, But You Can't Tune a Fish 1979—Nine Lives 1980—A Decade of Rock 'n' Roll; Hi-Infidelity 1982—Good Trouble 1984—Wheels Are Turnin' 1987—Life as We Know It 1988—The Hits (– Gratzner; + Graham Lear, drums) 1990—(– Richrath; – Lear; + Bryan Hitt, drums; + Dave Amato, gtr.; + Jesse Harms, kybds.) The Earth, a Small Man, His Dog and a Chicken 1991—(– Harms) The Second Decade of Rock & Roll 1996—Building the Bridge (Castle) 1999—The Ballads (Epic/Legacy).

After more than a decade of touring and nine middling albums, this Midwestern journeyman hard-pop quintet sold over 7 million copies of Hi-Infidelity. REO Speedwagon (named after a high-speed fire engine) was formed by Neal Doughty and Alan Gratzner while both were students at the University of Illinois in 1968. They became a popular local club attraction. Irving Azoff, who later managed the Eagles and Steely Dan, handled the group in the early '70s, getting it dates opening for other popular Midwestern acts like Bob Seger and Kansas. REO and Azoff severed their relationship in 1977.

Throughout the early '70s, REO Speedwagon's records sold unspectacularly as the group continued to tour. REO went through relatively few personnel changes, the most significant being vocalist Kevin Cronin's departure in 1972 for a solo career, replacement Michael Murphy handled the singing on REO's third, fourth, and fifth LPs. Cronin then returned in 1975; his songwriting and singing would be crucial to the band's ascendance.

REO was the quintet's least successful LP, but its seventh and eighth—the live You Get What You Play For and You Can Tune a Piano, But You Can't Tune a Fish—were breakthroughs. With Cronin and Gary Richrath coproducing, REO began to develop a more distinctive sound, a mix of rock riffs and pop hooks. Tuna contained the band's first chart single, "Roll With the Changes" (#58, 1978), and was its first to sell a million copies. Nine Lives in 1979 continued in this pop-rock direction.

Hi-Infidelity in 1980 was a phenomenally successful album, climbing to #1 on the Billboard chart three separate times. Four of its singles made the Top 40: "Keep On Lovin' You" (#1, 1980), "Take It on the Run" (#5, 1981), "Don't Let Him Go" (#24, 1981), and "In Your Letter" (#20, 1981). The first two were heavy ballads, a style the group would rely upon from then on. Good Trouble (#7, 1982) was a relative disappointment, though it did contain the Top 10 single "Keep the Fire Burnin'."

REO took a two-year sabbatical before coming out with the double platinum Wheels Are Turnin' (#7, 1984), which gave the band its second #1: "Can't Fight This Feeling," a strongly melodic ballad. The band placed five more singles in the Top 20 through 1988, but its record sales gradually slackened. When Richrath—one of the band's main writers and a fiery guitar player—left in 1990, not long after drummer Gratzner's departure, REO's ability to carry on appeared in jeopardy. But Cronin, Doughty, and Bruce Hall (a member since 1976) are still at it, with ex-Ted Nugent sideman Dave Amato on guitar and drummer Bryan Hitt, formerly of Wang Chung in the Midwest especially, REO can still draw crowds. Building the Bridge (1996), however, failed to chart. In 1998 REO Speedwagon's attorneys issued a cease-and-desist letter to Royalty Records, home of the punk act REO Speedealer, which subsequently truncated its name to "Speedealer" to avoid confusion.

The Replacements

Formed 1980, Minneapolis, MN

Paul Westerberg (b. Dec. 31, 1959, Minneapolis), voc., gtr., kybds.; Bob Stinson (b. Dec. 17, 1959, Mound, MN; d. Feb. 15, 1995, Minneapolis), gtr.; Tommy Stinson (b. Oct. 6, 1966, San Diego, CA), bass; Chris Mars (b. Apr. 26, 1961, Minneapolis), drums.

1982—The Replacements Stink EP 1983—Hootenanny

1987—(- Bob Stinson) Pleased to Meet Me (+ Slim Dunlap [b. Robert Dunlap, Aug. 14, 1951, Plainview, MN], gtr.)

1989—Don't Tell a Soul 1990—All Shook Down (- Mars; + Steve Foley, drums) 1997—All for Nothing—Nothing for All (Reprise).

Chris Mars solo: 1992—Horseshoes and Hand Grenades (Smash) 1993—75% Less Fat 1995—Tenterhooks (Bar/None) 1996—Anonymous Botch.

Slim Dunlap solo: 1993—The Old New Me (Twin/Tone)

1996—Times Like This (Restless).

Tommy Stinson (with Bash & Pop): 1993—Friday Night Is Killing Me (Sire).

Tommy Stinson (with Perfect): 1996—When Squirrels Play Chicken EP (Medium Cool/Restless).

Paul Westerberg solo: 1993—14 Songs (Sire) 1996—Eventually (Reprise) 1999—Suicaine Gratification (Capitol).

Paul Westerberg as Grandpaboy: 1997—Grandpaboy EP (Soundproof/Monolith).

In the '80s the Replacements' blend of punk guitar and pop melodies garnered critical acclaim but little commercial success. Hailing from the Minneapolis home base of acts as diverse as Husker Du and Prince, the quartet was seen by its fans as generational spokesmen, Paul Westerberg's angst-ridden confessional songs cast him as a postpunk Bob Dylan and would influence such '90s stars as the Goo Goo Dolls.

The son of a Cadillac salesman, Westerberg was refused his high-school diploma for failing to show up at graduation. After taking odd jobs as a steel-mill worker and a janitor, he formed the Impediments with drummer Chris Mars, guitarist Bob Stinson, and Stinson's 12-year-old bass-playing brother, Tommy. Inspired by Westerberg's love for the Sex Pistols, the band—renaming itself the Replacements after being banned from a club for rowdy behavior—developed a raucous, drunken stage act. Bob Stinson sometimes performed in underwear or a dress, and the set list ranged from covers of Kiss and Cher to Westerberg's originals. Discovered by Peter Jesperson, cofounder of Twin/Tone Records, they signed with the indie label in 1980 and, gaining a following that nicknamed them the "Mats (for "placemats"), they put out albums that progressed from the punk assault of their first two releases to the country-tinged Hootenanny to Let It Be, a collection that placed them at the forefront of alternative-rock bands.

Notorious for their alcoholic self-destructiveness and wildly uneven concerts but celebrated for Westerberg's hook-laden and painfully honest songs, the Replacements hovered on the verge of mainstream acceptance. But even their major-label signing to Sire in 1987 didn't alter their underdog status. While Tim reflected the band's increasingly skillful musicianship and Westerberg's stylistic range, exhaustion began setting in. Bob Stinson was fired for excessive drinking in 1987, and Pleased to Meet Me was recorded as a trio. Guitarist Slim Dunlap joined in time for Don't Tell a Soul, which again delighted reviewers and even produced a single that cracked the Top 100 ("I'll Be You," #51, 1989) but sold only around 300,000 copies. The band's swan song, All

The Replacements:
Tommy Stinson,
Chris Mars, Slim Dunlap,
Paul Westerberg

Shook Down, was a Replacements record in name only, fighting what he perceived as Westerberg's dictatorial control. Mars eventually departed (Steve Foley of the Minneapolis band Things Fall Down replaced him for a subsequent tour), and the album was basically a Westerberg solo project with the other Replacements employed as occasional sidemen. Again failing to break into the mainstream, the Replacements broke up in 1991, just short of the '90s alternative explosion they helped inspire. A 1997 retrospective, the two-disc All for Nothing—Nothing for All (#143), gathered albums tracks, B sides, and rarities from the Sire years.

Contributing to the popular soundtrack to Singles, director Cameron Crowe's 1992 movie about the nascent Seattle music scene, Westerberg finally enjoyed a measure of success: in 1993 he released a solo debut, 14 Songs (#44, 1993), to mixed reviews. Eventually (#50) followed in 1996, with the introspective track "Good Day" inspired by the drug-overdose death of Bob Stinson in early 1995. After returning from a tour in '96, Westerberg was treated for depression. He left Reprise in 1997 and recorded a single and EP under the name Grandpaboy that briefly returned the singer/songwriter to an edgier, rocking sound. Westerberg then signed to Capitol for 1999's Suicaine Gratification (#104), earning his best reviews since the Replacements for more songs of intense introspection, but unspectacular sales.

The other Replacements also put out albums whose sound didn't depart greatly from their former band's. Both Dunlap and Mars released critically lauded discs. Tommy Stinson formed Bash & Pop, which released Friday Night Is Killing Me on Sire in 1993. That band eventually evolved into Perfect and recorded an EP, When Squirrels Play Chicken, in 1996 for Restless Records. A followup album was recorded, but Restless chose not to release it. Within a year, Stinson astonished Mats followers by joining the new lineup of Guns n' Roses [see entry]. He worked alongside Axl Rose on that band's long-delayed Chinese Democracy album and first appeared onstage with GNR after midnight at a 2001 New Year's Eve show in Las Vegas. As of mid-2001, Westerberg was reportedly finishing another solo album.

With Renaldo and the Loaf: 1983—Title in Limbo (Ralph).

The Residents have never identified themselves by name, nor have they ever appeared in photos without some kind of mask (usually giant eyeballs with top hats). Until 1982 they had given only one public concert—1976 at Berkeley, California—where they appeared wrapped in mummylike coverings and played behind an opaque screen. The Residents have made several surrealist short films, which, like their albums, cryptically elaborate a deliberately perverse antipop vision.

About all that is known is that there are four of them, and that they emigrated from northern Louisiana to San Francisco in the early '70s. The Residents' longtime spokesmen are Hardy Fox and Homer Flynn. The band was named when Warner Bros. sent back an anonymous tape to "Residents" at their return address. On record they use a broad sonic palette, encompassing acoustic chamberlike instrumentation, tonal and atonal quasi-jazz, electronics, noise distortion, and intentionally whiny-nasal vocals. Until the mid-'70s, their albums were available only on the mail-order Ralph label.

The jacket of their debut album originally featured a grotesque dadaesque parody of Meet the Beatles. Threatened with legal action, the Residents changed it to depict Beatle-suited figures with crawfish heads and Beatle-like names (i.e., "Paul McCrawfish," "Ringo Starrfish"). The 1976 followup, Third Reich n' Roll, depicted American Bandstand host Dick Clark as Hitler. Not Available features modern-classical suites; Eskimo purports to be an Arctic cultural documentary with its otherworldly windswept sounds and naive Eskimo chants; and Commercial Album fits 40 songs lasting a minute or less each onto one LP.

In October 1982 the Residents played five shows in San Francisco and L.A. Adhering to their "Theory of Obscurity," they were veiled and behind screens throughout the multimedia show, which included props and dancers enacting the "Mark of the Mole" storyline. The story became part of a Mole trilogy that included Mark of the Mole, The Tunes of Two Cities, and The Residents Mole Show. Meanwhile, the Residents and Ralph Records became embroiled in an internal conflict that led to the group's label hopping in the latter part of the decade.

The Residents issued a steady stream of albums through the '80s, including their American Composer Series (George & James, a collection of George Gershwin and James Brown, and Stars and Hank Forever!, a tribute to John Philip Sousa and Hank Williams), God in Three Persons, an hour-long piece about sexual compulsion and violence, and The King and Eye and Cube-E: The History of American Music in 3 E-Z Pieces, which focus on Elvis Presley and the collapse of American pop. They spent most of 1986 touring Japan. Australia, Europe, and the United States, and in 1989 took their multimedia Cube-E stage show (again with dancers and props) all over the world. At a mid-'80s tour stop in L.A., one of the band's eyeball heads was stolen from backstage, leading one member to switch to a menacing black skull mask. The weirdness continued.

The Residents issued a hodgepodge of recycled, unreleased, and live material in the '80s: Whatever Happened to Vileness Fats? revives an abandoned 1972 video project. Residue is a ranties collection; and Heaven? and Hell! compile previously released material. Freak Show is a surreal musical comparison of the Residents' own strange performances with circus freak shows. In 1994 they released the album as an interactive CD-ROM. A survey of the mysterious quartet's long career was released in 1997 as Our Tired, Our Poor, Our Huddled Masses. The band reemerged the following year to explore skewed biblical themes with Wormwood and in 1999 toured for the first time in nearly a decade.

Paul Revere and the Raiders emerged from the rock & roll scene of the Northwest to become national pop successes, trading on the enormous teenybopper appeal of ponytailed lead singer Mark Lindsay. The Raiders began in 1959 as the Downbeats, a raunchy rock & roll band. Lindsay, who worked as a delivery boy at Revere's drive-in restaurant, played saxophone and sang on raucous, honking numbers like their first record, "Like, Long Hair" (1961), an independent single heard in Portland, Oregon, and nowhere else. They changed their name in mid-1962 and started wearing pseudo-Revolutionary War costumes. Columbia signed the group after hearing an unsolicited tape, and in mid-1963 the Raiders' version of "Louie Louie" was released. Though once again popular in the Northwest, their version was beaten out across America by the Kingsmen's hit. Sometime in 1964 Lindsay left the band, in early 1965 the Raiders moved to California and began to focus on a cleaner, more pop-oriented sound. Lindsay returned shortly thereafter.

"Steppin' Out" was their first national hit single (#46, 1965), aided by the band's prominence on Dick Clark's daily television rock program, Where the Action Is. By 1967, the group was known as Paul Revere and the Raiders, featuring Mark Lindsay, which served as acknowledgment that Lindsay was cowriting most of their hits.

The group's singles during these years included "Just Like Me" (#11, 1965), "Kicks" (#4, 1966), "Hungry" (#6, 1966), "The Great Airplane Strike" (#20, 1966), "Good Thing" (#4, 1966), "Ups and Downs" (#22, 1967), and "Him or Me—What's It Gonna Be?" (#5, 1967). Despite the success, the lineup fluctuated constantly. Drake Levin was drafted in 1966 and was replaced by Jim Valley. When Levin returned from the army, he, Michael Smith, and Phil Volk formed Brotherhood, while Valley left for a solo career. Replacements included Freddy Weller (1967-73), destined for a highly successful solo career as a country singer, and Keith Allison (1968-75), a minor teen idol in his own right, mainly thanks to his many appearances as a regular on Action.

In 1969 Lindsay began to make solo records in addition to his work with the Raiders. Their success ended early in the '70s after Lindsay's "Arizona" (#10, 1970) and the band's "Indian Reservation" (#1, 1971). Lindsay quit the group in 1975, though he did rejoin Revere the following year to capitalize on America's bicentennial, with a tour and album. Since then he worked briefly in A&R, then forged a successful career singing commercials. He continues to tour the nostalgia circuit. Revere meanwhile, gigs constantly. As of 2000 his band of Raiders included longtime drummer Omar Martinez, guitarist Doug Heath, bassist Ron Foom, singer Carl Driggs, and keyboardist Daniel Krause, many of whom have been with him since the '70s. In 1985 the group returned to TV on a summer series, Rock 'N Roll Summer Action, on ABC.

Busta Rhymes

Born Trevor Smith Jr., May 20, 1972, Brooklyn, NY
1996—The Coming (Elektra) 1997—When Disaster Strikes

2000—Anarchy.

Busta Rhymes possesses one of the most recognizable vocal umbres in rap music. His West Indian-tinged lyrical flow, psychedelic garb, and endearing rambunctiousness helped turn Rhymes into a rap superhero, an urban warrior straight out of the P-Funk tradition.

The son of Jamaican immigrant, Seventh-Day Adventist parents, Rhymes got his start with the Leaders of the New School, whose debut, A Future Without a Past (#53 R&B, 1991), received some critical acclaim, especially when the boyish anthem "Case of the P.T.A." became popular on the radio and Yo! MTV Raps. Rhymes' appearance on 1992's "Scenario" (#57 pop, #42 R&B), a collaborative effort between A Tribe Called Quest and the Leaders of the New School, garnered more praise from fans and critics, motivating Rhymes to go solo. But he stayed on board for the group's second and final album, TIME: The Inner Mind's Eye—The Endless Dispute With Reality (#66 pop, #15 R&B, 1993).

Though professionally prospering, Rhymes suffered personal tragedy in 1992 when his son was born prematurely and died. This loss seemed to haunt Rhymes' music—each of his four albums mix murky prophesies of the apocalypse with bass-bumping party jams. The Coming (#6 pop, #1 R&B, 1996), Rhymes' highly anticipated solo effort, turned the Brooklyn native into an instant hip-hop luminary. "Woo Hah!! Got You All in Check" (#8 pop, #6 R&B, 1996) and "It's a Party" (#52 pop, #27 R&B, 1996) became club staples, and Rhymes soon began touring with such acts as De La Soul and Puff Daddy and the Family. When Disaster Strikes (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1997), E.L.E. (#12 pop, #2 R&B, 1999), and Anarchy (#4 pop, #1 R&B, 2000), bound together by the Armageddon motif, yielded hits like "Put Your Hands Where My Eyes Could See" (#2 R&B, 1997), "Dangerous" (#9 pop, #4

R&B, 1998), "Turn It Up [Remix]/Fire It Up" (#10 pop, #7 R&B, 1998), and "What's It Gonna Be?!" (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1999). Rhymes also made cameo appearances on a number of other artists' '90s hip-hop records.

Tutored by renowned video director Hype Williams, Rhymes codirected or directed many of his own videos, always adding his kaleidoscopic Afrocentricism. As an actor, Rhymes has appeared in a couple of John Singleton films: 1995's Higher Learning, which also featured rapper Ice Cube, and the 2000 remake of Shaft.

Charlie Rich

Born Dec. 14, 1932, Colt, AZ; died July 25, 1995, Hammond, LA
1969—Lonely Weekends (Sun) 1973—Behind Closed Doors (Epic) 1974—There Won't Be Anymore (RCA); Very Special Love Songs (Epic); The Silver Fox 1976—Greatest Hits; Silver Linings 1992—Pictures and Paintings (Sire)
1997—Feel Like Going Home: The Essential Charlie Rich (Legacy) 2000—Love Songs (Columbia).

One of the original Sun rockabilly artists, gray-haired Charlie Rich (known as the "Silver Fox") is a country-and-blues singer, songwriter, and pianist. His career was fitfully successful until his MOR country and pop crossover singles "Behind Closed Doors" and "The Most Beautiful Girl" hit in 1973.

Rich grew up listening to gospel music and learned piano from his missionary Baptist mother; he also sang in the church choir. In high school he met the woman whom he married upon graduation, and who later became his songwriting partner, Margaret Ann Rich. Rich played in dance bands and jazz combos, then spent a year studying music at Arkansas University in 1950.

He joined the air force in 1951, and while stationed in Oklahoma formed his own jazz unit and then a pop band, the Velvetones, who had their own local television show. Though Rich felt he should restrict music to weekends and support his family by farming, his wife pushed his musical aspirations and eventually got him signed to Sun Records. There he wrote songs and played sessions for Johnny Cash, Roy Orbison, and others. His third solo single, "Lonely Weekends," was a #22 hit in 1960.

Rich went to Mercury's Smash subsidiary in 1965, when "Mohair Sam" became his next Top 40 hit. He went to RCA in 1967, achieving a minor hit with "Big Boss Man," then went to Hi and finally Epic. At Epic Rich teamed with Nashville producer Billy Sherrill.

Things finally clicked when Rich covered Kenny O'Dell's "Behind Closed Doors," which went gold and reached #15 in 1973. Later that year "The Most Beautiful Girl" (by Sherrill, Norro Wilson, and Rory Bourke) hit #1, it, too, earned a gold record. The Behind Closed Doors LP went platinum. His subsequent Top 40 singles include "There Won't Be Anymore" (#18), "A Very Special Love Song" (#11), and "I Love My Friend" (#24) in 1974, and "Every Time You Touch Me (I Get High)" (#19, 1975). In 1978 Rich appeared in the Clint Eastwood film Every Which Way But Loose. His 1992 album, Pic- tures and Paintings, showed his eclecticism, including covers of Duke Ellington's "Mood Indigo" and the gospel standard "I Feel Like Going Home." Rich died in 1995, suffering a blood clot in his lungs.

Cliff Richard

Born Harry Rodger Webb, Oct. 14, 1940, Lucknow, India
 1960—Cliff Sings (ABC) 1961—Listen to Cliff 1962—It's Wonderful to Be Young (Dot) 1963—Hits From the Soundtrack of "Summer Holiday" (Epic) 1964—It's All in the Game; Cliff Richard in Spain 1965—Swinger's Paradise soundtrack 1970—His Land; Good News (Word) 1976—I'm Nearly Famous (Rocket) 1977—Every Face Tells a Story 1978—Green Light 1979—We Don't Talk Anymore (EMI America) 1980—I'm No Hero 1981—Wired for Sound 1982—Now You See Me, Now You Don't 1983—Give a Little Bit More 1987—Always Guaranteed (Striped Horse) 1988—Carols (Word) 1989—Songs of Life: Mission 89 1994—The Collection (Razor & Tie).

Over a career that spans four decades, Cliff Richard far exceeded his early billing as Britain's answer to Elvis Presley. Since 1958, he has appeared on the UK charts for a greater number of weeks than any other artist. His track record in the U.S.—a relatively paltry nine Top 40 singles—doesn't even begin to hint at his massive popularity at home, where he has charted a record 107 Top 40 singles, among them 61 Top 10 hits and 14 Number Ones.

Harry Webb's parents were British subjects in India—his father born in Burma, his mother in India—who didn't see England until 1947. Cliff Richard learned guitar and sang with skiffle bands near his Herefordshire home, and he formed a short-lived vocal group, the Quintones, with one other boy and three girls in 1957. He next joined the Dick Teague Skiffle Group, and worked for a short time as a credit-control clerk in a factory.

In 1958 he put together a backup band, the Drifters, and changed his name to Cliff Richard for the Drifters' first demo, "Laudy Miss Claudy." Late that summer the group's first release, "Move It," went to #2, and after a single television appearance and a tour, British teens embraced Richard as their first homegrown rock idol. Richard followed up with two #1s, 1959's "Living Doll" and "Travellin' Light." That year he also appeared in two films, A Sensou Charge (a.k.a. Immoral Charge) and A Touch of Hell, and the next year, Expresso Bongo. Later movies would include The Young Ones (1961), Summer Holiday (1963), and Wonderful Life (1964). Through these and a near-constant chart presence, Richard quickly became a leading teen idol, not only at home but in Australia, Germany, and elsewhere. His U.K. Top 10 hits of the period included "High Class Baby" (1958); "Travellin' Light," "Mean Streak," and "Living Doll" (1959); "Voice in the Wilderness," "Fall in Love With You," "Please Don't Tease," "Nine Times Out of Ten," and "I Love You" (1960); "Theme for a Dream," "Gee Whiz It's You," "A Girl Like You," and "When the Girl in Your Arms Is the Girl in Your Heart" (1961); "The Young Ones," "I'm Looking Out the Window" b/w "Do You Wanna Dance," "It'll Be Me," and "The Next Time" b/w "Bachelor Boy" (1962); "Summer Holiday," "Lucky Lips," "It's All in the Game," "Don't Talk to Him" (1963); "I'm the Lonely One," "Constantly," "On the Beach," "The Twelfth of Never," "I Could Easily Fall" (1964); "The Minute You're Gone," and "Wind Me Up (Let Me Go)" (1965).

The Shadows [see entry] had a few instrumental hits in England, and those singles often battled on the charts with the recordings made by the band with Richard. Meanwhile, only two of Richard's myriad early U.K. smashes made it into the U.S. Top 40: "Living Doll" (#30, 1959) and "It's All in the Game" (#25, 1964). After that, it would be another dozen years before he had his next U.S. hit. At home, however, he was among the very few young pop artists of his generation to weather and survive the rise of the British Invasion. Richard's long-held clean-cut image solidified with his announcement (at a 1966 Billy Graham crusade) that he had embraced Christianity; widespread popularity with older listeners placed Richard firmly in the British entertainment firmament. Nonetheless, fans panicked at the suggestion that he might abandon his career altogether.

As it turned out, they worried needlessly. Richard never left the charts (in fact, his first hit of 1966 was a Mick Jagger-Keith Richards song, "Blue Turns to Grey"). Although his forays into the Top 10 became less frequent, he remained a near-constant chart presence. He began recording a series of gospel albums (Good News, About That Man, His Land, Help It Along, Small Corners, Walking in the Light, It's a Small World, Hymns and Inspirational Songs, Carols, Songs of Life: Mission 89) and releasing an occasional Christmas single. Richard, who claims not to proselytize, also made a series of statements condemning premarital sex, drugs, and sundry attitudes and behaviors associated with rock stardom. In 1968 he parted with his longtime backup group the Shadows; they have since reunited on several occasions.

Richard enjoyed a handful of Top 10 British singles through the late '60s—"Visions" and "Time Drags By" (1966), "In the Country," "It's All Over," "The Day I Met Marie," and "All My Love" (1967), but his biggest hit of that era was "Congratulations," a Eurovision Song Contest contender that went to #1 in England and almost everywhere else in the world except the U.S., where it stalled at #99. He continued to release hit singles at home, among them "Goodbye Sam, Hello Samantha" (1970) and "Power to All Our Friends" (1973).

In 1976 "Devil Woman" became a Top 10 hit in the U.S., beginning an unprecedented run of hits that included "We Don't Talk Anymore," a #1 hit in the UK (his 10th) that went into the U.S. Top 10 in 1979. The following year he toured America for the first time since 1963. He was also named an officer of the Order of the British Empire (like the Beatles in 1965). In 1981 Richard's autobiography, Which One's Cliff?, was published; he claimed not to have slept with a woman in more than 16 years and also denied that he was homosexual. His other '80s U.S. hits included "Carrie" (#34, 1980), "Dreaming" (#10, 1980), "A Little in Love" (#17, 1981), a cover of Shep and the Limelites' "Daddy's Home" (#23, 1982), and "Suddenly" (#20, 1980), a duet with Olivia Newton-John from the film Xanadu.

Back at home, though, Richard remained nearly as popular as ever, and his silver show-business anniversary brought several more U.K. hits, including a duet with Phil Everly, "She Means Nothing to Me," and a six-week sold-out run at a London theater. The following year's duet with Janet Jackson, "Two to the Power of Love" (which appears on her solo album Dream Street) was not a hit. He has made a number of appearances on behalf of various charities, and his annual gospel concerts have become something of an institution. In 1986 he starred in the Dave Clark musical Time, from which he had several more U.K. hits, including the Stevie Wonder-produced "She's So Beautiful" and "Time" (#17 U.K., 1985). Also early that year he recorded a #1 U.K. version of his 1959 hit "Living Doll" with cast members of the British sitcom The Young Ones (named for the Richard hit of the same name); proceeds went to charity. With David Cassidy taking his place in Time in early 1987, Richard made a stellar return to the charts with Always Guaranteed, boasting two U.K. Top 10 singles, "My Pretty One" and "Some People." His 1988 Christmas single, "Mistletoe and Wine," became the biggest selling single of the year in the U.K. At year's end Richard claimed the #1 single, album, and video there. In 1989 his Stronger (including the Stock/Aitken/Waterman single "I Just Don't Have the Heart") joined Always Guaranteed as the two best-selling albums of his career. Later that year, his duet with Van Morrison, "Whenever God Shines His Light," hit the Top 20, while a rerecording of "Do They Know It's Christmas" (recorded with an assemblage known as Band Aid II) went to #1.

Richard kicked off his 50th-birthday year with a series of sold-out concerts, the most ambitious of which included a full-stage re-creation of the old British TV rock show on which he was given his first break, Oh Boy! He closed 1990 with the #1 U.K. Christmas song, "Saviour's Day." His 1993 The Album went to #1 almost immediately. He was knighted in 1995 for his services to charity. That year, he also released a British album, Songs From "Heathcliff," from the namesake theatrical production in which he appeared. In 1998 and 1999 Richard remained popular enough to sell out a run of 32 40th anniversary concerts at the Royal Albert Hall. He also released the U.K. album As Real as I Wanna Be. His single "The Millennium Prayer" reached #1 U.K. in 1999.

Jonathan Richman/Modern Lovers

Jonathan Richman, born 1951, Boston, MA
1976—Modern Lovers (Beserkley) 1977—Jonathan Richman

and the Modern Lovers; Rock & Roll With the Modern Lovers; Modern Lovers Live 1979—Back in Your Life 1983—Jonathan Sings! (Sire) 1985—Rockin' and Romance (Twin/Tone) 1986—It's Time for Jonathan Richman and the Modern Lovers (Upside) 1987—The Beserkley Years: The Best of Modern Lovers (Beserkley/Rhino) 1988—Modern Lovers 88 (Rounder) 1989—Jonathan Richman 1990—Jonathan Goes Country 1993—Jonathan, Te Vas a Emocionar! 1995—You Must Ask the Heart 1996—Surrender to Jonathan (Vapor) 1998—I'm So Confused.

Jonathan Richman is easily one of rock's quirkiest figures. He dreams up songs like "I'm a Little Aeroplane" or "Ice Cream Man," and croons them in a heartfelt tone of boyish wonder. Those neo-nursery rhymes are far removed from the singer/songwriter/guitarist's early days with the original, garage-rock incarnation of the Modern Lovers, the group he formed in New England.

The Lovers—who also featured Jerry Harrison and Dave Robinson, who later joined the Talking Heads and the Cars, respectively—were inspired by the Velvet Underground and wrote songs like "Roadrunner," "Pablo Picasso," and "Hospital." But Richman's tolerance for loud music decreased, and he began to tone down the Modern Lovers, when Dave Robinson's drum kit was reduced to a single snare drum covered with a towel, he quit. The group also had run-ins with its record company, Warner Bros., and disbanded in 1972. Richman formed a new, completely acoustic Modern Lovers (with guitarist Leroy Radcliffe, bassist Greg "Curly" Kerenan, and drummer D. Sharp), and went on to cut a series of albums for the independent Beserkley label (including the 1976 release Modern Lovers, an anthology of Warner demos from the early '70s).

In 1977 Richman's instrumental tune "Egyptian Reggae"—taken from Rock & Roll with the Modern Lovers—became a hit in England, Holland, and Germany, where he enjoys large cult followings. In 1978 Richman broke up the acoustic Modern Lovers and became a solo act. A period of self-imposed obscurity in New England was broken in 1980, when Richman began touring fairly regularly. He continues to play frequently, usually backed by ex-Giant Sand drummer Tommy Larkins.

In 1993 he demonstrated his growing interest in Latin culture by recording Jonathan, Te Vas a Emocionar! entirely in Spanish. In 1996 he signed to Neil Young's Vapor label, which issued Surrender to Jonathan. The album featured a new version of "Egyptian Reggae," song titles like "I Was Dancing in the Lesbian Bar," and bigger, busier arrangements. Richman, whose '90s cult grew thanks to his appearances on NBC's Late Night With Conan O'Brien, also made a cameo in the Farrelly Brothers' 1996 comedy Kingpin. He played a loopy singing narrator in their next film, 1998's blockbuster There's Something About Mary. Several of his tunes appeared on the soundtrack. Ric Ocasek produced Richman's next studio effort, 1999's I'm So Confused. While Jonathan Richman has yet to achieve mass acceptance, he is notable for his sheer unpredictability and artistic risk-taking.

Bill Medley solo: 1971—A Song for You (A&M) 1973—Smile 1978—Another Beginning (United Artists) 1980—Sweet Thunder (Liberty) 1982—Right Here and Now (Planet) 1984—I Still Do (RCA) 1985—Still Hung Up on You 1991—Blue-Eyed Singer (Curb) 1993—Going Home (Essential) 1996—Christmas Memories (Rocktopia) 1997—Almost Home.

Bill Medley and Bobby Hatfield's close-harmony ballads came to exemplify so-called blue-eyed (i.e., white) soul. Medley and Hatfield met when both were performing with the Paramours; they broke off to form a duo in 1962. They became the Righteous Brothers reportedly after a black fan referred to them as "righteous," a popular slang term at the time. In 1963 they had a hit on Moonglow Records with "Little Latin Lupe Lu" (#49).

Phil Spector signed them to his Phillies Records in 1964. There they cut "You've Lost That Lovin' Feelin'." The Barry Mann—Cynthia Weil—Phil Spector song went to #1 pop, #3 R&B, and was successfully revived by Hall and Oates in 1980. Spector had other significant hits with the Righteous Brothers—"Unchained Melody" (#4 pop, #3 R&B, 1965), "Ebb Tide" (#5, 1965), and "Just Once in My Life" (#9, 1965)—before the duo moved to Verve Records in 1966. That year a Mann-Weil song, "(You're My) Soul and Inspiration," went to #1 pop, #13 R&B for Medley and Hatfield. In that time, the duo was also a regular act on the weekly rock TV show Shindig!

In 1968 the Brothers broke up, and Medley recorded solo. Hatfield kept the duo's name and performed with Jimmy Walker. That year Medley had two minor chart singles on his own, "Brown Eyed Woman" (#43) and "Peace Brother Peace" (#48), on MGM Records.

In 1974 Medley and Hatfield reunited to record a tribute to dead rock stars, "Rock and Roll Heaven" (#3), and scored two more hits: "Give It to the People" (#20) and "Dream On" (#32). Medley then retired for five years following the 1976 murder of his first wife, Karen. The duo did appear on an American Bandstand anniversary television special in 1981, where they performed a substantially reworked version of "Rock and Roll Heaven" as a tribute to John Lennon. Medley signed with Planet Records in 1982 and released Right Here and Now, produced by Richard Perry and featuring a title track by Barry Mann and Cynthia Weil. In 1983 Medley and Hatfield toured together again, as they have continued to do on and off through the years.

The duo returned to the charts in 1990 when "Unchained

Melody" found a new audience through its inclusion in the Ghost soundtrack; the song went platinum in rerelease. In 1987 Medley's Dirty Dancing duet with Jennifer Warnes, "(I've Had) The Time of My Life," won a Grammy and went to #1. In 1993 Medley recorded a new version of "(You're My) Soul and Inspiration" with singer Darlene Love, who, in 1966, had sung background vocals on the Righteous Brothers' original version of the hit. The 1990 Curb anthology was certified platinum.

Billy Lee Riley

Born Oct. 5, 1933, Pochontas, AR

1977—Billy Lee Riley EP (Charly) 1978—Legendary Sun Performers: Sun Sounds Special 1994—Blue Collar Blues (Hightone) 1997—Hot Damn! (Capricorn) 2000—Shade Tree Blues (Sun-Up).

Billy Lee Riley is arguably among the most important of the original rockabillys, an artist whose behind-the-scenes contributions as a Sun Records sessionman and unique recording legacy have earned him the respect of self-proclaimed fans such as Bob Dylan.

The son of a sharecropper, Riley learned to play guitar from the black farmworkers he grew up among. An adept multi-instrumentalist on guitar, harmonica, piano, and drums, Riley first recorded as a solo artist for a local Memphis label in 1955. Impressed, Sun Studios owner Sam Phillips signed Riley, and by 1955 he was playing behind label mates Jerry Lee Lewis, Johnny Cash, Roy Orbison, Charlie Rich, and Bill Justis. With guitarist Roland Janes and drummer J.M. Van Eaton, Riley cut a string of rockabilly sides that were simply unlike anything anyone had ever heard before: "Red Hot" and "Flying Saucer Rock 'n' Roll." The former featured what at the time were daring lyrics ("my gal is red hot / your gal ain't doodly squat!"), while in the latter Riley breathlessly enthused about an encounter with little green men who brought "rock & roll all the way from Mars." (Both tunes were revived in 1978 by Robert Gordon and Link Wray.)

The success of "Flying Saucer" gave Riley a brief solo career—Van Eaton and Janes became the Little Green Men—but despite his good looks and wild stage moves, he was soon back in the Sun studio band. In 1962 Riley moved to L.A., where he worked steadily as a session musician on recordings by Herb Alpert, Dean Martin, the Beach Boys, Rick Nelson, Pearl Bailey, and many others. By the early '70s, he had tired of music and quit to begin his own construction and decorating business back in his native Arkansas. Word of his 1979 performance in Memphis spread through rockabilly circles worldwide, and before long Riley was back out on the road throughout Europe and England, where rockabilly commands a large, loyal following.

Although Riley released albums overseas through the years, no new material was issued in the U.S. until 1994's Blue Collar Blues. The critically acclaimed collection was recorded in the old Sun studios and brought together Riley with Van Eaton and Janes, as well as saxophonist Ace Cannon. Hot Damn! (1997) and Shade Tree Blues (2000) were rootsier, bluesier affairs.

Jeannie C. Riley

Born Jeanne Carolyn Stephenson, Oct. 19, 1945, Anson, TX
1968—Harper Valley PTA (Plantation) 1969—Yearbooks and Yesterdays; Things Go Better With Love 1970—Country Girl; Generation Gap 1991—Here's Jeannie C. (Playback)
1995—Praise Him.

In 1968 Jeannie C. Riley was working as a secretary in Nashville, still trying to get her career as a country singer off the ground. Everything changed when her recording of "Harper Valley PTA" hit #1 on both the pop and country charts, selling 5.5 million copies globally, though in the long run it did more for its author, Tom T. Hall, than it did for Riley. She did, however, win that year's Grammy for Best Female Country Vocal Performance.

Subsequent singles—"The Girl Most Likely," "There Never Was a Time," and "Good Enough to Be Your Wife"—hit the country & western Top 10, but reached only the lower regions of the pop chart. She had C&W hits through 1974. "Harper Valley PTA," on the other hand, made an impression so lasting that it inspired a film and a short-lived spinoff TV series, starring Barbara Eden, 13 years after its release. The success took its toll on Riley personally, and divorce from her childhood-sweetheart husband, Mickey Riley, as well as problems with alcohol followed. In 1976 Riley reemerged, remarried to Mickey and born again. She has continued to record religious material. In 1986 she released "Return to Harper Valley."

Minnie Riperton

Born Nov. 8, 1947, Chicago, IL; died July 12, 1979, Los Angeles, CA
1970—Come to My Garden (Janus) 1974—Perfect Angel (Epic) 1975—Adventures in Paradise 1977—Stay in Love 1979—Minnie (Capitol) 1980—Love Lives Forever 1997—Her Chess Years (Chess).
With Rotary Connection: 1968—Rotary Connection (Cadet Concept); Aladdin; Peace 1969—Songs 1970—Dinner Music 1971—Hey Love.

Singer Minnie Riperton's angelic five-octave voice made her one of pop's most distinctive singers. After studying opera as a child, Riperton decided she wanted a career in pop music when she reached her teens. She got a job as a receptionist at Chess Records. There she joined a vocal group called the Gems, who sang backup behind Fontella Bass, Etta James, and other Chess acts. In 1967 she sang with a black psychedelic pop band, Rotary Connection, that cut six albums.

"Amen" from their 1967 debut album was an FM staple for many years, as was their version of the Rolling Stones' "Rudy Tuesday."

Riperton left the Rotary Connection in 1970 and that year recorded an unsuccessful solo album for Janus, Come to My Garden. She sang with Stevie Wonder's backup band Wonderlove before signing with Epic Records in 1974. Perfect Angel, which featured two tracks coproduced by Wonder, was her most successful album. It was certified gold and contained Wonder's "Lovin' You" (#1 pop, #3 R&B, 1975). In 1976 Riperton underwent a mastectomy and then became a spokeswoman for the American Cancer Society. Two years later she moved to Capitol Records, where she recorded her last album, Minnie. Her condition gradually worsened, and she died of cancer in L.A. Love Lives Forever is a posthumous collection consisting of previously unreleased vocal tracks with completely new backing.

Johnny Rivers

Born John Ramistella, Nov. 7, 1942, New York, NY
1964—Johnny Rivers at the Whisky a Go Go (Imperial); Here We a Go Go Again! 1965—Meanwhile Back at the Whisky a Go Go 1966—Johnny Rivers' Golden Hits 1967—Changes; Rewind 1968—Realization 1969—A Touch of Gold 1970—Slim Slo Slider 1972—L.A. Reggae (United Artists) 1973—Homegrown 1974—Last Boogie in Paris 1978—Outside Help (Soul City) 1980—Borrowed Time (RSO) 1991—Johnny Rivers: Anthology (1964–1977) (Rhino) 1998—Last Train to Memphis (Soul City).

In addition to Johnny Rivers' major achievements behind the scenes (discovering talent like the Fifth Dimension and Jimmy Webb, bringing together top studio musicians as a regular band), his own records have sold over 30 million copies. John Ramistella's family moved to Baton Rouge, Louisiana, when he was a small child. He began playing guitar at age eight, and by 13 had joined bands. On a summer trip to New York he met disc jockey Alan Freed, who changed Ramistella to Rivers and got him a contract with Gone Records. Nothing happened, though, and Rivers concentrated on songwriting in New York and L.A. One song, "I'll Make Believe," was recorded by Rick Nelson.

In 1963 Rivers landed a gig at the new Whisky-a-Go-Go on the Sunset Strip. He soon became the club's regular star attraction and, drawing a star-packed audience, made the Whisky L.A.'s hippest nightclub. Rivers' 1964 debut Imperial LP, Johnny Rivers at the Whisky a Go Go (#12, 1964), yielded the #2 hit "Memphis." He recorded other live Whisky LPs over the years. His hits throughout the '60s were usually covers and included "Seventh Son" (#7, 1965), a songwriting collaboration with Lou Adler entitled "Poor Side of Town" (#1, 1966), "Secret Agent Man" (#3, 1966), and two Motown covers, "Baby I Need Your Lovin'" (#3, 1967) and "The Tracks of My Tears" (#10, 1967). He covered Van Morrison's "Into the Mystic" in 1970.

In 1966 Rivers was approached by manager Marc Gordon with a group called the Hi-Fis, previously the Versatiles. Rivers liked them, renamed them the Fifth Dimension, signed them to his newly established record company, Soul City, and linked the group with his friend, songwriter Jimmy Webb. Rivers played guitar on the Fifth Dimension's records and organized a regular band of studio musicians, including Hal Blaine (drums), Larry Knechtel (keyboards), and Joe Osborn (bass).

He continued to enjoy chart success as a performer in the '70s with a remake of Huey "Piano" Smith's '50s hit "Rockin' Pneumonia and the Boogie Woogie Flu" (#6, 1972) and the gold "Swayin' to the Music (Slow Dancin')" (#10, 1977). In 1975 he coaxed Brian Wilson out of retirement to do backups on his version of the Beach Boys' "Help Me Rhonda" (#22). Through the years, Rivers has successfully run his own song-publishing business and record company. He continues to perform. On Soul City Records, he released the all-new Last Train to Memphis in 1998.

Rob Base & D.J. E-Z Rock

Rob Base (b. Robert Ginyard, May 18, 1967, New York), voc.; D.J. E-Z Rock (b. Rodney Bryce, June 29, 1967, New York), DJ. 1988—It Takes Two (Profile) 1994—Break of Dawn (Funky Base).

Rob Base solo: 1989—The Incredible Base (Profile).

Robert Ginyard and Rodney "Skip" Bryce began their career together in Harlem in a fifth-grade rap group called Sureshot Seven. Eventually the group boiled down to the two of them, and as Rob Base & D.J. E-Z Rock, they recorded a couple of singles that failed to hit. Then their track "It Takes Two" (#36 pop, #17 R&B) became a hit the summer of 1988, rising from the underground to pop radio. The song succeeded on the basis of Base's smooth, easy rap and particularly its simple yet memorable backing track, it featured samples of Lyn Collins' 1972 single "Think (About It)" and Strafe's club hit "Set It Off"

It Takes Two (#31, 1988) went platinum and included "Get on the Dance Floor" and "Joy and Pain." The latter featured vocals by young soul singer Omar Chandler and was lyrically based on an old hit by Maze, whose Frankie Beverly sued Base and E-Z Rock for copyright infringement.

Base went solo for a while on the gold-selling The Incredible Base (#50 pop, #20 R&B, 1989). The track "Rumors" addressed several false stories circulating about Base—that he'd fathered illegitimate kids and that he'd died from smoking crack, among others. The duo reunited for 1994's Break of Dawn, released on their own Funky Base label. Base and E-Z Rock have since embarked on a couple of nationwide tours and put out a pair of singles, including "Diamonds" (2000), on the New York-based Rampage label.

Soon after his debut with the Miracles, Smokey Robinson became known as one of the premier songwriter/singers in pop music. Bob Dylan called him "America's greatest living poet," and in 1987 ABC's Martin Fry sang that "Everything's good in the world tonight / When Smokey sings," and few would disagree with either. As a writer of love songs, Robinson is peerless: From the straightforward, timeless "My Girl" to the elaborately constructed, metaphor-driven "The Hunter Gets Captured by the Game," "Let Me Be the Time (on the Clock of Your Heart)," and "The Way You Do the Things You Do," he explored every aspect of romantic love. Whether making an elegant declaration of passion ("More Love"), pleading forgiveness ("Ooh Baby Baby"), or musing at love's paradoxical nature ("Ain't That Peculiar," "Choosey Beggar"), Robinson's best songs showed a rare mastery of the pop form. His delicate yet emotionally powerful falsetto is among the most romantic in pop.

In addition, Smokey Robinson made major contributions to the success of Motown, a fact acknowledged by label founder Berry Gordy Jr., when he surprised the singer with a corporate-vice president title in 1961. In addition to providing the label with 27 Top 40 hits with the Miracles, he also wrote, cowrote, or produced some of Motown's biggest hits (the Temptations' "My Girl," Mary Wells' hits) as well as some of its lesser known but more adventurous releases (like the Four Tops' "Still Water [Love]," the Supremes' "Floy Joy").

Robinson founded the Miracles—all Detroit-born—while attending that city's Northern High School. As the Matadors, they played locally, usually performing Robinson originals. In 1957 they met Berry Gordy Jr. while they were auditioning for Jackie Wilson's manager Gordy, who had written songs for Wilson, was impressed not only by their presentation but by Smokey's prodigious songwriting. "Got a Job," an answer to the #1 hit "Get a Job" by the Silhouettes, attracted local attention in 1958. In 1959 "Bad Girl" was distributed locally by Motown and nationally by Chicago's Chess Records. It hit #93 on the pop chart and convinced Berry Gordy Jr. to expand his fledgling record company into one that would produce and distribute its own product rather than creating records to lease out to others. In 1960 "Shop Around" established both the group and the company when it went to #1 R&B, #2 pop. Its B side was the oft-covered soul ballad "Who's Lovin' You." This marked the beginning of Smokey and Gordy's relationship. According to one Motown history, when Gordy met Smokey, the young songwriter had hundreds of finished and unfinished song lyrics in notebooks, and it was Gordy who trained him to distinguish which were the best among them.

Throughout the '60s, Robinson wrote songs for and produced many other Motown acts, including the Marvelettes ("Don't Mess with Bill," "The Hunter Gets Captured by the Game," and "My Baby Must Be a Magician"); Marvin Gaye ("I'll Be Doggone," with Warren Moore and Marvin Tarplin; "Ain't That Peculiar," with Moore); Mary Wells ("My Guy," "The One Who Really Loves You," and "You Beat Me to the Punch," with Ronald White); and the Temptations ("Get Ready," "Don't Look Back," and "My Girl," with White; "The Way You Do the Things You Do," with Bobby Rogers; "It's Growing," with Moore).

Smokey Robinson and the Miracles: Pete Moore, Ronnie White, Smokey Robinson, Bobby Rogers

Though the Miracles made numerous uptempo singles such as "Mickey's Monkey" (#8 pop, #3 R&B) in 1963 and "Going to a Go-Go" (#11 pop, #2 R&B) in 1966, they are best known for their ballads, including "You've Really Got a Hold on Me" (#8 pop, #1 R&B, 1963), "Ooo Baby Baby" (#16 pop, #4 R&B, 1965), "The Tracks of My Tears" (#16 pop, #2 R&B, 1965), "More Love" (#23 pop, #5 R&B, 1967—by which time they had become Smokey Robinson and the Miracles), "I Second That Emotion" (#4 pop, #1 R&B, 1967), and "Baby, Baby Don't Cry" (#8 pop, #3 R&B, 1969). Their last big hit together was the uptempo "The Tears of a Clown," a #1 hit on both the R&B and pop charts, and in England, in 1970. A great deal of their work in these years featured Marv Tarplin on guitar; he even appeared on a few album covers as if he were a Miracle.

In 1972 Robinson left the group to record on his own and to spend more time with his wife, Claudette (Bobby Rogers' sister, and a Miracle until 1964, though she continued to sing on the group's records). Claudette had toured with the group until a series of miscarriages forced her off the road in the mid-'60s. Robinson wrote "More Love" for Claudette after one of their babies was lost. Their first child, Berry William (named after Gordy), was born in 1968; their daughter Tamla (named for the label) followed. The couple divorced in 1985.

Robinson continued in his duties as a Motown vice president. He also worked frequently with Tarplin, who, after a few years with the Miracles, rejoined Robinson. A Quiet Storm (1975) is regarded as his best early solo album. (Its title was eventually used to name a smooth subgenre of modern R&B that developed in the 1990s.) While Smokey has always been a popular concert attraction, his record sales during the '70s fluctuated. It wasn't until 1979's "Cruisin'" (#4 pop, #4 R&B) that Robinson again enjoyed mass success. His #1 R&B single "Being With You" (#2 pop) in 1981 continued his performing comeback, but in the ensuing years, he has placed just two more singles in the pop Top 10 (1987's "Just to See Her" and "One Heartbeat") and one LP in the Top 40 (One Heartbeat, which is gold). Despite rampant defections from the label through the '70s and '80s, Robinson did not leave Motown until 1990 (he had resigned his vice presidency there in 1988). He returned to the label in the late '90s and released Intimate (#134 pop, #28 R&B, 1999). In his 1989 autobiography, Smokey Inside My Life (cowritten with David Ritz), Robinson openly discussed his marital infidelities and a mid-'80s addiction to cocaine.

Among the artists who have covered Robinson's songs are the Beatles ("You've Really Got a Hold on Me"), the Rolling Stones ("Going to a Go-Go"), Terence Trent D'Arby ("Who's Lovin' You"), Johnny Rivers ("The Tracks of My Tears"), Blondie ("The Hunter Gets Captured by the Game"), Linda Ronstadt ("Ooo Baby Baby," "The Tracks of My Tears"), Kim Carnes ("More Love"), Rare Earth ("Get Ready"), the English Beat ("The Tears of a Clown"), Rita Coolidge ("The Way You Do the Things You Do"), and Luther Vandross ("Since I Lost My Baby"). He has received the Grammys' Living Legend Award and was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame with the Miracles in 1987. In 1999 he received a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award. The following year he became the host of Intimate With Smokey Robinson, a two-hour program of love songs and call-ins on the L.A. oldies station Mega 92.3.

After Robinson made his final concert appearance with the group in July 1972, the Miracles continued with lead vocalist Billy Griffin. While they kept charting through 1978, only three singles had significant chart status: "Do It Baby" (#13 pop, #14 R&B) and "Don't Cha Love It" (#4 R&B) in 1974, and their early-1976 #1 pop hit "Love Machine (Part 1)" (#5 R&B). Billy Griffin was replaced by his brother Donald, but the Miracles disbanded in the late '70s. They have reappeared in concert and on records, sometimes including Claudette Robinson. White died of leukemia in 1995.

The Tom Robinson Band/Sector 27

Formed 1977, England

Tom Robinson (b. ca. 1951, Cambridge, Eng.), bass, voc.; Danny Kustow, gtr., voc.; Mark Ambler, organ, piano; Brian "Dolphin" Taylor, drums.

1978—Power in the Darkness (Harvest) (– Taylor; – Ambler; + Nick Plytas, kybds.; – Plytas; + Ian "Quince" Parker, kybds.; + Preston Heyman [b. U.S.], drums) 1979—TRB Two (group disbanded).

Sector 27, formed late 1979: Robinson, voc., gtr.; Jo Burt, bass; Steve B., gtr.; Derek Quinton, drums, perc.

1980—Sector 27 (I.R.S.) (group disbanded).

Tom Robinson solo: 1982—North by Northwest (I.R.S.)

1984—Hope and Glory (Geffen, U.K.) 1994—Love Over Rage (Scarface) 1996—Having It Both Ways (Cooking Vinyl, U.K.).

Singer/songwriter Tom Robinson—one of rock's first openly gay performers—is also noteworthy for using his records to treat his sexual preference as a political issue (e.g., his song "Glad to Be Gay"). He first attracted public attention during the early days of British punk in 1977. The Tom Robinson Band, like the early Clash, played rousing battle-cry rock & roll.

Robinson claimed he was first drawn to rock & roll as an angry counterpoint to his father's love of classical music. At 17 Robinson was shipped off to Finchden Manor, a home for "maladjusted boys." In his six years there, he met guitarist Danny Kustow, and the two became friendly. He left for London in 1973, and there formed Cafe Society, a cabaret, folk-harmony band, with two old friends, Herewood Kaye and Raphael Doyle. Ray Davies signed them to his Konk label in 1973 and produced their one album in 1975. (Robinson and Davies had a falling out, later obliquely chronicled in "Don't Take No for an Answer" on TRB's debut.)

In 1976 Robinson left Cafe Society, and he formed the Tom Robinson Band in January 1977. In October TRB's "2-4-6-8-Motorway" went to #5 in the U.K. The band became press darlings in England, especially after the Rising Free EP in early 1978, which included "Glad to Be Gay." That press at-ention was soon repeated in the U.S., leading to the release of the band's American debut, Power in the Darkness. "Glad to Be Gay" got nearly as much radio play on the big-city U.S. stations as "2-4-6-8-Motorway." Robinson also plugged Rock Against Racism on the back of the album cover and included the New York and L.A. gay switchboard numbers on the inner sleeve of the U.S. version.

The band went through some personnel changes before its second LP, which was produced by Todd Rundgren. Despite several U.S. tours, neither LP sold well. The album was poorly received in England also, and Robinson began to feel that TRB's style was no longer fresh, so he broke up the group in July 1979. Earlier that year, Robinson had written a few songs with Elton John, including one for Gay Pride Week. A collaboration with Peter Gabriel, "Bully for You," appeared on TRB Two and was a minor hit in England.

Robinson's new band, Sector 27, appeared later in the year, influenced by the harsher wave of postpunk groups like Gang of Four, early XTC, and the Cure. Robinson toured England and then the U.S. in summer 1980. The self-titled LP got good reviews but failed to sell, and Sector 27 fell apart. Robinson moved to Berlin, Germany, working with alternative-cabaret and theater groups. In mid-1982 he resurfaced with a solo record, North by Northwest. A 1983 single, "War Baby," cracked the U.K. Top 10. Robinson's subsequent releases were U.K.-only. Hope and Glory yielded a minor U.K. hit in a cover of Steely Dan's "Rikki Don't Lose That Number." Robinson regrouped the original TRB for two mid-'80s English albums that sold unexceptionally and were dismissed by U.K. critics as nostalgia-mongering.

He continued performing into the '90s, and released Love Over Rage, his first U.S. album in a decade. Although he still identifies himself as gay, he also publicly revealed that he has a relationship with a woman, with whom he has a son. The U.K.-only Having It Both Ways contains the memorable track "The Artist Formerly Known as Gay." In 1997 Robinson formed his own Castaway Northwest Records, which reissued his back catalogue. He has also done extensive radio work; in the '90s he was the host of Locker Room, a BBC program about men. In 1997 he won a Sony Radio Award for the BBC GLR program You've Got to Hide Your Love Away. He remains highly outspoken on a range of issues, including gay rights, AIDS, and the treatment of Native Americans.

The Roches

Maggie Roche (b. Oct. 26, 1951, Detroit, MI), voc., gtr.; Terre Roche (b. Apr. 10, 1953, New York), voc., gtr.

1975—Seductive Reasoning (Columbia) 1976—(+ Suzzy Roche [b. Sep. 29, 1956, Bronxville, NY], voc., gtr. 1979—The Roches (Warner Bros.) 1980—Nurds 1982—Keep On Doing 1985—Another World 1987—No Trespassing (Rhino) 1989—Speak (MCA) 1990—We Three Kings (MCA/Paradox) 1992—A Dove (MCA) 1994—Will You Be My Friend? (Baby Boom) 1995—Can We Go Home Now? (Rykodisc).

Suzzy Roche solo: 1997—Holy Smokes (Redhouse) 2000—Songs From an Unmarried Housewife and Mother, Greenwich Village, USA.

Terre Roche solo: 1998—The Sound of a Tree Falling (Earth Rock Wreckers).

By the time their critically acclaimed debut album as a three-piece band was released, the Roche sisters had been singing together for years. Maggie and Terre had previously recorded as a duo; the trio lineup had performed in New York clubs. With Suzzy's sweet-and-sour voice, Terre's pliant upper register, and Maggie's near bantone, they came out of New York's folk, feminist, and bohemian traditions, mingling barbershop quartet, Irish traditional, Andrews Sisters, doo-wop, and other vocal-group styles in songs—mostly by Maggie—full of wordplay and unexpected twists. Onstage the sisters invariably wore an eccentric array of thrift-shop clothes and sporting gear.

Maggie and Terre began singing professionally in the late '60s. Maggie dropped out of Bard College and Terre left high school in order to accommodate tour schedules. In 1970 they met Paul Simon, and in 1972 they sang backup harmonies on his There Goes Rhymin' Simon. Simon's lawyer got the duo a contract with Columbia, which resulted in Seductive Reasoning, an album that went largely unnoticed. Maggie and Terre retreated to a friend's temple in Hammond, Louisiana, but eventually drifted back north, performing again for the first time in June 1976 at the Women's Music Festival in Champaign, Illinois. Within a few months Suzzy, who'd been attending the State University of New York in Purchase, joined them, and they became fixtures in Greenwich Village folk clubs.

After amassing local critical raves, they recorded together under the eye of producer Robert Fripp. The Roches sold 200,000 copies and contained "The Married Men" (later covered by Phoebe Snow) but failed to yield a hit. Terre sang on Fripp's 1979 solo LP Exposure and the trio sang backup for Loudon Wainwright III's "Golfin' Blues." In 1980, augmented with the rhythm section of ex-Television bassist Fred Smith and Patti Smith drummer Jay Dee Daugherty, they recorded Nurds. In mid-1982 Fripp produced their third album, Keep On Doing, a primarily acoustic album that nevertheless featured members of King Crimson. Another World used a full rock-styled sound, but again failed to sell well.

The Roches then moved to MCA, where Speak was another commercial failure. We Three Kings was a Christmas album, while A Dove returned to the trio's typically playful, audaciously harmonized tunes (including "The Ing Song," every word of which ends in "ing"). The children's record Will You Be My Friend? was released independently.

The Roches have also written and recorded music for various theater and television shows, and such films as Crossing Delancey and the animated feature The Land Before Time II. They also appeared on albums by the Indigo Girls, Was (Not Was), and country singer Kathy Mattea. Steven Spielberg used the siblings to voice animated cockroach sisters in his '90s cartoon TV series Tiny Toons.

After the 1995 release of Can We Go Home Now?, the Roches split up. Suzzy went solo and released two albums. Terre formed a 12-piece band called Terre Roche and Her Mood Swings, which included her soul mate, Gary Dial, on piano. She self-released her solo debut in 1998. As of 2001 she was spending most of her time teaching music to beginners in New York.

Rockpile

Formed 1976, London, Eng.

Dave Edmunds (b. Apr. 15, 1944, Cardiff, Wales), voc., gtr.; Nick Lowe (b. Mar. 25, 1949, Woodbridge, Eng.), voc., bass; Terry Williams (b. 1948), drums; Billy Bremner (b. 1947, Scot.), gtr., voc.

1980—Seconds of Pleasure (Columbia).

Dave Edmunds solo: see entry.

Nick Lowe solo: see entry.

Billy Bremner solo: 1984—Bash (Arista, U.K.)

Though it recorded only one album under the name Rockpile, this band had made four previous U.S. tours, and its members had appeared on most solo LPs by the group's best-known members: Nick Lowe [see entry] (who specializes in ironic pop) and Dave Edmunds [see entry] (known for his revitalized rockabilly).

Ex-Love Sculpture guitarist Edmunds called his first solo album Rockpile (1972), and his band, which toured to support that album, was also christened Rockpile, though the only member of the more recent group was drummer Terry Williams, who'd filled in on one of Love Sculpture's U.S. tours. Williams had also played with Deke Leonard and Martin Ace, whom he later joined in Man.

This initial Rockpile helped kick off England's pub-rock movement, which included other no-frills groups like Ducks Deluxe and Brinsley Schwarz. Nick Lowe of the Schwarz band met Williams and Edmunds on the pub circuit, and Edmunds produced the final Brinsley LP in 1974. On Edmunds' next solo LP, 1975's Subtle As a Flying Mallet. Lowe played and contributed songs.

In mid-1976 Rockpile solidified its new lineup for a brief American tour with Bad Company, rounded out by Billy Bremner, a sessionman who'd backed everyone from Duane Eddy to Lulu. The group's sets offered a furiously paced mixture of Lowe's tuneful ditties and Edmunds' more rocking outbursts. In 1980 the band's two leaders were both signed to the same label, and Rockpile released its one and only LP (#27), which included an EP of Lowe and Edmunds duetting on Everly Brothers tunes. Rockpile toured the U.S. that winter, but in February of 1981 it had a bitter split. Edmunds and Lowe resumed their recording and production careers, while Williams went on to play with Dire Straits. In 1982 Bremner was a temporary replacement for the late James Honeyman-Scott in the Pretenders, but he then rejoined Edmunds' band. Most recently he has become a Nashville session musician. On his Nick the Knife, Lowe took a shot at Edmunds in "Stick It Where the Sun Don't Shine," but the two ended their estrangement in the late '80s, and Edmunds produced Lowe's Pinker and Prouder Than Previous and Party of One.

Jimmie Rodgers

Born Sep. 8, 1897, Meridian, MS; died May 26, 1933, New York, NY

1962—Country Music Hall of Fame (RCA) 1965—Best of the Legendary Jimmie Rodgers 1975—My Rough and Rowdy Ways 1978—A Legendary Performer (RCA) 1991—First Sessions, 1927–1928 (Rounder); The Early Years, 1928–1929; On the Way Up, 1929; Riding High, 1929–1930; America's Blue Yodeler, 1930–1931; Down the Old Road, 1931–1932; No Hard Times, 1932; Last Sessions, 1933.

Though his recording career only lasted seven years (from 1927 until his death in 1933), Jimmie Rodgers established himself as the father of modern country music, mixing black blues with folk and traditional hillbilly country.

Rodgers first played the guitar and banjo while working as a water carrier on the M&O Railroad, where he picked up blues influences from black fellow laborers. He later worked as a brakeman until ill health forced him to quit in 1925. (He always had health problems; his mother died of TB when he was four.)

Rodgers had long been an amateur performer, but following his forced retirement he pursued music full-time, becoming a blackface performer in a medicine show. In 1926 he appeared as a yodeler and later that year formed his own band, the Jimmie Rodgers Entertainers. The group soon split. Rodgers got a solo contract with Victor Records and released "The Soldier's Sweetheart" and "Sleep Baby Sleep" in 1927, around the same time the Carter Family made its recording debut. His song "Blue Yodel" became a million-seller, making Rodgers the first country superstar. "Brakeman's Blues" also sold a million, and in 1929 he made the movie short The Singing Brakeman, its title became his nickname.

Even during the Depression, Rodgers' records sold well, but his health was deteriorating. Though he was critically ill and had to cancel shows, he continued to record up until his death. His final song, "Fifteen Years Ago Today," was completed the same day he hemorrhaged and lapsed into a coma. The next day he died. In 1961 Rodgers, along with Frank Rose and Hank Williams, became one of the first persons elected to the Country Music Hall of Fame.

Tommy Roe

Born May 9, 1942, Atlanta, GA

1962—Sheila (ABC-Paramount) 1966—Sweet Pea 1969—Dizzy (ABC); 12 in a Roe/A Collection of Tommy Roe's Greatest Hits 1970—We Can Make Music.

At the peak of his career, in the late '60s, singer/songwriter Tommy Roe could do no wrong. He had two #1 records, "Sheila" in 1962 and "Dizzy" in 1969, and also scored big with "Sweet Pea" (#8, 1966), "Hooray for Hazel" (#6, 1966), and "Jam Up and Jelly Tight" (#8, 1969). Even a version of Lloyd Price's hit from 1959, "Stagger Lee," reached the Top 30.

At the age of 16 Roe was living in Atlanta, leading his own group, the Satins. In 1960 he recorded one of his own songs, a bald rewrite of Buddy Holly's "Peggy Sue," called "Sheila." Two years later Roe was signed to ABC. His first single there seemed destined for failure until disc jockeys flipped over "Save Your Kisses" and found "Sheila" (in its second version), which became a huge success.

Followup records didn't fare so well. But Roe was doing much better in England, where he relocated for a while in the '60s. Today he continues to perform, alternating between the oldies circuit and country shows.

Though often dismissed by critics, Kenny Rogers has had well over 40 years of success with folk pop (with the New Christy Minstrels), mild psychedelia and country rock (with the First Edition), and country-pop ballads (as a solo act)

Rogers began singing in a high-school band, the Scholars, who had a regional Texas hit with "That Crazy Feeling." At the University of Houston, he joined a jazz group, the Bobby Doyle Trio, as a vocalist and recorded with it for Columbia. He then joined the New Christy Minstrels [see entry] in 1966.

The First Edition was formed by ex-Minstrels in 1967 and included Mike Settle, Mickey Jones, Terry Williams, and Thelma Camacho. The group made its debut at Ledbetter's in L.A., a club owned by another ex-Minstrel, Randy Sparks. There, the group was brought to the attention of musician/comedian Tommy Smothers, who put Rogers and the First Edition on his popular TV show in January 1968. This led to a Repnse contract, and the act had its first hit just a month later with the quasi-psychedelic "Just Dropped In (To See What Condition My Condition Was In)" (#5). Subsequent hits were in a more countryish vein, like "Ruby, Don't Take Your Love to Town" and the Kingston Trio's "Reuben James" (#26), both in 1969. More hits followed, including the harder-rocking "Something's Burning" (#11) and the gospelish "Tell It All Brother" (#17) in 1970. From 1971 to 1973 the First Edition had its own syndicated TV show, Rollin' on the River.

After the breakup of the First Edition, Rogers switched to an MOR-country style and chalked up a string of big hits like "Lucille" (#5, 1977), "The Gambler" (#16, 1979), "Don't Fall in Love With a Dreamer" (#4, 1980; a duet with Kim Carnes), Lionel Richie's "Lady" (his first #1 hit), "I Don't Need You" (#3), "Through the Years" (#13, 1982), "Love Will Turn You Around" (#13, 1982), "We've Got Tonight" (with Sheena Easton) (#6, 1983), "Islands in the Stream" (with Dolly Parton) (#1, 1983), and "What About Me?" (with Kim Carnes and James Ingram) (#15, 1984).

Between 1977 and 1979 alone, Rogers sold over $100 million worth of records, and he soon became a household name. Through the mid-'80s, Rogers' record sales cooled somewhat, although he continued to score C&W hits with "Crazy" (#1 C&W, 1984), "Morning Desire" (#1 C&W, 1985), "Tomb of the Unknown Soldier" (#1 C&W, 1986), "Twenty Years Ago" (#2 C&W, 1986), "I Prefer the Moonlight" (#2 C&W, 1987), and "The Factory" (#6 C&W, 1988), among others. Love Will Turn You Around and We've Got Tonight went gold; the Barry Gibb-produced Eyes That See in the Dark, Twenty Greatest Hits, and What About Me? were all certified platinum, and Once Upon a Christmas sold 2 million copies, but Something Inside So Strong did not even make the Top 100 albums chart.

By then Rogers had branched out into other areas with comparable success. In 1980 he began his acting career, starring in a TV movie entitled, The Gambler, based on his 1979 hit. Since then, he has starred in four more films in the same series, two movie-of-the-week productions as the detective MacShayne, and in the feature film Six Pack (1982). Since 1979 he has also starred or costarred in over a dozen television specials. He has published several books of his photography, opened a rotisserie-chicken fast-food franchise, and hosted a series of documentaries on the Old West for the Arts and Entertainment Network. He participated in USA for Africa and, with his manager, Ken Kragen, was a principal leader of the charity effort Hands Across America in 1986.

By the late '90s, Rogers had formed his own label, Dreamcatcher Entertainment. His 1999 album She Rides Wild Horses, which peaked at #6 C&W, marked his highest chart debut in 15 years. The singles "Buy Me a Rose" (#1 C&W, 2000) and "The Greatest" (#26 C&W, 1999) were successful as well.

The Rolling Stones: Charlie Watts, Bill Wyman, Mick Taylor, Keith Richards, Mick Jagger

Meanwhile, Brian Jones had begun skipping school in Cheltenham to practice bebop alto sax and clarinet. By the time he was 16, he had fathered two illegitimate children and run off briefly to Scandinavia, where he began playing guitar. Back in Cheltenham he joined the Ramrods, then drifted to London with his girlfriend and one of his children. He began playing with Alexis Korner's Blues, Inc., then decided to start his own band; a want ad attracted pianist Ian Stewart (b. 1938; d. December 12, 1985).

As Elmo Lewis, Jones began working at the Ealing Blues Club, where he ran into a later, loosely knit version of Blues, Inc., which at the time included drummer Charlie Watts. Jagger and Richards began jamming with Blues, Inc., and while Jagger, Richards, and Jones began to practice on their own, Jagger became the featured singer with Blues, Inc.

Jones, Jagger, and Richards shared a tiny, cheap London apartment, and with drummer Tony Chapman they cut a demo tape, which was rejected by EMI. Taylor left to attend the Royal College of Art; he eventually formed the Pretty Things. Ian Stewart's job with a chemical company kept the rest of the group from starving. By the time Taylor left, they began to call themselves the Rolling Stones, after a Muddy Waters song.

On July 12, 1962, the Rolling Stones—Jagger, Richards, Jones, a returned Dick Taylor on bass, and Mick Avory, later of the Kinks, on drums—played their first show at the Marquee. Avory and Taylor were replaced by Tony Chapman and Bill Wyman, from the Cliftons. Chapman didn't work out, and the band spent months recruiting a cautious Charlie Watts, who worked for an advertising agency and had left Blues, Inc. when its schedule got too busy. In January 1963 Watts completed the band.

Local entrepreneur Giorgio Gomelsky booked the Stones at his Crawdaddy Club for an eight-month, highly successful residency. He was also their unofficial manager until Andrew Loog Oldham, with financing from Eric Easton, signed them as clients. By then the Beatles were a British sensation, and

The Rolling Stones began calling themselves the "World's Greatest Rock & Roll Band" in the late '60s, and few disputed the claim. The Stones' music, based on Chicago blues, has continued to sound vital through the decades, and the Stones' attitude of flippant defiance, now aged into wry bemusement, has come to seem as important as their music.

In the 1964 British Invasion they were promoted as bad boys, but what began as a gimmick has stuck as an indelible image, and not just because of incidents like Brian Jones' mysterious death in 1969 and a violent murder during their set at Altamont later that year. In their music, the Stones pioneered British rock's tone of ironic detachment and wrote about offhand brutality, sex as power, and other taboos. In those days, Mick Jagger was branded a "Lucifer" figure, thanks to songs like "Sympathy for the Devil." In the '80s the Stones lost their dangerous aura while still seeming "bad"—they've become icons of an elegantly debauched, world-weary decadence. But Jagger remains the most self-consciously assured appropriator of black performers' up-front sexuality; Keith Richards' Chuck Berry-derived riffing defines rock rhythm guitar (not to mention rock guitar rhythm); the stalwart rhythm section of Bill Wyman and Charlie Watts holds its own; and Jagger and Richards continue to add to what is arguably one of the most significant oeuvres in rock history.

Jagger and Richards first met at Dartford Maypole County Primary School. When they ran into each other 10 years later in 1960, they were both avid fans of blues and American R&B, and they found they had a mutual friend in guitarist Dick Taylor, a fellow student of Richards' at Sidcup Art School. Jagger was attending the London School of Economics and playing in Little Boy Blue and the Blue Boys with Taylor. Richards joined the band as second guitarist, soon afterward, he was expelled from Dartford Technical College for truancy.

Oldham decided to promote the Stones as their nasty opposites. He eased out the mild-mannered Stewart, who subsequently became a Stones roadie and frequent session and tour pianist.

In June 1963 the Stones released their first single, Chuck Berry's "Come On." After the band played on the British TV rock show Thank Your Lucky Stars, its producer reportedly told Oldham to get rid of "that vile-looking singer with the ure-tread lips." The single reached #21 on the British chart. The Stones also appeared at the first annual National Jazz and Blues Festival in London's borough of Richmond and in September were part of a package tour with the Everly Brothers, Bo Diddley, and Little Richard. In December 1963 the Stones' second single, "I Wanna Be Your Man" (written by John Lennon and Paul McCartney), made the British Top 15. In January 1964 the Stones did their first headlining British tour, with the Ronettes, and released a version of Buddy Holly's "Not Fade Away," which made #3.

"Not Fade Away" also made the U.S. singles chart (#48). By this time the band had become a sensation in Britain, with the press gleefully reporting that band members had been seen urinating in public. In April 1964 their first album was released in the U.K., and two months later they made their first American tour. Their cover of the Bobby Womack/Valentinos song "It's All Over Now" was a British #1, their first. Their June American tour was a smashing success, in Chicago, where they'd stopped off to record the Five by Five EP at the Chess Records studio, notes broke out when the band tried to give a press conference. The Stones' version of the blues standard "Little Red Rooster," which had become another U.K. #1, was banned in the U.S. because of its "objectionable" lyrics.

Jagger and Richards had now begun composing their own tunes (at first using the "Nanker Phelge" pseudonym for group compositions). Their "Tell Me (You're Coming Back to Me)" was the group's first U.S. Top 40 hit, in August. The follow-up, a nonoriginal, "Time Is on My Side," made #6 in November. From that point on, all but a handful of Stones hits were Jagger-Richards compositions.

In January 1965 their "The Last Time" became another U.K. #1 and cracked the U.S. Top 10 in the spring. The band's next single, "I Can't Get No Satisfaction," reigned at #1 for four weeks that summer and remains perhaps the most famous song in its remarkable canon. Jagger and Richards continued to write hits with increasingly sophisticated lyrics: "Get Off My Cloud" (#1, 1965), "As Tears Go By" (#6, 1965), "19th Nervous Breakdown" (#2, 1966), "Mother's Little Helper" (#3, 1966), "Have You Seen Your Mother, Baby, Standing in the Shadow?" (#3, 1966).

Aftermath, the first Stones LP of all original material, came out in 1966, though its impact was minimized by the simultaneous release of the Beatles' Revolver and Bob Dylan's Blonde on Blonde. The Middle Eastern-tinged "Paint It, Black" (1966) and the ballad "Ruby Tuesday" (1967), were both U.S. #1 hits.

In January 1967 the Stones caused another sensation when they performed "Let's Spend the Night Together"

("Ruby Tuesday"'s B side) on The Ed Sullivan Show. Jagger mumbled the title lines after threats of censorship (some claimed that the line was censored, others that Jagger actually sang "Let's spend some time together"; Jagger later said, "When it came to that line, I sang mumble"). In February Jagger and Richards were arrested on drug-possession charges in Britain. In May, Brian Jones, too, was arrested. The heavy jail sentences they received were eventually suspended on appeal. The Stones temporarily withdrew from public appearances. Jagger and his girlfriend, singer Marianne Faithfull, went to India with the Beatles to meet the Mahanishi Mahesh Yogi. The Stones' next single release didn't appear until the fall: the #14 "Dandelion," its B side, "We Love You" (#50), on which John Lennon and Paul McCartney sang backup vocals, was intended as a thank-you to fans.

In December came Their Satanic Majesties Request, the Stones' psychedelic answer record to the Beatles' Sgt. Pepper—and an ambitious mess. By the time the album's lone single, "She's a Rainbow" had become a #25 hit, Allen Klein had become the group's manager.

May 1968 saw the release of "Jumpin' Jack Flash," a #3 hit, and a return to basic rock & roll. After five months of delay provoked by controversial album-sleeve photos, the eclectic Beggars Banquet was released and was hailed by critics as the band's finest achievement. On June 9, 1969, Brian Jones, the Stones' most musically adventurous member, who had lent star dulcimer, and, on "Under My Thumb," manimba to the band's sound, and who had been in Morocco recording nomadic Jajouka musicians, left the band with this explanation: "I no longer see eye-to-eye with the others over the discs we are cutting." Within a week he was replaced by ex-John Mayall guitarist Mick Taylor. Jones announced that he would form his own band, but on July 3, 1969, he was found dead in his swimming pool, the coroner's report cited "death by misadventure." Jones, beset by drug problems—and the realization that the band now belonged squarely to Jagger and Richards—had barely participated in the Beggars Banquet sessions.

At an outdoor concert in London's Hyde Park a few days after Jones' death, Jagger read an excerpt from the poet Shelley and released thousands of butterflies over the park. On July 11, the day after Jones was buried, the Stones released "Honky Tonk Women," another #1, and another Stones classic. By this time, every Stones album went gold in short order, and Let It Bleed (a sardonic reply to the Beatles' soon-to-be-released Let It Be) was no exception. "Gimme Shelter" received constant airplay. Jones appeared on most of the album's tracks, though Taylor also made his first on-disc appearances.

After going to Australia to star in the film Ned Kelly, Jagger rejoined the band for the start of its hugely successful 1969 American tour, the band's first U.S. trip in three years. But the Stones' Satanic image came to haunt them at a free thank-you-America concert at California's Altamont Speedway. In the darkness just in front of the stage, a young black man, Meredith Hunter, was stabbed to death by members of the Hell's Angels motorcycle gang, whom the Stones—on advice of the Grateful Dead—had hired to provide security for the event. The incident was captured on film by the Maysles brothers in their feature-length documentary Gimme Shelter. Public outcry that "Sympathy for the Devil" (which they had performed earlier in the show; they were playing "Under My Thumb" when the murder occurred) had in some way incited the violence led the Stones to drop the tune from their stage shows for the next six years.

After another spell of inactivity, the Get Yer Ya-Ya's Out! live album was released in the fall of 1970 and went platinum. That same year the Stones formed their own Rolling Stones Records, an Atlantic subsidiary. The band's first album for its own label, Sticky Fingers (#1, 1971)—which introduced their Andy Warhol-designed lips-and-lolling-tongue logo—yielded hits in "Brown Sugar" (#1, 1971) and "Wild Horses" (#28, 1971). Jagger, who had starred in Nicolas Roeg's 1970 Performance (the soundtrack of which contained "Memo From Turner"), married Nicaraguan fashion model Bianca Perez Morena de Macias, and the pair became international jet-set favorites. Though many interpreted Jagger's acceptance into high society as yet another sign that rock was dead, or that at least the Stones had lost their spark, Exile on Main Street (#1, 1972), a double album, was another critically acclaimed hit, yielding "Tumbling Dice" (#7) and "Happy" (#22). By this time the Stones were touring the U.S. once every three years, their 1972 extravaganza, like those in 1975, 1978, and 1981, was a sold-out affair.

Goats Head Soup (#1, 1973) was termed the band's worst effort since Satanic Majesties by critics, yet it contained hits in "Angie" (#1, 1973) and "(Doo Doo Doo Doo Doo) Heartbreaker" (#15, 1974). It's Only Rock n' Roll (#1, 1974) yielded Top 20 hits in the title tune and a cover of the Temptations' "Ain't Too Proud to Beg." Mick Taylor left the band after that album; and after trying out scores of sessionmen (many of whom showed up on the next LP, 1976's Black and Blue), the Stones settled on Ron Wood, then still nominally committed to Rod Stewart and the Faces (who disbanded soon after Wood joined the Stones officially in 1976). In 1979 Richards and Wood, with Meters drummer Ziggy Modeliste and fusion bassist Stanley Clarke, toured as the New Barbarians.

Black and Blue was the Stones' fifth consecutive LP of new material to top the album chart, though it contained only one hit single, the #10 "Fool to Cry." Wyman, who had released a 1974 solo album, Monkey Gnp (the first Stone to do so), recorded another, Stone Alone. Jagger guested on "I Can Feel the Fire" on Wood's solo first LP, I've Got My Own Album to Do. Wood has since recorded several more albums, and while none were commercial hits (Gimme Some Neck peaked at #45 in 1979), his work was generally well received.

The ethnic-stereotype lyrics of the title song from Some Girls (#1, 1978) provoked public protest (the last outcry had been in 1976 over Black and Blue's battered-woman advertising campaign). Aside from the disco crossover "Miss You" (#1), the music was bare-bones rock & roll—in response, some speculated, to the punk movement's claims that the band was too old and too affluent to rock anymore.

Richards and his longtime common-law wife, Anita Pallenburg, were arrested in March 1977 in Canada for heroin possession—jeopardizing the band's future—but he subsequently kicked his habit and in 1978 was given a suspended sentence.

In 1981 Tattoo You was #1 for nine weeks (1980's Emotional Rescue also went to #1) and produced the hits "Start Me Up" (#2, 1981) and "Waiting on a Friend" (#13, 1981), the latter featuring jazz great Sonny Rollins on tenor saxophone. The 1981 tour spawned an album, Still Life, and a movie, Let's Spend the Night Together (directed by Hal Ashby), which grossed $50 million.

Through the '80s the group became more an institution than an influential force. Nevertheless, both Undercover (#4, 1983) and Dirty Work (#4, 1986) were certifiable hits despite not topping the chart, as every new studio album had done in the decade before. Each album produced only one Top 20 hit, "Undercover of the Night" (#9, 1983) and "Harlem Shuffle" (#5, 1986), the latter a remake of a minor 1964 hit by Bob and Earl.

Jagger and Richards grew estranged from each other, and the band would not record for three years. Jagger released his first solo album, the platinum She's the Boss, in 1984. His second, 1987's Primitive Cool, didn't even break the Top 40. Richards, who'd long declared he would never undertake a solo album (and who resented Jagger's making music outside the band), countered in 1988 with the gold Talk Is Cheap, backed up by the X-Pensive Winos: guitarist Waddy Wachtel and the rhythm section of Steve Jordan and Charley Drayton.

The two Stones sniped at each other in the press and in song. Richards' album track "You Don't Move Me" was directed at his longtime partner. Nevertheless, shortly before the Rolling Stones were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, in January 1989 the two traveled to Barbados to begin writing songs for a new Stones album. Steel Wheels (#3, 1989) showed the group spinning its wheels musically, and were it not for the band's first American tour in eight years, it is doubtful the LP would have sold anywhere near its 2 million copies. But the 50-date tour, which reportedly grossed $140 million, was an artistic triumph. As the group's fifth live album, Flashpoint (#16, 1991), demonstrated, never had the Stones sounded so cohesive onstage.

Bill Wyman announced his long-rumored decision to leave the group after 30 years, in late 1992. "I was quite happy to stop after that," the 56-year-old bassist told a British TV show. The announcement helped deflect attention from Wyman's love life. In 1989 he married model Mandy Smith, who was just 13½ when the two began dating. The couple divorced in 1990, the same year that Mick Jagger finally married his longtime lover, Jerry Hall. (Jagger and Hall would later split up.)

The early '90s were a time for solo albums from Richards—Live at the Hollywood Palladium and Main Offender (#99, 1992)—and Jagger's Wandering Spirit (#11, 1993). Neither sold spectacularly, apparently fans are most interested in Jagger and Richards when they work together. Wood released Slide on This, his first solo album in over a decade, and Watts pursued his real love, jazz, with the Charlie Watts Orchestra.

In 1994 Jagger, Richards, Watts, and Wood, along with bassist Darryl Jones (whose credits include working with Miles Davis and Sting) released the critically well-received Voodoo Lounge (#2, 1994) and embarked on a major tour that proved one of the highest-grossing of the year, earning a reported $295 million. Voodoo Lounge brought the Stones their first competitive Grammy, 1994's Best Rock Album award. Voodoo Lounge was also the group's first release under its new multimillion-dollar, three-album deal with Virgin Records, which included granting Virgin the rights to some choice albums from the Stones' back catalogue, including Exile on Main Street, Sticky Fingers, and Some Girls. After having languished in storage for nearly three decades, the Rolling Stones' Rock & Roll Circus concert film and soundtrack was released in 1996, which featured the Stones in the era of Beggars Banquet, and other rock luminaries—the Who, Jethro Tull, John Lennon and Yoko Ono, Eric Clapton, Taj Mahal, and more—as well as various acrobats, fire-eaters, and other circus artists who performed routines between songs.

Meanwhile, back to their standard time lapse of three years between tours, the Stones released Bridges to Babylon (#3, 1997, their 19th platinum LP) and launched yet another lavish, sold-out worldwide tour, where they played two-hour concerts consisting of only a few songs off the new album and lots of hits. Corporate sponsorship was particularly intense: long-distance carrier Sprint, for example, paying $4 million to print its company logo on tickets and stage banners. In 1998 the Stones released the obligatory tour album, No Security.

In 1997 Richards coproduced and played on Wingless Angels, an album of Rastafarian spirituals; guested, with Elvis Presley guitarist Scotty Moore, on All the King's Men, a tribute to Presley; and with the rest of the Stones, played on B.B. King's Deuces Wild. Assembling the roots-rock band the Rhythm Kings, with Peter Frampton and Georgie Fame sitting in, Bill Wyman put out three albums in the late '90s. Watts continued his jazz excursions with 1996's orchestral offering, Long Ago and Far Away, and then forayed into world beat with a 2000 collaboration with veteran session drummer Jim Keltner. Mick Taylor's recording career revived, as the ex-Stone put out Stonesy releases with Carla Olson.

In 2000 "Satisfaction" topped a VH1 Poll of 100 Greatest Rock Songs. Jagger gained more attention in the social columns. In 1998 29-year-old Brazilian model Luciana Gimenez Morad claimed that she was pregnant with his child; Jagger disagreed. Jerry Hall filed for divorce. Jagger, despite the couple's four children, maintained that their Hindu nuptials did not constitute a legal marriage. When Morad's child was born, DNA tests concluded that Jagger was indeed the boy's father.

The Romantics

Formed 1977, Detroit, MI

Wally Palmar (b. Apr. 27, 1953, Hamtramck, MI), gtr., voc.; Mike Skill (b. July 16, 1952, Buffalo, NY), gtr., voc.; Richard Cole, bass, voc.; Jimmy Marinos, drums, voc.

1980—The Romantics (Nemperor); National Breakout 1981—(- Skill; + Cos Canter [b. July, 25, 1954, Havana, Cuba], gtr.) Strictly Personal 1983—In Heat (- Marinos) 1985—Rhythm Romance (+ Skill, bass) 1990—What I Like About You (and Other Romantic Hits) (Epic Associated) 1996—Breakout (Sony); In Concert (King Biscuit) 1998—Super Hits (Sony).

With their matching suits—usually red, purple, or pink leather—and sprightly Merseybeat sound, the Romantics were one of the relatively few power-pop bands to make the national charts. They hit the Top 10 in 1983 with "Talking in Your Sleep" (#3, 1983), but are probably better known for the power-pop anthem "What I Like About You" (#49, 1980), which has been licensed for use in advertisements for, among others, Budweiser beer and Home Box Office.

Formed on Valentine's Day 1977 (hence the name), the Romantics played East Coast clubs and later that year released "Little White Lies" b/w "I Can't Tell You Anything" on their own Spider Records. Their pop sound attracted rock critic Greg Shaw to sign them to his Bomp! label, which released "Tell It to Carne" in 1978.

They signed with Nemperor Records in 1979, and released their eponymous debut (#61) the next year. After two more albums in the pop vein (National Breakout [#176, 1980], Strictly Personal [#182, 1981]), stified, the Romantics mutated into a more commercial, arena-rock band on In Heat (#14, 1983), which contained "Talking in Your Sleep." That year, drummer Jimmy Marnos, who sang lead on "What I Like About You," left.

The Romantics soldiered on, with drummer David Patratos, then ex-Blondie Clem Burke, taking Marinos' place. In 1987 the Romantics discovered that their songs were being licensed for commercials by their managers without the band's permission. They spent several years in litigation over publishing royalties and licensing fees, finally gaining back their nights in 1995. Though the Romantics continue to play around, 1996's In Concert actually was recorded in 1983 and features Marinós.

Romeo Void

Formed 1979, San Francisco, CA

Debora Iyall (b. Apr. 29, 1954), voc.; Frank Zincavage, bass; Peter Woods, gtr.; Jay Derrah, drums; Ben Bossi, sax.

1980—(– Derrah; + John Stench [b. John Haines], drums)

1981—It's a Condition (415) (– Stench; + Larry Carter, drums)

1982—Never Say Never EP; Benefactor (415/Columbia)

1983—(– Carter; + Aaron Smith, drums) 1984—Instincts

1992—Warm, in Your Coat (Columbia/Legacy).

Debora Iyall solo: 1986—Strange Language (415/Columbia).

Debora Iyall's sung-spoken songs for Romeo Void explore the empty consequences of love over a solid postpunk dance beat. The critically acclaimed band was formed in San Francisco in 1979, with most members coming from an art-school background.

Iyall, a Cowlitz Indian, wanted to become a poet as a teenager growing up in Fresno. In 1977, while studying at the San Francisco Art Institute, she sang with a '60s-style pop-revival band, the Mummies and the Poppers, and later met Frank Zincavage, a sculpture student. They formed Romeo Void with other locals Jay Derrah, Peter Woods (both from the M&Ps), and later Ben Bossi. Their debut, It's a Condition, featuring "Myself to Myself," received massive critical praise. Playing drums on the LP was John Stench of Pearl Harbour and the Explosions, taking over for Derrah; a number of drummers went through the group. Iyall's tough, un-sentimental stance on love was compared to Pretender Chrissie Hynde's, and her sexy deadpan-to-pouty voice also drew attention on the band's 1981 EP Never Say Never, coproduced by Ric Ocasek of the Cars. Benefactor, including "Never Say Never," was a dance-floor favorite. Instincts produced the group's only hit, "A Girl in Trouble (Is a Temporary Thing)" (#35, 1984).

Romeo Void disbanded in 1985, and Iyall released a solo album the following year. The band regrouped and performed in 1993. Iyall has also written poetry and short stories and been published in literary journals and anthologies. In the late '90s she comprised the singing and lyric-writing half of the duo Knife in Water. As of 2000 she was living in the high desert of Southern California.

The Ronettes/Ronnie Spector

Veronica Bennett (later Ronnie Spector, b. Aug. 10, 1943, New York), voc.; Estelle Bennett (b. July 22, 1944, New York), voc.;

Nedra Talley (b. Jan. 27, 1946, New York), voc.

1964—Presenting the Fabulous Ronettes Featuring Veronica (Philles) 1992—The Best of the Ronettes (Abkco).

Ronnie Spector solo: 1980—Siren (Polish) 1987—Unfinished

Business (Columbia) 1995—Dangerous: 1976–1987 (Raven, Austral.) 1999—She Talks to Rainbows EP (Kill Rock Stars).

In their towering black beehive hardos and dark eye makeup, the Ronettes were a classic mid-'60s girl group with a sultry twist: vulnerable but tough, sexy but sweet. They were the first bad girls of rock, a racially undefinable (the Bennetts' mother was black and Native American; their father was white) trio that became producer Phil Spector's most successful act.

All three Ronettes are related: Talley is the cousin of the two Bennett sisters. The trio began singing together as the Darling Sisters. By 1961, they had become featured dancers and vocalists at the Peppermint Lounge, performing a song-and-dance routine inspired by Hank Ballard and Chubby Checker's "Twist." They later appeared with New York City disc jockey Murray the K's rock shows and recorded in 1961 and 1962 for Colpix as Ronnie and the Relatives, then the Ronettes.

Spector signed them to his Philles label in 1963. Smitten with Ronnie, he attempted to sign her as a solo artist, but when the group refused to be broken up, he signed them all. Initially the trio provided background vocals for other Spector productions, including records by Darlene Love and Bob B. Soxx and the Blue Jeans. (Earlier in their career, the Ronettes backed up Little Eva, Del Shannon, Bobby Rydell, and Joey Dee, among others.) His first Wall of Sound productions for them were "Baby I Love You" and a song he cowrote with Ellie Greenwich and Jeff Barry, "Be My Baby." That fall it hit #2 and sold over a million copies.

The Ronettes had other, less successful hits: "Baby I Love You" (#24, 1963), "(The Best Part of) Breakin' Up" (#39, 1964), "Walking in the Rain" (#23, 1964), "Do I Love You?" (#34, 1964), "Is This What I Get for Lovin' You?" (#75, 1965), and "I Can Hear Music" (#100, 1966). In 1964 Spector began managing the group as well, and throughout the group's career Spector's possessiveness and jealousy created problems. For example, when they were set to open for the Beatles on their 1966 U.S. tour, he kept Ronnie at home and had another cousin of hers take her place on the road. By then, the group was near to breaking up. Talley married a New York City radio station-programming director, and Estelle married producer Teddy Vann.

In 1966 Ronnie Bennett married Phil Spector. According to her autobiography, Be My Baby, Spector virtually held her prisoner in their L.A. mansion. They separated in 1973 and divorced in 1974, by which time Ronnie Spector had developed a serious drinking problem that would last several more years. Although Spector had recorded her for A&M in 1969 ("You Came, You Saw, You Conquered") and Apple in 1971 ("Try Some, Buy Some," coproduced with George Harnson), her first solo releases went unnoticed. Ronnie Spector began her long comeback with a 1973 appearance at a rock-revival show with two new Ronettes; she then released two singles on Buddah.

Through the '70s she later pursued a solo career, inspired by the fact that many notable musicians (including Billy Joel, who wrote "Say Goodbye to Hollywood" for her, and Bruce Springsteen) cited her as an influence. In 1977 Little Steven van Zandt produced her version of "Say Goodbye to Hollywood" (with backing by the E Street Band), but it never charted. She sang on Southside Johnny's debut LP and then cut a solo album in 1980 entitled Siren, produced by Genya Ravan. Ronnie Spector's biggest commercial break came in 1986 when her duet with Eddie Money, "Take Me Home Tonight," the chorus of which reprised "Be My Baby," hit #4 and became an oft-seen video. In 1986 her autobiography, Be My Baby (written with Vince Waldron) was published. Through the '80s she also performed as one of the "legendary ladies of rock," along with Martha Reeves, Lesley Gore, Mary Wilson, and others.

Remarried and living in Connecticut with her husband and two sons, Spector returned to recording in the late '90s. She began touring on punk and indie-rock bills. The hard-edged, guitar-based She Talks to Rainbows features songs written by Joey Ramone (the EP's coproducer, with whom she also sings a duet), Brian Wilson, and Johnny Thunders. In 2000 a Manhattan judge ordered Phil Spector to pay $2.6 million, most of it in back royalties, to Ronnie Spector and her fellow Ronettes.

Mick Ronson

Born ca. 1946, Hull, Eng.; died Apr. 30, 1993, London, Eng.
1974—Slaughter on Tenth Avenue (RCA) 1975—Play Don't Worry 1989—Y U I ORTA (with Ian Hunter) (Mercury) 1994—Heaven n' Hull (Epic Associated) 2001—Indian Summer (Pilot).

After having played sessions with pop producer Michael Chapman and David Bowie—producer Gus Dudgeon, Mick Ronson came to attention as the guitarist for Bowie's early-'70s Spiders From Mars backing band. Upon Bowie's temporary retirement from performing in 1973, Ronson launched an unsuccessful solo career. He joined Mott the Hoople in its last days, then continued a partnership with Mott's Ian Hunter in both the Hunter-Ronson Band and on Hunter's solo LPs. In late 1975 Ronson was a surprise member of Bob Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue. He later went on to help produce Roger McGuinn's Cardiff Rose (1976), David Johansen's In Style (1979), and Mornsey's Your Arsenal (1992), as well as several Ian Hunter LPs.

In 1991, having learned he had liver cancer, the guitarist began recording a new solo album. Friends such as Hunter, David Bowie, John Mellencamp, Chrissie Hynde, and Def Leppard's Joe Elliott lent their voices to Heaven n' Hull, which was released a year after Ronson's death at age 46.

Linda Ronstadt

Born July 15, 1946, Tucson, AZ
1969—Hand Sown . . . Home Grown (Capitol) 1970—Silk Purse 1972—Linda Ronstadt 1973—Don't Cry Now (Asylum) 1974—Different Drum (Capitol); Heart Like a Wheel

1975—Prisoner in Disguise (Asylum) 1976—Hasten Down the Wind; Greatest Hits 1977—Simple Dreams 1978—Living in the U.S.A. 1980—Mad Love; Greatest Hits, vol. 2 1982—Get Closer 1983—What's New? 1984—Lush Life 1986—Sentimental Reasons 1987—Canciones de Mi Padre (Elektra); Trio (with Dolly Parton and Emmylou Harris) (Warner Bros.) 1989—Cry Like a Rainstorm, Howl Like the Wind (Elektra) 1991—Más Canciones 1992—Frenesí 1993—Winter Light 1995—Feels Like Home 1996—Dedicated to the One I Love 1998—We Ran 1999—Trio II (with Dolly Parton and Emmylou Harris) (Asylum); Western Wall: The Tucson Session (with Emmylou Harris); The Linda Ronstadt Box Set (Elektra) 2000—A Merry Little Christmas.

During a recording career spanning four decades, Linda Ronstadt has covered much of America's popular and folk music and appealed to a mass audience that, but for her, might never have heard the work of Buddy Holly, Chuck Berry, or Elvis Costello, not to mention the older pop standards and traditional Mexican songs she sang later in her career.

Ronstadt is half Mexican, half German. She grew up singing Hank Williams and Elvis Presley favorites with her siblings and Mexican folk songs with her father, who played his guitar. While in high school, Linda performed around Tucson with her brother and sister. Local guitarist Bob Kimmel invited her to go with him to L.A. She declined the invitation until after a semester at the University of Arizona, but by the end of 1964 she was in L.A., where she joined the Stone Poneys, a folk group with Kimmel and guitarist Kenny Edwards.

The trio landed a gig at the Troubadour, where promoter Herb Cohen offered Ronstadt a solo management contract. She refused the offer out of loyalty to the trio and doubts about going it alone earlier, the three had turned down Mercury's offer to make them into a surf-music group to be called the Signets. But when the Stone Poneys failed to attract further interest, they split up, and Ronstadt signed with Cohen, whom she later persuaded to manage the trio.

Cohen got the Stone Poneys a recording contract with Capitol in 1966 and hired Nick Venet to produce three albums. The first was a failed attempt to present the Poneys as a sort of Hollywood Peter, Paul and Mary. The second included one number on which L.A. session musicians backed Ronstadt—"Different Drum," written by Mike Nesmith of the Monkees—which was a Top 20 hit in 1967. It induced Capitol to send the Stone Poneys on tour as an opening act, but Edwards soon quit. (He was reunited with Ronstadt in 1974 and was her bassist for the following five years.) Kimmel and Ronstadt stayed together for a while using pickup musicians for another tour and recording a few tracks for the third album, but soon Kimmel dropped out, leaving Ronstadt with a contractual obligation to finish, using session musicians. It sold so poorly that it wasn't until Heart Like a Wheel went gold seven years later that Ronstadt began to collect royalties.

Solo, Ronstadt floundered for most of the next five years.

Linda Ronstadt

She went through a succession of managers, producers, and backup musicians (including in the last category the four original Eagles). Onstage she was often devastatingly timid, and in the studio her voice was undermined by inappropriate material and arrangements. She attracted brief notice as a country singer—playing the Grand Ole Opry in Nashville, making TV appearances on The Johnny Cash Show and a Glen Campbell special—and reached the Top 30 in 1970 with “Long, Long Time” off Silk Purse. But by the end of 1972 she was in debt and paying commissions to two managers, Cohen (who still owned her contract) and John Boylan, her current producer. Don’t Cry Now, her first album on Asylum (although it turned out she owed another to Capitol), was predictably bogged down and unfinished in the studio.

The catalyst to Ronstadt’s popularity and acclaim was Peter Asher. A former half of the British pop duo Peter and Gordon, he had gone from performing in the mid-’60s to producing and managing. Under Asher’s direction, Don’t Cry Now was completed after a year in the works, $150,000, and three producers. Despite its flaws, the album sparked Ronstadt’s career and prompted Capitol to market a collection of her early songs under the title Different Drum.

With Asher as producer and manager, Ronstadt made Heart Like a Wheel, which established her best-selling mix of oldies covers and contemporary songs. In addition to astute song choices, high standards of studio craft became Ronstadt and Asher’s trademarks. Released shortly before Christmas 1974, Heart Like a Wheel reached #1 the following spring and eventually sold 2 million copies. “You’re No Good” rocked to #1 on the pop singles chart while its flip side, Hank Williams’ “I Can’t Help It If I’m Still in Love With You,” hit #2 C&W, and won the Grammy for Best Female Country Vocal Performance that year. “When Will I Be Loved” went #2 pop, #1 C&W. Although still hampered by stage fright, Ronstadt became a popular concert attraction and something of a sex symbol.

With a 1976 tour of Europe—her first outside the U.S.—she extended her popularity to the world market. Heart Like a Wheel was the first of 17 gold or platinum albums. She won a second Grammy in 1976. Her albums retained a California sensibility with songs by J.D. Souther and Warren Zevon, but she also expanded her repertoire to R&B (the Holland-Dozier-Holland Motown classic “Heat Wave,” a couple by Smokey Robinson), show tunes (Hammerstein-Romberg’s “When I Grow Too Old to Dream”), traditional folk ballads (“I Never Will Marry,” “Old Paint”), reggae (Jimmy Cliff’s “Many Rivers to Cross”), and even cocky rock & roll (Jagger-Richards’ “Tumbling Dice”). Her hit covers of Buddy Holly (“That’ll Be the Day” and “It’s So Easy”) brought his music to a new audience.

Ronstadt’s success gave a substantial boost to other female performers. She was the first to record songs by Karla Bonoff, Maria Muldaur, Wendy Waldman, Emmylou Harris, and Dolly Parton are a few of the female singers who have harmonized with Ronstadt in the studio and onstage; and she was instrumental in the careers of Valene Carter and Nicolette Larson. With these women, Ronstadt formed tight friendships and a sort of professional support system. (In 1987 she, Parton, and Harris released the platinum Trio, a project 10 years in the making.)

By decade’s end, Ronstadt was at the height of her popularity, both Simple Dreams (1977) and Living in the U.S.A. (1978) hit #1. She was also highly visible as the constant companion of California Governor Jerry Brown, with whom she shared the cover of Time. Ronstadt’s Mad Love (#3, 1980) included new-wave rock. Working with a self-styled L.A. new-wave group, the Cretones, she put three songs by group member Mark Goldenberg alongside three by Elvis Costello (whose “Alison” she had covered on her previous album). The response from Ronstadt’s audience was decidedly mixed, but “How Do I Make You” went Top 10, as did a remake of Little Anthony and the Imperials’ “Hurt So Bad.”

Rather than return to the studio, Ronstadt tried something new—the role of Mabel in Gilbert and Sullivan’s 19th-century light opera The Pirates of Penzance. Ronstadt performed at Central Park’s Delacorte Theater in New York City through the summer of 1980 and later appeared in the film version. A subsequent attempt at opera in a production of La Bohème was less well received by critics.

In 1982 she released Get Closer (#31), her least successful LP of new material in 10 years. Ronstadt then took a stylistic right turn, and she became among the first rock artists to tackle American pop standards. Lavishly orchestrated by veteran arranger Nelson Riddle, the triple-platinum What’s New (#3, 1983), platinum Lush Life (#13, 1984), and gold Sentimental Reasons (#46, 1986) were critically acclaimed and introduced baby boomers to such prerock classics as “Someone to Watch Over Me” and “When I Fall in Love.”

In 1987 Ronstadt and James Ingram topped the charts with the romantic ballad “Somewhere Out There” from the animated film An American Tale, and she made another commercially successful stylistic leap with the all-Spanish Canciones de Mi Padre ("Songs of My Father"), which went platinum though reaching only #42 on the chart. Later that year, the Trio album with Parton and Harris hit #6 on the chart and also went platinum (it won a Grammy for Best Country Vocal Duo/Group in 1988). Cry Like a Rainstorm, Howl Like the Wind (#7, 1989), went double platinum and contained two Grammy award-winning (for Best Pop Performance Duo/Group) ballads sung with Aaron Neville: "Don't Know Much" (#2, 1989) and "All My Life" (#11, 1990). However, two more Spanish-language albums, Mas Canciones and Frenesi, met with middling sales. Ronstadt returned to English-language recording with 1993's Winter Light, which she produced herself with George Massenburg (her first pop solo album in 20 years that Peter Asher did not produce). Feels Like Home (#75, 1995) was originally conceived as a followup to Trio, but Parton had to withdraw because of scheduling problems. The album included more country-rock sounds but had disappointing sales. That same year Ronstadt sang on a recording of Randy Newman's musical Faust. Dedicated to the One I Love (#78, 1996) was a collection of lullabies, but buyers stayed away from We Ran (#160, 1998), a return to more pop fare.

The long-in-the-making Trio II (#62 pop, #4 C&W) finally came out in 1999, followed a few months later by a duet album with Harris, Western Wall: The Tucson Sessions (#73 pop, #6 C&W). Harris and the reluctant Ronstadt, who had not been on the road since 1995, then embarked on a tour. In addition to her well-known dislike for public performances, Ronstadt revealed that she was afflicted with Hashimoto's disease, an autoimmune disorder the side effects of which include a loss of energy; she prefers staying home in Tucson, where she moved back in the early '90s to raise her two adopted children.

Integrating live instrumentation, vocal percussion, and old-school sensibility, the Roots created a unique sound within hip-hop. By touning up to 250 nights a year, the Roots slowly built a following in a fashion similar to the road work of the Grateful Dead, Phish, and the Dave Matthews Band, in which the group also revamped and improvised songs nightly. The group's innovative and fresh recordings document its vision of rap music with no boundaries.

The Roots formed in 1987 when vocalist Black Thought befriended drummer Questlove at Philadelphia's High School for Creative Performing Arts. The two began covering hip-hop classics, with Black Thought rapping over Questlove's drum beats. The duo eventually added a keyboardist and bassist and recorded Organix, an underground album that presages the jazzy, free-form aesthetic the Roots would later perfect. Geffen soon caught wind of the band's increasing following and released do you want more?!!!!? (#104 pop, #22 R&B, 1995), which includes concert staples like "Proceed" (#79 R&B, 1995), "Distortion to Static" (#96 R&B, 1994), and "Essaywhuman?!!!!?" Opening concerts for the Beastie Boys and performing on Lollapalooza's second stage added to the Roots' following with an alt-rock audience, while do you want more?!!!!? failed to make a big impact in hip-hop circles.

The second album, illadelph halflife (#21 pop, #4 R&B, 1996), with its harder edge, tighter beats, and appearances by notables Q-Tip, D'Angelo, Cassandra Wilson, and Common, became an instant success in the hip-hop community. "Clones" (#62 R&B, 1996) and "Push Up Ya Lighter" illustrate the Roots' rawer, streetwise side; conversely, the melodic "One Shine" and "What They Do" (#34 pop, #21 R&B, 1996) emit pure soul. In 1999 the Roots achieved its biggest critical and commercial success yet with things fall apart (#4 pop, #2 R&B), which yielded the Grammy award-winning single, "You Got Me" (#39 pop, #11 R&B), a love song featuring vocals by Erykah Badu [see entry]. Later the same year, The Roots Come Alive (#50 pop, #12 R&B), documented the band's renowned live performances. At a typical Roots concert, the band cycles through past and present rap standards, performs long instrumentals, and shows off the vocal talents of world-class beat boxers Rahzel and Scratch.

Both Black Thought (who acted in the 2001 indie film Brooklyn Babylon) and Rahzel went on to record solo albums, while Questlove made significant contributions to albums by Erykah Badu, D'Angelo, and Zack de la Rocha.

Diana Ross' tender, cooing voice brought her to prominence as the lead singer of the Supremes in the '60s. Upon leaving the Supremes [see entry] in January 1970, she established herself as a star of records, stage, television, and screen. Through the '70s and '80s she showed remarkable resilience, consistently rebounding from career setbacks, and remained without question the biggest female pop star of that era.

Ross' career shift was carefully planned by Motown president Berry Gordy Jr. and was foreshadowed when in the late '60s he changed the group's name from simply the Supremes to Diana Ross and the Supremes. By the time she did leave the group, she was clearly positioned as its star. Her initial solo recordings were produced by the husband-and-wife team of Nick Ashford and Valene Simpson. "Reach Out and Touch (Somebody's Hand)" in 1970 (#20 pop, #7 R&B) was her first solo single. Her next release, a new version of the Marvin Gaye-Tammi Terrell hit "Ain't No Mountain High Enough" (by Ashford and Simpson), reached #1 pop and R&B. The following year, however, she faltered, releasing singles, none of which was a major hit. At that time, most of her attention was taken up with a television special and preparations for playing Billie Holiday in the first Motown film production, Lady Sings the Blues. The 1972 film was a commercial success, spawning a #1 soundtrack of Ross singing Holiday ("Good Morning Heartache") and garnering Ross an Oscar nomination for Best Actress.

The title songs from her next two albums, Touch Me in the Morning (#5, 1973) and Last Time I Saw Him (#52, 1973), were both Top 20 pop singles, the former hitting #1. In 1973 she recorded an album of duets with Marvin Gaye, Diana and Marvin (#26, 1973). Her next film, Mahogany, directed by Berry Gordy and costarring Billy Dee Williams and Anthony Perkins, failed to match either the commercial or artistic accomplishments of Lady. The soundtrack, however, did have the MOR ballad "Do You Know Where You're Going To" (#1 pop, #14 R&B, 1976). Her Diana Ross (#5, 1976) was highlighted by "Love Hangover," a ballad-cum-disco dance song that went #1 on both the pop and R&B charts.

As the star of Motown's misconceived film version of the Broadway musical The Wiz, Ross took a tremendous risk by insisting that she play the role of Dorothy (originated on Broadway by a much younger Stephanie Mills). Not only was she clearly too old for the part, but the heavy-handed production (costarring Nipsey Russell, Michael Jackson, and Richard Pryor) was a critical and commercial bomb and a rude awakening for Motown. Her 1977 Baby, It's Me, produced by Richard Perry, sold disappointingly, as did Ross in 1978.

She returned to Ashford and Simpson for 1979's The Boss (#14) and was rewarded with her best sales in years. The title song (#19 pop, #10 R&B) reestablished Ross as a pop presence. Diana updated her approach. Produced by Nile

Rodgers and Bernard Edwards of Chic, the 1980 platinum album went to #1 R&B, #2 pop, and boasted two big singles, "Upside Down" (#1 pop, R&B) and "I'm Coming Out" (#5 pop, #6 R&B). In 1981 Ross duetted with Commodores lead singer Lionel Richie on the #1 theme from the film Endless Love. It was the year's most popular single, selling well over 2 million copies, but it proved to be her last hit for Motown.

In 1981 she ended her 20-year tenure with the company and signed with RCA Records. That fall she released her self-produced Why Do Fools Fall in Love? (#15, platinum) and had a hit with the title cut, a remake of the Frankie Lyman and the Teenagers hit, and in 1982 with "Mirror, Mirror." In 1982 Ross released her second RCA LP, Silk Electric, which featured the #10 single (#4 R&B) "Muscles" (written and produced by Michael Jackson). Her next few years with RCA were fruitful: Swept Away, with a Top 20 title track written and produced by Daryl Hall, went gold. "All of You," a duet with Julio Iglesias, was another hit that year. With "Missing You"—a ballad dedicated to Marvin Gaye, but in the video for the song, Ross sang to old footage of Florence Ballard, her mother, Gaye, and Temptation Paul Williams—Ross scored her last Top 10 (#1 R&B) pop hit in 1985. Eaten Alive's title track, with Michael Jackson on backing vocals, hit #10 on the R&B chart but stalled at #77 pop. Ross' biggest successes, like "Missing You," seemed to hark back to her days with Motown. In 1986 the Bee Gees—written and produced—"Chain Reaction" gave Ross a minor hit here, yet in England this affectionate re-creation of the Supremes/Holland-Dozier-Holland style went to #1. Her final RCA album, Red, Hot Rhythm and Blues, peaked at #73 with no charting pop singles.

Ross took some time off from her career. In 1985 she married Arne Naess, a Norwegian businessman, and had two sons, Ross and Evan. They separated in 1999 and divorced. She also has three daughters—Rhonda, Tracee, and Chudney—from her first marriage to entertainment manager Robert Silberstein. (In his 1994 autobiography, To Be Loved, Berry Gordy wrote of being Rhonda's true biological father.) They married in 1971 and divorced five years later.

After leaving Motown, Ross began to exert greater control over her career with, some have observed, less than desirable results. As an artist and celebrity, Ross' public image was tarnished by two 1983 incidents. The first was her on-stage display of temper against ex-Supreme Mary Wilson during the taping of the Motown 25 special. Ross' reputation as a high-handed diva was already well established, and the incident, coupled with speculation as to how much of the hit play Dreamgirls was based on the Supremes story, only solidified that image. The second incident, in which she argued, unconvincingly, that two concerts she gave in Central Park didn't generate sufficient profits to provide her promised $250,000 donation toward a new playground proved equally embarrassing. After the first night's show was rained out, the park was heavily damaged as the crowd of 350,000 retreated from the storm. By the evening's end, 84 people had been arrested after a wild rampage in which a large number of concertgoers and others in the area surrounding the park were attacked and/or robbed. The entire incident left a bitter taste, and although Ross returned a second night to perform, she didn't deliver the funds until after Mayor Ed Koch criticized her publicly over the next five months. Unfortunately, the groundbreaking for the park coincided with the publication of Mary Wilson's Dreamgirl. My Life as a Supreme, which some regarded as highly critical of Ross.

In early 1989 Ross left RCA and returned to Motown, where she became a corporate officer and part owner. Despite a rush of publicity and her continued strong concert-ticket sales, she could not regain a foothold on the pop chart. Neither the heavily publicized Workin' Overtime nor The Force Behind the Power got into the Top 100 albums chart.

In 1994 a four-CD retrospective box set, Forever Diana, which Ross oversaw and delivered complete to Motown, was withdrawn from the market for poor sound quality. Earlier that year her long-awaited autobiography (which, unlike most celebrities, she insisted on writing without professional assistance), Secrets of a Sparrow, was published to poor reviews and disappointing sales. The following year's Take Me Higher (#114 pop, #38 R&B, 1995) had a minimal impact on the chart.

Through her various production companies, Ross has produced a number of television specials and made-for-TV movies, including a film biography of Josephine Baker, in which she played the title role; 1994's Out of Darkness, where she played a paranoid schizophrenic; and 1999's Double Platinum. Music from the latter movie was actually included on Ross' 1999 album Every Day Is a New Day, but even that example of synergy did not help the record, which peaked at #108 (#47 R&B) despite "Not Over You Yet" hitting the Top 10 in England. In April 2000 the singer was the subject of a television special, VH1 Divas 2000: A Tribute to Diana Ross, that also starred Faith Hill, Donna Summer, and Manah Carey, but later that same year an acrimonious (Wilson declined to participate) Supremes reunion tour had to be cut short because of underwhelming ticket sales (see the Supremes entry for a fuller account).

Regardless of her career's ups and downs, Ross' stature among her fans and her power to draw attention to her endeavors is undiminished. She will always be the "first lady of Motown," the label's biggest and perhaps most important star and one of the top entertainers of her generation.

The Rossington-Collins Band

Formed 1979, Jacksonville, FL

Gary Rossington, gtr.; Allen Collins (b. ca. 1952; d. Jan. 23, 1990, Jacksonville), gtr.; Billy Powell, kybds.; Leon Wilkeson (d. July 27, 2001, Ponte Vedra Beach, FL), bass; Barry Harwood (b. GA), gtr., voc.; Derek Hess, drums; Dale Krantz (b. IN), lead voc.

1980—Anytime, Anyplace, Anywhere (MCA) 1981—This Is the Way.

The Rossington Band: 1988—Love Your Man (MCA).

The Rossington-Collins Band was formed by four of the five surviving members of Lynyrd Skynyrd. Nearly two years after the 1977 plane crash that killed Skynyrd lead singer Ronnie

Van Zant, guitarist Steve Gaines, and backup vocalist Cassie Gaines, Jacksonville natives Gary Rossington, Allen Collins, Billy Powell, and Leon Wilkeson—all of whom had been injured in the crash—decided to regroup. Of the surviving Skynyrd, only drummer Artimus Pyle declined to join the new band. (He went on to form his own five-piece Artimus Pyle Band in 1979 with members of the Marshall Tucker Band producing.)

Rossington-Collins solidified in late 1979. Female vocalist Dale Krantz, who sang in church gospels as a child, had played with Leon Russell in L.A. after graduating college and in 1977 joined Ronnie Van Zant's brother Donnie's 38 Special as a backup singer. Her hoarse vocals and tough persona surprised many and delighted critics. The group also included Barry Harwood, who completed the three-guitar lineup (in the Skynyrd tradition). He also came from Jacksonville, had done session work with Joe South and Melanie, and had played on three Skynyrd LPs. The last member was Derek Hess, also from Jacksonville, who had played in some local bands with Harwood.

The group's self-produced debut, Anytime, Anyplace, Anywhere, came out in June 1980 and went gold. Soon after the LP's release, Collins' wife, Katy, died. RCB dedicated its second album, This Is the Way, to her. Though the group seemed to have a promising future, it disbanded in 1983. Collins formed the Allen Collins Band with Powell, Wilkeson, Harwood, and Hess. Paralyzed in a 1986 car accident, he died in 1990. Krantz and Rossington married and started their own group in the late '80s. In 1991 Rossington, Powell, Wilkeson, and former Lynyrd Skynyrd guitarist Ed King put together a new version of Skynyrd, with Johnny Van Zant on lead vocals. Dale Krantz sang backup.

2000—Don't Bore Us, Get to the Chorus (Edel America).

Per Gessle solo: 1997—The World According to Per Gessle

(Fundamental/EMI, Swe.).

In the late '80s and early '90s, a bunch of catchy, well-executed singles made the duo Roxette Sweden's most successful musical export since Abba. Like Abba, singer Marie Fredriksson and songwriter, rhythm guitarist, and vocalist Per Gessle specialized in glossy, guilty-pleasure pop. Gessle had fronted a popular Swedish band, Gyllene Tider, and Fredriksson had embarked on a solo career before the two joined forces in the mid-'80s. From the start, they set their sights on the English-speaking market that is essential to international stardom, writing and recording in English.

Their plan paid off in 1989, when Roxette's second album, 1988's Look Sharp!, made a big splash in the U.S., generating the #1 pop singles "The Look" and "Listen to Your Heart" and the #2 hit "Dangerous." In 1990 Fredriksson and Gessle again topped the singles chart with the ballad "It Must Have Been Love," featured on the soundtrack to the film Pretty Woman. The following year, Roxette released Joyride, which spawned another #1 hit with the title track; another cut, "Fading Like a Flower (Every Time You Leave)," went to #2. At this point the pair was so popular in their native land that the Swedish government issued a postage stamp with their likenesses. Also in 1991 the duo began its first worldwide tour, enlisting support from the same group of musicians who had played on their albums. But a fourth album, 1992's Tourism, produced no major hits. The next year, Roxette appeared on another movie soundtrack, Super Mario Bros., with the song "Almost Unreal."

When 1994's Crash! Boom! Bang! proved to be more popular everywhere but the U.S., Roxette's 1995 tour skipped North America altogether, instead concentrating on such exotic locales as Moscow, South Africa, and Beijing, making it the first Western pop act to perform in China since Wham! a decade earlier. Similarly, a greatest-hits collection, the coyly titled Don't Bore Us, Get to the Chorus, was released worldwide except for the U.S. in 1995. (It was released in the U.S. five years later.) The duo rerecorded several of its hits in Spanish for Baladas en Español in 1997. Also that year, Gessle released his first solo album recorded in English. (Both Gessle and Fredriksson had previously released solo efforts in Swedish.) After some time off to devote to their families, Roxette returned with an LP and an EP in Sweden in 1999, and began work on Room Service, scheduled for release in 2001.

Roxy Music defined the tone of '70s art rock by coupling Bryan Ferry's elegant, wistful romantic irony with initially anarchic and later subdued, lush rock. The band was never as popular in America as it was in Europe, perhaps because its detachment and understatement baffled American tastes. But Ferry's witty hoping-against-hopelessness persona and Brian Eno's happy amateurism filtered into the late-'70s new wave while Roxy Music itself was in suspension.

Ferry and bassist Graham Simpson began searching for band mates around November 1970. Ferry, who would write almost all of Roxy's songs, is the son of a coal miner. He attended the University of Newcastle, where he studied art for three years with pop-conceptual artist Richard Hamilton. At school he sang in a more rock-oriented band, the Banshees, before joining an R&B band called the Gas Board with Simpson. He also taught art.

In January 1971 Andy Mackay joined the fledgling band; he had played oboe as a teenager with the London Symphony Orchestra and saxophone at Reading University. Mackay brought Eno with him. The earliest lineup also included classical percussionist Dexter Lloyd, who left by June, and guitarist Roger Bunn, who soon returned to session work. Drummer Paul Thompson had played with a local band, Smokestack, and guitarist Davy O'List had been with the Nice. O'List left after five months and was replaced by Phil Manzanera from the experimental band Quiet Sun.

Then Simpson decided to give up music, and Roxy Music recorded its debut album with Rik Kenton. They would never have a full member on bass. The group's debut album, produced by King Crimson lyricist Peter Sinfield, went Top 10 in England in 1972, and "Virginia Plain" went to #4 in Britain, where Roxy Music's '50s-style retro-chic costumes fit in with the glam-rock fad, although its music was far more sophisticatedly primitive. In addition, Ferry's lyrics ranged from deliriously campy to acutely sensitive, and his '50s-greaser-cum-suave-matinee-idol good looks seemed incongruous at the time. This was most apparent when Roxy Music served as opening act for Jethro Tull on a December 1972 U.S. arena tour.

The second Roxy Music album, For Your Pleasure, met with a similar reaction, its strangeness was popular in Britain and ignored in America. In July 1973 Eno [see entry] left for a solo career—perhaps inevitably, since he was a songwriter himself, and Roxy Music was Ferry's outlet. Ferry cut his first solo album in 1973, These Foolish Things. While treating Lesley Gore and Bob Dylan songs with equal camp disengagement, Ferry also showed a deep affection for pop tradition, which would continue throughout his solo career.

Teenage multi-instrumentalist Eddie Jobson, formerly with Curved Air, replaced Eno for Stranded, which also included writing credits for Manzanera and Mackay. With Eno gone, the music now focused on Ferry's singing rather than the band's counterpoint. Country Life, also released in 1974, was Roxy's first U.S. success; it went to #37, although its cover, with a glimpse of pubic hair through panties, was banned in some record stores, covered with an opaque wrapper elsewhere, and finally replaced with an inoffensive forest photo.

Roxy toured the U.S. in 1975 with bassist John Wetton, formerly of King Crimson and Family, and later with Uriah Heep, U.K., and Asia. After its most singlemindedly danceable record, Siren—which included Roxy's first U.S. hit single, "Love Is the Drug" (#30, 1976)—the group took what it described as an indefinite "rest," leaving the live LP Viva! and Greatest Hits in its wake.

Ferry's fourth solo album, In Your Mind (1977), was the occasion for a world tour with Roxy's Manzanera, Wetton, and Thompson providing backup. For 1978's The Bride Stripped Bare, Ferry recorded with L.A. sessionmen and several Roxy regulars. Mackay released solo albums and wrote music for the British TV series Rock Follies, while Manzanera recorded and toured briefly with a band called 801, featuring Eno; he also re-formed Quiet Sun for a short time and played sessions for John Cale, Eno, Nico, and others.

In 1978 Roxy Music reunited for Manifesto, minus Jobson, who had joined U.K., the keyboardist later recorded with Frank Zappa and Jethro Tull. Manifesto (#23, 1979) (which includes "Dance Away" and "Angel Eyes") became Roxy's highest-charting U.S. album ever. The group embarked on a world tour with guest keyboardist Paul Carrack (formerly of Ace, and later with Squeeze, Nick Lowe, and Mike + the Mechanics) and two bassists, including Gary Tibbs, formerly of the Vibrators and later of Adam and the Ants. Just prior to that tour, Thompson broke his thumb in a motorcycle accident and left the band.

For 1980's Flesh + Blood Roxy Music was down to a threesome—Ferry, Manzanera, and Mackay—plus sessionmen. Though their most subdued album, it set Ferry's new (seemingly) heartfelt romantic longing against simpler but richer melodies and signaled a new direction. Flesh + Blood became the group's second #1 album in England (after Stranded) and went to #35 in the U.S. Avalon (#53, 1982) continued in the same vein and yielded the Top 10 British hit "More Than This." It was the group's only LP to sell a million copies in America. The next year Roxy Music toured the U.S. as an eight-piece band plus three backup singers, concurrent with a live EP called The High Road (which includes a version of John Lennon's "Jealous Guy," a #1 U.K. shortly after the ex-Beatle's murder). Heart Still Beating documents a 1982 French concert.

Given the '80s popularity of such clearly Roxy-influenced acts as the Cars, ABC, and Duran Duran, Ferry and the band's mix of outrageous humor ("In Every Dream Home a Heartache," a love song to an inflatable doll, "Do the Strand"), tongue-in-cheek cool, and exceptional musicianship, their lack of a wider U.S. audience is baffling. Roxy's early music videos, rarely seen in this country outside new-wave rock clubs, were as stylish as its album covers, and as artists' visual presentations became increasingly important, it would seem that Roxy's chance had come.

Since the breakup, Ferry's sporadic recorded output has maintained the sleek, meticulously produced sound of Avalon. Boys and Girls eventually went gold. "Kiss and Tell," a track off 1987's Bête Noir, became his only Top 40 U.S. hit after it was featured in the movie Bright Lights, Big City, starring Michael J. Fox. In 1976 Ferry had been romantically involved with Siren's cover girl, model Jerry Hall; she left him for Mick Jagger. In 1982 he married socialite Lucy Helmore, who'd recently graced the picture sleeve of the "Avalon" 45, a #13 U.K. hit. At the time of 1993's Taxi, another interpretive album (produced by, of all people, Robin Trower), Ferry hinted that a Roxy Music reunion might happen. Eight years later, in spring 2001, Ferry, Manzanera, and MacKay, along with Paul Thompson, Chris Spedding, and others, launched an international 30th anniversary tour.

Mackay and Manzanera's first post-Roxy venture was a group called the Explorers: they've also recorded as a duo and separately, with others, such as John Wetton (Manzanera) and with an instrumental band called the Players (Mackay).

Ferry's 1994 solo album, Mamouna, marked a reunion of sorts, with Manzanera, Mackay, and Eno all contributing to the project. The record didn't fair well commercially, although that wasn't the case with "Dance With Life (Brilliant Light)," Ferry's cut on the soundtrack to the movie Phenomenon, the single received airplay on a number of Adult Contemporary radio stations. The Grammy-nominated As Time Goes By (1999) was a mostly acoustic affair consisting of faithful, reverent covers of prewar pop standards, including songs by George Gershwin, Kurt Weill, and Cole Porter.

The Rumour

Bob Andrews (b. June 20, 1949), kybds., voc.; Stephen Goulding, drums; Andrew Bodnar, bass; Brinsley Schwarz, gtr., voc.; Martin Belmont, gtr.

1977—Max (Mercury) 1979—Frogs, Sprouts, Clogs and Krauts (Stiff) 1980—(- Andrews) 1981—Purity of Essence (Hannibal).

The Rumour, five veterans of England's pub-rock scene of the early '70s, is best known as Graham Parker's backup band on his first six LPs. But the group has also recorded its own albums. In addition, it has backed and produced other performers.

The Rumour was first heard from in 1976 on Parker's Howlin' Wind. Bob Andrews and Brinsley Schwarz came from the group Brinsley Schwarz (as did the LP's producer, Nick Lowe); Martin Belmont was originally in Ducks Deluxe; Andrew Bodnar and Stephen Goulding were the former rhythm section of Bontemps Roulee.

While working with Parker, members of the Rumour played on Lowe's Pure Pop for Now People and on debut LPs by Rachel Sweet and Carlene Carter (the latter produced by Andrews and Schwarz), and they recorded the albums Max (in reply to Fleetwood Mac's Rumours) and Frogs.

Andrews left the group in 1980, with the band continuing as a four-piece and recording Purity of Essence. The Rumour left Graham Parker a year later to back up Garland Jeffreys on tour (Goulding and Bodnar had played on Jeffreys' 1981 album Escape Artist). Belmont went on to record and tour with Nick Lowe. Bodnar has played on Parker's records since the mid-'80s, Schwarz, too, has graced several Parker LPs. Goulding joined the Mekons.

The Runaways

Joan Jett (b. Sep. 22, 1960, Philadelphia, PA), gtr., voc.; Sandy West (b. 1960), drums; Micki Steele (b. Michael Steele, June 2, 1954), bass, voc.; - Steele; † Cherie Currie (b. 1960, Los Angeles), lead voc.; + Lita Ford (b. Sep. 23, 1959, London, Eng.), gtr.; + Jackie Fox (b. 1960), bass.

1976—The Runaways (Mercury) 1977—Queens of Noise (- Fox; - Currie; + Vicki Blue, bass); Waitin' for the Night 1981—Little Lost Girls (Rhino) 1982—Best of the Runaways.

The Runaways were an all-female hard-rock band who suffered from hype, manipulation, and being slightly ahead of their time. Formed on the Sunset Strip in late 1975 by Kim Fowley, they were presented as five hot, tough high-school-age girls out for sex and fun (a fairly novel idea in prepunk days). But with their musical deficiencies, the stigma of Fowley-as-Svengali, and a blatantly sexual presentation—lead singer Cherie Currie wore lingerie onstage—they often seemed more like tease objects than real musicians.

The group started when Fowley met 13-year-old lyricist Kan Krome at a party. He liked her three-minute lyrics about sex, and when she suggested girls a few years older than herself to play her songs, Fowley was interested. First they got Krome's acquaintance Joan Jett and then, through some local ads, Micki Steele and Sandy West. They were going to be a threesome, but after Steele left, Lita Ford, Cherie Currie, and Jackie Fox joined. Only Ford had been in a band before.

The Runaways signed to Mercury, and their Alice Cooper-influenced debut (with much material cowritten by Fowley) came out in May 1976 to universal pans and snickers. Their only real audience was in Japan, where they earned three gold records for their debut and for Queens of Noise (for which Currie and Jett split lead vocals) and Live in Japan. But after some internal conflict, Currie and Fox left in mid-1977. Jett, who already did most of the writing by that time, took over the lead. Vickie Blue was added on bass. Currie went on to become an actress, costarring with Jodie Foster in Foxes (1980), and then appearing in a succession of straight-to-video titles such as Parasite (1982) and Rich Girl (1991). She later recorded an LP with her sister Marie entitled Messin' With the Boys.

The Runaways' Waitin' for the Night did no better than its predecessors. The band turned in good performances as U.S. openers for the Ramones' 1978 tour, but they played their final show that year on New Year's Eve. Jett felt that their last LP, And Now the Runaways! (out in Europe only; released in the U.S. as Little Lost Girls in 1981), was too heavy metal, and so at the start of 1979 she quit, and the group died. Afterward Jett took part in a B movie based loosely on the group, entitled We're All Crazy Now, after the Slade song.

Both Jett and Ford went on to successful solo careers [see entries]. Micki—now known as Michael—Steele, meanwhile, joined the poppier Bangles in 1983. Jett paid homage to her former band by reviving its "Cherry Bomb" on her 1984 album Glorious Results of a Misspent Youth. The following year Kim Fowley put together a new Runaways with fresh recruits. After one album, 1987's Young and Fast, they broke up. Various aggregations of original members have reunited for performances over the years.

An eclectically accomplished musician and studio virtuoso, Todd Rundgren has been recording for more than three decades. His musical career has gone from simple pop that never brought the success some critics felt he deserved (only one gold LP, Something/Anything?) to the more complex progressive rock of Utopia, which did gain Rundgren a devoted cult following. Through it all, this multi-instrumentalist has maintained a prolific sideline career as a producer: he must also be regarded as a pioneer of rock video, interactive CD, and Web-based music.

Rundgren began playing in a high-school band. Money, then went on to play with Woody's Truckstop in the mid-'60s (a tape recording of the latter makes a brief appearance on Something/Anything?) In 1967 he formed the Nazz [see entry], which, contrary to then-prevailing West Coast psychedelic trends, tried to replicate the look of Swinging London in its clothes, Mod haircuts, and Beatles-ish pop sound. In some ways the Nazz was ahead of its time, especially in terms of Rundgren's studio facility and the band's musical sophistication. But the quartet remained a local Philadelphia phenomenon, with one minor hit single, the original version of "Hello It's Me." The Nazz broke up in 1969, at which point Rundgren formed the studio band Runt and hit the Top 20 in 1971 with the single "We Gotta Get You a Woman."

By this time Rundgren had become associated with manager Albert Grossman, who let him produce for his new Bearsville label. By 1972 Rundgren had taken over production of Badfinger's Straight Up LP from George Harrison (who was involved with his Bangla Desh concerts) and had engineered the Band's Stage Fright and Jesse Winchester's self-titled 1971 LP as well as produced records by the Hello People, bluesman James Cotton, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, and Halfnelson (who later became Sparks). In 1973 he would produce the New York Dolls' debut LP, Grand Funk Railroad's We're an American Band, and Fanny's Mother's Pride.

For many, Something/Anything? (#29, 1972) is the high-water mark of Rundgren's solo career. On it he played nearly all the instruments, overdubbed scores of vocals, and managed to cover pop bases from Motown to Hendrix, from the Beach Boys to the Beatles. The album yielded hit singles in "I Saw the Light" (#16, 1972) and "Hello It's Me" (#5, 1973).

A Wizard/A True Star (#86, 1973), while in much the same vein, was more of a critical than commercial success. However, Rundgren's cult following was growing. In Wizard's liner notes he asked fans to send their names to him for inclusion in a poster to be contained in his next LP. As promised, 1974's Todd included that poster—with some 10,000 names printed on it in tiny type.

That same year Rundgren unveiled his cosmic/symphonic progressive-rock band Utopia, which gradually expanded his following to mammoth proportions. Utopia was a more democratic band, in which Rundgren shared songwriting and lead vocals with other members (from 1977 on: Roger Powell, Kasim Sulton, and Willie Wilcox). In the mid-'70s Utopia played bombastic suites with "cosmic" lyrics and used pyramids as a backdrop, but in the '80s it returned to Beatles/new wave-style pop (Faithful [#54, 1976]). Despite some excellent music, the quartet never placed a single in the Top 40 or saw any of its 11 albums go gold. One of their songs, "Love Is the Answer," was a 1979 Top 10 hit for England Dan and John Ford Coley.

In 1975 Rundgren produced Gong guitarist Steve Hillage's L, on which Utopia played backup. A trip to the Middle East in 1978 led Rundgren to a brief flirtation with Sufism; that same year Hermit of Mink Hollow (#36, 1978) produced his first hit single in several years in "Can We Still Be Friends?" (a minor hit for Robert Palmer a year later). Rundgren also produced Meat Loaf's monstrously successful Bat Out of Hell. In 1979 alone he produced Tom Robinson's TRB Two, the Tubes' Remote Control, and Patti Smith's Wave; in 1980 he produced Shaun Cassidy's Wasp.

By that time Rundgren had taken a strong interest in the emerging field of rock video. By 1981 he had built his own computer-video studio in Woodstock, New York, and was making technically advanced surrealistic videotapes. In 1982 Rundgren embarked on a one-man tour, playing sets that were solo-acoustic as well as those in which he was backed by taped band arrangements, with his computer-graphic videos being shown also. He still concentrated on production (with the Psychedelic Furs, among others) and video art.

Utopia took an indefinite sabbatical in 1985. Sulton, in addition to recording on his own, has played with Joan Jett, Hall and Oates, Patty Smyth, and Cheap Trick. Powell, designer of a shoulder-strap keyboard called the Powell Probe, now engineers software for a computer-graphics firm, while Wilcox writes and produces. In 1992 the four reunited for a tour of Japan, captured on Utopia Redux '92.

The following year Rundgren went back out on the road as a high-tech one-man band to perform his unique new album No World Order. The world's first interactive music-only CD (available on Philips), it allowed listeners to reshape the 10 songs into an infinite number of versions. To hear the same version of a song twice, Rundgren claimed, users would have to play the disc 24 hours a day, seven days a week "well into the next millennium." Continuing in a similar vein, he then released The Individualist, an enhanced CD which paired each song with its lyrics, graphics, and video. At about that time he came up with the monicker TR-i (Todd Rundgren—interactive), to be used for his multimedia work. In typical fashion, though, his next move was to rerecord several of his old songs in bossa-nova arrangements on 1997's With a Twist . . . (which also featured Utopia bassist Sulton). That same year he was one of the few Westerners invited to play the Shanghai Festival.

Consistently fascinated with new technological developments, Rundgren created PatroNet, a Web-based service in which subscribers could purchase new songs after paying a yearly fee, in 1998. The 2000 release One Long Year collected some of the songs sold through PatroNet. That year he embarked on a tour in which he performed material from his entire catalogue in a power-trio formation that also included Sulton and drummer Trey Sabatelli.

Run-D.M.C.

Formed 1981, Hollis, Queens, NY
 Run (b. Joseph Simmons, Nov. 14, 1964), voc.; D.M.C.
 (b. Darryl McDaniels, May 31, 1964), voc.; Jam Master Jay
 (b. Jason Mizell, Jan. 21, 1965), turntables, programming.
 1984—Run-D.M.C. (Profile) 1985—King of Rock 1986—
Raising Hell 1988—Tougher Than Leather 1990—*Back
 From Hell* 1991—Together Forever: Greatest Hits 1983–1991
 1993—Down With the King 2001—Crown Royal (Arista).

Run-D.M.C. took hardcore hip-hop from an underground street sensation to a pop-culture phenomenon. Although earlier artists, such as Grandmaster Flash and the Sugar Hill Gang, made rap's initial strides on the airwaves, it was Run-D.M.C. that introduced hats, gold chains, and untied sneakers to youth culture's most stubborn demographic group: white, male, suburban rock fans. In the process, the trio helped change the course of popular music, paving the way for rap's second generation.

The members of Run-D.M.C. grew up together in the middle-class New York neighborhood of Hollis, Queens. By the time Joey Simmons reached his teens, his older brother Russell was becoming a major figure in the burgeoning rap scene, establishing Rush Productions and later cofounding the trailblazing rap label Def Jam along with his white partner Rick Rubin. With Russell's help and encouragement, Joey and Darryl McDaniels started rapping together in the Simmons home.

Upon graduating high school in 1982, the two recruited their old basketball buddy, Jay Mizell, to back them on turntables. Run-D.M.C.'s first single was the groundbreaking 1983 anthem "It's Like That" b/w "Sucker M.C.'s" (#15 R&B); it was followed the same year by "Hard Times" b/w "Jam-Master Jay" (#11 R&B). The songs' sparse music and booming vocal delivery was informed as much by rock as by the pseudo-jazz of earlier recorded rap songs. Moreover, the first single introduced Simmons and McDaniels' unconventional vocal style. Rather than trade off on the verses, they finished each other's lines. The group followed up with a string of R&B chart hits, including "Rock Box" (#22, 1984), "30 Days" (#16, 1984), "King of Rock" (#14, 1985), "You Talk Too Much" (#19, 1985), and "Can You Rock It Like This" (#19, 1985). In 1985 Run-D.M.C. starred in the movie Krush Groove alongside Kurtis Blow, the Fat Boys, and the Beastie Boys.

Run-D.M.C.'s third album, 1986's Raising Hell (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1986), confirmed the group's self-professed "King of Rock" status. In a clever marketing scheme, Rick Rubin teamed Run-D.M.C. with Steven Tyler and Joe Perry of then-fading pop-metal band Aerosmith for a remake of the latter's 1976 hit "Walk This Way." The song sent suburban metal-heads jumping for their air guitars, as it reached #4 on Billboard's pop chart (#8 R&B), while helping to reinvigorate Aerosmith's career. Other singles from Raising Hell included "My Adidas" (#5, 1986), which won the group a corporate sponsorship, "You Be Illin'" (#29 pop, #12 R&B, 1986), and "It's Tricky" (#57 pop, #21 R&B, 1987).

Run-D.M.C. began its decline after 1988's Tougher Than Leather, putting out albums but barely making it into the Top 100. Tougher Than Leather, though it reached #9 on the pop-album chart and went platinum, was a critical failure, and the film of the same name was a box-office bomb. Back From Hell was the group's first album not to go gold; by then, McDaniels and Simmons were recovering from drug and alcohol problems, as well as a rape charge (later dropped) against the latter. In 1993 Run-D.M.C. bounced back with their cleaned-up, Christian-themed seventh album, Down With the King, which entered the R&B chart at #1 (#7 pop) and sold nearly 500,000 copies. By 1995 McDaniels was a deacon in his church and Simmons an ordained minister. Simmons also founded a gospel label, REV RUN Records and wrote a self-help book, It's Like That: The Way to Spiritual Abundance. Run-D.M.C. continued to tour throughout the '90s and enjoyed an international hit single via Jason Nevins' 1998 remix of "It's Like That." In 2001 Arista released the group's album Crown Royal (#37), which featured contributions from Kid Rock, Fred Durst, Method Man, Nas, and Sugar Ray.

RuPaul

Born RuPaul Andre Charles, Nov. 17, 1960, San Diego, CA
 1993—Supermodel of the World (Tommy Boy) 1996—*Foxy
 Lady* (Rhino) 1997—Ho Ho Ho.

Pop-culture mini-phenomenon RuPaul became nearly ubiquitous in the '90s entertainment media as a black drag queen singing neo-disco and propagating a philosophy that combined self-help assertiveness, a genial attack on convention, and a Warholian emphasis on marketing and self-promotion.

In the early '80s, RuPaul was a fixture of Atlanta's art scene and sang in various comedy, cabaret, and/or rock groups (notably RuPaul and the U-Hauls and Wee Wee Pole) until he moved to New York in the late '80s. There, taken up by denizens of the fashionable demimonde, the 6-foot-7-inch (in heels) personality eventually signed with Tommy Boy. Off his debut album, "Supermodel (You Better Work)" was a video-channel and dance-club hit (#45 pop), and RuPaul began appearing regularly on the talk-show circuit. In 1993 his career began taking off. He recorded a duet version of Elton John's "Don't Go Breaking My Heart" for John's Duets album, contributed vocals to the Addams Family Values soundtrack, released a Christmas single ("Little Drummer Boy") from a cable television special, RuPaul's Christmas Ball, and landed a part in the Spike Lee film, Crooklyn.

In 1995 RuPaul penned an autobiography, Lettin' It All Hang Out. The year before, he became spokesman for Canadian Make-Up Art Cosmetics (MAC), the first drag queen ever to represent a cosmetics company. In 1996 he hosted a late-night talk/variety show on VH1. His screen credits include The Brady Bunch and A Very Brady Sequel.

Tom Rush

Born Feb. 8, 1941, Portsmouth, NH

1962—Tom Rush: Live at the Unicorn (Lycornu) 1963—Got a Mind to Ramble (Prestige); Blues Songs and Ballads 1965—Blues and Folk (Transatlantic); Tom Rush (Elektra) 1966—Take a Little Walk With Me 1968—The Circle Game 1970—Tom Rush (Columbia); Wrong End of the Rainbow; Classic Rush (Elektra) 1971—Merrimack County 1974—Ladies Love Outlaws 1975—The Best of Tom Rush (Columbia) 1982—Tom Rush: New Year (Night Light) 1984—Tom Rush: Late Night Radio 1993—Tom Rush: Work in Progress 1999—The Very Best of Tom Rush: No Regrets (Legacy).

Singer and occasional songwriter Tom Rush came to prominence while working the Cambridge, Massachusetts, coffeehouse circuit (he holds a B.A. from Harvard) in the early '60s. He was eclectic from the beginning, experimenting with blues, jazz, classical arrangements, and electric instrumentation.

The Circle Game, one of pop's first concept albums, yielded Rush's two best-known performances: his own "No Regrets" and the album's title cut, written by Joni Mitchell. Rush was performing songs by Mitchell, Jackson Browne, and James Taylor before any of them were well known. The latter singer has cited Rush as a prime influence on his work. Merrimack County presaged a two-year period of self-imposed retirement, broken only by the more commercial Ladies Love Outlaws. In 1980 he founded Maple Hill Productions, through which he arranged a series of concerts under the name Club 47 (after the famous Cambridge coffeehouse where Rush, Dylan, Baez, and other seminal folk artists began) to introduce modern folk artists. He also started his own mail-order record label, Night Light Recordings. He continues to write and record, he tours regularly. He is also deeply involved in the wildlife protection organization, the Wolf Fund. He currently hosts his own shows at Boston's Club Passim (formerly the famed Club 47).

Rush

Formed 1969, Toronto, Can.

Alex Lifeson (b. Alex Zivojinovich, Aug. 27, 1953, Surnie, B.C., Can.), gtr.; Geddy Lee (b. Gary Lee Weinrib, July 29, 1953, Toronto), voc., bass, gtr., kybds.; John Rutsey, drums. 1974—Rush (Moon/Mercury) (- Rutsey; + Neil Peart [b. Sep. 12, 1952, Hamilton, Ont., Can.], drums) 1975—Fly by Night; Careless of Steel 1976—2112; All the World's a Stage 1977—A Farewell to Kings 1978—Hemispheres 1980—Permanent Waves 1981—Moving Pictures; Exit... Stage Left 1982—Signals 1984—Grace Under Pressure 1985—Power Windows 1987—Hold Your Fire 1989—A Show of Hands; Presto (Atlantic) 1990—Chronicles (Mercury) 1991—Roll the Bones (Atlantic) 1993—Counterparts 1996—Test for Echo 1998—Different Stages—Live. Geddy Lee solo: 2000—My Favorite Headache (Atlantic). Victor (Alex Lifeson solo): 1996—Victor (Atlantic).

Since the release of its 1976 breakthrough, 2112, this Canadian, progressive power trio has released nothing but gold or platinum albums. Rush's early critics cited vintage Yes when they first heard singer Geddy Lee's high-pitched vocals, Alex Lifeson's major-chord guitar heroics, and Neil Peart's heavy but adroit drumming. Instruments wrapped themselves around intricate, often epic-length musical structures that carried Peart's apocalyptic lyrics. The band has since won respect as an inventive thinking-person's hard-rock unit. Virtuoso instrumentalists, the three regularly place high in the readers polls of musicians' magazines.

Rush's initial success was based on diligent touning, as the group established itself first in Canada and the northern U.S., then gradually expanded its following despite limited airplay. The futuristic concept album 2112 (#61, 1976), made Rush into a late-'70s force to be reckoned with. But Permanent Waves (#4, 1980) caused the trio's popularity to soar. The album, Rush's eighth, marked something of a departure with its shorter compositions, which characterized the band's work into the '90s. The platinum Signals (#10, 1982) introduced a refined sound: shimmering guitar similar to the Police's Andy Summers', warm synthesizer backdrops, and, most notably, relatively subdued vocals from Lee, who now sang in a lower (and far more listenable) register. That remained the blueprint for Rush's music throughout the '80s and early '90s. Each of Rush's five albums through 1985's Power Windows sold at least 1 million copies, with Moving Pictures (#3, 1981) moving over 4 million units. While Rush remained the antithesis of a singles band, Signals produced an actual hit, "New World Man" (#21, 1982).

The group lowered its profile somewhat later in the decade, scaling back on touring. Yet the titles from 1987's Hold Your Fire through 1998's Different Stages—Live (#35) still sold either gold or platinum. Counterpoints (#2, 1993) recalled Rush's earlier, earthier sound, with Lifeson once again the instrumental focus. The band then went on an 18-month hiatus. Peart worked on a tribute album to drummer Buddy Rich. With guest help from Primus' Les Claypool, Lifeson made an album under the name Victor. Nevertheless, Rush's next studio offering, Test for Echo, leaped to #5 in 1996. In 1998 the trio went on sabbatical again. A devastated Peart had lost his 19-year-old daughter in an auto accident, when his wife Jacqueline died of cancer about a year later. The drummer coped with his grief by riding his motorcycle from Alaska to Mexico. During this period, Lee recorded his solo debut, 2000's My Favorite Headache. In 2001 the trio reconvened to begin work on a new album due out in 2002.

The Canadian trio has altered more than just its music over the years. Once perceived as a rather dour bunch (due largely to Peart's often weighty lyrics), Rush has long since revealed a sly sense of humor. In 1982 Lee sang on the Top 20 hit "Take Off" by Bob and Doug McKenzie, the Canadian-bumpkin satire by Dave Thomas and Rick Moranis of the Canada-based TV comedy show SCTV. Another SCTV character, Joe Flaherty's Count Floyd, introduced the group via video on its 1984 tour. Rush often takes the stage to such prerecorded self-deprecating bits as the Three Stooges theme or Pavement's "Stereo."

Jimmy Rushing

Born Aug. 26, 1903, Oklahoma City, OK; died June 8, 1972, New York, NY

1978—The Essential Jimmy Rushing (Vanguard) 1980—Mister Five by Five (Columbia) 1988—The You and Me That Used to Be (RCA) 1999—Oh Love (Vanguard).

Known as "Mr. Five by Five" for his short and wide physique, Jimmy Rushing was arguably the best male blues-based vocalist of the swing era, during which he was a featured attraction with Count Basie's orchestra (1935–50). His tenor voice and his phrasing easily fit jazz, blues, pop, and shouting R&B.

Born to musical parents, Rushing studied violin, piano, and theory as a child, and he sang in church, school glee clubs, and opera-hall pageants. As a teenager he hoboed through the Midwest before moving to California, where he occasionally sang with Jelly Roll Morton and worked solo as a barroom singer/pianist. In the late '20s he was with the seminal Kansas City swing band Walter Page's Blue Devils, and from 1929 to 1935 he was a vocalist with another important early Kansas City big band, Bennie Moten's Kansas City Orchestra.

Rushing then worked with Count Basie, often sharing the microphone with Billie Holiday. In 1946 he recorded with Johnny Otis, and in the early '50s he led his own septet at New York's Savoy Ballroom. He had a resurgence in popularity in the late '50s, and in 1964 he toured Australia and Japan with Eddie Condon's All Stars. He also toured with Benny Goodman's orchestra, appeared on several TV specials, and in 1969 had a singing and acting role in the Gordon Parks film The Learning Tree. In 1972 he died from leukemia. Rushing was an immensely influential vocalist for generations of blues, jazz, R&B, pop, and rock singers, and his performances are available on a number of albums under both his own and Basie's names.

Leon Russell

Born Claude Russell Bridges, Apr. 2, 1941, Lawton, OK
1968—Asylum Choir: Looking Inside (Smash) 1970—Leon Russell (A&M/Shelter) 1971—Asylum Choir II (Shelter); Leon Russell and the Shelter People 1972—Carry 1973—Leon Live; Hank Wilson's Back 1974—Stop All That Jazz 1975—Will o' the Wisp; Live in Japan 1976—Wedding Album (with Mary Russell) (Paradise); Best of Leon Russell (Shelter) 1977—Make Love to the Music (with Mary Russell) (Paradise) 1978—Americana 1979—Willie and Leon (with Willie Nelson) (Columbia); Live and Love (Paradise) 1981—Leon Russell and New Grass Revival Live (Warner Bros.) 1984—Solid State (Paradise); Hank Wilson, vol. II 1992—Anything Can Happen (Virgin) 1997—Retrospective (Shelter/The Right Stuff) 1998—Hank Wilson, vol. III—Legend in My Time (Ark 21) 1999—Face in the Crowd (Sagestone).

Leon Russell is perhaps best known as one of the first super-sessionmen, having worked for everyone from Jerry Lee Lewis and Phil Spector to Joe Cocker, Bob Dylan, and the Rolling Stones. He has also maintained a solo career as a countryish blues-gospel performer.

A multi-instrumentalist, Russell studied classical piano from ages 3 to 13. At 14 he learned trumpet and formed his own band in Tulsa (where he grew up) and lied about his age to land a job at a Tulsa nightclub, where he played with Ronnie Hawkins and the Hawks (who later became the Band). Soon after, Jerry Lee Lewis took Russell's band on tour. In 1958 Russell moved to L.A., where he learned guitar from Rick Nelson—sideman James Burton and did studio work with Dorsey Burnette, Glen Campbell, and others. Russell played on nearly all of Phil Spector's hit sessions. He also played on Bob Lind's "Elusive Butterfly," Herb Alpert's "A Taste of Honey," and the Byrds' "Mr. Tambourine Man." In the mid-'60s he arranged some hit records by Gary Lewis and the Playboys, including the gold "This Diamond Ring." He became a close friend of Delaney and Bonnie Bramlett and in 1967 built his own studio. He occasionally appeared on the TV rock show Shindig! in the Shindogs band. He also played on Gene Clark's 1967 album, and arranged Harper's Bizarre's 1967 Feel'n' Groovy LP.

In 1968 Russell teamed up with guitarist Marc Benno to make the critically acclaimed but commercially unsuccessful Asylum Choir LP. He then went on the road with Delaney and Bonnie's Friends tour, during which time Joe Cocker recorded Russell's "Delta Lady" at Russell's studio.

where Booker T. (of MG's fame) was also working. In 1969 Russell and A&M producer Denny Cordell founded Shelter Records. The following year Russell organized the backing band for Cocker's Mad Dogs and Englishmen Tour, an event and film that eventually made him as much of a star as Cocker. When Mercury seemed reluctant to release the second Asylum Choir LP, Russell bought the master tapes and released them himself on Shelter. He played piano on Bob Dylan's "Watching the River Flow" and "When I Paint My Masterpiece" and played at George Harrison's Concert for Bangla Desh in 1971.

From then on, Russell devoted his energies to his solo career, though he toured with the Rolling Stones in the early '70s. He also helped out his wife, singer Mary McCreary, who appeared with him on Wedding Album and released her own Butterflies in Heaven LP on Shelter in 1973. His first U.K. solo tour, in 1970, found him backed by the ex-Cocker Grease Band. That year he also played on Dave Mason's Alone Together LP. In fall 1970 Russell hosted a highly praised hour-long music special on public TV station WNET in New York. Leon Russell and the Shelter People (#17, 1971) went gold, while Carny (#2, 1972) also went gold on the strength of its Top 20 single "Tight Rope." Leon Live went gold as well, and in 1976 Russell's "This Masquerade" (as performed by George Benson) won a Grammy.

After that, Russell returned to his southwestern roots, recording and performing with Willie Nelson and leading a bluegrass band, the New Grass Revival. In recent years, Russell's recordings have been few. Bruce Hornsby produced Russell's long-awaited major-label "comeback" album, Anything Can Happen, which failed to spark much interest. After another long period of silence, the songwriter returned in 1998 with the traditional, country-minded Hank Wilson, vol. III. The followup, Face in the Crowd, is a bluesier affair.

Bobby Rydell

Born Robert Ridarelli, Apr. 26, 1942, Philadelphia, PA
1961—Bobby's Biggest Hits (Cameo) 1962—Biggest Hits, vol. 2 2000—Now and Then (R.D.R.) 2001—The Complete Bobby Rydell (Capitol).

In the late '50s and early '60s, there was a preponderance of clean-cut American boys smoothing out the threatening rock & roll beat. The most successful of these was Pat Boone, but the center for this sound was Philadelphia, home of Dick Clark's American Bandstand, Frankie Avalon, Fabian, and Bobby Rydell.

Unlike many of the others, who were literally no more than pretty faces, Rydell was a genuine musician. He began playing drums at the age of six and was a nightclub attraction at seven. At nine he entered Paul Whiteman's local Teen Club amateur TV show and remained as a regular for three years (Whiteman shortened Ridarelli's surname to Rydell). In 1957 Rydell became the drummer for local rock & roll combo Rocco and His Saints (who also featured Frankie Avalon on trumpet), but he soon struck out on his own. Three major labels turned him down, and Rydell's first two singles for his manager Frankie Day's label flopped. He recorded three more failed singles for Cameo-Parkway.

In 1959 "Kissin' Time" became a #11 hit, launching a four-year period in which Rydell scored 19 Top 30 smashes, including "Volare" (#4), "Sway" (#14), "Swingin' School" (#5), and "Wild One" (#2), all in 1960, and "Forget Him" (#4, 1964). Beatlemania ended his career, as presaged by the film Bye Bye Birdie, in which he appeared as Hugo Peabody. Although his hitmaking days are behind him, Rydell continues to perform around the world. Since 1985, he has toured with Fabian and Avalon as one of the Golden Boys of Bandstand. Now and Then, issued in 2000 and partly comprising remakes of old hits, was Rydell's first album of new recordings in over two decades.

With Detroit: 1971—Detroit (Paramount).

Mitch Ryder is a white soul shouter from Detroit who reached his peak of popularity in the late '60s while fronting the Detroit Wheels. His career began well before that, though. Ryder, who was born in the Polish Detroit enclave of Hamtramck and whose father sang in a big band, had sung with local combos the Tempest and the Peps before forming Billy Lee and the Riveras. In 1965 their stage act (opening for the Dave Clark Five) caught the attention of Four Seasons-producer Bob Crewe, who signed them and gave Ryder the name he became famous with (supposedly picked out of a phone book) and rechristened the Riveras the Detroit Wheels.

Their first single combined Little Richard's "Jenny Jenny" and Chuck Willis' "C.C. Rider" into "Jenny Take a Ride," which became a #10 hit in 1966, inspiring followup medleys "Devil With a Blue Dress On" and "Good Golly Miss Molly" (#4, 1966) and "Too Many Fish in the Sea" and "Three Little Fishes" (#24, 1967). Ryder's next big hit came with the hard-rocking "Sock It to Me Baby" (#6, 1967), which was banned in some markets for allegedly being too suggestive.

At the peak of the group's success, Ryder—under the guidance of Crewe—split from the Detroit Wheels. Former Wheels Rusty Day and Jim McCarty went on to form Cactus with Tim Bogert and Carmine Appice, late of Vanilla Fudge; McCarty then joined the Rockets (with Wheels drummer Johnny Badanjek), who had a #30 hit in 1979, "Oh Well."

Ryder's first attempt at a solo career met with less success, though "What Now My Love" (#30, 1967) became his sixth (and last) Top 40 hit. In 1970 he and Badanjek formed a new seven-piece group known simply as Detroit. Its one album, released in 1971, contained a classic reworking of Lou Reed and the Velvet Underground's "Rock and Roll."

By 1973 Ryder had quit music and moved to Denver. He made a comeback in the late '70s with several albums, all containing his own songs, a few of which alluded to homosexual experiences. In 1983, two years after Bruce Springsteen helped to revive the career of his idol Gary "U.S." Bonds, longtime Ryder fan John Cougar Mellencamp produced the singer's major-label comeback, Never Kick a Sleeping Dog. It produced a minor hit in "When You Were Mine," written by Prince, and also contained a duet with Marianne Faithfull.

Since then, Ryder has continued to tour and record, particularly in Germany, where he is revered and has released many albums. In 2000 J-Bird Records issued many of these works in America. Ryder was in the news in 1994, when his song "Mercy," from Rite of Passage, was revealed to be a tribute to Dr. Jack Kevorkian. Johnny Badanjek, after a stint in the late '70s and '80s with the Rockets, was back with his old boss before playing with the Romantics and his own group, the Notorious Johnnies. Joseph Kubert died of liver cancer in 1991.

S

Sade

Born Helen Folasade Adu, Jan. 16, 1959, Ibadan, Nigeria
1985—Diamond Life (Portrait); Promise 1988—Stronger Than Pride (Epic) 1992—Love Deluxe 1994—The Best of Sade
2000—Lovers Rock.

Although Sade is officially a group, for all intents and purposes vocalist Sade (pronounced "shar-day" or "shah-day") is Sade. Born in Nigeria, where her Nigerian father was an economics professor and her English mother a nurse, Sade Adu (her stage name) was educated in London. After studying fashion design, and later modeling briefly, Sade landed a spot as backup singer with the British R&B band Pride. There she formed a writing partnership with Pride's guitarist/saxophonist Stewart Matthewman, together, backed by Pride's rhythm section, they began doing their own sets at Pride gigs. Sade's elegant, exotic look and the cool, jazz-inflected approach of her low-keyed singing immediately garnered her considerable attention. In 1983 Sade and Matthewman split from Pride along with keyboardist Andrew Hale, bassist Paul Denman, and drummer Paul Cooke and formed Sade; they got a record deal late that year.

Although Sade's 1984 debut, Diamond Life, with its single "Your Love Is King," quickly became a hit in Britain, the album wasn't released in the U.S. until 1985. Propelled by the bossa nova-tinged "Smooth Operator" (#5), Diamond Life (#5, 1985) rose to the Top 10; its popularity set the stage for the influx of "Quiet Storm" vocalists spearheaded by Anita Baker among others. Diamond Life featured strong original material by Sade and Matthewman including "Hang On to Your Love," and "When Am I Going to Make a Living" as well as an imaginative remake of Timmy Thomas' 1971 hit "Why Can't We Live Together."

Diamond Life had international sales of over 6 million copies, becoming one of the top-selling debut recordings of the '80s and the best-selling debut ever by a British female vocalist. In 1985 her stature as a major pop star was confirmed when Sade appeared at Wembley Stadium as part of Live Aid.

At the end of the year, Promise was released; the album went to #1 in the U.S. spawning the hits "The Sweetest Taboo" (#3) and "Never as Good as the First Time" (#8). Sade had a small part in the 1986 Julien Temple film Absolute Beginners and appears on its soundtrack.

Critics faulted 1988's Stronger Than Pride (#7) for musical sameness and emotional distance. Four years passed before the release of Love Deluxe (#3), whose brisk sales proved that Sade hadn't lost her appeal. An American tour to promote the release was also well received. Sade followed it with a best-of collection and an interactive CD-ROM and retreated to her home in Jamaica to have a baby in 1995. The following year, Matthewman, Denman, and Hale assumed the name Sweetback and released an album of the same name, calling in guest vocalists Maxwell and Amel Larrieux of Groove Theory.

Sade left Jamaica for London in 1997 and returned to the public scene in 2000 with the release of Lovers Rock (#3), which again found her teamed with Hale, Denman, and Matthewman.

Staff Sergeant Barry Sadler

Born 1940, NM; died Nov. 5, 1989, TN

1966—Ballads of the Green Berets (RCA); The "A" Team.

While recuperating from a leg wound suffered in Vietnam, Staff Sergeant Barry Sadler began writing what would become the #1 single of 1966, the patnotic novelty "The Ballad of the Green Berets." The song, inspired by Robin Moore's best-selling book The Green Berets (Sadler's face is on the cover of the paperback edition), was written by Moore (lyrics) and Sadler (music). The similarly named LP also went to #1 and contained such Sadler compositions as "Letter From Vietnam," "Saigon," "Trooper's Lament," and "Salute to the Nurses." Both the single and the LP were certified gold soon after their release.

Sadler wasn't heard from again until December 1978, when he was involved in a Nashville shooting incident that left local songwriter Lee Bellamy, 51, dead. The fracas was apparently over a woman; no charges were filed against Sadler. In mid-1981 Sadler was involved in another shooting incident, in Memphis, though the victim—an ex-business partner of his—wasn't killed. Sadler, in fact, justified his innocent plea by explaining, "I'm a Green Beret. If I'd shot him, he'd be dead." He wrote a series of adventure novels; the hero was a mercenary. He also established a trust fund for Vietnamese orphans.

In 1988 Sadler was shot in the head during a robbery attempt while he was entering a cab in Guatemala. Exactly what he was doing there remains a bit of a mystery. He claimed to have been there training anti-Communist contras; others have disputed that. He suffered some degree of brain damage, and as a result of the shooting was left with some paralysis as well; he died of heart failure the following year at age 49.

Doug Sahn/Sir Douglas Quintet

Born Nov. 6, 1941, San Antonio, TX; died Nov. 18, 1999, Taos, NM

1971—The Return of Doug Saldaña (Philips) 1973—Doug Sahn and Band (Atlantic); Texas Tornado 1974—Groovers Paradise (Warner Bros.) 1976—Texas Rock for Country Rollers (ABC/Dot) 1980—Hell of a Spell (Takoma) 1988—Juke Box Music (Antone's) 1992—The Best of Doug Sahn and Friends: Atlantic Sessions (Rhino) 1995—The Last Real Texas Blues Band (Antone's) 1998—"S.D.Q. '98" (Watermelon) 2000—San Antonio Rock: The Harlem Recordings 1957-1961 (Norton); The Return of Wayne Douglas (Tornado).

With Sir Douglas Quintet, formed 1964, San Antonio, TX:

Original lineup: Sahn, gtr., voc.; Augie Meyers (b. May 31, 1940, San Antonio), kybds.; Francisco Moran (b. Aug. 13, 1946), sax; Harvey Kagan (b. Apr. 18, 1946), bass; Johnny Perez (b. Nov. 8, 1942), drums.

1965—Best of Sir Douglas Quintet (Tribe) 1966—The Sir Douglas Quintet Is Back! 1968—Honkey Blues (Smash) 1969—Mendocino 1970—Together After Five; 1 + 1 + 1 = 4 (Philips) 1971—Rough Edges (Mercury) 1981—Border Wave (Takoma) 1994—(group re-forms: Sahn, gtr., voc.; Meyers, kybds., voc.; Shawn Sahn, gtr.; John Jorgenson, gtr.; Speedy Sparks, bass; Neal Walker, bass; Doug Clifford, drums; Shandon Sahn, drums) Day Dreaming at Midnight (Elektra).
With the Texas Tornados: see entry.

"Mendocino" and "She's About a Mover" were Doug Sahn and the Sir Douglas Quintet's commercial peaks, but those singles were only part of Doug Sahn's long, varied career. The energetic guitarist, singer, and songwriter dug into all American musics, helping to create the Tex-Mex sound in the '60s, and also drawing upon and playing such sounds as blues, country, folk, rock, Western swing, and jazz.

Sahn grew up in San Antonio, Texas, where he absorbed the strains of music (live and on his father's 78s) that would show up in his own musical gumbo: T-Bone Walker, Guitar Slim, Hank Williams, Lefty Frenzell, Jimmie Rodgers, and Bob Wills, as well as the polkas of Mexican conjunto bands. At five, he began learning to play mandolin, fiddle, and acoustic and steel guitar. By age six, he was singing on the radio, billed as Little Doug Sahn. His first Little Doug record was "A Real American Joe," in 1955. Soon after, he formed a rock & roll band and had local hits while still in high school, beginning with "Crazy Daisy" in 1958. (These early recordings have been anthologized on the 2000 Norton set.)

In 1960 Sahn met keyboardist Augie Meyers, and eventually the two teamed up with producer Huey P. Meaux, who urged them to go for a Beatles sound and look to capitalize on the British Invasion. Sahn complied with "She's About a Mover," and with Meyers on Vox organ and the English-sounding name bestowed by Meaux, Sir Douglas Quintet was on its way, filled out by three Mexican-Americans on sax, bass, and drums. "She's About a Mover," featuring a recurring organ line reminiscent of conjunto accordion, went into the Top 20, spurring a wave of Tex-Mex hits (by Sam the Sham and ? and the Mysterians). (Sundazed reissued the SDQ's first two albums in 2000.)

When Sahn was arrested for marijuana possession, the group, minus Meyers, moved to San Francisco, where the blues revival and psychedelia had taken hold. A shifting Quintet played loose-limbed blues at the Avalon Ballroom and other such venues; Meyers rejoined in 1968, and the group cut its last big hit, "Mendocino" (#27, 1969). The Quintet's albums grew more experimental and spacier, and didn't sell. Sahn produced albums by bluesman Junior Parker and early Tejano group Louie and the Lovers.

In 1971 Sahn returned to Texas to cut an album of San Antonio barroom honky-tonk, under the name Doug Saldaña, temporarily giving up the Sir Douglas moniker. His first solo album featured Dr. John, conjunto accordionist Flaco Jiménez, jazz saxophonist David "Fathead" Newman, and Bob Dylan, who wrote the country-flavored "Wallflower" for Sahn. Mercury capitalized on Sahn's expected stardom with Rough Edges, a collection of Quintet outtakes, but Doug Sahn and Band never caught on.

Relocated to Austin, Texas, Sahn continued to record through the '70s under his own name, as the Sir Douglas Band (1973) and as Sir Douglas and the Texas Tornados (1976) with his mixture of Texans, Mexicans, and Californians. Groovers Paradise featured Creedence Clearwater's rhythm section, Stu Cook and Doug Clifford. By the late '70s, Sahn had become a leader of Austin's "cosmic cowboy" scene centered around the Armadillo World Headquarters. Meanwhile, new-wave bands—particularly Elvis Costello and the Attractions—were rediscovering the organ-pumping sound of Tex-Mex.

As the '80s began, Sahn resurrected the Quintet with Meyers and Perez to make Border Wave, and he toured with them in a band that also included his son Shawn on guitar. The Quintet periodically re-formed throughout the decade, and in 1990 Sahn brought back the Texas Tornados [see entry] moniker for a critically acclaimed and commercially successful collaboration with Meyers, Jiménez, and country star Freddy Fender [see entry]. Sahn re-formed the Quintet yet again in 1994, reuniting with Meyers and ex-Creedence drummer Clifford, and including sons Shawn (who cowrote three songs with his dad for Day Dreaming at Midnight) and Shandon, who was then drumming with the Texas hard-rock band Pariah.

The last few years of Sahn's life found him in a flurry of musical activity. In addition to performances with the Tornados and the reconstituted SDQ, he made a 1995 blues album, covering songs by his heroes and joined by musicians such as tenor saxman Rocky Morales, with whom he'd played since childhood. (Sahn's heartfelt notes to the album read like the autobiography of a life lived in music.) In 1998 a musical collaboration with Austin roots-rock band the Gourds was featured on "SDQ '98." It also included "Get a Life," Sahn's paean to his beloved hometown, and recordings made with Morales, Meyers, and the SDQ. Just prior to his sudden death of a heart attack in another of his favorite places (Taos), Sahn recorded an album of classic C&W, The Return of Wayne Douglas. Featuring ex-Commander Cody guitarist Bill Kirchen, the album consisted of Sahn's old and new country compositions including his kiss-off to the sanitized music coming out of Nashville in the '90s, "Oh No, Not Another One" and, seemingly, his farewell, "Beautiful Texas Sunshine."

Buffy Sainte-Marie

Born Feb. 20, 1941, Saskatchewan, Can.

1964—It's My Way (Vanguard) 1965—Many a Mile 1966—Little Wheel Spin and Spin 1967—Fire, Fleet and Candlelight 1968—I'm Gonna Be a Country Girl Again 1969—Illuminations 1970—The Best of Buffy Sainte-Marie 1971—She Used to Wanna Be a Ballerina; The Best of Buffy Sainte-Marie, vol. 2 1972—Moon Shot 1973—Quiet Places 1974—Native North American Child; Buffy (MCA) 1975—Changing Woman 1976—Sweet America (ABC) 1992—Coincidence and Likely Stories (Ensign/Chrysalis) 1996—Up Where We Belong (Angel).

Born of Cree Indian parents and adopted by a white family as an infant, Buffy Sainte-Marie is one of the most famous Native-American artists in pop music. Her unique vibratoed vocal delivery made her records something of an acquired taste. However, she is best known for the versions of her songs made hits by others artists—including "Until It's Time for You to Go," "The Universal Soldier," "Codine," and "Up Where We Belong," the latter of which she cowrote—and for decades of activism on behalf of Native Americans.

Sainte-Marie was discovered singing in a New York coffeehouse by Vanguard producer Maynard Solomon. Her debut LP contained the protest song "The Universal Soldier," which became a classic of the genre, mainly through well-known cover versions, including those by Donovan and Glen Campbell. Elvis Presley had a Top 40 hit in 1972 (#5 U.K.) with her "Until It's Time for You to Go." Though she began as a solo folksinger, Sainte-Marie infused rock, classical, orchestral, and Native-American styles into her albums. She Used to Wanna Be a Ballerina featured backing by Ry Cooder and Neil Young and Crazy Horse. She composed the title song for Soldier Blue and scored several other films including Stripper, Where the Spirit Lives, and Attila. She also sang in the movies Strawberry Statement and Performance.

Sainte-Marie won an Oscar for "Up Where We Belong," which she cowrote with the arranger, composer, and producer Jack Nietsche, and Will Jennings. The song was a #1 1982 hit for Joe Cocker and Jennifer Warnes. From 1976 to 1981 she was a familiar face to viewers of Sesame Street. Following Sweet America, Sainte-Marie did not record again for another 15 years until Coincidence and Likely Stories. During that time, she continued working on behalf of Native Americans, giving benefit concerts, speaking, and founding the Nihewan Foundation for Native North American scholarships. She acted in the 1994 film The Broken Chain. She was instrumental in founding the Juno Awards' category Music of Aboriginal Canada. Her 1996 album and video Up Where We Belong won both a Genie and a Juno in Canada, beating out the likes of Celine Dion and Alanis Morissette. In 1997 Sainte-Marie, who holds a degree in philosophy, a teacher's degree, and a Ph.D. in fine arts, was named an Officer in the Order of Canada, which is the highest civilian honor that country may bestow.

The Saints

Formed 1975, Brisbane, Austral.

Chris Bailey (b. Nov. 29, 1958, Kenya), voc., gtr.; Ed Kuepper, gtr.; Kym Bradshaw, bass; Ivor Hay, drums.

1977—(- Bradshaw; + Alisdair Ward, bass) (I'm) Stranded (Sire) 1978—Eternally Yours 1979—Prehistoric Sounds (Harvest, Austral.) (- Kuepper) 1987—(- Ward; - Hay; + Archie Larizza, bass; + Baz Francis, gtr.; + Iain Shedden, drums; + Joe Chiofalo, kybds.) All Fools Day (TVT) 1988—Prodigal Son 1995—The Most Primitive Band in the World (Restless) 1997—Howling (Amsterdamed/Triple X) 1998—Everybody Knows the Monkey.

The Aints: 1995—Shelflife Unlimited: The Best of the Aints (Restless).

Ed Kuepper solo: 1994—Character Assassination (Restless); The Butterfly Net.

The first Australian punk band to gain renown in Britain and the U.S., the Saints are best remembered for their debut single, a frantic buzz-saw of sound, "(I'm) Stranded." Formed by Chris Bailey, the Saints recorded "Stranded" on their own label in 1976. After a rave review in the British music weekly Sounds, they were signed by EMI. Lead guitarist Ed Kuepper left in 1978 (he later formed the Laughing Clowns), and the band's focus changed to a more traditional, R&B-inflected rock & roll. In 1979 the Saints broke up, but Bailey kept the name, releasing several albums as the Saints and two solo records on French and British labels. The original Saints, minus Kuepper, re-formed in 1984. In 1987 Bailey fired the band. That year, recording with a new lineup, the Saints had their first American release (All Fools Day) in nine years. In 1990 Kuepper formed the Aints to protest Bailey's continuing use of the Saints name and material; he also maintained a thriving solo career, releasing an uninterrupted stream of albums. Most of them came out on Australia's Hot Records, though a few, including the anthology The Butterfly Net, had a U.S. release.

In 1995 Restless released The Most Primitive Band in the World, a series of live tracks recorded by the Saints in 1974. Meanwhile, after another hiatus, Bailey got himself some backing musicians, called them the Saints, and released Howling, a return to the band's original no-nonsense rock & roll, which featured a collaboration with ex-Concrete Blonde Johnette Napolitano.

Ryuichi Sakamoto

Born Jan. 17, 1952, Tokyo, Jap.

1978—Thousand Knives of Asia (Denon) 1980—B-2 Unit (Alfa-Island) 1981—Left Handed Dream (Epic) 1983—Coda (London); Merry Christmas Mr. Lawrence soundtrack (MCA) 1985—Esperanto (Midi, Jap.); Futurista 1986—Media Bahn Live; Illustrated Musical Encyclopedia; Piano One (Private Music) 1988—No Boundaries (Columbia); Neo Geo (Epic); The Last Emperor soundtrack (with David Byrne and Cong Su) (Virgin Movie Music) 1989—Playing the Orchestra (Virgin); Gruppo Musicale 1990—Beauty; The Handmaid's Tale soundtrack (GNP-Crescendo) 1991—Peachboy (Windham Hill) 1992—Heartbeat (Virgin); High Heels (Antilles) 1994—Hard Revenge (For Life/Gut); Sweet Revenge (Elektra); Soundbytes (Mesa/Bluemoon) 1995—Smoochy (For Life/Gut) 1996—1996; Snooty 1998—Discord (Sony Classical) 2000—BTTB; Cinimage (Sony).

Ryuichi Sakamoto emerged in the '80s with "Neo Geo," a high-tech style of world music that fuses Asian and Western classical elements with other global sounds. Founder of Yellow Magic Orchestra, a technopop trio, the composer, producer, and actor went on to make influential film scores and pop works.

Taking up piano at age three, Sakamoto played in jazz bands in high school; his cosmopolitan upbringing exposed him to Beethoven, the Beatles, and John Cage, as well as to the films of Pier Paolo Pasolini and Jean-Luc Godard. After studying electronic music at the University of Art of Tokyo, he founded Yellow Magic Orchestra in 1978. Their single, "Computer Game (Theme From The Invaders)," became a 1980 Top 20 U.K. hit; with two Japanese Top 10 albums, the trio, known for a robotic theatricality indebted to Kraftwerk, were hugely popular at home.

During Y.M.O.'s five-year career, Sakamoto released two solo albums; his subsequent work took a genre-crossing approach. Characterized by perfectionist zeal (Illustrated Musical Encyclopedia, with Thomas Dolby, took 20 months to record), his output features diverse guests (Iggy Pop, Bootsy Collins, and Tony Williams on Neo Geo) and wide range (with David Sylvian and Ingrid Chavez, 1992's Heartbeat incorporates Russian rap, New York dance music, and African rhythms).

Acting with David Bowie in the film Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence, Sakamoto also penned its score; his collaboration with David Byrne and Chinese musician Cong Su on The Last Emperor earned an Oscar. Sakamoto's other projects include music for performance artist Melissa Fenley (Esperanto); the score for Pedro Almodóvar's High Heels; a piece for the 1992 Olympics; and Beauty, an album featuring his English-singing debut and contributions by Brian Wilson, Robbie Robertson, Arto Lindsay, Youssou N'Dour, and Sakamoto's wife, Akiko Yano. Sakamoto's 1994 album Sweet Revenge featured guests Holly Johnson (Frankie Goes to Hollywood) and Roddy Frame (Aztec Camera).

In 1993 Sakamoto briefly reunited Yellow Magic Orchestra; 1995's Smoochy offered a musical portrait of Rio de Janeiro; 1996 was classically influenced, with brilliant arrangements of piano and strings. Among subsequent works, Discord featured a 70-piece orchestra, electronics, and spoken word, and BTTB (Back to the Basics) was a stunning solo piano work.

Salt-n-Pepa

Formed 1985, Queens, NY

Cheryl "Salt" James (b. Mar. 8, ca. 1964, Brooklyn, NY), voc.;

Sandy "Pepa" Denton (b. Nov. 9, ca. 1961, Kingston, Jam.), voc.; Pamela Greene, DJ.

1986—Hot, Cool and Vicious (Next Plateau) 1988—

(—Greene; + Deidre "Dee Dee" "Spinderella" Roper [b. Aug. 3, New York, NY], DJ) A Salt With a Deadly Pepa 1990—Blacks' Magic 1991—A Blitz of Salt-n-Pepa Hits 1993—Very Necessary (Next Plateau/London) 1997—Brand New (Red Ant/London).

Salt-n-Pepa was one of the first rap groups to cross over to the pop charts and one of the few in which the rappers and their DJ were women. They were the first female rappers to have as many as three platinum albums. Cheryl "Salt" James and Sandy "Pepa" Denton were working at Sears when coworker Hurby "Luv Bug" Azor (James' boyfriend) asked them to rap on a project for his audio-production class at New York City's Center for Media Arts. The song, "The Show Stoppa," was an answer to Doug E. Fresh and Slick Rick's

"The Show." It was released as a single by Pop Art Records, credited to the band Super Nature, and became a minor hit, reaching #46 on the R&B chart.

Now calling themselves Salt-n-Pepa, after a line in "The Show Stoppa," the duo signed with the rap independent Next Plateau. Azor, who became their manager, produced Hot, Cool and Vicious and is credited on the album with writing all the songs, although the rappers have said they contributed lyrics. Three of the platinum album's singles, "Chick on the Side," "My Mike Sounds Nice," and "Tramp," charted moderately on the R&B chart. But then Cameron Paul, a DJ at San Francisco station KMEL, remixed "Push It" (the flip side of "Tramp"); after its release, it peaked on the pop chart at #19 in 1988. "Push It" was nominated for a Grammy in 1988, but Salt-n-Pepa and other rappers boycotted the ceremony when the rap awards were not presented in the telecast. In June that year the group played Freedomfest: Nelson Mandela's 70th Birthday Celebration at London's Wembley Stadium.

Azor also produced A Salt With a Deadly Pepa, a solid if not earthshaking followup (though the record eventually went gold). The album includes "Shake Your Thang," a reworking of the Isley Brothers' "It's Your Thang" (performed with DC go-go band EU) and a cover of "Twist and Shout," as well as "Get Up Everybody (Get Up)" and a remix of "Let the Rhythm Run," their contribution to the Colors soundtrack. Unfortunately, plans to record with Joan Jett, a la Run-DMC and Aerosmith's collaboration, didn't pan out. A Blitz of Salt-n-Pepa Hits featured dance remixes of the band's hits.

The platinum-selling Blacks' Magic (#38 pop, #15 R&B, 1990) was a huge success for Salt-n-Pepa artistically and commercially. The group, which had been accused by some rap fans of selling out, paid tribute to Afrocentricity in the album's title and cover art. Alongside Azor and guest producer Steeve-O, Salt produced or coproduced four tracks, and DJ Spinderella produced one. One Salt cut, "Expression" (#26, 1990), went gold before it even entered the Hot 100, thanks to eight weeks at the top of the rap chart. The album also included the hit "Let's Talk About Sex" (#13, 1991), which Salt-n-Pepa rerecorded in 1993 as "Let's Talk About AIDS" for a campaign to educate women about safe sex. That year the band played at the President Clinton's Inaugural Youth Ball, where they met their fan Chelsea Clinton.

Salt-n-Pepa had been having increasing disagreements with Next Plateau and Azor, with whom James was no longer romantically linked. The group demanded larger financial and creative roles in their career and, over Azor's objections, signed with London/PolyGram. Salt-n-Pepa then set much of the creative direction on the popular Very Necessary (#4 pop, #6 R&B, 1993), which showcased the women as sophisticated but tough rap divas. On songs like "Shoop" (#4 pop, #3 R&B, 1993) and "Whatta Man" (#3 pop and R&B, 1994), which featured En Vogue on the chorus, the group reveled in their sexuality. The album, which has sold 5 million copies to date, ends with a public-service announcement about AIDS performed by a group of young actors from Boston.

Salt and Pepa both have had film deals. The group performed the song "Start Me Up" in 1992's Stay Tuned (the soundtrack was released by Morgan Creek), and Salt also starred in Who's the Man? the next year. In 1995 Salt-n-Pepa were awarded the Best Rap Performance Grammy for "None of Your Business" (#32 pop, #57 R&B, 1994).

The group also signed with MCA in 1995, a deal that enabled them to form their own imprint, Jireh Records. The women later dissolved the partnership, citing creative differences, before releasing Brand New (#37 pop, #16 R&B) on Red Ant/London in 1997. The album, most of it written and produced in Salt's basement, featured guest performances by Sheryl Crow, Queen Latifah, and Naughty by Nature's Treach (whom Denton married in 1999). Brand New produced two moderately successful singles and found the women, all of whom had children by this point, talking less about sex and more about issues such as domestic violence and discrimination. The record received mixed reviews, but Salt-n-Pepa's return to the limelight landed the group their own Cover Girl makeup commercial and a spot on the cover of ROLLING STONE.

Sam and Dave

Samuel Moore, b. Oct. 12, 1935, Miami, FL; David Prater, b. May 9, 1937, Ocilla, GA; d. Apr. 9, 1988, GA 1966—Sam and Dave (Roulette); Hold On I'm Comin' (Stax); Double Dynamite 1967—Soul Men 1968—I Thank You (Atlantic) 1969—The Best of Sam and Dave 1975—Back Atcha (United Artists) 1993—Sweat n' Soul Anthology (1965–1971) (Rhino) 1995—The Very Best of Sam and Dave.

Sam Moore and Dave Prater's string of soul and pop hits made them the '60s' most successful black vocal duo. Both had grown up singing in church, and each was a regular solo performer in Southern clubs before they met in 1961 at Miami's King of Hearts club. Moore was emceeing an amateur-night show, and when Prater forgot the words to a Jackie Wilson song, "Doggin' Around," Moore coached him the rest of the way. The pair became a popular club attraction in the Miami area and soon signed to Roulette. They moved to Atlantic in 1965, though executive Jerry Wexler arranged for their records to be recorded at and released by Stax Records. At Stax, Sam and Dave quickly became the favorite foils of the production/songwriting team of Isaac Hayes and David Porter. Their first single, "You Don't Know Like I Know" (#7 R&B), in 1966, began a string of high-powered soul hits. Later in 1966 "Hold On! I'm a Comin'" went to #1 on the R&B chart (#21 pop), while "Said I Wasn't Gonna Tell Nobody" (#8 R&B) and "You Got Me Hummin'" (#7 R&B) rounded out a successful year. In 1967 Sam and Dave (nicknamed "Double Dynamite") gained their widest exposure with "When Something Is Wrong With My Baby" (#2 R&B) and the epochal "Soul Man" (#2 pop, #1 R&B). The next year they scored their last major hit, "I Thank You" (#9 pop, #4 R&B).

The duo's frantic live show was one of pop music's most exciting, yet offstage Moore and Prater barely spoke to each other. After breaking up in 1970, they reunited several times. In 1979 the Blues Brothers' success with "Soul Man" rekindled interest in them, and the duo received bookings at many clubs nationwide. But they split up for good after a New Year's Eve 1981 show at San Francisco's Old Waldorf. Prater then took to the road with another Sam: vocalist Sam Daniels.

In a 1983 interview with the Los Angeles Herald Examiner, Moore admitted that he had been a drug addict for 12 years and that the main reason for his feud with his ex-partner was that he'd "lost respect" for him after Prater shot his own wife during a 1968 domestic dispute. Prater escaped prosecution in that instance, but in 1987 he was arrested for selling crack to an undercover cop and sentenced to three years' probation. He died the following year in a car accident. Moore contributed vocals to Bruce Springsteen's Human Touch LP in 1992, the same year Sam and Dave were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Moore continues to perform; he published Sam and Dave: An Oral History in 1998. That year he also appeared in the comedy sequel Blues Brothers 2000.

Sam the Sham and the Pharaohs

Formed early '60s, Texas
 Sam the Sham (b. Domingo Samudio, 1940, Dallas, TX), voc., organ; David Martin, bass; Ray Stinnet, gtr.; Jerry Patterson, drums; Butch Gibson, sax.
 1965—Wooly Bully (MGM) 1966—Li'l Red Riding Hood
 1970—Sam, Hard and Heavy (Atlantic) 1985—Pharaohization: The Best of Sam the Sham and the Pharaohs (Rhino).

Sam the Sham and his turban-clad Pharaohs achieved brief but massive success in the mid-'60s with their rollicking Tex-Mex rock & roll. Following the moderately successful independent single "Haunted House," the band moved to MGM, where its second record, "Wooly Bully," sold 3 million copies in 1965, rising to #2.

For the next two years the Pharaohs continued to rack up hit singles: "Juju Hand" (#22, 1965), "Ring Dang Doo" (#33, 1965), the million-selling "Li'l Red Riding Hood" (#2, 1966), and its followup, "The Hair on My Chinny Chin-Chin" (#22, 1966), among them. In 1967 Sam broke up the group and went solo, reverting to his given name, Domingo Samudio.

Though his years of stardom were behind him, he won a Grammy Award in 1970 for his liner notes to the LP Sam, Hard and Heavy, which featured the work of a session guitarist named Duane Allman. Samudio resurfaced in 1982, donating two original songs, sung in Spanish, to the soundtrack of The Border. Later on he became a street preacher in Memphis. "Wooly Bully," still a bar-band standard, was covered in 1981 by Joan Jett. As of 1995 Samudio worked for a federal institution as a nondenominational Bible teacher in English and Spanish. He performed occasionally, mixing his classics with gospel songs

David Sanborn

Born July 30, 1945, Tampa, FL
 1975—Taking Off (Warner) 1976—Sanborn 1978—Heart to Heart 1979—Hideaway 1981—Voyeur 1982—As We Speak 1983—Backstreet 1984—Straight to the Heart 1987—A Change of Heart 1988—Close-Up (Reprise) 1991—Another Hand (Elektra) 1992—Upfront 1994—Hearsay 1995—Pearls 1996—Songs From the Night Before 1999—Inside (Elektra/Asylum).

Alto saxophonist David Sanborn has one of the most recognizable instrumental voices in pop music. As a child Sanborn suffered from polio and breathing ailments, neither of which discouraged his early interest in the saxophone. After moving to St. Louis, the teenage Sanborn began playing with local R&B and jazz musicians.

In 1967 Sanborn joined the Paul Butterfield Blues Band; he played with the group at Woodstock and can be heard on In My Own Dream, The Resurrection of Pig Boy Crabshaw, and Live Leaving Butterfield. Sanborn played in the bands of a number of top musicians including Stevie Wonder, joining him for the 1972 Rolling Stones tour for which Wonder was an opening act. (Sanborn can also be heard on Wonder's Talking Book.)

When Sanborn went freelance, he became the originator of the ubiquitous saxophone sound of the '70s. His classic work on James Taylor's "How Sweet It Is to Be Loved by You" and David Bowie's "Young Americans" exemplifies the mixture of Hank Crawford-influenced R&B finesse and bold, rock-oriented grit that has become Sanborn's calling card. Sanborn could also be heard on recordings by the Eagles, Bruce Springsteen, Paul Simon, and the Rolling Stones.

Sanborn's own recording career began in 1975 and has thrived since. (He has four gold records, one platinum, and a Grammy for Voyeur.) From 1988 to 1990, Sanborn hosted the innovative television show Night Music, which presented a widely eclectic blend of artists.

In the '90s Sanborn gained greater respect among the jazz and avant-garde music community. His Another Hand (1991) featured noted jazzmen Bill Frisell and Charlie Haden. Sanborn also recorded with avant-garde saxophonist Tim Berne, and in 1995 released Pearls, with an orchestra arranged by Johnny Mandel. Sanborn remains in the public eye through his frequent guest appearances with Paul Shaffer's band on The Late Show With David Letterman. He has also hosted music-related television programs.

Through a long, erratic career laden with personnel changes, the group Santana has maintained popularity and critical respect with what was in the beginning an innovative fusion of rock, fiery Afro-Latin polyrhythms, and contrasting cool, low-key vocals. In time, group leader/guitarist Carlos Santana was drawn to jazz-rock fusion and worked outside the band with John McLaughlin, Stanley Clarke, and others. Though the mid-'70s saw Santana becoming involved in spiritual mysticism (he affixed "Devadip" before his name), by the decade's end the band was back in hard-driving rhythmic form and chucked up several hit dance singles. The group continued to perform off and on into the '90s, in 1994 Santana appeared at Woodstock '94, one of three acts who had previously performed at the original '69 festival that were asked to return to the 25th anniversary concert. Five years later, Clive Davis signed the band to Anista Records and, by teaming Santana with a varied host of current hitmakers (including Wyclef Jean and Rob Thomas of Matchbox Twenty), orchestrated one of the most phenomenal comeback success stories in rock & roll history.

Carlos Santana is a fourth-generation musician and the son of a violinist father who played manachi music. His father tried for many years to teach him violin, but at age eight, Santana discovered the guitar and started listening to the electric blues of B.B. King and John Lee Hooker. In 1955 the family moved from the small village of Autlán de Navarro to Tijuana, where Santana began playing guitar in nightclubs. During his teens, the family moved to San Francisco. It was there, working as a dishwasher, that he formed his own band.

The band evolved in San Francisco's Latin district from jam sessions among Santana, David Brown, and Gregg Rolie.

With original drummer Rod Harper and rhythm guitarist Tom Frazer, they became the Santana Blues Band. Though the soft-spoken Santana felt uncomfortable as leader, he lent his name to the group because the local musicians' union required that each band have a designated leader. The group's 1968 debut at San Francisco's Fillmore West (by which time it had become known simply as Santana) received a standing ovation; its local popularity led to a spot at Woodstock, where it stopped the show. The instrumental "Soul Sacrifice," featuring Michael Shrieve's drum solo, is one of the high points of the Woodstock soundtrack album.

Santana's overwhelming success at the festival led to a deal with Columbia, and within a few weeks of its late-summer 1969 release, its debut LP was #4 and eventually went double platinum. That album's "Evil Ways" was a Top 10 single in early 1970. Abraxas, released later that year, sold 4 million copies and lodged at #1 on the album chart for six weeks; Santana III, the first to feature 16-year-old second guitarist Neal Schon, topped the chart for five weeks in late 1971. Abraxas yielded hits such as "Black Magic Woman" (#4, 1970), previously recorded by Fleetwood Mac, and veteran salsa bandleader Tito Puente's "Oye Como Va" (#13, 1971), while Santana III contained "Everybody's Everything" (#12, 1971) and "No One to Depend On" (#36, 1972).

Caravanserai went platinum, Welcome, gold. Both LPs saw Santana's music stretching out into jazzier directions, and the band's personnel changed considerably with every album. Neal Schon and keyboardist Gregg Rolie went on to found Journey; Shrieve played various sessions, including Stomu Yamashta's Go series, and later formed Automatic Man and Novo Combo.

In 1972 Carlos Santana made his first recording outside the band, a live album with Buddy Miles. Though dismissed by critics, it, too, sold well, eventually going platinum. The fusion supersedion Love, Devotion, Surrender found the guitarist playing with John McLaughlin, Jan Hammer, and Billy Cobham of the Mahavishnu Orchestra, Stanley Clarke of Return to Forever, and Larry Young of the Tony Williams Lifetime.

In 1974 Santana collaborated with Alice Coltrane and ex-Miles Davis jazz bassist David Holland, among others, for the string-dominated Illuminations; it didn't sell as well as Love, Devotion, Surrender, which had gone gold. Borboletta featured contributions from Clarke and Brazilian musicians Airto Moreira and Flora Purim. Lotus stands out in Santana's mid-'70s period, the three-record set was recorded in Japan and long unavailable in America except as a costly import.

By the late '70s, Santana had tightened up his band into a funkier direction, and enjoyed a hit single with a cover of the Zombies' mid-'60s hit "She's Not There" (#27, 1977), featuring singer Greg Walker. After two more jazz-fusion solo LPs, Oneness and The Swing of Delight—the latter featuring such fusion stars and former Miles Davis sidemen as Herbie Hancock, Tony Williams, Ron Carter, and Weather Report reedman Wayne Shorter—the Santana band's Zebop! became a big seller on the strength of "Winning" (#17, 1981), written by ex-Argent guitarist Russ Ballard, the following year's Shangó added another Top 20 hit, "Hold On," with a lead vocal by Alex Ligertwood. Havana Moon featured guests Willie Nelson and the Texas blues band the Fabulous Thunderbirds.

Santana appeared at Live Aid in 1985. To celebrate its 20th anniversary the next year, the band played a special San Francisco performance that featured all previous Santana members. Freedom reunited Carlos Santana with Buddy Miles, who contributed vocals. The title track of Carlos Santana's sixth solo recording, Blues for Salvador, won a 1988 Grammy for Best Rock Instrumental Performance. An acclaimed career retrospective box set, Viva! Santana, was released in 1988. Carlos Santana hooked up with saxophonist Wayne Shorter for a 1988 summer tour.

Spirits Dancing in the Flesh (1990) featured guest appearances by Bobby Womack and Living Colour guitarist Vernon Reid, who played on "Jin-Go-Lo-Ba," a reworking of "Jingo," a Santana favorite from the first album. In 1992, after a 20-year association with Columbia Records, Santana moved to PolyGram, appearing first on Polydor, then on Island. Sacred Fire—Live in South America attested to the band's tremendous popularity in Latin America. Carlos Santana announced plans in 1993 to start his own specialty label, Guts and Grace, to release jazz, world music, and selections from his extensive private collection of live-performance recordings, including artists as diverse as Jimi Hendrix, Marvin Gaye, Bob Marley, and Stevie Ray Vaughan. Along with a box set (Dance of the Rainbow Serpent), Legacy released a live show from the Fillmore featuring the original Santana lineup. That lineup was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1998, but Santana's long career was still a year shy of its pinnacle.

Although Santana maintained a core classic-rock audience that supported him on the road, it had been nearly two decades since his last radio hit. In interviews, Santana spoke of an angel, Metatron, who had told him that he was destined to spread the positive message of music to younger listeners through the radio. In late 1997 he signed to Arista, thus reuniting with label head Clive Davis, who had signed Santana to Columbia 30 years earlier. Their goal was to marry Santana's signature instrumental sound with contemporary voices in an attempt to connect with a modern audience. The band's last studio album, 1992's Milagro, had failed to crack the Top 100, but Davis boldly talked about producing an album that would outsell the quadruple-platinum Abraxas. It proved to be an understatement. With guest performers and writers Wyclef Jean, Dave Matthews, Lauryn Hill, Rob Thomas, Everlast, Eagle-Eye Cherry, and Eric Clapton on board, Supernatural (#1, 1999) sold more than 10 million copies within a year of its release (21 million worldwide), far eclipsing Abraxas as the best-selling album of Santana's career and putting the 50-something guitarist in the unlikely company of teen chart-toppers 'N Sync and the Backstreet Boys. The lead single, "Smooth" (cowritten and sung by Thomas), spent 12 consecutive weeks at #1. The album went on to earn nine Grammys, including Album, Song, and Record of the Year (for "Smooth"). In the wake of the awards and heavy media interest, Supernatural continued to spin off successful singles, with the Wyclef Jean-produced "Mana Maria" reaching #1.

Joe Satriani

Born July 15, 1957, Carle Place, NY

1984—Joe Satriani EP (Rubina) 1986—Not of This Earth (Relativity) 1987—Surfing With the Alien 1988—Dreaming #11 EP 1989—Flying in a Blue Dream 1992—The Extremist 1993—Time Machine 1995—Joe Satriani 1998—Crystal Planet (Epic) 2000—Engines of Creation (Sony).

With Eric Johnson and Steve Vai: 1997—G3 Live in Concert (Epic).

A rock guitarist of dazzling technical proficiency, Joe Satriani spent years as a relatively unknown working musician before a tour with Mick Jagger heightened interest in his own recording career. Satriani, who also played piano and drums while growing up, became fascinated with the guitar after listening to Jimi Hendrix, whose death inspired the young musician to devote himself to music. Satriani practiced along to blues and classic-rock records, and learned some music theory in school. He quickly became proficient enough to teach the instrument, among his early students were Steve Vai, now a fellow guitar hero, as well as future members of Metallica, Primus, Counting Crows, and Third Eye Blind. Satriani also played in bands and took lessons with the influential bebop jazz pianist Lennie Tristano.

After a stint with a pop band called the Squares, Satriani made his recording debut in 1984 with a self-titled instrumental EP. A couple of instrumental albums followed, selling respectably for their genre. In the late '80s, after Satriani had toured alone and with Greg Kihn, a tip from Vai landed him on the road with Jagger. The exposure helped propel to platinum status Satriani's album Surfing With the Alien (#29, 1987), which became the first instrumental LP to enter the Top 40 since 1980 and the first of eight times that the guitarist was nominated for the Best Rock Instrumental Performance Grammy. Satriani's 1989 effort, Flying in a Blue Dream, reached #23, 1992's The Extremist shot to #22. In 1993 Satriani released the double-CD Time Machine, a collection of out-of-print and previously unreleased recordings and new tracks. He followed up this release with a stint as Ritchie Blackmore's replacement on a Deep Purple tour in 1994.

Satriani's 1995 self-titled album was produced by Glyn Johns, who had worked with such notable artists as the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, the Who, Led Zeppelin, and the Eagles. The following year, Satriani toured with fellow guitar virtuosos Vai and Eric Johnson on the G3 tour, the trio released a live album in 1997. His next solo album, 1998's Crystal Planet, contained songs named by his then-five-year-old son (such titles included "A Piece of Liquid" and "Psycho Monkey"). Engines of Creation, produced by Trevor Horn (Art of Noise, Yes, Seal) and released in 2000, explored Satriani's admiration of techno.

Savage Garden

Formed 1994, Brisbane, Austral.

Darren Hayes (b. May 8, 1972, Brisbane), voc.; Daniel Jones (b. July 22, 1973, Essex, Eng.), kybds., gtr.

1997—Savage Garden (Columbia) 1999—Affirmation (Sony).

Darren Hayes and Daniel Jones of the Australian pop duo Savage Garden came together in 1993 when Haynes joined Jones' Brisbane-based cover band. After a year and a half, the pair began collaborating on original songs and submitting demos under the name Crush. They secured an independent deal in their homeland, changed their name to Savage Garden, and saw their self-titled debut album top the Australian charts in 1997 before being picked up by Columbia for export later the same year.

Although supplemented by extra musicians both in the studio and onstage, together Hayes and Jones cowrote and arrange all their songs, with Hayes assuming frontman duties—over-the-top costume changes included—during the band's live performances. The group's sound—lush, melodic love songs and catchy pop rock reminiscent of '80s hit duos like Wham! and Roxette—seemed out of place in the hip-hop and alternative-rock climate of the late '90s, but it connected with both Adult Contemporary fans and boy-band-hungry young teens. Propelled by the uptempo lead single "I Want You" (#4, 1997), Savage Garden sold 12 million copies worldwide, peaking at #4 and spinning off the additional hits "Truly Madly Deeply" (#1, 1997) and "To the Moon and Back" (#24, 1998). After contributing "The Animal Song" (#19, 1999) to the soundtrack for The Other Sister, Savage Garden issued Affirmation (#6, 1999), which yielded their second U.S. #1 single, "I Knew I Loved You."

This workmanlike blues-rock band became a favorite with American audiences while never achieving widespread popularity at home in Britain. Though Savoy Brown never had a hit single, its albums sold respectably, thanks to dogged touring. The only constant in the band's membership was guitarist Kim Simmonds, who ruled the group with an iron hand and hired and fired members regularly.

Savoy Brown was formed originally as the Savoy Brown Blues Band. In 1968 drummer Bill Bruford (Yes, King Crimson, U.K.) joined them for about a week before moving on to Yes. As the British blues boom wound down in the early '70s, Savoy Brown edged toward a more hard-rock boogie style. Around this time, it also began to concentrate almost exclusively on the U.S., where Simmonds later relocated. In 1971 Dave Peeverett, Roger Earl, and Tone Stevens left the band to form another rock-boogie outfit, Foghat. Over the years, Simmonds re-formed the band, drawing on personnel from such British blues bands as Chicken Shack (Walker, Raymond, Silvester, Bidwell, Webb) and the Keef Hartley Band (Anderson).

In 1973 Simmonds announced that Savoy Brown was no more, but the following year he formed yet another version. This group was also known (parenthetically) as the Boogie Brothers, and lasted for only one album. Simmonds continues to tour and record with Savoy Brown. In 1997 he released his first solo album, the acoustic Solitaire.

Leo Sayer

Born Gerard Hugh Sayer, May 21, 1948, Shoreham-by-Sea, Eng. 1973—Silverbird (Warner Bros.) 1974—Just a Boy 1975—Another Year 1976—Endless Flight 1977—Thunder in My Heart 1978—Leo Sayer 1979—The Very Best of; Here 1980—Living in a Fantasy; World Radio 1990—Cool Touch (EMI, U.K.) 1993—Leo Sayer: All the Best (Chrysalis).

Singer/songwriter Leo Sayer has enjoyed sporadic American success, and at one point, in 1977, he had three Top 40 singles and a platinum album.

While attending Worthington Art College, Sayer formed his first band, Terraplane Blues. He later moved to London and headed a group called Patches. Sayer then began writing songs with David Courtney. Courtney linked the group up with singer/actor Adam Faith, who became its manager. After Patches' debut single sold only 55 copies, Sayer decided to go solo. Faith's wife, Jackie, renamed him Leo, thinking he looked like a lion.

Faith and Courtney produced the debut Sayer LP, Silverbird, at Roger Daltrey's studio in Sussex, with Sayer writing the words and Courtney the music. Daltrey liked their songs so much he recorded his debut solo with all material written by the two unknowns, making their "Giving It All Away" a #5 British hit in early 1973. Silverbird came out a short time later, and in keeping with the glitter trend, the cover featured Sayer in a Pierrot clown costume (which he also wore live). The LP established Sayer as a big British star in his own right and yielded the #2 English hit "The Show Must Go On."

For Just a Boy, Sayer gave up the clown image, which had been ridiculed in the U.S. The album became a British gold LP and featured his first U.S. hit single, "Long Tall Glasses" (#9, 1975). He split with Courtney, who wanted to go solo (he later reunited with Sayer for Here). On Another Year Sayer wrote the songs with Frank Farrell. The single "Moonlighting" went to #2 in the U.K. but was ignored in the U.S.

Sayer next linked up with Richard Perry, who suggested more covers and new songwriting alliances for 1976's Endless Flight. Flight was Sayer's platinum U.S. breakthrough, and yielded three hit singles: "You Make Me Feel Like Dancing" (#1, 1976), "When I Need You" (#1, 1977), and "How Much Love" (#17, 1977). Thunder in My Heart went gold in the U.K. but flopped in the U.S. Soon his British audience dwindled as well. Though Sayer produced some respectable surface pop in this period, he did not return to the U.S. chart until late 1980, with a #2 cover of Bobby Vee's "More Than I Can Say." He enjoyed several more hits in the U.K. and even had his own television series there, but by decade's end, he had no record deal. His 1990 U.K. "comeback" album, Cool Touch, failed to restore his career. However, the late '90s saw him playing universities and disco revivals throughout the U.K.

Boz Scaggs

Born William Royce Scaggs, June 8, 1944, OH
 1965—Boz (Polydor, U.K.) 1969—Boz Scaggs (Atlantic)
 1971—Moments (Columbia); Boz Scaggs and His Band
 1972—My Time 1974—Slow Dancer 1976—Silk Degrees
 1977—Down Two, Then Left 1980—Middle Man; Hits!
 1988—Other Roads 1994—Some Change (Virgin) 1997—Come On Home.

After over a decade of trying to make it as a solo act, singer/songwriter Boz Scaggs hit with a 5-million-seller, Silk Degrees.

Scaggs grew up in Oklahoma and Texas, and while at St. Mark's Preparatory School in Dallas he met Steve Miller. He joined Miller's band, the Marksmen, as lead vocalist while Miller taught him guitar. Scaggs followed Miller to the University of Wisconsin, where they played together in a blues-rock band known as the Ardells or the Fabulous Knight Trains. Returning to Texas in 1963, Scaggs joined an R&B band, the Wigs. The next year, Scaggs and two of the Wigs—John Andrews and Bob Arthur—went to England. Finding little success, they broke up (most of the Wigs eventually forming Mother Earth), while Scaggs roved Europe as a street singer, recording his debut LP in Stockholm. He returned to the U.S. in 1967 and moved to San Francisco. There he reunited with Steve Miller for two albums with the Steve Miller Band: Children of the Future and Sailor.

Jann Wenner, editor and publisher of ROLLING STONE, helped arrange for Scaggs' U.S. solo debut with Atlantic, Boz Scaggs. It was released to some critical acclaim but scant profits. The album gained most of its fame from the tune "Loan Me a Dime," which featured a memorable Duane Allman guitar solo. Bluesman Fenton Robinson later successfully sued for composer credit on the song. Scaggs' second and third U.S. LPs were produced by Glyn Johns. On My Time he dispensed with a backing band in favor of studio musicians. Also at this time his vocals began to show more of a soul influence. This became even more pronounced on Slow Dancer, produced by ex-Motown producer Johnny Bristol, which was again critically hailed but not commercially successful.

Then came 1976's Silk Degrees, with its #3 hit, "Low-down," and other smashes like "Lido Shuffle" (#11, 1977). His studio band for much of the '70s included the nucleus of what became Toto. Though Scaggs has never quite matched that success, Middle Man yielded minor hits with "Break-down Dead Ahead" (#15, 1980) and "Jo Jo" (#17, 1980). Scaggs also appeared on the soundtrack of the film Urban Cowboy (1980). In San Francisco Scaggs became known for his annual black-tie concerts on New Year's Eve.

Scaggs' 1994 Virgin Records debut, Some Change, was his second album in 14 years. The preceding release, Other Roads (#47, 1988), yielded the hit "Heart of Mine" (#35, 1988). During the mid-'80s he opened a restaurant and rock club, Slim's, in San Francisco. Save for a lone 1988 album, Scaggs didn't fully begin to return to music until he appeared as part of Donald Fagen's New York Rock and Soul Revue in 1991. Some Change (#91, 1994) was produced by former Beach Boys drummer and Bonnie Raitt band member Ricky Fataar. Its 1997 followup, Come On Home, peaked at #94.

Schoolly D

Born Jesse B. Weaver, June 22, 1966, Philadelphia, PA
1986—Schoolly D (Schoolly D) 1987—Saturday Night—the Album; The Adventures of Schoolly D (Rykodisc) 1988—Smoke Some Kill (Jive) 1989—Am I Black Enough for You? 1991—How a Black Man Feels (Capitol) 1994—Welcome to America (Ruffhouse/Columbia) 1995—The Jive Collection Series, vol. 3 (Jive); Reservoir Dog (Contract/PSK) 1996—Gangster's Story (CTRA).

On his first album, Schoolly D pioneered gangsta rap with his chilling, unsentimental descriptions of urban violence. His debut featured "PSK—What Does It Mean?" a song about the Philly gang Parkside Killers, as well as the anthem "I Don't Like Rock 'n' Roll." He released his first two albums himself, then signed with Jive, which rereleased Saturday Night. The Adventures of Schoolly D contains material from the rapper's first albums with a bonus track.

Critics embraced Schoolly D's early work for its raw, journalistic outlook on what would become such familiar gangsta themes as sex and violence. The musical settings were provided by DJ Code Money. On Am I Black Enough for You? the rapper tackled the issues of black nationalism and pride. His 1994 release Welcome to America featured Schoolly D backed by a band, including veteran session player and coproducer Mike Tyler and ex-Urge Overkill bassist Chuck Treece. The album also introduced rapper Cheese.

Reservoir Dog was a leaner-sounding affair, mostly just samples, keys, and a drum machine, it also found Schoolly softening his thuggish persona a bit. The rapper released another album, Gangster's Story, in 1996, but apart from being sampled on the Chemical Brothers' single "Block Rockin' Beats," he hasn't been heard from much since.

The most popular rock band to come out of Germany, Scorpions broke out as a leading heavy-metal band in the mid-'80s, with three Top 10 LPs: Blackout (#10, 1982), Love at First Sting (#6, 1984), and Savage Amusement (#5, 1988).

Originally formed in 1965 as a pop band by Rudolf Schenker, they broke up and re-formed in 1971 as a hard-rock outfit, featuring Rudolf's brother Michel on guitar. After the 1972 debut, Lonesome Crow, Michel left to join UFO (changing the spelling of his name to Michael in the process). Scorpions' five albums for RCA, while popular in Europe, did not crack the American charts, partly, the band later contended, because the label prohibited them from touring stateside. (Ironically, Scorpions' forte is live performance, as was later evinced in their appearances at the US Festival in 1985 and as part of 1990's Monsters of Rock Tour.)

Matters changed with Lovedrive (#55, 1979), their first record for Mercury and the first to chart in the U.S. With Michael Schenker back on guitar, the band seemed to come alive. But Schenker left again, unable to keep up with the band's brutal touring schedule, and young Matthias Jabs (who had been hired before Michael returned, then fired, then rehired) took his place. Michael has since led the Michael Schenker Group, and worked with groups named the McAuley Schenker Group and Schenker/McAuley.

Blackout (#10, 1982), Scorpions' first album to go platinum, contained their first modestly successful single, "No One Like You" (#65, 1982), followed in 1984 with "Rock You Like a Hurricane" (#25) from the double-platinum Love at First Sting (#6). In 1988 Scorpions toured the Soviet Union, the first heavy metal band to do so. They returned in 1989, with Bon Jovi and Ozzy Osbourne, for the Moscow Music Peace Festival. A ballad, "Wind of Change" (#4, 1991), written about their Russian experiences, included on 1990's Crazy World (#21), was released in a Russian version, and won the group an audience with then-Soviet premier Mikhail Gorbachev. In 1992 bassist Buchholz, who also handled some of the band's business matters, left the group in a storm of controversy.

The band confronted the problems arising from Germany's reunification in the songs "Alien Nation," "Unholy Alliance," and "Ship of Fools" on 1993's Face the Heat (#24). Drummer Herman Rarebell left the band and was replaced by Curt Cress on Pure Instinct (#99, 1996), an album that failed to make much of a dent on the U.S. chart. Cress was replaced by James Kottack (ex-Kingdom Come) on the subsequent tour. On 1999's Eye II Eye Scorpions attempted to update their sound by enrolling Peter Wolf as producer and including quasi-dance numbers.

But this was nothing compared to what the German veterans came up with next. On Moment of Glory the band, echoing Metallica's collaboration with the San Francisco Symphony on the S&M album, hooked up with the Berlin Philharmonic to rerecord some of their old hits (with "Rock You Like a Hurricane" becoming "Hurricane 2000") along with three new songs, including one penned by Diane Warren. Scorpions and the Philharmonic performed live together at the Hannover World Expo in June 2000.

Tom Scott

Born May 19, 1948, Los Angeles, CA
 1967—Honeysuckle Breeze (Impulse) 1968—Rural Still Life
 1971—Great Scott (A&M) 1974—Tom Scott and the L.A. Express (Ode) 1975—Tom Cat; New York Connection
 1977—Blow It Out (Columbia) 1978—Intimate Strangers
 1979—Street Beat 1980—The Best of Tom Scott 1981—Apple Juice 1982—Desire (Elektra/Musician) 1987—Streamlines (GRP) 1989—Flashpoint (with Eric Gale, others)
 1990—Them Changes 1991—Keep This Love Alive

1992—Born Again (with Randy Brecker, Kenny Kirkland, others)
 1994—Reed My Lips; Night Creatures 1996—Bluestreak
 1998—Priceless Jazz 1999—Smokin' Section (Windham Hill).

Though he was known in jazz circles since the late '60s, saxophonist Tom Scott didn't become widely recognized in pop until the mid-'70s for studio work with Carole King, Joni Mitchell, Steely Dan, Blondie ("Rapture"), Paul McCartney, Barbra Streisand, and countless others.

Scott's mother was a classical pianist and his father a film and television theme composer (of, among many others, the themes to The Twilight Zone and Dragnet). At eight he took up the clarinet, but switched to bantone sax in junior high. He left college after one semester in 1966 and started playing the L.A. clubs with Don Ellis' band and then Roger Kellaway's quartet. His work with Oliver Nelson's band led to a contract with Impulse, which released his first solo album, Honeysuckle Breeze. He recorded another LP for Impulse, 1968's Rural Still Life, and then two for Flying Dutchman. He also did sessions, playing on Phil Ochs Greatest Hits in 1970, and began composing TV scores, first for Dan August in 1969. (He later wrote the themes for Starsky and Hutch, The Streets of San Francisco, Family Ties, Square Pegs, and many more. He has also done movie scores for Star Crazy, Neighbors, Soul Man, and others.)

In 1971 Scott got a contract with A&M, and on his first LP for the label, Great Scott, he did a version of Joni Mitchell's "Woodstock" that so impressed Mitchell that she invited him to play on her For the Roses (1972). After that LP, Scott began to develop a band, an informal, ever-shifting group that became the L.A. Express, a pop-jazz band. Ode Records released Tom Scott and the L.A. Express, which got more attention than usual, especially after he was featured on Carole King's tour and soloed on her 1974 #2 single "Jazzman."

A new Express played on Joni Mitchell's Court and Spark and on her live Miles of Aisles. Scott disbanded the L.A. Express in the mid-'70s. He later toured with George Harrison and Ravi Shankar and added sax to Wings' hit "Listen to What the Man Said." In 1978 Scott recorded an album with Billy Cobham, Alfonso Johnson, and Steve Kahn called Alivemutherfoya. He has also recorded as part of the New York Connection (with Eric Gale, Richard Tee, and Bob James).

In 1987 Scott signed to GRP, where he released a series of respected albums and led the GRP All-Star Big Band, which tours and records. He was musical director for the ill-fated Pat Sajak Show. Reed My Lips (1994) featured such heavy-weight players as Grover Washington Jr., Eric Gale, and Robben Ford. Scott reunited with the L.A. Express for 1996's Bluestreak.

Gil Scott-Heron

Born Apr. 1, 1949, Chicago, IL
 With Brian Jackson: 1970—Small Talk at 125th and Lenox (Flying Dutchman); Free Will 1973—Pieces of a Man

1974—The Revolution Will Not Be Televised; Winter in America (Strata/East) 1975—The First Minute of a New Day (Arista); From South Africa to South Carolina 1976—It's Your World 1977—Bridges.

Solo: 1978—Secrets; The Mind of Gil Scott-Heron 1980—1980: Real Eyes 1981—Reflections 1982—Moving Target 1984—The Best of Gil Scott-Heron 1994—Spirits (TVT) 1999—Evolution & Flashback: The Very Best of Gil Scott-Heron (RCA).

Writer-turned-singer Gil Scott-Heron stresses his literate, politically conscious lyrics as much as his funk and jazz-based music. His oeuvre has been cited as an influence on some schools of rap as well as on the burgeoning spoken-word movement of the '90s.

Scott-Heron's mother was a librarian (his father, a pro soccer player) and Scott-Heron wrote detective stories as an early teen. At 19 he published his first novel, The Vulture, followed by a book of rap verse called Small Talk at 125th and Lenox and a second novel, The Nigger Factory. Scott-Heron believed he could reach more people through music, so he began to collaborate with a friend from Pennsylvania's Lincoln University, Brian Jackson. They each played piano, and at first Jackson wrote music to Scott-Heron's words, but soon they began to collaborate on the music.

The two cut three LPs for Flying Dutchman, first a mostly verbal version of his verse, Small Talk, followed by two more musical albums, Pieces of a Man, which included the militant poem "The Revolution Will Not Be Televised" (also popularized by Labelle on its Pressure Cookin' LP), and Free Will. In 1974 the two became the first signing to the new Arista label; the following year they released The First Minute of a New Day. It was also the debut of Scott-Heron and Jackson's jazzy backup group, the Midnight Band.

The followup, 1975's From South Africa to South Carolina, included the R&B hit "Johannesburg" (#29 R&B, 1975). Scott-Heron began writing on his own, without Jackson, in the late '70s. His first single after going solo, "Angel Dust," reached #15 on the R&B charts in 1978.

Over the years Scott-Heron's music generally has gotten good reviews, though some critics have considered his lyrics didactic. He appeared at the antinuclear MUSE benefit at Madison Square Garden in September 1979, where he performed his own atomic warning, "We Almost Lost Detroit." He also recorded "Shut 'Um Down" (#68 R&B, 1980) on the same subject.

In 1985 Scott-Heron was featured on the all-star anti-apartheid record Sun City, and continued touring with his own band, the Amnesia Express. By then, the influence of Scott-Heron's work had begun to surface in rap. Public Enemy's 1991 "1 Million Bottlebags" updated Scott-Heron's 1974 "The Bottle" (a minor R&B hit [#98] in 1977). But although his work is regarded as a precursor of rap, Scott-Heron didn't jump on the bandwagon. "It's something that's aimed at the kids," Scott-Heron said. "I have kids, so I listen to it. But I would say it's not aimed at me. I still listen to the jazz station."

He toured throughout the '80s and ended a 10-year hiatus from recording new material with 1994's Spirits. Among the album's new songs was "Message to the Messengers," in which he took gangsta rappers to task for straying from the course with their violent lyrics. By decade's end he was at work on a new album and was looking for a publisher for a new book, The Last Holiday, about Martin Luther King Day. In 1998 The First Minute of a New Day, Winter in America, and From South Africa to South Carolina were all reissued on CD for the first time with bonus material on Rumlal-Gia. Scott-Heron's imprint on TVT Records, It's Your World and The Mind of Gil Scott-Heron followed in 2000.

Screaming Trees

Formed 1984, Ellensburg, WA
Mark Lanegan (b. Nov. 25, 1964, Ellensburg), voc.; Van Conner (b. Mar. 17, 1967, Apple Valley, CA), bass; Gary Lee Conner (b. Aug. 22, 1962, Ft. Irwin, CA), gtr.; Mark Pickerel, drums.
1985—Other Worlds EP (Velvetone) 1986—Clairvoyance 1987—Even If and Especially When (SST) 1988—Invisible Lantern 1989—Buzz Factory; Changes Come double EP (Sub Pop); Something About Today EP (Epic) 1991—Uncle Anesthesia (- Pickerel; + Barrett Martin [b. Apr. 14, 1967, Olympia, WA], drums) Anthology (SST) 1992—Sweet Oblivion (Epic) 1993—Time Is of the Essence EP 1996—Dust.
Mark Lanegan solo: 1990—The Winding Sheet (Sub Pop) 1994—Whiskey for the Holy Ghost 1998—Scraps at Midnight 1999—I'll Take Care of You 2001—Field Songs.

Screaming Trees are a psychedelic-tinged postpunk band from the rural Pacific Northwest formed by 300-pound brothers Van and Gary Lee Conner. Sons of video-store owners in Ellensburg, Washington, the Conners formed Screaming Trees along with friend Mark Lanegan out of a collective love of both hard rock and punk. The group's SST output is rawer and grungier than its Epic releases, although its Doors-like groove has remained a constant.

The Trees have a reputation for boozing and fighting, often breaking up and regrouping over the years. Lanegan's role as the band's creative center was frequently hobbled by heroin addiction and other drug use; he was arrested in San Francisco in 1997 for allegedly trying to buy crack (charges were later dropped). Each member has done side projects: Lanegan began his singer/songwriter solo career with The Winding Sheet (1990), which included a rendition of Leadbelly's "Where Did You Sleep Last Night?" with accompaniment by Nirvana's Kurt Cobain and Krnst Novoselic, who would later record their own version. Lee Conner formed the Purple Outside in 1990 and put out Mystery Lane on New Alliance, and Van Conner (who went on hiatus in 1991 to tour with Dinosaur Jr) formed Solomon Grundy, which released a self-titled album on New Alliance in 1990.

In 1990 the Trees signed with Epic. The band's first full-length album for the label was 1991's Uncle Anesthesia, co-produced by Chris Cornell of Soundgarden. By the end of 1992, following the massive success of fellow Washingtonians Nirvana and Pearl Jam, the Trees' second full-length Epic release, Sweet Oblivion, began to garner a fair amount of mainstream exposure via MTV's "grunge-mania," helping the album to sales of more than 300,000. The band also gained new listeners with the hit "Nearly Lost You" through their appearance on the platinum soundtrack to Cameron Crowe's 1992 film Singles.

The band reconvened in two L.A. studios in 1995 to record Dust (#134, 1996), which included the single "All I Know." A critical success, the album reflected the darkness and melancholy that had descended on Seattle with the recent deaths of Cobain, Hole bassist Kristin Pfaff, and singer Mia Zapata (who was brutally raped and murdered). Sales were disappointing, however, and after appearing on the 1996 Lollapalooza Tour, the band again dissolved. Lanegan relocated to Southern California and focused on two more solo projects, Scraps at Midnight and I'll Take Care of You. Drummer Barrett Martin, meanwhile, joined Mad Season with Mike McCready (Pearl Jam) and Layne Staley (Alice in Chains) to record Above (#24, 1995); he also performed percussion duties on R.E.M.'s Up in 1998, and joined guitarist Peter Buck in the instrumental band Tuatara. In June 2000 the Screaming Trees performed at the opening of Seattle's Experience Music Project and then promptly broke up, apparently for good.

Seal

Born Sealhenry Olumide Samuel, Feb. 19, 1963, London, Eng.
1991—Seal (Sire/Warner Bros.) 1994—Seal 1998—Human Being.

Though his first recording success came through England's house-music scene, Seal's critically acclaimed debut album presented him as a somewhat mystically inclined singer/songwriter mixing elements of folk, soul, pop, and rock. The son of Nigerian and Brazilian parents who separated when he was a toddler, Sealhenry Samuel earned a degree in architecture, designed leather clothes, and worked in electrical engineering and other odd jobs before he began singing in London pubs. A funk band called Push invited him along on a tour of Japan, after which he joined a blues band in Thailand, then spent several months traveling alone through India.

Seal returned to England and happened to meet house/techno producer Adamski, on whose U.K. dance hit "Killer" Seal wrote lyrics and sang. That led to a deal for Seal himself, whose debut album was produced by ex-Buggie Trevor Horn (ABC, Art of Noise). Seal (#24, 1991) yielded a Top 10 pop hit in "Crazy" (#7, 1991), the video for which showed off Seal's distinctive facial scars (the result of a skin ailment). The rerecorded "Killer" was only a minor hit (#100, 1991). In 1993 he joined Jeff Beck on "Manic Depression," for the Jimi Hendrix all-star tribute album Stone Free. The next year Seal released his second album, again self-titled and produced by Trevor Horn. Despite the early success of the single "A Prayer for the Dying" (#21, 1994), the record got a second life when "Kiss From a Rose" (#1, 1995) was included on the Batman Forever soundtrack. It charted as a single a year after Seal's album had come out, and went on to win Grammys for Best Song, Best Record, and Male Pop Vocal of the Year.

After contributing a cover of Steve Miller's "Fly Like an Eagle" to the Space Jam soundtrack (#10, 1996), Seal teamed up with Horn once again on his third album, Human Being (#22, 1998).

Seals and Crofts

Formed 1969, California

Jim Seals (b. Oct. 17, 1941, Sidney, TX), gr., sax, fiddle, voc.; Dash Crofts (b. Darrell Crofts, Aug. 14, 1940, Cisco, TX), drums, voc., mandolin, kbds., gtr.

1970—Seals and Crofts (TA); Down Home 1971—Year of Sunday (Warner Bros.) 1972—Summer Breeze 1973—Diamond Girl 1974—Unborn Child 1975—I'll Play for You; Greatest Hits 1976—Get Closer; Sudan Village 1977—One on One 1978—Takin' It Easy 1979—The Seals and Crofts Collection (K-Tel) 1980—The Longest Road (Warner Bros.). Dash Crofts solo: 2000—Today (Nuance).

Jim Seals and Dash Crofts were a commercially successful soft-rock pop duo through the '70s. Both were born in small Texas towns and met when Crofts was a teenage drummer for a local band. Later Seals joined a local band called Dean Beard and the Crew Cuts; later Crofts came aboard that outfit, and, to make a long, complicated story short, by mid-1958 both were touring with the Champs, then riding the success of their huge #1 Latin-rock instrumental hit "Tequila." The pair later moved to L.A., where both worked as session musicians and tried to make a go of their own recording careers. In 1965 Seals and Crofts (who spent two years in the service and then returned to the Champs upon being discharged in 1964), left the Champs. Two groups, the Mushrooms and the Dawnbreakers, failed. But out of the latter, first Crofts (who married fellow Dawnbreaker Billie Lee Day) and then Seals were introduced to the Bahá'í faith.

In 1969 Seals and Crofts decided to try it as a duo. They signed to Talent Associates and released two largely ignored LPs before signing to Warner Bros. in 1971. Their first album for their new label also bombed, but their second, Summer Breeze, went to #7 in 1972 on the strength of its #6 title tune and "Hummingbird" (#20, 1972). Diamond Girl (#4, 1973), spun off two more hits, "Diamond Girl" (#6, 1973) and "We May Never Pass This Way (Again)" (#21, 1973). Seals and Crofts, though devout followers of their chosen faith, did not proselytize directly, but they insisted on a clause in their contracts stating that they be given time after each concert to speak to interested fans about Bahá'í. Crofts' wife's sister wrote a poem after viewing a documentary on abortion. Seals wrote the music, and in 1974 the duo released "Unborn Child," an antiabortion song written from the fetus' point of view ("Momma, don't!"). Seals and Crofts, ignoring Warner Bros.' advice, also chose to title the album Unborn Child (#14, 1974). A critical and commercial flop, "Unborn Child" rose only as high as #66 and prompted pro-choice demonstrations at many of their shows.

Over a year later they returned with "I'll Play for You" (#18, 1975), from I'll Play for You (#30, 1975). The following year's Get Closer (#37, 1976), featuring "Get Closer" (#6, 1976), was Seals and Crofts' last Top 40 LP. Carolyn Willis, formerly of Bob B. Soxx and the Blue Jeans and Honey Cone, was featured on that album and its live followup, Sudan Village (#73, 1976). The pair sang music for a Robby Benson film, One on One, from which "My Fair Share" went to #28 in 1977. Takin' It Easy (#78, 1978) included their last Top 20 single, "You're the Love" (#18, 1978). Their final studio effort, The Longest Road, didn't even crack the album chart; Chick Corea and Stanley Clarke guest on it.

Warner Bros. dropped the duo soon after that, but by then, as both have indicated in recent years, it didn't really matter to them. Except for a short 1991–1992 reunion tour and a number of appearances together at Bahá'í-related gatherings, the two have not played together. Crofts lived in Mexico, then Australia, then Nashville. Seals has lived on a coffee farm in Costa Rica since 1980. Dan Seals, Jimmy's younger brother, recorded in the '70s as England Dan and John Ford Coley. More recently, he has had a string of country hit singles. In 1997 rapper Busta Rhymes sampled "Sweet Green Fields" from Seals and Crofts' Get Closer. Crofts completed a solo album, complete with new Adult Contemporary versions of the duo's old material, in 1998; originally a limited edition, it was widely released in 2000.

The Searchers

The Searchers were one of the best of the Liverpool pop bands to emerge in the wake of the Beatles. Their sound matched their clean-cut looks: pretty, gentle, with perfect close-harmony vocals and ringing guitar lines that presaged the Byrds.

The Searchers, originally formed to back up British singer Johnny Sandon, took their name from the John Ford–John Wayne film. They went to Hamburg, Germany, to play the Star Club after the Beatles' success there, and then returned to Liverpool. A&R man Tony Hatch offered them a recording contract after they had established a residency at Liverpool's Iron Door club. Their first U.K. hit came in 1963 with their cover of the Drifters' "Sweets for My Sweet." "Needles and Pins," written by Sonny Bono and Jack Nitzsche, was #1 in Britain in 1964 (#13 US); it eventually sold over a million copies.

The Searchers toured America, Australia, and New Zealand that year. Their only subsequent U.S. Top 20 hits were "Don't Throw Your Love Away" (#16, 1964) and "Love Potion Number 9" (#3, 1965). In Britain their Top 20 success continued through 1965, with "Sugar and Spice" (1963), "Someday We're Gonna Love Again," "When You Walk in the Room," and "What Have They Done to the Rain" (1964); and "Goodbye My Love" and "He's Got No Love" (1965). They then became stalwart club and cabaret performers for many years before resurfacing on Sire in 1979. In the wake of new wave, both The Searchers and Love's Melodies sounded entirely contemporary (containing songs by Tom Petty, Will Birch and John Wicks of the Records, and Alex Chilton) and elicited glowing reviews. Neither sold well, however, and so the group returned to the touring circuit. Cofounder Pender left in 1985 to form his own live act, Mike Pender's Searchers. Longtime drummer Billy Adamson left the remaining Searchers in 1998, but otherwise, the band has been traveling the world with few changes.

The master of lo-fi and one of underground rock's most venerated songwriters, Lou Barlow has demonstrated a flair for confessional folk rock buned under various degrees of feedback and white noise. His bands—Sebadoh, the Folk Implosion, and the mostly solo Sentridoh—represent a commitment to the indie aesthetic that has made Barlow a college radio hero alongside the likes of Pavement and Guided by Voices.

Barlow grew up in Jackson, Michigan, before his father's job transferred the family to Massachusetts. At age 13 Barlow was drawn to the raw emotion of the hardcore punk bands Minor Threat, Dead Kennedys, and Black Flag, which he discovered on college radio. He soon formed the punk band Deep Wound with J Mascis. That partnership evolved into the band Dinosaur Jr [see entry] in the mid-'80s. Barlow originally formed Sebadoh with drummer Eric Gaffney as a side project, but it quickly became full-time when Barlow was fired from Dinosaur Jr in 1989 after Mascis hit him with a guitar during a Connecticut performance. Sebadoh's earliest recordings were bedroom tapes of Barlow's edgy folk rock and Gaffney's noisier experiments, initially released in cassette form, before signing to Homestead Records. The label collected those early cassette releases onto the 1989 CD The Freed Weed.

Bassist Jason Loewenstein (Dissident Voices) was recruited into the band, but differing styles caused tensions between Barlow and Gaffney. Sebadoh signed to Sub Pop in 1992, and Gaffney quit the band three times in the next year. He left permanently after 1994's Bakesale, and was replaced by Bob Fay. Harmacy (#126, 1996) presented a notably cleaner sound, and included strings on the song "Willing to Wait." It was the second Sebadoh album with Barlow fully in charge, though Loewenstein wrote half the songs. The year after the release of The Sebadoh (#197, 1999), the band was dropped by Sub Pop.

Barlow also released several albums with Sebadoh and the hip-hop informed Folk Implosion, a collaboration with singer/songwriter John Davis. With the Folk Implosion, Barlow and Davis wrote songs for the film soundtrack to 1995's Kids, and enjoyed an unexpected lo-fi Top 40 hit in "Natural One" (#29, 1995).

John Sebastian

Born Mar. 17, 1944, New York, NY

1970—John B. Sebastian (MGM); John Sebastian Live
1971—Cheapo-Cheapo Productions Presents the Real Live John Sebastian (Reprise); The Four of Us 1974—The Tarzana Kid 1976—Welcome Back 1989—The Best of John Sebastian (Rhino) 1993—Tar Beach (Shanachie) 1996—I Want My Roots (Music Masters) 1999—Chasin' Gus's Ghost (Hollywood).

John Sebastian's solo career took off almost immediately after breaking up his old group, the Lovin' Spoonful [see entry]. He appeared in an unscheduled set at Woodstock and captured the audience with songs like "I Had a Dream" and a persona that was the epitome of the tie-dyed hippie.

John B. Sebastian, his first solo album, featured "I Had a Dream," as well as a remake of the Spoonful's "You're a Big Boy Now," and though it produced no hit singles, it went to #20 and became the best-selling album of Sebastian's solo career. Cheapo-Cheapo Productions Presents the Real Live John Sebastian was meant to counter an unauthorized live set released and quickly deleted by his old label, MGM, and it relied largely on previously recorded material. Sebastian worked with Little Feat's Lowell George on Tarzana Kid (which included their joint composition "Face of Ap-palachia"). Sebastian's fortunes were temporarily reversed with his first hit single in close to 10 years, "Welcome Back" (#1, 1976), the title song of the TV show Welcome Back, Kotter, which outsold the Spoonful's best-selling single by nearly two-to-one, and was the second-best-selling single of 1976.

Though Sebastian then vanished from the recording scene for over 15 years, he remained active: touring, both solo and as opening act or accompanist to acts as diverse as NRBO, Sha Na Na, Tom Petty, Graham Parker, Willie Dixon, and Les Paul; appearing on TV shows, and writing music for the Care Bears show; and writing a children's book, JB's Harmonica. Sebastian declined to take part in a 1992 Lovin' Spoonful reunion. In 1994 he formed the J-Band, a touring jug band, who appeared on Garrison Keillor's popular radio show, The Prairie Home Companion, and on Late Night With Conan O'Brien.

Jon Secada

Born Juan Secada, Oct. 4, 1962, Havana, Cuba

1992—Jon Secada (SBK) 1994—Heart, Soul & a Voice
1997—Secada (SBK/EMI) 2000—Better Part of Me (Sony).

Jon Secada's debut album, released in both English and Spanish, charted in the Top 20, a victory both for the artist and for the Latin sound—a mixture of romantic ballads and dance pop—he helped bring into the mainstream.

Secada emigrated from Cuba with his parents as a child and grew up in Hialeah, Florida, where he later worked in his family's diner before earning a master's degree in jazz at the University of Miami. There he met two future members of Gloria Estefan and the Miami Sound Machine. Shopping his Stevie Wonder-influenced material to Estefan's husband and manager, Emilio, he broke into the music business by cowriting six songs for Estefan's Into the Light, including two 1991 #1 hits, "Coming Out of the Dark" and "Can't Forget You."

After touring with Estefan as backup vocalist, he released his first album. While his label, SBK, planned that he record only in English, he convinced the company to release two songs in Spanish. When both hit #1 on the Latin chart, he redid the entire album in a Spanish version, Otro Dia Mas Sin Verte; it went on to win a Grammy for Best Latin Pop Album in 1992. (Secada has since continued to release his albums in English and Spanish versions.) Jon Secada (#15, 1992), with its four Top 40 singles, "Just Another Day," "Do You Believe in Us," "Angel," and "I'm Free," sold 4 million copies worldwide; all four were #1 Latin hits as well. A genuine Latin music star who also duetted with Frank Sinatra on the latter's Duets II, Secada in the '90s began penning songs for up-and-comers Ricky Martin and Jennifer Lopez.

Neil Sedaka

Born Mar. 13, 1939, Brooklyn, NY

1962—Neil Sedaka Sings His Greatest Hits (RCA) 1974—

Sedaka's Back (MCA/Rocket) 1975—The Hungry Years 1976—Steppin' Out 1977—A Song (Elektra) 1980—In the Pocket 1981—Now 1986—Me and My Friends (Polydor) 1994—Laughter in the Rain—The Best of Neil Sedaka 1974–1980 (Varèse Vintage) 1998—Tales of Love and Other Passions (Artful).

Neil Sedaka began in the late '50s as a writer of hit songs, became a hitmaking performer himself, then returned to songwriting until the early '70s, when Elton John helped him resume a singing career that briefly propelled him back into the spotlight.

As a teenager, Sedaka was selected by Arthur Rubinstein to play on a show on New York City's classical music station, WQXR. By that time, he had become strongly attracted to popular music as well, and he began writing songs at age 13 to lyrics by his high school friend Howard Greenfield. He formed a backing band, the Tokens (see entry), who later had a hit of their own, "The Lion Sleeps Tonight."

While on a two-year scholarship to New York's Juilliard School of Music, Sedaka sold his first tune, "Stupid Cupid," a hit for Connie Francis in 1958, as was his "Where the Boys Are" (which Francis sang in the hit teen movie of the same title) in 1961. He also sold Sedaka-Greenfield songs to Jerry Wexler at Atlantic Records, who placed them with R&B singer LaVern Baker and Clyde McPhatter. On the advice of Doc Pomus, Sedaka signed up with Al Nevins and Don Kirshner's Aldon Publishing. They felt Sedaka's own high-pitched voice was worth consideration and got him signed with RCA as a singer. In 1959 he had two hits, "The Diary" (#14) and "I Go Ape" (#42). More Sedaka-Greenfield hits followed: "Oh! Carol" (#9) in 1959; "Stairway to Heaven" (#9) in 1960; "Calendar Girl" (#4), "Little Devil" (#11), and "Happy Birthday, Sweet Sixteen" (#6) in 1961; "Breaking Up Is Hard to Do" (#1) and "Next Door to an Angel" (#5) in 1962. Sedaka also played a part in music-video history with the film for "Calendar Girl," today being counted among the first conceptual promotional clips.

Sedaka's performing career slowed in 1963. However, through the '60s and early '70s he and Greenfield continued to write hits for others, including the Fifth Dimension's "Workin' on a Groovy Thing," Tom Jones' "Puppet Man," and Davy Jones' "Rainy Jane." Greenfield, in the meantime, had also found success collaborating with Carole King; together they wrote "Crying in the Rain" for the Everly Brothers. Sedaka and Greenfield split up in 1973, after Sedaka had begun a performing comeback in England. After Sedaka made three LPs in Britain with Graham Gouldman of 10cc coproducing, Elton John helped him get back onto the U.S. chart, first by reissuing cuts from the three British LPs on one U.S. package (Sedaka's Back), then by having him record for his Rocket label. Sedaka's Back (#23, 1974) and The Hungry Years (#16, 1975) both went gold. "Laughter in the Rain" was a #1 hit for Sedaka in 1974, and his "Love Will Keep Us Together" (cowritten with Greenfield) was a #1 smash for the Captain and Tennille, winning a 1975 Grammy as Record of the Year.

Sedaka's second recording streak culminated with the #1 hit "Bad Blood" (1975), which featured John on backing vocals; a bluesy reworking of "Breaking Up Is Hard to Do" (#8, 1976); and "Love in the Shadows" (#16, 1976). Since then Sedaka and Greenfield have collaborated regularly. Sedaka has become a successful MOR ballad singer and has made numerous TV and concert appearances; he remains a familiar face on the nostalgia circuit. In 1980 he and his daughter Dara recorded "Should've Never Let You Go," which reached #19 on the pop chart.

The Seeds

Formed 1965, Los Angeles, CA

Sky Saxon (b. Richard Marsh, ca. 1946, Salt Lake City, UT), voc., bass, harmonica; Jan Savage, gtr.; Daryl Hooper, kybds.; Rick Andridge, drums.

1966—The Seeds (GNP Crescendo); Web of Sound 1967—Future 1968—Raw and Alive: Merlin's Music Box 1969—A Full Spoon of Seedy Blues 1977—Fallin' Off the Edge 1993—Travel With Your Mind.

On the cusp of the early-to-mid-'60s garage-rock boom and the mid-to-late-'60s flower-power era came the Seeds. Their Top 40 hit of 1967, "Pushin' Too Hard" matched their scruffy looks with a nasty, threatening drive and ominous lyrics. This product of the L.A. teen scene had a few more minor hits—"Mr. Farmer," "Can't Seem to Make You Mine," and "Thousand Shadows"—later that year, all were very much in the vein of "Pushin'"; though their sound gradually became more psychedelic. The group disbanded in 1969.

After making records with the legendary religious cult-psych ensemble Ya Ho Wa 13 (a k a Father Yod and the Spirit of '76), lead singer Sky Saxon—sometimes rechristened Sky Sunlight—attempted several comebacks fronting a number of bands. He has released numerous solo albums. In the mid-'80s, ROLLING STONE magazine tracked him down at home in Kailua, Hawaii, where he claimed to be living with two common-law wives and five kids, and praying to dogs, since, as he explained, "God is dog spelled backwards." Former Seeds guitarist Jan Savage joined the L.A. Police Department.

After several years of playing with L.A. punk musicians (including members of the Dream Syndicate and Redd Kross) Saxon reunited the original Seeds for a tour in 1989. In the late '90s he made another resurgence, having become an icon to the international psychedelic underground. In 1998 he was backed by ?'s Mysterians at New York's Cavestomp! Festival. The following year the Seeds announced news of a forthcoming album.

Pete Seeger is unquestionably the foremost contemporary popularizer of American folk music. From his pop-folk successes with the Weavers in the late '40s, through the '50s, when he was blacklisted by the government, through the '60s, when he became a cultural hero through his outspoken commitment to the antiwar and civil rights struggles, until now, Seeger has remained an indomitable, resourceful, and charming performer. He wrote a number of folk standards—including "If I Had a Hammer" (with Lee Hays) and "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?"—and has preserved and given exposure to thousands of other songs.

Seeger's interest in music began early. His father, Charles Seeger, was a musicologist, and his mother a violin teacher, both were on the faculty of the Juilliard School of Music. He had learned banjo, ukulele, and guitar by his teens, when he developed an interest in America's folk-music legacy at age 16, after attending a folk festival in North Carolina. He began working with noted folk archivist and field recorder Alan Lomax before traveling around the country, absorbing rural music. He attended Harvard University and served in the army in World War II. In the '40s Seeger became a friend and singing associate of Woody Guthrie before forming the Weavers [see entry], an enormously popular folk quartet that popularized such folk chestnuts as "On Top of Old Smokey" and Lead Belly's "Goodnight Irene."

In the '50s Seeger's sympathies with humanistic socialism led him to be blacklisted by the House Un-American Activities Committee; still Seeger continued to perform wherever he could. He recorded for Folkways and signed with John Hammond and Columbia Records in the early '60s. As always, Seeger did more than just perform. A gifted storyteller and music historian, he brought to his audiences not just the songs but the stories of the people who wrote and first sang them. In his 1993 autobiography, Where Have All the Flowers Gone, for example, Seeger writes of "Wimoweh": "Please don't sing it the way the American pop record had it: 'In the jungle . . . etc.' This trivializes a song of great historical importance."

With the arrival of the Vietnam War protests, Seeger was rediscovered by a younger audience. In 1965 the Byrds had a #1 hit with Seeger's "Turn! Turn! Turn!," a Biblical passage set to music. From the mid '70s on, Seeger has worked regularly with Woody Guthrie's son Arlo. He has crusaded for ecology with the sloop Clearwater, giving concerts along the Hudson River. In 1994 he received the Presidential Medal of the Arts, as well as a Kennedy Award. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame as an early influence in 1996. Pete, released later that year, was his first new studio album in 17 years. It featured everything from traditional ballads to gospel to a community chorus to an activist rap. Seeger has toured and sung around the world. His music instructional books and records inspired generations of self-taught musicians and folksingers (including Joni Mitchell).

Seeger's half sister, Peggy, is also an accomplished folk musician and songwriter. In addition to her feminist anthem "Gonna Be an Engineer," Peggy also wrote with her husband, Ewan MacColl. In the '50s she moved to England, where she joined a folk group called the Ramblers, with Alan Lomax, Shirley Collins, and MacColl (writer of "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face"). A British citizen, Peggy Seeger continues to tour and record. Half brother Mike Seeger, also a musician, was a member of the New Lost City Ramblers and an important part of the folk revival of the '60s.

Bob Seeger

Born May 6, 1945, Dearborn, MI

1969—Ramblin' Gambler's Man (Capitol); Noah 1970—Mongrel 1971—Brand New Morning 1972—Smokin' O.P.'s (Palladium) 1973—Back in '72 1974—Seven (Capitol) 1975—Beautiful Loser (Capitol) 1976—Live Bullet; Night Moves 1978—Stranger in Town (Capitol) 1980—Against the Wind 1981—Nine Tonight 1983—The Distance 1986—Like a Rock 1991—The Fire Inside 1994—Greatest Hits 1995—It's a Mystery.

For years, singer/songwriter Bob Seeger remained a local Michigan rock hero. His music brought together Detroit's two legacies—hard rock and soul—while a series of bad breaks denied him the nationwide audience critics thought his hard-driving workingman's rock deserved. But he came into his own in 1976 with the gold Live Bullet and platinum Night Moves LPs.

Seeger's father had been a big-band leader who quit music to work in a factory, then left the family when Seeger was 12, leaving the boy to live in near-poverty with his mother and brother. (His father died in a fire in 1968.) In 1961 Seeger led a three-piece band, the Decibels, then joined another local Michigan band, the Town Criers, before going on to Doug Brown's Omens. Seger recorded "East Side Story" with members of the Town Criers and the Omens; the tune had previously been a failure for the Underdogs, who included Michael and Suzi Quatro and future Eagle Glenn Frey, but Seger's version was a local hit in 1966. He later produced Frey's first solo single, "Such a Lonely Child."

In the late '60s Seger had strong followings in the Midwest and Florida as well as more big local hits, such as "Nut-bush City Limits," "Ramblin' Gamblin' Man" and, most notably, "Heavy Music," which had begun climbing the national chart before dropping when Seger's record company, Cameo, folded. He also recorded an answer record to Staff Sergeant Barry Sadler's "The Ballad of the Green Berets"—"Ballad of the Yellow Beret," for Are You Kidding Me Records in 1966—but when legal action was threatened, the label withdrew the 45.

Seger signed with Capitol in 1969. Despite having his first national hit in early 1969 with a rereleased "Ramblin' Gamblin' Man" (#17), he left music later that year to go back to college. By 1970, though, he was back on the road with a group called Teegarden and Van Winkle, a partnership resulting in 1972's Smokin' O.P.s, his first for his own label, Palladium. Back in '72, partly recorded at Muscle Shoals and including J.J. Cale backing on some cuts, was yet another commercial failure, as was Seven, which yielded the failed single "Get Out of Denver" (later covered by Dave Edmunds).

After moving back to Capitol, things slowly began to click with Beautiful Loser, which introduced Seger's own backup unit, the Silver Bullet Band (Drew Abbott, guitar; Robyn Robbins, keyboards; Alto Reed, sax; Chris Campbell, bass; Charlie Allen Marun, drums), and included another local Detroit hit, "Katmandu." The Live Bullet double album, recorded in Detroit, stayed on the U.S. chart for over three years and eventually went quadruple platinum.

The 5-million-seller Night Moves established Seger on ballads (the hit title tune, #8, 1977; "Mainstreet," #24, 1977) as well as hard rock ("Rock and Roll Never Forgets," #41, 1977). Stranger in Town yielded four major hits: "Still the Same" (#4), "Hollywood Nights" (#12) and "We've Got Tonight" (#13) in 1978, and "Old Time Rock & Roll" (#28) in 1979. By the time of the 4-million-selling Against the Wind (1980), Seger's only #1 LP, his singles had become almost exclusively ballads: "Fire Lake" (#6), "Against the Wind" (#5), and "You'll Accompany Me" (#14). Only "Horizontal Bop" (#42), from that album, was uptempo. The singer's second live LP Nine Tonight, became his fifth consecutive multiplatinum release.

But beginning with 1982's The Distance, Seger's sales began to taper off (his taking three- and five-year sabbaticals between records certainly was a factor), although that album and the two to follow, Like a Rock and The Fire Inside, each sold a million copies. The Distance also signaled the gradual revamping of the Silver Bullet Band. Guitarist Drew Abbott quit in anger after Seger began using session musicians such as pianist Roy Bittan from Bruce Springsteen's E Street Band and guitarist Waddy Wachtel. The band has shed members ever since, with only bassist Chns Campbell remaining. Former Grand Funk keyboardist Craig Frost came aboard in 1980 and on Like a Rock cowrote two songs with Seger, who also provided a home, briefly, to ex-GFR drummer Don Brewer.

Seger contributed the song "Understanding" to the soundtrack of the film Teachers in 1984; it went Top 20. "Shakedown," from 1987's Beverly Hills Cop II, topped the chart. The Keith Forsey tune had been offered first to Seger's pal Glenn Frey, but he contracted laryngitis and couldn't record it. The Fire Inside (1991), coproduced by Don Was, gave Seger only one hit, "Real Love" (#24). Greatest Hits went double platinum, peaked at #8, and spent 99 weeks on the album chart in 1994 and 1995. The all-new It's a Mystery peaked at #27 though it produced no hit singles.

For more than 30 years the Seldom Scene has been making vital bluegrass music while adhering to the "new grass" ethos, a genre that combines the instrumentation and style of bluegrass with material most often performed by rock and/or folk musicians. Founded by John Duffey, "the father of modern bluegrass," the group's unique approach has enabled it to balance tradition and innovation without alienating advocates of either camp. The Seldom Scene's "new grass" roots come honestly. Both Duffey and original bass player Tom Grey were members of the first progressive bluegrass outfit, the Country Gentlemen, formed in 1957. Like the Scene, they covered contemporary country, pop, and folk tunes in addition to bluegrass standards.

The Seldom Scene has recorded with some of the biggest names in contemporary country music, and has simultaneously acquired a reputation as a powerful, spontaneous live ensemble. Guest fiddler Ricky Skaggs graces Act Three and The New Seldom Scene Album features Linda Ronstadt on vocals. Old Train includes both Skaggs and Ronstadt, as the band runs through its trademark concoction of traditional and new material. Scene 20 chronicles two nights of performance at the band's second home, the Birchmere club in Alexandria, Virginia. Completely free of overdubs, this album includes all eight Seldom Scene members up to that point, and Emmylou Harns contributes lead vocals to the bitter-sweet "Satan's Jeweled Crown."

In 1994 the Seldom Scene released Like We Used to Be, which marked the return of guitarist/vocalist John Starling, who departed again before the album was released. Taking his place was Moondi Klein, who moved to Washington, DC, in 1984, harboring aspirations of joining the Seldom Scene, with whom he had been enamored since discovering bluegrass music at age 14.

In 1995 three members of the band, including Klein and founding Dobro player Mike Auldridge, defected to concentrate on Cheseapeake, the side project they had formed a couple of years earlier. The remaining Scenesters plus three new recruits recorded 1995's Dream Scene, which was Duffey's last album with the band. He died of a heart attack in late 1996. Lou Reid, who had played with the Seldom Scene in the late '80s and early '90s, returned to the fold. Original banjoist Ben Eldridge and the others released the surprisingly faithful, less slick Scene It All in 2000.

The Selector

Formed 1979, Coventry, Eng.
Noel Davies, gtr.; Charley Anderson, bass; Pauline Black, voc.;

Charley "H" Bembridge, drums; Compton Amanor, gtr.; Arthur "Gaps" Hendrickson, voc.; Desmond Brown, kybds.

1980—Too Much Pressure (Chrysalis) 1981—Celebrate the Bullet (group disbands) 1992—Out in the Streets (Triple X) (group re-forms: Davies; Black; + Perry Melius, drums; + Martin Stewart, kybds.; + Nick Welsh, bass) 1993—Madness EP 1994—The Happy Album 1995—Hairspray 1996—Back Out on the Streets 1997—The Very Best of the Selector 1999—Cruel Britannia (Snapper Music, U.K.); Perform the Trojan Songbook (Receiver, U.K.).

Along with the Specials, Madness, and the English Beat, the Selector was one of the main bands in the ska-influenced trend that broke big in England in 1979. Like the other bands in this "movement," the Selector used the old Mod two-tone fashion style as a visual aid. Its music was an upbeat blend of ska (quicker and less brooding than reggae, which also influenced the group's music), rock, and soul, with socially conscious lyrics, backed up by the band's own racially and sexually integrated lineup.

Like the Specials, the members of the Selector all hailed from the industrial city of Coventry, about 80 miles northwest of London. Noel Davies had written a song called "The Selector" that he tried to sell to various companies, without success. Davies and the Specials financed their own label, 2-Tone, and issued a single, "Gangsters" b/w "The Selector," with Davies playing guitar. The single went British Top 10 in 1979, and Davies formed a band.

Charley Anderson, Charley Bembridge, Arthur Hendrickson, and Compton Amanor had been playing in the Coventry roots-reggae band Hard Top 22; the band was completed with Pauline Black and Desmond Brown, who were working in another local rock-reggae outfit. Their 2-Tone label went on to become one of England's most successful independent record companies, and the band's 1980 debut, Too Much Pressure, came out in America on Chrysalis. Highlighted by Black's lead vocals, the sound was fast-paced and politically charged. It was the rage for a short while in England (the single "Three Minute Hero" went Top 10 there), but it did not go over in America despite positive press and a strong summer tour. In 1981 the Selector released a second album, Celebrate the Bullet, and was featured in the film and soundtrack to Dance Craze, chronicling all the 2-Tone bands, but broke up later that year.

Black released a British single, "Pirates of the Airwaves," that year, but soon left the music business to concentrate on acting, appearing on the British children's show Hold Tight. In 1992 she again joined forces with Davies in a re-formed Selector, featuring members of the band Bad Manners. They toured to support Out in the Streets (1992), a greatest-hits collection, and returned to the studio in 1993 to record the Madness EP with ska legend Prince Buster. The band continues to tour and record regularly. One of its latest releases, Perform the Trojan Songbook, is a collection of classic reggae and ska songs.

Brian Setzer/The Brian Setzer Orchestra

Born Apr. 11, 1959, New York, NY

Brian Setzer solo: 1986—The Knife Feels Like Justice (EMI America) 1988—Live Nude Guitars (EMI Manhattan).

Brian Setzer Orchestra, formed 1992, Los Angeles, CA: Setzer, voc., gtr.; numerous other musicians.

Brian Setzer's 68 Comeback Special, formed 2000: Setzer; Bernie Dresel, drums; Mark Winchester, bass. 2001—Ignition! (Surfdog).

When the neo-swing movement spread from L.A. cocktail lounges into the American mainstream on the heels of the 1996 movie Swingers, Brian Setzer was ready for it. In 1992 the former Stray Cats guitarist, who had seen two solo albums and a Stray Cats reunion fail to make an impression, hit upon the novel idea of marrying his electric guitar with a big band orchestra. The Brian Setzer Orchestra's self-titled 1994 debut sold modestly, as did Guitar Slinger, their 1996 followup. By the time of 1998's Dirty Boogie, however, Setzer found himself at the forefront of a nationwide swing revival. The album featured a duet with No Doubt's Gwen Stefani on the Elvis Presley/Ann-Margret classic "You're the Boss," but the track that proved the strongest selling point was a cover of Louis Prima's 1956 hit "Jump Jive an' Wail" (#94)—thanks in part to the simultaneous use of the original in a popular Gap TV ad. The album climbed to #9, was certified double platinum, and won two Grammys, for Best Pop Performance Duo/Group (for "Jump Jive an' Wail") and Best Pop Instrumental Performance (a cover of Santo and Johnny's #1 instrumental hit "Sleepwalk"). The inevitable wane of the swing fad cooled the sales of Vavoom! (#62, 2000), but the instrumental track "Caravan" won the group another Grammy. In the midst of touring behind the album, Setzer road-tested a new rockabilly trio, Brian Setzer's '68 Comeback Special, featuring the Orchestra's rhythm section, drummer Bernie Dresel, and bassist Mark Winchester. An album by the trio, Ignition!, was released in summer 2001.

The Sex Pistols

Formed 1975, London, Eng.

Johnny Rotten (b. John Lydon, Jan. 31, 1956, London), voc.; Steve Jones (b. Sep. 3, 1955, London), gtr.; Glen Matlock (b. London), bass; Paul Cook (b. July 20, 1956, London), drums. 1977—(—Matlock; + Sid Vicious [b. John Simon Richie, May 10, 1957, London; d. Feb. 2, 1979, New York, NY], bass) Never Mind the Bollocks, Here's the Sex Pistols (Warner Bros.) 1980—The Great Rock 'n' Roll Swindle (Virgin) 1996—Filthy Lucre Live.

Unabashedly crude, intensely emotional, calculated either to exhilarate or to offend, the Sex Pistols' music and stance were in direct opposition to the star trappings and complacency that, by the mid-'70s, had rendered rock & roll irrelevant to the common bloke. Over the course of their short, turbulent existence, the group released a single studio album that changed if not the history of rock, at least its course. While the Sex Pistols were not the first punk rockers (that distinction probably goes to the Stooges), they were the most widely known and at least, to appearances, the most threatening. Never Mind the Bollocks, Here's the Sex Pistols unquestionably ranks as one of the most important rock & roll records ever: its sound a raw, snarling, yet mesmerizing rejection of and challenge to not only rock & roll music and culture but a modern world that offered, as Rotten sang in "God Save the Queen," "no future." Whether the Pistols were simply a sophisticated hype run amok or the true voice of their generation has been widely debated, yet, oddly, that neither matters nor explains how they came to spark and personify one of the few truly critical moments in pop culture—the rise of punk.

The Sex Pistols were the brainchild of young entrepreneur Malcolm McLaren [see entry]. The owner of a London clothes boutique, Sex, which specialized in "anti-fashion," McLaren had conceived the idea of a rock & roll act that would challenge every established notion of propriety when, in 1975, he found himself managing the New York Dolls in their final months as a group. A part-time employee of Sex, Glen Matlock, played bass with Paul Cook and Steve Jones; he let McLaren know they were looking for a singer. McLaren approached 19-year-old John Lydon, whom he had seen hanging around the jukebox at Sex and who was known mainly for his rudeness.

Lydon had never sung before, but he accepted the invitation and thoroughly impressed the others with his scabrous charisma. McLaren had found his act, he named the group the Sex Pistols. Allegedly, Lydon's disregard for personal hygiene prompted Jones to dub him Johnny Rotten. Ten minutes into their first gig at a suburban art school dance on November 6, 1975, the school's social programmer literally pulled the plug. In the early months of 1976, McLaren's carefully cultivated word-of-mouth about the Sex Pistols made the band the leader of the nascent punk movement. Their gigs inspired the formation of the Clash, Buzzcocks, X-Ray Spex, Joy Division, Siouxsie and the Banshees, and countless other rebel groups in the second half of the '70s.

The press and the record industry ignored the Sex Pistols at first, but by the end of the summer the uproar—both acclamatory and denunciatory—was too loud to be ignored. In November EMI outbid Polydor with a recording contract worth £40,000. The Sex Pistols' first single, "Anarchy in the U.K.," was released in December. That month the band used the word "fucker" in a nationally televised interview; the consequent outrage led promoters and local authorities to cancel all but five of the dates scheduled on the group's national tour and EMI to withdraw "Anarchy in the U.K."—#38 on the U.K. chart in January 1977—from circulation and to terminate its contract with the Sex Pistols.

In March Matlock left to form the Rich Kids and was replaced by John Richie, a previously nonmusical friend of Rotten, who named him Sid Vicious. That same month A&M signed the Pistols for £150,000; just a week later the company fired them for a balance payment of £75,000. In May Virgin signed the Pistols and released their second record, "God Save the Queen," timed to coincide with the Queen's Silver Jubilee that June. The song was immediately banned from airplay in England. Nonetheless it was a top-selling single (cited as a blank at the #2 position on official charts, listed as #1 on independent charts).

When no British hall would book the Pistols, the group went abroad—to the Continent in July and to the U.S. in December, by which time the debut album had been released. In America the band found itself the object of a little adulation, considerable hostility, but mostly uncomprehending curiosity, which turned to scoffing when the group made only halfhearted attempts to live up to its reputation for savagery. Rotten was characteristically critical of the sensationalism and opportunism that had been attached to the Pistols (for which he blamed McLaren), and on January 14, 1978, immediately after a concert in San Francisco, he announced the breakup of the group.

Jones and Cook remained active in the punk movement and formed the Professionals; Jones materialized in the mid-'80s in Chequered Past, featuring former Blondie rhythm section Nigel Harrison and Clem Burke, ex-Iggy Pop sideman Tony Sales, and singer Michael des Barres. Vicious initiated a haphazard solo career, which ended when he was imprisoned in New York on charges of stabbing his girlfriend Nancy Spungen to death in their Chelsea Hotel room. He died of a heroin overdose while out on bail before he could be tried.

Dismissing the Sex Pistols as "a farce" and reverting to his given name, Lydon formed Public Image, Ltd. [see entry]. In 1986 the surviving members of the group and Vicious' mother won a lawsuit against McLaren, charging he had tied up their royalties in two management companies. The plaintiffs were later awarded approximately $1.44 million. That same year, the critically acclaimed Alex Cox film Sid and Nancy was released.

In 1996 all four original members reunited to embark on a world tour, including Europe, North and South America, Japan, and Australia, dubbed the Filthy Lucre Tour. The Sex Pistols, uncharacteristically "professional" onstage, nonetheless attacked the old repertoire with a fury. Filthy Lucre Live, which documented the re-formed band's London performance, was released in the States in time for the tour's U.S. arrival. In 2000 Julien Temple's The Filth and the Fury documentary on the Pistols included some of the footage originally released as The Great Rock 'n' Roll Swindle in 1980.

Charlie Sexton

Born Aug. 11, 1968, San Antonio, TX

1985—Pictures for Pleasure (MCA) 1989—Charlie Sexton 1995—Under the Wishing Tree (with the Charlie Sexton Sextet). With Arc Angels (Sexton, gtr., voc.; Chris Layton [b. Nov. 16, 1955, Corpus Christi, TX], drums; Tommy Shannon [b. Apr. 18, 1948, Tucson, AZ], bass; Doyle Bramhall II [b. Dec. 24, 1968, Dallas, TX], gtr., voc.): 1992—Arc Angels (DGC). Doyle Bramhall II solo: 1996—Doyle Bramhall II (Geffen) 1999—Jellycream (RCA).

Charlie Sexton's precocious guitar skills earned him a record contract at the age of 15, but it was his high cheekbones and skinny, vaguely androgynous sensuality that won the singer and musician heavy rotation on MTV two years later, when his 1985 debut album and single hit the pop chart. Alas, a teen idol's reign is usually short-lived, and so in the early '90s, after a disappointing sophomore effort, Sexton resurfaced as one-fourth of Arc Angels, a roots-rock outfit that made a bid for the sort of artistic credibility that he had aspired to as a child prodigy. By 1994, the Arc Angels had disbanded, and Sexton was recording a new album with a different band.

The guitarist was born to hippie teenage parents (his mother was 16 when Sexton was born, his father served time in prison when Sexton was a young child). Sexton's prodigious behavior began when he picked up a guitar at the age of four, encouraged by his blues-and-rockabilly-loving mother. (Younger brother Will fronts the band Will and the Kill.) By the time he was 10 the fledgling musician was sitting in on club gigs around Austin, Texas; about a year later he met Joe Ely, who enlisted him for a six-week tour. Sexton left home to live in Austin full-time when he was just 12; by 13 he was playing professionally. He played in various other bands before being signed by MCA Records. Session work with Keith Richards and Ron Wood, Bob Dylan, and Don Henley followed before the teenager's first album, Pictures for Pleasure, was released and shot to #15, spawning the #17 single "Beat's So Lonely." Sexton's low, throaty vocals and buoyantly disposable hard-rock songs evoked shades of Billy Idol, another video-genic bad boy whose star was then falling fast. As for Sexton, his self-titled second album peaked at #104, then quickly disappeared.

In 1990, while working on material for a comeback effort at the Austin Rehearsal Complex (ARC), Sexton encountered drummer Chris Layton and bassist Tommy Shannon, the rhythm section of Stevie Ray Vaughan's band Double Trouble, and singer/guitarist Doyle Bramhall II (the son of drummer Doyle Bramhall, who had played with Vaughan's brother Jimmie in the Fabulous Thunderbirds). The musicians clicked immediately, and became the group Arc Angels shortly afterward, following Stevie Ray's death in a 1990 helicopter crash. Their eponymous 1992 debut album was predictably a gritty, bluesy, album-rock-oriented affair, and was produced by Little Steven Van Zandt. Arc Angels (#126, 1992) garnered critical acclaim, if not commercial success. The group broke up soon after, partly amid Bramhall's growing dependence on heroin. (After the band's demise, Bramhall successfully completed a rehab program.)

In 1994 Sexton hooked up with a new band—bassist George Reiff, keyboardist Michael Ramos, and drummer Rafael Gayol (the latter two from the band BoDeans)—and recorded Under the Wishing Tree, released in 1995 and credited to the Charlie Sexton Sextet. More musically diverse and lyrically personal than his previous work, the album was well received critically but wasn't a popular hit. Sexton began recording an album with his brother for A&M Records in 1998, but when the record label was acquired by Seagram, the project was dropped. With bassist Shannon and drummer Layton fresh from the disbanded Storyville and Bramhall working on his second solo album, the Arc Angels briefly reunited for a club tour in 1999. Bramhall went on to tour with Roger Waters later that year. Sexton joined Bob Dylan's band around the same time. In 2001 he coproduced Lucinda Williams' Essence.

The Shadows

Formed 1958 as the Drifters, London, Eng.
 Hank B. Marvin (b. Oct. 28, 1941, Newcastle, Eng.), gtr., voc.;
 Bruce Welch (b. Nov. 2, 1941, Bognor Regis, Eng.), gtr., voc.;
 Ian Samwell, bass; Terry Smart, drums; Ken Payne, gtr.
 Early years—(- Samwell; + Jet Harris [b. July 6, 1939], bass; - Smart; + Tony Meehan [b. Mar. 2, 1942, London], drums; - Meehan; + Brian Bennett [b. Feb. 9, 1940, London], drums) 1962—The Shadows (Columbia, U.K.) (- Harris; - Bennett; + "Licorice" Locking, bass) 1963—Greatest Hits (- Locking; + John Rostill [b. June 16, 1942, Birmingham, Eng.; d. Nov. 26, 1973], bass) 1965—More Hits 1968—(- Welch; + Adam Hawkshaw, gtr., voc.) 1972—(- Hawkshaw; + Welch; + John Farrar, bass, gtr., voc.) 1973—Specs Appeal (EMI) 1976—Rarities 1977—The Best of the Shadows; 20 Golden Greats 1996—Shadows Are Go! (Scamp).

While still backing British teen idol Cliff Richard in the late '50s, the Shadows began to branch out into a successful instrumental-rock career of their own, which made ever-besppectacled lead guitarist Hank B. Marvin one of the most influential British rock guitarists.

Marvin, whose twanging guitar leads were the group's hallmark, took up banjo and guitar as a youth, and by 14 he and schoolmate Bruce Welch were playing together in skiffle groups. They moved to London's Soho section, and after a few months of living in poverty, they joined Richard's touring band, which already included Terry Smart and Ian Samwell (the latter wrote Richard's first hit, "Move It").

The group was originally called the Drifters, but changed its name to the Shadows to avoid confusion with the American vocal group. They stayed with Richard through 1968, despite their own long string of hits. They appeared with Richard in films like Expresso Bongo, The Young Ones, Summer Holiday, and Finders Keepers, and despite several personnel changes, they always maintained their trademark sound. Their first single, 1959's "Feelin' Fine," wasn't a hit, but their fourth, 1960's "Apache," was a long-running #1 in the U.K. In 1981 it was revived in a rap-funk version by the Sugar Hill Gang.

Most of their 20-plus followup hits—"FBI," "Kon Tiki," "Atlantis," "Frightened City" (1961), "Shindig" (1963), "Don't Make My Baby Blue" (1965)—were instrumentals and were mainly U.K. successes, including 13 Top 10 hits. In 1962 Tony Meehan and Jet Harris performed as a duo and had three 1963 hits in Britain: "Diamonds" (#1), "Scarlet O'Hara" (#2), and "Applejack" (#4). After Harris was involved in a car crash, Meehan returned to songwriting and production work.

Welch finally quit in 1968, precipitating the first of several Shadows breakups. Within two years, though, he and Marvin were back together with Bennett and Australian guitarist John Farrar. They recorded two LPs as Marvin, Welch and Farrar. Ex-bassist Rostill had gone on to play with Tom Jones, record a few solo singles, and write tunes for Engelbert Humperdinck, the Family Dogg, and others, and was fatally electrocuted by his guitar in 1973.

Meanwhile, the Shadows had split up again in 1969—when Welch fell ill—and they re-formed several times through the '70s. The title of 1973's Specs Appeal referred to Marvin's glasses. In 1977 the 20 Golden Greats album was #1 in Britain, and the Shadows re-formed again to tour by popular demand. They have regrouped several times over the years. In 1986 Marvin appeared on a remake of "Living Doll" that Cliff Richard recorded with the cast of the popular British comedy The Young Ones.

Bennett, Welch, Farrar, and Marvin have done session and production work. Welch has worked with Cliff Richard and Farrar with Olivia Newton-John. Meehan has become a successful producer and arranger. The group last placed an album in the U.K. Top 10 in the mid-'80s. In 1983 the Shadows received the Ivor Novello Award for their contribution to British music. In 1990 Bennett retired from the group. Marvin, who has had a pocky relationship with Welch, pursued solo projects. Bennett and Marvin have also toured with their sons.

The Shaggs

Formed 1967, Fremont, NH
 Betty Wiggin (b. Dec. 24, 1950, Exeter, NH), voc., gtr.; Dorothy "Dot" Wiggin (b. Mar. 21, 1948, Portsmouth, NH), gtr., voc.;
 Helen Wiggin (b. Dec. 17, 1946, Kittery, ME), drums.
 1969—Philosophy of the World (Third World) 1982—Shaggs' Own Thing (Red Rooster) 1988—The Shaggs (Rounder).

Three self-taught sisters raised in a remote area of New England, the Shaggs formed (at their disciplinarian father's bidding) one of the first all-girl bands who played their own instruments and wrote and sang their own songs—making music that was so primitively quirky it spawned a cult following among NRBQ and other rock cognoscenti and future fans of punk rock including Kurt Cobain.

Textile worker Austin Wiggin Jr. got instruments for his three young daughters, Dot, Helen, and Betty, and insisted they form a band, even though the girls exhibited no musical talent. After woodshedding for less than a year, and inspired by their favorite group, Herman's Hermits, the sisters entered a Massachusetts recording studio to record their homegrown songs, about such topics as their cat Foot Foot, their parents, and the idea that the grass is always greener on the other side. The result, as described by Irwin Chusid, who featured the band in his book Songs in the Key of Z: "Hacked-at chords, missed downbeats, out-of-socket transitions, blown accents, and accidental convergences abound. The sisters' arrangements are so uncoordinated they seem to be riffing off their genetic code." Local label Third World pressed 1,000 copies of Philosophy of the World. The album was sold locally at weekly Saturday night Shaggs gigs at the Fremont Town Hall, which the girls dutifully played to please their father. Younger sister Rachel sometimes joined in on bass. When Dad died in 1975, the sisters put away their instruments for nearly 25 years.

Meanwhile, the album fell into the hands of outsider music buffs, like NRBQ keyboardist Terry Adams, who arranged for its national release in 1980, and Frank Zappa, who named it in a Playboy survey as his third favorite album of all time. In 1982 NRBQ's Red Rooster label released slightly more accomplished, later recordings, Shaggs' Own Thing.

Still, the story of the Shaggs was shrouded in mystery until 1999, when a New Yorker writer tracked the sisters down for a comprehensive profile. In November 1999 Dot and Betty performed in a New York nightclub with a stand-in drummer (sister Helen suffers from depression and couldn't make the gig), and the sisters have since sold their life-story movie nights to Artisan Entertainment. Over the years, the Shaggs' recordings have been available in various formats, combinations, and sequencing, and in 1999 RCA reissued on CD an exact replica of the original Philosophy (with the same cover, liner notes, and sequencing).

Tupac Shakur/2Pac

Born Lesane Parish Crooks, changed to Tupac Amaru Shakur, June 16, 1971, Brooklyn, NY; died Sep. 13, 1996, Las Vegas, NV

1991—2Pacalypse Now (Interscope) 1993—Strictly 4 My N.I.G.G.A.Z. 1995—Me Against the World; So Many Tears EP 1996—All Eyez on Me (Death Row); The Don Killuminati: The 7 Day Theory (as Makaveli) 1997—R U Still Down? (Remember Me) (Amaru/Jive) 1998—In His Own Words (Mecca); Greatest Hits (Interscope) 2001—Until the End of Time.

Tupac + Outlawz: 1999—Still I Rise (Interscope).
2Pac with Thug Life: 1994—Volume 1 (Interscope).

Tupac Shakur (a.k.a. 2Pac) was among the most dynamic, influential, and self-destructive rappers of the '90s. And true to his appropriately titled 1995 chart-topping album, Me Against the World, he attempted to define himself as a performer amidst numerous criminal charges and convictions. His husky voice described the rapper's stark contradictions, preaching misogyny and strong women, street wisdom and the violence of his "thug life"—words he had tattooed across his torso. The critical and commercial success of his music (as well as an acclaimed acting career) was continually overshadowed by his legal entanglements, which began only after he became a recording artist. In the life of this alternately acclaimed and vilified gangsta rapper, art and reality became tragically blurred, culminating in his 1996 murder in Las Vegas.

Shakur was the son of Black Panther Party members Billy Garland and Afeni Shakur (Shakur is Arabic for "thankful to God"), who was in jail (and later acquitted) on bombing charges while pregnant with him. Sometime after his birth, he was named Tupac Amaru, for an Incan chief whose name translates as "shining serpent." Shakur spent his earliest years in the Bronx and Harlem, and at age 13 made his acting debut in a production of A Raisin in the Sun at an Apollo Theatre benefit for Jesse Jackson's 1984 presidential campaign. He spent the rest of his childhood moving around the country with his mother. He attended the Baltimore School of the Arts before dropping out and settling, at the age of 17, in Mann County, California. The rapper then successfully auditioned to become a dancer and roadie for the rap group Digital Underground [see entry] and simultaneously worked relentlessly on his own material. He appeared on that group's This Is an E.P. Release EP (1990) and Sons of the P (1991). In 1991 he signed with Interscope and released the album 2pacalypse Now (#64 pop, #13 R&B, 1992), a musical mixture of inner-city portraiture and messages of racial strength. An underground hit, the album spawned the single "Brenda's Got a Baby" (#23 R&B).

Shakur also became a successful actor in the early '90s, appearing in Ernest Dickerson's Juice (1992) and Above the Rim (1994), and giving a critically acclaimed performance opposite Janet Jackson in John Singleton's Poetic Justice (1993). Despite a promising start and wide praise for his performances, the rest of his film work was far less acclaimed, he ended his acting career as James Belushi's sidekick in the mostly ignored Gang Related.

Shakur's second album, Strictly 4 My N.I.G.G.A.Z. (#24 pop, #4 R&B, 1993), yielded the hits "I Get Around" (#11 pop, #5 R&B, 1993) and "Keep Ya Head Up" (#12 pop, #7 R&B, 1993). He also released an album as part of the short-lived Thug Life group in 1994.

Even longer than Shakur's hit list, though, was his police blotter. In 1992 the rapper was arrested after a six-year-old California boy was killed by a stray bullet discharged during a scuffle between Shakur and two others. (A lawsuit filed by the boy's family was later settled out of court.) He was then charged in Atlanta with shooting two off-duty police officers in October 1993. Charges in both cases were dismissed. The following month Shakur and two members of his entourage were charged with sexual abuse following an incident in a New York luxury hotel. In early 1994 he was found guilty of assault on Menace II Society codirector Allen Hughes and served 15 days in jail. By the end of the year, the rapper was found guilty of the sexual assault only a day after being shot by muggers in the lobby of a New York recording studio. He was later sentenced to one and half to four and a half years in prison. While his 1995 album Me Against the World (#1 pop, #1 R&B) headed to the top of the charts, Shakur headed for prison. Shakur became the first artist to reach #1 on the Billboard charts while serving a prison sentence. The hit single "Dear Mama" (#9 pop, #3 R&B) suggested a depth of feeling that led some critics to reassess the rapper and his work.

By now Shakur was a lightning rod for a highly publicized West Coast vs. East Coast hip-hop feud. Shakur was released after serving just eight months of his sentence, the result of a parole arrangement and a $1.4 million bond paid by Death Row label CEO Manon "Suge" Knight. The rapper signed with Death Row in late 1995, soon releasing the dark, two-disc All Eyez on Me (#1 pop, #1 R&B, 1996). On the album, Shakur attacked his enemies with furious threats of violence, while speaking of his own early death as inevitable. The album also included "How Do You Want It" (#1 pop, #1 R&B), "California Love" (#6 pop) (with Dr. Dre and Roger Troutman), and "Hit 'Em Up," on which Shakur claimed to have slept with the Notorious B.I.G.'s wife, singer Faith Evans.

Then, on September 7, Shakur was shot near the Las Vegas Strip while riding in the passenger seat of Knight's BMW. The shooting came about two hours after a scuffle that involved Shakur and Knight in the lobby of the MGM Grand Hotel (an incident that ultimately led to Knight, 31, being handed a nine-year prison sentence for violating his parole). Six days later Shakur died from his injuries. He was 25. No arrests were ever made. In addition, despite calls within the hip-hop community to halt the violence, the Notorious B.I.G. was killed in a similar fashion six months later.

Like Elvis Presley and Jimi Hendrix before him, Shakur was soon the subject of a flood of posthumous album releases and rumors that he faked his death. The first release was The Don Killuminati: The 7 Day Theory (#1 pop, 1 R&B, 1996), released under the pseudonym Makaveli. It was followed by R U Still Down? (Remember Me) (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1997), released on Amaru/Jive, an imprint headed by his mother. In 1997 his estate began a war of lawsuits against Death Row, complaining of $150 million in unpaid royalties, demanding the return of more than 150 unreleased master recordings, and a voiding of the rapper's contract with the label. A 1998 settlement awarded the tapes to Shakur's estate, which sanctioned the release that year of Greatest Hits (#3 pop, #1 R&B); it includes "Unconditional Love" (#73 R&B, 1998) and "Changes" (#32 pop, #12 R&B, 1999). "Do for Love" (#21 pop, #10 R&B, 1998) appears on R U Still Down? In 2001 the fourth posthumous collection, Until the End of Time, debuted at #1.

Shalamar

Formed 1977, Los Angeles, CA

Jeffrey Daniels (b. Aug. 24, 1957, Los Angeles), voc.; Jody Watley (b. Jan. 30, 1961, Chicago, IL), voc.; Howard Hewett (b. Oct. 1, 1957, Akron, OH), voc.

1978—Disco Gardens (Solar) 1979—Big Fun 1981—Three for Love; Go for It 1982—Friends 1983—The Look 1984—Heart Break (– Daniels; – Watley; + Delisa Davis, voc.; + Micki Free, voc.) 1985—(– Hewett; + Sidney Justin, voc.) 1987—Circumstantial Evidence 1990—Wake Up. Howard Hewett solo: 1986—I Commit to Love (Elektra) 1988—Forever and Ever 1990—Howard Hewett 1995—It's Time (Caliber). Jody Watley solo: see entry.

This good-looking vocal trio was comprised of black teen idols from the late '70s and early '80s, each pursued a successful solo career after leaving the group. The original Shalamar was made up of several L.A. session singers convened in 1977 by concert promoter Dick Griffey to record a medley of Motown dance hits, "Uptown Festival" (#25 pop, #10 R&B, 1977). With producer Leon Sylvers III, they had a dance hit with "Take That to the Bank" (#11 R&B, 1978), a lively number that was the model for other hits on Griffey's new Solar ("Sound of Los Angeles Records") label.

For a touring group, Griffey recruited Jeffrey Daniels and Jody Watley, two dancers from Soul Train, the television show hosted and produced by his friend and sometime business partner Don Cornelius. Howard Hewett joined after the original third member, Gerald Brown, left. "The Second Time Around" (#8 pop, #1 R&B, 1979) established them as stars, they followed up with "Right in the Socket" (#22 R&B, 1980), "Full of Fire" (#24 R&B, 1980), and "Make That Move" (#6 R&B, 1981).

Adding to their teen appeal was a real-life love triangle between Daniels, Watley, and singer Stephanie Mills. The two Shalamar singers had been childhood sweethearts, but after meeting Mills in New York, Daniels married the Broadway star; less than a year later they were divorced—all of which was dramatically reported in teen magazines. In 1981 Shalamar released "This Is for the Lover in You" (#17 R&B, 1981) and "Sweeter as the Days Go By" (#19 R&B, 1981). The group's last two big hits were "Dead Giveaway" (#22 pop, #10 R&B, 1983) and "Dancing in the Sheets" (#17 pop, #18 R&B, 1984), the latter from the hit movie Footloose soundtrack.

Watley [see entry] left to pursue her solo ambitions. Daniels also quit. He moved to England, where he hosted that country's version of Soul Train; he also appeared in the West End production of Starlight Express. Hewett, the remaining member of the most successful lineup, left in 1985. His R&B hit singles include "I'm for Real" (#2 R&B, 1986), "Stay" (#8 R&B, 1986), "I Commit to Love" (#12 R&B, 1987), "Strange Relationship" (#9, 1988), and "Show Me" (#2 R&B, 1990). In 1989 he married actress Nia Peeples. The new version of Shalamar placed a number of singles on the R&B chart, including "Games" (#11 R&B, 1987).

Sha Na Na

Formed 1969, New York, NY

Original lineup: Johnny Contardo, voc.; Scott Powell, voc.; Frederick Dennis "Denny" Greene, voc.; Don York, voc.; Bruce Clarke, bass; John "Jocko" Marcellino, drums; Ritchie Joffe, voc.; Elliot Cahn, gtr.; Henry Gross, gtr.; Chris Donald, gtr.; Screamin' Scott Simon, piano, bass; John "Bowzer" Baumann, piano, voc.; Lennie Baker (b. Apr. 18, 1946, Whitman, MA), sax.
 1969—Rock & Roll Is Here to Stay (Kama Sutra) 1971—Sha Na Na 1972—The Night Is Still Young 1973—The Golden Age of Rock 'n' Roll; From the Streets of New York 1974—Hot Sox 1975—Sha Na Now 1976—Best of Sha Na Na 1990—34th & Vine (Gold Castle) 1993—The Sha Na Na 25th Anniversary Collection (Laurie) 1999—Rock 'n' Roll Dance Party (The Gold Label).

Sha Na Na were forerunners of the '50s revival craze that eventually spawned television shows like Happy Days and the movie Grease. They began while students at Columbia University, making frequent appearances at the Fillmore East. Lennie Baker, who had played saxophone on '50s hits, was their claim to authenticity. Their big break was a booking at the Woodstock festival in 1969. The band's humor, choreography, and '50s costuming caught on. Though the band was never particularly successful on record, Sha Na Na became a popular live attraction, first on the rock & roll circuit, later in nightclubs. Their popularity reached unprecedented heights starting in 1977, when they began a syndicated TV show, which ran until 1981 and was shown around the world. They also appeared in the movie Grease (1978).

Over the years, personnel has been fluid, the most notable change being the departure of original guitarist Henry Gross in 1970 for a solo career, which was highlighted by the 1976 hit single "Shannon." John "Bowzer" Baumann went into television, cohosting a local L.A. morning show in the '80s. Screamin' Scott Simon cowrote "Sandy," which became a hit for John Travolta from the Grease soundtrack. Simon has also released solo albums.

As of 1994 Sha Na Na—with Jocko Marcellino, Donny York, Lennie Baker, and Screamin' Scott from the original lineup—made an appearance at the Woodstock '69 Reunion in Bethel, New York, and the year before that, a two-week stint in the entertainment capital of the heartland, Branson, Missouri. Latterday members include Reggie De Leon, an actor and choreographer and furniture designer who appeared in Stayin' Alive and White Men Can't Jump, among other films; Chico Ryan, who had belonged to the Happenings and later toured with the Comets; Rob MacKenzie; Jimmy Wall; and Lisa, the group's first "greaserette."

In 1998 Sha Na Na celebrated its 30th anniversary, which loosely coincided with the 20th anniversary of Grease. Longtime member Ryan (b. David-Allan Ryan, Apr. 9, 1948, Arlington, MA), who spent 25 years with the ensemble, died shortly thereafter on July 26, 1998, in Boston. As of 2000 the group still performed over 100 nights per year, and Jocko, Donny, and Screamin' Scott remained in the lineup. The greasers still maintain a high profile at corporate, casino, fair and festival, and performing arts venues.

The Shangri-Las

Formed 1964, Queens, NY

Mary Ann Ganser (b. ca. 1948; d. 1971, NY), voc.; Marge Ganser, voc. (b. ca. 1948; d. Jul. 28, 1996); Liz (Betty) Weiss, voc.; Mary Weiss, voc.
 1964—Leader of the Pack (Red Bird) 1965—Shangri-Las '65 1966—I Can Never Go Home Anymore; Golden Hits (Mercury) 1976—Remember (Walking in the Sand) EP (Charly, U.K.) 1996—The Best of the Shangri-Las (Mercury Chronicles).

Of the early-'60s girl vocal groups who rose meteorically to fame and disappeared nearly as quickly, one of the few white units was the Shangri-Las: two sets of sisters (the Gansers were twins) who first started singing together at Andrew Jackson High School in Queens. Their stock in trade was the teen-angst-ridden mini-melodramas written for them by George Morton, sometimes abetted by Jeff Barry and Ellie Greenwich.

In early 1964 they attracted the attention of writer/producer George "Shadow" Morton, who got the new Red Bird label (for which he was a producer) off the ground with the first Shangri-Las hit, his "Remember (Walkin' in the Sand)" (#5, 1964). A few months later, they recorded the motorcycle-gang melodrama "Leader of the Pack"—a typically showy Morton production complete with sound effects and talk-over sections—which was #1. A death-rock classic, "Leader of the Pack" showcased Mary Weiss' emotional, often overwrought delivery, which so perfectly suited the stories of teen runaways, parental death, and good teens gone bad that followed. Their other hits included "Maybe" (#91) and "Give Him a Great Big Kiss" (#18) in 1964, "Out in the Streets" (#53), "Give Us Your Blessings" (#29), "Right Now and Not Later" (#99), and "I Can Never Go Home Anymore" (#6) in 1965; and "Long Live Our Love" (#33), "He Cried" (#65, a remake of Jay and the Americans' "She Cried"), and "Past, Present and Future" (#59) in 1966.

The group, despite several in-and-out personnel shifts (Liz left early on, and the group remained a trio), was a top concert attraction in the U.S. and the U.K. in those years. But by the late '60s, a morass of legal entanglements, poor chart showings, and a low royalty rate on their biggest hits conspired to bring the Shangri-Las to an end. All four married. Mary Ann Ganser died of encephalitis in 1971. In 1989 the three surviving Shangri-Las reunited for the first time in over 20 years; they occasionally performed in the '90s. Marge Ganser succumbed to breast cancer in 1996. She was 48.

Del Shannon

Born Charles Westover, Dec. 30, 1939, Coopersville, MI; died Feb. 8, 1990, Santa Clarita, CA
 1961—Runaway (Big Top) 1963—Little Town Flirt 1965—Handy Man (Amy); Sings Hank Williams; 1,661 Seconds
 1966—This Is My Bag (Liberty); Total Commitment 1967—Best of (Dot) 1968—Further Adventures of Charles Westover
 1970—Del Shannon Sings (Post) 1973—Live in England (United Artists); Best of (Polydor) 1975—Vintage Years (Sire)
 1981—Drop Down and Get Me (Elektra) 1990—Greatest Hits (Bug/Rhino) 1991—Rock On! (Gone Gator/MCA).

With hit songs like "Runaway" and "Hats Off to Larry," Del Shannon was one of the few early rockers who wrote his own material and held his own through the British Invasion. Shannon was 14 when he learned guitar and began performing in school shows. After graduating high school, he took his stage name from those of a friend (Mark Shannon) and his boss's car (a Cadillac Coupe de Ville). In early 1960 a Grand Rapids area disc jockey passed live tapes of Shannon on to manager/publishers Harry Balk and Irving Micahnik, who then signed Shannon to Detroit's Big Top label. Big Top sent him to New York to record, but not much came of it.

On a second trip to New York, Shannon recorded "Runaway," which—with its galloping beat, Max Crook's proto-synthesizer Musitron solo, and Shannon's nearly hiccuping falsetto vocals—went to #1 in 1961. He followed up with "Hats Off to Larry" (#5), "So Long Baby" (#28) and "Hey! Little Girl" (#38) in 1961, and "Little Town Flirt" (#12) in 1962. He first toured England in 1962 and the next year met the Beatles there. His version of Lennon-McCartney's "From Me to You" made Shannon the first American to cover a Beatles tune.

In 1963 Shannon had legal problems with Balk and Micahnik; the action instituted that year dragged on for the next decade. Still, he had more hits with "Keep Searchin' (We'll Follow the Sun)" (#9, 1964) and "Stranger in Town" (#30) in 1965. That year Peter and Gordon recorded Shannon's "I Go to Pieces." In 1966 Shannon signed to Liberty, where producer Snuff Garrett and arranger Leon Russell tried to mold him into a teen idol. When Tommy Boyce asked Shannon to record "Action," the theme for the TV rock show Where the Action Is, Shannon turned him down and gave the song instead to Freddy Cannon. The Total Commitment LP, belying its title, was almost all covers. In England in 1967, Shannon recorded an album with Andrew Loog Oldham called Home and Away (Nicky Hopkins and John Paul Jones played on it).

With his career on the wane, Shannon left Liberty in 1969 and concentrated on production work. He arranged the 1969 hit "Baby It's You" by Smith and produced Brian Hyland's 1970 hit "Gypsy Woman." In England he recorded tracks with Jeff Lynne of the Electric Light Orchestra (including "Cry Baby Cry"). In 1974 Dave Edmunds produced Shannon's "And the Music Plays On." The next year, Shannon signed to Island and released a cover of the Zombies hit "Tell Her No." During 1976 and 1977, Shannon suffered from alcoholism, but beginning in 1979 he returned to music. He recorded material under the production supervision of longtime fan Tom Petty, with Petty's band the Heartbreakers backing him. The album included "Sea of Love," which hit #33 in early 1982.

Through the remainder of the decade Shannon continued to perform, although he was financially secure. He was reportedly suffering from depression and had been highly agitated after 15 days on Prozac when he committed suicide by shooting himself in the head. Shannon's wife contends that her husband's suicide was a direct result of the Prozac, a claim the drug's manufacturer denies. Del Shannon was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1999.

Roxanne Shanté

Born Lolita Shanté Gooden, Mar. 8, 1970, New York, NY
 1989—Bad Sister (Cold Chillin') 1992—The Bitch Is Back (Livin' Large) 1995—Greatest Hits (Cold Chillin').

Roxanne Shanté was one of the first women to directly challenge sexism in rap. At age 14 she recorded "Roxanne's Revenge" (#22 R&B, 1985), an answer to the popular U.T.F.O. song "Roxanne, Roxanne," which dissed women who ignored the band's advances. "Revenge," produced by Shanté's neighbor in the Queensbridge projects, Marley Marl, became an underground hit even before it was pressed to vinyl and kicked off a slew of answer records. U.T.F.O. themselves tried to clarify their position by recording with a woman they dubbed "the Real Roxanne." The group also forced Marl and Shanté to rerecord "Revenge," which sampled an original U.T.F.O. riff. Ultimately, Shanté's tough, street-smart style bested all other Roxannes.

Shanté followed her success with more Marl-produced singles. "Queen of Rox (Shanté Rox On)" was her summation of the "perils of Roxanne," while the lyrics to "Have a Nice Day" and "Go on Girl" were written by Big Daddy Kane. In 1988 she recorded "Loosey's Rap" (#1 R&B, 1988) with Rick James. Shanté toured extensively, then had a baby. She finally recorded an album in 1989: Bad Sister (#52 R&B, 1989) showed Shanté was a formidable rapper with a dirty mouth; tracks like "Knockin' Hiney" and "Feelin' Kinda Horny" followed the tradition of her hero, Millie Jackson. On her second album Shanté dropped the name Roxanne. The Bitch Is Back (#82 R&B, 1992) featured a variety of producers, including Kool G Rap, The Large Professor, and Grandmaster Flash, but failed to make much of a commercial impact.

In 1995 Shanté performed as part of Old School Throw-down III, a multi-act revue featuring hip-hop pioneers hosted by radio station Hot 97 at New York City's Paramount Theater. That same year she released a greatest-hits album, including the new single "Queen Pin." In 1996 she put out another single, "Bite This," a collaboration with rapper Craig G.

Billy Joe Shaver

Born Aug. 16, 1939, Corsicana, TX

1973—Old Five and Dimers Like Me (Monument) 1976—When I Get My Wings (Capricorn) 1977—Gypsy Boy 1981—I'm Just an Old Chunk of Coal . . . But I'm Gonna Be a Diamond Someday (Columbia) 1982—Billy Joe Shaver 1987—Salt of the Earth 1995—Restless Wind: The Legendary Billy Joe Shaver 1973–1987 (Razor & Tie).

As Shaver (with Eddy Shaver [b. John Edwin Shaver, June 20, 1962, Waco, TX; d. Dec. 31, 2000, Waco], gtr.): 1993—Tramp on Your Street (Zoo/Praxis) 1995—Unshaven: Live at Smith's Olde Bar 1996—Highway of Life (Justice) 1998—Victory (New West) 1999—Electric Shaver 2001—The Earth Rolls On.

With Willie Nelson, Waylon Jennings, and Kris Kristofferson: 1999—Honky Tonk Heroes (Pedernales/FreeFalls).

Eddy Shaver solo: 1996—Baptism of Fire (Dixie Frog, Can.).

When Waylon Jennings kick-started the "outlaw" country movement of the '70s with his 1973 album Honky Tonk Heroes, he didn't do it alone. Every song but one on the album was penned by Billy Joe Shaver, a fellow Texan who focused on songwriting after a stint in the Navy and working a series of manual labor jobs, including an ill-fated tenure at a sawmill that claimed half the fingers on his right hand. Shaver's songs on Jennings' Honky Tonk Heroes, and his own, Kris Kristofferson-produced debut, Old Five and Dimers Like Me (also released in 1973), established him as a cult hero and one of the most respected song poets of the Lone Star State. Although he has never enjoyed commercial success on the level of Jennings or Willie Nelson, Shaver's hardscrabble and almost exclusively autobiographical songs have been covered by such artists as Kristofferson, Johnny Cash, Elvis Presley, John Anderson, and Patty Loveless.

Beginning in 1976, Shaver's road band featured his gifted guitarist son Eddy, who cut his first session with his father at age 12 and was on the road with him by age 14. After Eddy coproduced his father's 1987 set Salt of the Earth, the pair began touring and recording together under the band name Shaver. Their 1993 Shaver debut, Tramp on Your Street, showcased Eddy's classic hard rock- and blues-inspired electric guitar heroics and was widely regarded as one of the strongest albums of Billy Joe's career. Producer Brendan O'Brien (Pearl Jam) captured their high-octane live show on 1995's Unshaven, while 1998's Victory, named after Billy Joe's mother, focused on Billy Joe's gospel songs and his son's acoustic slide and finger-picking skills. The following year's Electric Shaver marked a return to the band's more familiar roadhouse roar, but on the morning of December 31, 2000, Eddy Shaver overdosed on heroin in a motel room. The Earth Rolls On, finished shortly before his death, was released in the spring of 2001.

Jules Shear

Born Jules Mark Shear, Apr. 7, 1952, Pittsburgh, PA
1983—Watch Dog (EMI America); Jules EP 1985—The Eternal Return 1987—Demo-Itis (Enigma) 1989—The Third Party (I.R.S.) 1992—The Great Puzzle (Polydor) 1993—Horse of a Different Color: The Jules Shear Collection 1976–1989 (Razor & Tie) 1994—Healing Bones (Polydor) 1998—Between Us (High Street) 2000—Allow Me (Zoë/Rounder).

With Funky Kings: 1976—Funky Kings (Arista).

With Jules and the Polar Bears: 1978—Got No Breeding (Columbia) 1979—Fenetiks 1996—Bad for Business (Columbia Legacy).

With Reckless Sleepers: 1988—Big Boss Sounds (I.R.S.).

A prolific songwriter and recording artist, Jules Shear is widely respected by critics and musicians for his glowing melodies and wry, insightful lyrics. Both with bands and on his own, Shear has produced smart, graceful music that has inspired companions to guitar pop heroes from the Byrds to Elvis Costello. Commercial success has nonetheless eluded the singer, whose songs have thus far only become pop hits when covered by other artists: Cyndi Lauper took his "All Through the Night" to #5 in 1984, and in 1986 the Bangles reached #10 with another wistful Shear ballad, "If She Knew What She Wants."

Shear began writing songs as a teenager, and his career epiphany came while visiting music clubs during a trip to L.A. after his junior year of college. Rather than return to school, he lingered in the city, and in 1976 formed the band Funky Kings with two older minstrels, Jack Tempchin and Richard Stekol. The trio released one album before Shear left to form Jules and the Polar Bears, whose albums of buoyant rock received excellent reviews.

Shear disbanded the Polar Bears in 1980 (the band's third album was finally released in 1996) and relocated to Boston, where he embarked on a solo career, releasing several acclaimed albums. During this time he became romantically involved with Aimee Mann; their breakup was the topic of much of Mann's final 'Til Tuesday album. In 1986 Shear formed the band Reckless Sleepers with the Cars' guitarist Elliot Easton and two studio veterans. The band quickly split up, due to Shear's dissatisfaction with its hard-rock approach, but reemerged minus Easton (and plus session guitarist Jimmy Vivino) in 1988, with Big Boss Sounds. Shear went his own way again for 1989's The Third Party, which set his Dylanesque vocals against stark guitar work by the Church's Marty Willson-Piper. Shear's wife at the time, Pal Shazar, contributed vocals to the title track of his 1992 solo effort, The Great Puzzle, which he recorded in Woodstock, New York, where he had moved from Boston. Shear also helped conceive MTV's popular Unplugged series, which he hosted from 1989 until 1991.

Shear's 1998 effort, Between Us, was a melancholy collection of duets mostly reflecting on his separation from Shazar. Shear's duet partners included Carole King, Paula Cole, Rosanne Cash, Curtis Stigers, and Shears' own brother, Rob. The tone of Allow Me, released two years later, was more upbeat. Guest vocalists on this album included Vicki Peterson of the Bangles.

Duncan Sheik

Born Nov. 18, 1969, Montclair, NJ
1996—Duncan Sheik (Atlantic) 1998—Humming 2001—Phantom Moon (Nonesuch).

Duncan Sheik's postalternative brand of singer/songwriter music is inspired more by the ambient-based sounds of the Cocteau Twins and Brian Eno and the late English bard Nick Drake than by '70s Southern California icons like Jackson Browne and Joni Mitchell. And Sheik's big break came in a very '90s way: "Barely Breathing" (#18 pop, 1996), from his self-titled debut album, appeared in the hit TV series ER.

Duncan Sheik

Raised in New Jersey and South Carolina, Sheik learned to play piano before he was five years old. He eventually picked up the guitar, and by the '80s was playing in cover bands. During the early '90s, he attended Brown University, where he studied semiotics, played in a band with fellow singer/songwriter Lisa Loeb, and recorded a demo track with Tracee Ellis Ross, the daughter of Diana Ross.

In 1992 Tracee Ross delivered the track she had recorded with Sheik to her mother's entertainment lawyer, within six months Sheik had a solo record deal with Atlantic. After moving to L.A. Sheik appeared on a 1993 album by His Boy Elroy, on Epic Records. He recorded his Atlantic debut in France with producer Rupert Hine (Howard Jones, Tina Turner). For his second solo album, the more personal Humming, Sheik traveled to El Cortijo, Spain, where he recorded again with Hine. In 2001 he released the atmospheric Phantom Moon on Nonesuch.

Shep and the Limelites

Formed 1961, Queens, NY
James "Shep" Sheppard (b. ca. 1936, Queens; d. Jan. 24, 1970, Long Island, NY), voc.; Clarence Bassett, voc.; Charles Baskerville, voc.

As lead singer of the Heartbeats, James Sheppard wrote and recorded "A Thousand Miles Away," which, though it only hit #5 on the R&B chart and #53 on the pop chart, remains one of the best-remembered doo-wop ballads of the era. The group was also notable among its doo-wop contemporaries for being a trio, as opposed to the more common quartet and quintet lineups.

In 1961 he formed Shep and the Limelites and hit big with "Daddy's Home" (#2 pop, #4 R&B). Over the next year and a half, they hit the Hot 100 with five more entries, but none went higher than #42. Interestingly, they formed a song cycle, detailing the ongoing relationship and lives of the characters in the first hit. And so it was followed by "Three Steps From the Altar," "Our Anniversary," "What Did Daddy Do," and "Remember Baby." The group disbanded after a final single in 1967, "I'm a Hurting Inside."

Sheppard was found dead in 1970 in his automobile on the Long Island Expressway after having been robbed and beaten. In 1982, with "A Thousand Miles Away" featured on the soundtrack of Diner, Sheppard's Limelites played some doo-wop revival concerts at places like New York's Bottom Line.

Bobby Sherman

Born July 18, 1943, Santa Monica, CA
1969—Bobby Sherman (Metromedia) 1970—Here Comes Bobby; With Love, Bobby 1971—Portrait of Bobby; Getting Together 1972—Bobby Sherman's Greatest Hits 1991—

The Very Best of Bobby Sherman (Restless); The Bobby Sherman Christmas Album.

Bobby Sherman was a teenybopper heartthrob who had talent. Besides singing and acting, Sherman also played guitar, piano, trumpet, trombone, French horn, drums, and sitar. He'd begun performing in school, but rather than going into show business, he first entered college in California to major in psychology. He later told an interviewer, "I gave up psychology because I realized I was a schizo and belonged in show business with the rest of them." Actually he was discovered by an agent and cast in the television series Shindig! where he was a regular from 1964 to 1966. Sherman began writing tunes and making record company rounds, eventually getting some work as a record producer, but none of his early singles clicked.

After Shindig! was canceled, Sherman went on to star in the ABC series Here Come the Brides. His first hit was 1969's "Little Woman," which made #3 and earned a gold record, and the hits kept coming "La La La (If I Had You)" (#9, 1969), "Easy Come, Easy Go" (#9, 1970), "Hey, Mister Sun" (#24, 1970), "Julie, Do Ya Love Me" (#5, 1970), "Cried Like a Baby" (#16, 1971), and "The Drum" (#29, 1971). After that, Sherman's record sales fell off. His last bubblegum single was 1972's "Together Again," a tie-in to a failed Partridge Family spinoff series. Before and since, Sherman made a number of television guest appearances, on The Monkees, The Love Boat, Emergency, Fantasy Island, Lobo, Murder, She Wrote, and The Mod Squad. He was also in the 1983 film Get Crazy.

As of 2001 Sherman worked as a certified EMT (emergency medical technician), a technical reserve officer with the L.A. Police Department, and a reserve deputy sheriff in San Bernardino County. He also served as a medical training officer at the L.A. Police Academy. In addition, he has sometimes worked as a producer, guest star, director, and composer, primarily for television. His autobiography, Bobby Sherman. Remembering You, was published in 1996. He toured the nostalgia circuit in the late '90s.

Shinehead

Born Edmund Carl Aiken, Apr. 10, 1962, London, Eng.
1986—Rough and Rugged (African Love Music) 1988—Unity (Elektra) 1990—The Real Rock 1992—Sidewalk University 1995—Toddin' 1999—Praises (VP).

Shinehead was one of the first artists to fuse reggae and rap styles. He grew up in Jamaica and moved to the Bronx as a teen. After his mom gave him a microphone, he quit college to pursue his love of music. He began toasting in 1982 with the Downbeat International mobile sound system and was a member of the early-'80s African Love Soundsystem. Shinehead's first single was a reggae version of Michael Jackson's "Billie Jean," released in 1984.

Shinehead's debut album was issued on producer Claude Evans' label, African Love Music. It introduced the roots-rock rapper's unique and often wacky style. The track

"Who the Cap Fits," based on a Bob Marley tune, was picked up by New York radio stations and became an underground hit. Elektra signed Shinehead and released Unity, which includes remixes of some tracks from Rough and Rugged. Run-D.M.C.'s Jam Master Jay produced three cuts. The title track, based on the Beatles' "Come Together," calls for rappers to join together and stop dissing each other. The album features Jamaican session band Roots Radics.

On The Real Rock, Shinehead shows off his knack for mimicry and odd inspiration with versions of songs by Sly and the Family Stone, Frank Sinatra, and the Everly Brothers. Shinehead continued to offer positive messages, and with his band No Offense Crew, had a strong live following. On Sidewalk University Shinehead covers Sting, Paul McCartney, and Stevie Wonder. The single "Try My Love" was a modest hit. In the summer of 1993 Shinehead headlined the Reggae Sunsplash Tour.

Commercial success nevertheless eluded the singer, prompting Elektra to drop him after the release of Toddin' (1995). However, Shinehead continued to tour and play festivals; he also won DJ of the Year honors at the inaugural Tamika Reggae Awards held at Manhattan's Lincoln Center in 1998. Praises, a 1999 album that included "Collie Weed," a reworking of Seals and Crofts' "Summer Breeze," found Shinehead back in the studio with Jamaica's Roots Radics. He also appeared on one track on Fatboy Slim's [see entry] 2000 album, The Fatboy Slim/Norman Cook Collection.

The Shirelles

Formed 1958, Passaic, NJ

Shirley Owens Alston (b. June 10, 1941, Passaic), lead voc.; Addie "Micki" Harris (b. Jan. 22, 1940, Passaic; d. June 10, 1982, Los Angeles, CA), voc.; Doris Coley Kenner (b. Doris Coley, Aug. 2, 1941, Goldsboro, NC; d. Feb. 4, 2000, Sacramento, CA), voc.; Beverly Lee (b. Aug. 3, 1941, Passaic), voc.

1961—Tonight's the Night (Scepter); The Shirelles Sing 1962—Baby It's You; Greatest Hits 1964—Foolish Little Girl 1972—The Shirelles (RCA) 1982—(– Harris; + Louie Bethune, voc.) 1986—Anthology (Rhino) 1995—The World's Greatest Girl Group.

One of the first of the late-'50s and early-'60s girl groups and among the few to write their own hits, the Shirelles were also one of the most enduring. The four girls began singing together at school shows and parties. A classmate, Mary Jane Greenberg, heard them singing one of their compositions, "I Met Him on a Sunday." Mary Jane convinced them to bring the song to her mother, Florence, who was in the music business. The Shirelles auditioned in Florence Greenberg's living room and were signed to Greenberg's Tiara label. In early 1958 "I Met Him on a Sunday" had garnered so much airplay that Decca Records bought it, it was on the pop chart for over two months, reaching #49. Greenberg formed her own independent Scepter Records and in 1959 she released the Shirelles' cover of the Five Royales' "Dedicated to the One I Love" Without a national distributor, the disc only reached #83 on the pop chart. In 1960 the Shirelles scored with "Tonight's the Night" (#39 pop, #14 R&B) a song cowritten by lead vocalist Shirley Owens and produced by her cowriter, Luther Dixon, formerly of the Four Buddies.

Within a year the Shirelles had their first #1 pop hit (#2 R&B) with the Carole King-Gerry Goffin composition "Will You Love Me Tomorrow?" Scepter rereleased "Dedicated to the One I Love," and it joined "Will You" in the Top 10 for a while early in 1961.

The Shirelles became regulars on disc jockey Murray the K's Brooklyn all-star rock shows. In mid-1961 "Mama Said" (by Dixon and W. Denson) reached #4 pop, #2 R&B, and early in 1962 "Baby It's You" (by Burt Bacharach, Hal David, and Barney Williams) went to #3 pop, #3 R&B. A few months later, "Soldier Boy," a first take recorded initially as album filler, became their second #1 pop single (#3 R&B) and their biggest seller. Then Dixon (who had cowritten "Soldier Boy") left Scepter, precipitating the Shirelles' decline, although their first post-Dixon single, "Foolish Little Girl," went to #4 pop, #9 R&B in 1963.

In 1963 the Beatles covered the Shirelles' "Baby It's You" and "Boys" on their first U.K. LP. The Shirelles continued to perform and record, finally breaking up in the late '60s, then re-forming, sometimes with different members, in the early '70s to play revival concerts. Their later career was no doubt stymied by a contractual provision that prohibited any member who left the group from ever using the Shirelles name.

In 1994, at a Rhythm & Blues Foundation awards ceremony, the three surviving members sang together for the first time in 19 years. Addie Harris had died in 1982 of a heart attack. Shortly thereafter, the remaining original members reunited, sang on a Dionne Warwick album, and began performing again in various reunited permutations. In 1996 they were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Dons Coley (by then, Dons Kenner-Jackson) died of breast cancer in 2000.

Shirley and Lee/Shirley and Company

Shirley Goodman (b. Shirley Pixley, June 19, 1936, New Orleans, LA), voc.; Leonard Lee (b. June 29, 1935; d. Oct. 23, 1976, New Orleans), voc.

Shirley and Lee: 1960—Let the Good Times Roll (Warwick)
1990—Shirley and Lee (EMI).

Shirley and Company: 1975—Shame, Shame, Shame (Vibration).

Shirley and Lee, who recorded "Let the Good Times Roll" in 1956, were known as "the sweethearts of the blues." Many of their records were supposed to tell the continuing story of their on-again/off-again romance. Long after the duo had gone their separate ways and had stopped making New Orleans R&B hits, Shirley resurfaced in 1975 with the disco hit "Shame, Shame, Shame" (#12 pop, #1 R&B).

Shirley Goodman and Leonard Lee were discovered by New Orleans studio owner Cosimo Matassa when 30 local children, including Shirley and Lee, collected nickels to make a two-dollar demo record of "I'm Gone" at Matassa's studio. Matassa dispatched Eddie Mesner of Aladdin Records to track down the teenaged Shirley and Lee, and they rerecorded "I'm Gone" with ace New Orleans producer Dave Bartholomew. The tune was a #2 R&B hit in 1952. Their love-story songs were minor early-'50s R&B hits, but the big hit was "Let the Good Times Roll," a #2 R&B hit that also did well on the pop chart (#20) in 1956 and eventually sold over a million copies. Despite Shirley's unique quavery soprano, the duo didn't catch on with white audiences—and their only followup was "I Feel Good" (#38 pop, #6 R&B, 1956).

In 1960 they began recording for Warwick and had three Top 100 hits, including a 1960 remake of "Let the Good Times Roll" (#48). They split up in 1963, and Shirley briefly worked with West Coast singer Jesse Hill (of "Ooh Poo Pah Doo" fame) as Shirley and Jesse. She later did sessions for New Orleans-based performers like Harold Battiste and Dr. John. Lee recorded a few singles as Leonard Lee for Imperial and Broadside in the mid-'60s. In 1972 the pair reunited for one of Richard Nader's Rock & Roll Revival shows.

In 1975 Shirley teamed up with an anonymous crew of studio musicians to record the smash hit "Shame, Shame, Shame," one of the first disco songs. It was cowritten and produced by Sylvia Robinson of Mickey and Sylvia.

Michelle Shocked

Born Michelle Johnston, Feb. 24, 1962, Dallas, TX
1986—The Texas Campfire Tapes (Cooking Vinyl/Mercury)
1988—Short Sharp Shocked (Mercury) 1989—Captain Swing 1992—Arkansas Traveler 1994—Kind-Hearted Woman (self-released) 1996—Mercury Poise: 1988-1995 (Polygram); Kind-Hearted Woman (Private Music; rerecorded and rereleased version of 1994 album); Artists Make Lousy Slaves (self-released) 1998—Good News.

Michelle Shocked's music is as unique and well-traveled as its bohemian author: a downhome hobo and squatter whose albums have shown her adept at bluegrass, rock, punk, soul, and country. Shocked grew up on various army bases until she was 14, when her stepfather retired to the small East Texas town of Gilmer. She ran away from home at 16, and in 1979 moved to Dallas to live with her father, a hippie-ish schoolteacher who had introduced Shocked to music in previous summers by taking her to bluegrass festivals and back-porch picking sessions.

Shocked attended the University of Texas in Austin for a couple years, but quit and moved to San Francisco, where she became involved in hardcore punk and squatter activism. After returning to Austin in 1983, her mother, a fundamentalist member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (a Mormon), had Shocked committed to a psychiatric hospital for a month, until the insurance ran out. Homeless, Shocked was institutionalized again and jailed a few times for political protests; during one of these experiences she decided to change her name. She lived in New York in the mid-'80s, becoming active in the squatter and "antifolk" movements of Manhattan's Lower East Side. After Ronald Reagan was reelected in 1984, Shocked moved to Amsterdam, although the experience of being raped in Europe ruptured her expatriate dreams.

In May 1986 she returned to Texas and volunteered at the Kerrville Folk Festival. Pete Lawrence, an English producer and label owner, overheard her playing for friends around a campfire and recorded Shocked on a Sony Walkman. He released the recording, crickets chirping in the background and all, and The Texas Campfire Tapes went to #1 on the U.K. indie chart. The avowed anarchist suddenly had multinational corporations offering her six-figure contracts; Shocked reputedly turned down a percentage of PolyGram's advance offer in a bid for artistic control.

She had to fight for that control, however. When the label sent her to Dwight Yoakam producer Pete Anderson to produce her first album, Shocked read him a protest statement before she would proceed. He eventually convinced her of his integrity, and in two weeks they recorded Short Sharp Shocked, a brilliantly catchy album that got critical raves and some radio play with "When I Grow Up" and "Anchorage." The album showed Shocked was not just a folksy but a skilled songwriter with serious rock and pop potential (as well as the ability to play hardcore, on one track with punk band M.D.C.). With an ode to slain graffiti artist Michael Stewart and a cover featuring a photo of Shocked in the stranglehold of a San Francisco not police officer, Shocked also got her political say.

Anderson returned to produce Captain Swing, but the album, which was R&B-oriented, was less well received. Some critics knocked Shocked for shying away from politics, although the album was named after a 19th-century term for industrial sabotage, and the first track was "God Is a Real Estate Developer."

On Arkansas Traveler Shocked indulged her wanderlust, recording different tracks in different cities with favorite artists, including Pops Staples, Levon Helm, Red Clay Ramblers, Taj Mahal, Don Was, Hothouse Flowers, Uncle Tupelo, Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, Doc Watson, and Alison Krauss. She said the album completed a trilogy of tributes to her influences: Texas songwriters and honky-tonk on Short Sharp Shocked, jump blues and swing on Captain Swing, and fiddle tunes on Arkansas Traveler. The album included her own compositions as well as versions of classic minstrel songs and a Woody Guthrie tune. Her attempt to make a political comment on minstrelsy's role in American music by posing in blackface on the album cover, however, was stopped by her record company.

Stating in 1993 that "I am taking responsibility for my own creativity," Shocked began making moves to leave Mercury. Early the next year, she fired her manager and sued the label for failing to honor the creative control clause of her contract. She then recorded and self-released the album Kind-Hearted Woman, which was available for sale only at her performances. Shocked settled her lawsuit with Mercury out of court (the suit cited the 13th Amendment abolishing slavery). She got in one last dig, though, by titling her 1996 anthology Mercury Poise, a nod to "Mercury Poisoning," Graham Parker's spleen-venting 1978 rant against the label. The compilation also featured three new songs, including "The Quality of Mercy," which first appeared on the Dead Man Walking soundtrack.

In 1996 Shocked signed a deal with Private Music, which rereleased Kind-Hearted Woman after the singer rerecorded some of its tracks with producer Bones Howe. Artists Make Lousy Slaves (1996) and Good News (1998) were both DIY projects Shocked sold at her shows.

Shriekback

Formed 1981, London, Eng.

Dave Allen (b. Dec. 23, 1955, Cambria, Eng.), bass; Barry Andrews (b. Sep. 12, 1956, Lambeth, Eng.), voc., kybds.; Martyn Barker (b. Sep. 9, 1959, Merseyside, Eng.), drums; Carl Marsh, gr., voc.

1982—Tench EP (Y America) 1983—Care (Warner Bros.) 1984—Jam Science (Arista, U.K.) 1985—Oil and Gold (Island) (—Marsh; + Mike Cozzi [b. Nov. 27, 1960, Usk, Wales], gr.) 1986—Big Night Music (—Allen; + Doug Wimbish [b. Sep. 22, 1956, Hartford, CT], bass) 1988—Go Bang! 1990—The Dancing Years 1992—(—Wimbish; + Allen) Sacred City (World Domination) 1994—Natural History (Castle) 2000—Naked Apes & Pond Life (Mushroom, U.K.); Best of Shriekback: The Y Record Years (Castle).

With the pedigree of Gang of Four bassist Dave Allen and XTC singer/keyboard player Barry Andrews, Shriekback plays smart, tuneful funk. But with a career marred by personnel and record company problems, the band has never gathered the momentum necessary for wider popularity. Andrews and Allen joined forces when they found themselves without bands in summer 1981. Adding guitarist/vocalist Carl Marsh and a drum machine, they recorded Tench for the independent Y America label in 1982. With Martyn Barker aboard on drums, next year's Care (#188) was picked up by Warner Bros., which quickly dropped it. The band's next album, 1984's Jam Science, was released by Ansta in Europe and the U.K. only. It was notable for its slicker sound, buttressed by synthesized strings and female backing vocals. Next on Island Records, Shriekback's Oil and Gold, released in America, had a harsher, rockier sound; although it contained the club favorite "Nemesis," the album did not chart, and Marsh left after its release. He was briefly replaced by former Voidoid Ivan Julian. Following the release of the dark, piano-based Big Night Music (#145, 1987), Dave Allen left to form King Swamp, leaving Andrews the lone original member. Doug Wimbish, later of Living Colour, took his place, while Mike Cozzi took on guitar chores. This band appears on the playful, kinetic Go Bang! (#169, 1988).

Shriekback disbanded in 1989. Drummer Martyn Barker joined Allen in King Swamp, while Andrews formed Illuminati. Soon after, Allen went on to start Low Pop Suicide. In 1992 Shriekback reunited, with Allen joining Andrews and Barker, and released Sacred City on Allen's World Domination label. Busy with the label, upon which he released his first solo album, The Elastic Purejoy. Allen departed Shriekback in 1994. The band carried on, however, touring Europe and attempting to sign to a new label.

The Silos

Formed 1985, New York, NY

Bob Rupe (b. Sep. 16, 1956, MI), gr., voc.; Walter Salas-Humara (b. June 21, 1961, New York), gr., voc.; Mary Rowell (b. Sep. 6, 1958, Newport, VT), violin.

1985—About Her Steps (Record Collect) 1987—Cuba 1990—(—Rowell) The Silos (RCA) 1992—(—Rupe; + Rowell) Hasta La Victoria (Normal Records, Ger.) 1994—Susan Across the Ocean (Watermelon) 1997—Long Green Boat (Last Call) 1998—Heater (Checkered Past).

Walter Salas-Humara solo: 1988—Lagartija (Record Collect) 1995—Radar (Watermelon).

Walter Salas-Humara with the Setters: 1993—The Setters (Million Miles, Ger.).

The Silos were created by Walter Salas-Humara and Bob Rupe, and included violinist Mary Rowell and a revolving group of backing musicians. The group's rough-hewn, unaffected, but catchy take on folk rock made them critical favorites in the mid-'80s. Recording and distributing their first two albums themselves, the Silos evinced a commercial independence and a stripped-down aesthetic that blazed the trail for later "alternative" bands.

In the early '80s Salas-Humara led the Vulgar Boatmen in Gainesville, Florida, while Rupe was part of Fort Lauderdale's Bobs. Although they knew each other in Florida, they did not form the Silos until they had separately moved to New York within six months of each other.

To help secure gigs for their band, Salas-Humara and Rupe recorded About Her Steps, pressing 1,000 copies on their own Record Collect label. The album was reviewed both in the States and the U.K., garnering comparisons to the Velvet Underground, the Byrds, and REM. In 1989 RCA signed the band. By the time their major-label debut was released in 1990, their A&R person had left the label, the album languished, and the group was eventually dropped.

Salas-Humara and Rupe parted ways in 1991. Salas-Humara kept the Silos name, continuing to perform and record with Rowell and assorted musicians. Rupe played briefly with Gutterball, appearing on the group's eponymously titled album in 1993. Rupe played bass for Cracker [see entry] on their 1994 tour and later joined the group. In addition to recording the solo effort Lagartija, Salas-Humara joined Austin, Texas, residents Alejandro Escovedo (Rank & File, True Believers) and Michael Hall (Wild Seeds) in a side project called the Setters, issuing a self-titled album.

In 1994 the Silos released Susan Across the Ocean, a more rock-leaning effort that included covers of Jonathan Richman's "I'm Straight" and Lucinda Williams' "Change the Locks." The record was dedicated to Manuel Vezosa, a singer/guitarist on the album who died in an auto accident just prior to its release. Salas-Humara followed Susan with another solo album, a noisy, discordant record called Radar Heater, a 1998 project released under the Silos moniker, veered even further away from conventional guitar rock, incorporating beats and loops into the band's otherwise rootsy approach.

Carly Simon

Born June 25, 1945, New York, NY

1971—Carly Simon (Elektra); Anticipation 1972—No Secrets 1973—Hotcakes 1974—Playing Possum 1975—Best of Carly Simon 1976—Another Passenger 1978—Boys in the Trees 1979—Spy 1980—Come Upstairs (Warner Bros.) 1981—Torch 1983—Hello, Big Man 1985—Spoiled Girl 1986—Heartburn soundtrack (Arista) 1987—Coming Around Again 1988—Working Girl soundtrack 1989—Greatest Hits Live 1990—My Romance; Have You Seen Me Lately?; Postcards From the Edge soundtrack 1992—This Is My Life soundtrack (Qwest) 1994—Letters Never Sent (Arista) 1995—Clouds in My Coffee 1965–1995 1997—Film Noir 2000—The Bedroom Tapes.

Singer/songwriter/composer Carly Simon was born into an affluent, musical family. Her father, a cofounder of Simon & Schuster publishers, played classical piano in his spare time; one sister, Lucy, is a folksinger and composer (she wrote the score for the musical The Secret Garden); another, Joanna, is an opera singer.

Simon left Sarah Lawrence College to work as a folk duo with Lucy. They played New York clubs as the Simon Sisters, breaking up when Lucy got married. The Simon Sisters cut an LP for Kapp and had a minor hit in 1964 with "Winken, Blinken and Nod." Carly continued as a solo act and in 1966 began recording material for a solo debut album with sessionmen including Robbie Robertson, Rick Danko, and Richard Manuel (of the Band), Al Kooper, and Mike Bloomfield. One of the tracks to be included was a version of Eric Von Schmidt's "Baby Let Me Follow You Down," with lyrics rewritten for Simon by Bob Dylan. After the project was abandoned, Simon kept a low profile for the rest of the decade.

She reemerged in 1970 with a single from her debut LP, "That's the Way I've Always Heard It Should Be" (#10, 1971), one of many songwriting collaborations with film critic Jacob Brackman. In late 1971 the title cut of her second LP, Anticipation (produced by ex-Yardbird Paul Samwell-Smith), was a #13 hit, and the album was also a bestseller, helping her to win that year's Best New Artist Grammy. Her later hits included the mammoth smash "You're So Vain" (#1, 1972), allegedly inspired by and sung to either Warren Beatty or Mick Jagger (who appears on it as a backup vocalist). No Secrets (#1, 1972) went gold later that year; it is her most successful album to date.

On November 3, 1972, she married James Taylor, and in 1974 their duet cover of "Mockingbird" hit #5; the album it came from, Hotcakes, went gold. Playing Possum would be her last Top 10 album for a few years. Among her Top 30 hits of the mid-'70s were "The Right Thing to Do" (1973) and "I Haven't Got Time for the Pain" (1974). Simon came back strongly in 1977, with the theme song from the James Bond movie The Spy Who Loved Me, "Nobody Does It Better," which went to #2, and next year's "You Belong to Me" (#6), which she cowrote with Michael McDonald. Boys in the Trees, which included "You Belong," was the last Top 10 and first platinum album of her career. She and Taylor's duet of the Everly Brothers' hit "Devoted to You" went to #36, and her biggest singles of the time were "Jesse" (#11, 1980) and "Why" (#10 U.K., 1982).

With the '80s Simon changed direction, recording 1981's Torch (#50), her first collection of pop standards, featuring songs by Hoagy Carmichael, Rodgers and Hart, and others. (She followed it up with two more albums of standards, 1990's My Romance [#46] and 1997's Film Noir [#84].) In 1981 she also filed for divorce from Taylor (it was finalized in 1983), they have two children, Sally and Ben, who have pursued music as adults. Simon's legendary stage fright, which had caused her to cancel a tour in support of Come Upstairs, and a series of interesting but less than stellar singles (such as "Tired of Being Blonde") followed.

Simon's efforts as a composer for film paid off immediately, however, as "Coming Around Again" (from the 1987 film Heartburn) became a Top 20 single and "Let the River Run" (from 1988's Working Girl) garnered her an Oscar for Best Original Song. She also composed music for the film Postcards From the Edge, including "Have You Seen Me Lately?" In the late '80s she also surmounted her stage fright with a live concert on Martha's Vineyard, which was filmed for a popular HBO special, "Carly in Concert—Coming Around Again," and recorded for her gold 1988 LP Greatest Hits Live. In 1995 she went on her first major tour since 1981, and even played in New York's Grand Central Terminal. Like the Martha's Vineyard show, the performance was taped for cable (Lifetime Network).

In 1997 Simon was diagnosed with breast cancer. After undergoing a mastectomy and rounds of chemotherapy, she wrote and recorded The Bedroom Tapes, her first album of original material in six years, at her home in Martha's Vineyard. Continuing her tradition of autobiographical, introspective songwriting, she dealt with her illness on songs such as "Scar."

Over the past decade, Simon has also successfully diversified her career. In 1993 her opera for young people, Romulus Hunt, debuted at the Metropolitan Opera and the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. She has written five children's books: Amy the Dancing Bear, The Boy of the Bells, The Fisherman's Song, The Nighttime Chauffeur, and Midnight Farm. She also set nursery rhymes to music on Mother Goose's Basket Full of Rhymes (2000).

Paul Simon

Born Oct. 13, 1941, Newark, NJ

1965—The Paul Simon Song Book (CBS, U.K.) 1972—Paul

Simon (Warner Bros.) 1973—There Goes Rhymin' Simon 1974—Live Rhymin' 1975—Still Crazy After All These Years 1977—Greatest Hits, Etc. 1980—One Trick Pony 1983—Hearts and Bones 1986—Graceland 1988—Negotiations and Love Songs 1971–1986 1990—The Rhythm of the Saints 1991—Paul Simon's Concert in the Park 1993—1964/1993 1997—Songs From "The Capeman" 2000—You're the One.

After the 1970 breakup of Simon and Garfunkel [see entry], Paul Simon went on to confirm his stature as a first-rate songwriter and performer. His terse, exquisitely crafted songs have drawn on early rock & roll (particularly doo-wop), reggae, salsa, jazz, gospel, blues, New Orleans, and African and South American music, in some cases presaging the conscious blending of world music into mainstream pop by over a decade. In an unassuming, distinctive tenor, Simon has sung of matters personal and universal with attitudes ranging from the whimsical to the reverent. Simon stands apart from most folk-based singer/songwriters of his generation in that he has created a wide-ranging body of work in which the purely musical vocabulary—of style, instrumentation, and sounds—is as evocative and as expressive as his lyrics.

Simon had recorded solo in England between Simon and Garfunkel's first and second albums. On his first album after their breakup, Paul Simon (#4, 1972), he began working from a broader stylistic palette and playing with such celebrated artists as jazz violinist Stephane Grappelli; the first single, "Mother and Child Reunion" (#4, 1972) was cut in Jamaica; and "Me and Julio Down by the Schoolyard" (#22, 1972) showed a clear urban Latin influence. Although Simon had ventured outside the classic folk-rock idioms with Garfunkel ("Cecilia," "El Condor Pasa"), as a solo artist he pursued these new directions in earnest while returning to such American genres as gospel on There Goes Rhymin' Simon (#2, 1973); "Loves Me Like a Rock" (#2) featured the venerable Dixie Hummingbirds on backup. That album also included "Kodachrome" (#2, 1973) and went on to sell 2 million copies. The next year's Live Rhymin' (#33, 1974) featured the Dixie Hummingbirds and the Peruvian folk group Urubama.

Despite their sometimes rocky relationship, Simon and Garfunkel never completely severed ties. They performed at a George McGovern fund-raiser in 1972 and Garfunkel was a frequent guest at Simon's concerts. In 1975 they collaborated on their first record since 1970's Bridge Over Troubled Water, the single "My Little Town" (#9), which turned up on both Garfunkel's Breakaway and Simon's Still Crazy After All These Years (#1, 1975). The latter, purportedly about the dissolution of Simon's first marriage, generated the hits "Gone at Last" (#23) (a duet with Phoebe Snow) and "50 Ways to Leave Your Lover" (#1), and won a Grammy for Best Album of 1975.

Next Simon played a small nonsinging part in Woody Allen's Annie Hall in 1977, and started working in television, hosting Saturday Night Live and his own special. His Greatest Hits (#18, 1977) yielded the 1977 #5 hit "Slip Slidin' Away." In 1980 Simon starred in One Trick Pony, for which he wrote the screenplay and soundtrack. The story of a journeyman rock & roller, Pony received mixed reviews and flopped at the box office, although the salsa-influenced "Late in the Evening" became a #6 hit. In 1981 Simon reunited with Garfunkel again in Central Park; the concert was documented on a live album.

A year later, the pair toured together, intending to collaborate in the studio. When those plans fell through, Simon released Hearts and Bones (#35, 1983), the least commercially and critically successful work of his career to date. Including a collaboration with composer Philip Glass, the album failed commercially, and with the end of his second marriage, to actress Carrie Fisher, Simon reached a personal and professional low point.

Seeking inspiration, Simon traveled to South Africa in 1985 to explore its indigenous music, which he had been studying. After participating in the recording of "We Are the World," the all-star anthem for the USA for Africa hunger relief project, he began recording in Johannesburg. He emerged with Graceland, a dazzling collection influenced by South African dance music and featuring the vocal group Ladysmith Black Mambazo (for whom he'd later produce two albums), the Everly Brothers, and Los Lobos. Graceland scored #3 in 1987—a whimsical single "You Can Call Me Al," reached #44 (and #23 in rerelease in 1987)—and won a 1988 Grammy for Album of the Year.

Recording in South Africa caused Simon to be blacklisted by the United Nations and the African National Congress (ANC) and to be picketed in concert by antiapartheid protesters. To his credit, Simon spoke at public gatherings, where he addressed his critics face to face and defended his actions, insisting that his motives in breaking the boycott on recording in South Africa were musical, not political. The UN and the ANC dropped their bans in early 1987 after Simon wrote the UN pledging to abide by the terms of their South African boycott. Simon then released a best-selling home video of the Graceland concert in Zimbabwe.

In 1990 The Rhythm of the Saints, incorporating strains of West African, Brazilian, and zydeco music, reached #4, and Simon and Garfunkel were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. The next year, Simon hosted a free Central Park concert (at which Garfunkel was pointedly asked not to appear) that drew an estimated 750,000 people. In 1992 Simon married Edie Brickell (see entry), then the lead singer for the New Bohemians; he coproduced his wife's first solo album in 1994.

Simon performed a series of 16 concerts at the Paramount in New York City in the fall of 1993. A retrospective of his career, the concert event also included a reunion with Garfunkel. Over the years, Simon's chantable and social work has involved fundraising for Amazonian rain forest preservation, New York's homeless, and South African children. For his humanitarian efforts, the United Negro College Fund accorded him its highest honor in 1989.

In 1997 Simon won an Emmy for a televised concert special ("Paul Simon Special"), received critical praise for the three-CD Simon and Garfunkel retrospective, Old Friends, and collaborated with Nobel Prize-winning author Derek Walcott on a Broadway musical. The show, The Capeman, based on the true-life story of a young Puerto Rican immigrant sent to jail for the murders of two Manhattan teens, failed financially. However, it received a Tony Award nomination for Best Original Score written for Theater, and its accompanying CD was warmly received.

In 1999 Simon toured with Bob Dylan, the former rivals were recognized as the premier American songwriters to have emerged from the '60s. The following year, Simon released You're the One, a solid set of songs with no overarching conceptual framework. In 2001 he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame as a solo artist.

Simon and Garfunkel

Paul Simon (b. Oct. 13, 1941, Newark, NJ), gr., voc.; Arthur Garfunkel (b. Nov. 5, 1941, New York, NY), voc.

1964—Wednesday Morning, 3 A.M. (Columbia) 1966—Sounds of Silence; Parsley, Sage, Rosemary and Thyme
1968—Bookends; The Graduate soundtrack 1970—Bridge Over Troubled Water 1972—Greatest Hits 1982—The Concert in Central Park 1997—Old Friends.

When they were in the sixth grade together in Forest Hills, New York, Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel found they could harmonize. The first songs they sang together were doo-wop hits, but soon they were singing their own songs. One of those was "Hey Schoolgirl," which the duo recorded in 1957. An agent of Big Records present at the session signed them on the spot. Calling themselves Tom and Jerry ("Tom Graph" and "Jerry Landis"), they had a Top 50 hit with "Hey, Schoolgirl" and appeared on American Bandstand. (In a 1984 Playboy interview Simon asserted that the record company agent used payola to get the record played.) Garfunkel estimates the record sold 150,000 copies. When a few followups flopped, Tom and Jerry split up. When they met again in 1962, Garfunkel was studying architecture after trying to record as Arty Garr, and Simon was studying English literature but devoting most of his time to writing and selling his songs. In 1964 Simon, who had just dropped out of law school and quit his job as a song peddler for a music publishing company, took one of his originals to Columbia Records producer Tom Wilson. Wilson bought the song and signed the Everly Brothers—influenced duo.

Wednesday Morning, 3 A.M.—a set that combined traditional folk songs with Simon's originals and Dylan anthems like "The Times They Are A-Changin'," performed only by the two singers accompanied by Simon's acoustic guitar—was lost in the glut of early Dylan imitations. Simon went to work the folk circuit in London, where in May 1965 he recorded a solo album. Several months later, he was performing around England and the Continent when he received the news that one of the songs on Wednesday Morning—"The Sounds of Silence"—was the #1 single in the United States. It was not quite the song Simon and Garfunkel had recorded. Wilson (who had played a part in electrifying Dylan's music) had added electric guitars, bass, and drums to the original track. The remixed single was at the vanguard of "folk rock." Simon returned to hit the college circuit with Garfunkel and to record a second duo album. Along with the redubbed "Sounds of Silence," the album of that name comprised folk-rock remakes of many of the songs from Simon's U.K. solo album. The production was elaborate, an appropriate setting for Simon's self-consciously poetic songs and Garfunkel's angelic voice, and Simon and Garfunkel turned out to be acceptable to both teenagers (who found them relevant) and adults (who found them intelligent). In 1966 they placed four singles and three albums in the Top 30 (the revived Wednesday Morning, Sounds of Silence, and Parsley, Sage, Rosemary and Thyme). "Homeward Bound" (#5), "I Am a Rock" (#3), and "Sounds of Silence" (#1) reached the Top 5. Simon was not a prolific writer—most of the material on the first three Simon and Garfunkel albums had been composed between 1962 and 1965—and once Parsley, Sage was completed, the duo's output slowed considerably. They released only two singles in 1967: "At the Zoo" (#16) and "Fakin' It" (#23). Simon was developing the more colloquial, less literary style he would bring to his later solo work; the first sign of it was the elliptical "Mrs. Robinson," composed for the soundtrack of The Graduate. The film and the soundtrack album were followed within two months by Bookends; "Mrs. Robinson" hit #1 in June 1968. Bookends soon afterward.

Simon and Garfunkel produced Bookends with engineer Roy Halee, who had worked on every Simon and Garfunkel session (With Parsley, Sage, Halee had taken a major role in the arranging; it was Columbia's first album recorded on eight tracks.) "The Boxer" (#7), Simon and Garfunkel's only release in 1969, was Columbia's first song recorded on 16 tracks.

Bridge Over Troubled Water took almost two years to make, as the duo began to pursue their individual projects.

They often worked separately in the studio, and as their music became more complex they performed less often on stage; their only appearance in 1969 was on their own network television special. Around this period, Garfunkel's acting career began with a role in Catch-22. Soon after the record's release, Simon and Garfunkel staged a brief but very successful tour, which quieted rumors about a breakup, but by the time Garfunkel's second movie, Carnal Knowledge, and Simon's 1972 solo album came out, it was clear that their individual solo careers [see entries] were taking precedence. The two left their joint career at its peak, though both have said that their initial intention was not to break up permanently but just take a break from each other. After reaching #1 in spring 1970, Bridge Over Troubled Water rode the charts for over a year and a half (spending 10 weeks at the top), eventually selling over 13 million copies worldwide. The LP yielded three hit singles—the title song (a #1 hit, the biggest seller of their career), "Cecilia" (#4), and "El Condor Pasa" (#18)—and won six Grammys. In 1977 it was given the British Bntannia Award as Best International Pop Album of the past 25 years, and the title song received the equivalent award as a single. To date the duo has sold more than 20 million albums in the U.S. alone.

Since 1970 the Forest Hills classmates have gotten together on a few notable occasions. The first was a benefit concert for presidential candidate George McGovern at Madison Square Garden, New York, in June 1972. (That occasion also saw the reunions of Peter, Paul and Mary and the comedy team of Mike Nichols and Elaine May.) In 1975 Simon and Garfunkel had a Top 10 hit single with "My Little Town," a song Simon wrote for Garfunkel and sang with him, which appeared on solo LPs by both. Garfunkel joined Simon to perform a selection of their old hits on Simon's 1977 television special, and the two got together again the next year in a studio with James Taylor to record a duo rendition of Sam Cooke's "(What a) Wonderful World." On September 19, 1981, Simon and Garfunkel gave a free concert for an estimated 500,000 fans in New York's Central Park, and in 1982, a double album, The Concert in Central Park, went platinum, peaking at #6. They embarked on an extended tour and began recording what was to have been a new Simon and Garfunkel album. Unable to resolve their creative differences, the two abandoned the project, and the material was released on the Paul Simon solo LP Hearts and Bones.

The pair performed several shows for charitable causes in the early '90s, and in 1993 a smash 21-date sold-out run at the Paramount Theater in New York City, followed by a tour of the Far East. Though, technically speaking, these shows were not Simon and Garfunkel concerts (they performed together only in the first and last of the show's four segments; the balance was dedicated to Simon's solo work), fans seemed to feel otherwise. Whether for its exquisite craftsmanship or place as a musical-cultural touchstone, or both, the music Simon and Garfunkel created and recorded seems destined to endure. The two were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1990. The 1997 box set Old Friends includes remastered hits ("Sounds of Silence," "Bridge Over Troubled Water"), previously unreleased live performances ("Bye, Bye Love"), and demos.

Singer Nina Simone's music has gone from gospel to jazz to pop to R&B and blues to a raging black protest that moved her off the supper-club circuit and into political rallies and soul concerts. Known since the late '50s as the "High Priestess of Soul," she enjoyed a renaissance in her sixth decade with the publication of her autobiography and the exposure given her music in a popular American film. Taking her stage name from French actress Simone Signoret, she epitomizes the soul diva.

Simone began singing in church and taught herself piano and organ by the time she was seven. She took classical keyboard lessons and attended New York's Juilliard School of Music, then began playing East Coast clubs and concerts. Her first hit was a 1959 gold record of Gershwin's "I Loves You, Porgy."

In the '60s she moved toward R&B, recording Screamin' Jay Hawkins' "I Put a Spell on You" and "Don't Let Me Be Misunderstood" (a subsequent hit for the Animals). This led to sizable popularity in England, where she had hits with "Ain't Got No—I Got Life" (from Hair) in 1968 and the Bee Gees' "To Love Somebody" in 1969.

By then she had become a black-power activist (her first protest song, "Mississippi Goddam," mourned the death of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers), and politically oriented tracks like "Four Women" (on an out-of-print Philips album) alienated her white audience. She became even more intense and unpredictable in concert, and despite continuing critical acclaim, she gradually lost her commercial standing. Financially, she fell upon hard times, and she divorced her manager/husband (her first marriage had also failed). In 1974 Simone quit the music business.

Leaving the States, Simone took up residence in Switzerland, Liberia, Barbados, France, and the U.K. in the mid-'70s. By 1978, however, she had returned to music, releasing Baltimore and touring the U.S. again. While the early '80s were a fallow period, Simone experienced a comeback in 1987 when a television commercial for Chanel No. 5 perfume used her early recording "My Baby Just Cares for Me." Her candid 1991 autobiography, I Put a Spell on You, and an appearance on Pete Townshend's Iron Man boosted her revival. In 1993, with her music featured in the film Point of No Return and with a new studio album, A Single Woman, Simone gained a new audience for her fiercely elegant fare. In 1995 Simone was ordered to pay a $4,600 fine for shooting at two teenaged boys whom she maintained were disturbing her peace while she was gardening, that year also, she was fined $5,000 for leaving the scene of a car accident that had occurred in 1993. The '90s concluded, however, on a happier note, as her music was presented again in a number of well-crafted anthologies.

Scotland's Simple Minds found some success in the latter half of the '80s with a synth-based, epic-pop sound. The band grew out of the Glasgow punk outfit Johnny and the Self-Abusers, which included childhood buddies Jim Kerr and Charlie Burchill. Simple Minds began playing an ambitious postpunk art rock, influenced by Roxy Music and David Bowie and veering from pop songs (Life in a Day) to harsher, more experimental sounds (Real to Real Cacophony) to cool, aloof Eurodisco (Empires and Dance).

While Simple Minds became critical favorites with the British music press, the band did not attract a significant U.S. following until New Gold Dream, which had a warmer musical feel and more positive lyrics, including much religious imagery. It became the group's first American chart album (#69, 1983), and included "Promised You a Miracle" (the only track on which second drummer Kenny Hyslop ever played), which got frequent play on college radio and in rock discos. The videos for that track, and for "Someone Somewhere in Summertime," were also played on MTV.

Sparkle in the Rain (#64, 1984) united Simple Minds with U2 producer Steve Lillywhite, but failed to spawn a U.S. chart single. The band toured with the Pretenders, and in June 1984, Kerr married Pretender Chrissie Hynde in New York's Central Park. They had a daughter, Yasmin, in 1985, before divorcing a few years later. Simple Minds finally achieved their long-predicted U.S. breakthrough with "Don't You (Forget About Me)" (#1, 1985), from the soundtrack of The Breakfast Club. The song was written by producer/composer Keith Forsey (Flashdance, Billy Idol) and Steve Schiff; Bryan Ferry had turned down the song, and Simple Minds were originally against the idea of recording or releasing it. "Don't You" did not appear on the album Once Upon a Time (#10, 1985), which yielded hits of its own in "Alive & Kicking" (#3, 1985), "Sanctify Yourself" (#14, 1986), and "All the Things She Said" (#28, 1986).

Simple Minds were unable to further that commercial success with the concert album Live in the City of Light (#96, 1987) and the politically oriented Street Fighting Years (#70, 1989). Real Life (#74, 1991) returned to the grand-scale sound and more personal lyrics, and spawned a modest U.S. hit single in "See the Lights" (#40, 1991). Kerr married British actress Patsy Kensit in 1992 (the pair divorced four years later). The band's 1993 effort, Glittering Prize, was a commercial bomb. Its 1995 album (its first on new label Virgin) Good News From the Next World (#87, 1995), was only moderately successful.

One of several mellow, blue-eyed soul acts from the U.K., Simply Red distinguished itself from the lot by virtue of its lead singer and primary songwriter, Mick Hucknall. In addition to his striking physical appearance—a shock of red curls atop a visage evoking a young Mickey Rooney—Hucknall boasted a shivery, keening counter-tenor that drew the attention, and praise, of critics. For some, however, Hucknall's distinctive voice couldn't compensate for the often effete arrangements that characterized Simply Red's hybrid of R&B and Adult Contemporary pop.

As a working-class Manchester lad, Hucknall led a punk-influenced band called the Frantic Elevators in the late '70s and early '80s. Then, yearning to play the pop and soul music that was closer to his heart, the singer put together the short-lived first incarnation of Simply Red. Once that lineup dissolved, Hucknall recruited bassist Tony Bowers, drummer Chris Joyce, and trumpeter/synth player Tim Kellett from another Manchester band, Durutti Column. Adding gospel pianist Fritz McIntyre, Hucknall finally secured the band he wanted. In the years to come, it became clearer that the overriding decisions of Simply Red were Hucknall's to make, as he contracted out musicians for hire rather than treating them as equal partners in a band. In 1985 Simply Red signed to Elektra, releasing that year their first single, "Money$ Too Tight to Mention" (#13 U.K.), and debut album, Picture Book (featuring classically trained guitarist Sylvan Richardson, who joined the band after the single's release). It wasn't until 1986, though, that Book's kickoff single, a wistful ballad called "Holding Back the Years," shot to #2 in England—and #1 in the U.S.

Simply Red was received less enthusiastically by American fans over the next few years. (In the U.K., the album Men and Women reached #2; and two 1987 singles, "The Right Thing" and a cover of Cole Porter's "Ev'ry Time We Say Goodbye," hit #11.) The group rebounded in 1989, though, with a remake of Harold Melvin and the Blue Notes' "If You Don't Know Me by Now" (#1 U.S., #2 U.K.). A fourth album, Stars, topped the British chart—in fact, it became one of the biggest sellers of all time in the U.K.—but stalled at #76 in the U.S. The 1995 followup, Life, provided a #1 single, "Fairground," in England, but again, peaked at only #75 in the States. Around this time, Hucknall and his then-manager, Elliot Rashman, formed Blood and Fire, a music label that reissued reggae albums on CD. The group's popularity continued to surge in Europe when its song "We're in This Together" was designated the official theme of Euro '96, the European soccer championships hosted by England that year. Two other albums, 1998's Blue and 1999's Love and the Russian Winter, played respectfully in Europe but were largely ignored in the U.S.

Hucknall also enjoyed celebrity status in Britain, becoming vocally political in support of Prime Minister Tony Blair, as well as being pictured in the tabloids with numerous women over the years, including singer Kim Wilde, tennis player Steffi Graf, actresses Catherine Zeta-Jones and Brigitte Nielsen, and model Helena Christensen.

Bantone Frank Sinatra was indisputably the 20th century's greatest singer of popular song. Though influenced by Bing Crosby's crooning, and by learning from trombonist Tommy Dorsey's breath control and blues singer Billie Holiday's rhythmic swing, Sinatra mainstreamed the concept of singing colloquially, treating lyrics as personal statements and handling melodies with the ease of a jazz improviser. His best work is standards—Cole Porter, Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, and the Gershwins—but Sinatra, despite his 1957 denunciation of rock & roll as degenerate, has recorded songs by the likes of Stevie Wonder, George Harrison, Jimmy Webb, and Billy Joel. Not only did his freely interpretive approach pave the way for the idiosyncrasies of rock singing, but with his character a mix of tough-guy cool and romantic vulnerability, he became the first true pop idol, a superstar who through his music established a persona audiences found compelling and true.

Sinatra, an only child of a family with Sicilian roots, grew up in Hoboken, and sang in the glee club of Demarest High School. His break came in 1937, when he and three instrumentalists, billed as the Hoboken Four, won on the Major Bowes Original Amateur Hour. After some touring, the group disbanded.

Harry James signed Sinatra to sing with his orchestra, and on July 13, 1939, two weeks after his debut as a big-band vocalist at the Hippodrome Theatre in Baltimore, Sinatra cut his first disc, "From the Bottom of My Heart," with the orchestra. Of the 10 sides he recorded with them, the biggest seller, "All or Nothing at All," sold just over 8,000 copies upon release. In 1943 it was rereleased and became the first of Sinatra's many million-sellers, hitting #2 on the chart.

In 1940 Tommy Dorsey's lead singer, Jack Leonard, quit and Sinatra began a two-year stay with the trombonist. During those years, the band consistently hit the Top 10 (15 entries in 1940-41, including their first, the #1 hit "I'll Never Smile Again"). His radio work with Dorsey was the springboard for Sinatra's solo career. During the war years, Sinatra, married at the time to his childhood sweetheart, Nancy, sang love songs to his mostly female audiences, notably on Lucky Strike's Hit Parade and at New York's original Paramount Theatre. Between 1943 and 1946 he had 17 Top 10 chart singles, and earned the sobriquets "The Voice" and "The Sultan of Swoon." With the GIs back in the U.S., public taste shifted away from these songs, and Sinatra's popularity waned. At Columbia, producer Mitch Miller burdened Sinatra with novelty songs (washboard accompaniment on one, barking dogs on another), and his sales slipped to an average of 30,000 per record. In the early '50s, he was dropped by Columbia and by his talent agent and lost his MGM motion picture contract. To regain his popularity, he begged to be cast as Maggio in the film From Here to Eternity. His first nonsinging role, it won him a 1953 Oscar and a return to the limelight. (His film debut had been with the Tommy Dorsey Orchestra in 1941's Las Vegas Nights.)

The fledgling Capitol Records signed him in 1953 and, with ex-Dorsey trombonist and arranger Nelson Riddle, Sinatra moved into the next phase of his recording career with a new emphasis: saloon ballads and sophisticated swing tunes. With Capitol, he concentrated on albums, although he again charted in the singles Top 10, notably with "Young at Heart" (#2, 1954), "Learnin' the Blues" (#1, 1955), "Hey! Jealous Lover" (#3, 1956), "All the Way" (#2, 1957), and "Witchcraft" (#6, 1958). His best albums of the period were arranged by Riddle, Billy May, or Gordon Jenkins.

Through the early '50s, during which he was married to film actress Ava Gardner, having left Nancy in 1950, Sinatra became a movie star. He won especially high praise for his portrayal of a drug addict in The Man With the Golden Arm (1955). Beginning in 1959, two years after he divorced Gardner, his singles failed to hit the Top 30, and in 1961 Sinatra left Capitol to establish his own company, Reprise. (In 1963 he sold Reprise to Warner Bros. and became a vice president and consultant of Warner Bros. Picture Corp.)

Sinatra decided to try again to become a Top 40 singles artist. "The Second Time Around" hit #50 in 1961, subsequent releases charted lower. But in the mid-'60s he recouped. He was the triumphant headliner of the final evening of the 1965 Newport Jazz Festival in a 20-song set accompanied by Count Basie's orchestra, conducted by Quincy Jones. His 1965 Thanksgiving TV special, Frank Sinatra: A Man and His Music, a review of his 25-year career, won an Emmy and set the precedent for numerous other TV specials, including one each in the next four years. That year he also picked up a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award. In 1966–67 he charted three of his biggest Top 10 hits: "Strangers in the Night" (#1, 1966), "That's Life" (#4, 1966), and a duet with daughter Nancy, "Somethin' Stupid" (#1, 1967).

In the '60s he made his Las Vegas debut at the Sands and continued for years as a main attraction at Caesars Palace. Leader of the notorious "Rat Pack," including Sammy Davis Jr., Dean Martin, Peter Lawford, and Joey Bishop, he came to epitomize the hard-drinking, blonde-chasing swinger, a stout Democrat who'd named his son after Franklin D. Roosevelt, he also strongly supported John F. Kennedy's presidential bid. Married from 1966 to 1968 to actress Mia Farrow, he began reconciling with youth culture, covering songs, with indifferent success, by younger writers. In 1968 he recorded "My Way," a French song to which Paul Anka wrote new English lyrics. A modest U.S. hit (#27), it was an overwhelming smash in the U.K., staying in the Top 50 an unprecedented 122 weeks (Sex Pistol Sid Vicious later recorded a sarcastic version.)

In 1970 Sinatra announced his retirement and was honored with a gala farewell on June 13, 1971, at the L.A. Music Center. He reversed that decision in 1973 with the release of Ol' Blue Eyes Is Back (#13), a TV special of the same name, and a performance at the Nixon White House (over the years, Sinatra's politics had become markedly conservative; in 1985, he would produce Ronald Reagan's inaugural gala). In 1974 he mounted an eight-city, 13-date sold-out U.S. tour and performed in Japan and Australia. In Australia he aggravated the paparazzi with his antijournalist harangues: Through the years he referred to the males as parasites, and the females as everything from "a buck-and-a-half hooker" to "two-dollar broads." Married to Zeppo Marx's widow, Barbara, in 1976, however, he appeared to mellow somewhat. In the mid-'70s Sinatra's career slowed down, but in mid-1980, after a five-year recording hiatus, he released Trilogy (#17), which included a version of "Theme From New York, New York" (#32) that the city fervently adopted.

In the '80s Sinatra continued to perform sold-out concerts in major halls, to star in movies and TV specials, and to spark controversy for his business and political associations. (His 1972 appearances before the House Select Committee on Crime investigating criminal infiltration into horse racing were front-page news.) With 1981's She Shot Me Down (#52) and 1984's L.A. Is My Lady (#58) he appeared to have ended his recording career. In 1985, he was accorded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian award.

In 1993, however, he enjoyed a renaissance with Duets debuting at #2. Featuring top singers—among them Aretha Franklin, Bono, Tony Bennett, Liza Minnelli, and Luther Van-dress (some recording their parts via telephone)—it gained Sinatra new young fans. Still touring, with the aid of TelePromTers, at 78, he collapsed onstage in Virginia in 1994 but soon recovered; days earlier, when presented with a special "Legend" award at the Grammy Awards ceremony—with an over-the-top intro by Bono—he had waxed so emotional that his own handlers requested that television cameras cut away from his acceptance speech. Rumors abounded about Sinatra's health, but he insisted on resuming his tour. By year's end, the sequel Duets II was issued, featuring Chrissie Hynde, Linda Ronstadt, and Willie Nelson, among others.

A 1983 honoree at the Kennedy Center Honors, Sinatra was involved for many years in charitable work, particularly in fundraising for multiple sclerosis, chronically ill children, and awareness of child abuse.

Frank Sinatra died of a heart attack on May 14, 1998, in L.A. That year, his FBI dossier, 1,275 pages covering 50 years of surveillance, was released. The document revealed no shocking secrets.

Nancy Sinatra

Born June 8, 1940, Jersey City, NJ

1966—Boots (Reprise) 1968—Nancy and Lee (with Lee Hazlewood) 1970—Greatest Hits 1972—Nancy and Lee—Encore (RCA) 1987—Boots: Nancy Sinatra's All-Time Hits (1966–1970) (with Lee Hazlewood) (Rhino) 1989—Fairy Tales and Fantasies: The Best of Nancy & Lee (with Lee Hazlewood) 1995—One More Time (Cougar) 1999—You Go Go Girl (Varèse Sarabande).

Frank Sinatra's daughter Nancy recorded a slew of '60s hits, including the sassy "These Boots Are Made for Walkin'" and "How Does That Grab You, Darlin'?" as well as collaborating on several more-obtuse, intriguing compositions, such as "Some Velvet Morning" and "Sand," with producer Lee Hazlewood. Her attitude-laced vocal style and go-go boots fashion sense inspired such postpunk femmes as Sonic Youth's Kim Gordon and the Breeders' Kim Deal.

At an early age Nancy Sinatra began studying dance, acting, singing, and piano. She made her national TV debut in 1960, in a Timex special featuring her father and Elvis Presley, in his first television appearance since leaving the army. She dropped out of the University of Southern California in 1960 after marrying singer/actor Tommy Sands, and did not resume her career until they divorced in 1965.

Her first few, girly-voiced singles, "Like I Do," "Tonight You Belong to Me," and "Think of Me," were hits in England, Europe, and South Africa, but were ignored in the U.S. Then in 1966 she began working with songwriter/producer Lee Hazlewood [see entry] and arranger Billy Strange, who urged her to go for a saucier, lower-register vocal style. Voila, she had her first #1 hit with the million-selling "Boots" soon after. She followed it up with the gold "Sugar Town" b/w "Summer Wine" (#5, 1966). In 1967 Sinatra and Hazlewood hit with the honey 'n' vinegar duet "Jackson" (#14), also a smash for Johnny Cash and June Carter Cash. Nancy's title tune for the James Bond film You Only Live Twice reached #44 the same year, and her 1967 duet with her father, "Somethin' Stupid," took her back to the top of the chart. She also appeared in films, including The Wild Angels with Peter Fonda and Speedway with Presley.

After the hits quit coming in 1968, Sinatra retired from the entertainment business. Her moody duet with Hazlewood, "Some Velvet Morning," was revived by postpunk icons Lydia Lunch and Rowland S. Howard in the '80s, around the time Sinatra recorded a little-known album with Mel Tillis. Then, in 1995, Sinatra resurfaced, releasing a new album on the tiny Cougar label, posing in Playboy, and, with Hazlewood and a band, touring hip rock clubs. Her liner notes to the new recording explained she wanted to sing songs like those she'd done with Hazlewood: "tough and gentle, nasty and sweet, experienced and innocent," and during her comeback interviews she expressed great admiration for Hole's Courtney Love.

As leader of Siouxsie and the Banshees, Siouxsie Sioux has gone from punk-rock fan to seminal punk rocker to elder stateswoman. Outlasting most of their contemporaries, the Banshees have moved from an abrasive, art-punk sound into the mainstream, gaining a Top 40 hit with 1991's "Kiss Them for Me" (#23).

The Banshees grew out of the Bromley Contingent, a group of Sex Pistols fans; Sid Vicious, later a Pistol himself, played drums for their debut performance (which consisted of just one song, an elongated version of "The Lord's Prayer") at the 100 Club's 1976 punk festival. By the time their debut single, "Hong Kong Garden," and the album The Scream came out, only Siouxsie and Steve Severin remained from the original lineup (Marco Pirroni went on to join Adam and the Ants). Cure leader Robert Smith joined the band for a 1979 tour, and former Sex Pistol guitarist Steve Jones helped out on Kaleidoscope. Magazine's John McGeoch joined the band shortly before its first American tour in 1980. After appearing on two albums (Ju Ju and A Kiss in the Dreamhouse), McGeoch left in 1982. Smith rejoined the Banshees for a live album, Nocturne, and in the studio for Hyaena (#157, 1984).

With Smith on board, the band's musical palette widened, adding symphonic elements and a cover of the Beatles' "Dear Prudence" (#3 U.K., 1983). But Smith found playing in two bands wearying and left in 1984. Sioux broke her kneecap onstage in 1985, and the band laid low the remainder of the year. It returned with new guitarist John Valentine Carruthers and Tinderbox (#88, 1986), the group's first U.S. Top 100 album. Carruthers left after Through the Looking Glass (#188, 1987), an album of cover versions.

Peepshow (#68, 1988), with new members Jon Klein (ex-Specimen) and Martin McCarrick, moved the Banshees in the direction of a techno/dance groove, giving the band its first U.S. chart single: "Peek-a-Boo" (#53, 1988). In 1991 the Banshees were invited by Perry Farrell to perform on the first-ever Lollapalooza Tour. Released in conjunction with the tour, Superstition (#65) was the Banshees' best-selling album. In 1993 Siouxsie and Budgie (who had married in 1991) moved to the South of France, and there they began working on The Rapture (1995) with coproducer John Cale. That moody album turned out to be the Banshees' last as Sioux and Budgie decided to end the band's run in 1996 to concentrate instead on the Creatures.

Sioux and Budgie started the Creatures, essentially a percussion and voice setup, as a side project in 1981, scoring an early hit with the single "Right Now" (#14 U.K., 1983). They've since released three full-length albums as well as Hybrids, a collection of remixes that solidified the Creatures' strong dance-floor appeal. In 1998 the band toured with John Cale, with all three principals taking turns in the spotlight and collaborating on several songs.

Sister Sledge

Formed late '50s, Philadelphia, PA

Debra Sledge (b. 1955), voc.; Joni Sledge (b. 1957), voc.; Kim Sledge (b. 1958), voc.; Kathy Sledge (b. 1959), voc.
 1975—Circle of Love (Atco) 1979—We Are Family (Cotillion) 1980—Love Somebody Today 1981—All American Girls 1983—Bet Cha Say That to All the Girls 1985—When the Boys Meet the Girls (Atlantic) 1992—The Best of Sister Sledge (1973-1985) (- Kathy Sledge) 1998—African Eyes (Fahrenheit).

This vocal quartet of Philadelphia-born sisters enjoyed considerable success as the '70s ended.

The Sledge sisters made their performing debut at Philadelphia's Second Macedonia Church in the late '50s. Their parents had both been entertainers, and their grandmother Viola Williams was an opera singer. Before they attended elementary school, the four girls entertained at parties as Mrs. Williams' Grandchildren.

In 1971 they recorded "Time Will Tell" for the Money label. It was produced by Marty Bryant and the band Slim and the Boys, the team behind the Stylistics' first hit. While attending college they worked as background singers on several Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff productions, and in 1973 they were signed to Atlantic Records. All four have since graduated from Temple University.

From 1973 to 1978, Sister Sledge recorded in New York and Philadelphia without any significant success. It wasn't until the gold We Are Family in 1979, written and produced by Nile Rodgers and Bernard Edwards of Chic, that they became a chart presence. "He's the Greatest Dancer" (#9 pop, #1 R&B) and "We Are Family" (#2 pop, #1 R&B) were dance hits. The latter became the theme song of the Pittsburgh Pirates, the 1979 World Series champions, and later the anthem of gays marching on Washington, DC, that year. In 1981 (the year they began producing their own records) the quartet recorded "He's Just a Runaway," a tribute to the late Bob Marley. The next year, Sister Sledge had a hit with a cover of the Mary Wells oldie "My Guy." Although the group had no further pop hits in the U.S., they had a #1 U.K. hit, "Frankie," in 1985. After that, Kathy sought a solo career, and found some success in Europe in the early '90s. The remaining Sisters continued without her for 1998's African Eyes.

The Sisters of Mercy

Formed 1980, Leeds, Eng.

Andrew Eldritch (b. Andrew Taylor, May 10, 1959, Ely, Eng.), voc., gtr., bass, machines; Ben Gunn (b. Benjamin Matthews), gtr.; Craig Adams (b. Apr. 4, 1962, Leeds), bass; Gary Marx (b. Mark Pearman), gtr.

1982—Alice EP (Brain Eater) 1983—The Reptile House EP
1984—(- Gunn; + Wayne Hussey [b. Jerry Wayne Hussey, May 26, 1958, Bristol, Eng.], gtr.) Body and Soul EP (WEA) 1985—First and Last and Always (Elektra) 1987—(- Hussey; - Adams; - Marx; + Patricia Morrison, bass) Floodland
1990—(- Morrison; + Tony James [b. ca. 1956], bass; + Andreas Bruhn [b. Nov. 5, 1967, Hamburg, Ger.], gtr.; + Tim Bricheno [b. July 6, 1963, Huddersfield, Eng.], gtr.) Vision Thing 1992—Some Girls Wander by Mistake (Mute) (- James; - Bruhn; - Bricheno) 1993—(+ Adam Pearson [b. Mar. 3, 1964, Coventry, Eng.], gtr.) A Slight Case of Overbombing: Greatest Hits, vol. 1 (Elektra) 1996—(+ Chris Sheehan [b. N.Z.], gtr.; + Mike Varjak [b. Belgrade, Serbia], gtr.)

The Sisters of Mercy, progenitors of England's "goth," or "gothic," postpunk subgenre, play a darkly psychedelic, danceable music that feasts on what bandleader Andrew Eldritch considers the "corpse of rock & roll." Sisters were formed by Eldritch and Gary Marx as a studio project: a metal band with a drum machine, Doktor Avalanche. After one year and one single released on their Merciful Release label, the Sisters (named after an order of nuns) added Ben Gunn and Craig Adams so they could play live shows. Gunn left the band after its first U.S. tour, in 1983, and was replaced by former Dead or Alive guitarist Wayne Hussey.

After a string of singles and EPs established a strong Sisters following in England, WEA signed the band worldwide. By this time, Sisters had added dance and pop elements to their heavy sound, and First and Last and Always, produced by Dave Allen (the Cure), reached the U.K. Top 20. The band was having internal problems, however, and Marx left to form the group Ghost Dance. In typically macabre fashion, the Sisters played a June 1985 concert dubbed "Altamont: A Festival of Remembrance." Shortly afterward, Hussey and Adams left to form the Mission (U.K.). Eldritch, who had been having health problems, moved to Hamburg. Embroiled in a legal fight with his former band mates, he released the EP Gift in 1986 under the name Sisterhood, partly to preempt Hussey and Adams from using that name. Gift featured tape collages, a cameo by American Alan Vega (Suicide), and another American, ex-Gun Club bassist Patricia Morrison.

Morrison remained Eldritch's sole band mate on Floodland, whose single "This Corrosion" became popular among American alternative rockers. Meat Loaf collaborator Jim Steinman produced two album tracks. Morrison left, and Eldritch replaced her with the controversial Tony James, former Generation X bassist and Sigue Sigue Sputnik mastermind. The Sisters continued their transatlantic success with Vision Thing, a powerful and pointed commentary on life under Bush and Thatcher. The album, featuring new members Andreas Bruhn and Tim Bricheno and guest appearances by John Perry (Only Ones), yielded the singles "Vision Thing" and "More." In summer 1991 the Sisters, joined by ex-B.A.D. keyboardist Dan Donovan, led a tour of outdoor theaters with Public Enemy, Gang of Four, Warnor Soul, and Young Black Teenagers.

Feuds with their record company kept the Sisters out of the recording studio until they extricated themselves from their contract in 1998. Meanwhile, a side project of Eldritch's called Gangwar released a number of brooding tracks on a 1996 compilation album they split with U.K. synth-pop band James Ray's Performance. The Sisters continue to be a big concert draw among goth fans, even though Eldritch now claims no connection with the goth movement. Some Girls Wander by Mistake (1992) and A Slight Case of Overbombing (1993) are compilations of previously released material.

Ricky Skaggs

Born July 18, 1954, Cordell, KY

1979—Sweet Temptation (Sugar Hill) 1981—Waitin' for the Sun to Shine (Epic) 1982—Highways & Heartaches 1983—

Don't Cheat in Our Hometown 1984—Country Boy 1985—Favorite Country Songs; Live in London 1986—Love's Gonna Get Ya! 1988—Cornin' Home to Stay 1989—Kentucky Thunder 1991—My Father's Son 1993—Super Hits 1995—Solid Ground (Atlantic) 1997—Life Is a Journey; Bluegrass Rules! (Skaggs Family Records) 1999—Ancient Tones; Soldier of the Cross 2000—Big Mon: The Songs of Bill Monroe; 16 Biggest Hits.

From bluegrass to the top of the country charts and back again, it would be impossible to imagine Nashville without Ricky Skaggs. His work with Emmylou Harris was instrumental in bringing country music back from the slick, over-produced sound that dominated Nashville in the '70s. As a solo artist, Skaggs has had 18 Top 10 C&W singles, with 10 reaching #1, and two #2, including "Uncle Pen" (#1, 1984), the first bluegrass recording to top the country charts since 1963. Skaggs has scored eight C&W Top 20 albums, including three #1s (Highways & Heartaches [#61 pop, 1982], Don't Cheat in Our Hometown, and Country Boy [#180 pop, 1984]). A virtuoso multi-instrumentalist (on guitar, mandolin, banjo, and fiddle), he was named to the Grand Ole Opry in 1982, at the time the youngest performer to receive that honor.

Born into a musical family (his construction worker father played church meeting halls, his mother was a gospel singer and songwriter), Skaggs taught himself mandolin at age five. He also made his first public appearance that year, playing "Ruby" at a Bill Monroe concert. By the late '60s, he started performing with Keith Whitley. When bluegrass legend Ralph Stanley was late for a show in 1970, the promoter asked Skaggs and Whitley, who were in the audience, to fill in. Stanley, who walked in while they were playing, was sufficiently impressed to add them to his band.

Tired of life on the road, Skaggs quit in 1972 and moved to Washington, DC, where he worked for the Virginia Electric and Power company until 1974, when he joined the Country Gentlemen. He played with JD Crowe and the New South before forming his own band, Boone Creek, in 1975. He met Emmylou Harris at a party, and when Rodney Crowell left her Hot Band in 1978, she asked Skaggs to replace him. He played on her albums Blue Kentucky Girl [1980], Light of the Stable [1981], and was musical director and arranger for Roses in the Snow [1980]. Skaggs recorded a solo album, Sweet Temptation (1979), for Sugar Hill, a small North Carolina label, moved to Nashville in 1980, and signed to Epic, who released Waitin' for the Sun to Shine [#77 pop, #2 C&W, 1982], which proved there was still an audience for traditional country music. Subsequent albums add some rock touches but never stray far from Skaggs' country roots.

In 1981 Skaggs married Sharon White, one half of the Whites. They recorded a #10 C&W duet in 1987, "Love Can't Ever Get Any Better Than This." He has also dueted with Ray Charles on "Friendship" (1984), and performed with and produced albums for the Bellamy Brothers, Johnny Cash, Rodney Crowell, Exile, Dolly Parton, and Jesse Winchester. In 1994, as "hat acts" flourished in Nashville, Skaggs' contract with Epic ended and he signed with Atlantic, for which he released Solid Ground (#72 C&W, 1996) and Life Is a Journey (1997), all the while continuing to perform at bluegrass concerts and festivals.

While Skaggs had enormous popular success during the '80s, culminating with his being named Entertainer of the Year by the Country Music Association in 1985, he didn't fare as well in the following decade, finding himself at odds with a Nashville that was producing increasingly pop-ish music. While his last album for Atlantic flopped, the defiantly titled Bluegrass Rules! (#45 C&W, 1997), initially released as a side project on the guitarist's own label, Skaggs Family Records, turned into a surprise commercial success and won a Grammy for Best Bluegrass Album in 1999. This prompted Skaggs to leave Atlantic and return to his musical roots. (Using the label as a new creative outlet, he also spearheaded 2000's Big Mon: The Songs of Bill Monroe, a tribute to the bluegrass legend.)

In 1999 Skaggs, an openly Christian performer who had won several Dove Awards in the past, released his first gospel album, Soldier of the Cross (#65 C&W, 1999).

1963—Ska Authentic (Studio One) 1975—Legendary Skatalites (Top Ranking) 1977—African Roots (United Artists) 1984—Scattered Lights (Alligator) 1986—Stretching Out cassette (ROIR) 1993—Skavoozee (Shanachie) 1994—Hi-Bop Ska 1996—Greetings From Skamania; Foundation Ska (Heartbeat) 1998—Ball of Fire (Island/PolyGram).

From 1963 to 1967 the Skatalites played on nearly every session recorded in Jamaica. Leader Don Drummond virtually invented ska, and the ranks of his band were filled with stars of that and later eras. The band was a major inspiration for the British 2-Tone movement in the late '70s. Drummond was a music teacher at a Catholic boys' school in West Kingston when he formed his band, some members had been his students. With varying numbers according to the demands of the session, they recorded for all of the Jamaican producers, but especially for Coxson Dodd at his Studio One. They backed Eric Morris, the Charms, Justin Hines, Derrick Morgan, the Maytals, the Wailers, and the Heptones. They issued instrumental records from their sessions as well, scoring Jamaican hits with "Ball o' Fire," "Independent Anniversary Ska," "Confucius," and "Dick Tracy."

One of the first Jamaican acts signed to Island Records and marketed in the U.K., they made the British Top 40 with "Guns of Navarone" in 1967. They also recorded, in various aggregations, as the Don Drummond All Stars, Roland Al and the Soul Brothers, Tommy McCook and the Superions, the Baba Brooks Band, the Karl Bryan Orchestra, Jackie Mittoo and the Soul Vendors, Drumbago's All Stars, Sir Coxson's All Stars, and Roland Alphonso's Alley Cats.

By 1967, the Skatalites were no longer recording under that name, although most of the members were active in Jamaican music until the '80s. Some moved to England, where, like Ernest Ranglin, they maintained careers as session musicians or, like Rico Rodriguez, they began making solo records. Drummond, who had won international jazz trombonist awards, died in 1969 after years of steadily worsening mental illness. In 1975 Tommy McCook, Roland Alphonso, Lloyd Knibb, and Lester Sterling briefly reunited as the Skatalites under Lloyd Brevette's leadership.

The punky ska played by 2-Tone bands like the Specials and Madness in the late '70s and early '80s revived interest in the Skatalites. Rico Rodriguez played on the Specials debut album in 1979 (they also covered "Navarone" in concert). In 1988 the group, now led by Tommy McCook, toured the U.S. Ska voovee was released in 1993, supported by a tour that featured latter-day 2-Tone-style bands Special Beat, the Selector (which had just re-formed), and the New York City-based Toasters. Hi-Bop Ska underlined the connections between ska and jazz, and featured Lester Bowie as a guest.

Despite undergoing a triple bypass in 1994, McCook helmed the 1996 studio album Greetings From Skamania; he was to die of heart failure in 1998. Ball of Fire featured new recordings of some of the Skatalites' old hits; the band at that time included founding members Brevette, Sterling, Alphonso, and Knibb.

Skid Row

Formed 1986, New Jersey

Matt Fallon, voc.; Dave "Snake" Sabo, gtr.; Scotti Hill, gtr.; Rachel Bolan, bass; Rob Affuso, drums.

1987—(– Fallon; + Sebastian Bach (b. Sebastian Bierk, Apr. 3, 1968, Bahamas), voc.) 1989—Skid Row (Atlantic) 1991—Slave to the Grind 1992—B-Sides Ourselves EP 1995—Subhuman Race 1998—Forty Seasons: The Best of Skid Row. Sebastian Bach solo: 1999—Bring 'Em Bach Alive (Spitfire).

New Jersey-based hard-rock band Skid Row included Bon Jovi's original guitarist, Dave "Snake" Sabo. That connection came in handy when Bon Jovi's management signed Skid Row and offered it the opening-act slot on Bon Jovi's 1989 U.S. tour—where audiences discovered the wild, anything-goes stage persona of pretty-boy frontman Sebastian Bach. Bach would later publicly criticize Jon Bon Jovi for taking a chunk of Skid Row's publishing royalties in exchange for his early support.

The band's debut album (#6, 1989) sold 4 million copies, thanks to the Bon Jovi connection, heavy MTV play of the video for the anthemic "Youth Gone Wild," and the unexpected success of the singles "18 and Life" (#4, 1989) and the power ballad "I Remember You" (#6, 1989). Skid Row also contributed a cover of the Sex Pistols' "Holidays in the Sun" to the 1989 metal all-star album Stairway to Heaven, Highway to Hell.

Bach then began courting controversy in earnest. At a December 27, 1989, concert in Springfield, Massachusetts, he was hit in the head with a bottle thrown by a fan. Bach hurled the bottle back into the crowd—hitting an innocent girl in the face—then leapt into the throng and pummeled someone who may or may not have tossed the bottle. Bach faced four assault charges and one count of mayhem. He did no jail time but spent three years on probation and paid an undisclosed settlement to the girl he injured, as well as giving her a personal apology (she'd also endured the taunts of schoolmates angry that she'd "made trouble" for Bach).

About the same time, Bach was pictured in a metal magazine wearing a T-shirt that read AIDS KILLS FAGS DEAD (a parody of an insecticide slogan). Asked by MTV News about the shirt, Bach laughingly said, "I do not condone, comprehend, or understand homosexuality in any way, shape, form, or size." In the face of mounting public outrage, Bach stated that he had friends who were gay and that he disapproved of gay bashing.

Slave to the Grind took a harder-edged and punkier approach than the first album, and yielded no hit singles. Though it entered the chart at #1, the album fell before too long, and sold only a quarter the copies of its predecessor. The five-song EP B-Sides Ourselves included Skid Row's covers of Jimi Hendrix's "Little Wing" and the Ramones' "Psychotherapy." The band's subsequent 1995 release, Subhuman Race, reached #35 but only charted for nine weeks, performing poorly in the post-Nirvana rock market. Bach was jettisoned the following year, and launched a solo career that included Bnng 'Em Bach Alive—Japanese concert recordings of old Skid Row hits, plus more recent studio tracks—and a side project with former Breeders guitarist Kelley Deal and Smashing Pumpkins drummer Jimmy Chamberlin called the Last Hard Men. By 2000, Bach was appearing on Broadway in Jekyll & Hyde, and Skid Row guitarist Dave Sabo had plans to record with a new band, Ozone Monday.

Slade

Formed 1968, Wolverhampton, Eng.

Noddy Holder (b. Neville Holder, June 15, 1950, Walsall, Eng.), gtr., voc.; Dave Hill (b. Apr. 4, 1952, Fleet Castle, Eng.), gtr.; Jimmy Lea (b. June 14, 1952, Wolverhampton), bass, piano, violin; Don Powell (b. Sep. 10, 1950, Bilston, Eng.), drums.

Noyz 1992—(group disbands) 1993—(group re-forms as Slade II: Hill; Powell; + Steve Whalley, gtr., voc.; + Trevor Holliday, bass, voc.) 2000—(- Holliday; + Dave Glover, bass, voc.).

Distinguished by Noddy Holder's harsh screaming, a crudely thunderous rhythm section and song titles that recast the English language ("Gudbuy T'Jane," "Cum On Feel the Noize," "Skweeze Me Pleeze Me"). Slade breathed life into early-'70s hard rock. Within a decade, the group's influence could be seen in newer artists, including Quiet Riot (whose first hit was a cover of "Cum On Feel the Noize" and who covered "Mama Weer All Crazee Now" on its second album), Joan Jett, and any number of glitter-influenced rockers.

Hailing from Wolverhampton, an industrial city near Birmingham, the quartet started as the In Betweens. They changed their name to Ambrose Slade and were spotted one night by Chas Chandler, the former Animal and former manager/producer of Jimi Hendrix. Chandler dropped the Ambrose and became the group's manager and producer, giving them their first British hit in 1971, a cover of Little Richard's "Get Down and Get With It," followed by the #1 record "Coz I Love You."

The key to Slade's primitive attack was Chandler's live-in-the-studio production. Appearing onstage at first with closely cropped haircuts, blue jeans, suspenders, and construction boots—trademarks of England's working-class skinhead movement—Slade was as noisy as the Who and generated an unrestrained "Slademanía." Fans stomped, clapped, rushed the stage, fainted, and tossed bras and panties onstage. Slade gradually switched its visual image, becoming one of rock's most gaudily outfitted groups. The four rockers dressed in the unlikely combination of silver sci-fi gear and high-fashion platform boots.

Slade's hits from this period included "Take Me Back 'Ome" (#1 U.K., 1972), "Mama Weer All Crazee Now" (#1 U.K., 1972), "Gudbuy T'Jane" (#2 U.K., 1972), and "Cum On Feel the Noize" (#1 U.K., 1973), which were generally ignored in the U.S. In 1974 Slade starred in the film Flame in which the members appeared as rock stars on the way to the top. At the same time, Slade's popularity was slipping, with decreasing sales of albums such as Slade in Flame, which underlined the group's maturing hard-rock style. Slade carried on, seemingly unable to regain the momentum of its peak period, when it sold more than 10 million records worldwide. In 1981 the group had a British hit with "Lock Up Your Daughters," then in 1983, on the heels of the Quiet Riot hit cover, the group rebounded in the U.K. with "My Oh My," which went to #2. "Run Runaway," from Keep Your Hands Off My Power Supply, became Slade's highest-charting single in the U.S., topping at #20. After a few more moderately successful releases in its homeland, Slade split up in 1992. Guitarist Dave Hill, drummer Don Powell, and two new recruits have soldiered on in the U.K. as Slade II. Holder produced the female metal band Girlschool's 1983 album, Play Dirty. He finished a witty book, Who's Crazee Now?, in 1999 and he occasionally works as an actor. Holder and former Slade bassist Jimmy Lea have also recorded solo.

Slayer

Formed 1982, Los Angeles, CA

Tom Araya (b. June 6, 1961, Chile), bass, voc.; Jeff Hanneman (b. Jan. 31, 1964, Los Angeles), gtr.; Kerry King (b. June 3, 1964, Huntington Park, CA), gtr.; Dave Lombardo (b. Feb. 16, 1965), drums.

1983—Show No Mercy (Metal Blade) 1985—Hell Awaits 1986—Reign in Blood (Def Jam) 1988—South of Heaven 1990—Seasons in the Abyss (Def American) 1991—Decade of Aggression Live 1992—(- Lombardo, + Paul Bostaph [b. Mar. 4, 1965, Hayward, CA], drums) 1994—Divine Intervention (American) 1996—Undisputed Attitude 1998—Diabolus in Musica.

If Slayer did not exist, the tabloid press would invent it. Loud, aggressive, and violent, its songs touch on sadism, Satanism, Nazi death camps, and serial killers. Its music was prominently featured in 1987's troubled-teen film River's Edge. A 1988 concert in New York's Felt Forum had to be stopped when fans rampaged, tearing up seats and pelting the stage with debris. And all five teens featured on the "Kids Who Kill" episode of Geraldo cited Slayer as one of their favorite bands.

Slayer began in 1982 as part of L.A.'s Huntington Beach head-banging scene. Originally a cover band, by 1983 the band had written "Aggressive Perfection," which appeared on Metal Blade Records' Metal Massacre III compilation. Metal Blade also released Slayer's next two albums, Show No Mercy and Hell Awaits. The group's brutal songs and malevolent obsessions increased its local reputation, but it was unable to garner national attention until Rick Rubin signed the band to his Def Jam label in 1986. Slayer became something of a cause célèbre that year when Columbia (Def Jam's distributor) refused to release Reign in Blood, citing references to Nazi physician/torturer Joseph Mengele in the song "Angel of Death," among other offenses. Geffen quickly picked up the album, which became the band's first to chart, peaking at #94.

Starting with the group's followup, South of Heaven (#57, 1988), bassist/vocalist Tom Araya became the main songwriter, and Slayer's music and subject matter turned slightly more mainstream, with riffs and melodies replacing drones. The lyrics focused on more earthbound subjects: "Death Skin Mask" from Seasons in the Abyss (#40, 1990) was inspired by serial killer Ed Gein.

In 1991 Slayer celebrated its first 10 years together by releasing Decade of Aggression Live (#55) and holding down one third of the Clash of the Titans Tour along with Megadeth and Anthrax. The band returned in 1994 with Divine Intervention (#8, 1994), its most successful album to date.

Picking up where 1993's "Disorder" (a medley of Exploited songs done in collaboration with Ice-T for the Judg- ment Night soundtrack) had left off, Slayer released Undisputed Attitude (#34, 1996). It featured only one new Slayer track, concentrating instead on a variety of punk covers by the likes of T.S.O.L., Minor Threat, and Verbal Abuse. Bostaph was replaced by ex-Testament drummer John Dette for the following tour, but came back to play on Diabolus in Musica (#31, 1998), on which Slayer returned to its usual gruesome lyrical content set to speed metal. In 2000 the band joined the inaugural Tattoo the Earth Tour, reaffirming its status as a grand elder of the metal scene.

Slayer: Tom Araya, Paul Bostaph,
Kerry King, Jeff Hanneman

Sleater-Kinney

Formed 1994, Olympia, WA

Carrie Brownstein (b. Sep. 27, 1974, Seattle, WA), gtr., voc.;

Corin Tucker (b. Nov. 9, 1972, State College, PA), voc., gtr.;

1995—Sleater-Kinney (Kill Rock Stars) (– McFarlane; + Toni

Gogin, drums) 1996—(– Gogin) Call the Doctor; (+ Janet

Weiss [b. Sep. 24, 1965, Hollywood, CA], drums, voc.)

1997—Dig Me Out 1999—The Hot Rock 2000—All Hands on the Bad One.

Corin Tucker with Heavens to Betsy: 1994—Calculated (Kill Rock Stars).

Corin Tucker with Cadallaca: 1998—Introducing Cadallaca

(K Records) 2000—Out West EP (Kill Rock Stars).

Carrie Brownstein with Excuse 17: 1995—Excuse Seventeen (Chainsaw); Such Friends Are Dangerous (Kill Rock Stars).

Sleater-Kinney was among the most critically acclaimed bands of the '90s, emerging in the final days of the riot-grrrl movement to fuse radical feminism with challenging, fiery punk. The all-female trio also became dynamic leaders of an alternative-rock movement that had otherwise lost its way in the post-Nirvana years. The band is mostly unknown to the mainstream and has shown little interest in recording for a major label. But for Sleater-Kinney rock & roll is more about empowerment and community than stardom.

Singer/guitarists Corin Tucker and Carrie Brownstein met as students in the early '90s at Evergreen State College in Olympia, Washington. Inspired by Bikini Kill and other riot grrrls, both were already in bands (Tucker in Heavens to Betsy, Brownstein in Excuse 17). The two began writing songs together, were lovers for a time, and with drummer Lora McFarlane founded Sleater-Kinney—named for an Olympia freeway off-ramp. The band's self-titled debut in 1995 introduced a sound that was fast and raw. Tucker's searing wail was set against the band's minimalist rock (just drums and two guitars), with lyrics that confronted sexual abuse and inequality while rebelling against the sexist traditions of rock & roll. On 1996's Call the Doctor, Sleater-Kinney claimed its own piece of the rock tradition with the ironic "I Wanna Be Your Joey Ramone." Critics took notice, voting the album among the best of that year.

McFarlane quit in 1995. Her permanent replacement was Janet Weiss (Quasi, Elliott Smith, Motorgoat), who first appeared on 1997's Dig Me Out and then 1999's The Hot Rock (#181), both critically acclaimed releases. That was followed the next year by All Hands on the Bad One, which welded clean pop hooks onto the Sleater-Kinney punk sound, bemoaning the corporate raiding of punk culture on "#1 Must Have" and celebrating the need to rock amid continued sexism on "The Ballad of a Ladyman." Tucker introduced a side project in 1998 called Cadallaca (with Sarah Dougher), featuring a sound similar to, though looser than Sleater-Kinney. Weiss continued to record and tour with Quasi (a collaboration with ex-husband Sam Coomes). And later in 2000 Sleater-Kinney appeared on a new Go-Betweens [see entry] album, The Friends of Rachel Worth, that Australian band's first recording in a dozen years.

Percy Sledge

Born Nov. 25, 1940, Leighton, AL
 1966—When a Man Loves a Woman (Atlantic), Warm and Tender Soul 1967—The Percy Sledge Way 1968—Take Time to Know Her 1969—The Best of Percy Sledge 1974—I'll Be Your Everything (Capricorn) 1987—When a Man Loves a Woman (The Ultimate Collection) (Atlantic) 1992—It Tears Me Up: The Best of Percy Sledge (Atlantic) 1995—Blue Night (Pointblank/Virgin).

In the mid-'60s singer Percy Sledge was performing throughout Mississippi and Alabama as a member of the Esquires Combo. His career took a dramatic turn for the better in 1966, when he quit to go solo and scored a #1 pop and R&B hit with his debut single, "When a Man Loves a Woman." Sledge remained a popular singer through the end of the decade, working in the same intense balladeering style of "When a Man."

His successes included "Warm and Tender Love" (#17 pop, #5 R&B) and "It Tears Me Up" (#20 pop, #7 R&B) in 1966, "Out of Left Field" (#25 R&B) in 1967, "Sudden Stop" (#41 R&B) in 1968, "Any Day Now" (#35 R&B) in 1969, and especially "Take Time to Know Her" (#11 pop, #6 R&B) in 1968. Sledge's career stalled in the '70s, save for a brief resurgence with the R&B hits "Sunshine" (#89 R&B, 1973) and "I'll Be Your Everything" (#15 R&B, 1974).

Sledge's career faded somewhat after that, although he continued to tour the U.S., England, Japan, and the UK through the rest of that decade and into the '80s. The use of "When a Man Loves a Woman" in the 1987 hit film Platoon sparked a resurgence for Sledge, and that year the song was rereleased in the UK, where it went to #2. In 1989 he won the Rhythm & Blues Foundation's Career Achievement Award. He continues to perform, playing over 100 dates a year. As of this writing, he lives in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. In 1994 he was sentenced to five years' probation after being convicted of tax evasion.

Grace Slick: See the Jefferson Airplane

Slick Rick

Born Ricky Walters, Jan. 14, 1965, London, Eng.
 1989—The Great Adventures of Slick Rick (Def Jam) 1991—The Ruler's Back 1994—Behind Bars 1999—The Art of Storytelling.

Sporting a black patch over an eye blinded by broken glass as a youth, Slick Rick epitomized a pre-gangsta version of ghetto cool that made him a million-selling star but also proved his downfall when a jail term derailed his career. Ricky Walters moved to the Bronx as a teenager and attended New York's prestigious High School of Music and Art. As MC Ricky D, he joined with human beat-box Doug E. Fresh and the Get Fresh Crew (see entry), his singsong voice with its odd accent was featured on their 1985 hit "La-Di-Da-Di" b/w "The Show."

Splitting from Fresh, Walters hooked up with rap impresario Russell Simmons and disappeared for three years, amid much rumor. He reemerged with the phenomenal The Great Adventures of Slick Rick (#31 pop, #1 R&B, 1989), which went on to sell more than a million copies. The album, produced by Jam-Master Jay, Hank Shocklee, Eric Sadler, and Walters, featured "Teenage Love" (#16 R&B, 1988), "Children's Story" (#5 R&B, 1989), and the infamous misogynist rap "Treat Her Like a Prostitute." Rick was also featured on Al B. Sure's single "If I'm Not Your Lover" (#2 R&B, 1989).

On July 3, 1990, Walters was arrested for shooting his cousin, who had allegedly embezzled money from him, and another passenger in his cousin's car. In 1991 he was given a sentence of 3 to 10 years for attempted murder. While out on bail before sentencing, Walters recorded The Ruler's Back (#29 pop, #18 R&B, 1991), a powerfully ominous record. While in a work-release program, he released Behind Bars (#51 pop, #11 R&B, 1994). Interviews with the rapper from inside prison also opened and closed the 1995 hip-hop documentary The Show.

Walters finished serving his sentence in 1996, after which he appeared on a number of hit singles by other acts, most notably Montell Jordan's "I Like" (#28 pop, #11 R&B, 1996). Rick finally released an album of his own, The Art of Storytelling (#8 pop, #1 R&B), in 1999. The project featured some of the biggest names in rap, everyone from Snoop Dogg and OutKast to Raekwon from the Wu-Tang Clan. It also saw Rick abandoning his thug stance and, on one track, extolling the virtues of monogamy.

The Slits

Formed 1976, London, Eng.
 Ari Up (b. Ariana Forster, 1962, Munich, Ger.), voc.; Kate Korus, gtr.; Suzi Gutsy, bass; Palmolive (b. Paloma Romero, 1955, Spain), drums.

1977—(-Korus; -Gutsy; + Tessa Pollit, bass; + Viv Albertine [b. 1955, Fr.], gtr.) 1978—(-Palmolive; + Budgie [b. Aug. 21, 1957, St. Helens, Eng.], drums) Cut (Island/Antilles) 1981—Return of the Giant Slits (CBS) 1989—The Peel Sessions (Dutch East India) 1997—In the Beginning (Cleopatra).

Brush punk rock's first all-female band of any consequence, the Slits knew nothing about how to play their instruments yet began jamming together anyway—just like many of their male counterparts. Before the band had played a gig, bassist Suzi Gutsy left to join Flicks and guitarist Kate Korus left to form the Modettes (whose "White Mice" was a club favorite and whose cover of the Stones' "Paint It Black" was a minor U.K. hit [#42, 1980]). The Slits made their stage debut in London, opening for the Clash, in March 1977 with new guitarist Viv Albertine and bassist Tessa Pollit, both from Flowers of Romance, Sid Vicious' pre-Sex Pistols backing band.

Lead singer Ari Up was 14 years old at the time of the first Slits show, so the band's ability to perform was somewhat limited. Still, the Slits opened for the Clash on its 1977 "White Riot" tour, with Ari Up making a fashion statement by wearing her panties over her black pants, and leaving numerous combs stuck in her dreads. The Slits did not get a record deal until 1979, by which time original drummer Palmolive had left to help form the Raincoats [see entry], and the Slits had evolved into a white-reggae group. With guest drummer Budgie (formerly with Big in Japan and soon to join Siouxsie and the Banshees) and reggae producer Dennis Bovell, the Slits recorded the dub-influenced Cut, new-wave discos in the U.S. gave some play to the frolicsome track "Typical Girls." Demonstrating the neo-tribalism they were affecting at the time, the three Slits wore nothing but thongs and mud for the Cut album cover photo. For a subsequent U.S. tour, Budgie was replaced by Bruce Smith, of British avant-jazz-rock band the Pop Group, and the band was filled out by British avant-gardist Steve Beresford on keyboards, trumpet, and miscellaneous toy instruments. The Slits broke up at the end of 1981, which saw a second album, Return of the Giant Slits, further emphasizing the group's interest in dark, dubby textures. Up then joined the New Age Steppers, an experimental funk and reggae outfit guided by producer Adrian Sherwood. (Ari's stepfather is Johnny Rotten, whom her mother Nora started dating around the time the Slits first formed and subsequently married.)

Philip (P.F.) Sloan

Born 1946, Los Angeles, CA

1965—Songs of Our Time (Dunhill) 1966—12 More Times

1968—Measure of Pleasure (Atco) 1972—Raised on Records

(Epic, U.K.) 1993—P. F. Sloan Anthology (One Way) 1997—(Still on the) Eve of Destruction (All the Best)

With the Fantastic Baggies: Tell 'Em I'm Surfin' (Imperial).

Though he had his own career as a Dylan-styled singer/songwriter, P.F. Sloan is best known for his songwriting, particularly Barry McGuire's 1965 smash "Eve of Destruction." Prior to "Eve," Sloan and his partner Steve Barri had written surf-rock hits, and even recorded a few of them disguised as the Fantastic Baggies on the album Tell 'Em I'm Surfin'.

In the years that followed, Sloan and Barri worked extensively with the Grass Roots, provided the Turtles with a hit record, "You Baby," and wrote songs for the Searchers, Herman's Hermits, and many others. Because of the groups he was involved with, Sloan's work tended to be dismissed—a situation addressed by Jimmy Webb in his song "P.F. Sloan." Barri remains active as a pop-rock producer. Shortly before his death, ex-Washington Square Bruce Jay Paskow produced an album for Sloan and played guitar in the band that backed the singer for a showcase performance in L.A. in late 1993. Initially issued in Japan, 1997's (Still on the) Eve of Destruction was Sloan's first new album in over 20 years.

Sly and Robbie

Formed 1975, Kingston, Jam.

Sly "Drumbar" Dunbar (b. Lowell Fillmore Dunbar, May 10, 1952, Kingston), drums; Robbie "Basspeare" Shakespeare (b. Sep. 27, 1953, Kingston), bass.

1981—Sly and Robbie Present Taxi (Mango); 60s, 70s, 80s
1982—Sly-Go-Ville 1983—Crucial Reggae Driven by Sly and Robbie 1985—A Dub Experience; Reggae Greats; Language Barrier (Island) 1987—Rhythm Killers 1988—The Summit (RAS) 1989—Silent Assassin (Island) 1990—Two Rhythms Clash (RAS) 1998—Friends (EastWest) 1999—Drum & Bass Strip to the Bone by Howie B (Palm Pictures).

Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare began their careers as teenage session musicians. They teamed up to become one of Jamaica's most celebrated rhythm sections and continued their partnership as bandleaders, producers, and record businessmen.

Dunbar started out in the Yardbrooms, a reggae band of the late '60s that nurtured several of Jamaica's leading instrumentalists. In the early '70s Dunbar was with Skin, Flesh and Bones, who recorded their own records and backed various singers.

Shakespeare studied with Aston "Family Man" Barrett (bassist with the Upsetters, who went on to join the Wailers) and played sessions for Burning Spear, Bunny Wailer, and others. He first played with Dunbar behind Peter Tosh in 1975, and the following year—after Dunbar had returned from touring the U.K. with the Mighty Diamonds—the two formed the Revolutionaires, a leading dub band of the '70s. Concurrently until 1979, Dunbar and Shakespeare led Peter Tosh's band, Word, Sound and Power, in the studio and on tours of North America and Europe. Their sound exemplified the "rockers' riddims" of late-'70s reggae (Shakespeare played a cameo role in Rockers, the 1977 film inspired by that sound.)

In 1978 they set up their own record company, Taxi Productions, formed the Taxi All-Stars from the ashes of the Revolutionaires and Word, Sound and Power, and began working as producers. Taxi's first release was Black Uhuru's "Observe Life." It was followed by numerous albums for Black Uhuru, for established artists like Gregory Isaacs, Max Romeo, Prince Far-I, and Dennis Brown, and for such newer acts as the Tamlins, the Wailing Souls, Jimmy Riley, and General Echo. Their immediately recognizable sound is marked by Robbie's thundering in-the-pocket bass and Sly's innovative use of synthesized drums. In addition, Sly and Robbie (as they are invariably billed) issued their own duo and solo recordings on Taxi. In 1980 they entered into a worldwide distribution agreement with Island Records. Their early-'80s U.S. releases are anthologies of Taxi artists. In the early '80s they worked with such reggae veterans as Jimmy Cliff, Desmond Dekker, and the Paragons, and regularly took their "riddims" on the road with Black Uhuru. They have also worked with artists not usually associated with reggae: Ian Dury, Joan Armatrading, Grace Jones, Manu Dibango, Robert Palmer, Joe Cocker, and even Serge Gainsbourg. Bob Dylan used them as the rhythm section on his 1983 album Infidels. Mick Jagger employed them for his 1985 solo debut, She's the Boss.

On their own, Sly and Robbie hooked up with avant-funk bassist/producer Bill Laswell for 1985's Language Barrier, featuring guest appearances by Afrika Bambaataa and Bob Dylan. Laswell also produced Rhythm Killers, which included contributions from Bootsy Collins and dancehall star Shinehead. Collaborating with rappers KRS-ONE, Queen Latifah, and Young MC, Sly and Robbie produced the dub-rap hybrid, Silent Assassin. Sly and Robbie also produced Maxi Priest's 1988 U.K. #5 hit "Wild World" (a cover of the Cat Stevens' song) and Chaka Demus and Pliers' 1993 Top 10 U.K. single "Tease Me."

In 1998 the duo recorded Friends, an album that featured many of the artists they'd worked with over the years—Keith Richards appeared on a dancehall cover of "(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction," for instance. The following year, they teamed up with producer and remixer Howie B, head of the Pussyfoot label and better known for his work with Tricky and Björk. In keeping with their taste for experimentation, Sly and Robbie performed live in the studio while B simultaneously edited and remixed the tracks.

Sly and the Family Stone

In the late '60s Sly and the Family Stone fused black rhythms and a psychedelic sensibility into a new pop/soul/rock hybrid that drew both white and black audiences. The Family Stone's music predated disco and inspired the many black self-contained bands that emerged in the '70s; along with James Brown, the Family Stone virtually invented '70s funk, and their impact has proven lasting and widespread. Motown producer Norman Whitfield, for example, patterned that label's forays into harder-driving, socially relevant material (such as the Temptations' "Runaway Child" and "Ball of Confusion") on Sly's work. The pioneering precedent of Sly Stone's racial, sexual, and stylistic mix had an undeniably major influence on Prince and Rick James in the '80s, and the male-female vocal interplay of Human League's "Fascination," for example, can be traced back to any of a number of the group's hits. In the '90s he was paid homage by Earth, Wind & Fire on their Heritage album, and in a hit cover of "Everyday People" by rap group Arrested Development.

Sylvester Stewart's family moved from Texas to the San Francisco area in the '50s. At age four, he began singing gospel music and at age 16 made a local hit, "Long Time Away." Stewart studied trumpet, music theory, and composition at Vallejo Junior College and while in school became active on the Bay Area music scene. With his brother, Fred, he formed several short-lived groups, like the Stewart Bros. He was a disc jockey at soul station KSOL, and at Autumn Records he produced records by the Beau Brummels, Bobby Freeman, the Mojo Men, and Grace Slick's first band, the Great Society. He later worked for KDIA.

In 1966 Sly formed a short-lived group called the Stoners, which included female trumpeter Cynthia Robinson. With her he started his next band, Sly and the Family Stone. Sly, Robinson, and Fred Stewart were joined by Larry Graham [see separate entry], Greg Errico, and Jerry Martini, all of whom had studied music and worked in numerous amateur groups. Rosie Stone joined the group soon after working around the Bay Area in 1967; this multiracial band made a strong impression. They recorded their debut single, "I Ain't Got Nobody" b/w "I Can't Turn You Loose," on the local Loadstone label.

The Family Stone's debut LP, A Whole New Thing, flopped. Its followup, Dance to the Music, included the hit title cut (#8 pop, #9 R&B). Life sold fewer copies than their previous albums, but their next release, a double-sided single, "Everyday People" b/w "Stand a Simple Song," was #1 on both the R&B and pop charts. Stand mixed hard-edged politics with the Family's ecstatic dance music. It rose to #13 on the pop chart and contained Sly standards like the title song, "Don't Call Me Nigger Whitey," "Sex Machine," "Somebody's Watching You," and "I Want to Take You Higher" (#3 pop, #24 R&B). Fiery versions of "Dance to the Music" and "Higher," heard on the Woodstock soundtrack album, established the Family Stone as one of the finest live bands of the late '60s.

Singles like "Hot Fun in the Summertime" (#2 pop, #3 R&B) and "Thank You Falettunme Be Mice Elf Agin" b/w "Everybody Is a Star" (#1 pop and R&B), were the band's commercial peak, and the success of Greatest Hits (#2 pop) reflected their immense popularity. The smooth post-doo-wop/pop/soul of "Hot Fun" and the eene funk of "Thank You" demonstrated the band's considerable range. By this time, Stand had been on the charts for more than 80 weeks, and most of the Family's Top 10 singles had gone gold, as had most of their post-Dance to the Music LPs. Jazz trumpeter Miles Davis, who'd been flummoxing critics with electrified "fusion" albums, did it again when he named Sly Stone and Jimi Hendrix as his favorite musicians.

After 1970 Sly became somewhat notorious for arriving late for or missing concerts, and it was generally known that he was suffering from drug problems. The group's turning point came in 1971, when There's a Riot Goin' On went to #1. Its darkly understated sound, violent imagery, and controversial militant stance were a sharp contrast to the optimism of earlier works. From that album came "Family Affair" (#1 pop and R&B), Sly's last across-the-board hit.

By 1972, the Family Stone was growing restless. Key members Larry Graham and drummer Greg Errico left and were replaced by Rusty Allen and Andy Newmark. From Fresh, "If You Want Me to Stay" (#12 pop, #3 R&B) did fairly well, and a blues version of "Que Sera Sera" got some airplay, particularly when rumors of a romance between Sly and Dons Day emerged. Small Talk fared moderately well. It took advertising of Sly's public wedding ceremony to Kathy Silva at Madison Square Garden in 1974 to sell it out. "I Get High on You" (#3 R&B) did respectably, but subsequent albums failed.

Meanwhile, disco had emerged, and in 1979 Epic issued Ten Years Too Soon, a compilation album on which the quirky original rhythm tracks were erased and a disco beat dubbed in. By the mid '70s, stories of drug problems and arrests were part of the Sly Stone legacy. By 1979, he was with Warner Bros., attempting to make the comeback many observers felt would be as natural as James Brown's, given the current interest in and popularity of funk. In 1981, having been cited as a major influence by George Clinton, he appeared on Funkadelic's Electric Spanking of War Babies. He toured with Clinton's P-Funk All-Stars, on his own, and with Bobby Womack in the early '80s. In 1983 Sly was arrested for cocaine possession and entered a rehabilitation program a year later.

In 1986 Stone guested on ex-Time guitarist Jesse Johnson's minor hit "Crazy," which led to a deal with A&M Records. A 1987 single, "Eek-a-Bo-Static," failed to chart, that same year Stone duetted with ex-Motel Martha Davis on "Love & Affection," for the soundtrack of the movie Soul Man. Sly's stalled-out career stopped dead for a time when he was jailed in 1987 for cocaine possession. In 1993 Sly and the Family Stone was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Stone has reportedly been working on a new album since 1995, but as of early 2001 no material has surfaced.

The Small Faces/The Faces

The Small Faces: formed 1965, London, Eng. Steve Marriott (b. Jan. 30, 1947, London; d. Apr. 20, 1991, Arkesden, Eng.), gtr., voc.; Jimmy Winston (b. Ian McLagan solo: 1979—Troublemaker (Mercury) 1981—Bump in the Night.

The Small Faces got their name for two reasons: They were small, under five-feet-six-inches tall, and they were "faces," as in the Who's "I'm the Face," a declaration of Mod-era hipness. When the Small Faces first hit the British singles charts in 1965 with "Whatcha Gonna Do About It?" (recorded six weeks after their formation), they were seen by British youth as East London's answer to West London's Who. Led by Steve Marriott, the Small Faces became as big an attraction in Britain for their Mod clothing as for their basic, raw R&B-inspired music.

Marriott, a former child actor, formed the band with Ronnie Lane, who had already played with several local bands and was writing his own tunes. McLagan was recruited when original keyboardist, Jimmy Winston, left immediately after the Faces' first hit single. Rounding out the lineup was drummer Kenney Jones, who had studied drums but had never played with a professional band. Though Marriott has said that he could barely play guitar at the time, he and Lane began writing songs together. After attracting a following with fevered London club performances and the success of their first single, the Small Faces were signed to Andrew Loog Oldham's Immediate label and appeared frequently in the U.K. Top 10 for the next few years with 1966's "Sha La La La Lee," "Hey Girl," "All or Nothing," and "My Mind's Eye"; 1967's "Itchycoo Park" and "Tin Soldier"; and 1968's "Lazy Sunday." The only one of their early hits to gain any attention in America was "Itchycoo Park" (#16, 1967), a piece of psychedelia that featured one of the earliest uses of studio "phase-shifting" production.

By 1968, the band was becoming frustrated with its image as a singles band. That changed somewhat in 1968, when they released the concept album Ogden's Nur Gone Flake. Still, internal tensions grew, and in 1969 Marriott left to form Humble Pie [see entry]. It seemed a crucial blow at the time, but with the addition of ex-Jeff Beck Group members Rod Stewart and Ronnie Wood the Faces were Small no more. (Literally. Each of the two new members stood a head taller than the remaining, formerly Small, Faces.) The original Small Faces band later reunited, minus Lane and with the addition of Jimmy McCulloch and Rick Wills.

From 1969 to 1975 the Faces worked in the lucrative shadow of Stewart's solo career. Loose and boozy onstage and good-timey on record, the Faces made several arena-circuit U.S. tours playing material from Stewart's solo albums as well as the hits he sang with the group—"Stay With Me" (#17, 1971) and "Cindy Incidentally" (#48, 1973)—while enjoying as wild a lifestyle as possible.

In 1973 Ronnie Lane, an original Small Face, quit and was replaced by ex-Free bassist Tetsu Yamauchi. Lane then started a traveling rock circus, complete with jugglers and fire eaters, called the Passing Show, and recorded four albums with Slim Chance; he also made Rough Mix with Pete Townshend of the Who in 1977. In the late '70s Lane was debilitated by multiple sclerosis.

Meanwhile the Faces were slowly dissolving. Wood officially joined the Rolling Stones in 1976 (after having played on their 1975 tour), and McLagan regularly participated in Stones tours and such projects as the New Barbarians; he also records solo albums and has become a sought-after session hand. Jones, who reunited with the original Small Faces in 1977-78, replaced Keith Moon in the Who in 1978. He formed the Law with Paul Rodgers in the early '90s. Lane moved to the United States. In 1983 he appeared at the ARMS (Action Research Multiple Sclerosis) concerts, which featured Ronnie Wood, Charlie Watts, Jeff Beck, Jimmy Page, Steve Winwood, and others. He died in 1997, ending his long battle with multiple sclerosis. Marriott died in a 1991 fire in his home. At the time of his death, he was discussing the possible re-formation of Humble Pie.

Smash Mouth

Formed 1994, San Jose, CA

Steve Harwell (b. Steven Scott Harwell, Jan. 9, 1967, Santa Clara, CA), voc.; Greg Camp (b. Gregory Dean Camp, Apr. 2, 1967, West Covina, CA), gtr.; Paul DeLisle (b. Paul Gerald DeLisle, June 13, 1963, Exeter, Ont., Can.), bass; Kevin Coleman (b. Kevin John Coleman, Oct. 21, 1965, San Jose), drums.

1997—Fush Yu Mang (Interscope) 1999—Astro Lounge (– Coleman); The East Bay Sessions (Break Through)
2000—(+ Michael Urbano, drums).

San Jose's Smash Mouth was pegged as a one-hit wonder when it scored a #1 Modern Rock hit in 1997 with "Walkin' on the Sun," an unabashedly retro rocker that seemed part novelty surf-rock number and part loving homage to the Zombies. Two years later, it proved its staying power by delivering a second radio and video smash with "All Star."

Frontman Steve Harwell, a former rapper with the group F.O.S. (Freedom of Speech), and childhood friend Kevin Coleman hooked up with guitarist Greg Camp and began writing songs together in 1994. With bassist Paul DeLisle on board, the band started playing around the Bay Area and L.A. and landed one song, "Nervous in the Alley," on regular rotation on San Jose station KOMA in April 1996. Further exposure at the station's annual summer festival helped spark major label interest, leading to a deal with Interscope in 1997 just in time to release its debut album, Fush Yu Mang (the name came from an Al Pacino slur in Scarface). The album climbed to #19 and went double platinum behind "Walkin' on the Sun," and a second retro-leaning single, a cover of War's "Why Can't We Be Friends?" The followup album, Astro Lounge (#6, 1999), fared even better—selling 3 million copies and yielding the #4 hit "All Star."

At the beginning of the band's 1999 tour in support of Astro Lounge, Coleman left due to back problems and was eventually replaced on drums by Michael Urbano. Smash Mouth was slated to release its third album (not counting 1999's early-recordings collection, The East Bay Sessions), in 2001.

Smashing Pumpkins

Formed 1989, Chicago, IL

Billy Corgan (b. Mar. 17, 1967, Chicago), gtr., voc.; James Iha (b. Mar. 26, 1968, Elk Grove, IL), gtr.; D'Arcy Wretzky (b. May 1, 1968, South Haven, MI), bass; Jimmy Chamberlin (b. June 10, 1964, Joliet, IL), drums.

1991—Gish (Caroline) 1993—Siamese Dreams (Virgin)
1994—Pisces Iscariot 1995—Mellon Collie and the Infinite Sadness 1996—(– Chamberlin) The Aeroplane Flies High
1998—Adore 1999—(+ Chamberlin; – Wretzky) 2000—MACHINA/the machines of god (+ Melissa Auf der Maur [b. Mar. 17, 1972, Montreal, Can.], bass).

James Iha solo: 1998—Let It Come Down (Virgin).

Smashing Pumpkins' music is distinguished from most other grunge rock in its incorporation of the high production values, ornate arrangements, and melodicism of such '70s bands as Boston and ELO.

Corgan, whose father is a guitarist, grew up in a Chicago suburb and moved to Florida at age 19 as leader of a goth band, the Marked. Returning home, he formed Smashing Pumpkins, at first simply a duo (Wretzky, Corgan, and a drum machine). A local-label single, "I Am One," led to the release of "Tristessa" on Sub Pop, in 1991, the band's debut album, with Butch Vig producing, became a college-radio favorite, eventually going gold in 1994. The major-label followup fared even better, debuting at #10 in 1993 and making the group alternative-rock stars.

Emphasizing both the virtuosic interplay of Corgan and Jimmy Chamberlin and Corgan's confessional lyrics, the Pumpkins employed a Mellotron, strings, and multiple guitar parts on Siamese Dreams, and continued to edge closer to progressive rock than to punk or grunge. Pisces Iscariot (1994) is a compilation of earlier recordings. Corgan indulged his prog-rock jones full-on with Mellon Collie and the Infinite Sadness (#1, 1995), a double-disc set that spawned a handful of hit singles, including "1979" (#12, 1996). The Aeroplane Flies High (#42, 1996) was a 33-song box set compiling Mellon Collie's singles along with B sides and cover songs.

During a 1996 summer tour, Chamberlin and touring keyboardist Jonathan Melvoin both overdosed on heroin at the same time; Melvoin died and Chamberlin was arrested and subsequently fired. Filter's Matt Walker filled his seat for the remainder of the tour, but the band's quietly intimate next album, Adore (#2, 1998), was recorded using session percussionists and drum machines. A theater tour promoting the album raised more than $2.7 million for various charities, but when Adore stalled at platinum it was considered a commercial failure in the wake of the band's previous sales. Chamberlin was brought back on board in 1999, and MACHINA/the machines of god (#3, 2000) represented a return to hook-laden guitar rock. Wretzky quit shortly before the album's release, and was replaced for the ensuing tour by Melissa Auf der Maur of Hole. Sales of MACHINA proved no better than Adore's, and during a radio interview on May 23, 2000, Corgan announced that the band would break up at the end of the year.

As the Pumpkins finished their tour commitments through the end of 2000, Corgan revealed plans for one final album of unreleased material from the band. He also hinted at a solo career, an avenue James Iha had already tested via Let It Come Down (#64), his 1998 album of singer/songwriter-style love songs. The Smashing Pumpkins officially broke up on December 2, 2000, following a four-hour-long show at Chicago's Cabaret Metro, where the band had debuted in October 1988. In early 2001 the band offered the album Machina/Friends and Enemies of Modern Music on its official Web site.

Bessie Smith

Born Apr. 15, 1894, Chattanooga, TN; died Sep. 26, 1937, Clarksdale, MI

1970—Any Woman's Blues 1971—The World's Greatest Blues Singer (Columbia); Empty Bed Blues; The Empress 1972—Nobody's Blues But Mine 1989—Bessie Smith—The Collection 1991—The Complete Recordings, vol. 1; The Complete Recordings, vol. 2 1992—The Complete Recordings, vol. 3

1993—The Complete Recordings, vol. 4 1996—The Complete Recordings, vol. 5

Bessie Smith is generally considered the greatest and most influential American woman blues singer. She was also the preeminent black performer of her time, a singer/dancer/actress whose later performances (in which she was billed as the Queen of All Torch Singers) revealed a stylistic versatility that promised continued success in other genres, including swing. It is, however, her blues recordings upon which her legend rests and her influence has spread, speaking powerfully and eloquently of satisfaction and defeat, hope and despair.

Smith came by her intimate acquaintance with hard times honestly. One of seven children born to a poor family, she had seen both her parents and two siblings buried before she reached the age of nine. Like many poor black youngsters of her time, she saw little opportunity, and so at age 16 she joined her older brother Clarence in the Moses Stokes Company, one of many traveling vaudeville-type shows popular then. It was while working with this show that Smith first met her mentor and stylistic predecessor, Gertrude "Ma" Rainey. While the literature is rich with accounts of Rainey kidnapping Smith or the pair's alleged rivalry, in fact they were friends.

Smith left the Stokes company within a year of joining and began to perform as a solo act or with any of a number of other touring groups. After working a successful duo act with singer Hazel Greene, Smith began pursuing her solo career in earnest. Details of her life during World War I are sketchy. It is known that she married Earl Love; she later claimed he died in the war. In the early '20s she moved north, to Philadelphia, where she married Jack Gee, in June 1923. Around that same time Columbia Records released her first and most successful record, "Gulf Coast Blues" b/w "Down Hearted Blues." Selling over 780,000 copies within six months, the record launched not only Smith but Columbia's soon burgeoning "race" records division.

For the rest of the decade Smith toured the country, often in a luxurious, custom-designed railway car. The feisty yet insecure Smith's own life was as passionate and tumultuous as some of her darker recordings. Smith had a violent temper and an appetite for extramarital liaisons (with men and women) and liquor. Chris Albertson's acclaimed biography Bessie includes dozens of anecdotes, including one of her beating her husband's mistress unconscious on a Harlem street. Yet her stubborn independence served her well; once in North Carolina when she learned that a group of Ku Klux Klansmen were standing outside her show tent and beginning to pull up stakes, she charged outside and shouted, "You just pick up them sheets and run!" And they did.

Smith recorded 160 songs for Columbia, many of which she wrote or cowrote. Among the musicians she recorded with were Louis Armstrong, who joined her on the 1925 classic "Saint Louis Blues," and Fletcher Henderson. In 1929 she starred and sang in a 17-minute short film entitled St. Louis Blues, in which she played a woman wronged by a two-timing lover. It is the only extant footage of Smith. That same year, the stock market crash and the rise of "talkies" sent the black vaudeville circuit reeling. The show business milieu in which Smith had thrived was dying. Columbia reduced her recording fee from $200 a side to $125, by 1931 she had no recording contract at all.

Smith revamped her style and her repertoire, trading her traditional feathered and beaded costumes for elegantly understated gowns and pearls. Contemporary standards, like "Tea for Two" and "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," were part of her show. She had last recorded in 1933, but in 1937 there were plans for new recording sessions and talk of her appearing in a film. Smith seemed on the verge of a commercial comeback when she was critically injured in a Mississippi car accident. Erroneous reports that Smith died because she was refused treatment at a white hospital endured for decades, thanks in part to popular works of literature, such as Edward Albee's play The Death of Bessie Smith and various writings about Smith and her music. In fact, Smith was severely injured when the car in which she was riding hit a parked truck on a darkened road. Her injuries included a nearly severed arm and internal damage to the chest and head. Despite being transported to the local black hospital, where her arm was amputated and she was transfused, Smith died within hours. Smith's funeral was among the most lavish and well attended of its time. In Philadelphia an estimated 10,000 mourners paid tribute to the singer as she lay in state; 7,000 stood outside as her gold-trimmed metallic, velvet-lined coffin was placed in the hearse. Despite her costly funeral, Smith's grave remained unmarked for over 30 years. Janis Joplin and Juanita Green, a woman who had worked for Smith, paid for the stone, which was unveiled in August 1970. It read: "The Greatest Blues Singer in the World Will Never Stop Singing."

Elliott Smith

Born Steven Paul Smith, Aug. 6, 1969, Omaha, NE
 1994—Roman Candle (Cavity Search) 1995—Elliott Smith (Kill Rock Stars) 1997—Either/Or; Good Will Hunting soundtrack (Capitol) 1998—XO (DreamWorks) 2000—Figure 8.
 With Heatmiser: 1993—Dead Air (Frontier) 1994—Cop and Speeder 1996—Mic City Sons (Caroline).

After years of playing on the indie circuit, both as a solo artist and as the cofrontman for the Portland, Oregon-based distorted-guitar rock band Heatmiser, Elliott Smith suddenly found himself in the national and worldwide spotlight in 1998 when his song "Miss Misery" from the soundtrack to Gus Van Sant's film Good Will Hunting was nominated for an Academy Award. Smith lost to Celine Dion's inescapable Titanic theme, "My Heart Will Go On," but came away from the experience with a major label recording deal with DreamWorks Records (which had signed him shortly before the Oscar telecast).

Smith spent the bulk of his early childhood with his mother and stepfather in Dallas, Texas, before moving to Portland, Oregon, to live with his father as a teenager. After attending college in New Hampshire (where he studied political philosophy), Smith returned to Portland and began playing with Heatmiser. The band recorded three albums, beginning with 1993's Dead Air, while Smith simultaneously recorded as a solo artist. His three sparsely recorded, mostly acoustic independent albums, 1994's Roman Candle, 1995's Elliott Smith, and 1997's Either/Or, established Smith as an introspective singer/songwriter in the Nick Drake vein, but with a particular knack for disarmingly catchy, Beatlesque melodies. His six songs featured on the Good Will Hunting soundtrack (#91, 1998) continued in this direction, but both his 1998 DreamWorks debut, XO (#104), and its followup, Figure 8 (#99, 2000), expanded on his patented brand of melodic gloom pop, as Smith began experimenting with densely layered studio soundscapes reminiscent of Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band and the Beach Boys' Pet Sounds.

Huey "Piano" Smith

Born Jan. 26, 1934, New Orleans, LA
 1959—Havin' a Good Time (Ace) 1961—For Dancing
 1962—Twass the Night Before Christmas 1963—Rock 'n' Roll Revival 1978—Rockin' Pneumonia.

New Orleans R&B pianist Huey Smith, together with his vocal group, the Clowns, recorded some of the R&B classics of the '50s. Smith began playing professionally at age 15 with Guitar Slim. In the early '50s, after a stint with Earl King, he played sessions for Lloyd Price, Smiley Lewis, and Little Richard. Meanwhile, he began writing songs and recording for Savoy. A weak singer, he was unsuccessful as a soloist. Consequently, he recruited the Clowns, originally Junior Gordon, Dave Dixon, and Roland Cook. When he signed with Ace they included Bobby Marchan, "Scarface" John Williams, and James Black. They had their first hit, "Rockin' Pneumonia and the Boogie Woogie Flu" (#52 pop, #9 R&B, 1957). A gold record, it was followed by the even bigger "Don't You Just Know It" (#9 pop, #4 R&B, 1958), with Gern Hall, Eugene Francis, and Billy Roosevelt singing behind Marchan.

Famous for their stage shenanigans and comic dancing, Smith and the Clowns were a popular live attraction throughout the U.S., but they had no more big hits after "Don't You Just Know It." Their best known record is probably one not credited to the group: Frankie Ford's 1959 hit "Sea Cruise," with Ford's vocals over a Clowns backup. The Clowns' own "Don't You Know Yockomo" reached #56 in 1959 before Marchan left the Clowns—to be replaced by Curley Moore—and Smith moved to Imperial. He returned to Ace with "Pop-Eye" (#51 pop, 1962) before the Clowns broke up.

Smith continued to work through the rest of the decade, but his success was local at best. He formed his own label, Pity-Pat, and recorded as the Hueys and Shindig Smith and the Soulshakers. In the early '70s he retired from show-business to become a Jehovah's Witness. He made a rare appearance in 2000 when he was honored at the Rhythm & Blues Foundation Pioneer Awards.

Patti Smith

Born Dec. 30, 1946, Chicago, IL
 1975—Horses (Arista) 1976—Radio Ethiopia 1978—
Easter 1979—Wave 1988—Dream of Life 1996—*Gone
 Again* 1997—Peace and Noise 2000—Gung Ho.

In the early '70s, painter-turned-poet and sometime playwright (Cowboy Mouth, with Sam Shepard) Patti Smith began to set her poems to the electric guitar backup of erstwhile rock writer Lenny Kaye. By the end of the decade, she had proved remarkably influential, releasing what may be the first punk-rock record (the independent 1974 single "Hey Joe" b/w "Piss Factory") and claiming the rock-musician-as-shaman role previously reserved by males. After a nine-year hiatus, Smith returned to recording with the 1988 album Dream of Life, the work of a more mellow, but still rebellious songwriter. Another eight years would pass before her second artistic comeback, marked by a trio of acclaimed albums released in quick succession, which found her fighting her way out of a period of intense personal grief stemming from the loss of several of the most important people in her life.

Smith, who grew up in Pitman, New Jersey, first began performing her poetry backed by Kaye and pianist Richard Sohl in 1971. Along with Television, she helped put New York's punk-rock landmark CBGB on the map. As her music grew toward rock & roll, she enlisted Ivan Kral on guitar and Jay Dee Daugherty on drums. This lineup recorded Horses (#47, 1975), produced by John Cale, an original mixture of exhortatory rock & roll ("Gloria," "Land of 1000 Dances"), Smith's poetry, vocal mannequins inspired by Mick Jagger and Jim Morrison, and the band's energetically rudimentary playing. Aerosmith producer Jack Douglas oversaw the Patti Smith Group's second album, Radio Ethiopia (#122, 1976), and the result was a more bombastic guitar-heavy record, tempered by the title cut, the height of Smith's improvised free rock.

A fall from a Florida stage hospitalized Smith with neck injuries in early 1977, during which time she wrote her fourth book of poetry, Babel (Seventh Heaven, Witt, and Kodak preceding it). When she was able to perform again, the result was her first Top 20 LP, Easter (#20, 1978), produced by Jimmy Iovine, and her only hit single, "Because the Night" (#13, 1978), written by Bruce Springsteen and revised by Smith. She then began her withdrawal from rock & roll—Wave (#18, 1979) was overtly religious. Soon after its release, Smith moved to Detroit to live with her new husband, ex-MC5 guitarist Fred "Sonic" Smith, and except for rare local appearances, dropped out of the music scene altogether. She and Smith, who died in late 1994, had two children together.

After the breakup of the Patti Smith Group, Sohl remained close to Smith, and Daugherty played with a variety of people, from folkies like the Roches and Willie Nile to Tom Verlaine, the Waterboys, and the Church. Ivan Kral put in a stint with Iggy Pop (on the LP Soldier). Lenny Kaye led several bands, beginning with the Lenny Kaye Connection, and produced such artists as Suzanne Vega.

In 1988 Smith's comeback album, Dream of Life (#65), featured her husband (who coproduced the album with Iovine), Daugherty, and Sohl. Its songs included a call-to-arms, "People Have the Power," which got some radio airplay, as well as lullabies for her children. Smith did not tour behind the album, but five years later, on a hot summer night in 1993, she made a rare appearance at Central Park's Summerstage, reading her poetry (including "Piss Factory") and singing a few songs a cappella. She dedicated her performance to two close friends who'd recently died, photographer Robert Mapplethorpe and Richard Sohl. In 1994 W.W. Norton published a book of Smith's poetry, Early Work: 1970-1979. She was also at work on a new album, but withdrew from it when her husband died of a heart attack at age 45. A month later, her younger brother (and former road manager), Todd, also died of a heart attack.

Determined to carry on as a tribute to the encouragement her husband and brother had shown her before their passing, Smith performed a string of opening dates with Bob Dylan in late 1995 and issued the intensely personal Gone Again in 1996. The album—which featured Kaye, Daugherty, and new band members Tony Shanahan on bass and Oliver Ray on guitar as well as Jeff Buckley, John Cale, and Television's Tom Verlaine—offered a potent mix of songs about mourning and rebirth, reflecting Smith's belief that the beauty of life survives death. Highlights included the title track and the rocker "Summer Cannibals," both cowritten with her husband, and "About a Boy," a bitter-sweet paean to the late Kurt Cobain of Nirvana. The same year saw the release of The Coral Sea, her epic prose poem dedicated to Mapplethorpe, as well as her vocal turn on the song "New Test Leper" from R.E.M.'s New Adventures in Hi-Fi.

Armed with the basic guitar chords her husband taught her shortly before his death, Smith continued to write new songs at a steady pace, releasing Peace and Noise in 1997 and Gung Ho three years later. Both albums found her expanding her focus beyond personal mourning to political reflections on subjects ranging from the Vietnam War to the Heaven's Gate cult and AIDS to American slavery. Gung Ho featured guest turns by Michael Stipe and Smith's teenage son Jackson, who played guitar on the song "Persuasion."

In 1998 Doubleday published a comprehensive collection of Smith's lyrics, Patti Smith Complete Lyrics, Reflections & Notes for the Future.

Will Smith/D.J. Jazzy Jeff and the Fresh Prince

Born Willard Christopher Smith Jr., Sep. 25, 1968, Philadelphia, PA

1997—Big Willie Style (Columbia) 1999—Willennium.

D.J. Jazzy Jeff and the Fresh Prince, formed 1986, Philadelphia, PA: Smith (as Fresh Prince), voc.; Jazzy Jeff (b. Jeff Townes, Jan. 22, 1965, Philadelphia), DJ.

1987—Rock the House (Jive/RCA) 1988—He's the D.J., I'm the Rapper 1989—And in This Corner... 1991—Homebase 1993—Code Red 1998—Greatest Hits.

With his clean-cut image and playful, lighthearted approach to rapping, Will "Fresh Prince" Smith had little trouble winning over a multiracial mainstream audience—or parlaying that mass appeal into a successful TV sitcom, The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air, and a series of movies that would make him a full-fledged Hollywood star.

Jeff (D.J. Jazzy Jeff) Townes, who began spinning records at age 10, met Smith in 1986. The two joined forces immediately, although their professional future was soon threatened when Smith graduated high school with a scholarship to attend the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The rapper chose a recording career over MIT, though, and he and Townes released their debut album, Rock the House (#83 pop, #24 R&B), in 1987. It included the duo's third single, "Girls Ain't Nothing But Trouble" (#57 pop, #81 R&B, 1988). Its innocence would set the mold for what some critics deemed their "bubblegum rap" style. Their breakthrough came the following year, with the double LP He's the D.J., I'm the Rapper (#4 pop, #5 R&B, 1988), one of the first rap albums to go triple platinum. This sophomore effort contained the #12 pop, #10 R&B hit, 1988's "Parents Just Don't Understand," a teenager's lament about, among other things, shopping with Mom. It won the first Grammy offered in the Best Rap Performance category in 1988. The album also featured "A Nightmare on My Street" (#15 pop, #9 R&B, 1988).

In 1991 the duo had its biggest hit with "Summertime," a wistful ode to good times in the 'hood that went to #4 pop, #1 R&B, and earned them another Grammy. It was the first single from Homebase (#12 pop, #5 R&B, 1991), which came out the year after the Fresh Prince TV show premiered, casting Smith as a Philadelphia homeboy sent to live with wealthy Bel-Air relatives. That show's popularity (it lasted six seasons), as well as Smith's 1993 feature role in the film version of John Guare's dramatic play Six Degrees of Separation, seemed to threaten the rapper's musical partnership with Townes. The duo released the commercially disappointing Code Red (#64 pop, #39 R&B) in 1993; a greatest-hits compilation was released in 1998, but by that time, Smith was fully ensconced in his new career as a movie star.

After surprising audiences with his dramatic role in Six Degrees, Smith proved adept in other genres: buddy-comedy (1995's Bad Boys with Martin Lawrence), action-adventure (the 1996 smash Independence Day), sci-fi humor (1997's even bigger hit Men in Black), conspiracy thriller (1998's Enemy of the State), set pieces both wacky (1999's Wild Wild West) and pop-spiritual (2000's The Legend of Bagger Vance). He played Muhammad Ali in the 2001 bio-pic Power and Grace.

Not one to limit his talents, Smith returned to recording with the title song for Men in Black—which won a Grammy—followed by his first solo album, Big Willie Style, in 1997. (These releases marked the first time Smith recorded under his actual name rather than as the Fresh Prince.) With Townes producing and engineering a handful of tracks, Big Willie Style went multiplatinum and to #10 on the pop album chart (#9 R&B), thanks to the hits "Gettin' Jiggy Wit It" (#1 pop, #6 R&B, 1998, and another Grammy winner), "Just the Two of Us," the 1981 Grover Washington Jr.–Bill Withers song remade as a love song to Smith's young son Trey (#20 pop, #17 R&B, 1998), and "Miami" (#17 pop, #73 R&B, 1998). After his 1999 theme song for Wild Wild West went to #1 pop and #3 R&B, the double-platinum Willennium (#5 pop, #8 R&B, 1999) followed, featuring guest appearances by a posse of harder-edged rappers and R&B singers, including Smith's Fresh Prince of Bel-Air costar Tatyana Ali. This album was coproduced by Townes, who had established A Touch of Jazz Studios in Philadelphia, where he worked with artists such as Nuyorican Soul, Kenny Lattimore, and Jill Scott.

Smith also had a side business, Will Smith Enterprises, for which he developed music and TV projects for selective clients, including singer Ali. Although divorced from Trey's mother, Sheree Zampino, Smith appeared in the media as a devoted family man who spoke glowingly of his parents, siblings, son, and eventually, his second wife, actress Jada Pinkett Smith (whom he married New Year's Eve 1997), and the two children he had with her, son Jaden and daughter Willow.

The Smithereens

Formed 1980, Carteret, NJ

Jim Babjak (b. Nov. 17, 1957, Salzburg, Austria), gr.; Dennis Diken (b. Feb. 25, 1957, Belleville, NJ), drums; Pat DiNizio (b. Oct. 12, 1955, Plainfield, NJ), gr., voc.; Mike Mesaros (b. Dec. 11, 1957, Trenton, NJ), bass.

1980—Girls About Town EP (D-Tone) 1983—Beauty and Sadness EP (Little Ricky) 1987—The Smithereens Live EP (Restless); Especially for You (Enigma) 1988—Green Thoughts 1989—11 (Capitol) 1991—Blow Up 1994—A Date With the Smithereens (RCA) 1995—Blown to Smithereens (Capitol); Attack of the Smithereens 1999—God Save the Smithereens (Koch).

Pat DiNizio solo: 1997—Songs and Sounds (Velvet).

The Smithereens' brand of hard-edged pop songs is reminiscent of the '60s British Invasion, but the mordant sensibility of singer/songwriter Pat DiNizio gives the band a decidedly modern point of view.

The band was formed in 1980 when DiNizio answered an ad placed in a music paper by high-school friends Babjak, Diken, and Mesaros. They released an EP that year, Girls

About Town, containing three originals and a cover of the Beach Boys' "Girl Don't Tell Me." Neither that record nor a 1983 release, Beauty and Sadness, helped the Smithereens get signed, so they supported themselves playing covers and backing veteran acts the Beau Brummels and Otis Blackwell.

In 1985 DiNizio sent a tape to Enigma Records. The tape, with only the band's name and DiNizio's name and phone number to identify it, fell into the hands of Scott Vanderbilt, who had become a fan while a college DJ. He signed the band and the next year released Especially for You (#51), with guest appearances by Marshall Crenshaw (under the name Jerome Jerome) and Suzanne Vega. Its single, "Blood and Roses," was featured in a grade-B slasher film, Dangerously Close; the film's production company financed a video, which gained airplay on MTV.

The Smithereens toured extensively, the work paid off with 11 (#41, 1989), their most commercially successful album, and "A Girl Like You" (#38, 1989), the band's only Top 40 single. In 1994 the Smithereens moved to RCA for A Date With the Smithereens. The album reunited the band with producer Don Dixon (who produced the group's first two albums) and featured Lou Reed's guitar playing on two songs. The grunge movement of the early- to mid-'90s rendered the Smithereens' power-pop sound dated, and the band followed Date with two compilation albums—a best-of collection, Blown to Smithereens, and a set of rare tracks, Attack of the Smithereens.

In 1997 DiNizio released a solo album, Songs and Sounds, in which he expanded on his band's punk-inspired pop by adding a touch of jazz. He regrouped with the Smithereens in 1999, releasing God Save the Smithereens, which featured more of the band's familiar catchy pop. In 2000 DiNizio turned his attention to politics, running an unsuccessful campaign in New Jersey for the U.S. Senate as a Reform Party candidate.

The Smiths/Morrissey

Formed 1982, Manchester, Eng.

Morrissey (b. Stephen Patrick Morrissey, May 22, 1959, Manchester), voc.; Johnny Marr (b. John Maher, Oct. 31, 1963, Manchester), gtr.; Mike Joyce (b. June 1, 1963, Manchester), drums; Andy Rourke (b. 1963, Manchester), bass.

1984—The Smiths (Sire); Hatful of Hollow (Rough Trade, U.K.)

1985—Meat Is Murder (Sire) (+ Craig Gannon, gtr.) 1986—The Queen Is Dead 1987—(—Gannon) Louder Than Bombs; Strangeways, Here We Come 1988—Rank; Peel Sessions (Dutch East) 1992—Best . . . I (Sire/Reprise); Best . . . II 1995—Singles (Reprise).

Morrissey: 1988—Viva Hate (Sire/Reprise) 1990—Bona Drag 1991—Kill Uncle 1992—Your Arsenal 1994—Vauxhall and I 1995—Southpaw Grammar (RCA Victor) 1997—Maladjusted (PolyGram) 1998—My Early Buxley Years (Reprise).

Articulate, broodingly charismatic frontman Morrissey and supple guitarist Johnny Marr made the Smiths one of the most significant English bands of the '80s. An avowed celibate whose lyrics disclosed a sexually ambiguous point of view, Morrissey was given to controversy, whether advocating animal rights or trashing Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and disco. The band's trancelike, guitar-based music angrily rebutted such British synthesizer pop as the Human League and Thompson Twins.

Morrissey (originally of the Smiths)

Son of a hospital porter and a librarian, Morrissey first expressed himself by writing; unemployed in the late '70s, he wrote a book on James Dean and another on the New York Dolls, whose English fan club he headed. He also played briefly in a band called the Nosebleeds. Veteran of such cult groups as Sister Ray and Freaky Party, Marr first met Morrissey at a 1979 Patti Smith concert, and by 1982 they decided to form a band. The pair eventually enlisted drummer Mike Joyce and bassist Andy Rourke for an eponymous debut that, on U.K. indie label Rough Trade (on Sire in the U.S.), entered the British chart at #2. An earlier single, "Hand in Glove," was then recorded with Morrissey's favorite female singer, '60s British pop idol Sandie Shaw, and scored #27 in the U.K. This coup, along with The Smiths' "Heaven Knows I'm Miserable Now" (#10 U.K., 1984), established the band.

The meteoric rise continued with Meat Is Murder debuting at #1 on the British chart, the group also caused a stir with Morrissey's stage presence, the singer wearing a garland of gladioli in tribute to Oscar Wilde, a headdress in homage to '50s balladeer Johnnie Ray, and a ducktail haircut patterned after English rocker Billy Fury. Some critics sniped that the group's lyrics referred to child molesting, and Morrissey offended others with sharp comments about the all-star Band Aid benefit single for Ethiopian famine relief. His champions, though, hailed his oblique, angst-driven songs as latter-day examples of Ray Davies-styled social commentary. With ex-Aztec Camera guitarist Craig Gannon added, 1986's The Queen Is Dead (#2 U.K.) fared handsomely, but a disappointing U.S. tour showed that the Smiths had yet to penetrate the American mainstream. Later that year Johnny Marr was involved in a serious car accident, during his recovery, Gannon was fired. A single, "Sheila Take a Bow," became a Top 10 U.K. hit in mid-1987, but later that year, with Marr deeming their musical approach exhausted, the Smiths disbanded. Strangeways, Here We Come and the live Rank were released posthumously.

Despite his prolific output—Viva Hate, Bona Drag, Kill Uncle, Your Arsenal, and Vauxhall and I—Morrissey's solo career hasn't quite matched his success with the Smiths, although the singer has attracted a rabid cult following in the U.S. He released 1995's Southpaw Grammar (#66) and 1997's Maladjusted (#61) to an ambivalent critical response. My Early Burglary Years was a collection of B sides and rarities. But a tour in 2000 enjoyed sell-out crowds without a new album or even a record deal.

Besides playing sessions with Bryan Ferry, Talking Heads, the Pet Shop Boys, and Billy Bragg, Marr served for a while with the Pretenders, The The, and Electronic without ever finding a permanent venue. Marr's low profile led to a reputation as British rock's most talented underachiever. But he reemerged in 2000 for the first time at the front of his own band, the Healers, which included former Dub Pistol keyboardist Lee Spender, bassist Alonza Bevan from Kula Shaker, and drummer Zak Starkey (son of Ringo Starr).

Rourke and Joyce played with the Adult Net before backing up Sinéad O'Connor. Joyce eventually joined the reformed Buzzcocks. In 1996 they both sued Marr and Morrissey, complaining over the unequal sharing of Smiths earnings; Rourke settled out of court, but in 1998 Joyce won his case, with a British judge calling Morrissey "devious, truculent, and unreliable." A reunion is not expected.

Patty Smyth/Scandal

Born June 26, 1957, New York, NY

With Scandal, formed 1982, New York; Patty Smyth, voc.; Zack Smith (b. Westport, CT), gtr.; Ivan Elias, bass; Benji King, kybds.; Frankie Laroocca, drums.

1982—Scandal EP (Columbia) 1984—The Warrior.

Patty Smyth solo: 1987—Never Enough (Columbia) 1992—

Patty Smyth (MCA) 1998—Greatest Hits—Featuring Scandal (Sony).

Patty Smyth rose to fame as the lead singer of Scandal, a hard-pop outfit that proved the perfect vehicle for Smyth's husky, agile voice and her sexy, tough-girl image. While the band's career was short-lived, Smyth reemerged in the late '80s and early '90s as a successful solo artist. The daughter of a Greenwich Village club-owner mother, Smyth grew up in New York City, and in her teens fronted a band called Patty and the Planets. Supporting herself as a waitress, she hooked up in 1982 with guitarist Zack Smith, Scandal's founder and principal songwriter.

With the support of such singles as "Goodbye to You" (#65, 1982) and "Love's Got a Line on You" (#59, 1983), Scandal became the best-selling EP in Columbia Records' history. Smith left the band after its release, but not before cowriting material (with Smyth writing some of the lyrics) for a follow-up album, The Warrior (#17, 1984), which yielded a #7 pop hit with its title track. Scandal split up not long after. Drummer Frankie Laroocca became head of A&R at Epic Records. Smyth married punk pioneer Richard Hell; the two had a daughter, Ruby, and later divorced.

In 1987 came Smyth's solo debut, Never Enough (#66, 1987), but it wasn't until five years later that, after moving to MCA, the singer reemerged in the Top 10 with "Sometimes Love Just Ain't Enough," a #2 duet ballad with Don Henley featured on her self-titled gold 1992 album. A song she cowrote and performed for the movie Junior, "Look What Love Has Done," was nominated for a 1994 Academy Award.

In the latter half of the '90s Smyth began dating tennis-pro-turned-commentator John McEnroe; the couple had a daughter, Anna, in late 1995. Smyth and McEnroe married in 1997, and another daughter, Ava, was born in 1999. While she put her own career on the back burner, Smyth inspired her husband to indulge his own musical aspirations. McEnroe plays guitar in a group called the Johnny Smyth Band. More a hobby than a career change, McEnroe's band plays about 35 gigs a year, and occasionally Smyth joins him onstage to sing.

Snap!

Formed ca. 1989, Pittsburgh, PA

Turbo B. (b. Durrone Maurice Butler, Apr. 30, 1967, Pittsburgh), voc.; Penny Ford (b. Nov. 6, 1964, Cincinnati, OH), voc.; Jackie Harris (b. Jacqueline Arlissa Harris, Pittsburgh), voc.

voc.) 1995—Welcome to Tomorrow 1997—Attack! The Best of Snap!, Remixes & All.

Penny Ford solo: 1993—Penny Ford (Columbia).

Created as the project of two German producers, the dance-pop collective Snap! climbed the American chart in 1990 with "The Power," a fierce, relentless track that proved as successful on Top 40 radio as it did in clubs. Like the more visible C + C Music Factory, Snap! was an early-'90s success story manufactured by behind-the-scenes studio wizards but distinguished equally by the sizzling contributions of a succession of female vocalists.

Around 1989, the Frankfurt-based production team (Luca Anzilotti and [Michael] Muenzing recruited American rapper Turbo B. and soul singer Penny Ford, who had previously been a member of the S.O.S. band. Crediting themselves as Benito Benites and John "Virgo" Garrett III, Anzilotti and Muenzing recorded "The Power," featuring Turbo B. and Ford as Snap!, for Germany's Logic Records. (Turbo B.'s cousin, singer Jackie Harris, was also credited as a member of Snap!, and filled in for Ford on some early media appearances.) The band was picked up by Arista in 1990, and its single topped the British chart and went almost as far in the U.S. (#2 pop, #4 R&B). Five additional Top 10 hits followed in England, with Ford singing on all of them. Ford then opted for a solo career, so Thea Austin took her place on Snap!'s 1992 sophomore effort, The Madman's Return. The album's first single, "Colour of Love," flopped, at which point Turbo B. quit the group, citing creative frustration. But a second single, "Rhythm Is a Dancer," reached #5 on the American pop chart.

Niki Haris, formerly a backup singer for Madonna, replaced Austin for Snap!'s next single, "Exterminate," which entered the U.K. Top 5 in 1993. That same year, Penny Ford released a self-titled album on Columbia while Anzilotti and Muenzing began work on a third Snap! album with Haris. By the time Welcome to Tomorrow was released in 1995, Haris had been replaced by former Paula Abdul backup vocalist Paula Brown (a.k.a. Paula Summer).

Snoop Doggy Dogg/Snoop Dogg

 1993—Doggystyle (Death Row) 1996—Tha Doggfather
 1998—Da Game Is to Be Sold, Not to Be Told (No Limit)

 Death Row); Tha Last Meal (No Limit).
 With Tha Eastsidaz: 2000—*Snoop Dogg Presents tha
 Eastsidaz* (Dogg House)

Rapper Snoop Doggy Dogg, with his lazy drawl and gangster persona, became one of the most commercially successful artists in all of rap. Alongside artists like N.W.A, Tupac, and Ice-T, Snoop epitomizes West Coast hip-hop. Debuting in 1992 as a collaborator on Dr. Dre's 1992 multiplatinum The Chronic, Snoop followed soon after with the release of Doggystyle, which set a new record as the then-biggest selling rap album.

Calvin Broadus (nicknamed Snoop by his mother) was born and raised on the tough streets of Long Beach, California. Shortly after graduating from high school, Snoop was arrested on a cocaine charge; he spent the next three years in and out of jail. In 1990 Snoop began to record underground tapes with a friend, rapper Warren G, who subsequently gave a cassette to his brother, N.W.A's Dr. Dre. Dre was impressed with what he heard, and Dre and Snoop began working together on the single "Deep Cover" for a movie of the same name. By the time Dre started recording The Chronic, Snoop was his right-hand man, performing on more than half of the album. Buoyed by the acclaim received for his contributions, Snoop entered the studio to record his own album for Dre's Death Row Records. The result, the Dr. Dre-produced Doggystyle, was one of the most anticipated rap records in history. With beats straight out of the P-Funk tradition, songs like "What's My Name?" (#8 pop, #8 R&B, 1993) and "Gin & Juice" (#8 pop, #13 R&B, 1994) became bicoastal party anthems. Doggystyle entered the Billboard chart at #1 the first week of its release (the first debut album ever to do so).

Despite his success, however, Snoop encountered trouble with the law. In 1993 he was arrested in connection with the murder of a man who the rapper alleged had been stalking him. Together with his bodyguard, who was reported to have fired the gun that killed the man in 1993, Snoop was arraigned to stand trial in L.A. The trial concluded in February 1996 with both Snoop and his bodyguard being acquitted of all charges. In the meantime, the 1994 soundtrack Murder Was the Case (#1), from the short film directed by Dr. Dre, featured three Snoop songs, including the title track. In 1996, with Dr. Dre no longer at the controls, Snoop dropped the chart-topping Tha Doggfather (#1 pop, #1 R&B).

After the murder of label mate Tupac and the incarceration of Death Row CEO Suge Knight, Snoop dropped the

Snoop Dogg

"Doggy" from his name and moved over to Master P's No Limit imprint. His next two No Limit albums, Da Game Is to Be Sold, Not to Be Told (#1 pop, #1 R&B, 1998) and No Limit Top Dogg (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1999), marked Snoop's coming into his own as a producer. He started his own label, Dogg House Records, and oversaw Tha Eastsidaz project. In 2000 Snoop joined forces with Dr. Dre, Eminem, and Ice Cube for the Up In Smoke summer tour and later released his final album for No Limit, Last Meal (#4 pop, #1 R&B). That same year, Death Row released Dead Man Walkin (#24 pop, #11 R&B), a collection of material Snoop recorded before he left the label.

Phoebe Snow

Born Phoebe Laub, July 17, 1952, New York, NY
 1974—Phoebe Snow (Shelter/A&M) 1976—Second Childhood (Columbia); It Looks Like Snow 1977—Never Letting Go; Against the Grain 1981—Rock Away (Mirage); The Best of Phoebe Snow (Columbia) 1989—Something Real (Elektra) 1998—I Can't Complain (House of Blues).

With her supple contralto voice, Phoebe Snow burst onto the music scene with an impressive debut LP on Leon Russell's Shelter label that yielded the Top 5 single "Poetry Man."

She had moved with her family from New York to Teaneck, New Jersey, at age three and did not seriously take up music until the late '60s. A shy performer, she began to play Greenwich Village clubs in the early '70s, singing the blues, as well as folk and pop. After her debut LP, she sang with Paul Simon on his hit gospel single "Gone at Last." Her second LP, Second Childhood (#13, 1976), included "Two Fisted Love," one of several Snow album tracks that weren't hits per se but were frequently played on FM radio. Her first two albums have been certified gold.

Snow's subsequent albums were not as commercially successful, but she still maintained a small, loyal audience and was by now devoting time to raising her daughter. For years her distinctive voice was often heard on radio and television ads, thanks to a series of commercials for Bloomingdale's, Stouffer's, Salon Selectives, Hallmark, General Foods International, and General Electric. In the early '90s she performed and recorded with Donald Fagen's Rock and Soul Revue. In 1994 she appeared at Woodstock in a gospel group with Mavis Staples, Thelma Houston, and CeCe Peniston.

Social Distortion are suburban punk rockers who survived both their genre's burnout and their leader's drug addiction to find belated major-label success. The band was founded by Mike Ness and Dennis Danell, two Orange County schoolmates who had been inspired by the punk scene in nearby L.A. They released their first single, "1945," in 1982. The following album, Mommy's Little Helper, introduced Social Distortion's rootsy punk, influenced equally by the Clash and the Rolling Stones. Song titles like "I Just Want to Give You the Creeps" demonstrated their rebels-without-a-cause attitude.

Ness in particular styled himself an outlaw. He was kicked out of his home at 15, subsequently living in shooting galleries, flophouses, and jail. His heroin addiction, fighting, and other self-destructive acts—he fancied himself a sort of Sid Vicious—split the band. Ness and Danell found a new rhythm section, however, and in 1985 Ness quit drugs and alcohol. A tour documentary recorded that year, Another State of Mind, captured Social Distortion still in its wild, sordid period.

On the country-influenced Prison Bound, Ness reflected on his past. Social Distortion returned to a more punk sound on their eponymous Epic debut, including a hard-rocking version of the Johnny Cash hit "Ring of Fire." The album initially sold more than 250,000 copies (it later went gold) and landed the long-laboring underground band on MTV and a tour with Neil Young. Somewhere Between Heaven and Hell was another solid album with a country feel, including the alternative hit "Bad Luck."

After a four-and-a-half-year break from recording, Social Distortion returned with White Light, White Heat, White Trash (#27, 1996), an album that included the Top 5 Modern Rock hit "I Was Wrong." The record's title was an allusion to the second Velvet Underground album and to White Heat, a 1949 gangster movie starring James Cagney. Frontman Mike Ness released a pair of roots albums in 1999, Cheating at Solitaire, which featured guest shots from Bruce Springsteen and Brian Setzer, and Under the Influences, a collection of country covers. In 2000 Social Distortion rhythm guitarist Danell died suddenly of a brain aneurysm.

Singer Marc Almond and synthesizer player David Ball were hardly the first British pop musicians to join forces while attending art school. Still, as the technopop duo Soft Cell, they set something of a precedent by adapting a cult soul classic into a cheeky electronic dirge—then having their version of the song, Gloria Jones' "Tainted Love," become 1981's best-selling British single, as well as a #3 pop hit in the U.S. the next year.

A mutual fascination with the U.K. soul scene brought Almond and Ball together, first as collaborators on theatrical music—with Almond writing lyrics to accompany Ball's instrumentals—then as Soft Cell. The band's early shows featured striking visual accompaniment, eventually attracting the attention of a quirky label called Some Bizarre. Released in 1981, the duo's debut single, "Memorabilia," failed to chart; later that year, though, "Tainted Love" generated instant success. Numerous Top 10 singles followed in England, many of them sleazily sensual and all of them distinguished by Almond's rather affected (and often pitch-shy) tenor and Ball's moody synth colorings. By 1983, however, Almond and Ball decided to part company professionally. The aptly titled This Last Night in Sodom was released the next year.

By this point, Almond had already formed another band, Marc and the Mambas. The group's two 1983 U.K. albums mixed covers with electrosoul originals and were generally perceived as excessive. In 1984 the singer formed Marc Almond and the Willing Sinners, whose two albums and one EP were stylistically evocative of the Mambas' efforts (and of Soft Cell, for that matter) but somewhat better received. In the late '80s Almond put out a few solo albums, including a Jacques Brel tribute. His first American release was 1988's The Stars We Are (#144, 1989), with the minor hit single, "Tears Run Rings" (#67, 1989), followed in 1990 by Enchanted and in 1991 by Tenement Symphony. Although he lost his U.S. record deal, Almond continued to release albums in the U.K., including the 1993 live recording Twelve Years of Tears. Meanwhile, ex-band mate Ball had formed the dance duo the Grid with Richard Norris, exploring techno and house music on several albums (not released in the U.S.) through 1995.

Interest in Almond was piqued in 1999 when he published his autobiography, Tainted Life. The book talked about his estrangement from his alcoholic father, his homosexuality, and his onetime addiction to Ecstasy and Valium, which led to a rehab stay in 1995. Also in 1999, Almond started his own label to release his music, Blue Star, which he licenses to other labels for distribution. Blue Star's first album was that year's Open All Night, which became his first U.S. release in eight years. The album included a duet, "Threat of Love," with Siouxsie Sioux of Banshees fame. Almond and Ball then began collaborating again. The Art of Falling Apart is a reissue of the 1983 LP with bonus tracks; The Twelve Inch Singles is a greatest-hits collection. In 1999 Almond published a book of his poetry and prose, Beautiful Twisted Night.

The original Canterbury progressive British rock band (along with Caravan, Gong, Hatfield and the North, National Health, Henry Cow), Soft Machine lasted through seemingly endless personnel changes to become one of Britain's most durable progressive-fusion units. Actually, the original Canterbury band was the Wilde Flowers, who got together at Canterbury's Simon Langton School, where Mike Ratledge, Hugh Hopper, Robert Wyatt, and Caravan's David Sinclair were schoolmates. The Wilde Flowers existed in varying lineups from 1963 to 1965, usually gathering at the home of Wyatt's mother, a writer and disc jockey who introduced her son to modern jazz. (One writer later described a car ride with Wyatt in which he whistled Charlie Parker's "Donna Lee" solo note for note.) Wyatt enrolled in the Canterbury College of Art but dropped out to travel in Europe. There he met beatnik/hippie and fellow avant-gardist Daavid Allen. Hopper soon joined them. Upon their return to Canterbury, they opened up the Wilde Flowers' jazz rock to include more free-form experimentations and "pataphysics," a sort of winsome absurdity derived from French playwright Alfred Jarry.

Ratledge came back to Canterbury next from Oxford University; Hopper went with Sinclair, Pye Hastings, and Richard Coughlan to form another version of the Wilde Flowers, which quickly became Caravan. Ratledge formed Soft Machine with Wyatt, Kevin Ayers, and Allen; they got the name from the William Burroughs novel. After some rehearsals, the band went to London and played with Pink Floyd at the psychedelic UFO club. At this point guitarist Andy Summers (later with the Police) occasionally played with them. In London they met producer Kim Fowley, with whom they recorded two songs, "Feelin' Reelin' Squealin'" and "Love Makes Sweet Music" (reissued on At the Beginning); Jimi Hendrix, who was recording "Hey Joe" in the same studio, played some rhythm guitar. The records made little impact in England, and Soft Machine went back to France, settling in St. Tropez, where they soon attracted much notoriety as the center of "happenings" surrounding Alan Zion's production of the Picasso play Desir Attrape par la Queue. When they finally returned to Britain late in 1967, Allen had visa problems; he went back to Paris and later founded Gong [see entry]. Soft Machine played some shows as a trio and opened Hendrix's 1968 U.S. tour. (Wyatt painted a suit and tie on his bare torso for the occasion.) In New York they recorded their debut LP with producer Tom Wilson.

After the tour and recording sessions, Soft Machine temporarily disbanded. Ayers went to Ibiza, then Majorca, to write before forming his own band, the Whole World; Ratledge went to London; and Wyatt stayed in the U.S. The record company pressured Wyatt to reassemble the group. Ayers was replaced by Hopper. The new band recorded Volume Two, less a concept album than a stream-of-consciousness LP, with 17 tracks bleeding into each other over two sides and jazz influences ranging from cocktail to avant-garde. Toward the end of a long U.K. tour, they added a horn section from Keith Tippett's Centipede Orchestra for Third; sax player Elton Dean stayed on to help on Fourth, a double LP of four side-long compositions (including Wyatt's magnum opus, "Moon in June"), which again won heavy critical acclaim but sold only moderately.

In 1971 Wyatt began to grow disenchanted with Soft Machine, as the band became more and more formulaic. He left after recording Fourth and formed Matching Mole, who recorded two LPs. He went on to have a critically respected career as a solo performer, and was preparing to embark on a Matching Mole reunion when he fell from a fourth-story window. He was left paralyzed from the waist down. With Ratledge's fuzz organ the sole sonic link with the band's past, and Wyatt apparently taking the band's verbal wit with him, Soft Machine gradually devolved into just another jazz-rock fusion band, recruiting members from other such British units as Nucleus (whence came John Jenkins and Karl Marshall). Hopper went on to record solo concept LPs like 1984. He also formed a band called Isotope, and worked with reedman Elton Dean in Soft Heap. Ayers maintained a respectable solo-singer/songwriter career of his own [see solo entry]. Marshall and Babbington have returned to the jazz and jazz-rock scenes. Ratledge quit Soft Machine in 1976 (replaced by Rick Wakeman's brother Alan), leaving the band with no original members. Jenkins and Marshall continued on through the '90s with a lineup that was still critically respected. When the group finally dissolved, Jenkins became a jingle writer and composer. Marshall played with jazz bassist Eberhard Weber.

In the meantime, Robert Wyatt was becoming a long-established cult artist. His first solo album released after his accident, Rock Bottom, was produced by Pink Floyd's Nick Mason; it earned him the prestigious French Prix Charles Cros in 1974. Despite being wheelchair bound, Wyatt continued to tour and to travel, and he has collaborated with a wide range of artists ranging from Everything But the Girl's Ben Watt to Ryuichi Sakamoto. Wyatt has had two U.K. chart singles during his long solo career: a cover of the Monkees' "I'm a Believer" (#29 U.K., 1974) and a rendition of Elvis Costello's antiwar "Shipbuilding" (#35 U.K., 1983). Wyatt's later material, which is clearly political, also includes old folk and protest songs. In the early '80s he recorded the anti-lynching "Strange Fruit" (first popularized by Billie Holiday) and "Caimenera" (better known as "Guantanamo"). In 1998 he resurfaced after a six-year absence and released the widely praised, whimsically challenging Shleep, which boasts guest appearances by Brian Eno, Paul Weller, and jazzman Evan Parker. The following year's EPs is a historical boxed set of mini-albums.

Son Volt

Formed 1995, St. Louis, MO, and Minneapolis, MN
 Jay Farrar (b. Dec. 26, 1966, Belleville, IL), voc., gtr.; Mike Heidorn (b. May 28, 1967, Belleville), drums; Dave Boquist (b. Nov. 21, 1957, Minneapolis), gtr., fiddle, banjo, lap steel; Jim Boquist (b. May 30, 1964, Minneapolis), voc., bass.
 1995—Trace (Warner Bros.) 1997—Straightaways
 1998—Wide Swing Tremolo.

When Uncle Tupelo [see entry] cofounder Jay Farrar left the Belleville, Illinois, roots-punk combo due to creative differences with partner Jeff Tweedy in 1994, he set out to make music in the rustic, history-conscious vein of predecessors like the Byrds and Flying Burrito Brothers. To that end Farrar formed Son Volt (the group takes its name from Delta bluesman Son House) with former Tupelo drummer and high school pal Mike Heidorn, as well as brothers Jim and Dave Boquist, both of whom were active in Minneapolis' alternative-music scene.

Son Volt's debut album, Trace (#166, 1995), was an introspective set of banjo- and fiddle-flecked songs exploring both the heart's longings and the lure of the open road. More muted in tone than A.M., the first release from Wilco (Farrar's former partner Jeff Tweedy's band [see entry]), Trace became an instant critical favorite, winding up in the Top 10 of ROLLING STONE'S 1995 critics' list. The record, which included a minor hit, the uncharacteristically hard-rocking "Drown," was something of a commercial success as well.

Recorded after the band had spent two years on the road, including appearances at Farm Aid and a slot on the H.O.R.D.E. Tour, Straightaways (#44, 1997), was even more laid back than Trace. It also didn't fare as well commercially, selling only 95,000 copies. Critics were divided on its merits, some calling it a soporific sequel to Trace, others hailing it as a consolidation of that album's virtues. The group's self-produced third album, Wide Swung Tremolo (#93, 1998), found Sun Volt cranking up its amps as never before, a sound that harked back to the crunching roots punk of Uncle Tupelo. The record received mixed reviews and didn't sell very well. Rumors began circulating on the Internet toward the end of 1999 that Farrar might be dissolving the band. The fact that he had gone into the studio to demo new songs without the rest of Sun Volt, along with reports that Farrar was taking time off to be a father, only heightened speculation.

Sonic Youth is the avatar of noisy, underground guitar rock. After making the transition from uncompromising avant-rockers in the early '80s to indie guitar-pop trailblazers by decade's end, the group became the alternative-music world's brightest beacon. In the '90s Sonic Youth's sound continued to influence younger bands, the most famous evidence being in the grungy, sometimes discordant riffs of Nirvana's "Smells Like Teen Spirit." And if Nirvana's mainstream success briefly suggested crossover potential for Sonic Youth, the band's weakness for wild experimentation never waned.

In the late '70s Thurston Moore, raised in Bethel, Connecticut, and Lee Ranaldo, of New York's Long Island, hit Manhattan just in time for the end of punk rock and its avant-garde cousin, no wave. The two met while performing with downtown guitar-orchestra composer Glenn Branca, whose extended works featured several guitars playing highly textured, dissonant music. In 1981 Moore formed Sonic Youth with bassist/art-school graduate Kim Gordon (who would marry Moore) and drummer Richard Edson (who later pursued acting and starred in such films as Stranger Than Paradise and Do the Right Thing). Rinaldo joined before their second gig. The band went through several drummers before locking in with Steve Shelley in 1986.

Sonic Youth's first recordings, released on Branca's Neutral label, mainly consisted of feedback and ringing harmonics, with Gordon or Moore intoning about death, urban decay, and other dreary, no-wave-inspired topics. Moore and Rinaldo became known for propping up a dozen or so guitars behind the band during performances, each tuned unconventionally and some containing objects such as screwdrivers and drumsticks jammed between the strings and fretboards.

With 1985's Bad Moon Rising, Sonic Youth hit on a direction that incorporated swirling, Branca-style guitar textures into more traditional pop-based song structures. Critical responses were generally positive, and major labels began knocking at the band's door. But Sonic Youth held out for three more full-length indie-label albums, including the double-length classic Daydream Nation, while perfecting its art-pop recipe. (In the meantime they did a tongue-in-cheek tribute to Madonna under the pseudonym Ciccone Youth.)

In 1990 the group's major-label debut, Go (#96), cemented Sonic Youth's stature in the music world and led to an arena tour opening for Neil Young. The move was incongruous but not altogether inappropriate, since both acts worshipped feedback and distortion. (It was also consistent with Sonic Youth's ironic sense of humor.) By the release of Dirty (#83, 1992), the former avant-noisemakers were being hailed as the messiahs of modern rock, even Vanity Fair profiled Gordon and anointed her the "godmother . . . of alternative rock." In 1994 Sonic Youth released their most popular LP to date, Experimental Jet Set, Trash and No Star, which peaked on the U.S. album charts at #34 (and #10 in the U.K.) Later that year, Gordon and Moore had a daughter.

In 1995 Sonic Youth headlined the Lollapalooza Tour, but endured a nightly insult of seeing large numbers of fans leave immediately following the set by support act Hole and celebrity frontwoman Courtney Love. But the tour financed the creation of Sonic Youth's Manhattan studio-workshop. The band earned strong reviews for 1995's Washing Machine (#58). By now, Gordon had largely abandoned the bass for guitar. Band members were also exploring a variety of solo projects. Gordon joined Julie Cafritz (of Pussy Galore) in Free Kitten, and Moore released the Psychic Hearts album on Geffen in 1995.

Sonic Youth never left the underground, even as it explored more traditional pop structures in the '90s. While remaining on Geffen, in 1997 the band established its own SYR label for a series of experimental and mostly instrumental releases, with tracks stretching beyond 20 minutes. Sonic Youth could appear as animated characters on The Simpsons and yet step back into the avant-garde for an acclaimed 1997 performance at New York's Lincoln Center, soon followed by the expansive 74-minute A Thousand Leaves album. With 1999's two-disc Goodbye 20th Century, the band explored other forms of avant-garde music, tackling compositions by the likes of John Cage and Steve Reich. That same year, a vanload of the band's hot-rodded, one-of-a-kind guitars was stolen at a Southern California tour stop. Sonic Youth had to start again from scratch, which only forced the band into still-further explorations on NYC Ghosts & Flowers in 2000.

Cher solo: see entry.

Sonny and Cher were a husband-and-wife team who enjoyed a brief period of success as wildly garbed hippie-ish pop singers, followed by a slightly longer stretch when their Vegas-style singing and stand-up comedy found favor with a nationwide TV audience. The partnership ended in divorce, and Cher went on to a solo career as singer, actress, ganshly gowned celebrity, and fitness guru.

Bono spent years trying to break into the music business as a songwriter. He'd started writing songs at age seven, and at 12 appeared on the popular music show Peter Potter's Hit Parade. In 1957 he placed "High School Dance" on the B side of Larry Williams' "Bony Morone." When Sonny's tune reached #90 in its own right, he became a staff producer at Specialty, where he also began recording under the name Don Chnsty. He had no particular success until 1964, when "Needles and Pins," which he cowrote with Jack Nitzsche, became a big hit for the Searchers. By this time, Sonny was working for Phil Spector as writer and backup vocalist. In 1963 he met Cher when she sang backup on some of Spector's sessions.

They married in 1964 and made a couple of unsuccessful singles under various names (Caesar and Cleo) for Vault and Reprise before signing to Atco in 1965. Their first chart entry was the million-seller "I Got You Babe" (#1, 1965). Then came "Baby Don't Go" (#8, 1965), "The Beat Goes On" (#6, 1967) and "solo" hits like Sonny's "Laugh at Me" (#10, 1965) and Cher's "All I Really Wanna Do" (#15, 1965), "Bang Bang (My Baby Shot Me Down)" (#2, 1966), and "You Better Sit Down Kids" (#9, 1967). With the exception of Bob Dylan's "All I Really Wanna Do," Bono wrote and produced all of these records. The pair also made two movies: Good Times (1967) and Chastity (1969, written by Sonny, starring Cher, named for their daughter). The pop hits slowed at the end of the '60s.

Produced by Snuff Garrett, a pair of Top 10 hits—"All I Ever Need Is You" (#7, 1971) and "A Cowboy's Work Is Never Done" (#8, 1972)—helped Sonny and Cher bounce back in 1971–72. These and a series of successful appearances in Las Vegas and on countless television variety shows led to the TV series—The Sonny and Cher Comedy Hour (1971–74) and The Sonny and Cher Show (1976–1977)—that made them household names. At that time, however, their marriage was breaking up. During and after the split, both tried solo careers and had solo TV shows. The duo performed their last show as husband and wife at the Houston Astrodome in 1974; they divorced in June 1975. Cher [see solo entry] would be the more successful of the two, however, and Sonny soon abandoned show business.

Beginning in 1983 Bono operated an L.A. restaurant for several years before moving to Palm Springs, where he opened another restaurant and made a successful bid for the mayor's office in 1988. A subsequent run for the U.S. Senate failed. He made occasional forays into performing, costarring in John Waters' Hairspray (1988) and making guest appearances on television programs (The Love Boat, Fantasy Island). In 1987 Sonny and Cher reunited to perform "I Got You Babe" on Late Night With David Letterman, after which Bono seemed visibly moved. In 1991 he wrote And the Beat Goes On, which became a regional bestseller in a few markets. In the book, Bono alleged that Cher neglected their daughter, Chastity, and he painted his ex-wife as a cold, calculating careerist. In 1994 Bono, who'd never bothered to register to vote until 1988, was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he proved himself a quick study and became popular with colleagues on both sides of the aisle. He was the second most successful Republican fund raiser after his friend Speaker Newt Gingrich. He was reelected in 1996. Bono made his mark as a supporter of legislation to strengthen copyright laws, among other issues. On other matters (such as same-sex marriage), he was conservative, though when Chastity revealed she was gay, he was initially more accepting and supportive than Cher. (Chastity recounted her life as a gay rights activist and celebrity offspring in her book Family Outing.)

Bono died at age 62 of massive head injuries after skiing into a tree at a resort near South Lake Tahoe, Nevada. The death was termed accidental, though in 1998 his widow, Mary (who had assumed his seat in the House following his death), revealed to the Los Angeles Times that his longtime dependence on prescription painkillers may have been a contributing factor. She also contended that Bono was insecure, erratic, and subject to mood swings. Cher delivered the eulogy at Sonny's funeral.

S.O.S. Band

Formed 1977, Atlanta, GA

Mary Davis (b. Savannah, GA), voc., kybds.; Jason "TC" Bryant, kybds., voc.; Bruno Speight, gr., voc.; Billy Ellis, flute; Willie "Sonny" Killebrew, sax; John Simpson, bass, voc.; James Earl Jones III, drums.

1980—S.O.S. (Tabu/Columbia) (+ Abdul Raouf, trumpet, voc.)

1981—Too (– Jones; + Jerome "JT" Thomas, drums)

1982—S.O.S. III 1983—On the Rise 1984—Just the Way

voc.) 1987—Diamonds in the Raw 1988—The Way You

Like It (CBS Special Prod.) 1991—One of Many Nights

(A&M).

An Atlanta-based pop-funk outfit, the S.O.S. ("Sounds of Success") Band's eponymous debut album (#12, 1980) spawned the massive late-disco smash "Take Your Time (Do It Right) Part 1" (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1980), and a lesser dance hit in "S.O.S." (#20 R&B, 1980). But the group's next two albums failed to crack the pop chart, III, however, yielded a moderate dance hit in "High Hopes" (#25 R&B, 1982), which was the S.O.S. Band's first collaboration with the writing-producing team of Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis, then still members of the Prince spin-off band the Time.

In March 1983 Jam and Lewis—during a few days off from a tour by Prince and the Time—flew to Atlanta to produce some S.O.S. Band tracks. Snowed in by a freak storm, the pair missed their next tour date and were promptly fired by Prince. But one of the tracks they were producing, "Just Be Good to Me" (#55 pop, #2 R&B, 1983), reasserted S.O.S. Band's pop status and codified Jam and Lewis' cool, plush, Chic-like sound. They produced half of On the Rise (#47, 1983), which also yielded "Tell Me If You Still Care" (#65 pop, #5 R&B, 1983) and "For Your Love" (#34 R&B, 1984), and worked on the group's next two albums. Just the Way You Like It (#60, 1984) produced hits in the title track (#60 pop, #6 R&B, 1984) and "No One's Gonna Love You" (#15 R&B, 1984); Sands of Time (#44, 1986) conformed "The Finest" (#44 pop, #2 R&B, 1986) and "Borrowed Love" (#14 R&B, 1986).

In 1986 Jam and Lewis moved on, and Mary Davis left to launch a solo career, her first album, Separate Ways (#82 R&B, 1990) spawned the single "Don't Wear It Out" (#19 R&B, 1990). Davis was replaced by Penny Ford for Diamonds in the Raw, which failed to chart pop but produced the R&B hit "I'm Still Missing Your Love" (#7 R&B, 1989). Though the album didn't chart at all, 1991's One of Many Nights yielded the R&B hit "Sometimes I Wonder" (#12 R&B, 1991). Three years later, Davis joined Bryant and Raouf in a new version of the band, which frequently toured as a part of "old school" R&B-themed package shows.

Soul Asylum

Formed 1981, Minneapolis, MN

Dave Pirner (b. Apr. 16, 1964, Green Bay, WI), voc., gr.; Dan Murphy (b. July 12, 1962, Duluth, MN), voc., gr.; Karl Mueller

(b. July 27, 1963, Minneapolis), voc., bass; Grant Young (b. Jan. 5, 1964, Iowa City, IA), drums.

1984—Say What You Will, Clarence . . . Karl Sold the Truck (Twin/Tone) 1986—Made to Be Broken; Time's Incinerator cassette; While You Were Out 1988—Clam Dip & Other Delights EP; Hang Time (Twin/Tone-A&M) 1990—Soul Asylum and the Horse They Rode In On 1992—(+ Sterling Campbell, drums) Grave Dancers Union (Columbia) 1995—Let Your Dim Light Shine 1998—Candy From a Stranger (- Campbell) 2000—Black Gold—The Best of Soul Asylum (- Ian Mussington, drums).

Soul Asylum began as a thrashy punk band in the style of hometown peers the Replacements and Hüsker Dü. The group's tireless blend of punk energy, jazzy rhythms, country shadings, and solid songwriting earned it the tag "best live band in America."

In 1981 roommates Karl Mueller and Dan Murphy, 18 and 19 respectively, formed Loud Fast Rules with 17-year-old drummer Dave Pirmer. Within three years Pirmer had moved to the front, and the group changed its name to Soul Asylum. After the lo-fi Say What You Will . . . produced by Hüsker Dü's Bob Mould, the band locked into its signature song style: loud, anthemic musings on the lives of young misfits.

For the next four years Soul Asylum slogged it out on the independent label Twin/Tone, touring constantly and releasing generally well-received albums. In 1988, the same year the group's Twin/Tone deal was picked up by Herb Alpert's A&M Records, the cover of its album Clam Dip & Other Delights featured a send-up of Alpert's own 1965 Tijuana Brass album, Whipped Cream & Other Delights. The joke seemed to elicit bad karma for Soul Asylum. Its A&M albums sold poorly even though they were among the group's strongest. After a shakeup at A&M, 1990's And the Horse They Rode In On stiffed so badly the band members almost decided to call it quits.

Pirmer and Murphy briefly toured the Midwest as an acoustic duo called Murphy and Pirinkle. Meanwhile Columbia struck a deal with A&M whereby it could release Soul Asylum's next album, and in 1992 the group came back with its biggest success to date. Grave Dancers Union (#11) was both a critical and commercial smash, selling a million copies and scoring a #5 hit with "Runaway Train." That song's video also acted as a public service spot by featuring photographs of real teenage runaways, earning endless airplay on MTV. By 1993, Soul Asylum had performed at Bill Clinton's presidential inaugural, and Pirmer had begun showing up in the gossip columns because of his relationship with actress Winona Ryder, with whom he appeared in the film Reality Bites.

Young was replaced by drummer Sterling Campbell in time for 1995's Let Your Dim Light Shine (#6), which produced the hit single "Misery" (#20), but failed to match the popularity of "Runaway Train." In 1998 the band returned with Candy From a Stranger (#121), though Campbell soon left, weary of touring. Two years later, Soul Asylum released Black Gold—The Best of Soul Asylum.

By now, Pirmer had relocated to New Orleans, and he wrote the score to the Kevin Smith film Chasing Amy. A Pirmer solo album was planned for 2001, though side projects were nothing new to the band. By 1992, Murphy had already joined members of Wilco and the Jayhawks in a country-flavored side project called Golden Smog, which became a serious recording and touring endeavor, along with such lesser-known band projects as Dim Sum and the Three Amigos.

Soul II Soul took its slow-grooving fusion of reggae, soul, and rap music fused in the clubs of London, and internationalized it with a string of hits and a Marcus Garvey-inspired ideology. Leader Jazzie B. has described the group as more of a concept than a band. Soul II Soul is at once an amorphous collective and Jazzie B's solo project. Jazzie B., whose parents are from Antigua, grew up in North London and began working in sound studios at age 11. He and childhood friend Philip "Daddae" Harvey started Soul II Soul as a mobile sound system playing reggae clubs and warehouse parties. At one party in 1985, Soul II Soul rented equipment to Nellee Hooper, formerly of Bristol hip-hop group the Wild Bunch and then Massive Attack. The two argued that night but soon were working together.

Soul II Soul defined late-'80s British club music, and its reputation increased when Jazzie B. and other band associates DJ'd on a British pirate radio station. After a couple of singles failed to hit, Soul II Soul finally struck it big with "Keep On Movin'" (#11 pop, #1 R&B, 1989), a #5 U.K. hit that also found a mass audience in the U.S. The single kicked off the album Keep On Movin' (#14 pop, #1 R&B, 1989), called Club Classics Vol. One in England, where it was #1. The single and its followup, "Back to Life (However Do You Want Me)" (#4 pop, #1 R&B, 1989), both platinum hits, featured the vocals of longtime studio singer Caron Wheeler. She soon had a falling-out with Soul II Soul and left to pursue a solo career. On the album's third single, "Jazzie's Groove" (#6 R&B, 1989), Jazzie B. articulated his positivist, Afrocentric philosophy: "A happy face, a thumpin' and lovin' bass, for a thumpin' and lovin' race." The album won two Grammys.

Soul II Soul expanded to form an umbrella for a number of enterprises, including a studio, a fashion line, boutiques, and in 1991, the label Funki Dred, originally a joint venture with Motown but now an independent company. In 1990 Hooper and Jazzie B. coproduced Sinéad O'Connor's hit "Nothing Compares 2 U"; they also produced the Chimes, Neneh Cherry, Maxi Priest, and Fine Young Cannibals. As in the past, they used an assortment of singers on Vol. II—1990—A New Decade (#21 pop, #14 R&B, 1990), including Victoria Wilson-James on "A Dream's a Dream" (#19 R&B, 1990) and Kym Mazelle on "Missing You" (#29 R&B, 1990) and "Get a Life" (#54 pop, #5 R&B, 1990). The album's assortment of musicians included rapper Fab 5 Freddie and saxophonist Courtney Pine. A world tour for the album featured a fashion show and a 15-piece band. Jazzie B.'s back was injured in a seven-car pileup while on the road in Illinois, however, and Soul II Soul canceled the rest of its American shows.

Wheeler returned to sing on Volume III Just Right, an album that featured mostly male vocalists. "Joy" (#14 R&B, 1992) was sung by Richie Stephens, while Kofi Kari Kari handled vocals on "Move Me No Mountain" (#33 R&B, 1992). A whole crew of musicians was on board for 1995's Vol. V Believe, which incorporated jungle and other forms of contemporary electronica into Soul II Soul's club sound. The album became a Top 10 hit in the U.K. but had little commercial impact in the States (#67 R&B); its successor, Time for Change (1997), didn't chart in the U.S. at all. Over the years, Nellee Hooper has worked with stars ranging from Björk to Madonna and U2.

Soundgarden

Formed 1984, Seattle, WA

Matt Cameron (b. Nov. 28, 1962, San Diego, CA), drums; Chris Cornell (b. July 20, 1964, Seattle), voc.; Kim Thayil (b. Sep. 4, 1960, Seattle), gtr.; Hiro Yamamoto (b. Apr. 13, 1961), bass. 1987—Screaming Life EP (Sub Pop) 1988—Fopp EP; Ultramega OK (SST) 1989—Louder Than Love (A&M) (- Yamamoto; + Jason Everman [b. Aug. 16, 1967], bass) 1990—(- Everman; + Ben Shepherd [b. Hunter Shepherd, Sep. 20, 1968, Okinawa, Jap.], bass) 1991—Badmotorfinger 1994—Superunknown 1996—Down on the Upside 1997—A-Sides. Hater (Cameron; Shepherd; + John McBain, gtr.; + Brian Wood, voc.; + John Waterman, bass): 1993—Hater (A&M). Wellwater Conspiracy (Cameron; Shepherd; McBain): 1997—Declaration of Conformity (Third Gear) 1999—(- Shepherd) Brotherhood of Electric: Operational Directions (Time Bomb). Chris Cornell solo: 1999—Euphoria Morning (A&M).

One of the first bands to come out of the Seattle grunge scene (and one of the earliest to sign with Sub Pop Records), Soundgarden parlayed gloomy metal riffs, surrealistic psychedelia, and punk into platinum with a trilogy of popular albums released in the '90s.

After graduating high school in Illinois in 1981, musicians Kim Thayil and Hiro Yamamoto, as well as fanzine editor (and later Sub Pop founder) Bruce Pavitt, moved to Olympia, Washington, where they planned to attend college. When this did not pan out, the three each ended up in Seattle, attracted by its nascent music scene.

After playing in cover bands, Yamamoto joined his roommate and sometime drummer Chris Cornell in his new band. Thayil signed on, and they called themselves Soundgarden after a noisy pipe sculpture in a Seattle park. The addition of drummer Scott Sundquist in 1985 (he was replaced by Cameron in 1986) freed Cornell to front the band. After contributing two songs to a local compilation, they signed with the new Sub Pop label. Their two EPs, Screaming Life (1987) and Fopp (1988), attracted major-label interest. But the band decided to stay true to their indie roots, signing to SST for their debut album Ultramega OK.

For Louder Than Love (#108, 1990), the band signed with A&M. The higher profile of a major label increased sales and helped the band garner a Grammy nomination. Yamamoto left the band in late 1989 to go back to school (in 1994 he joined Truly) and was replaced by Jason Everman, who had previously played with Nirvana. Everman was soon replaced by Hunter "Ben" Shepherd in early 1990.

The sales of Badmotorfinger (#39, 1991) were helped by "Outshined" being chosen as an MTV "Buzz Clip" and a spot opening for a Guns n' Roses tour (they were invited by Axl Rose, a longtime fan). In 1991 Cornell and Cameron, along with members of Pearl Jam [see entry] were part of Temple of the Dog, a tribute to the late Mother Love Bone singer Andrew Wood. In 1993, during a break from Soundgarden, Shepherd and Cameron released an album with their side project Hater, a band which also included Andrew Wood's brother Brian. Cameron, Shepherd, and McBain resumed their collaboration in 1997 under the name the Wellwater Conspiracy (in which Cameron and Shepherd were originally billed as Ted Dameron and Zeb, respectively).

Superunknown (1994), debuting at #1, emphasized Cornell's emotional lyrical content and Soundgarden's new-found stylistic flourishes. The album spawned the band's breakthrough track, "Black Hole Sun," which propelled them into the pop mainstream. Cameron even performed the song with the Seattle Symphony and experimental keyboardist Wayne Horvitz. In 1994 "Black Hole Sun" won a Grammy for Best Hard Rock Performance, while another Superunknown song, "Spoonman," won for Best Metal Performance.

The musical evolution started on Superunknown became even more pronounced on Soundgarden's followup, Down on the Upside (#2, 1996). Produced by the band, the album attempted to balance Cornell's trademark tortured lyrics ("Nothing seems to kill me no matter how hard I try"), metal energy, and increasingly complex arrangements and melodies. Despite its initial success with the #1 Modern Rock hits "Burden in My Hand" and "Blow Up the Outside World," the album wasn't as popular as its predecessor. Subsequent touring was rumored to be rife with the kind of internal tension that had plagued the album's recording.

In April 1997 Soundgarden announced that they were disbanding. Explanations offered at the time included Shepherd's increasingly antagonistic onstage behavior, as well as divergences between Thayil, who wanted to stick to metal, and Cornell, who would have preferred to explore new directions. While Cameron joined fellow grunge survivors Pearl Jam, Cornell released a solo album, Euphonia Morning (#38, 1999) in which he was free to display his love for the Beatles and his pop sensibility. In 2001 Cornell began recording with Rage Against the Machine.

Joe South

Born Joe Souther, Feb. 28, 1940, Atlanta, GA
 1968—Introspect (Capitol) 1969—Don't It Make You Want to Go Home 1971—So the Seeds Are Growing 1975—Midnight Rainbows (Island) 1990—The Best of Joe South (Rhino) 1992—Best of Joe South (CEMA Special Products).

Joe South was a successful sessionman who went on to become a hit songwriter and performer, crossing over from country to pop in the early '70s.

At age 11, South got his first guitar, and a year later he was appearing regularly on Atlanta country music station WGST. In 1957 he joined the band of Pete Drake, the famed country pedal steel guitar player, and in the early '60s he recorded some unsuccessful solo singles, including "Purple People Eater Meets the Witch Doctor." He also worked for a while as a country disc jockey.

South became a regular session guitarist in Nashville and Muscle Shoals, backing up country artists such as Marty Robbins and Eddy Arnold, in addition to Bob Dylan and Aretha Franklin. He appears on Simon and Garfunkel's "Sounds of Silence." South had also begun to do some songwriting, and in the mid-'60s he wrote hits for the Tams ("Untie Me"), Billy Joe Royal ("Down in the Boondocks"), and early Deep Purple ("Hush").

By 1968, South was recording his own material. Introspect at first sold marginally, but when other performers began to cover "Games People Play," Capitol reissued the LP in 1969 under that title. They also released the song as a single, and both album and single went gold. It also won a Grammy as Song of the Year. So the Seeds Are Growing included his 1970 hit "Walk a Mile in My Shoes" (#12). His "I Never Promised You a Rose Garden" became an international country and pop hit for Lynn Anderson (#3, 1971).

In 1971 South took time off, in part to recuperate from a hectic schedule and also because of the suicide of his brother Tommy. He lived awhile in the forests of Maui, Hawaii, and did not record again until 1975, when Midnight Rainbows was released. A difficult personality, South did not perform for years. In 1994 he played a show in London called The American South, where he was showcased along with Allen Toussaint, Guy Clark, Dan Penn, and Vic Chesnut.

"Games People Play" was again a hit in Europe by Jamaican reggae group Inner Circle. Having overcome past problems with a drug dependency, South is now in the music publishing business.

Southside Johnny and the Asbury Jukes

Formed 1974, Asbury Park, NJ

Southside Johnny (b. John Lyon, Dec. 4, 1948, Neptune, NJ), voc., harmonica; Billy Rush (b. Aug. 26, 1952), gtr.; Kevin Kavanaugh (b. Aug. 27, 1951), kybds., voc.; Al Berger (b. Nov. 8, 1949), bass, voc.; Kenny Pentifallo (b. Dec. 30, 1940), drums; Carlo Novi (b. Aug. 7, 1949, Mexico City), tenor sax; Eddie Manion (b. Feb. 28, 1952), baritone sax; Tony Palligrosi (b. May 9, 1954), trumpet; Ricky Gazda (b. June 18, 1952), trumpet; Richie "La Bamba" Rosenberg, trombone.
 1976—I Don't Wanna Go Home (Epic) 1977—This Time It's for Real (- Pentifallo; - Novi) 1978—Hearts of Stone (+ Steve Becker, drums; + Joe Gramalin, gtr.) 1979—The Jukes (Mercury); Having a Party With Southside Johnny 1980—Love Is a Sacrifice (- Berger; + Gene Bacia, bass) 1981—Live/Reach Up and Touch the Sky 1983—Trash It Up! (Mirage) 1984—In the Heat 1986—At Least We Got Shoes (Atlantic) 1992—The Best of Southside Johnny (Epic) 1999—Messin' With the Blues (Leroy).
 Southside Johnny solo: 1988—Slow Dance (Cypress) 1991—Better Days (Impact).

Southside Johnny and the Asbury Jukes were an R&B-influenced rock band who graduated from the Asbury Park bar-band scene soon after Bruce Springsteen's massive success.

Johnny Lyon, Springsteen, and Springsteen guitarist Miami Steve Van Zandt played together in the late '60s in Asbury Park groups like the Sundance Blues Band and Dr. Zoom and the Sonic Boom. Lyon got his nickname because he liked blues from the South Side of Chicago. After migrating to Richmond, Virginia, with a band called Studio B, Lyon returned to Asbury Park and formed a duo with Van Zandt called Southside Johnny and the Kid, which became the Bank Street Blues Band with keyboardist Kevin Kavanaugh. In 1974 Van Zandt left again to go on the road with the Dovells (of "Bristol Stomp" fame), whose backing band also included bassist Al Berger. Lyon then joined the Blackberry Boogie Band, which included drummer Kenny Pentifallo. With the addition of a horn section, they became the Asbury Jukes. Van Zandt briefly rejoined them before moving on to Springsteen's band. The Jukes became mainstays at Asbury Park's top barroom, the Stone Pony. After Springsteen's successful 1975 U.S. and European tours, Van Zandt became the Jukes' manager/producer and landed them a recording contract. Their debut LP, which included two Springsteen tunes and guest appearances by Ronnie Spector and Lee Dorsey, sold well. This Time featured more Van Zandt and Springsteen tunes and included guest shots by members of the Coasters, the Drifters, and the Five Satins. Their third LP, with guest appearances by Van Zandt and E Street Band drummer Max Weinberg, still contained many Van Zandt and Springsteen titles. On their self-titled fourth LP, the Jukes declared their independence from the Springsteen imprimatur by writing all their own material (Lyon and Rush were the main composers). The Jukes went to #48, becoming the highest-charting album of their career. While their albums began to sell less well, they remained a successful touring unit for several more years: Lyon's solo debut, Better Days (#96, 1991) reunited him with Van Zandt.

In the summer of 1994 Southside Johnny and the Jukes performed with Bruce Springsteen, Jon Bon Jovi, and others at the 20th-anniversary celebration for the Stone Pony in Asbury Park.

Bob B. Soxx and the Blue Jeans

Formed 1963, New York, NY

Bob B. Soxx (b. Robert Sheen); Darlene Love (b. Darlene Wright, July 26, 1938, Los Angeles, CA); Fanita James. 1963—Zip-A-Dee Doo-Dah (Philles).

Out of Phil Spector's Wall of Sound stable came vocal group Bob B. Soxx and the Blue Jeans in 1963, with their only big hit a revamped swinging version of "Zip-A-Dee Doo-Dah" (#8), a tune from the Disney film Song of the South. The LP also included covers of tunes like "This Land Is Your Land," "Let the Good Times Roll," and "The White Cliffs of Dover."

Spector had been initially attracted to Robert Sheen (a.k.a. Bob B. Soxx) because his voice reminded him of Clyde McPhatter's. All of the Blue Jeans had been singing since their early teens, and Love and James were both members of another Spector group, the Blossoms. Though they only had three chart hits, the group was a mainstay of the rock-concert circuit between 1963 and 1965. Darlene Love [see entry] went on to have some hits of her own for Spector. James was a backup vocalist for Tom Jones in the early '70s and continued to lead a group of Blossoms through the '80s as well.

Spandau Ballet

Formed 1979, London, Eng.

Tony Hadley (b. June 2, 1960, London), voc., kybds.; Gary Kemp (b. Oct. 16, 1959, London), gtr., kybds.; Martin Kemp (b. Oct. 10, 1961, London), bass; Steve Norman (b. Mar. 25, 1960, London), gtr., sax, perc.; John Keeble (b. July 6, 1959, London), drums.

1981—Journeys to Glory (Chrysalis) 1982—Diamond 1983—True 1984—Parade 1985—The Singles Collection 1986—Through the Barricades (Epic) 1991—Best of Spandau Ballet (Chrysalis, U.K.).

British dance-pop band Spandau Ballet was a product of the same fashion-conscious New Romantic scene that produced Duran Duran and Visage, among others. Spandau began as a kilt-clad synth-disco outfit, playing in a handful of ultratrendy London clubs, where genteel kids put off by punk's abrasiveness paraded around in outrageously ornate and fanciful clothes (as opposed to punk style). Spandau Ballet's reputation built so quickly that Island Records chief Chris Blackwell reportedly offered the group a contract the first time he met them, at a London party. The group refused his offer, instead forming its own Reformation label (later licensing its recordings to Chrysalis).

The group's first U.K. hits, "To Cut a Long Story Short" (#5 U.K., 1980) and "Musclebound" (#10 U.K., 1981), also got much play in U.S. clubs, and especially in the New York dance clubs that proliferated in the early '80s. Late 1981 saw Spandau introduce more musical urgency into its postdisco mix, with the soul-inflected "Chant No. 1 (I Don't Need This Pressure On)" (#3 U.K., 1981), which also got heavy U.S. club play.

In 1983 Spandau Ballet surprised critics who'd been dismissing the group as shallow, unmusical fops, with its first U.S. chart album True (#19, 1983), and its title single (#4, 1983)—a soulful ballad with the sound and feel of a pop standard. Indeed, nearly a decade later, psychedelic rappers PM Dawn made a sample of "True" the centerpiece of its chart-topping pop hit "Set Adrift on Memory Bliss." True also yielded hits in "Gold" (#29, 1983) and "Communication" (#59, 1983), but Parade (#50, 1984) spawned only the minor hit "Only When You Leave" (#34, 1984).

No more hits followed, and in 1985 Spandau sued Chrysalis, claiming ineffective promotion had killed its commercial chances in the U.S. The Kemp brothers launched acting careers, to great acclaim, playing real-life British gangsters the Kray twins in the 1990 film The Krays, signaling Spandau Ballet's demise later that year. In 1992 Gary Kemp appeared in the film The Bodyguard, playing the role of Whitney Houston's manager; the next year, he was featured on the hit U.S. cable-TV comedy series, The Larry Sanders Show. In 1998 Martin Kemp joined the cast of the popular British soap opera, East-Enders. The following year, the three other former members of the band—Tony Hadley, Steve Norman, and John Keeble—lost a court case against Gary Kemp, who they contended had failed to pay them a promised share of royalties.

The Spaniels

Formed 1952, Gary, IN

James "Pookie" Hudson, lead voc.; Gerald "Bounce" Gregory (b. June 10, 1934, East St. Louis, IL; d. Feb. 12, 1999, Gary), bass voc.; Opal Courtney Jr., baritone voc.; Ernest Warren, tenor voc.; Willis C. Jackson, tenor voc.

1955—(- Courtney; + Cal Carter; - Carter; + James Cochran, baritone voc.; - Warren; - Hudson; - Jackson; + Donald Porter, tenor voc.; + Carl Rainge, lead voc.) 1956—Goodnight, It's Time to Go (Vee-Jay) Lineup ca. 1960—(Hudson; Warren; Gregory; + Bill Carey, voc.; + Andy McGruder, voc.; numerous personnel changes follow) 1993—The Spaniels—Goodnite Sweetheart, Goodnite (Vee-Jay); (lineup: Hudson; Gregory; Courtney; Jackson; + Billy Shelton, voc.; + Teddy Shelton, voc.) 40th Anniversary (JLJ).

A mid-'50s doo-wop vocal group, the Spaniels had several big R&B hits but never crossed over into pop-chart success.

They began as street singers in the Gary, Indiana, ghetto, and attracted the attention of local disc jockey Vivian Carter, who became their manager and with James Bracken formed Vee-Jay Records to release their material. The Spaniels' first single was "Baby, It's You," a Top 10 R&B hit in 1953, which established both the band and Vee-Jay Records (whose roster would later include Jimmy Reed and Jerry Butler, among others). In early 1954 their "Goodnite Sweetheart, Goodnite" was a #5 R&B hit (covered on the pop chart by the McGuire Sisters); in 1973 it was used as the closing theme for the film American Graffiti. The Spaniels became a top live attraction on the national R&B circuit, but they had undergone many personnel changes beginning in 1955. Through it all, though, the group continued to chart, notably with "You Painted Pictures" (#13 R&B, 1955) and "Everyone's Laughing" (#69 pop, #13 R&B, 1957). The Spaniels began fading in the late '50s, and shortly after "I Know" (#23 R&B, 1960), they broke up again. In 1969 "Pookie" re-formed the Spaniels. They toured the revival circuit and in 1970 released the Spaniels' last charting single, "Fairy Tales" on Lloyd Price's Calla label (#45 R&B).

Hudson and Gerald Gregory occasionally revived the Spaniels throughout the '80s. In 1991 the Smithsonian Institution's Rhythm & Blues Foundation bestowed upon the group its lifetime achievement award. The Spaniels, with several original members intact, released a 40th-anniversary album in 1993. Gregory continued performing with them until mere months before his death in 1999. Hudson continues to carry the torch.

Spanky and Our Gang

Formed 1966, Chicago, IL

Elaine "Spanky" McFarlane (b. June 19, 1942, Peoria, IL), voc.; Nigel Pickering (b. June 15, 1929, Pontiac, MI), bass, gtr., voc.; Oz Bach (b. Paul Bach, 1939, WV; d. Sep. 21, 1998, Asheville, NC), bass, gtr., voc. 1966—(+ Malcolm Hale [b. May 17, 1941, Butte, MT; d. 1968], gtr., voc.) 1967—(+ John Seiter [b. Aug. 17, 1944, St. Louis, MO], drums, voc.) Spanky and Our Gang (Mercury) 1968—(- Bach; + Kenny Hodges [b. Jacksonville, FL], gtr., voc., bass; + Lefty Baker [b. Eustace Britchforth, Jan. 7, 1939, Roanoke, VA; d. Aug. 11, 1971], gtr., banjo, voc.) Like to Get to Know You; Without Rhyme or Reason (- Hale; group disbands, re-forms with numerous personnel changes) 1969—Spanky's Greatest Hit(s); Live 1975—Change (Epic).

Along with the Mamas and the Papas, Spanky and Our Gang were part of the late-'60s folk/pop vocal-group movement, with major pop hits like "Sunday Will Never Be the Same" (#9, 1967), "Lazy Day" (#14, 1967), and "Like to Get to Know You" (#17, 1968). In 1982 Spanky joined the re-formed Mamas and the Papas.

Elaine McFarlane had met Mama Cass Elliot in the early '60s and then joined "an electric comedy-jug band," the New Wine Singers, which included Malcolm Hale. "Spanky" met Nigel Pickering, Kenny Hodges, and Lefty Baker while vacationing in Florida. As a quartet they debuted at the Mother Blues club and were an immediate success; they were signed by Chicago-based Mercury Records. Malcolm Hale and John Seiter then joined. They took their name from the Our Gang (a.k.a. Little Rascals) films.

The Gang began racking up a string of soft-rock/folk-pop hits like "Sunday Will Never Be the Same," "Making Every Minute Count" (#31), and "Lazy Day" in 1967; "Like to Get to Know You" and "Sunday Mornin'" (#30) in 1968. They were often featured on network TV variety shows, though in 1969 their ghetto-consciousness protest song "Give a Damn" was banned on many radio stations. That song was later used in a widely aired public service announcement campaign.

Though Hale had died of cirrhosis in 1968 during the mixing of Without Rhyme or Reason, the group retained the rest of the lineup until the hits stopped in 1970. The following year Lefty Baker died of liver complications.

In 1975 McFarlane and Pickering re-formed the band with three new members, playing Texas bars until 1980; McFarlane also appeared on Roger McGuinn's solo debut album. Then came the Mamas and the Papas reunion, with McFarlane even being called "Mama Spanky" by the rest of the group. McFarlane later worked with a new Spanky and Our Gang lineup. She continues to occasionally perform. Original bassist Oz Bach died of lung cancer in 1998.

Sparks

Formed 1971, Los Angeles, CA

Ron Mael (b. Aug. 12, 1948 or 1950, Culver City, CA), kybds.; Russell Mael (b. Oct. 5, 1953 or 1955, Santa Monica, CA), voc.; Earle Mankey, gtr.; Jim Mankey, bass; Harley Feinstein, drums. 1972—Sparks (Bearsville); A Woofler in Tweeter's Clothing 1974—(- E. Mankey; - J. Sparks' arch combination of witty lyrics with ever-changing pop styles has long perplexed and enticed critics and audiences. Essentially the band is an outlet for the eclectic, eccentric Mael brothers, whose twisted tastes may have been set when they modeled for clothing catalogues as children. The Maels formed the band Halfnelson in the early '70s with friends from UCLA. Halfnelson caught the ear of Todd Rundgren, who got the band signed to Albert Grossman's Bearsville label and produced their first album.

When the eponymous disc failed to sell, the band's manager urged Halfnelson to change its name, and the retitled album was rereleased. The single "Wonder Girl" (also made the Hot 100 (#112, 1972). Sparks' quirky, overwrought art pop fared little better commercially with their second album, A Woofier in Tweeter's Clothing, now a cult classic. The Maels relocated to England, where they had found some success on tour, leaving the rest of the band behind. Earle Mankey went on to become a producer and recording artist, while brother Jim helped form Concrete Blonde.

With the assistance of a new band and producer Muff Winwood, Russell's quavering falsetto and Ron's odd lyrics found phenomenal acceptance in England, beginning with 1974's Kimono My House (#4 U.K.) Their image—Ron's stiff, nerdy demeanor and signature mustache juxtaposed to Russell's curly mane and beaming androgyny—appealed to British teens. Sparks landed nine U.K. chart hits during this period, starting with "This Town Ain't Big Enough for Both of Us" (#2, 1974), "Amateur Hour" (#7, 1974), and "Never Turn Your Back on Mother Earth" (#13, 1974). After another Top 10 U.K. album, Propaganda (#9 U.K., 1974), they began to falter the next year on the Tony Visconti-produced Indiscreet (#18 U.K.) In 1976 they returned to the U.S. and recorded Big Beat with various players, including Tuff Darts guitarist Jeff Salen. They sang two songs from the album in the film Rollercoaster. On the ironically titled Introducing Sparks, the Maels recorded with L.A. session players.

Seeking a change, Sparks got Giorgio Moroder to produce Number One in Heaven. Although critics dented the band for going disco, the album's dance-synth pop returned the duo to the British charts with three hits. "The Number One Song in Heaven" (#14 U.K., 1979), "Beat the Clock" (#10 U.K., 1979), and "Tryouts for the Human Race" (#45 U.K., 1979). Next, Sparks recorded Terminal Jive with Moroder protégé Harold Faltermeyer, although it was never released in the U.S., the album yielded "When I'm With You," a megaseller in France. Sparks adopted the band Bates Motel for its next few albums; Moroder associate and Queen engineer Mack produced 1981's Whomp That Sucker. The band divided its time between L.A. and Belgium, where it recorded the self-produced Sparks in Outer Space. The album features Sparks fan and Go-Go Jane Wiedlin on two songs, including "Cool Places" (#49, 1983), Sparks' biggest American hit.

After a string of albums that failed to hit in Europe or the U.S., the Maels built a home studio in L.A., where they recorded 1988's Interior Design. They also wrote the music for a film by Hong Kong director Tsui Hark. In late 1994 Sparks returned—performing in London and releasing the U.K. album Gratuitous Sax and Senseless Violins (the record came out in the States the following year). Two singles from the record, the cheekily titled "When Do I Get to Sing 'My Way' " and "When I Kiss You (I Hear Charlie Parker Playing)," were hits overseas.

Plagiarism (1997) found the brothers paying tribute to themselves with reworked versions of their best-known songs. Producer Tony Visconti was back on board for the club-conscious project, which also included cameos from Erasme, Faith No More, and Jimmy Somerville. Balls (2000) consisted of new material but continued in its predecessor's techno vein.

Britney Spears

Born Britney Jean Spears, Dec. 2, 1981, Kentwood, LA 1999—... Baby One More Time (Jive) 2000—Oops! ... I Did It Again.

Mixing brazen sex-appeal, teenage energy, and radio-ready bubblegum-pop tunes, Britney Spears graduated from the Disney Channel's Mickey Mouse Club to the top of the chart.

Born in a small town north of New Orleans, Spears started taking gymnastics lessons after finishing kindergarten. She first auditioned for the Disney Channel's The New Mickey Mouse Club at age eight, but she was deemed too young. She went on to make commercials and spend three summers in New York, attending the Professional Performing Arts School; she appeared in the off-Broadway show Ruthless in 1991. She was finally accepted on the The New Mickey Mouse Club, filming two seasons in 1993–94. Two of her costars on the show were future 'N Sync members Justin Timberlake and JC Chasez. After the cancellation of the show, which had been taping in Orlando, Florida, she went back to her Louisiana home. Through a family friend who was an entertainment lawyer, she auditioned for Jive Records, which signed her, she was 15.

Following in the footsteps of the Backstreet Boys, Spears was sent to Stockholm to record her debut album, ... Baby One More Time, with producers Max Martin and Eric Foster White, a writer who had previously worked with Whitney Houston (one of Spears' acknowledged influences, along with Mariah Carey and Madonna). She prepped the album release by opening for 'N Sync and going on a mall tour of her own, where she performed short sets with backing tapes. Her first single, "... Baby One More Time," released in October 1998, debuted at #1, as did the album of the same name, which came out in January 1999. The album also included the singles "Sometimes" (#21, 1999), "(You Drive Me) Crazy" (#10, 1999), and "From the Bottom of My Broken Heart" (#14, 2000).

... Baby One More Time would go on to sell 13 million copies, becoming the best-selling album by a teenage female singer. Spears was nominated for a Grammy as Best New Artist but lost to Christina Aguilera. By then, her public persona was firmly in place, as the singer cultivated sexual allure and youthful innocence—often both at the same time, as in the video for "... Baby One More Time," in which she wore a skimpy Catholic school uniform, and in a provocative cover shoot for Rolling Stone.

Spears confirmed that she was no flash-in-the-pan with Oops! ... I Did It Again (#1, 2000), produced by Max Martin and Robert "Mutt" Lange, which sold 1.3 million copies in its first week, on its way to a total of 8 million copies. Singles included the title track (#9, 2000), "Lucky" (#23, 2000), and the gold-selling "Stronger" (#11, 2000). The album explored the same territory of teen romance, though the sexual come-ons were even more obvious. At the same time, the singer, who often discusses her belief in God and her opposition to premarital sex and drugs, was careful to maintain a wholesome image—the lyrics she uses to cover the Rolling Stones' "(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction" deletes a reference to smoking cigarettes. Immediately after the album's release, she embarked on her first headlining tour.

In 2000 Spears cowrote a memoir, Heart to Heart, with her mother, Lynne. As of this writing, she was slated to star in her first movie.

The Specials/Fun Boy Three

Fun Boy Three (Hall; Staples; Golding): 1982—The Fun Boy Three (Chrysalis) 1983—Waiting 1984—The Best of Fun Boy Three.

The Specials were the prime movers behind England's short-lived two-tone movement of 1979–81, which also included Madness, the Selecter, the English Beat, and several other bands. (The original fans often sported two-tone clothes and the band was racially mixed, ergo the title of the "movement.")

Coming together from mid-1977 to early 1978 in Coventry, the Specials initially played both fast punk and slower roots reggae. But they were unable to bring the two sounds together into a recognizable package, so they reoriented themselves toward ska, an upbeat precursor to reggae that was fashionable in England among Mods and skinheads in the mid-'60s.

By early 1979, after a 1978 tour with the Clash, the Specials cut an independent single, "Gangsters," but for its B side they used a cut by another struggling band, the Selecter. Pressed on the band's 2-Tone label, the single soared to #6 on the British charts. That led to a distribution deal with Chrysalis in June 1979. Soon their 2-Tone label gave British hits to a whole movement of bands—the Selecter, the Beat, and Madness—making it for a while the most successful independent English label since Stiff.

The Specials' debut LP, out in the U.S. in early 1980, was produced by Elvis Costello. Like that of most neo-ska bands, the music was danceable and charged with anticacist sentiment. Most of the music was by leader Jerry Dammers, but it also included the 1967 ska anthem "A Message to You Rudy" (#10 U.K., 1979). The Specials were stars in England, where "Too Much Too Young," a song advocating contraception from their U.K. EP, went to #1. Their other U.K. Top 10 hits were "Rat Race," "Stereotype," and "Do Nothing" (1980). In America, however, the group made little impression, except with critics. Their followup LP confused even the few fans they had here. Released in late 1980, More Specials had elements of cocktail jazz, cabaret theatricality, odd pop, and not much ska. In 1981 the Specials, along with several other 2-Tone groups, were featured in a concert movie entitled Dance Craze, which was released in the U.K. The 2-Tone label soon fell apart, with the Beat, the Selecter, and Madness all going to other companies. But the Specials hit a poignant high point in England in the summer of 1981 when they released "Ghost Town." It was inspired by the unemployment and racial tensions in England, and its release coincided with black-white riots in Brixton and Liverpool. (Black guitarist Golding was himself a victim of a racial attack, having his throat slashed and requiring 27 stitches.) The single went #1 in England, although it was banned from airplay by the BBC.

Soon after that, though, in October, the band fell apart after vocalists Hall and Staples plus Golding quit to form Fun Boy Three. While that group made no chart impression in the U.S., the trio had a string of Top 20 U.K. pop hits, including "The Lunatics (Have Taken Over the Asylum)" (1981), "The Telephone Always Rings," and "Summertime" (1982), and two Top 10 U.K. singles with Bananarama: "Tunnel of Love" (1983) and "Our Lips Are Sealed" (1983, which Hall cowrote with then-girlfriend Go-Go Jane Wiedlin). In addition, Fun Boy Three also appeared on Bananarama's "It Ain't What You Do, It's the Way That You Do It" (#4 U.K., 1982). Fun Boy Three disbanded in 1983, with Hall going on to form Colourfield and, in 1990, Terry Blair and Anouchka. He worked with Dave Stewart in Vegas and released a solo album in the U.K.

Roddy Byers fronted a rockabilly group called Roddy Radiation and the Tearjerkers. Panter later joined General Public. Dammers and Bradbury re-formed as the Specials AKA, with a new lineup in late 1981. It was this group—which included Stan Campbell of the Selecter—that recorded "Racist Friend" and "Free Nelson Mandela," a 1984 #9 hit in the U.K. In 1986 Dammers formed Artists Against Apartheid. He would become a key organizer of the Nelson Mandela's 70th Birthday Party concerts in 1988. Later Bradbury, along with Golding and Staples, joined the Special Beat, which was made up of ex-Specials and ex-(English) Beat members. A new version of the Specials, with four original members but notably missing Dammers and Hall, toured in 1994. Having inspired such successful ska-influenced alternative-rock acts as No Doubt, Reel Big Fish, and the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, they released a pair of albums in the mid- to late '90s. In fact members of Rancid, No Doubt, and the Bosstones guested on 1998's Guilty 'Til Proved Innocent!

Phil Spector/The Teddy Bears

Born Dec. 25, 1940, Bronx, NY

The Teddy Bears, formed 1958, Los Angeles, CA: Spector, voc.; Marshall Leib, voc.; Annette Kleinbard (a.k.a. Bard), voc.; Harvey Goldstein, voc.

1959—(—Goldstein) The Teddy Bears Sing! (Imperial).

Phil Spector as a producer: 1963—A Christmas Gift to You

(Philles) 1977—Phil Spector's Greatest Hits (Warner Bros.)

1991—Back to Mono (Abkco).

Over three decades since its heyday, Phil Spector's Wall of Sound still stands as a milestone in recording history. It changed the course of pop-record producing and left some of rock's best-loved music. Spector raised pop production's ambition and sophistication by overdubbing scores of musicians—five or six guitars, three or four pianos, and an army of percussion, including multiple drum kits, castanets, tambourines, bells, and timpani—to create a massive roar. Spector called it "a Wagnerian approach to rock & roll: little symphonies for the kids."

Spector was raised in the Bronx but moved with his mother to L.A. at age 12 after his father died. He began learning guitar and piano while at Fairfax High School, and at 16 played with local jazz combos. In high school, Spector met Marshall Lieb, and in 1957 the two began writing songs. In early 1958, another friend, Annette Kleinbard, joined them to form the two the Teddy Bears. Spector's choice of a group name was supposedly inspired by Elvis Presley's hit, "(Let Me Be Your) Teddy Bear." In short order they had a Top 10 U.S. and U.K. hit with Spector's first production, "To Know Him Is to Love Him," taken from the inscription on Spector's father's gravestone ("To Know Him Was to Love Him"). The Teddy Bears appeared on national television, but when Spector disagreed with the record company on the group's next release, he moved them to Imperial. There they cut a few singles and The Teddy Bears Sing!, which flopped, and soon broke up.

In the fall of 1960 Kleinbard suffered severe facial injuries in a car accident. After recovering, she changed her name to Carol Connors and has written or cowritten a number of hit records, including Billy Preston and Syreeta Wright's "With You I'm Born Again" and "Gonna Fly Now," the theme from the first Rocky film. Other films for which she has written music include Sophie's Choice and Rocky III. Leib became a musician and producer, for, among others, the Everly Brothers. He has also supervised music for a number of feature films.

Spector then enrolled in UCLA, and also worked as a part-time court stenographer. He dropped out and moved back to New York, where he hoped to become a U.N. interpreter in French. But he soon returned to L.A., where he deecided to reenter the record business. The 18-year-old Spector approached independent producers Lester Sill and Lee Hazlewood and persuaded them to take him under their wing. At this time, he formed another group, the Spectors Three, but after several flops, they disbanded and Spector concentrated on producing.

In 1960 Sill and Hazlewood sent Spector to New York, where he worked with hitmakers Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller. With Leiber he cowrote "Spanish Harlem," a mammoth 1960 hit for Ben E. King. Spector also played the guitar break in the Drifters' "On Broadway." He became staff producer for Dunes Records and produced Ray Peterson's "Corinna, Corinna," a Top 10 hit. By this time he was also a freelance producer and A&R man at Atlantic Records as well as an independent producer. He produced Gene Pitney's "Every Breath I Take" and Curtis Lee's "Pretty Little Angel Eyes." Back on the West Coast, the Paris Sisters' "I Love How You Love Me" and the Ducanes' "Little Did I Know" followed. The youthful Spector was becoming an industry sensation.

While these late-1961 hits were still on the charts, Spector returned to New York and with Sill formed Philles (from Phil and Les) Records. He began recording a girl group called the Crystals, who hit in early 1962 with "There's No Other (Like My Baby)." Their next Spector-produced hit, "Uptown," was an even bigger success, and then came "He Hit Me (And It Felt Like a Kiss)," which was banned in some markets because of its lyrics, and the million-selling "He's a Rebel." Spector bought out Sill's part of Philles in late 1962.

At 21, Spector was a millionaire. He began recording on the West Coast, where he crafted his Wall of Sound in earnest, using such sessionmen as guitarists Glen Campbell, Sonny Bono, and Barney Kessel, pianist Leon Russell, and drummer Hal Blaine. Within three years, Spector had 20 consecutive smash hits, including the Crystals' "Da Doo Ron Ron," "Then He Kissed Me," and "He's Sure the Boy That I Love"; the Ronettes' "Be My Baby," "Baby I Love You," "The Best Part of Breaking Up," and "Walking in the Rain"; Darlene Love's "Today I Met the Boy I'm Gonna Marry" and "Wait Till My Bobby Gets Home"; and Bob B. Soxx and the Blue Jeans' "Zip-A-Dee Doo-Dah." The Righteous Brothers' "You've Lost That Lovin' Feeling" sold over 2 million copies. In 1963 Spector made a Christmas album, featuring Darlene Love's "Christmas (Baby Please Come Home)" and the Ronettes' "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town." In a 1964 magazine piece Tom Wolfe profiled Spector, dubbing him "the first tycoon of teen."

By this time, however, Spector had made more enemies than friends in the record business. In 1966 came the turning point, with Ike and Tina Turner's "River Deep—Mountain High." Spector considered it his greatest production to date, but it became a hit only in England. Embittered, Spector went into seclusion for two years, during which time reports of strange, near-psychotic behavior on his part filtered out of his 23-room Hollywood mansion: Spector allegedly mentally abused his wife, Ronnie (formerly of the Ronettes); Spector carried a gun. Except for a cameo appearance as a dope pusher in the film Easy Rider and some hits for Sonny Charles and the Checkmates—"Love Is All I Have to Give," "Black Pearl," and "Proud Mary" (the latter employed some 300 musicians)—he remained inactive through the late '60s.

In 1969 Spector was brought in to do a remix on the Beatles' Let It Be. He proved he could adapt to more minimal arrangements with Lennon's "Imagine," which he coproduced, and he returned to the Wall of Sound style for George Harrison's All Things Must Pass LP. In 1971 Spector oversaw production of Harrison's The Concert for Bangla Desh and produced the studio sides of John Lennon and Yoko Ono's Some Time in New York City. In 1973 he formed Warner-Spector Records with Warner Bros., but little came of the association. In 1974 and 1975 he survived two near-fatal auto accidents, and in late 1975 formed Spector International, which reissued the Christmas Album and Greatest Hits packages, and found Spector working with Cher, Dion, Harry Nilsson, Darlene Love, and Spector's latest "discovery," Jeri Bo Keno, still using L.A.'s Gold Star Studios, where he'd made his classics.

Spector's last major productions were Leonard Cohen's Death of a Ladies' Man (1977) and the Ramones' End of the Century (1980). He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1989. In 1995 he came out of retirement to produce an album by Canadian singer Celine Dion, however, he backed out of the project, citing his disgust with Dion's management team. Later in the decade Spector was the subject of more controversy. He won a 1997 legal battle over the U.K. copyright to the music and lyrics of his first #1 hit, "To Know Him Is to Love Him." In November of that year he referred to the Spice Girls as "the Antichrist" while accepting an honor at a music awards ceremony held by the British magazine Q. In 2000 a Manhattan judge ordered Spector to pay $2.6 million, most of it in back royalties, to his ex-wife, Ronnie Spector, and to her former group the Ronettes.

Chris Spedding

Born June 17, 1944, Sheffield, Eng.

1970—Backwood Progression (Harvest, U.K.) 1972—The Only Lick I Know 1976—Chris Spedding (RAK) 1977—Hurt 1979—Guitar Graffiti 1980—I'm Not Like Everybody Else 1981—Friday 13th (Live in NYC) (Passport) 1986—Enemy Within (New Rose, Fr.) 1990—Cafe Days (Mobile Fidelity Sound Lab) 1991—Motorbikin: The Best of Chris Spedding (EMI, U.K.).

Chris Spedding is one of the most widely experienced session guitarists in rock. He first learned violin as a youngster, but by his early teens gave it up for guitar. He joined a hometown band the Vulcans, in the late '50s, went with them to London and then joined a country band that toured U.S. Army bases for three years. In 1964 he spent a year on the ship Himalaya entertaining passengers; upon his return to London, he worked with ex-Animal Alan Price and ex-Manfred Mann vocalist Paul Jones.

In 1967 he formed Battered Ornaments with Pete Brown, through whom Spedding met ex-Cream bassist Jack Bruce (for whom Brown wrote lyrics). When Battered Ornaments disbanded in 1969, Spedding took his first session job on Bruce's Songs for a Tailor LP. He then briefly worked with Ian Carr's jazz-fusion band Nucleus and has since played fusion with Keith Tippett, Mike Westbrook, and Mike Gibbs.

For the next few years, Spedding became one of Britain's busiest session guitarists, working with Lulu, Gilbert O'Sullivan, Dusty Springfield, David Essex, Donovan (he wrote string arrangements on Donovan's Cosmic Wheels LP), and John Cale, among many more. During this period he recorded two solo LPs.

In 1972 Spedding and ex-Free bassist Andy Fraser formed the hard-rock band Sharks (which included session bassist Busta Jones, who went on to play with Brian Eno, Talking Heads, and Gang of Four). They made two albums, then broke up in 1974; Spedding worked with Jones on Eno's 1974 Here Come the Warm Jets. In 1975 Spedding joined session bassist Dave Cochran and ex-Yes/King Crimson drummer Bill Bruford to form the backing band Trigger for British folk-rock singer/songwriter Roy Harper. Trigger backed Harper on what many consider his best album, HQ (reissued as When an Old Cricketer Leaves the Crease in the U.S.), and on a 1975 U.K. tour, then disbanded. Spedding then teamed with British pop producer Mickie Most for his next solo album. Spedding's eponymous 1976 solo album yielded the Top 10 U.K. hit "Motorbikin" and included "Guitar Jam-boree," in which Spedding imitated just about every famous rock guitarist in rapid succession. During the '70s, Spedding reportedly turned down an offer to join the Rolling Stones.

Spedding also played sessions with Roxy Music singer Bryan Ferry (on Let's Stuck Together and In Your Mind) and British punk band the Vibrators. He also reportedly played power chords for the first Sex Pistols singles. In 1979 Spedding teamed up with ex-Tuff Darts singer Robert Gordon. In 1980 he played with the New York band the Necessaries, and in 1981 formed a New York trio with Busta Jones and drummer David Van Tieghem, who had worked with minimalist composer Steve Reich and Brian Eno, among others.

Through the '80s and early '90s, he continued doing session work for, among others, Mark Almond (ex-Soft Cell), Mananne Faithfull, Nina Hagen, and Laune Anderson. He duetted with Chrissie Hynde on the Otis Blackwell tribute album Brace Yourself. He has also worked as a record producer, journalist (as music editor of Details magazine), and soundtrack composer. He appears in Paul McCartney's Give My Regards to Broad Street as a band member. In 1999 he formed a band called 100 Inches. In 2001 he joined Roxy Music's 30th anniversary tour.

The Jon Spencer Blues Explosion

Formed 1991, New York, NY

Jon Spencer, gtr., voc., theremin; Judah Bauer, gtr., harmonica; Russell Simins, drums.

1991—A Reverse Willie Horton (Pubic Pop Can) 1992—The Jon Spencer Blues Explosion (Caroline); Crypt Style (Crypt)
 1993—Extra Width (Matador) 1994—Orange 1995—Experimental Remixes EP 1996—Now I Got Worry 1998—Acme 1999—Xtra Acme USA.
 Russell Simins solo: 2000—Public Places (Grand Royal).

Postmodern smart-ass Jon Spencer first caught the public's eye in the mid-to-late-'80s when he led Pussy Galore, a New-York-by-way-of-Washington, DC, noise band that mixed tuneless garage punk with calculated shock tactics and industrial metal percussion. That group's less severe, later material provided the blueprint for the Blues Explosion's livelier but only vaguely bluesier mix of reverence and cynicism. The trio took shape when Spencer briefly joined the Honey-moon Killers, who included Judah Bauer's roommate Russell Simins.

The Blues Explosion's overlapping first three LPs add up to a thrilling, bass-free blare topped with an affected, attitudinous sneer. The more hi-fi Extra Width abandons willful discordance to focus on tight riffs, screaming theremins, and ironic nods to '70s R&B and '90s hip-hop. Orange takes the blues deeper into the urban jungle; the stylish, genre-crossing Spencer had become indie rock's answer to the Beastie Boys, whose Mike D, along with Beck, Moby, and members of the Wu-Tang Clan, helped assemble Experimental Remixes.

In 1995 Boss Hog, the long-running band led by Spencer and his wife, ex-Pussy Galore/Honeymoon Killers guitarist Cristina Martinez, released an album on Geffen. The following year the Blues Explosion backed real-life Mississippi bluesman R.L. Burnside; Simins concentrated on Butter 08, his side project that included wacky Japanese expats Cibo Matto [see entry]; and Bauer formed the neo-traditional 20 Miles. Now I Got Worry sheds some of Orange's slick eclecticism for solid, driving rock & roll. However, 1998's Acme renews an interest in studio tinkering. In 2000 the Beasties' Grand Royal label issued Simins' solo debut.

The Spice Girls

Formed 1994, London, Eng.

Ginger Spice (b. Geraldine "Geri" Estelle Halliwell, Aug. 18, 1970, Watford, Eng.), voc.; Posh Spice (b. Victoria Beckham, Apr. 17, 1974, Essex, Eng.), voc.; Scary Spice (b. Melanie "Mel B" Brown, May 29, 1975, Leeds, Eng.), voc.; Sporty Spice (b. Melanie "Mel C" Jayne Chisholm, Jan. 12, 1974, Liverpool, Eng.), voc.; Baby Spice (b. Emma Lee Bunton, Jan. 21, 1976, London), voc.
 1996—Spice (Virgin) 1997—Spiceworld 1998—(- Halliwell) 2000—Forever.

Geri Halliwell solo: 1999—Schizophonic (Capitol).

Melanie C solo: 1999—Northern Star (Virgin).

The Spice Girls fused "girl power," glamour, catchy dance-pop, and zany, Fab Four-style antics to stand not just their native England on its head, but to turn much of the rest of the world upside down as well. The group formed in 1994 when four of its five future members answered an ad seeking "lively girls" for a pop group that father-and-son team Bob and Chris Herbert, manager of the British boy band Take That!, had placed in The Stage magazine. All four were hired, along with Michelle Stephenson, to sing in a group called Touch, but the women didn't like the direction the Herberts wanted to take the act, so they opted out of the deal to make a go of it on their own. Meanwhile, they rented a house together, replaced Stephenson (who went off to college) with Emma Bunton, began writing and demoing songs, and rechristened themselves the Spice Girls. They didn't start attracting notice until the spring of 1995 when they hired manager Simon Fuller (Annie Lennox), who helped the group secure a Virgin record deal.

The Spice Girls received their well-known nicknames, based on each member's personality, looks, or interests, from writers at the British teen magazine Top of the Pops. The Spice Girls' first single, "Wannabe," an irresistible dance record that promoted sisterhood and featured a playful rap interlude, was an overnight sensation. It was also the first debut single by an all-female group to enter the U.K. charts at #1, where it stayed for seven weeks, before going on to top the charts in 22 other countries, including the U.S. (#1, 1997). Spice, the group's first album, a project recorded with studio gurus Richard Stannard, Matt Rowe, and the production duo Absolute, went to #1 in England, and in 1997 became the first debut album by a U.K. act to enter the charts at #1 in the States. In addition to "Wannabe," Spice yielded two other Top 10 singles, "Say You'll Be There" (#3, 1997) and "2 Become 1" (#4, 1997). The album, which sold more than 6 million copies in the U.S. and 20 million worldwide, found favor among both critics and fans, giving way to a Spice Girls craze in America. A series of lucrative endorsement deals with companies ranging from Pepsi to Polaroid to Sony Playstation followed.

The late 1997 release of the group's second album, Spiceworld (#3), coincided with the opening of the Spice Girls movie of the same name. Both featured the single "Spice Up Your Life" (#18, 1997) and the album shipped an unprecedented 1.4 million copies in the U.K., beating out the record previously held by Frankie Goes to Hollywood's Welcome to the Pleasuredome. The group then fired Fuller, known in media circles as "Svengali Spice," and Halliwell assumed managerial duties until her departure in May 1998. (Her solo debut, Schizophonic [#42, 1999], made little commercial impact.)

Now a quartet (Halliwell was not replaced), the Spice Girls released their third album, Forever, in 2000. The record saw them dispensing with their girlish nicknames and costumes and adopting a more adult image. Yet despite production help from Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis, the album was, by Spice Girls standards, a commercial failure, selling but a fraction of the copies their first two records did. In November 2000 Chisholm ("Sporty Spice") announced the group would not be touring anymore. All went on to pursue solo projects.

Spinal Tap

Formed 1967, London, Eng. (1978, Los Angeles, CA)
 David St. Hubbins (b. Michael McKean, Oct. 17, 1947, New York, NY), gtr., voc.; Nigel Tufnel (b. Christopher Guest, Feb. 5, 1948, New York), gtr., voc.; Derek Smalls (b. Harry Shearer, Dec. 23, 1943, Los Angeles), bass, voc.
 1984—This Is Spinal Tap (Polydor) 1992—Break Like the Wind (MCA).

Probably the funniest inside joke in rock history, Spinal Tap was an ambitious dead-on parody of heavy metal's clichés and excesses, put on by skilled comic actors who wrote and played their own songs, and were big enough fans of the music to satirize it—however brutally—with knowing affection. Indeed, the butts of the joke embraced Spinal Tap, who were invited to take part in such all-star hard-rock projects as the 1986 Hear-N-Aid benefit single, and the 1992 London tribute concert to Queen's Freddie Mercury.

Spinal Tap's principals were old friends and veteran satirists. Harry Shearer and Michael McKean had been in the early-'70s comedy troupe the Credibility Gap. McKean starred as Lenny in the TV show Laverne and Shirley, and Shearer was in the 1984–85 cast of TV's Saturday Night Live. Also in that cast, Christopher Guest (a schoolmate of McKean's at New York University) had written for the humor magazine National Lampoon and won an Emmy for his writing on a Lily Tomlin TV special, Spinal Tap, performing "Rock and Roll Nightmare," debuted in a 1978 ABC-TV comedy special, The TV Show, on which Guest, McKean, and Shearer worked with director Rob Reiner. They all began seeking funds for a full-length Spinal Tap film, which took some six years to make.

This Is Spinal Tap was directed in semi-improvised form by Reiner (who appeared in the film as director Marty DiBergi, an obvious takeoff on Martin Scorsese, director of The Last Waltz) as a mock-rockumentary of a disastrous U.S. tour. Guest, McKean, and Shearer skewered all aspects of the rock biz, and fomented a long and detailed history of "the loudest band in England," all of whose drummers were cursed to die bizarre, mysterious deaths. Their repertoire featured the near-Kiss of "Tonight I'm Gonna Rock You Tonight," the virtual-Jethro Tull of "Stonehenge" (complete with dancing dwarfs), and "Big Bottom," an ode to the female derrière on which Tufnel and St. Hubbins played bass while Smalls played a double-necked bass. Along the way, Tap also spoofed the sounds of the British Invasion ("Gimme Some Money") and psychedelic pop ("Listen to the) Flower People"), as well as such rock & roll "institutions" as the meddling girlfriend, the sociopathic manager, the Brooklynese publicist (played by Fran Drescher), and the obsequious PR man (played by bandleader Paul Shaffer). Indeed, the film was so sharply understated that some younger moviegoers actually believed they were watching a real film about a real group.

Despite universally glowing reviews and an instant, diehard cult following, neither This Is Spinal Tap nor its soundtrack album (#121, 1984) was a commercial smash.

Still, the movie inspired a book (1984's Inside Spinal Tap by Peter Occhlogrosso), and—after Guest and Shearer did stunts in the cast of Saturday Night Live—eventual sequels of sorts. Break Like the Wind (#61, 1992)—with guests Cher, Jeff Beck, Joe Satriani, and Slash of Guns n' Roses, and such tracks as "Rainy Day Sun," "The Majesty of Rock," and "Birch School" (its video got MTV airplay)—was followed by the TV special A Spinal Tap Reunion, which mixed concert footage (shot before an adoring London audience) and testimonials by such guest stars as Martin Short, Kenny Rogers, Mel Torme, and Guest's wife, Jamie Lee Curtis. The band reunited in 2000 for a handful of shows to promote the DVD release of This Is Spinal Tap, with Mick Fleetwood on drums, and again in 2001, when it performed at Carnegie Hall as part of the Toyota Comedy Festival.

Spin Doctors

Formed 1988, New York, NY
 Aaron Comess (b. Apr. 24, 1968, AZ), drums; Chris Barron (b. Christopher Barron Gross, Feb. 5, 1968, HI), voc.; Mark Burton White (b. July 7, 1962, NY), bass; Eric Schenkman (b. Dec. 12, 1963, MA), gtr.
 1991—Up for Grabs EP (Epic); Pocket Full of Kryptonite
 1992—Homebelly Groove 1994—Turn It Upside Down (– Schenkman; + Anthony Krizan [b. Aug. 25, 1965, Plainfield, NJ], gtr.) 1996—You've Got to Believe in Something (– Krizan)
 1999—Here Comes the Bride (Uptown/Universal).

Although Spin Doctors are one of a group of early-'90s bands who play improvisational rootsy rock in the tradition of the Grateful Dead, the Doctors first found commercial success with a pop single. Singer/songwriter Chris Barron formed the band Trucking Company in 1989 with Eric Schenkman and John Popper, a friend from high school in Princeton, New Jersey. Popper left to form Blues Traveler [see entry], and Barron and Schenkman formed Spin Doctors with fellow New School of Social Research classmate Aaron Comess. They then recruited Mark White, who had played with Comess in the band Spade. Spin Doctors' first show was at a Columbia University frat house.

The band gigged constantly in the New York area, often playing three sets a night or opening for kindred spirits Blues Traveler. They developed a strong following that soon attracted record company interest. In 1991 Epic signed Spin Doctors and promoted the band on the basis of their shows: the first record was a live EP Kryptonite (#4, 1992) was released in the summer of 1991, but did not take off until a year later, when radio stations and then MTV began playing "Little Miss Can't Be Wrong," a catchy if somewhat misogynist single (Barron frequently apologized live for the line "Been a whole lot easier since the bitch left town.")

Spin Doctors continued to tour constantly, including playing the HORDE (Horizon of Rock Developing Everywhere) Tour with Blues Traveler, Phish, and Widespread Panic—bands whose hippie-ish energy, extended jams, and untiring gigging led them to be dubbed "the living Dead."

Shows are so crucial to the Spin Doctors' reputation that they encourage concert bootlegs. Homebely Groove is a live album comprising the Doctors' deleted first EP plus extended versions of songs from Kryptonite Turn It Upside Down (#28, 1994), the band's second studio release, was a disappointment both critically and commercially, with no Top 40 singles.

You've Got to Believe in Something (1996) also failed to yield a hit single, but at least it found the Doctors taking some creative risks, as witnessed by the album's unlisted cover of KC and the Sunshine Band's "That's the Way (I Like It)" featuring rapper Biz Markie and actor Tommy Chong. Meanwhile, the Doctors left Epic and signed with Universal, for which they made Here Comes the Bride (1999). Unfortunately, the band was unable to tour in support of the record after singer Chris Barron was diagnosed with a rare form of vocal-cord paralysis that left him unable to speak above a whisper. He has since made a full recovery.

The Spinners

Formed 1957, Detroit, MI

Bobbie Smith (b. Apr. 10), tenor voc.; Pervis Jackson (b. May 16), bass voc.; Henry Fambrough (b. May 10), baritone voc.; Billy Henderson (b. Aug. 9), tenor-baritone voc.; George W. Dixon, tenor voc.

1962—(- Dixon; + Edgar "Chico" Edwards, tenor voc.)

1967—The Original Spinners (Motown) (- Edwards; + G.C. Cameron, tenor voc.) 1972—(- Cameron; + Phillippe Wynne [b. Apr. 3, 1941; d. July 13, 1984, Oakland, CA], tenor voc.)

1973—Spinners (Atlantic) 1974—Mighty Love; New and Improved Spinners 1975—Pick of the Litter; Spinners Live! 1976—Happiness Is Being With the Detroit Spinners 1977—Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow (- Wynne; + John Edwards [b. St. Louis, MO], tenor voc.) Spinners/8 1978—The Best of the Spinners; From Here to Eternally 1979—Dancin' and Lovin' 1980—Love Trippin' 1981—Superstar Series, vol. 9 (Motown); Labor of Love (Atlantic); Can't Shake This Feeling 1983—Grand Slam 1989—Down to Business (Volt) 1991—One of a Kind Love Affair—The Anthology (Atlantic) 1993—The Very Best of the Spinners (Rhino) 1999—At their Best (Intersound).

The Spinners started as the Domingoes, a group of Ferndale (Detroit) High School students. Around 1961 singer/producer Harvey Fuqua discovered them and began recording the quintet, rechristened the Spinners, on Tri-Phi Records, the label he cofounded with his wife, Berry Gordy's sister, Gwen. The first Spinners single, "That's What Girls Are Made For" (#27 pop, #5 R&B, 1961), featured Bobbie Smith singing lead in a style similar to Fuqua's (not Fuqua himself, as is often reported). The group released a series of singles that didn't click, and a few years later, when Tri-Phi merged with Motown, the Spinners moved to the larger company.

The group was, in some historians' opinion, overlooked at Motown. Although the group had some hits there—"I'll Always Love You" (#8 R&B) in 1965, "Truly Yours" (#16 R&B) in 1966, "We'll Have It Made" (#20 R&B) in 1971 and the Stevie Wonder-produced-and-penned "It's a Shame" (#14 pop, #4 R&B) in 1970—the company never considered them a major act. G.C. Cameron was lead singer for much of the late '60s, and Edwards had left. In 1972 the Spinners moved to Atlantic Records and were teamed with Philadelphia producer Thom Bell. Newcomer Phillippe Wynne, who had previously worked in a band with Catfish and Bootsy Collins, was now handling most of the lead vocals, and from 1972 to 1979 the Spinners' close-harmony ballads regularly topped the R&B and pop charts. Their hits included "I'll Be Around" (#3 pop, #1 R&B) and "Could It Be I'm Falling in Love" (#4 pop, #1 R&B), 1972; "One of a Kind (Love Affair)" (#11 pop, #1 R&B) and "Ghetto Child" (#4 R&B), 1973; "Mighty Love, Part 1" (#20 pop, #1 R&B), "I'm Coming Home" (#18 pop, #13 R&B) and, with Dionne Warwick, "Then Came You" (#1 pop, #2 R&B), 1974; "Sadie" (#7 R&B) and "They Just Can't Stop It (the Games People Play)" (#5 pop, #1 R&B), 1975; "Wake Up Susan" (#11 R&B) and "The Rubberband Man" (#2 pop, #1 R&B), 1976; "You're Throwing a Good Love Away" (#5 R&B), 1977; and "If You Wanna Do a Dance" (#17 R&B), 1978. During this time, the Spinners earned five gold albums: Spinners (#14, 1973), Mighty Love (#16, 1974), New and Improved (#9, 1974), Pick of the Litter (#8, 1975), and Happiness Is Being With the Detroit Spinners (#25, 1976). They were also extremely popular in the U.K., where they were known as the Detroit Spinners to avoid confusion with a British group called the Spinners.

In 1977 Wynne left for a solo career (he also toured with Parliament-Funkadelic) and was replaced by John Edwards. Wynne released several solo albums and had a minor hit with "Wait 'til Tomorrow" in 1983. He died onstage of a heart attack; he was 43.

In 1979 the Spinners returned to the charts with a remake of the Four Seasons' "Working My Way Back to You" (#2 pop, #6 R&B, #1 U.K.). Their "Cupid Medley"—"Cupid/I've Loved You for a Long Time"—was another big hit (#4 pop, #5 R&B, 1980). Subsequent singles hit the R&B chart but none moved into the Top 20. These include "Now That You're Mine Again" and "I Just Want to Fall in Love" (1980), "Yesterday Once More/Nothing Remains the Same," "Long Live Soul Music," "You Go Your Way (I'll Go Mine)" (which was produced by James Mtume and Reggie Lucas), and "Love Connection (Raise the Window Down)" (1981), "Magic in the Moonlight" and "Funny How Time Slips Away" (1982), and "Right or Wrong," at #22 R&B (1984), the group's highest-charting single since 1980's "Cupid" medley. The Spinners continue to tour and record with the same lineup intact since 1977.

Randy California solo: 1972—Kaptain Kopter and the Fabulous Twirly Birds (Epic).

Though they did have one hit single, "I Got a Line on You," Spirit were known primarily for their albums, an ambitious, eclectic blend of hard rock, blues, country folk, and profusion jazz.

Shaven-headed drummer Ed Cassidy met Randy California while he was dating the latter's mother (whom he later married) when Randy was 13. He joined Randy's band, the Red Roosters, which had been formed in 1965 and featured most of the original Spirit lineup. Previously Cassidy had drummed for jazzmen Thelonious Monk, Art Pepper, Cannonball Adderley, and Gerry Mulligan on the West Coast in the mid-'50s, and in the early '60s had formed his own New Jazz Trio. In 1965 he joined Rising Sons with Ry Cooder and Taj Mahal, but was forced to leave the group after injuring his hand during a drum solo.

John Locke, who claimed to be a direct descendant of the British philosopher of the same name, first encountered Cassidy in the New Jazz Trio. At UCLA, he later met Mark Andes and Jay Ferguson, who had grown up together in the San Fernando Valley. Andes' band, the Marksmen, had played sessions with Bobby "Bons" Pickett, among others. Ferguson had met California while with a bluegrass band, the Oat Hill Stump Straddlers. In 1965 Cassidy joined California, Ferguson, and Andes in the Red Roosters, but they broke up in 1966.

In New York City, Cassidy and California played in sessions, and joined numerous bands. Meanwhile, Ferguson formed Western Union with Mark and his brother Matt Andes; the band gained some local popularity before Mark Andes left to briefly join Canned Heat. In late 1966 Cassidy and California returned to the state of California and, with Locke, formed Spirits Rebellious (the name taken from a Kahilil Gibran book), which with the addition of Ferguson and Mark Andes became Spirit.

Their LPs rarely sold better than moderately well, but Spirit were critically well received. Their biggest success critically and commercially was The Twelve Dreams of Dr. Sardonicus, the last LP by the original lineup. In mid-1971 Andes and Ferguson left to form Jo Jo Gunne, with Cassidy and Locke bringing in the Staehely brothers from Texas. After recording Feedback, however, the two original members quit, leaving the Staehelys to take their own "Spirit" on the road.

Randy California then went to England, where he played sessions with British art-rockers Peter Hammill of Van der Graaf Generator. In late 1971 he began experiencing health problems (a concussion from falling off a horse, and a nervous breakdown), which sidelined him until 1973, when he released a solo LP, Kaptain Kopter and the Fabulous Twirlybirds. When California and Cassidy re-formed Spirit in 1974, Chris Staehely went to Jo Jo Gunne.

In 1975 the group played some West Coast reunion dates with Mark Andes, who'd left Jo Jo Gunne and would go on to join Firefall and later Heart. Ferguson, in the meantime, had hits on his own ("Thunder Island") and became an active West Coast sessionman and producer. Spirit continued recording and touring. A 1983 reunion resulted in Spirit of '84. The group, with Cassidy and California at the helm, has reunited in various configurations over the years. Cassidy has written and published Ed Cassidy's Musicians' Survival/Resource Manual (which he sells through ads in music magazines such as Goldmine). He has also lectured and given drum seminars.

Spirit came to an end with the 1997 death of California, who drowned while he was pushing his 12-year-old son out of a rip tide off the Hawaiian coast. The band completed California Blues, a compilation of vintage live material and a dozen new recordings, prior to the incident. Spencer Davis and ex-Doors guitarist Robbie Krieger made cameos on the record, which also marked the return of original keyboardist Locke.

The Finn Brothers (T. Finn; N. Finn): 1996—The Finn Brothers (Discovery).

When the New Zealand band Split Enz began playing in the mid-'70s, it had a lot of trouble being taken seriously because of its weird appearance, complete with glaring clownlike costumes and hairdos that made the members look like parrots. The musicians created an eclectic art-pop amalgam with innovative song structures swinging from ballads to cabaret to heavy pop. They later reemerged with neo-Beatles pop songs and well-made video clips to gain a larger audience. Ultimately, however, Neil Finn (later joined by Tim) found a broader audience with his more orthodox pop rock in Crowded House [see entry].

The band went to Australia in 1975 as a seven-piece outfit and recorded its debut, Mental Notes, there in May and June; it was released only in Australia. Split Enz came to the attention of Roxy Music's Phil Manzanera, who produced Second Thoughts in England, which was mostly new versions of material from the first record. England became the group's home base. The band went through many personnel changes, including the loss of major songwriter Phil Judd (The other writer was Tim Finn.) Split Enz's records sold well only in Australia. In 1976 the band toured America, including a date at New York's Bottom Line, opening for Henry Youngman. In January 1977 Chrysalis released its debut U.S. LP, a compilation under the title Mental Notes. A year later, Judd briefly rejoined, but he left again, and was replaced by Tim Finn's brother Neil, but the group soon lost its contract. Judd went on to start his own band, the Swingers.

With Tim Finn in charge, Split Enz grew more accessible, grooming itself into a pop band, performing Beatles-influenced songs that, like 10cc's, masked droll undertones with winsome melodies. The band broadened its Australian following, and returned to the U.S. market with True Colours in 1980; new anticounterfeiting technology allowed the record to be pressed in laser-etched vinyl with rainbow patterns. "I Got You" gave the band its first taste of U.S. airplay; the single was #1 in Australia for 10 weeks, and the album sold 200,000 copies there.

Split Enz had made rock videos in its early, more eccentric form, and with the advent of cable-cast rock video in the early '80s the combo's latter-day clips received exposure. Even so, the albums sold fewer copies with each release, despite containing pop gems such as "History Never Repeats." The group disbanded in 1985, reuniting four years later in New Zealand. In 1985 Tim Finn married actress Greta Scaachi (they have since split up) and, after a less than stellar solo career, he joined his brother Neil's Crowded House in 1991, only to depart two years later. He briefly played in the band Alt in the mid-'90s. The siblings have also recorded as the Finn Brothers. Split Enz has reunited periodically in New Zealand, with its classic incarnation gigging on New Year's Eve 1999. In 1996 the New Zealand Symphony Orchestra performed a tribute to the band with help from the Finn brothers.

Though it never had a hit single or a best-selling LP, Spooky Tooth remained a bastion of Britain's hard-rock scene. Gary Wright [see entry] made hits after leaving the band.

Mike Harrison had worked as a clerk before joining the VIPs, which became the group Art in the mid-'60s, with Mike Kellie. Gary Wright had been a child actor (in Captain Video and TV commercials) and a psychology student in New Jersey before attending college in Berlin. Spooky Tooth's first two albums, produced by Jimmy Miller, sold respectably in the U.K.; U.S. bassist Greg Ridley left for Humble Pie after the second and was replaced by Andy Leigh for Ceremony.

Wright brought in French electronic-music pioneer Pierre Henry to add processed musique concrète overdubs. Wright then left to form the short-lived Wonderwheel and reemerged a few years later on his own. Harrison brought in Henry McCullough, Chris Stainton, and Alan Spenner from Joe Cocker's Grease Band for Last Puff. Grosvenor left after that LP, later to join Stealers Wheel and Mott the Hoople, and Spooky Tooth entered suspended animation, with Harrison pursuing a short solo career with an LP, Smokestack Lightning.

Wright and Harrison re-formed the band in 1972, with future Foreigner [see entry] guitarist Mick Jones. Their next two albums sold fairly well, especially You Broke My Heart, So I Busted Your Jaw. Harrison left again to pursue a solo career in 1973; in 1974 Spooky Tooth re-formed yet again, with Mike Patto on vocals and keyboards. (He would work with a few more bands before dying of throat cancer in 1979.) The band broke up again a year later. Kellie, who in 1970 had briefly played with the British supergroup Balls (which also included Denny Laine and Steve Gibbons), resurfaced in the late '70s with the Only Ones. At the end of the '90s, Spooky Tooth's original members, excluding Wright, reunited to record Cross Purpose.

Dusty Springfield

Born Mary Isabel Catherine Bernadette O'Brien, Apr. 16, 1939, London, Eng.; died Mar. 2, 1999, Henley-on-Thames, Eng.

1964—The Dusty Springfield Album (Philips) 1966—You Don't Have to Say You Love Me; Golden Hits 1967—Look of Love 1968—Stay Awhile (Mercury) 1969—Dusty in Memphis (Atlantic) 1970—A Brand New Me 1971—For You, Love, Dusty (Philips) 1973—Cameo (Dunhill) 1978—It Begins Again (United Artists) 1979—Living Without Your Love 1982—White Heat (Casablanca) 1990—Reputation 1995—A Very Fine Love (Columbia) 1997—Dusty Springfield Anthology Collection (Mercury) 1998—The Very Best of Dusty Springfield.

Dusty Springfield's husky voice made her one of Britain's best-selling pop-rock singers in the '60s. She and her brother Tom began harmonizing with radio hits as children. Dusty briefly recorded with the Lana Sisters before she and Tom formed a folk trio, the Springfields, with Tim Field. The group, a British equivalent of Peter, Paul and Mary, had U.K. chart hits in 1962-63 with "Island of Dreams" and "Say I Won't Be There," and hit the American Top 20 in 1962 with "Silver Threads and Golden Needles." That year, Field quit, replaced by Mike Hurst (who later produced Cat Stevens), before the trio disbanded. Tom found success as a songwriter for the Seekers, among others.

Springfield continued on her own. In late 1963 she had a British Top 10 hit with "I Only Want to Be With You," which went to #12 in the U.S. in early 1964 and eventually went gold. The tune has since been covered by many other performers. That song was Springfield's first flirtation with Motown-style soul, a sound to which she would often return. She toured the world and had British hits through 1964-65 with Bacharach-David's "I Just Don't Know What to Do With Myself" and "Wishin' and Hopin'" and with Goffin-King's "Some of Your Lovin'" and "Goin' Back." In 1966 "You Don't Have to Say You Love Me" was #1 in the U.K. and #4 in the U.S. She continued to tour extensively and made TV appearances with Tom Jones, Engelbert Humperdinck, and on The Ed Sullivan Show. In 1969, with producers Jerry Wexler, Arif Mardin, and Tom Dowd, she recorded Dusty in Memphis, which yielded the Top 10 international hit single "Son of a Preacher Man." In 1970 she moved back toward pop with Brand New Me, which contained "Land of Make Believe," "Silly Silly Fool," and the title cut. In England her popularity declined, though "How Can I Be Sure," a cover of the Rascals hit, was a 1970 Top 40 hit in the U.K. By then she had scored 17 U.K. and 10 U.S. hit singles.

Between 1971 and 1978 Springfield lived reclusively in America and did not record, except for some backup vocals on Anne Murray's Together LP. In 1978 Springfield recorded two comeback albums on the West Coast. The first, Begins Again, produced by Roy Thomas Baker (of Queen and Cars fame), fared poorly both critically and commercially; the second, Living Without Your Love, produced by David Wolfert, did slightly better. She had a minor 1979 U.K. hit with "Baby Blue," and the following fall she played some New York club dates, her first in eight years.

Springfield's big commercial comeback occurred in 1987, a quarter century after "Silver Threads and Golden Needles," when fan/Pet Shop Boy Neil Tennant invited her to sing on his duo's "What Have I Done to Deserve This?" An international smash, the song hit #2 in the U.S. and in the U.K. She was also featured on the Scandal soundtrack, with "Nothing Has Been Proved," and in 1990 Reputation was a Top 20 U.K. album. Springfield recorded her 1995 country-tinged album in Nashville. Around that time, she was diagnosed with breast cancer. After a long battle with the disease, she died at her English home in 1999, just prior to her induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and just two months after receiving an OBE.

Rick Springfield

Born Aug. 23, 1949, Sydney, Austral.

1972—Beginnings (Capitol) 1974—Comic Book Heroes (Columbia) 1976—Wait for the Night (Chelsea) 1981—Working Class Dog (RCA) 1982—Success Hasn't Spoiled Me Yet 1983—Living in Oz 1984—Hard to Hold soundtrack; Beautiful Feelings (Mercury) 1985—Tao (RCA) 1988—Rock of Life 1989—Rick Springfield's Greatest Hits 1999—Karma (Platinum).

Rick Springfield first became a household name as an actor, playing Dr. Noah Drake on the television soap opera General Hospital. Later that same year (1981) he became a platinum-selling recording star as well with the #1 single "Jessie's Girl."

Springfield grew up in both Australia and England. He got his first guitar at 13 and formed several bands. He performed his first original material with Zoot, who became a top teen idol band in Australia with a #1 hit, "Speak to the Sky." His remake of "Speak to the Sky" reached the American Top 15 in 1972. Springfield's U.S. label, Capitol, promoted him as a teen star, which got him lots of coverage but kept him from being taken seriously; his next album, Comic Book Heroes, also flopped. Legal tangles kept Springfield out of circulation for two years, after which he signed to the small Chelsea label and released Wait for the Night. In 1974 he had been originally cast as lead in The Buddy Holly Story, but the role went to Gary Busey.

Through the '70s Springfield made guest appearances on The Six Million Dollar Man and Wonder Woman while still making demos. In early 1980 he signed with RCA. Working Class Dog, which contained "Jessie's Girl," was released as Springfield became a regular on General Hospital. The album went platinum, as did Success Hasn't Spoiled Me Yet, with "I've Done Everything for You" (#8, 1981) and "Don't Talk to Strangers" (#2, 1982), and Living in Oz (#12, with the 1983 Top 10 "Affair of the Heart" and Top 20 "Human Touch").

Springfield starred in the critically lambasted Hard to Hold. The Top 20 platinum album of the same title included Springfield's last Top 10 hit, "Love Somebody." While the actor's subsequent singles (including "Bruce," about his being mistaken for Bruce Springsteen) all charted in the 20s, fans either didn't warm to his new, more serious direction or simply outgrew him. After a near-fatal motorcycle accident and a prolonged absence, Springfield made a surprise return to the club and casino circuit in 1998. Karma marked his first new album in 11 years.

Bruce Springsteen

Born Sep. 23, 1949, Freehold, NJ

 1978—Darkness on the Edge of Town 1980—The River

 1975—1985 1987—Tunnel of Love 1992—Human Touch;

For nearly three decades Bruce Springsteen has been a rock & roll working-class hero: a plainspoken visionary. He is a fervent and sincere romantic whose insights into everyday lives—especially in America's small-town, working-class heartland—have earned comparisons to John Steinbeck and Woody Guthrie. His belief in rock's mythic past and its potential revitalized pop music and made Springsteen a superstar in the '80s. Since then, he has remained true to his artistic calling and shown himself—in rare interviews—to be among the most thoughtful and articulate artists in rock.

Springsteen, of Irish-Italian ancestry, grew up in Freehold, New Jersey, the son of a bus driver and a secretary. He took up the guitar when he was 13 and joined the Castiles a year later. In 1966 the Castiles recorded (but never released) two songs cowritten by Springsteen, and they worked their way up to a string of dates at New York City's Cafe Wha in 1967. During the summer after his graduation from high school, Springsteen was working with Earth, a Cream-style power trio, and hanging out in Asbury Park, New Jersey. He entered Ocean County Community College in the fall, but dropped out when a New York producer promised him a contract; he never saw the producer again.

While in college, he had formed a group with some local musicians, including drummer Vini "Mad Dog" Lopez and keyboardist Danny Fedenci. Called Child, then Steel Mill, the group worked the Atlantic coast down to Virginia. In summer 1969 Steel Mill visited California (where Springsteen's parents had moved); club dates in San Francisco led to a show at Bill Graham's Fillmore and a contract offer from Graham's Fillmore Records, which Steel Mill turned down because the advance was too small. The band returned east and was joined by an old friend of Springsteen's, Miami Steve Van Zandt, on bass.

Springsteen disbanded Steel Mill in early 1971, intending to put together a band with a brass section and several singers. Meanwhile, he formed Dr. Zoom and the Sonic Boom, which played only three dates. Eventually, the Bruce Springsteen Band was formed with Lopez, Fedenci, Van Zandt (on guitar), pianist and guitarist David Sancious, bassist Garry Tallent, and a four-piece brass section. After the group's first show, the brass section was dropped and Clarence Clemons, a football-player-turned-tenor-saxophonist (a knee injury aborted his pro career), joined the band. The group didn't last; by autumn 1971 Springsteen was working solo.

Springsteen had auditioned for Laurel Canyon Productions, a.k.a. Mike Appel and Jim Cretecos, who had written a hit for the Partridge Family and produced an album by Sir Lord Baltimore. In May 1972 Springsteen signed a long-term management contract and an agreement giving Laurel Canyon exclusive rights to his songs. Royalty rates effective for five albums were set at a low 3 percent of retail price.

Appel arranged for his new client to audition for John Hammond, who had signed Dylan to Columbia. After hearing Springsteen sing in his office, Hammond set up a showcase for CBS executives at the Gaslight in New York City and supervised a demo session. In June 1972 Columbia president Clive Davis signed a 10-album contract with Appel that gave Laurel Canyon about a 9 percent royalty.

Within the month, Springsteen completed Greetings From Asbury Park, N.J. Some of Springsteen's word-crammed songs were set to acoustic singer/songwriter backup, and some to the R&B-inflected rock of the reconstituted Bruce Springsteen Band. Released in January 1973 and touted as one more "new Dylan" effort, Greetings initially sold about 25,000 copies, largely to Jersey Shore fans. Springsteen and the band toured the Northeast, playing extended sets that earned him followings in Boston and Philadelphia. A string of dates opening for Chicago, who limited his sets to a half hour, convinced Springsteen not to open for other bands.

With his second album, The Wild, the Innocent and the E Street Shuffle, Springsteen and his band integrated lyrics and instrumental passages into long romantic narratives; the average track was over seven minutes. The album sold as poorly as its predecessor, and Springsteen decided to concentrate on his stage show. Replacing Lopez with Ernest "Boom" Carter on drums, he tightened up what became the E Street Band, hired expensive light and sound crews, and rehearsed them to theatrical precision. He made up elaborate stories, often involving band members, to introduce his songs, dramatized the songs as he sang them, and capped his sets with fervently rendered oldies.

In spring 1974 critic Jon Landau saw a Springsteen show in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and wrote in the Real Paper: "I saw rock & roll's future and its name is Bruce Springsteen." Columbia used the quote in an ad campaign, and rave reviews of Springsteen concerts and belated notices of The Wild began showing up in print. By November 1974, the album had sold 150,000 copies. Springsteen and a revamped E Street Band (pianist Roy Bittan and drummer Max Weinberg replaced Sancious and Carter, who had formed their own fusion group, Tone; Van Zandt joined as second guitarist) were bogged down by an ambitious third album. Landau, who had been visiting the studio with suggestions, became coproducer with Springsteen and Appel (he would later become the singer's manager). Far from toning down Springsteen's histrionics, Landau inflated them with dramatic arrangements. While the album was being mastered, Springsteen wanted to scrap it in favor of a concert album. But that plan was dropped, and in October 1975 Born to Run (#3, 1975) was released.

Advance sales put the album on the chart a week before its release date, and it made the Top 10 shortly afterward. Within the month, it hit #3—and gold—while "Born to Run" (#23, 1975) became Springsteen's first hit single. Springsteen embarked on his first national tour. Time and Newsweek simultaneously ran cover stories on him. Yet Springsteen was still a cult figure—the album didn't stay on the charts long. In spring of 1976 an independent auditor's report called Appel's management "unconscionable exploitation." And when Appel refused permission for Landau to produce the next album, Springsteen sued his manager in July 1976, alleging fraud, undue influence, and breach of trust. Appel's countersuit asked for an injunction to bar Springsteen from working with Landau, which the court granted. Springsteen rejected the producer Appel chose, and the injunction prevented Springsteen from recording until May 1977. An out-of-court settlement gave Springsteen rights to his songs and he was allowed to work with Landau, while his Columbia contract was upgraded. Appel reportedly received a lump-sum settlement.

During the legal imbroglio, Springsteen toured and E Streeters did session work: Bittan with David Bowie and Meat Loaf, Van Zandt produced the debut album by Southside Johnny and the Asbury Jukes, I Don't Want to Go Home, which featured several Springsteen compositions. Other Springsteen songs provided hits for the Hollies ("Sandy"), Manfred Mann ("Blinded by the Light," a #1 single in 1977), Robert Gordon ("Fire," later a smash for the Pointer Sisters), and Patti Smith ("Because the Night," to which she contributed some lyrics). And Springsteen continued to write new songs, several of which were chosen for Darkness on the Edge of Town (#5, 1978).

Darkness was a dire and powerful album that reflected the troubled period Springsteen had just endured. On tracks like "Badlands," "Promised Land," "Adam Raised a Cain," and the title track, Springsteen sang with choked emotion about working-class problems and the hopes that keep Americans going. The album proved his depth to critics, although it failed to deliver on crossover hopes, yielding only the minor single "Prove It All Night" (#33, 1978).

Work on The River began in April 1979 and went on for a year and a half. Springsteen appeared on stage only twice in that period, at the Musicians United for Safe Energy (MUSE) antinuclear benefit concerts in New York, which were filmed as No Nukes. Meanwhile, Dave Marsh's best-selling Born to Run: The Bruce Springsteen Story was released, spreading the Springsteen legend out in book length. (It was released again in a revised edition, followed by a second Marsh volume, Glory Days: Bruce Springsteen in the 1980's, which was published in 1987.)

Coproduced by Springsteen, Landau, and Van Zandt, the double album The River (#1, 1980) sold over 2 million copies. A single, "Hungry Heart" (#5, 1980), was Springsteen's first Top 10 hit, followed by "Fade Away" (#20, 1981). The River was notable for its shorter, verse-chorus songs that were essentially short stories or character sketches ("Wreck on the Highway," "Independence Day," "Point Blank," "The River"). These four songs especially revealed a sense of resignation, of Springsteen's characters learning to live with what they cannot change.

On the eve of The River's release in October 1980, Springsteen kicked off a tour that crisscrossed the United States twice and took him to over 20 European cities, every one of his four-hour shows was sold out. In the fall, he played six benefit concerts in L.A. for Vietnam War veterans. In 1981 Springsteen persuaded Gary "U.S." Bonds (whose "Quarter to Three" was a favorite Springsteen encore) to return to recording, on an album produced by Van Zandt that included Springsteen material. Members of the E Street Band played sessions for Garland Jeffreys, Joan Armatrading, Ian Hunter, and others. Van Zandt continued producing Southside Johnny and the Asbury Jukes, and Bittan produced an album for rock singer Jimmy Mack.

In 1982 Springsteen made Nebraska (#3, 1982), a stark album recorded (initially as demo tapes) on a 4-track machine at home. With its tales of losers, desperadoes, and dreamers, the album was Springsteen's folk-song commentary on the social problems of America in the Age of Reagan, and on the nihilism bred by alienation.

After Nebraska's deliberately noncommercial statement, Springsteen decided to head in the other direction and try to bring his message to a mass audience. With the simple, declarative songs on Born in the U.S.A. (#1, 1984), Springsteen became a megastar. The album yielded a string of singles—"Dancing in the Dark" (#2, 1984), "Cover Me" (#7, 1984), "Born in the U.S.A." (#9, 1984), "I'm on Fire" (#6, 1985), "Glory Days" (#5, 1985), "I'm Goin' Down" (#9, 1985), and "My Hometown"

(#6, 1985)—and remained in the Top 10 for more than two years. Springsteen made his first videos for the album's singles, including "Dancing in the Dark" directed by Brian DePalma (the single later won a Grammy). Although on Born in the U.S.A., Springsteen continued to look at the dark side of the American dream, he simplified sentiments and packaged them in an album featuring a U.S. flag on the cover. Not surprisingly, many fans took "Born in the U.S.A." as an upbeat patriotic anthem, although the song was actually about the dead ends hit by a Vietnam vet. Ronald Reagan himself, during the 1984 presidential campaign, tried to coopt Springsteen's vision as his own in one speech. Springsteen attempted to counteract such misinterpretations by meeting with labor, environmental, and civil rights activists in towns he played and mentioning their efforts on stage. Springsteen has always played numerous benefits; in 1985 he sang on USA for Africa's "We Are the World" and on Van Zandt's anti-apartheid project "Sun City." But the Born in the U.S.A. concerts themselves fueled the spectacle of Springsteen's success, with fans waving American flags in sold-out stadiums. The previously scrawny, modest Springsteen had joined the country's mania for pumping iron, and his marathon concerts began to resemble athletic events. Constant touring in 1985 (with Nils Lofgren replacing Van Zandt, who went on to pursue a solo career [see entry], and Patti Scialfa added on vocals) took him to the Far East and Australia for the first time.

The 40-song live album package Live/1975–85 (#1, 1986) was released partly to counter the flood of bootlegs that had been traded among fans for years. It featured his cover of Edwin Starr's "War" (#8, 1986), a song whose critique he explicitly aimed in concerts at Reagan's militarism.

In 1984 Springsteen met model/actress Julianne Phillips, and the couple married in May 1985. On Tunnel of Love (#1, 1987) Springsteen recorded some of his most personal songs—including the Grammy-winning "Tunnel of Love" (#9, 1987), "Brilliant Disguise" (#5, 1987), and "One Step Up" (#13, 1988)—in which he detailed love unraveling. The songs proved to be painfully honest. While he was headlining the 1988 Amnesty International Human Rights Now! Tour, tabloids began reporting that Springsteen and Scialfa were having an affair. In August 1988 Phillips filed for divorce. The couple divorced the next year, and Springsteen married Scialfa in 1991. They moved to L.A. and eventually had three children, Evan James, Jessica Rae, and Sam Ryan.

Springsteen was apparently rethinking his life in general during this period. On the Tunnel of Love tour he had tried to shake up the E Street Band's live habits by repositioning them on stage. Still, the large group no longer seemed to be the correct vehicle for his music, and in November 1989 he told them he no longer needed them.

After half a decade's absence Springsteen returned with the simultaneous release of two albums, Human Touch (#2, 1992) (coproduced by Bittan, the only E Street Band member on the album) and Lucky Town (#3, 1992). The albums entered the charts at their peak positions, but merely went platinum as opposed to the multiplatinum of his previous three albums. (All of his albums to this point sold platinum.) Springsteen wasn't aiming for the huge success of Born in the U.S.A., but the pop songs of Human Touch, which he painstakingly had written over several years, received mixed reviews. Critics generally preferred Lucky Town's ruminations on parenting and adulthood, which revealed new possibilities for a more mature Springsteen.

Springsteen performed on a television program for the first time in 1992, appearing on Saturday Night Live. On tour, he recruited a new, younger, and smaller band, but he hadn't quite freed himself from his old, overstated stadium style, and the shows seemed somewhat out of step with the album's more mature tone. For the first time in 15 years, Springsteen played to empty seats. In 1993 Scialfa released her first solo album, Rumble Doll, to general critical praise. That year Springsteen wrote and recorded "Streets of Philadelphia" (#9, 1994) for the Jonathan Demme film Philadelphia; the song won an Academy Award and four Grammys. Greatest Hits, which debuted at #1 on the charts, contained four previously unreleased songs.

In 1995 Springsteen released The Ghost of Tom Joad, an austere record in the tradition of Nebraska that invoked the populism of Steinbeck and Guthrie and applied it to problems of race and class in America at the end of the 20th century. The album, which Springsteen promoted with his first acoustic solo tour, won a Grammy for Best Contemporary Folk Album, although as of this writing it remains his only album not to go platinum.

After that, Springsteen maintained a low profile until the November 1998 announcement of his induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. That same week saw the release of Songs, a coffee-table book containing his song lyrics, as well as Tracks (#27), a career-spanning collection that included 56 unreleased recordings. The album became the first box set ever to debut at #1 on the charts, witnessing to the ongoing relevance of Springsteen's music.

In 1999 Springsteen and the E Street Band reunited for the first time in more than a decade, kicking off their U.S. tour with a record-setting 15 sold-out shows at the Continental Airlines Arena in the group's home state of New Jersey. The band's performances testified to Springsteen's faith in the redemptive power of both rock & roll and the human community. At a show at Madison Square Garden in the spring of 2000, Springsteen also performed "American Skin," a song that explores what happens when that community breaks down—in this case, when New York City police officers shot at West African immigrant Amadou Diallo 41 times while he was reaching for his wallet to show them his ID. Two New York performances were documented on a 2001 live album, which debuted at #5.

Though the band had garnered some critical acclaim and a few minor commercial successes in the late '70s, Squeeze appeared to have broken through in 1981 with East Side Story, which yielded a minor U.S. single in "Tempted" and was one of the most highly praised albums of the year. Despite that auspicious beginning (and a Top 20 hit in 1987 with "Hourglass"), the group's commercial fortunes never improved. Bafflingly, while none of its LPs cracked the Top 30 in the U.S., a 1983 "greatest hits" has been certified platinum.

Chris Difford and Glenn Tilbrook had been writing and performing together since 1973, and claim to have written over 1,000 songs to date. With Difford writing the lyrics and Tilbrook penning the music, the pair created a body of smart, poppish but ultimately sophisticated songs. The group was initially formed as Squeeze, but affixed a "U.K." to avoid confusion with a preexisting American band called Tight Squeeze, when the latter disbanded, it went back to Squeeze.

The title tune from Cool for Cats, featuring Chris Difford's eccentric guttural vocals, was a #2 U.K. hit and achieved some dance floor success in the U.S.; "Up the Junction" from the same LP fared similarly. Argy Bargy yielded "Pulling Mussels [From a Shell]," "Another Nail in My Heart," and "If I Didn't Love You," none hits but all frequently played in new-wave clubs and on new-wave format radio.

In late 1980 Holland left to form his own band, the Millionaires. He was replaced by Paul Carrack, formerly of Ace (see entry), he'd sung Ace's hit "How Long," which Squeeze included in its live concerts and sang "Tempted," from the Elvis Costello-coproduced East Side Story. Carrack left to join Carlene Carter's band, then to work with her then-husband Nick Lowe's Noise to Go. He was replaced by ex-Sincero Don Snow for Sweets, another well-received LP, which yielded FM staples in "Black Coffee in Bed" and "I Can't Hold On." Difford became involved in England's antinuclear movement and wrote what he called the band's "first protest song," "Apple Tree," which was to be included on Sweets but, for unknown reasons, was not. That year Difford also cowrote "Boy With a Problem" with Elvis Costello for Costello's Imperial Bedroom (Tilbrook had appeared on Costello's Trust earlier), and Squeeze played its first Madison Square Garden concert.

In the fall of 1982 the group broke up. Difford and Tilbrook continued to collaborate, and released one eponymously titled album before re-forming the band with Holland, Lavis, and Keith Wilkinson. The resulting Così Fan Tutti Frutti, another critical hit, topped at #57, and Babylon and On, which contained "Hourglass" and "853-5937," stopped at #36. The next two albums did not reach the Top 100. In the meantime, Holland, something of a personality, had hosted a U.K. music show from 1982 to 1987. He then hosted NBC's Sunday Night, a unique and respected music performance series not unlike the later MTV Unplugged. In England, he has hosted film documentaries, written and starred in a U.K. sitcom about Martians, and hosted the BBC's Juke Box Jury and Later With Jools Holland. He now plays cool jazz, often backed by a large ensemble.

In 1993, between solo work and stints with Mike + the Mechanics, Carrack returned to Squeeze for Some Fantastic Place, which peaked at #182 and produced the single "Everything in the World." More lineup changes ensued for 1996's Ridiculous and 1999's Domino. Carrack resumed his solo career, drummer Pete Thomas arrived and left to rejoin the Attractions, ex-Roxy Music drummer Andy Newmark came and went, Holland's brother Christopher and ex-Del Amitri drummer Ashley Soan came on board. In 1999 Difford, who had stopped drinking years before, shocked fans by bowing out of the band's American tour, opting not to risk his sobriety. As of 2001, the group's future was in doubt, and Tilbrook released a solo album.

Billy Squier

Born May 12, 1950, Wellesley Hills, MA

1980—The Tale of the Tape (Capitol) 1981—Don't Say No 1982—Emotions in Motion 1984—Signs of Life 1986—Enough Is Enough 1989—Hear & Now 1991—Creatures of Habit 1993—Tell the Truth 1995—The Best of Billy Squier: 16 Strokes 1999—Happy Blue (J-Bird).

After more than a decade of performing, heavy-metal guitarist Billy Squier hit it big in 1981 with "The Stroke" and enjoyed a few years of multiplatinum albums.

Squier grew up in an affluent Boston suburb, and after graduating from high school he moved to New York, where he and several friends formed Magic Terry and the Universe. Squier later returned to the Boston area, where he studied at the Berklee School of Music, planning to become a music teacher. But he soon returned to New York where in 1973 he joined the pop group the Sidewinders (he does not appear on their LP). Next he joined Piper, but after two LPs (Piper and Can't Wait) the group disbanded, and Squier began a solo career.

After his lackluster The Tale of the Tape (#169, 1980), Squier came back strong with a #5 LP (Don't Say No) and the Top 20 "The Stroke." The album also included "My Kinda Lover" (#45, 1981) and "In the Dark" (#35, 1981) and was eventually certified triple platinum. The next year's Emotions in Motion included "Everybody Wants You" (#32, 1982); it sold over 2 million copies, boosted by heavy rotation on MTV. Much to Squier's chagrin, he was embraced as something of a teen idol, an image that was blatantly (even embarrassingly) exploited in the video for "Rock Me Tonight" (#15, 1984). That song, from Squier's last platinum album, Signs of Life (#11, 1984), was also his last Top 40 single to date.

Subsequent albums failed to hit: Enough Is Enough and Hear & Now went Top 70, while Creatures of Habit didn't cross into the Hot 100. In 1999 he released the acoustic Happy Blue, which boasted a radically different version of "The Stroke."

Katharine Whalen's Jazz Squad: 1999—Jazz Squad (Mammoth). Tom Maxwell solo: 2000—Samsara (Samsara Limited).

The Squirrel Nut Zippers are an aggregation of erstwhile indie rockers who came together around their shared passion for old-time blues, jazz, and string-band music. The last thing they expected was to find themselves at the forefront of a swing revival that would make its way into the cultural mainstream.

The Zippers grew out of a series of potluck dinners-cum-picking sessions held during the summer of 1993 at the Eland, North Carolina, farmhouse of musical and marital partners Jim Mathus and Katharine Whalen. Mathus had been the drummer for a Chapel Hill indie-rock outfit called Metal Flake Mother but wanted to learn to master the country blues he'd heard while growing up in the Mississippi Delta; Whalen loved the jazz singing of Billie Holiday and Chet Baker. Tom Maxwell, Ken Mosher, and Chris Phillips—all regulars at the couple's get-togethers—stirred elements of calypso, hot jazz, and swing into the mix, and it wasn't long before the ensemble was gigging around Chapel Hill.

Naming themselves after Mathus' favorite brand of candy, a chewy, peanut-flavored sweet made by confectioners in Massachusetts, the Zippers released a three-song vinyl EP that included "Roasted Right" on Merge in 1994. The group later signed to another North Carolina-based label, Mammoth, for which they recorded their debut album, The Inevitable, in 1995. The record sold moderately well, boosted in part by the inclusion of the song "Anything But Love" on the soundtrack for the movie Flirting With Disaster, starring Ben Stiller. But their real commercial breakthrough came with "Hell," a Caribbean-flavored number from their second album, Hot, which became a hit on radio and MTV. Hot (#27, 1997) eventually went platinum and the Zippers were soon receiving invitations to appear on A Prairie Home Companion, Late Night With Conan O'Brien, and The Late Show With David Letterman, as well as at the 1996 Summer Olympics. Once the hubbub surrounding "Hell" died down (the band released an EP as a stop-gap measure in 1997), the Zippers returned with Perennial Favorites (#18, 1998), which added Klezmer and Western swing to their musical palette. Whalen and Maxwell subsequently released solo albums (Maxwell left the band toward the end of 1998), while the Zippers returned with their fourth full-length record, Bedlam Ballroom, in the fall of 2000.

Lisa Stansfield

Born Apr. 11, 1966, Rochdale, Eng.

1989—Affection (Arista) 1991—Real Love 1993—So Natural 1997—Lisa Stansfield 1998—The #1 Remixes EP.

Lisa Stansfield topped the pop and R&B charts internationally in the early '90s, a rare feat for a white female soul singer from a small town in England. Stansfield started singing in her early teens. Although she had no formal training, she plied her skill arduously at talent contests and social clubs. In the early '80s she hosted the British children's television program Razzamatazz. In 1983 she formed the group Blue Zone with former schoolmates Andy Morris and Ian Devaney (her future boyfriend). The trio released several singles and the album Big Thing but never broke out of the Manchester club circuit.

In 1989 the British production team Coldcut recorded "People Hold On" with Blue Zone, and the single went to the U.K. Top 20. Arista signed Stansfield as a solo artist, with Morris and Devaney as her composers, musicians, and producers. The platinum Affection (#9 pop, #5 R&B, 1990) became an international hit, with the singles "This Is the Right Time" (#21 pop, #13 R&B, 1990), "All Around the World" (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1990), and "You Can't Deny It" (#14 pop, #1 R&B, 1990). Stansfield broke a color and ocean barrier by topping the U.S. R&B chart three times. In England she won Best British Female Artist at the BRIT Awards in 1991, although she angered organizers by using the show to speak out against the Gulf War.

For Real Love (#43 pop, #18 R&B, 1991), Stansfield cut off her trademark spit curl and presented herself as a more serious, mature artist. The singles "Change" (#27, 1991), "All Woman" (#1 R&B, 1992), and "A Little More Love" (#30 R&B, 1992) fared better with R&B and Adult Contemporary audiences than with the pop market. In 1992 she recorded a new version of "All Around the World" with one of her musical influences, Barry White. Stansfield sang Cole Porter's "Down in the Depths" for the AIDS benefit album Red Hot + Blue.

So Natural (1993), however, was a commercial and artistic disappointment, a record bloated with ballads that even Stansfield admits were self-indulgent. Its self-titled successor (#55 pop, #30 R&B, 1997) was anything but, galvanized by covers of Barry White's "Never, Never Gonna Give You Up" (#74 pop, #38 R&B) and Phyllis Hyman's "You Know How to Love Me," the album was a soulful return to form. Stansfield then tried her hand at acting, starring in the movie Swing, a well-received romantic comedy about a swing band from Liverpool. The picture's 1999 soundtrack album found her re-creating "Mack the Knife" and other swing-era standards.

(Pointblank/Charisma) 1994—Father Father.

First as gospel singers and then as a soul-pop group, the Staples family has maintained a strong following and had several pop and soul hits, usually fronted by Mavis Staples' breathy vocals. The Staples family goes back to Mississippi, where as a young man Roebuck Staples played guitar and sang in local choirs. In the mid-'30s, he and his wife, Oceola, traveled up the Mississippi River to Chicago in search of work, like many of their contemporaries. The Staples had three daughters and a son, each of whom sang from an early age. They put together a family gospel act (which, until the mid-'60s, included all but the youngest daughter, Yvonne) and by the mid-'50s were considered one of the finest vocal groups in the field. The group made its first recording in the early '50s, for Pops Staples' own label, "These Are They" b/w "Faith and Grace," which they sold at concerts. In 1953 they recorded for United, and three years later for Vee-Jay, both Chicago labels, without success. In the early '60s the Staples made their first pop (secular) recordings for Epic, but had no commercial success, although 1967's "Why" snuck onto the lower reaches of the pop chart, and a version of Buffalo Springfield's "For What It's Worth" also charted later that year. Everything changed after they signed to Stax in 1968. Their new maternal continued to reflect the Staples' commitment to making secular music with a message, but not until 1972's gold Beatitude: Respect Yourself did they make the approach commercial. The Staples' first secular hit was "Heavy Makes You Happy" (#27 pop, #6 R&B); and their next two hits, "Respect Yourself" (#12 pop, #2 R&B) and "I'll Take You There" (#1 pop and R&B), went gold. "If You're Ready (Come Go With Me)" was a #1 R&B hit in 1973. The Staples had succeeded in meshing Memphis soul shuffles with their own messages, and might have continued to release crossover hits were it not for Stax's mid-'70s decline and eventual closing.

Curtis Mayfield's Curton label was their next home, and in 1974 the Staples had a #1 pop and R&B hit with his "Let's Do It Again" and a #4 hit with "New Orleans," both from the film Let's Do It Again. Mayfield also produced two of Mavis' solo albums. A couple of years later, at Warner Bros. the group changed their name to "the Staples" and released two R&B Top 20 singles: "Love Me, Love Me, Love Me" (#11 R&B, 1976) and "Unlock Your Mind" (#16 R&B, 1978). None of their singles charted again until 1984, when three, including a cover of Talking Heads' "Slippery People," appeared. Their last R&B Top 40 single was a 1985 version of "Are You Ready?" The group appeared in 1971's Soul to Soul, a documentary of a concert in Ghana, and in Wattstax (1973), and The Last Waltz (1978). In 1999 the Staple Singers were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Mavis Staples also recorded solo, but without comparable success, in part because her own career was frequently suspended due to group obligations. In 1987 Prince signed her to his Paisley Park label, for whom she recorded Time Waits for No One, which he coproduced with Al Bell (who had worked with the Staples at Stax). She opened for Prince on the overseas leg of his 1990 tour and appeared on his Graffiti Bridge. In addition, she has appeared on records by a range of artists, including Aretha Franklin (One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism), John Mayall, Ray Charles, Kenny Loggins, and Marty Stuart. Pops, who also released solo albums, appears on Mavis' The Voice. His 1994 release Father, Father won that year's Grammy for Best Contemporary Blues Album. He died in 2000, after falling in his home and suffering a concussion; he was 85.

Edwin Starr

Born Charles Hatcher, Jan. 21, 1942, Nashville, TN
 1968—Soul Master (Gordy) 1969—25 Miles; Just We Two 1970—War & Peace 1971—Involved 1974—Hell Up in Harlem soundtrack (Tamlam) 1976—Free to Be Myself (Granite)
 1977—Edwin Starr (GTO) 1978—Clean (20th Century-Fox)
 1979—Happy Radio 1981—The Best of Edwin Starr.

Singer/songwriter Edwin Starr's rough, powerful voice has made him a memorable but erratic hitmaker since the mid-'60s, though he is best known in the United States for his 1970 #1 protest song "War."

Starr sang in high school and began his professional career on Ric-Tic Records, a Detroit-based label that copied the sound of its crosstown rival, Motown, in many of its releases. On Ric-Tic, Starr had hits with his own "Agent Double-O-Soul" (#21 pop, #8 R&B, 1965) and "Stop Her on Sight (S.O.S.);" (#9 R&B, 1966). In 1968 Ric-Tic was purchased by Motown. The gritty Starr-penned "Twenty-five Miles" (#6 pop and R&B, 1969) is regarded as a soul classic. "I'm Still a Strugglin' Man" (#27 R&B) was the followup.

With producer Norman Whitfield, Starr had success in 1970 with two social commentary songs, "War" (#1 pop, #3 R&B) and "Stop the War Now" (#26 pop, #5 R&B). The next year brought "Funky Music Sho Nuff Turns Me On" (#6 R&B). During the late '70s, Starr recorded for 20th Century-Fox Records. His most successful singles of the period were "H.A.P.P.Y. Radio" (#79 pop, #28 R&B, 1979) and "Contact" (#65 pop, #13 R&B, 1979). In 1982 he cut a comical commentary song, "Tired of It," for Montage Records.

Around 1983 Starr moved to England, where, like many other '60s singers, he found a receptive audience. In fact, "H.A.P.P.Y. Radio" and "Contact" had been Top 10 hits there. He has since participated in the Ferry Aid single, "Let It Be" (1987), and recorded with Stock/Aitken/Waterman ("Whatever Makes Our Love Grow"). "It Ain't Fair" reached #56 there in 1985. As of the late '80s, Starr was living in a country manor outside of Birmingham. He owned a rehearsal studio and cafe in Birmingham.

Ringo Starr

Born Richard Starkey Jr., July 7, 1940, Liverpool, Eng.
 1970—Sentimental Journey (Apple); Beaucoups of Blues
 1973—Ringo 1974—Goodnight Vienna 1975—Blast From Your Past 1976—Ringo's Rotogravure (Atlantic) 1977—Ringo the 4th 1978—Bad Boy 1981—Stop and Smell the Roses (Boardwalk) 1983—Old Wave (RCA, Can.) 1989—Starr Struck: Best of Ringo Starr, vol. 2 (1976-1983) (Rhino)

Man (Mercury); VH1 Storytellers 1999—I Wanna Be Santa Claus 2001—The Anthology . . . So Far: Ringo Starr and His All-Starr Band (Kuch).

While some accused Ringo Starr of being a clumsy drummer, many more agreed with George Harrison's assessment: "Ringo's the best backbeat in the business." And while many in the wake of the Beatles' breakup predicted that Starr would be the one without a solo career, he proved them wrong. Not only has he released several LPs (the first came out before the Beatles disbanded) and hit singles, but he's also the only Beatle to establish a film-acting career for himself outside of the band's mid-'60s movies.

Young Richard Starkey's parents had divorced when he was three, and he was raised by his mother and stepfather, a Liverpool house painter his mother married eight years later. By the time he was 13, he'd been in and out of the hospital several times with pleurisy, and once, at age six, with appendicitis. After leaving the hospital in 1955, too old to return to school, he became a messenger boy for British Railways. In 1959, while working as an apprentice engineer, he got his first drum set as a Christmas present, and he joined the Ed Clayton Skiffle Group soon after. By 1961, he was playing drums in Rory Storm's Hurricanes. It was while on tour with that band in Hamburg, Germany, in 1961 that he met John Lennon, Paul McCartney, and George Harrison. A year later, when drummer Pete Best was ousted from the Beatles, Starr agreed to join them. The Ringo stage name came from his penchant for wearing lots of rings.

Beginning with "Boys" on the Beatles' first British album, Starr was given the occasional lead vocal, usually on covers of country tunes such as Carl Perkins' "Honey Don't" and "Matchbox" and Buck Owens' "Act Naturally." Later he sang the lead on "Yellow Submarine" and "With a Little Help From My Friends," songs written for him by Lennon and McCartney. The Beatles (the so-called White Album) in 1968 featured Starr's first songwriting credit, "Don't Pass Me By." After appearing in three films with the Beatles, in 1967 Starr made his solo film debut playing a Mexican gardener in the film of Terry Southern's Candy. He appeared in The Magic Christian (1969, also from a Southern book); in 1970 he costarred with David Essex in That'll Be the Day; in 1973 he documented the success of glitter-rock star T. Rex by directing Born to Boogie; in 1975 he costarred again with Essex in Stardust; and in 1981 he starred in the moderately successful U.S. feature Caveman (in April of that year he married his Caveman costar Barbara Bach; it was his second marriage).

Starr's solo recording career began in 1970, just prior to the Beatles' breakup, with Sentimental Journey (#22, 1970), a collection of Tin Pan Alley standards (allegedly to please his mother) produced by George Martin, with a different arranger for each track. Beaucoups of Blues (#65, 1970), released later that year, was a country-music collaboration with guitarist Pete Drake and other Nashville sessionmen. It fared better than its predecessor, but failed to yield a hit. In 1971 Starr appeared on Lennon's Plastic Ono Band and Har-nson's All Things Must Pass LPs, and recorded two hit singles, the hard-rocking "It Don't Come Easy" (#4) and "Back Off Boogaloo" (#9). (Starr later acknowledged that Harrison had cowritten these two songs without being credited.)

Starr appeared at Harrison's Concerts for Bangladesh and in 1972 sat in on Peter Frampton's Wind of Change LP. In 1973 he recorded Ringo (#2, 1973), with Richard Perry producing. The LP included three Top 10 singles—"Photograph" (#1), "You're Sixteen" (#1), and "Oh My My" (#5)—and featured songs and playing by the other Beatles; Lennon contributed "I'm the Greatest," McCartney "Six O'Clock," and Harrison "Sunshine Life for Me." Goodnight Vienna (#8, 1974) yielded hit singles in Hoyt Axton's "No No Song" (#3) and "Only You" (#6). Blast From Your Past, a greatest-hits package, went to #30 in 1975. While comanaging a furniture-designing business with his brother in London, Starr in 1975 started his own label, Ring O' Records, and signed to Atlantic. Compared to his previous solo success, his albums for his new label made little impression; Ringo's Rotogravure, despite guest appearances by Lennon, McCartney, Eric Clapton, and Peter Frampton, stopped at #28 with one Top 30 single, "Dose of Rock 'n' Roll," and Ringo the 4th, at #162, was a flop. Bad Boy (#129, 1978) continued the downward spiral.

Starr remained a familiar presence, though. In 1976 he played at the Band's San Francisco farewell concert and appeared in the film of the event, The Last Waltz. In 1977 he contributed to an LP by British skiffle pioneer Lonnie Donegan. In late 1981 Starr had a Top 40 hit with "Wrack My Brain," from Stop and Smell the Roses (#98, 1981), a tune written and produced by George Harrison. None of his subsequent albums has come near the Top 100.

Old Wave was not released in the U.S. or the U.K., and during this time Starr suffered from myriad problems, foremost among them alcoholism and drug abuse, for which both he and his wife Barbara sought treatment at the Betty Ford Center in 1988. At one point earlier, Starr's drinking had gotten so bad that he went to court to block the release of material he recorded in 1987. In the meantime, Starr became a star of the kiddie set in his portrayal of the miniature conductor and narrator of the acclaimed PBS series Shining Time Station, between 1989 and 1991. (Starr had first narrated the British series Thomas the Tank Engine and Friends back in 1984.)

Starr has since formed several celebrity configurations of his All-Starr Band. The first, in 1989, featured Levon Helm, Joe Walsh, Clarence Clemons, Rick Danko, Billy Preston, and Dr. John. A 1992 lineup included Ringo's son Zak on drums, Walsh, Timothy B. Schmit, Dave Edmunds, Nils Lofgren, and Todd Rundgren. Later editions have included the Who's John Entwistle, Procol Harum's Gary Brooker, Jack Bruce, Peter Frampton, and Bachman-Turner Overdrive's Randy Bachman. The 1992 release of Time Takes Time, coinciding with the silver anniversary of Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band, brought a new flush of publicity for Starr, who often made it amply clear to interviewers that he did not wish to talk about the Beatles.

Though Starr has had little success as a recording artist in the '80s and '90s, he is never long out of view. He appeared in Paul McCartney's Give My Regards to Broad Street (1984), a television production of Alice in Wonderland (1985), with Zak on the Artists Against Apartheid album and video (1985), with ex-band mate Harrison in the video for "When We Was Fab" (1988), and as himself on The Simpsons (1990). In 1994 Starr's first wife, Maureen Cox Starkey Tigrett, died of cancer.

Starr returned to the studio in the late '90s. First he reunited with the other surviving Beatles to record two tracks for the new Anthology 1 in 1995; he then released Vertical Man (#61, 1998), his most successful album in 20 years. Guests ranged from familiar faces like McCartney and Harrison to newcomers Alanis Morissette and Stone Temple Pilots' Scott Weiland, and the songs included a cover of the Beatles' "Love Me Do." The following year Starr recorded his first seasonal album, I Wanna Be Santa Claus. In 2001 he hit the road with a new All Starr Band that included Ian Hunter, Sheila E., Greg Lake, Howard Jones, and Roger Hodgson (Supertramp).

Status Quo

Britain's longest-running hard-rock boogie band. Status Quo has actually had only one U.K. #1 single, "Down Down," in late 1974, and one U.S. hit single, the psychedelic-pop classic "Pictures of Matchstick Men" in 1968 (#12; also a Top 10 U.K. hit).

As schoolmates, the group's members began playing together as the Spectres, who in 1966 recorded two singles for Pye Records. In 1967 they became Traffic Jam and released another single. That year, they changed their name to Status Quo. By 1970, the band had dropped its high-harmony pop style for heavy-metal boogie. Its albums became consistent big sellers in the U.K. Despite touring America in the '70s, the group never broke into the U.S. market.

In England Status Quo released four albums that entered the U.K. chart at #1. Among the band's 45 U.K. charting singles are the Top 5 hits "Caroline" (1973), "Rockin' All Over the World" (1977), "Whatever You Want" (1979), "What You're Proposing" (1980), "Marguenta Time" (1983), "In the Army Now" (1986), "Burning Bridges (On and Off and On Again)" (1988), and "The Anniversary Waltz—Part 1" (1990). This longevity and tenacity have made the musicians legends at home, sort of the Cliff Richard of heavy metal: phenomenally successful but predictable and safe. Despite the expected rounds of personnel changes, Status Quo has remained commercially viable. In a 1993 Q magazine interview with Rossi and Parfitt, the pair revealed their unpretentious and very un-rock-star-like charm. Rossi said, "So what if we're boring and only do three chords? There's no point in getting hung up about it," and "As far as I know, our lyrics mean nothing."

Stealers Wheel

Formed 1972, London, Eng.

Gerry Rafferty (b. Apr. 16, 1947, Paisley, Scot.), gtr., voc.; Joe Egan (b. Scot.), kybds., voc.; Rab Noakes, gtr.; Ian Campbell, bass; Roger Brown, drums, voc.

1973—(- Noakes; - Campbell; - Brown; + Paul Pilnick, gtr.; + Tony Williams, bass; + Rod Coombes, drums) Stealers Wheel (A&M) 1974—(- Pilnick; - Williams; - Coombes; + Gary Taylor, bass; + Joe Jammer, gtr.; + Andrew Steele, drums) Ferguslie Park 1975—(+ Bernie Holland, gtr.; + Dave Wintour, bass) Right or Wrong 1976—Stuck in the Middle With You.

One of the most critically respected pop groups of the mid-'70s, Stealers Wheel was so ridden with internal turmoil that it was never able to capitalize on its one big hit, "Stuck in the Middle With You," from its Leiber-Stoller-produced debut LP, which made #6 in the U.K. and #2 in the U.S. in 1973.

Gerry Rafferty [see entry] formed the original Stealers Wheel, which never recorded. The band regrouped with Rafferty, Joe Egan, and guitarist Paul Pilnick (formerly of Liverpool band the Big Three; Pilnick later worked with Badger) and drummer Rod Coombes, later of the Strawbs. Stealers Wheel's eponymously titled debut included "Stuck in the Middle With You" and went to #50 in the U.S., but Rafferty had quit before it was released, and only rejoined the band after it had become a hit.

Leiber and Stoller produced Ferguslie Park—for which the band included ex-Spooky Tooth guitarist Luther Grosvenor, who would go on to Mott the Hoople—and though the album was again critically acclaimed, it yielded only a Top 30 U.S. single in "Star" and sold poorly. Rafferty and Egan, the obvious nucleus of Stealers Wheel, fell out with Leiber and Stoller before recording a third LP. Mentor Williams produced Right or Wrong, but its release was held up for 18 months because of managerial problems, and by the time it came out the public had apparently forgotten Stealers Wheel. Rafferty and Egan were reportedly no longer speaking to each other after the LP's release. Rafferty went on to have a briefly spectacular solo career, while Egan continued to record as well. In 1993 "Stuck in the Middle With You" was resurrected when it was featured in the Quentin Tarantino film Reservoir Dogs.

Steeleye Span

Formed 1969, England

Ashley Hutchings (b. Jan. 1945, London, Eng.), bass; Maddy Prior (b. Aug. 14, 1947, Blackpool, Eng.), voc.; Tim Hart (b. Jan. 9, 1948, Lincoln, Eng.), gtr., voc., dulcimer; Gay Woods, voc., concertina; Terry Woods, gtr.

1970—Hark! The Village Wait (Chrysalis) (- C. Woods; - T. Nov. 15, 1941, Little Handford, Eng.], bass, voc.; + Bob Johnson, lead gtr., voc.) Below the Salt 1973—Parcel of Rogues 1974—(+ Nigel Pegrum, drums) Now We Are Six 1975—Commoner's Crown; All Around My Hat 1976—Rocket Cottage 1977—(+ John Kirkpatrick, voc., accordion; + Carthy) Storm Force 10; Original Masters 1978—Live at Last (- Knight; - Johnson; group disbands) 1980—(group re-forms: Prior; Hart; Kemp; Johnson; Pegrum; Knight; numerous personnel changes follow) Sails of Silver (Takoma) 1986—Back in Line (Shanachie) 1989—Tempted and Tried; Portfolio 1992—Tonight's the Night, Live 1995—(+ Woods) 1996—Time 1997—(- Prior) 1999—Horkstow Grange (Park).

Steeleye Span was formed with the idea of introducing electric instruments to traditional British folk music—updating mainly 17th- and 18th-century works found in the journals of the English Folk Dance and Song Society.

Founder Ashley Hutchings, formerly bassist for trad-rockers Fairport Convention, left that band after its Liege and Lief. Hutchings sought out more purely history-obsessed musicians and came up with two teams: Maddy Prior and Tim Hart (who had performed locally in St. Albans, England, and recorded three traditional albums) plus Gay and Terry Woods (a married couple who were part of the folk-rock group Sweeney's Men). The new fivesome took their name from a character in the Lincolnshire ballad "Horkstow Grange" and recorded Hark! The Village Wait in 1970. A few months later the Woodses left, and Hart brought in Martin Carthy, another folk-scene regular, and Peter Knight.

The new lineup recorded two LPs in 1971, Please to See the King and Ten Man Mop, which included more amplification on their all-traditional pieces. They began to attract attention, especially for Maddy Prior's vocals. The group was appearing in a play written for them called Carunna, by Keith Dewhurst, when Hutchings lost confidence in the project and, in 1971, left to form the very traditional Albion Country Band. Carthy also left. Their replacements were the more rock-oriented Rick Kemp (who had worked with Mike Chapman and spent a week once in King Crimson) and Bob Johnson (who had played in a folk duo with Knight).

This lineup gave Steeleye their first real success. Below the Salt in 1972 was their U.S. debut and the Latin a cappella song "Gaudete" became a British hit in 1973. By now, Hart, Carthy, and Prior were doing solo work. In 1973 the band released Parcel of Rogues, with its first drummer, ex-Gnldgrolog member Nigel Pegrum. He joined full time in 1974, making them a six-piece, inspiring the title of their next LP, Now We Are Six, produced by Jethro Tull's Ian Anderson. The band members began to write their own songs and settings for traditional lyrics. Its popularity increased in the UK with the gold hit single "Thomas the Rhymer." The LP also featured David Bowie playing sax on "To Know Him Is to Love Him." Commoner's Crown in 1975 featured actor Peter Sellers playing ukulele on "New York Girls," and the even more commercial All Around My Hat gave them a big British hit with the title track, and also their first U.S. charting A cut began to grow in America, drawn to the band's live show, which featured Prior's nimble jigs. In 1976 Prior recorded the album Silly Sisters with traditional singer June Tabor, and the two toured England. That solo outlet was indicative of the band's splintering, though. After Rocket Cottage failed to sell even in England, Knight and Johnson produced a duo album, The King of Elfland's Daughter.

In 1977, with the newly rejoined Carthy and Kirkpatrick, Knight and Johnson announced their departure, but first the band gave a farewell concert on March 7, 1978, captured on Live at Last. The group has gotten back together several times since with various original members floating in and out of the lineup. Steeleye Span resurfaced with the most popular lineup—Prior and Hart plus Johnson, Kemp, Knight, and Pegrum—on Sails of Silver. Prior has continued to record solo, as well. Gay Woods returned before 1996's Time, the band's first studio album in seven years. She fronted Steeleye Span on 1999's Horkstow Grange, which marked the departure of Prior, the only constant through the previous personnel changes.

Steel Pulse

Formed 1975, Birmingham, Eng.

Selwyn "Bumbo" Brown (b. June 4, 1956, London, Eng.), kybds., voc.; David Hinds (b. June 15, 1956, Birmingham), gtr., voc.; Stephen "Grizzly" Nisbett (b. Mar. 15, 1948, Nevis, West Indies), drums.

1978—Handsworth Revolution (Mango) 1979—Tribute to the Martyrs 1980—Reggae Fever 1982—True Democracy (Elektra) 1983—Earth Crisis 1984—Reggae Greats (Mango) 1986—Babylon the Bandit (Elektra) 1988—State of Emergency (MCA) 1991—Victims 1992—Rastafari Centennial: Live in Paris—Elysée Montmartre 1994—Vex

1996—Rastanthology (Wiseman Doctrine) 1997—Sound System (Island) 1997—Rage and Fury (Mesa/Blue Moon) 1999—Living Legacy (WEA/Lightyear).

Steel Pulse was one of the prime movers in the movement that cross-fertilized reggae rhythms with punk's energy. David Hinds and Selwyn Brown were inspired to start Steel Pulse by listening to Bob Marley and the Wailers' Catch a Fire By 1976, with punk in full swing, the group began to play punk venues such as Manchester's Electric Circus and the Hope and Anchor in London.

Though originally a traditional-sounding reggae unit, the band experimented with lush production after moving to Elektra in 1982. While Steel Pulse's loose-limbed grooves and the soaring vocals of Hinds and Brown caught most listeners' ears, Steel Pulse's politics have played a large part of its career. The group was among the early leaders of the Rock Against Racism movement in the late '70s; in the late '80s, Hinds joined a million-dollar class-action suit against the New York City Taxi and Limousine Commission after repeatedly being ignored by New York's cab drivers. Steel Pulse's radicalism has not lost them admirers; the band's 1986 album Babylon the Bandit won the Best Reggae Album Grammy, and the live Rastafari Centennial, widely hailed as a return to form, was nominated for the award in 1992. The following year Steel Pulse performed at Bill Clinton's inauguration, the first reggae band to ever receive such an invitation.

All through the '90s, Steel Pulse continued to craftily court the mainstream while maintaining strong political views—typically, 1997's Rage and Fury featured both a cover of Van Morrison's "Brown Eyed Girl" and a guest appearance by Spearhead's activist frontman Michael Franti. Living Legacy includes live material recorded between 1996 and 1999.

Steely Dan

Formed 1972, Los Angeles, CA

Walter Becker (b. Feb. 20, 1950, Queens, NY), bass, gtr., voc.; Donald Fagen (b. Jan. 10, 1948, Passaic, NJ), kybds., voc.; Denny Dias, gtr.; Jim Hodder (d. June 5, 1990), drums.

Walter Becker solo: 1994—11 Tracks of Whack (Giant).

Less a band than a concept, Steely Dan was one of the most advanced, successful, and mysterious pop units of the '70s. Combining pop hooks with jazz harmonies, complicated time changes and cryptic, often highly ironic lyrics, the band sounded like no one else. Because of the perfectionism of founders Donald Fagen and Walter Becker, the outfit rarely toured, and toward the end, was composed almost entirely of session musicians, while Becker and Fagen began to play less and less on their own albums. Producer Gary Katz became Steely Dan's "third member," as much because of Becker and Fagen's insistence on pristine sound quality as for Katz's role in forming the band. With Becker and Fagen fronting a version of Steely Dan that toured to great success in 1993, they proved that their long-lived cult was very much alive. And the 2000 release of Two Against Nature resurrected the band as a viable recording unit, and also won Steely Dan several Grammy Awards.

Meeting in 1967 at Bard College in upstate New York, Becker and Fagen played in amateur bands, ranging from jazz to rock to pop to progressive rock, one—Bad Rock Group—included future comedian Chevy Chase on drums. Becker and Fagen began composing together and toured from 1970 to 1971 as backing musicians for Jay and the Americans under the pseudonyms Tristan Fabriani (Fagen) and Gustav Mahler (Becker). They also wrote and recorded the album You Gotta Walk It Like You Talk It, produced by Kenny Vance of Jay and the Americans. They tried unsuccessfully to start a Long Island band with guitarist Denny Dias, then moved to New York City to sell their tunes to publishers, but had little success aside from placing "I Mean to Shine" on a Barbra Streisand album. They did, however, meet independent producer Gary Katz, who enlisted them at ABC/Dunhill Records in L.A. as staff songwriters as a stipulation to accepting his own contract as a staff producer. It was Katz who hatched the idea for what would become Steely Dan. Steely Dan was the name of a dildo in William Burroughs' Naked Lunch.

Steely Dan's debut, Can't Buy a Thrill (#17, 1972), yielded two hit singles, "Do It Again" (#6, 1972) and, featuring guitarist Elliot Randall, "Reeling in the Years" (#11, 1973). Hailed by critics, the album sold well. Put off by a singles-oriented audience, as well as inadequate rehearsals, Becker, Fagen, and Katz considered Steely Dan's first tour a total disaster. Countdown to Ecstasy (#35, 1973) contained no hit singles—possibly because singer David Palmer had left to form the abortive Big Wha-Koo, forcing Fagen's distinctive vocals to the fore.

On their next effort, Steely Dan was joined by singer/key-boardist Michael McDonald, who sang mostly backup vocals. Pretzel Logic (#8, 1974) featured "Rikki Don't Lose That Number" (#4, 1974) and more pronounced jazz leanings; the opening of "Rikki" was a nod to hard-bop pianist Horace Silver, and "Parker's Band" saluted bebop giant Charlie Parker. In 1974 Steely Dan went on their last tour for nearly two decades. Hodder resumed session work; Baxter and then McDonald joined the Doobie Brothers [see entry]; though Dias continued to work with Becker and Fagen for some time, he also returned to playing sessions. Becker and Fagen amassed enormous debts by spending lengthy spells in the studio with high-priced sessionmen. Katy Lied (#13, 1975), the first Steely Dan LP by Becker and Fagen plus session players, contained a single that inched into the Top 40, "Black Friday" (#37, 1975), and featured a solo on "Dr. Wu" by jazz alto saxophonist Phil Woods. The DBX noise-reduction system used to enhance the sound malfunctioned, and the album's sleeve contained a lengthy apology from Becker, Fagen, and Katz; still, it sounded cleaner than most contemporary releases. A scheduled tour was scrapped during rehearsals.

The Royal Scam, like most Steely Dan albums, sold well (#15, 1976) and presented some of Becker/Fagen's most mordant lyrics. The seven-song Aja (#3, 1977), which included FM favorites like "Peg" (#11, 1977) and "Deacon Blues" (#19, 1978), played by such expert sidemen as the Crusaders, Wayne Shorter, and Lee Ritenour, went Top 5 within three weeks of its release, and became the band's first platinum album. In 1978 jazz bandleader Woody Herman's Thundering Herd Big Band recorded five Becker-Fagen songs, selected by and under the supervision of the duo. A subsequent contractual dispute with MCA (which had absorbed ABC Records) delayed the release of Gaucho (#9, 1980), which yielded "Hey Nineteen" (#10, 1980) and featured guitar work by Mark Knopfler and Rick Derringer. Its B side was Steely Dan's only live recording, "Bodhisattva," from the 1974 tour. Also in 1978, Steely Dan's contribution to the movie FM, "FM (No Static at All)" (#22), was that soundtrack's highlight. In 1980 Becker suffered a broken leg and other injuries when a car hit him while he was walking in Manhattan.

The following year Becker and Fagen announced that they would go separate ways, though their management denied it would be a permanent separation. In 1982 Gaucho won a Grammy for Best Engineered Album, as had Aja in 1978. Such passion for sonic detail paid off when, during the '80s and the advent of CDs, Steely Dan's highly crafted catalogue steadily sold. Fagen released his solo The Nightfly in 1982 to stellar reviews, then waited until 1993 for the Becker-produced Kamakiriad. During that time, Becker produced such artists as Rickie Lee Jones and China Crisis and handled production work for New Age label Windham Hill and jazz label Triloka. After his girlfriend died from a drug overdose (her mother tried to sue Becker, claiming that he had fostered the young woman's drug problem), Becker overcame his own substance-abuse problems.

In the early '90s Becker and Fagen appeared in concert with the New York Rock and Soul Revue alongside Boz Scaggs, Phoebe Snow, and Michael McDonald, documenting the gigs on 1991's Live at the Beacon. In 1993, nearly two decades since their last concert, Becker and Fagen headed an 11-piece version of Steely Dan that reprised their works in a U.S. tour. In 1994 Becker released a critically acclaimed album of his own, 11 Tracks of Whack; Fagen produced the disc.

In 2000 Steely Dan, with Becker and Fagen coproducing, released their first album of new material in over 20 years, Two Against Nature. The record debuted at #6 and won three Grammys, including Album of the Year; its accompanying tour, meanwhile, drew raves. Also that year, Garden Party, an aggregation of smooth-jazz players such as keyboardist Jeff Lorber and saxophonist Dave Koz, put out a Steely Dan tribute album, No Static at All. Steely Dan was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2001.

Though tangentially identified with late-'60s West Coast psychedelia, Steppenwolf's music was uncompromising hard rock, and the term "heavy metal" was popularized in their first hit, "Born to Be Wild."

Leader John Kay never seen without sunglasses in part due to the fact that he has been legally blind since childhood, escaped from East Germany to West Germany with his war-widowed mother in 1948. Ten years later he emigrated to Canada with his mother and stepfather. A gym teacher who could not pronounce "Joachim" informally rechristened him John, several years later he adopted the Kay surname. In 1963 Kay and his family moved to Buffalo, New York, then to Santa Monica, California, where Kay fell into the burgeoning folk-rock scene and appeared on his first record playing harmonica on a song called "The Frog." He played around the country as a folk singer, and in New York met Jerry Edmonton, of a popular Canadian group called the Sparrows, a group that included Bruce Palmer, who was later replaced by the bass player from Neil Young and Rick James' group the Mynah Birds, Nick St. Nicholas. In 1965 Kay joined the Sparrows, followed by another ex-Mynah Bird, Goldy McJohn. The group toured and recorded (including an early version of Hoyt Axton's "The Pusher") without success and eventually broke up. In 1968 ABC-Dunhill producer Gabriel Mekler encouraged Kay to re-form the group and offered them studio time to make demos. Jerry Edmonton's brother Dennis (a.k.a. Mars Bonfire) offered the group a song he'd written for his solo album, "Born to Be Wild." Opposed to reviving the Sparrow name, the group went with Mekler's suggestion, inspired by the Hermann Hesse novel he had just read: Steppenwolf.

Steppenwolf's hard rock won them favor with local audiences, and Steppenwolf (#6, 1968) yielded "Born to Be Wild" (#2, 1968). The Second yielded another massive hit single in "Magic Carpet Ride" (#3, 1968), and around the same time, "Born to Be Wild" and "The Pusher" were featured in the film Easy Rider, more or less solidifying Steppenwolf's enduring identification as a biker band. At Your Birthday Party (#7, 1969) continued the streak with "Rock Me" (from the film Candy) (#10, 1969). Early Steppenwolf (#29, 1969) consisted of older Steppenwolf demos. Despite having a tough image (Kay was never seen in anything but his shades and tight black leather pants), Steppenwolf, which by 1969 included two members whose families had escaped postwar Germany, was an unabashedly political band. Contrary to a popular rumor, Kay did not run for an L.A. city council seat or any other elected post. However, he was always regarded as a highly articulate and thoughtful spokesperson for his political beliefs, most clearly articulated on the critically blasted concept work Monster (#17, 1969). From this album came two singles: "Move Over" (#31, 1969) and the title track (#39, 1970). Steppenwolf Live (#7, 1970) contained the group's next-to-last Top 40 single, "Hey Lawdy Mama" (#35, 1970). Although the big hits stopped coming, Steppenwolf remained a popular live act here and abroad, and their later albums—Steppenwolf 7 (#19, 1970), Steppenwolf Gold/Their Greatest Hits (#24, 1971), and For Ladies Only (#54, 1971)—fared respectably, despite a lack of focus and a series of personnel changes. In early 1972 the group announced its first breakup. Goldy McJohn formed a group called Damian, and later Manbeast. Edmonton worked with a band called Seven. By the first breakup, Kay had already formed the John Kay Band and recorded his first solo album, Forgotten Songs and Unsung Heroes. He had a minor hit single in 1972 with "I'm Movin' On."

Lack of success with their individual projects brought

Kay, Edmonton, and McJohn, along with latterday member George Biondi and Bobby Cochran (nephew of Eddie Cochran, he had worked with the Flying Burrito Brothers and Bob Weir) back together for Slow Flux (#47, 1974), which included "Straight Shootin' Woman" (#29, 1974), the group's last Top 40 single. McJohn departed soon after, and Andy Chapin (who would die in the plane crash that killed Rick Nelson) replaced him. When Chapin declined to go on the road, he was replaced by Wayne Cook. This lineup recorded Hour of the Wolf, the first album of new material in the group's history not to reach the Hot 100. Dispirited, Steppenwolf broke up again in 1976. Kay continued with a solo career, but reassumed leadership of a new Steppenwolf lineup in 1980. In the years between 1976 and 1980 several former members had toured with unprofessional, bogus versions of the group (Kay and Edmonton owned the name). Since then John Kay and Steppenwolf have recorded regularly and toured North America, Europe, and the Far East. The group has appeared at Farm Aids II and III. In 1989 Kay moved to Tennessee, where he now lives. In 1994 he published his autobiography, cowritten with John Einarson, Magic Carpet Ride: The Autobiography of John Kay and Steppenwolf.

Most of the former members of Steppenwolf have remained in the music business. McJohn performed in and around Seattle; St. Nicholas ran a management company and performed Christian rock; Monarch formed Detective and had a country songwriting duo, Stevens and Monarch; Byrom worked as a country sessionman. Rushton Moreve died in a car accident. Jerry Edmonton, who married the widow of former Steppenwolf member Andy Chapin, was also killed in a car wreck.

Following in the tradition of '70s kraut-rock bands Faust, Can, and particularly Neu!, England's Stereolab has based its career on the premise that, when it comes to music, less is definitely more. The group's songs stem from a few riffs—played on guitars, vintage Farfisa organs, and Moog synthesizers—repeated over and over. The resulting sound is not only mesmerizing but surprisingly warm and engaging, due in large part to Laetitia Sadier's voice, which sweetly rides atop her band's minimalist musings. The band is also known for its socialist leanings, as Sadier, who sings in both English and her native French and is often backed by longtime band mate Mary Hansen, usually imbues her lyrics with a leftwing political slant.

Stereolab has gone through numerous lineup changes during its prolific career; the only members who have been a constant presence since the band's formation are founders Sadier and Tim Gane. Gane met Sadier in Paris in 1989, at a gig headlined by his band, McCarthy, of whom Sadier was a fan. The two became romantically involved and, after Sadier moved from Paris to London, started Stereolab in 1991. Naming their group after a '50s record label dedicated to the promotion of the hi-fi, the duo released a few singles—some through mail order—of guitar- and vocal-generated droning. Their first three singles are compiled on 1992's Switched On, released the same year as their full-length debut, Peng! The band went through its first lineup switch prior to the recording of The Groop Played "Space Age Batchelor Music"; new recruits keyboardist/backing vocalist Mary Hansen and drummer Andy Ramsay have remained part of the group ever since, while guitarist Sean O'Hagan, who also played on the band's first Elektra release, Transient Random-Noise Bursts With Announcements, still contributes as a guest collaborator.

In 1994 Stereolab was invited to play Lollapalooza, appearing on the touring festival's second stage. The following year, the group recorded Music for the Amorphous Body Study Centre, released on the band's own Duophonic label, the album was designed to accompany an exhibition of work by sculptor Charles Long. As the group moved into the second half of the decade, it started shifting musical directions somewhat, favoring poppier sounds over full-blown drone rock. European prog rock and avant-jazz popped up on its major-label debut, 1996's critically acclaimed Emperor Tomato Ketchup. Bossa nova and samba influenced the following year's Dots and Loops. Releasing Cobra and Phases Group Play Voltage in the Milky Night in 1999, after the birth of Gane and Sadier's first child, Stereolab ushered in 2000 with the EP The First of the Microbe Hunters.

Calling itself "the one and only hip-hop band and the future of soul music," the six-piece Stetsasonic was an ambitious rap group boasting multiple vocalists, live drums, keyboards, and two full-time mixers—the first major hip-hop band to play its own instruments. Rappers Daddy-O and Delite formed the Stetson Brothers, named for the Stetson hat company, in 1982, and began performing at seminal New York hip-hop clubs. By 1984, they'd recruited Wise, Prince Paul, Fruitkwan, and DBC, changed the name to Stetsasonic, and begun work on 1986's On Fire. It took two years for the group to follow up with the critically acclaimed In Full Gear, which contained its sole hit single, "Sally" (#25 R&B, 1988). Stetsasonic hit its creative peak with Blood, Sweat & No Tears, but broke up shortly after its release. Leader Daddy-O continued producing (he mixed a song for rockers Sonic Youth) and released a solo album, You Can Be a Daddy, But Never a Daddy-O in 1993.

Prince Paul went to work as producer of De La Soul during recording of that group's acclaimed 1989 debut, 3 Feet High and Rising and two followup albums. He also worked on recordings by Boogie Down Productions, Big Daddy Kane, and MC Lyte. In 1994 he formed the "horror-core" group Gravediggaz with RZA. Too Poetic, and ex-Stetsasonic member Fruitkwan, releasing Six Feet Deep, followed in 1997 by The Pick, the Sickle, & the Shovel. By then Prince Paul was a leading force in experimental, underground hip-hop, releasing the solo albums Psychoanalysis: What Is It? (1996) and A Prince Among Thieves (1999). He also formed Handsome Boy Modeling School with DJ Dan "the Automator" Nakamura, releasing So . . . How's Your Girl? in 1999. Both Paul and the Automator then began a collaboration in 2000 with producer Mike Simpson of the Dust Brothers in a new group called the Good, the Bad and the Ugly.

Cat Stevens

Born Steven Demetri Georgiou (a.k.a. Yusef Islam), July 21, 1947, London, Eng.
 1967—Matthew and Son (Deram) 1968—New Masters

Chocolate Box 1975—Numbers; Greatest Hits 1977—Izitso 1978—Back to Earth 1984—Footsteps in the Dark—Greatest Hits, vol. 2 1988—Classics, vol. 24 1995—The Life of the Last Prophet (Mountain of Light) (as Yusef Islam) 2000—A Is for Allah (as Yusef Islam); The Very Best of Cat Stevens (A&M).

Cat Stevens was one of the most successful singer/songwriters of the first half of the '70s, and several of his soft, romantic, and sometimes mystical singles were Top 10 hits. After eight gold albums in a row, his star began to fade, and in the late '70s, following a near-drowning, he converted to Islam, changed his name to Yusef Islam, and dropped out of music.

The son of a Greek father and Swedish mother, Stevens spent his early youth developing a love of Greek folk songs and dances. By the time he entered secondary school, he had also taken an interest in rock & roll and English and American folk music. While attending Hammersmith College in the mid-'60s, he began writing his own songs and performing solo.

In 1966 independent producer Mike Hurst (formerly with the Springfields) produced Stevens' first U.K. hit single, "I Love My Dog." In 1967 "Matthew and Son" went to #2 on the British chart. Meanwhile, Stevens' tunes were British hits for other performers as well. P.P. Arnold hit with "The First Cut Is the Deepest" (later covered by Rod Stewart), the Tremeloes with "Here Comes My Baby." Stevens toured England and Europe, becoming something of a teen idol, and shared bills with Jimi Hendrix and Engelbert Humperdinck, among others.

But Stevens became disenchanted with what he considered the shallowness of his ventures. After his 1968 hit "I'm Gonna Get Me a Gun" (#6 U.K.), he tried to work ambitious classical arrangements into his tunes, to his producers' chagrin. Stevens' career then came to a standstill when he contracted a near-fatal case of tuberculosis in late 1968 and was confined to a hospital for a year. He took that time to work on his new material, which was unveiled in Mona Bone Jakon, a critical success that yielded a British hit single in "Lady D'Arbanville" (#8 U.K., 1970) (purportedly about the actress Patti D'Arbanville). The muted accompaniment was by flutist Peter Gabriel (who would soon find his own fame in Genesis), percussionist Harvey Burns, and perennial Stevens collaborator guitarist Alun Davies.

Stevens' next album, Tea for the Tillerman, hit the U.S. Top 10 and stayed on the charts for well over a year, yielding the hit "Wild World." Stevens was now a highly successful concert performer as well. The next album was another hit, Teaser and the Firecat went to #3, then gold, and contained the hits "Morning Has Broken" (#6), "Peace Train" (#7), and "Moon Shadow" (#30). Though Catch Bull at Four and Foreigner were also certified gold, they yielded no big hits. At that time, unbeknownst to many of his fans, Stevens was living in Brazil, donating much of his earnings to charities such as UNESCO. With Buddah and the Chocolate Box, featuring "Oh Very Young" (#10), and Numbers, Stevens' sales dropped off.

In 1975 Stevens began studying the Koran and later converted to the Muslim religion. In late 1981 the rechristened Stevens announced, "I'm no longer seeking applause and fame," and auctioned off all his material possessions, including his gold records. By then he had married Fouzia Ali, as of the late '80s, they had five children, and he was running a Muslim school outside London. In 1987 10,000 Maniacs covered "Peace Train," and the following year Maxi Priest hit the UK Top 10 with a version of "Wild World." What might have grown into a Stevens revival, however, was nipped in 1989, when the media reported that the singer supported Iran's death-sentence condemnation of Satanic Verses author Salman Rushdie, whose book had blasphemed the Muslim faith. American radio stations observed an airplay boycott of Stevens' material, 10,000 Maniacs removed "Peace Train" from later pressings of the album on which it appeared.

In the mid-'90s Yusuf Islam founded his own label, Mountain of Light, on which he released spoken-word albums. The double-CD A Is for Allah contains several songs for children in addition to spoken performances. In 2000 Islam, who has supported humanitarian efforts in Bosnia, oversaw the release of a Cat Stevens retrospective and resurfaced in the music press. He claims to have been unfairly vilified and misquoted about the Rushdie incident.

Al Stewart

Born Sep. 5, 1945, Glasgow, Scot.

1967—Bedsitter Images (Columbia, U.K.) 1969—Love Chronicles (Epic) 1970—Zero She Flies (Columbia, U.K.) 1972—Orange 1974—Past, Present and Future (Janus) 1975—Modern Times 1976—The Year of the Cat 1978—Time Passages (Arista) 1980—24 Carrots 1981—Indian Summer Live 1984—Russians and Americans (Passport) 1988—Last Days of the Century (Enigma) 1992—Rhymes in Rooms (Mesa) 1994—Famous Last Words 1995—Between the Wars.

British folk-rocker Al Stewart sold many records in the late '70s with a sound influenced by mid-period Dylan, and some distinctive name-dropping lyrics that focused on historical themes from Napoleonic invasions to Nostradamus.

Stewart, who moved to Bournemouth with his widowed mother when he was three, first played in rock bands in Bournemouth beginning at age 16. He bought his first guitar from future Police-man Andy Summers and got his first guitar lessons from Robert Fripp. But after hearing Bob Dylan, he started performing his own softer compositions at small London folk clubs in the mid-'60s. Of his first four albums, Columbia allowed only one to be released in the U.S., 1969's Love Chronicles. It featured Jimmy Page on guitar and was voted Folk Album of the Year by Melody Maker; it included a lengthy, explicit, confessional song about women Stewart had known.

Stewart signed with Janus Records in 1974 and released Past, Present and Future. Unlike his four previous LPs (which he's since repudiated) this record traded first-person love songs for historical sagas and received his first American FM airplay.

Modern Times improved the style with catchier melodies and harder-rocking music, helping it to reach the U.S. Top 30. His breakthrough came in late 1976 with the Alan Parsons-produced The Year of the Cat. The title single became a Top 10 hit, and the LP went platinum. Stewart then switched to Arista, sparking a complicated lawsuit.

With Parsons again in the studio, Time Passages went Top 10 and platinum. Despite two more Top 30 singles, "Song on the Radio" (1979) and "Midnight Rocks" (1980), subsequent LPs were commercial disappointments. Through the '80s, Stewart released only two more albums, though he toured intermittently and apparently devoted a great deal of time to collecting wine (for which he has received numerous awards). Rhymes in Rooms is a live recording from 1988. Famous Last Words (1993) makes use of traditional folk and classical styles, while Between the Wars (1995) draws inspiration from the '20s and '30s.

Billy Stewart

Born Mar. 24, 1937, Washington, DC; died Jan. 17, 1970, NC
1982—The Greatest (Chess) 1988—One More Time
2000—The Millennium Collection.

Billy Stewart qualifies as a unique entry in that he is rock's only high-powered scat man (hence his nickname "Motor-mouth"), using his outrageous trill to nip the stuffing out of such standards as "Summertime," "Secret Love" and "Every Day I Have the Blues" (#74, 1967).

The son of a piano teacher who had her own gospel group, the Stewart Gospel Singers (Billy was a member during his late teens), he won an amateur contest in Washington with a rendition of "Summertime." This led to club bookings and later to his discovery by Bo Diddley, with whose band he played for two years. Meanwhile he cut his first single, "Billy's Blues (Parts 1 and 2)," and later sang with the Rainbows, who included in their quartet Don Covay.

Stewart then signed with the Okeh label (he is included on 1982's Okeh Rhythm and Blues compilation with "Baby, You're My Only Life"). In 1961 he returned to Chess, and in 1966 he hit the Top 100 (his sixth entry) with the scorching version of George Gershwin's "Summertime" (#10), from Porgy and Bess, followed that same year by his equally dynamic cover of Fain and Webster's "Secret Love" (#29). Four years later, he and two members of his band were killed when their car plunged into the Neuse River in North Carolina.

John Stewart

Born Sep. 5, 1939, San Diego, CA

1968—Signals Through the Glass (Capitol) 1969—California Bloodlines 1970—Willard 1971—The Lonesome Picker Rides Again (Warner Bros.) 1972—Sunstorm 1973—Cannons in the Rain (RCA) 1974—Phoenix Concerts Live 1975—Wingless Angels 1977—Fire in the Wind (RSO) 1979—Bombs Away Dream Babies 1980—Dream Babies Go Hollywood; In Concert (RCA); Forgotten Songs 1984—Centennial (Homecoming) 1985—The Last Campaign 1986—Secret Tapes '86 1987—Trio Years (with Nick Reynolds); Punch the Big Guy (Shanachie) 1991—Neon Beach, Live 1990 (Homecoming); Deep in the Noon 1992—Bullets in the Hour Glass (Shanachie) 1993—Chilly Winds (Folk Era); John Stewart: American Originals (Capitol) 1995—Airdream Believer (Shanachie) 1997—Rough Sketches (Homecoming) 1999—John Stewart & Darwin's Army (Applesseed).

Despite a fairly successful solo career, singer/songwriter John Stewart is probably best remembered as the composer of the Monkees' hit "Daydream Believer" and as a member of the Kingston Trio [see entry].

At Pomona College in the mid-'50s, Frank Zappa taught Stewart the chords to "Streets of Laredo." Stewart went on to form a garage-rock band, the Furies, who recorded a single in the late '50s. Two of Stewart's tunes had been recorded by the Kingston Trio, and when the trio's manager, Frank Werber, told Stewart he was looking for a similar act to sign, Stewart formed the Cumberland Three, which included his former glee-club teacher, Gil Robbins. In July 1961 Stewart replaced Dave Guard in the Kingston Trio, staying on as a salaried member until 1967. Before leaving, Stewart had tried unsuccessfully to form a band with John Phillips (later of the Mamas and the Papas) and Scott McKenzie. He had also formed a short-lived duo with John Denver before either had gained any fame.

"Daydream Believer" (1967) spurred Stewart on to a solo career. His debut LP flopped commercially, but Bloodlines, recorded in Nashville, received some critical acclaim and fared slightly better.

Despite his general lack of commercial success, Stewart has maintained pockets of loyal cultists around the country, especially in Phoenix, where his live LP was recorded in 1974. He finally had some success in 1979 with Bombs Away Dream Babies, produced by Lindsey Buckingham and featuring Stevie Nicks on backing vocals on the hit single "Gold," which went to #5 in the U.S. Stewart's subsequent Top 40 singles were "Midnight Wind" (#28, 1979), which also featured Buckingham and Nicks, and "Lost Her in the Sun" (#34, 1980). Stewart continues to write, record, and perform. He founded his own label, Homecoming. Trio Years features new versions of Kingston Trio songs. Some of his '90s work is more electric in its approach.

Rod Stewart

Born Roderick David Stewart, Jan. 10, 1945, London, Eng.

Gritty-voiced singer and sometime songwriter Rod Stewart earned the tag "vocals extraordinaire" during his first stint with the Jeff Beck Group, and maintained it during his subsequent tenure with the Faces and his commercially more successful solo career. After garnering initial critical acclaim for his unerring choice of cover material, Stewart in the late '70s became known as a jet-setting bon vivant and bottled-blond sex symbol, always a stellar live performer but often indulging in self-parody on his albums. While his later work failed to live up to his early promise, his self-mocking charm and seemingly effortless but heartfelt vocal style have survived. In 1994 he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

The son of a Scottish shopkeeper, Stewart was born and raised in London but considers himself a Scot. After a short stint as an apprentice to a pro soccer team, Stewart joined a series of London bands—Jimmy Powell and the Five Dimensions, the Hoochie Coochie Men, Steampacket, and Shotgun Express. In 1967 Jeff Beck enlisted Stewart as vocalist for the Jeff Beck Group. Beck was especially popular in America, where the new group first toured in 1968. Petrified by the first-night audience at New York's Fillmore East, Stewart sang the opening number from backstage. Truth (1968) and Beck-Ola (1969), established Stewart as a rough-and-ready rock & roll vocal stylist.

In 1969 while still with Beck, Stewart signed a contract with Mercury. His solo debut, The Rod Stewart Album (#139, 1969), was recorded with Mick Waller and Ron Wood of the Jeff Beck Group, plus Small Faces keyboardist Ian McLagan and guitarist Martin Quittenton. Stewart's material was a grab bag of gentle folk songs, bawdy drinking songs, a taste of soul, and a couple of barrelhouse rockers. The album sold modestly—Jeff Beck Group fans considered it too subdued—but critics were impressed by Stewart's five original songs. Planning to form a new band with Stewart and the Vanilla Fudge's Tim Bogert and Carmine Appice, Beck disbanded his group. That project finally materialized in 1972, long after Stewart and his buddy Wood had joined the Small Faces, soon redubbed the Faces. Stewart spent the next seven years dividing his time between that band and a solo career, recording a Faces album for each of his own.

In 1970 the Small Faces recorded First Step, Stewart recorded Gasoline Alley (#27, 1970), and together they toured the United States twice. In the studio with the Faces, Stewart was but one of a quintet of equals merrily banging out rock & roll. On his own, he was different; the moody Gasoline Alley amplified his reputation as a sensitive, emotionally compelling singer and storyteller. When Every Picture Tells a Story came out in June 1971, the response was swift and strong. In October, the album was simultaneously #1 in America and Britain, the first record to do so. Its first single, "Maggie May," a Stewart-Quittenton song, was the second record to do the same. Before "Maggie May" had faded, Stewart followed up with a gritty version of the Temptations' "(I Know) I'm Losing You" (#24, 1971). Never a Dull Moment (#2, 1972), with his own "You Wear It Well" (#13, 1972), was also a hit.

With two gold albums, Stewart's role in the Faces became strained. Late in 1974, Mercury released Smiler (#13, 1974), Stewart's last album for the label. Stewart hired veteran American producer Tom Dowd and Muscle Shoals session musicians to record his Warner Bros. debut, Atlantic Crossing (#9, 1975). In 1975 he moved to L.A. to escape British income taxes and was soon the toast of the Beverly Hills celebrity set. Stewart retained Dowd and the American studio musicians for the double-platinum A Night on the Town (#2, 1976), his first effort to outsell Every Picture, largely on the strength of the biggest single of 1976, "Tonight's the Night (Gonna Be Alright)," which topped the U.S. chart for eight weeks.

The Faces had by now fallen apart, and Wood was a full-fledged Rolling Stone. Stewart formed a new, American touring band. The hits kept coming: raunchy rockers like "Hot Legs" (#28, 1978), romantic ballads like "You're in My Heart (The Final Acclaim)" (#4, 1977), and even a #1 disco hit with

"Da Ya Think I'm Sexy?" (1979) from the #1 LP Blondes Have More Fun, which eventually sold 4 million copies. Of his '80s albums, Foolish Behavior, Tonight I'm Yours, and Out of Order all went platinum, and Stewart released Top 10 singles throughout the decade, among them, "Passion" (#5, 1980), "Infatuation" (#6, 1984), "My Heart Can't Tell You No" (#4, 1988), and "Downtown Train" (#3, 1989).

Just as his major hits covered the topics of love and sex, Stewart's penchant for youthful blond trophy wives is also well known. After a much publicized liaison with Britt Ekland, Stewart got married for the first time in 1979 to George Hamilton's ex, Alana, with whom he had two children. Following their divorce, Stewart took up with model Kelly Emberg and had a child with her. In 1990 he tied the knot with Australian supermodel Rachel Hunter, with whom he fathered two more kids. That marriage also ended in divorce.

In 1986 Stewart and a re-formed Faces gathered for a performance at a London benefit for Faces' bassist Ronnie Lane, who had developed multiple sclerosis. Out of Order (#20, 1989), coproduced by Chic's Bernard Edwards and former Duran Duran guitarist Andy Taylor, was better received than much of his '80s output, boosting a revival in Stewart's critical reputation that blossomed with the 1990 career overview, Storyteller. The next year he released Vagabond Heart (#10, 1991), his highest charting album since Blondes. The #1 single from the movie The Three Musketeers, "All for Love" (1994), featured vocals from Bryan Adams, Sting, and Stewart.

Stewart played MTV's Unplugged show with Ron Wood joining him, resulting in 1993's multiplatinum Unplugged . . . and Seated (#2). That year also, he again rejoined the Faces for a show at the BRIT Awards, at which he received a Lifetime Achievement Award. While Stewart in the '90s sold all his future royalties to a Wall Street firm for $15 million, his commercial success was haphazard. The acoustic-oriented A Spanner in the Works (1995) only went gold and didn't yield a Top 40 single, while platinum sales returned with 1996's If We Fall in Love Tonight (#19). When We Were the New Boys, with edgy fare by Oasis and Primal Scream, was Stewart's self-produced, critically hailed 1998 return to his rocking roots. Soon after, he underwent throat surgery to remove a cancerous nodule on his thyroid gland. "Faith of My Heart" from the Patch Adams soundtrack, exemplified his later, smoother style and scored in the Top 10 on Adult Contemporary radio in 1999. His 2001 release, Human, a foray into contemporary soul, debuted on the Billboard chart at #50.

Sting

Born Gordon Matthew Sumner, Oct. 2, 1951, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Eng.

1985—The Dream of the Blue Turtles (A&M) 1986—Bring On the Night 1987—... Nothing Like the Sun 1988—Nada Como el Sol EP 1991—The Soul Cages 1993—Ten Summoner's Tales; Demolition Man soundtrack 1994—Fields of Gold: The Best of Sting 1996—Mercury Falling 1997—The Very Best of Sting & the Police 1999—Brand New Day (Interscope).

Having achieved stardom as singer, bassist, and principal songwriter for the Police [see entry], Sting dissolved that band at the peak of its career in the mid-'80s. Sting's solo career is characterized by a restless yen to experiment, and, by pop standards, take risks. He has sought to push the canny musicianship and affinity for exotic musical styles that distinguished his former group in directions that a trio could never have considered. Consequently, some have lamented the absence of the Police's striking economy, just as they've found Sting's literary and historical references pretentious. To his admirers, though, Sting's post-Police projects have ensured his place among the most articulate and intuitive rock musicians of his generation. Sting has recorded more albums as a solo artist than he did with the Police, and his total sales as a solo artist have surpassed that group's total as well.

For his first solo effort, The Dream of the Blue Turtles (#2, 1985), Sting enlisted a group of young jazz musicians, including saxophonist Branford Marsalis and Weather Report drummer Omar Hakim. The album was widely viewed as a reclamation of the musical turf Sting had covered while playing in jazz ensembles during his youth. But Turtles also drew on elements of classical music, funk, and perhaps most predictably reggae. Moreover, the hit songs "If You Love Somebody Set Them Free" (#3, 1985) and "Fortress Around Your Heart" (#8, 1985) were as pop-savvy as any Police singles. The 1986 concert album and documentary Bring On the Night featured the players that Sting had assembled for Turtles offering live renditions of his new songs, as well as fresh takes on a few Police favorites. ... Nothing Like the Sun (#9, 1987), released shortly after Sting's mother died and dedicated to her, featured a revised, expanded lineup of musicians dominated by Marsalis' saxophone. As on Turtles, Sting often played guitar rather than his primary instrument, bass. A moody album full of dense, delicate orchestration, Sun spawned only one Top 10 single, the atypically funky "We'll Be Together" (#7, 1987). The album fared well in South America, though, thanks in part to its various Latin-flavored instrumental touches, hence the EP Nada Como el Sol, featuring tracks from Sun rendered in Spanish.)

The Soul Cages, inspired by Sting's father's death, was darker still, full of haunted ballads, religious imagery, and traditional English folk flourishes that embellished a newly spare foundation provided by guitarist Dominic Miller, keyboardist David Sancious, drummer Vinnie Colaiuta, and Sting on bass. Again, an anomaly proved the one big hit: the upbeat "All This Time" went to #5. (On that single's strength, the album peaked at #2.) Sting unexpectedly shifted gears for 1993's breezy, buoyant Ten Summoner's Tales (#2), which featured the same core of musicians who had appeared on Cages. The album went triple platinum, yielding the hits "If I Ever Lose My Faith in You" (#17, 1993) (which also won a Grammy) and "Fields of Gold" (#23, 1993). That same year, Sting shared a #1 megahit single with Bryan Adams and Rod Stewart, "All for Love," from the film The Three Musketeers. An anthology, Fields of Gold, was released in 1994, featuring two previously unreleased tracks.

Sting released Mercury Falling (#5) in 1996, although a few singles were released from the album—notably "Let Your Soul Be Your Pilot" (#86), "You Still Touch Me" (#60), and "I'm So Happy I Can't Stop Crying" (#94)—the album as a whole was more successful than any one song. For the accompanying tour, Sting commuted to his concerts via private jet from one of his three homes so he would have more time to spend with his growing brood, including his sixth child (his fourth with his second wife, film producer Trudie Styler), an infant son. Another greatest-hits compilation was released in 1997, this one combining his solo material with Police hits.

An album of new material, Brand New Day (#9, 2000), followed in 1999. The title track was moderately popular on radio, but the song "Desert Rose"—released as a single nearly a year after the album and featuring Arabic backup vocals by Algerian singer Cheb Mami—was a surging success (perhaps helped by its use in a luxury car commercial) reaching #17 and pushing the album to double-platinum status in 2000. Even before the song reached its peak, Mami was snagged as the opening act on Sting's Brand New Day tour, giving him Western exposure and allowing him to support Sting on the song during the headliner's set. A critical success, the album also earned two Grammys, for Pop Album of the Year and Best Male Pop Vocal Performance for its title song. With David Hartley, Sting wrote several songs for the 2000 Disney animated children's feature The Emperor's New Groove. In the process, he had creative differences with the Disney people, which were captured on film by Styler for the "making-of" documentary The Sweatbox.

Equally unpredictable outside the studio, Sting has made numerous film appearances (including Dune, Stormy Monday, Plenty, Gentlemen Don't Eat Poets, and Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels) and in 1989 starred in a Broadway revival of The Threepenny Opera. Four years later he opened a series of stadium shows for the Grateful Dead. What's remained constant is his devotion to human rights and environmental issues. In the late '80s he not only toured with other stars to benefit Amnesty International, but also helped establish the Rainforest Foundation, and has since crusaded to raise funds and awareness on behalf of the preservation of this endangered Brazilian territory, in part with an annual all-star benefit concert, co-organized by Styler, in New York City.

The Stone Roses

Formed 1985, Manchester, Eng.

Ian George Brown (b. Feb. 20, 1963, Manchester), voc.; John Thomas Squire (b. Nov. 24, 1962, Manchester), gtr.; Andy Couzens, gtr.; Pete Garner, bass; Reni (b. Alan John Wren, Apr. 10, 1964, Manchester), drums.

1987—(—Couzens; —Garner; + Mani [b. Gary Michael Mountfield, Nov. 16, 1962, Manchester], bass) 1989—The Stone Roses (Silvertone) 1995—Second Coming (Geffen); The Complete Stone Roses (Silvertone) (—Reni; + Robbie Maddix, drums; + Nigel Ippinson, kybds.).

The story of the Stone Roses is one of unfulfilled promise. An overnight success in England with its debut album, the Stone Roses went from playing small clubs in the mid-'80s to massive stadiums by decade's end, with their faces appearing all over the U.K. music papers. The quartet received little more than cursory attention in the U.S., primarily for their role as the most celebrated combo of Manchester's mid-'80s psychedelic rave scene. The Roses' blend of Byrds-like chiming guitars with an updated, Smiths-style pop sensibility garnered critical acclaim. By 1990, however, legal problems had slowed their momentum. After winning freedom from their original label, Silvertone, the Roses landed a reported $4 million deal with Geffen in the U.S., finally returning at the end of 1994 with the disappointing Second Coming, before breaking up for good.

Ian Brown, an idealistic blend of beatnik, hippie, anarchist, and punk rocker, came together with self-taught painter John Squire in the early '80s. The two formed a punk band called the Patrol, which became the Stone Roses in 1985. After a couple of singles, the Roses teamed up with producer John Leckie, who helped shape their signature psychedelic pop sound. The group signed with Silvertone in 1988 and put out a single, "Elephant Stone," which reached #8 on the U.K. charts in March 1990. Following the release of their debut album, The Stone Roses (#19 U.K., 1989; #86 U.S., 1990), the band had a string of U.K. hits, including "What the World Is Waiting For/Pool's Gold" (#8 U.K., 1989), "Made of Stone" (#20 U.K., 1990), "She Bangs the Drums" (#34 U.K., 1990), "One Love" (#4 U.K., 1990), "I Wanna Be Adored" (#20 U.K., 1991), "Waterfall" (#27 U.K., 1992), and "I Am the Resurrection" (#33 U.K., 1992).

In 1990 members of the band vandalized the offices of Revolver Records after that label reissued old material without their permission. The case got major attention in the U.K. press. Meanwhile, the Roses were back in court later that year when they tried to leave Silvertone for Geffen; the group won the case but lost more career momentum. The band then spent the next two years sporadically recording, slowed during early sessions by drug use. Their comeback album, Second Coming (released in England in late 1994), lived up to its name, attracting U.K. media attention and peaking at #4 in England. It failed to ignite wide interest in the U.S. (reaching #49), and even at home the Stone Roses were no longer as irresistible. The band's own public arrogance and the arrival of such newer British rock acts as Oasis effectively dimmed whatever appeal remained.

The Stone Roses toured briefly in the U.S. and England, but in 1996 Squire quit the group and reemerged the next year heading the Seahorses. The Stone Roses continued on for another six months but called it quits after a performance at the Reading Festival where Brown appeared visibly drunk. Brown embarked on his own solo career, releasing an album in 1998. The singer then spent two months in a Manchester prison after arguing with a flight attendant. In jail he wrote songs that would be released as 2000's Golden Greats album.

Stone Temple Pilots

Formed 1987 (as Mighty Joe Young), San Diego, CA
Scott Weiland (b. Oct. 27, 1967, Santa Cruz, CA), voc.; Dean DeLeo (b. Aug. 23, 1961, NJ), gtr.; Robert DeLeo (b. Feb. 2, 1966, NJ), bass; Eric Kretz (b. June 7, 1966, Santa Cruz), drums.
1992—Core (Atlantic) 1994—Purple 1996—Tiny Music . . . Songs From the Vatican Gift Shop 1999—No. 4 2001—Shangri-La DeLo.

Scott Weiland solo: 1998—12 Bar Blues (Atlantic).

Talk Show (D. DeLeo; R. DeLeo; Kretz; + Dave Coultts, voc.): 1997—Talk Show (Atlantic).

In the wake of the success of the Seattle sound, Stone Temple Pilots emerged in the early '90s with a hard-rock approach that drew heavily on the influence of earlier guitar bands from Led Zeppelin to Blue Cheer. With their debut, Core, going platinum shortly after its release, they stirred controversy with "Sex Type Thing," a single about date rape and a stylistic approach that some critics felt drew too heavily on Pearl Jam's. Later, the controversy shifted to frontman Scott Weiland's battle to check a career-threatening heroin addiction.

Having met at a Black Flag concert in the late '80s, singer Weiland and guitarist Robert DeLeo founded Mighty Joe Young to purvey a sound combining heavy-metal-derived guitar with punk brashness; they changed the group's name to Shirley Temple's Pussy before deciding on Stone Temple Pilots. Signing to Atlantic and making the triple-platinum Core (#3, 1993) with producer Brendan O'Brien (the Black Crowes, the Red Hot Chili Peppers), they soon gained heavy MTV exposure and, while decrying the "grunge" label, found themselves in the same sales league as Nirvana and Pearl Jam. The single "Plush," which hit #9 on the Modern Rock tracks chart, continued their commercial ascension. Their followup album, Purple, debuted at #1 and featured the #1 album rock hits "Vaseline" and "Interstate Love Song." But the band's momentum hit the skids as Weiland fell headlong into a heroin addiction. An arrest in 1995 landed him in rehab for several months and forced the band to cancel a summer tour in support of its third album, the power pop-inspired Tiny Music . . . Songs From the Vatican Gift Shop (#4, 1996). They attempted to tour again in fall 1996 and the following spring but had to cancel both times when Weiland relapsed.

While Weiland went in and out of rehab, the rest of the band staved off frustration by recruiting singer Dave Coultts (from the Long Beach, California, band Ten Inch Men) and recording an album as Talk Show. Released in the fall of 1997, it stalled at #131. The following spring, Weiland released his own solo album, 12 Bar Blues (#42, 1998), but his tour was derailed after a drug arrest (his third) later that year.

STP reconvened in 1999 to record their fourth album, No.

4, but by the time of the album's release in October, Weiland was behind bars. He was sentenced to a year in prison in September after surviving a near-fatal overdose—it was his third parole violation following a 1997 conviction in California. He was released in December after serving a little less than half of his sentence. With Weiland determined to stay clean (and free), STP hit the road again in 2000.

Stone the Crows

Formed 1969, Glasgow, Scot.

Maggie Bell (b. Jan. 12, 1945, Scot.), voc.; Les Harvey (b. ca. 1947; d. May 3, 1972, Swansea, Wales), gtr.; Jon McGinnis, kybds.; Jim Dewar (b. Oct. 12, 1946), bass; Colin Allen, drums. 1970—Stone the Crows (Polydor); Ode to John Law 1971—(– Dewar; – McGinnis; + Steve Thompson, bass; + Ronnie Leahy, kybds.) Teenage Licks 1972—(+ Jimmy McCulloch [b. June 4, 1952, Glasgow; d. Sep. 27, 1979, London, Eng.], gtr.) 'Ontinuous Performance. Maggie Bell solo: 1973—Queen of the Night (Atlantic) 1975—Suicide Sal (Swansong).

A Scottish-English soul band, Stone the Crows (the name comes from a Scottish curse meaning “the hell with it”) is perhaps most significant for introducing Maggie Bell, a blues singer in the style of Janis Joplin, who went on to a solo career.

Young Maggie Bell had gotten onstage to sing in Glasgow with Alex Harvey (who in the early '70s led the Sensational Alex Harvey Band), earning £2. Harvey introduced her to his brother Les, who was leading the Kinning Park Ramblers. Within a few years Bell and Les Harvey were leading Power, which played clubs and U.S. Army bases in Europe. When Led Zeppelin manager Peter Grant discovered them, he renamed them Stone the Crows. Their first two albums were critically acclaimed but sold few copies.

Jim Dewar eventually left to join ex-Procol Harum guitarist Robin Trower, and Steve Thompson was recruited from John Mayall: with Teenage Licks the band seemed on the verge of success. In 1972 Bell won Britain's Top Girl Singer Award for the first of many times, but that year also saw Les Harvey electrocuted by a microphone wire during a show at Swansea University. Jimmy McCulloch came in to finish the sessions for 'Ontinuous, but the band soon broke up. McCulloch later joined Paul McCartney's Wings and, after that, the re-formed Small Faces; he died of undetermined causes. Bell released several solo LPs. She also did a lot of session work, including Rod Stewart's Every Picture Tells a Story. Colin Allen went on to join Focus, and Dewar moved on to Robin Trower's band.

Stories

Michael Brown (b. Apr. 25, 1949, Brooklyn, NY), kybds., voc.;

Steve Love, gtr., voc.; Ian Lloyd (b. Ian Buoncoglio, 1947, Seattle, WA), bass, voc., kybds.; Bryan Madey, drums, voc. 1972—Stories (Kama Sutra) 1973—(– Brown; + Kenny Aaronson [b. Apr. 14, 1952, Brooklyn], bass; + Ken Bichel [b. 1945, Detroit, MI], kybds.) About Us; Traveling Underground 1974—(– Madey; + Rick Ranno, drums).

Formed by ex-Left Banke mentor Michael Brown, Stones had a #1 hit in 1973 with “Brother Louie.” The tune was written by Errol Brown of British soul group Hot Chocolate, who released a competing version of it in 1973.

Brown left before their second LP to become the guiding spirit, writer, and producer of the Beckies (though he never actually performed with them). Bassist Kenny Aaronson went on to work with Hall and Oates, Leslie West, Rick Derringer, Billy Squier, and the supergroup Hagar, Schon, Aaronson, Shrieve. Lloyd pursued a solo career. During a session for one of his albums, musician Mick Jones met fellow sessionman Ian MacDonald, and the pair went on to form Foreigner. Lloyd has since appeared on albums by Foreigner, Peter Frampton, and others. Madey joined the Earl Slick band, and his replacement, Rick Ranno, was later in the group Starz.

The Strangeloves

Formed 1965, Brooklyn, NY

Richard Gottehrer; Robert Feldman; Jerry Goldstein.

1965—I Want Candy (Bang).

The Strangeloves' big hit was 1965's “I Want Candy” (#11). The song was treated to some bizarre versions in the early '80s by Lydia Lunch's 8 Eyed Spy and Bow Wow Wow. The Strangeloves were originally a studio-based winter-production trio, and even worked on some outside projects while they were recording their own band. Before they'd taken their name and become a group, they worked for the Angels (creating “My Boyfriend's Back”) and the McCoys (“Hang On Sloopy”). Posing as brothers Miles, Niles, and Giles Strange, the three used fake Australian accents and actually convinced everyone they met that they indeed hailed from Down Under. They had two Top 40 followups, “Night Time” (#30, 1966) and “Cara-Lin” (#39, 1965.) After 1966 the band broke up, and each member went back to full-time producing. Richard Gottehrer became a partner in Sire Records in 1970, and along with the two other original Strangeloves recorded unsuccessfully for the label under the name the Strange Brothers Show. In 1976 he produced the debut Blondie LP and in 1981 he coproduced the Go-Go's' first album. Feldman worked with, among others, Jay and the Americans and Johnny Mathis.

The Stranglers

Formed Sep. 1974, Guildford, Eng.

Jet Black (b. Brian Duffy, Aug. 26, 1958, Ilford, Eng.), drums;

Jean-Jacques Burnel (b. Feb. 21, 1952, London, Eng.), bass;

Hugh Cornwell (b. Aug. 28, 1949, London), gr., voc.; Dave Greenfield (b. Mar. 29, 1949, Brighton, Eng.), kybds. 1977—IV: Rattus Norvegicus (A&M); No More Heroes 1978—Black and White 1979—The Raven (United Artists, U.K.) 1980—IV (I.R.S.) 1981—The Meninblack (EMI America); La Folie 1982—Feline (Epic) 1984—Aural Sculpture 1986—Dreamtime 1988—All Live and All of the Night 1990—10 (– Cornwell; + John Ellis [b. June 1, 1952, London], gr.); + Paul Roberts [b. Dec. 31, 1959, London], voc.) 1991—Greatest Hits 1977–1990 1993—Stranglers in the Night (Viceroy) 1995—(– Tobe; + Black) About Time (When?, U.K.) 1997—Written in Red 1999—Coup de Grace (Festival, U.K.). Jean-Jacques Burnel solo: 1979—Euroman Cometh (United Artists, U.K.) 1988—Un jour parfait (Epic, Fr.). Hugh Cornwell solo: 1979—Nosferatu (United Artists, U.K.) 1988—Wolf (Virgin) 1999—Black Hair Black Eyes Black Suit (Velvet); First Bus to Babylon 2000—Hi Fi (Koch).

Armed with a nasty misogynist temperament and an aggressive musical attack, the Stranglers are usually classified as a punk band, even though their keyboard-heavy sound—and birth dates—have more in common with rock's previous generation. While never popular in the States, they were hugely successful in the U.K. with 15 Top 40 hits (seven in the Top 10), including "Peaches/Go Buddy Go" (#8 U.K., 1977) and "Golden Brown" (#2 U.K., 1982).

Their background was unusual for a punk band: They were formed in 1974 as the Guildford Stranglers by Cornwell, a science teacher, Black, an ice cream salesman and sometimes jazz drummer, and Burnel, an English-born son of French immigrants and a history major. In 1975, calling themselves a "soft-rock group," the trio placed an ad in Melody Maker that was answered by Greenfield. After a year of club dates the band, now simply the Stranglers, got its break opening for Patti Smith at London's Roundhouse, followed by a national tour. The exposure led to their signing with United Artists in Britain and A&M in the States.

While Greenfield's swirling keyboards and Cornwell's portentous vocals on IV Rattus Norvegicus (#4 U.K., 1977) (the biological name for the Norway rat, the band mascot) and No More Heroes (#8 U.K., 1977) left critics comparing the band to the Doors, their attitude placed them squarely in the punk camp: "Peaches" was banned by the BBC for offensive lyrics, and the Greater London Council pulled the plug on a 1977 show when Cornwell appeared on stage in a "Fuck" T-shirt. The entire band was arrested in Nice, France, for inciting a riot when a 1980 concert was canceled.

Failing to make a commercial dent in the U.S., the Stranglers were dropped by A&M after Black & White. Their lack of a U.S. label caused The Raven, a #4 U.K. hit, to go unreleased stateside until 1986. In 1983, after abortive contracts with two other labels, they signed with Epic. Attempts to soften their sound culminated in Dreamtime (#172, 1987), their only U.S. chart album.

Cornwell (who had already recorded solo sets while still in the band) left the Stranglers after 10 and released a handful of albums in the late '80s; some of that material was collected on the American release Black Hair Black Eyes Black Suit.

Except for a greatest-hits collection in 1991, nothing was heard from the rest of the band until 1993, when Burnel, Black, and Greenfield were joined by singer Paul Roberts and ex-Vibrators guitarist John Ellis on Stranglers in the Night and hit the comeback trail. The band still plays out regularly (even venturing down to a British Army base in the Falklands in 1997) and survived yet another personnel change when Ellis was replaced by Baz Warne in March 2000.

The Strawberry Alarm Clock

Formed 1967, Santa Barbara, CA
Ed King, gr., voc.; Lee Freeman, gr., bass, horns, drums, voc.; Mark Weitz, kybds.; Gary Lovetro, bass, voc.; George Bunnel, bass, special effects; Randy Seol, drums, voc. 1967—Incense and Peppermints (Uni) 1968—(– Lovetro) Wake Up, It's Tomorrow; The World in a Sea Shell 1969—(– Seol; – Bunnel; + Jimmy Pitman, gr., voc.; + Gene Gunnels, drums) Good Morning Starshine 1970—The Best of the Strawberry Alarm Clock (– Pitman; – Weitz; + Paul Marshall, gr., voc.) 1971—Changes (Vocalion).

This early psychedelic rock band surfaced in 1967 with the #1 hit and flower-power anthem "Incense and Peppermints." Though it would fade quickly from view, the band was renowned for its psychedelic stage show (drummer Randy Seol played bongos with his hands on fire) and for the presence of two bassists. Guitarist Ed King later resurfaced with Lynyrd Skynyrd.

The group's roots go back to King's early surf-rock group, the Iridescents. Seol broke up his group the Goldtones to join King, Mike Luciano, and Gene Gunnels, and they named themselves Thee Sixpence. They signed to All American Records, where they released "In the Building" b/w "Hey Joe" in spring 1966. Subsequent releases faded quickly. Following a major lineup shift, the group learned that there were two other bands using variations of the "sixpence" name, so in March 1967 the Strawberry Alarm Clock was born.

The singer on the group's biggest hit was not even a band member, but one Greg Munford, the teenage singer of Shapes of Sound and later Crystal Circus. "Incense and Peppermints" was the B side of "The Birdman of Alkatraz," and by the time it was released in April 1967 the group had moved to Uni. Various business problems plagued the band; for example, "Incense and Peppermints" writer Ed King was not properly credited or compensated. Seven months later, the song was at #1 and the album Incense and Peppermints on its way to #11. Commercially speaking, it was the group's finest hour, and although another Top 40 hit followed—"Tomorrow" (#23, 1968)—the Strawberry Alarm Clock wound down. Their version of "Good Morning Starshine," from the hit musical Hair, was beaten on the charts by a simultaneously released rendition by Oliver. With new member Paul Marshall, King began exploring what we now call Southern rock. The group appeared in Russ Meyer's Beyond the Valley of the Dolls (1970), and by late 1971 had disbanded. Shortly before that, however, King met Ronnie Van Zant of Lynyrd Skynyrd. In early 1973 King joined the Southern rock band, first as a bassist then as third lead guitarist.

In the summer of 1982 Lee Freeman happened to spot an ad for Strawberry Alarm Clock at an L.A. nightclub, intrigued, he went in and discovered the ad was a fake, designed to draw in original Alarm Clock members for a reunion. Freeman told ROLLING STONE he planned to assemble most of the original personnel, which he eventually did. This lineup—which included Freeman and King (by then having left Lynyrd Skynyrd and doing session work)—rerecorded "Incense and Peppermints" for a K-Tel album. Freeman then led a lineup of new musicians as the Strawberry Alarm Clock during the '80s.

The Strawbs

Formed as the Strawberry Hill Boys, 1967, Leicester, Eng. Dave Cousins (b. Jan 7, 1945), voc., gtr., banjo, dulcimer; Tony Hooper, gtr., voc.; Arthur Phillips, mandolin.

1968—(– Phillips; + Ron Chesterman, bass; + Sandy Denny [b. Jan. 6, 1941, Wimbleton, Eng.; d. Apr. 21, 1978, London, Eng.], voc.) 1969—(– Chesterman; – Denny; + Rick Wakeman [b. May 18, 1949, London], kybds.; + John Ford [b. July 1, 1948, London], bass, voc.; + Richard Hudson [b. Mar. 8, 1949, Hounslow, Eng.], gtr.; + Blue Weaver [b. Mar. 11, 1947, Cardiff, Wales], kybds.) 1973—Bursting at the Seams; All Our Own Work (Hallmark) 1974—(– Ford; – Hudson; – Weaver; + John Hawken, kybds.; + Chas Cronk, bass; + Rod Coombes, drums) Hero and Heroine (A&M); By Choice 1975—Ghosts (– Hawken; + John Mealing, kybds.; + Robert Kirby, kybds.) Nomadness 1976—Deep Cuts (Oyster) 1977—Burning for You 1978—(– Coombes; + Tony Fernandez, drums) Deadlines (Arista); The Best of the Strawbs (A&M) 1983—(group re-forms: Cousins; Hooper; Hudson; + others; numerous lineup changes follow) 1987—Don't Say Goodbye (Virgin, Can.) 1991—Sandy Denny and the Strawbs (Hannibal); Ringing Down the Years (Virgin, Can.) 2000—The Complete Strawbs (Witchwood, U.K.).

Through a long career laden with personnel changes, the Strawbs have kept in touch with both their British folk roots and the '70s progressive-rock movement. Dave Cousins, the band's main songwriter, and Tony Hooper formed the Strawberry Hill Boys (named for the London district where they rehearsed) in 1967, singing traditional British and American folk music, then recorded with Sandy Denny (who went on to Fairport Convention) before becoming the Strawbs with the addition of Richard Hudson and John Ford, from Velvet Opera. Their debut LP won great acclaim in British folk circles, but the second, which saw them turning to a keyboard-dominated progressive sound (Nicky Hopkins guested on it), left them between audiences.

Royal Academy of Music graduate Rick Wakeman's classical arpeggios took the band decisively away from folk and into progressive rock. Wakeman left in 1971 to join Yes. His replacement was Blue Weaver, who had played with Andy Fairweather-Low's Amen Corner and, with Dave Mason, had had a minor solo career under the name Wynder K. Frogg. Shortly after Wakeman's departure, internal disagreements among Cousins, Hudson, and Ford led to Cousins' temporary departure, placing the band in limbo in late 1971. Cousins recorded a solo LP, Two Weeks Last Summer. Strawbs then regrouped and had their first British hit singles with "Lay Down" in 1972, and in 1973 with Hudson-Ford's "Part of the Union."

After a traumatic 1973 U.S. tour, Hudson and Ford left to work as a team, with three LPs and a 1974 U.S. tour. Weaver also left, and Cousins recruited John Hawken (from Nashville Teens, Vinegar Joe, and Renaissance), Chas Cronk and Rod Coombes (of Stealers Wheel). At this time the band's audience base shifted from the U.K. to the U.S. Though they never became a truly major American attraction, they toured the U.S. constantly and hardly ever played the U.K. After middling success with a series of progressively more commercial late-'70s LPs, the group disbanded. Hudson, Hooper, and Cousins reunited in the '80s and recorded two Canadian studio albums. As of 1998, Cousins, Hudson, Weaver, and Ford remained from the early years. The Complete Strawbs (2000) documents a 30th-anniversary tour.

The Stray Cats

Formed 1979, Massapequa, NY

Brian Setzer (b. Apr. 11, 1959, New York, NY), gtr., voc.; Slim Jim Phantom (b. Jim McDonnell, 1961), drums; Lee Rocker (b. Lee Drucker, 1961), string bass, voc. 1981—Stray Cats (Arista, U.K.) 1982—Gonna Ball; Built for Speed (EMI America) 1983—Rant 'n' Rave With the Stray Cats 1986—Rock Therapy 1989—Blast Off 1991—Let's Go Faster (Jordan) 1992—Choo Choo Hot Fish (JRS/Great Pyramid) 1997—Runaway Boys: A Retrospective '81-'92 (EMI America). Phantom, Rocker, and Slick: 1984—Phantom, Rocker & Slick (EMI America) 1985—Cover Girl. Lee Rocker and Big Blue: 1995—Lee Rocker's Big Blue (Black Top) 1996—Atomic Boogie Hour. Lee Rocker solo: 1998—No Cats (Upright) 1999—Lee Rocker Live (J-Bird).

The Stray Cats' cartoonish version of classic '50s rockabilly proved one of the surprise successes of 1982. The group was formed in a Long Island suburb by Brian Setzer (an ex-member of the Bloodless Pharaohs), Slim Jim Phantom, and Lee Rocker (son of clarinetist Stanley Drucker). After playing the Long Island club circuit for several months, the group moved to London with their manager in the summer of 1980.

Although New Romanticism and new wave dominated the British scene, the Stray Cats soon became a popular club act. The group signed with Arista U.K., and Dave Edmunds produced their debut single, "Runaway Boys." Released in England in November 1980, "Runaway Boys" hit the British Top 10, as did their two subsequent singles, "Stray Cat Strut" and "Rock This Town." The Stray Cats opened three dates on the Rolling Stones 1981 North American tour; by that time their debut LP had become a top-selling import in the U.S. Their second LP, Gonna Ball, was not as well received as their debut, and by 1982 there were management problems as well. Nonetheless, the group signed to EMI America, which released their U.S. debut, Built for Speed, containing material from the two British albums. Within months, the Stray Cats' "Rock This Town" and "Stray Cat Strut" videos were in heavy rotation on MTV. "Rock This Town" was a #9 hit and the album sold over a million copies.

Rant 'n' Rave (#14, 1983) was a more moderate hit, yielding chart singles in "Sexy + 17" (#5, 1983) and "I Won't Stand in Your Way" (#35, 1983). The band then broke up (success "went to our heads," Setzer later said). Lee Rocker and Slim Jim Phantom (by now married to actress Britt Ekland) joined ex-David Bowie guitarist Earl Slick to form Phantom, Rocker and Slick, releasing two albums and appearing in a 1985 Carl Perkins tribute show organized by Edmunds. In addition to his solo career [see entry], Setzer played Eddie Cochran (at the request of Cochran's mother) in the 1987 Ritchie Valens biopic, La Bamba. The original Stray Cats re-formed in 1986 for two U.S. albums, neither of which cracked the Top 100, and two more albums on small, independent labels. Lee Rocker has also pursued a solo career, but one that remains rooted in rockabilly and early rock.

The top-selling female artist in history, Barbra Streisand has seen more than 30 of her 50 albums achieve gold status; she has sold more than 60 million albums, featuring for the most part the music of Broadway and its derivatives. And with more than 15 films to her credit, she has become emblematic of the consummate entertainer, heir to a show business tradition whose emphasis on sophistication and professionalism hark back to the prerock era. Both for her remarkable singing technique and as a consistent champion of classic American popular song, Streisand stands as one of contemporary music's most significant performers.

Born in Brooklyn, Streisand moved to Manhattan following high school graduation to pursue acting. She began concentrating on singing at the start of the '60s, first in gay clubs and then in Greenwich Village's Bon Soir club. Debuting on Broadway in I Can Get It for You Wholesale, she was signed to Columbia; two weeks after her self-titled Grammy-winning album was released in 1963, she was America's best-selling female singer, and her next seven albums entered the Top 5. Starring in 1,350 performances as Fanny Brice in Funny Girl consolidated her fame; in 1968 the Hollywood version, Streisand's first film role, earned her an Oscar. A death threat she received as she was about to perform a 1967 concert in Central Park contributed to an increasing anxiety about singing in public, causing her to retire from concert appearances for more than 20 years.

All of Streisand's '60s albums were hugely popular (nine of them charting in the Top 10); all highlighted Tin Pan Alley fare. In the '70s she attempted, with uneven results, the songs of younger writers (Jimmy Webb, Laura Nyro), her first rock & roll album, 1971's Stoney End (#10), drew praise, but critics questioned her other work in this vein. In 1977 she teamed with Bee Gee Barry Gibb on the disco Streisand Superman (#3); her hitmaking power remained intact ("You Don't Bring Me Flowers" with Neil Diamond, #1, 1978; "No More Tears [Enough Is Enough]" with Donna Summer, #1, 1979).

Streisand continued to make movies—Hello, Dolly!, The Way We Were, A Star Is Born, The Prince of Tides (which she also directed), among the more popular—and in 1983, with Yentl, an adaptation of a story by Isaac Bashevis Singer, became the first woman to cowrite, direct, produce, and star in a film of her own.

In 1987 she founded the Barbra Streisand Foundation to support liberal political causes, following up on political involvement that had placed her on Richard Nixon's Enemies List, and had drawn her back to live performance for "One Voice," a 1986 Democratic Party fundraiser. Among other examples of her philanthropy are the Streisand Chair in Cardiology at UCLA and the Streisand Chair on Intimacy and Sexuality at USC; she has also been outspoken in support of gay and women's rights and environmentalism.

Her pop icon status assured in the '90s, Streisand was the beneficiary of a tribute of sorts: on Saturday Night Live, Mike Myers in drag played Linda Richman, host of the fictional talk show Coffee Talk, who as a prototypical Long Island Streisand fan, gushed at every mention of the singer's name.

In 1992 Streisand surprised viewers and Coffee Talk guests Madonna and Roseanne Arnold with an unbilled walk-on.

In 1994, with two New Year's performances at the Las Vegas MGM Grand Hotel's Grand Garden, Streisand returned for her first paid concerts in 22 years. With nine metal detectors in place to assuage the performer's concern for personal safety, the highly successful shows previewed her first-ever major tour later that year. The highlights of those performances were documented on The Concert (#10, 1994). The next year, she was awarded a Lifetime Achievement Grammy.

As the '90s progressed, Streisand continued to support liberal causes: she sang at Bill Clinton's first inauguration, befriended his mother, Virginia Kelley, and in 1997 released an album of spiritually-oriented material in Kelley's memory. The year before, she had returned to the chart, with "I Finally Found Someone" from her movie The Mirror Has Two Faces, peaking at #8. By the end of the decade, Streisand had married actor James Brolin (she was married to actor Elliott Gould from 1963 to 1971, their son, Jason Gould, is also an actor). For 1999 New Year's Eve and Day concerts in Las Vegas, she earned a reported $10 million. In July 2000 Streisand announced her farewell from concert performance with shows in L.A. and at Madison Square Garden (for the NYC gigs, VIP tickets cost $2,500, including dinner).

Barrett Strong

Born Feb. 5, 1941, Mississippi
1975—Stronghold (Capitol) 1976—Live and Love 2001—Stronghold II (Boomtown USA/Blaritt).

Barrett Strong's career as a singer/songwriter began on a very promising note with "Money" in 1961, one of Motown founder Berry Gordy's first hits (#23 pop, #2 R&B). It was covered by a wide variety of acts, from the Beatles to the Flying Lizards.

Strong is the cousin of Nolan Strong, of the Detroit vocal group the Diablos. Shortly after "Money," Strong joined Gordy's fledgling recording empire as a performer and a songwriter. But Strong's singing career was soon overshadowed by his songwriting duties, and after 1961 the label released no more of his singles. As a Motown staff writer, he collaborated with Norman Whitfield on some of the songs that revolutionized Motown's sound in the late '60s and early '70s: "I Wish It Would Rain," "Ball of Confusion (That's What the World Is Today)," "Papa Was a Rolling Stone," "Just My Imagination (Running Away With Me)," and "Psychedelic Shack," among others, for the Temptations, "Smiling Faces Sometimes" for the Undisputed Truth, and "War" for Edwin Starr. Among Strong's other songwriting credits is "I Heard It Through the Grapevine," "The End of Our Road," and "How Can I Forget."

In the mid-'70s he tried unsuccessfully to revive his singing career, first on Capitol Records. He currently works as a songwriter and arranger, while signing talent to his label, Blaritt Records. He appeared on the 1992 album In Their Own Words, which featured a number of other singer/songwriters. Stronghold II was his first full-length release in 25 years.

Stryper

Formed 1983, Orange County, CA
Oz Fox (b. Richard Martinez, June 18, 1961, Whittier, CA), gtr.; Tim Gaines (b. Tim Hagelganz, Dec. 14, 1963, OR), bass; Michael Sweet (b. July 4, 1963, Whittier), voc.; Robert Sweet (b. Mar. 21, 1960, Whittier), drums.
1984—The Yellow and Black Attack! (Enigma) 1985—Soldiers Under Command 1986—To Hell With the Devil 1988—In God We Trust 1990—Against the Law 1991—Can't Stop the Rock: The Stryper Collection, 1984-1991 (Hollywood).
Michael Sweet: 1994—Michael Sweet (Benson) 1995—Real 2000—Truth (Restless).

Although its motives have been attacked by both rock critics and Christian evangelist Jimmy Swaggart, Stryper is one of the most successful Christian rock bands, spreading the Word with a slick heavy-metal sound and ending concerts by tossing Bibles into the audience. Their most popular album, To Hell With the Devil (#32, 1986), briefly made them platinum-level rock stars.

Brothers Robert and Michael Sweet, inspired by Jimmy Swaggart's evangelical show, were born again in 1975. Robert decided to form a band after seeing Van Halen and being impressed by the show but distressed by the message. In 1983, with his brother on vocals, he recruited bassist Tim Gaines and guitarist Oz Fox. Calling themselves Roxx Regime, they played clubs in Orange County, California, and submitted a demo to Enigma Records. The Sweets' mother persuaded them to perform overtly Christian material, and they changed their name to Stryper after a passage in Isaiah, "With His stripes we are healed." A 1984 mini-LP, The Yellow and Black Attack! (named for their trademark yellow-and-black-striped outfits) was followed in 1985 by the gold album Soldiers Under Command (#84).

The band reached its commercial peak with the platinum To Hell With the Devil. Yellow and Black Attack! was reissued with two extra tracks in 1986, reaching #103. A slickly produced amalgam of evangelism, power chords, and high-pitched vocals, it reached beyond the narrow Christian audience, yielding a Top 40 hit, "Honesty" (#23, 1987). In God We Trust (#32, 1988), a blatant attempt to court pop audiences, was a relative disappointment, reaching only gold status, following 1990's Against the Law (#39), the band changed labels, lost the striped outfits, and was back on more typical, secular heavy-metal ground.

In 1992 Michael Sweet left the band to pursue a solo career. In 1995, Real was nominated by the Gospel Music Association for a Dove Award for Best Rock Album. After releasing his first two records through a small gospel label, Sweet rejoined the musical mainstream by signing with Restless.

The Stylistics

Formed 1968, Philadelphia, PA

Russell Thompkins Jr. (b. Mar. 21, 1951, Philadelphia), lead voc.; Airron Love (b. Aug. 8, 1949, Philadelphia), tenor voc.; James Smith (b. June 16, 1950, New York, NY), bass voc.; Herbie Murrell (b. Apr. 27, 1949, Lane, SC), baritone voc.; James Dunn (b. Feb. 4, 1950, Philadelphia), baritone voc. 1971—The Stylistics (Avco) 1972—Round 2: The Stylistics 1973—Rockin' Roll Baby 1974—Let's Put It All Together; Heavy 1975—The Best of the Stylistics; Thank You Baby; You Are Beautiful 1976—Fabulous (Hugo and Luigi); Wonder Woman 1978—(– Dunn) 1979—(– Smith) Love Spell (Mercury) 1980—Hurry Up This Way Again (TSOP) 1986—All Time Classics (Amherst); The Best of the Stylistics (1972–1974); The Best of the Stylistics, vol. 2; Greatest Love Hits 1992—Stylistics Christmas; Love Talk 1996—Love Is Back in Style (MRT) (– Thompkins; + Van Fields, voc.; + Harold Brown, voc.).

Led by Russell Thompkins, the Stylistics were leading practitioners of the lush "Philadelphia sound" of the mid-'70s. They came together in 1968, a union of two Philadelphia vocal groups. Herbie Murrell and James Dunn came from the Percussions, Thompkins, Airron Love, and James Smith joined from the Monarchs. Robert Douglas, a member of their backing band Slim and the Boys, and road manager Marty Bryant wrote "You're a Big Girl Now" for the Stylistics. It began as a hit on the small Sebring Records in the Philadelphia area before being picked up by Avco Records and hitting the national R&B chart at #7.

Philadelphia producer/writer Thom Bell then took control of the Stylistics' music. Collaborating with songwriter Linda Creed (b. ca. 1949; d. April 10, 1986), Bell created "Stop, Look, Listen (to Your Heart)" (#39 pop, #6 R&B) and "You Are Everything" (#9 pop, #10 R&B) in 1971, "Betcha By Golly, Wow" (#3 pop, #2 R&B), "People Make the World Go Round" (#25 pop, #6 R&B), and "I'm Stone in Love With You" (#10 pop, #4 R&B) in 1972, "Break Up to Make Up" (#5 pop and R&B), "You'll Never Get to Heaven" (#23 pop, #8 R&B) and "Rockin' Roll Baby" (#14 pop, #13 R&B) in 1973, and "You Make Me Feel Brand New" (#2 pop, #5 R&B) in 1974.

After the Stylistics' relationship with Bell ended, they began working with Van McCoy [see entry], but the group's record sales in America declined. They remained popular in Europe both on record and in nightclubs throughout the '70s. Among their U.K. hits were three Top 5 singles: "Sing Baby Sing" and "Na Na Is the Saddest Word" (1975), and "Can't Help Falling in Love" (1976). "Can't Give You Anything (But My Love)" (#51 pop, #18 R&B) went to #1 in the U.K. during the summer of 1975.

The group signed to Philadelphia International Records in 1980. By then, Dunn had quit due to health problems and was not replaced, and within a year Smith had left as well. The group remained active in the '80s and '90s as a trio. Thompkins left sometime after 1996's Love Is Back in Style.

Styx

Formed 1963, Chicago, IL

James Young (b. Nov. 14, 1949), gr., voc.; John Curulewski, gr.; Dennis DeYoung (b. Feb. 18, 1947, Chicago), kybds., voc.; Chuck Panozzo (b. Sep. 20, 1948), bass, voc.; John Panozzo (b. Panozzo, J. Panozzo; + Glen Burtnik, gr., voc., bass) Edge of the Century 1995—(– Burtnik; + Shaw) Greatest Hits 1996—(– J. Panozzo; + Todd Sucherman, drums) Greatest Hits Part 2 1997—Return to Paradise (CMC) 1999—Brave New World (– DeYoung; – C. Panozzo; + Burtnik; + Lawrence Gowan, voc., kybds.). Dennis DeYoung solo: 1984—Desert Moon (A&M) 1986—Back to the World 1988—Boomchild (MCA) 1994—10 on Broadway (Atlantic) 1995—The Hunchback of Notre Dame (Grand Illusion). Tommy Shaw solo: 1984—Girls With Guns (A&M) 1985—What If 1987—Ambition (Atlantic) 1998—7 Deadly Zens (CMC).

One of the leading exemplars of the FM radio-oriented hard pop known as "pomp rock," Styx also claims the distinction of having been named (in a 1979 Gallup Poll) the most popular rock band among American fans aged 13 to 18. At the height of its commercial powers, Styx released a string of five platinum albums, including the #1 triple-platinum Paradise Theatre (1981).

Twins Chuck and John Panozzo, along with Dennis DeYoung and Tom Nardini, worked the Chicago-area bar circuit from 1963 until 1969, when Nardini left the group and the Panozzos and DeYoung entered Chicago State University. There they met John Curulewski, with whom they formed TW4. James Young joined a year later, and they changed their name to Styx (after the river that flows through Hades in Greek mythology).

After incessant touring, their national break came in 1975 with the #6 single "Lady," featuring the blaring vocal trads that are a Styx trademark. From 1977 until their breakup in 1984, every one of their releases sold platinum or better: The Grand Illusion (#6, 1977, 3 million sold), Pieces of Eight (#6, 1978, 3 million sold), Cornerstone (#2, 1979, 2 million sold), Paradise Theatre, and Kilroy Was Here (#3, 1983, 1 million sold). Their concerts were invariably sold out. Their hit singles included "Come Sail Away" (#8, 1977); "Fooling Yourself (the Angry Young Man)" (#29) and "Blue Collar Man (Long Nights)" (#21, 1978; "Babe" (#1, 1979); and "The Best of Times" (#3) and "Too Much Time on My Hands" (#9), both 1981

In 1983 the group toured 3,000-seat halls with a theatrical presentation of Kilroy Was Here, an anticensorship concept album that included the hit singles "Mr. Roboto" (#3) and "Don't Let It End" (#6). In 1984 the group members went their separate ways for a while. DeYoung and Shaw, who had written most of Styx's music, each embarked on initially auspicious solo careers. DeYoung's Desert Moon (#29, 1984) featured the #10 title single, while Shaw's Girls With Guns (#50, 1984) had a #33 title track. Subsequent releases were not as successful, and in 1990 Shaw joined Ted Nugent's Damn Yankees [see entry].

Four members of Styx, with newcomer Glen Burtnik, released the comeback Edge of the Century in the fall of 1990. Its "Show Me the Way" (#3, 1990) became something of a theme song during the Gulf War, and "Love at First Sight" was a Top 30 single later that next spring. In 1995 DeYoung played Pilate in the 1995 Broadway revival of Jesus Christ Superstar. He later completed his own musical based on The Hunchback of Notre Dame.

Shaw returned to the band when he helped rerecord "Lady" for 1995's Greatest Hits; Styx's initial label, Wooden Nickel, had refused to license the original version for the A&M compilation. By 1990, drummer John Panozzo had developed a debilitating drinking problem. In 1996 Styx was forced to hire a temporary touring replacement, Todd Sucherman. In July of that year Panozzo died, the result of a gastrointestinal hemorrhage, and Sucherman became a permanent addition. The live Return to Paradise was the first-ever gold record for Styx's new label, CMC International. During the sessions for 1999's Brave New World, DeYoung developed an acute case of photosensitivity. Styx acrimoniously replaced him for the ensuing tour. Burtnik also returned, this time on bass, to replace Chuck Panozzo, who had also left the band.

Long Beach Dub AllStars, formed 1996, Long Beach, CA:

Wilson, bass; Gaugh, drums; Marshall Goodman (b. Jan. 31, 1971, Chicago, IL), turntables, drums, perc.; Richard "RAS-I" Smith (b. Dec. 29, 1970, Long Beach), gtr., voc.; Jack Maness (b. Sep. 10, 1967, St. Louis, MO), kybds., voc.; Opie Ortiz

(b. Long Beach), voc.; Timothy Wu (b. Aug. 30, 1976, Long Beach), sax.

1999—Right Back (DreamWorks).

When national success finally came to the Long Beach, California, ska-rock band Sublime, it was painfully bittersweet. Frontman Brad Nowell spent eight years of his life in pursuit of rock stardom with the group, relentlessly working the Southern California party and bar scene with bassist Eric Wilson and drummer Bud Gaugh. He saw the band release two moderately successful albums on its own Skunk label before finally securing a long-sought-after major label deal with MCA, but he would never fully realize his dream. On May 25, 1996, three months before Sublime's self-titled MCA debut shipped to stores, Nowell—who had battled a heroin addiction for years—died of an overdose in a San Francisco hotel room. He was 28.

Released 10 weeks after Nowell's funeral, Sublime (#25, 1996) steadily went on to become one of the best-selling albums of 1997, spinning off four Modern Rock radio hits and eventually going quintuple platinum. The band's 1992 independent debut, 40 Oz. to Freedom, also enjoyed a sales spike (going platinum) after being reissued by MCA, while 1997's odds and sods collection, Second-Hand Smoke, went to #28. Other vault releases included Stand by Your Van—Live in Concert (#49, 1998) and Acoustic—Bradley Nowell & Friends (#107, 1998). Greatest Hits, issued in late 1999, peaked at #114.

After Nowell's death, Wilson and Gaugh assembled the Long Beach Dub AllStars to perform at a 1996 benefit for Nowell's son, Jakob. Three years later, the group released its debut, Right Back.

The Sugar Hill Gang

Formed 1977, New York, NY

Master Gee (b. Guy O'Brien, 1963, New York), voc.; Wonder Mike (b. Michael Wright, 1958, Englewood, NJ), voc.; Big Bank Hank (b. Henry Jackson, 1958, Bronx, NY), voc.
1979—Rapper's Delight (Sugarhill) 1981—The 8th Wonder 1996—The Best of Sugarhill Gang (Rhino) 1999—Jump On It.

Before the Sugar Hill Gang's "Rapper's Delight," rap was confined to the clubs and house parties in the New York City area. Following the record's release in the summer of 1979, rap became a part of the pop music vocabulary.

In 1979 Sylvia and Joe Robinson's independent label All Platinum was awash in lawsuits and losing money; the husband-and-wife team (Sylvia had been a hitmaking singer as half of Mickey and Sylvia and as a soloist) expected to quit the record business. At a party for her sister in Harlem, she heard guests chanting rhymes over the instrumental breaks in disco records. Using her son Joey as talent scout, she rounded up three youngsters from the New York area to rap over a rhythm track adapted from Chic's "Good Times," and chartered a new label, Sugarhill, to carry the record, "Rapper's Delight."

According to Sugarhill, the record sold 2 million copies in America. It placed #4 R&B in the U.S., made the Top 5 in the U.K., Israel, and South Africa, among other countries, and went to #1 in Canada. It proved to be the Sugar Hill Gang's only big hit, although "8th Wonder" (#15 R&B, 1981) and "Lover in You" were chart singles. The trio disappeared for most of the '80s, but eventually resurfaced with a few personnel changes (Master Gee was notably absent). The Gang continued performing into the '90s. Jump On It, released in 1999, is a winsome album of hip-hop for kids.

Sugar Ray

Formed 1989, as the Shrinky Dinx, Newport Beach, CA
 Mark McGrath (b. Mar. 15, 1968), voc., Rodney Sheppard (b. Nov. 25, 1967), gtr., Murphy Karges (b. June 20, 1967), bass, Stan Frazier (b. Apr. 23, 1968), drums.
 1995—(+ Craig "DJ Homicide" Bullock [b. Dec. 17, 1970])
Lemonade and Brownies (Atlantic) 1997—Flooded 1999—14.59

Riding a wave of Southern California alternative-rock acts that achieved popularity—sometimes fleeting—in the late '90s, Sugar Ray was influenced by a variety of sounds: Red Hot Chili Peppers-style punk-funk, reggae grooves, metal, hip-hop, and a little bit of retro new wave. The group released its debut album Lemonade and Brownies in 1995, but constant touring (with Cypress Hill and Korn) failed to generate much interest in it. Sugar Ray was on the verge of disbanding when drummer Stan Frazier came up with music for the Caribbean-flavored song "Fly" (#1 Modern Rock, 1997), which McGrath disliked so intensely that he briefly quit. The singer was talked into rejoining the band, and, borrowing lyrics from the Beatles, Killing Joke, and Gilbert O'Sullivan, created the breakthrough single that drove its next album, Flooded (#12, 1997), to 2 million in sales. Jokes that Sugar Ray was a one-hit wonder prompted the title of the 1999 album 14:59 (#17, 1999), an allusion to Andy Warhol's comment that "in the future, everyone will be famous for 15 minutes." If the band's time was up, it was going out on a high note. The album matched Flooded in sales, and produced hit singles in the Motown-inflected revere "Every Morning" (#3, 1999) and "Someday" (#7, 1999).

When artist/sculptor Alan Vega and keyboardist Martin Rev began performing at New York's Mercer Arts Center (then home to the New York Dolls), they were ahead of their time. Suicide based its music on Rev's repetitive wall-of-noise keyboards (initially a broken Farfisa organ) and pneumatic rhythm machines, with Vega's Presley-ish vocals providing a link to rock & roll tradition. But Vega also brought a form of performance art onstage. He hit himself in the face with his microphone, he whispered and screamed, he strode into the audience seeking to incite involvement or confrontation. Some found Suicide fascinating, others thought them brilliant and important, more seemed to enjoy them as some sort of joke, and most simply hated them.

Suicide opened for the Clash and Elvis Costello on 1978 British tours, where audiences regularly flung beer bottles at the stage, and a few fights broke out. On a limited-edition, European live album (later reissued as a flexi-disc), one can hear audience members grabbing the microphone from the stage and passing it around, hurling epithets at the band the whole time. In 1980 the Cars' Ric Ocasek revealed himself as Suicide's most famous fan. The Cars' Candy-O includes a direct allusion to Suicide in "Shoo-Be-Do." Ocasek got Suicide to open the Cars' 1980 U.S. tour (in L.A. Suicide nearly caused riots, and the concert promoters unsuccessfully tried to have them taken off the bill), included Suicide on a Cars-hosted Midnight Special, and produced Suicide's 1980 Ze album.

The two got back together again, with Ocasek producing, for 1988's more rhythmic A Way of Life and its followup, 1992's Why Be Blue. Ironically, the band is now quite revered in Europe. Suicide has become an unmeasurable influence on the industrial dance, noise, techno, ambient, and electronic scenes of the '80s and '90s. The pair's main albums have been reissued on numerous occasions, with scores of bonus tracks. Rev and Vega continue to perform, both together and solo.

Donna Summer

Born Adrian Donna Gaines, Dec. 31, 1948, Boston, MA
 1975—Love to Love You Baby (Oasis) 1976—A Love Trilogy; Four Seasons of Love (Casablanca) 1977—I Remember Yesterday; Once Upon a Time 1978—Live and More 1979—Bad Girls; On the Radio: Greatest Hits: vols. I and II 1980—Walk Away—Collector's Edition; The Wanderer

(Geffen) 1982—Donna Summer 1983—She Works Hard for the Money (Mercury) 1984—Cats Without Claws (Geffen) 1987—All Systems Go 1989—Another Place and Time (Atlantic) 1991—Mistaken Identity 1993—The Donna Summer Anthology (PolyGram) 1994—Endless Summer: Donna Summer's Greatest Hits (Mercury) 1999—VH1 Presents Live & More: Encore! (Sony).

Donna Summer was the biggest star to emerge from the mid-'70s disco explosion and went on to pursue a successful pop career. She sang in Boston churches as a child, occasionally as a lead vocalist. In 1967 she made her professional debut at Boston's Psychedelic Supermarket. Later that year, at age 18, she landed a role in the Munich, Germany, production of Hair. While in Germany, she married Austrian actor Helmut Sommer, later divorcing him but keeping the Anglicized surname. For a time she sang in a Vienna Folk Opera version of Porgy and Bess. Working as a backup singer at Munich's Musicland Studios, Summer met producers Giorgio Moroder and Pete Bellotte. Together the trio created a string of European pop hits for Moroder's Oasis label. In 1975 Moroder licensed Oasis to America's Casablanca Records.

The orgasmic 17-minute title track from Love to Love You Baby (#11 pop, #6 R&B, 1975) became a major disco hit, and by year's end had crossed over to pop and R&B charts as well (#2 pop, #3 R&B). Many thought Summer would be a typical one-hit disco act, but Moroder, Bellotte, and Casablanca president Neil Bogart were determined to give her hits and longevity. A Love Trilogy (#21 pop, #16 R&B, 1976) solidified her disco following, while Four Seasons of Love (#29 pop, #13 R&B, 1976) and "Spring Affair" (#58 pop, #24 R&B) expanded her pop audience.

With 1977's I Remember Yesterday (#18 pop, #11 R&B) Moroder expanded the music's stylistic range. The album yielded the influential synthesizer pop hit "I Feel Love" (#6 pop, #9 R&B). For the disco fairy-tale concept album Once Upon a Time (#26 pop, #13 R&B, 1977) Summer contributed lyrics to most of the material. Live and More (#1 pop, #4 R&B, 1978) provided Summer with her first pop #1 (#8 R&B), a cover of Jimmy Webb's "MacArthur Park." That year she also appeared in the disco film Thank God It's Friday. "Last Dance" (#3 pop, #5 R&B, 1978) from the soundtrack album won two Grammy Awards—one for Summer, one for songwriter Paul Jabara—and an Oscar for Jabara. The double-platinum Bad Girls (#1 pop and R&B, 1979) broke down any lingering critical resistance to Summer. "Hot Stuff" (#1 pop, #3 R&B) and the rocking title track (#1 pop and R&B) made her popular with disco, pop, and rock fans. That year, Barbra Streisand duetted with Summer on "No More Tears (Enough Is Enough)" (#1 pop, #20 R&B). Two other crossover hits rounded out Summer's biggest year: "Heaven Knows" (#4 pop, #10 R&B) and "Dim All the Lights" (#2 pop, #13 R&B).

But success also brought problems. In 1980 she sued her manager, Joyce Bogart, and husband Neil for $10 million for mismanagement. She was thus able to end her Casablanca contract and to sign with Geffen Records. The Wanderer (#13 pop, #12 R&B, 1980) was her first Geffen release, the title track becoming a strong-selling single (#3 pop, #13 R&B), although the album didn't live up to sales expectations. The Wanderer also included Summer's first born-again Christian message song, "I Believe in Jesus." It was around this time that rumors began circulating that Summer had said the emerging AIDS epidemic was God's revenge on homosexuals for living a blasphemous lifestyle. Summer later denied the rumors, but her large gay following dwindled. In 1980 she married Bruce Sudano, lead singer of Brooklyn Dreams, with whom she had recorded "Heaven Knows"; they named their daughter Brook Lyn. Donna Summer (#20 pop, #8 R&B) was released in 1982. The Quincy Jones-produced album was a replacement for an LP Giorgio Moroder had produced but Geffen Records had rejected. A track from that unreleased album appears on the Fast Times at Ridgemont High soundtrack. She then had her biggest hit album since Bad Girls with She Works Hard for the Money (#9 pop, #5 R&B, 1983), which yielded a massive hit single in the title track (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1983), a video for which was played heavily on MTV. The album also contained a more modest hit in the reggae-ish "Unconditional Love" (#43 pop, #9 R&B, 1983), with backing vocals by Britain's Musical Youth. Cats Without Claws (#40 pop, #24 R&B, 1984) contained a cover of the Difters classic "There Goes My Baby" (#21 pop, #20 R&B, 1984), the track "Forgive Me" earned Summer her second Grammy, for Best Inspirational Vocal.

While All Systems Go went nowhere (#122 pop, #53 R&B, 1987), yielding only a minor hit single in "Dinner With Gershwin" (#48 pop, #10 R&B, 1987), Another Place and Time (#53 pop, #71 R&B, 1989) was produced by the British team of Stock, Aitken, and Waterman, who'd had synth-driven dance hits with Bananarama and Dead or Alive. They brought Summer back to the Top 10 singles chart with "This Time I Know It's for Real" (#7, 1989). But as the album's followup, Mistaken Identity, quickly sank, Summer then embarked on another dry spell. Summer started performing live again in 1996 and that same year she sang a duet on Liza Minnelli's Gently. In 1997 "Carry On," a collaboration with Moroder, won a Grammy for Best Dance Recording. In 2000 she was nominated again, this time for "I Will Go With You (Con Te Partiró)" (#79 pop, 1999), off the VH1 special VH1 Presents Live & More: Encore! (#43 pop, #33 R&B, 1999).

In 1995 Summer and Sudano moved to Nashville, where they have been writing songs for the likes of Dolly Parton (they cowrote "Starting Over Again") and Reba McEntire. The couple has also been busy working on Ordinary Girl, a musical they hope to bring to Broadway.

With his spangly costumes, circus-style multimedia concerts, otherworldly cosmology, and surreal marriage of heady avant-gardism with funky tent-show gospel, Sun Ra was one of the most unique, colorful, and self-determined visionaries in modern popular music. With Miles Davis, he was one of the few authentic jazz figures to exert a wide, discernible influence not just on jazz artists (most explicitly the Art Ensemble of Chicago), but rock and R&B acts too, among them George Clinton, NRBO, Pink Floyd, and Sonic Youth (for whom Ra opened at New York's Central Park, July 4, 1992). Composer, arranger, bandleader, keyboardist, and philosopher, Ra innovated the use of electronics, Afro-percussive polyrhythms, and collective free improvisation within big-band jazz. Perhaps the first "alternative" artist, he also documented his work through roughly 100 self-produced albums for his own independent El Saturn Research label (many of which went out of print before being reissued on CD by Evidence Music, of Philadelphia, where Ra had been based since the late '60s).

Ra, who claimed to have been born on Saturn and sent to Earth as "an ambassador of the Creator of the Omniverse," was first known on Earth as Herman Blount. Reportedly a musical prodigy, he could instantly play a piano his parents bought for his tenth birthday (or "arrival day" as Ra would call it). Blount studied music in high school under renowned teacher and bandleader John Tuggles "Fess" Whatley and majored in music education at Alabama A&M University. After graduating in the mid-'30s, he led the college band on tour, then played piano in a variety of little-known Southern and Midwestern territory bands—sometimes under the name Sonny Lee—and allegedly backed such blues singers as Wynonie Harris on occasion. By the mid-'40s, he settled in Chicago, playing piano in the band led by his idol, seminal swing arranger Fletcher Henderson; he also worked at Chicago's popular Club DeLisa, arranging scores for floorshows and visiting singers.

Sometime around 1948 Sonny Blount changed the name on his passport to "Le Sony'r Ra" and proclaimed himself "Sun Ra, cosmic messenger." Going against the bebop-combo grain, Ra—though generally regarded as eccentric—slowly built his so-called "Arkestra," attracting a core of talented, dedicated players, some of whom (tenor saxophonist John Gilmore, baritone saxophonist Pat Patrick, and alto saxophonist Marshall Allen) remained with him for decades. The first Arkestras merged Monk's off-center bebop, Ellington's exotic tonal palette, and the earthy punch of Mungus with authoritative world-music elements from Africa, the Caribbean, the Middle East, and the Orient.

In the early '60s the members moved to New York, where Ornette Coleman, Cecil Taylor, and Albert Ayler were forging the "free jazz" revolution. Ra's controlled use of dissonance, silence, and free-form techniques set him firmly in the jazz avant-garde. From the mid-'60s on, Ra's cult following grew, especially in Europe, as he placed a heavier accent on electronic keyboards (including Moog synthesizer), massed African percussion, and the pageantry of dancers, film projections, and light shows.

The 1974 death of Duke Ellington seemed to inspire Ra to pepper his shows with punk-paced renditions of the classic Ellington and Fletcher Henderson big-band charts of his youth, presaging by several years the rediscovery of tradition by younger avant-garde jazz artists, and making his concerts more accessible. By the '80s, Sun Ra was no longer a leading-edge innovator, but a colorful elder statesman who toured incessantly, often playing rock venues. His final arranging triumph may have been in orchestrating a crowd-pleasing magical mystery tour through jazz history and beyond, from throbbing tribal percussion and roiling full-band noise, to rollicking swing and galvanic neo-gospel chants about outer space.

Despite his declining health, Ra continued performing, albeit in a wheelchair and then playing only skeletal piano. After suffering a third stroke in late 1992, Ra let his band tour without him. He returned to his birthplace, where he succumbed to mounting physical complications eight days after his 79th "annal day." Under Gilmore's leadership, the band continued playing Ra's music; after the 63-year-old Gilmore died of emphysema in 1995 (the same year that NRBQ, the Residents, and Sonic Youth's Thurston Moore contributed to the Ra tribute album Wavelength Infinity), Marshall Allen took over leadership of the Arkestra. Under his direction the band still represented in stores by myriad CD reissues of long-lost albums, made its first new recording since Ra's death with A Song for the Sun.

Supergrass

Formed 1993, Oxford, Eng.

Gaz Coombes (b. Gareth Michael Coombes, Mar. 8, 1976, Oxford), voc., gtr.; Mick Quinn (b. Michael Quinn, Dec. 17, 1969, Oxford), bass; Danny Goffey (b. Daniel Goffey, Feb. 7, 1974, Oxford), drums.

1995—I Should Coco (Capitol) 1997—In It for the Money 1999—Supergrass (Island/Def Jam).

Supergrass crafts sunny, uptempo pop with the subversive edge of punk, tapping into the legacies of early Elvis Costello, Small Faces, and the Buzzcocks. Frequently labeled Brit-pop, the band has otherwise largely escaped that genre's public feuds and commercial pressures.

Gaz Coombes and Danny Goffey, ex-members of the Jenuifers (a "shoegazing" quartet that released one single in England before disbanding), formed Supergrass with bassist Mick Quinn in 1993. Their first single, "Caught by the Fuzz," released the next year on the indie Backbeat, recounts Coombes' experience as a 15-year-old waiting for his mother to pick him up at jail after being busted for possession. The single attracted the attention of EMI's Parlophone label, which signed the band and reissued the single, which hit #43 on the U.K. chart. Their commercially successful debut album, I Should Coco (#1 U.K.) took its title from the cockney expression for "I should think so," and attracted critical acclaim and a cult audience in the U.S., where the album was released on Capitol. In It for the Money (#2 U.K.) followed in 1997. Supergrass changed U.S. labels for its self-titled third album (#3 U.K.) to Island/Def Jam. The band's touring lineup usually includes keyboardist Rob Coombes, the singer's brother, who cowrote tracks on the band's last two albums.

Supertramp began as the wish fulfillment of a millionaire rock fan. By the late '70s, the group's blend of keyboard-heavy progressive rock and immaculate pop had yielded several hit singles and a few platinum LPs.

In the late '60s Dutch millionaire Stanley August Miesegaes heard Rick Davies in a band called the Joint. When that band broke up, Miesegaes offered to bankroll a band if Davies would handle the music. Davies placed classified ads in London newspapers for a band. The first response was from Roger Hodgson, who was to split songwriting and singing with Davies in Supertramp, the name they took from W.H. Davies' 1938 book, The Autobiography of a Supertramp. Drummer Bob Miller suffered a nervous breakdown after their first LP's release; he was replaced by Kevin Currie for the next, but like the first, it flopped.

After a disastrous tour, the band (except Davies and Hodgson) broke up. Davies and Hodgson recruited Bob Benberg from pub rockers Bees Make Honey, and John Helliwell and Dougie Thomson from the Alan Bown Set, and A&M sent them to a rehearsal retreat at a seventeenth-century farm. Their next LP, Crime of the Century, was the subject of a massive advertising/promotional campaign, and went to #1 in the U.K. but didn't take off commercially in the U.S., though it did sow the seeds of a cult following.

In 1975 the singles "Dreamer" and "Bloody Well Right" from Crime achieved some chart success in both the U.K. and the U.S. Supertramp toured the U.S. as a headliner, with A&M giving away most of the tickets. Crisis? failed to yield a hit single, but was heavily played on progressive FM radio and solidified the band's audience base, as did Even in the Quietest Moments (#16, 1977), which included "Give a Little Bit" (#15, 1977). Supertramp's breakthrough was Breakfast in America, a #1 worldwide LP, which eventually sold over 4 million copies in the U.S. and contained hit singles in "The Logical Song" (#6), "Goodbye Stranger" (#15), and "Take the Long Way Home" (#10). The Paris live double LP hit #8, and "... famous last words ..." included another hit, "It's Raining Again" (#11, 1982). In early 1983 Hodgson announced he was leaving the group for a solo career. His first solo release, In the Eye of the Storm (#46, 1984), contained his only charting single to date, "Had a Dream (Sleeping With the Enemy)" (#48, 1984). His subsequent work was not as well received.

The group's next album, Brother Where You Bound (#21, 1985), contained Supertramp's last charting single to date, "Cannonball" (#28, 1985). Late in 1985 Supertramp embarked on a six-month tour of the United States. Hodgson briefly rejoined to promote the U.K. Top 10 compilation The Autobiography of Supertramp Free As a Bird (1987) missed the Top 100 by one and included a dance hit, "I'm Begging You." In 1997 Davies, Helliwell, and Benberg regrouped Supertramp—minus Hodgson—and, with the aid of studio players, released Some Things Never Change.

With 12 #1 pop singles, numerous gold recordings, sold-out concerts, and regular television appearances, the Supremes were not only the most commercially successful female group of the '60s but among the top 5 pop/rock/soul acts of that decade. Diana Ross, Mary Wilson, and Florence Ballard comprised Motown's flagship group. Berry Gordy Jr.'s black-pop music crossover dream come true that paved the way from rock radio hits and package bus tours to Las Vegas showrooms and Royal Command Performances. At the height of the civil rights movement, they were also embraced by the world as symbols of black achievement and black womanhood. Fronted by Diana Ross during their peak years, they epitomized Holland-Dozier-Holland's classic Motown sound and the label's sophisticated style. Unlike other so-called girl groups, the Supremes had a mature, glamorous demeanor that appealed equally to teens and adults. Beautiful, musically versatile, and unique, the original Supremes were America's sweethearts, setting standards and records that no group has yet equalled.

Diana Ross, Mary Wilson, and Florence Ballard met while each was living in Detroit's Brewster housing project. They began singing together in their teens and in their early years were a quartet, abetted by Betty McGlowin and then Barbara Martin. Ballard was the most enthusiastic about pursuing a music career. While still in high school, she and the others became friendly with members of the Primes, a male vocal trio that included future founding Temptations Eddie Kendricks and Paul Williams. That group's manager formed the three girls, along with Williams' girlfriend, McGlowin, into a "sister" group and dubbed them the Primettes. Of the three, Ballard, whose soulful style was closer to Aretha Franklin's than Ross', was originally considered the lead singer, although Ross and Wilson both sang lead. They became known locally, and through Ross came to know Smokey Robinson, who arranged their first audition for Gordy. Not yet out of high school, the Primitives were deemed too young to be signed, but they continued to hang around Hitsville, where they met other performers and contributed the occasional background vocal to records by other artists, including Mary Wells. In the meantime, they cut a single record for another local label, Lupine. Finally, in January 1961, Gordy signed the group to Motown and suggested that they change their name. Ballard suggested the Supremes.

Gordy groomed all his groups but paid special attention to the Supremes. Years later both Ross and Wilson, like several other Motown acts, would claim that Motown PR exaggerated their alleged impoverished upbringings and state that they had come to the label with their own coordinated stage costumes and choreography (masterminded by Temptation Paul Williams). The girls received instruction in dance, etiquette, and singing and were closely chaperoned. Although rumors of a romance between Gordy and Ross have endured over the years, neither specifically confirmed or denied them until Gordy revealed in his 1994 autobiography, To Be Loved, that Ross' eldest daughter, Rhonda, was his. Gordy was especially protective of the group and provided them with support not always offered to all his other acts.

Despite the attention, the group released nine singles that were either moderately successful (such as "Let Me Go the Right Way" and "When the Lovelight Starts Shining Through His Eyes") or flops before the Holland-Dozier-Holland team hit on the dramatic, seductive formula that showcased Ross' distinctive vocal style. Their 10th release, "Where Did Our Love Go," became their first #1 hit in summer 1964, selling over 2 million copies and starting a streak that resulted in two more chart-topping singles before year's end: "Baby Love" and "Come See About Me."

The Supremes' big singles of 1965 were "Stop! in the Name of Love" (#1 pop, #2 R&B), "Back in My Arms Again" (#1 pop and R&B), and "I Hear a Symphony" (#1 pop, #2 R&B). "You Can't Hurry Love" and "You Keep Me Hangin' On" were #1 on both the pop and R&B charts in 1966. "Love Is Here and Now You're Gone" (#1 pop and R&B), "The Happening" (#1 pop, #12 R&B), and "Reflections" (#2 pop, #4 R&B) hit in 1967. During that period the group averaged at least one national television appearance or major concert a week. Not only were the Supremes regular guests on such popular pop shows as Shindig and Hullabaloo, but on mainstream programs such as Ed Sullivan's The Tonight Show, The Hollywood Palace and countless other variety programs where they acquitted themselves in performances with show-business legends like Pearl Bailey and the Andrews Sisters. Early on, Gordy decided that the group's major television appearances would feature their latest hit and a Broadway show tune or standard. They soon became steady headliners at top Vegas venues and supperclubs around the world, including the Copacabana and London's Talk of the Town, and other top Motown acts followed suit. They recorded in several foreign languages and drew huge audiences wherever they appeared. They were also important symbols of black success. As such, they were often seen at Democratic political fund raisers, for President Lyndon Johnson, among others, and were specially invited to attend the funeral of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968.

Although the individual group members insisted they were a team, there was no denying that the public saw Ross as the star. Gordy, who had set his sights on moving Motown to L.A. and becoming a movie mogul, laid plans for Ross' eventual solo career. In 1967 "Reflections" was the first single credited to Diana Ross and the Supremes. By then, years of relentless touring and recording had taken their toll. Although both Ross and Wilson always credited Ballard with having founded the group, both later revealed in their respective autobiographies that Ballard's unpredictability, mood swings, and excessive drinking were threatening the group's future. In their and Gordy's defense, Ballard had missed several concert dates and become careless about her appearance and performance. Further, she was embittered by the attention being lavished on Ross, and finally in 1967 either quit or was asked to leave the group.

Although until recently Ballard was portrayed as a victim of Gordy and Ross' ambitions, her story was much more complicated. She left Motown and turned management of her career over to her husband, whose sole experience in the area consisted of being Gordy's chauffeur. Contrary to popular misconception, Ballard did not leave Motown penniless; rather, she received approximately $160,000 but was cheated out of it by her own attorney (who was later disbarred). She recorded an album for ABC that, to date, has not been released, and her two singles releases ("It Doesn't Matter How I Say It" b/w "Goin' Out of My Head" and "Love Ain't Love" b/w "Forever Faithful," both in 1968) failed to chart.

Within a few short years Ballard had three daughters, an unstable marriage, and was suffering from depression, alcoholism, and myriad health problems, including high blood pressure. She lost her home and for a while was separated from her husband and receiving aid for dependent children. Despite a few public appearances, including one that was part of President Richard Nixon's inaugural festivities, she basically gave up singing. Nine years after leaving Motown, she died of cardiac arrest in Detroit at 32. Both Ross and Wilson attended the funeral, presided over by Aretha Franklin's father, the Reverend C.L. Franklin. Among her pallbearers were the Four Tops.

Ballard was replaced by a member of Patti LaBelle and the Blue Belles, Cindy Birdsong. By that point, Holland-Dozier-Holland had left Motown, and while the Supremes continued to have hits with material recorded before the production team's departure, there were signs that in the wake of Aretha Franklin and the rise of soul, their smooth sophistication was becoming passé. "Love Child" (#1 pop, #2 R&B), an uncharacteristically bold song about illegitimacy, was the Supremes' biggest hit of 1968. They continued in the same vein with another slice of ghetto life, "I'm Livin' in Shame" (#10 pop, #8 R&B, 1969). These records were also significant for being the first on which Ross sang with anonymous background singers rather than Birdsong and Wilson. Others included the relatively less popular "The Composer" and "No Matter What Sign You Are." Their other big hits were group duets with the Temptations, with whom they costarred in two highly rated television specials, "T.C.B." (1968) and "G.I.T. on Broadway" (1969). These spun off hit albums and a string of popular singles, including "I'm Gonna Make You Love Me" and "I'll Try Something New."

By early 1969, Ross' future departure was widely rumored, and that November Motown issued the official press release. Speculation as to who would replace her focused on Syreeta Wright, but Gordy gave the spot to Jean Terrell, boxer Ernie Terrell's sister, to whom he'd signed to a solo contract earlier. The year ended with "Someday We'll Be Together" (#1 pop and R&B), a record that featured only one Supreme, Ross. In January 1970 Ross made her farewell appearance at the Frontier Hotel in Las Vegas. The event was documented on the live album Farewell. Though Ross went on as a hugely successful solo act (see her entry) her initial efforts were bested on the charts by the so-called "new" Supremes' first releases. Terrell was a stronger, earthier singer, and 1970 brought two Frank Wilson-produced hits: "Up the Ladder to the Roof" (#10 pop, #5 R&B) and "Stoned Love" (#7 pop, #1 R&B). Along with the Four Tops, this new lineup recorded three albums and hit with a powerful version of "River Deep—Mountain High" (#14 pop, #7 R&B, 1970). The progressive psychedelic blues "Nathan Jones" (#16 pop, #8 R&B) was the group's sole hit in 1971. The Smokey Robinson-written and -produced "Floy Joy" (#16 pop, #5 R&B) was considered their best effort of 1972.

By then the Supremes were not the only Motown act to suffer from the company's lack of support. Unlike early Motown artists, however, the newer Supremes, including Terrell, bntled at Gordy's authority and early on (Wilson claims as early as January 1970), he lost interest in the group. Through a series of producers, among them Jimmy Webb and Stevie Wonder (1973's "Bad Weather") and personnel changes that left Wilson the only original and consistent member, the group struggled against Motown's, and eventually the public's, indifference. Interestingly, the latter versions of the group didn't suffer from a lack of talent: Lynda Laurence and Susaye Greene had both been members of Stevie Wonder's group Wonderlove; Greene was a proven songwriter who would later cowrite "I Can't Help It" for Michael Jackson's Thriller. Scherrie Payne, sister of Freda, had sung with Holland-Dozier-Holland's group Glass House and was considered a technically gifted vocalist. In 1976 the Greene-Wilson-Payne lineup released the Supremes' last Top 40 single, "I'm Gonna Let My Heart Do the Walking." Wilson, who became the group's leader, decided to pursue a solo career and the last version of the Supremes gave their final farewell performance in London in 1977. Payne and Greene continued briefly as a duo. Birdsong worked as a secretary at Motown, then attempted a solo career. She has since become intensely religious. Terrell and Laurence both retired to marry. They, along with Payne, have performed together in recent years as "Supremes." Rumors that the hit Broadway play Dreamgirls was based on the Supremes' story were confirmed with the 1986 publication of Mary Wilson's best-selling autobiography Dreamgirl: My Life as a Supreme (cowritten with Arghus Juilliard and Patricia Romanowski). Aside from Ross, Wilson remains the best-known ex-Supreme, and she also authored a sequel recounting the latter-day Supremes, her abusive marriage, and ongoing legal disputes with Motown, Supreme Faith (with Romanowski) in 1990.

The first attempt at a Supremes reunion of Ross, Wilson, and Birdsong, occurred at the taping of Motown 25 in 1983 and ended in embarrassment when Ross pushed Wilson's microphone away from her face. Though the segment was not aired, it was widely reported and seemed to confirm the old image of Ross as the pushy leader. Despite the author's protests to the contrary, Wilson's depiction of Ross further damaged whatever relationship the two might have had.

In 1988, when the Supremes were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, Ross declined to attend, leaving Wilson and Ballard's youngest daughter, Lisa, to accept on behalf of the group. Although Wilson's solo records have not been successful, she continues to perform around the world. In January 1991 Wilson was injured and the youngest of her three children, Pedro Ferrer, was killed in a car accident. In the wake of that accident, she and Ross reconciled. Wilson continues to perform around the world to good reviews; she is also pursuing a degree at New York University.

The Supremes were front-page news again in the spring of 2000, when Ross announced what would become known as the Supremes Return to Love Tour. To the disappointment of fans and critics alike, Ross chose to tour with Payne and Laurence—two Supremes who had not joined the group until after her departure and with whom she had never worked before—after Wilson and Birdsong declined to join her. Though accounts of the negotiations differ in their details, Ross stood to earn an estimated $20 million for the tour, but she and/or her representatives refused to pay Wilson and Birdsong more than $3 million each. Clearly underestimating the public's affection for Wilson and Birdsong and its desire to see a real reunion, Ross forged on with a pretour campaign that included a VH1 Divas tribute to her, an hour on Oprah, and an interview with Barbara Walters in which she described Wilson as "vindictive" and "angry." While ticket sales were brisk in some cities, most venues did not even sell half their seats, and the tour was canceled midway through. Ross was savaged in the media for what some critics flatly termed egomania. Ironically, the tour's failure reminded anyone who might have forgotten that the Supremes were first, foremost, and always a group of three whose collective magic could not be eclipsed by any individual, not even Ross.

David Townsend (b. May 17, 1954, Englewood, CA), gtr., kybds., voc.; David "Pic" Conley (b. Dec. 27, 1953, Newark, NJ), bass, sax, perc., kybds., flute, voc.; Karen Copeland (d. Dec. 5, 1988, NJ), voc.

1984—(- Copeland; + Bernard Jackson [b. July 11, 1959, Stamford, CT], voc.) 1987—Surface (Columbia) 1988—2nd Wave 1990—3 Deep 1991—*The Best of Surface . . . Bernard Jackson solo: 2000—Bernard Jackson (Orchard).

Surface is a soul group that scored several hits with its R&B ballads and smooth dance grooves. The band was formed by David Townsend, son of producer/songwriter Ed Townsend and a former member of the Isley Brothers band, and David Conley, who had played with the '70s funk band Mandrill [see entry], with Karen Copeland on vocals. That version of Surface released two singles with mild success. Townsend and Conley then began working with singer/songwriter Bernard Jackson. Surface wrote songs for artists including New Edition, Isaac Hayes, the Jets, Sister Sledge, and Gwen Guthrie and began to record its own material.

Surface's eponymous debut yielded a few hits: "Happy" (#20 pop, #2 R&B, 1987), "Lately" (#8 R&B, 1987), and "Let's Try Again" (#22 R&B, 1987). They avoided sophomore jinx on 2nd Wave, which included "Shower Me With Your Love" (#5 pop, #1 R&B, 1989). They continued to hit with the R&B market on 3 Deep, which included "All I Want Is You" (#8 R&B, 1991), featuring backing vocals by Regina Belle, "Never Gonna Let You Down" (#17 pop, #24 R&B, 1991), and "You're the One" (#35 R&B, 1991).

Townsend and Conley produced Aretha Franklin's Grammy-nominated 1991 album What You See Is What You Sweat. As of late 1994, Jackson had formed a new group, Townsend was working A&R for a record label, and Conley was managing and producing bands including Tu Luce. Surface has yet to put out another record, but Jackson finally released his self-titled in 2000.

The Surfaris

Formed 1962, Glendora, CA

Pat Connolly (b. 1947), voc., bass; Jim Fuller (b. 1947), gtr.; Bob Berryhill (b. 1947), gtr.; Ron Wilson (b. 1945; d. May 1989), drums; Jim Pash (b. 1949), sax, clarinet, gtr.
1963—Wipe Out (Dot); The Surfaris Play Wipe Out and Others
1964—Hit City 64 ca. 1966—(- Berryhill; - Connolly; - Fuller)
1981—Punkline (N/A).

The Surfaris rode the wave of the early-'60s surf-music boom, often appearing at Southern California teen dances and beach parties with surf outfits like the Crossfires, who later became the Turtles. The Surfaris had only one big hit record, the 1963 instrumental "Wipe Out," which contained one of rock's first and most influential drum solos. The single hit #2 in 1963 and recharted at #16 in 1966.

It would be the group's only major hit and began life as a throwaway B side, recorded in two quick takes. But while "Wipe Out" would prove to be the Surfaris' ticket to fame, it was also a subject of contention for them. Their debut album, Wipe Out, they discovered, contained only two Surfaris tracks: "Wipe Out" and its A side, "Surfer Joe." The rest of the album was recorded by the Challengers, and so it was that group, and not the Surfaris, who received royalties, despite the fact that it was the Surfaris' hit title track that sold it. Then another L.A. group sued the Surfaris, claiming that they were the original and rightful Surfaris. Once all this dust settled, the group began recording again, but there were no further charting singles after "Point Panic" (#49, 1963).

After surf music went out of vogue, the Surfaris followed the folk-rock trend without success. By the mid-'60s, the group was basically disbanded, though Pash kept lineups working for years. The group re-formed on several occasions through the '70s, and in 1981 recorded a new album. Berryhill and Pash have become born-again Christians. Wilson died in poverty; Jim Fuller briefly joined the Seeds. Pash led a group that recorded music for the shortlived New Gidget television series in 1986.

"Wipe Out" has been revived countless times, in films (Back to the Beach, 1987), commercials (Stri-Dex, Wendy's), and on record (by Herbie Hancock, Dweezil Zappa, Scorpions drummer Herman Rarebell, among many others). In the summer of 1987 the Beach Boys and the Fat Boys had a #12 hit with their remake of the immortal surf classic.

Singer/songwriter/producer Swamp Dogg has had a varied career, during which his work has resulted in hits for other artists but rarely for himself.

Recording at first as "Little Jerry," Jerry Williams began in the '50s as a soul singer. By the middle of the next decade, he had scored a couple of minor hits, "I'm a Lover Man" and "Baby You're My Everything." In 1970 he became chief producer for Wally Roker's Canyon Records, where he was encouraged to stretch out musically, and therefore became Swamp Dogg. Under that name, he released Total Destruction to Your Mind, a psychedelically eccentric soul album influenced by Sly and the Family Stone and the Mothers of Invention. "Mama's Baby, Daddy's Maybe" was a minor hit (#33 R&B, 1970), and Swamp Dogg began incorporating touches of bayou style, à la Tony Joe White. Williams then signed with Elektra, but Rat On! was a commercial and artistic failure. In 1972 he moved to Cream Records and released Cuffed, Collared and Tagged, which included a tribute to Sly Stone called "If It Hadn't Been for Sly" and the John Prine song "Sam Stone." Soon after the album's release, Cream went out of business.

Swamp Dogg (a.k.a. Jerry Williams)

As a producer, Jerry Williams fared better. He wrote Gene Pitney's 1968 hit "She's a Heartbreaker" and produced the Commodores' first single, "I Keep On Dancing," while an Atlantic staff member, and Doris Duke's Top 10 soul hit, "I'm the Other Woman to the Other Woman," in 1970. In 1971 his song "She's All I Got" was a Top 40 pop hit for Freddy North and a #1 country song for Johnny Paycheck. Williams also had soul hits sung by Z.Z. Hill, Irma Thomas, and Charlie Whitehead.

Still Swamp Dogg struggled, although he released several records through the '70s. In the late '80s he formed the S.D.E.G. label and management company, which had a measure of success with the rappers M.C. Breed & DFC, whose self-titled album made the R&B Top 40. Dogg continued to release his own material as well, most notably The Re-Invention of Swamp Dogg, a calypso album recorded in Trinidad. The Swamp Dogg sound found new ears as well when Kid Rock, on his multiplatinum Devil Without a Cause, sampled Dogg's "I Got One for Ya."

Billy Swan

Born May 12, 1942, Cape Girardeau, MO

1971—I Can Help (Columbia) 1975—Rock 'n' Roll Moon 1976—Billy Swan 1977—Four 1978—You're OK, I'm OK (A&M) 1978—Billy Swan at His Best (Monument) 2000—Like Elvis Used to Do (Audium).

Billy Swan, a Nashville journeyman, emerged seemingly from nowhere with one of 1974's biggest hits, the strolling organ-heavy "I Can Help." A #1 on both the pop and country charts, "I Can Help" differed almost completely from Swan's usual output, which leaned toward rockabilly.

Swan had his first success when his song "Lover Please," which he had written at age 16 for his band Mrt Mirley and the Rhythm Steppers, became a nationwide hit in 1962 for Clyde McPhatter. Swan lived off that song's royalties for a time, then moved to Nashville at age 21, where his pursuit of a music career led him to replace Kris Kristofferson as janitor at Columbia's Nashville studios. Within a few years Swan was producing Tony Joe White's first three LPs (including White's hit "Polk Salad Annie"). He also lived for a time in Elvis Presley's uncle's house, in fact, after Presley covered "I Can Help," he gave Swan a pair of his socks.

In 1970 Swan played in Kristofferson's band at the Isle of Wight Festival, and in 1973 he worked with comic country singer and author Kinky Friedman, in 1975 the latter covered "Lover Please" (as did Kristofferson). After the international success of "I Can Help," Swan's debut album yielded a minor U.K. hit in a cover of Otis Blackwell's "Don't Be Cruel." Rock 'n' Roll Moon, another critically acclaimed album, contained another minor hit in "Everything's the Same." It was Swan's last pop success, but through 1975 and 1976 he embarked on successful worldwide tours, playing with Nashville session stars like Kenny Buttrey and Charlie McCoy in Paris in 1975, and with Willie Nelson in Britain in 1976. In 1986 he joined with Randy Meisner (ex-Poco and Eagles) and former Bread member James Griffin in Black Tie. The group released When the Night Falls. In 2000 Swan released an album of rearranged Elvis Presley covers.

Keith Sweat

Born July 22, 1961, New York, NY
 1987—Make It Last Forever (Vintertainment/Elektra) 1990—I'll Give All My Love to You 1991—Keep It Comin' (Elektra)
 1994—Get Up on It 1996—Keith Sweat 1998—Still in the Game 2000—Didn't See Me Coming.
 LSG: 1997—Levert-Sweat-Gill (Elektra).

With his good looks and romantic singing style propelled by hard rhythmic tracks, Keith Sweat helped revitalize R&B in the late '80s.

Sweat was born in Harlem, the third of five children, and grew up in projects a few blocks from the Apollo Theatre. He joined his first group at age 15, then became the frontman for Jamilah. After graduating from City College, he worked on Wall Street as a brokerage assistant. He continued to shop his demo around and eventually signed with manager Vincent Davis' Vintertainment label.

Sweat's first single, "I Want Her" (#1 R&B, 1987), produced by Teddy Riley, was the first major New Jack Swing hit, fusing soul and hip-hop. The album, Make It Last Forever (#15 pop, 1988; #1 R&B, 1987) was coproduced by Riley and went multiplatinum. It included the singles "Something Just Ain't Right" (#79 pop, #3 R&B, 1988) and "Make It Last Forever"

Keith Sweat

(#59 pop, #2 R&B, 1988), a duet with Jacci McGhee. Sweat continued his pop crossover success on I'll Give All My Love to You (#6 pop, #1 R&B, 1990), yielding the hits "Make You Sweat" (#14 pop, #1 R&B, 1990), "I'll Give All My Love to You" (#7 pop, #1 R&B, 1990), and "Merry Go Round" (#2 R&B, 1990), a ballad.

Sweat split from Davis and released Keep It Comin' (#19 pop, #1 R&B, 1991). The album featured cameos by L.L. Cool J on "Keep It Comin'" (#17 pop, #1 R&B, 1991) and the Gap Band's Charlie Wilson, as well as the single "Your Love—Part 2" (#71 pop, #4 R&B, 1991). In 1992 Sweat formed Keia Records, a label featuring new R&B and rap acts, that is distributed by Elektra and based in New York and Atlanta. His 1994 album, Get Up on It (#8 pop, #1 R&B), yielded such singles as the title track (#69 pop, #12 R&B, 1994), "When I Give My Love" (#93 pop, #21 R&B, 1994), and "How Do You Like It?" (#48 pop, #9 R&B, 1994).

Sweat's self-titled followup (#5 pop, #1 R&B, 1996) continued his incredible chart run, producing two more big hits, "Twisted" (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1996) and "Nobody" (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1996). In 1997 he teamed up with singers Gerald Levert and Johnny Gill to make Levert-Sweat-Gill (#4 pop, #2 R&B). Sweat returned with another solo record, Still in the Game (#6 pop, #2 R&B), in 1998, an album of love songs that included the single "Come and Get With Me" (#12 pop, #6 R&B) featuring rapper Snoop Dogg. Peaking at #2, the record was Sweat's first album in a decade not to top the R&B chart.

Matthew Sweet

Born Sidney Matthew Sweet, Oct. 6, 1964, Lincoln, NE
 1986—Inside (Columbia) 1989—Earth (A&M) 1991—Girlfriend (Zoo) 1993—Altered Beast 1995—100% Fun 1997—Blue Sky on Mars (Volcano/Zoo) 1999—In Reverse (Volcano) 2001—Time Capsule—1990–2000.

Matthew Sweet's career has been a kind of Cook's tour of postpunk rock, ranging from Athens, Georgia, to New York to L.A., with Girlfriend (#100, 1992), a pristine Revolver-meets-Neil-Young amalgam, finally bringing him to the public's attention.

Sweet, a musician in high school, attended the University of Georgia in Athens in 1983 because he was attracted by its music scene. He met Lynda Stupe (sister of R.E.M.'s Michael) there and joined her band, Oh-OK, playing on its Mitch Easter-produced EP, Furthermore What (1983). With Oh-OK drummer David Pierce, Sweet formed Buzz of Delight and wrote and produced Sound Castles (1984). This EP and a tape of unreleased songs produced by Don Dixon caught the attention of Columbia Records, who brought Sweet to New York and signed him to a solo deal. Settling up north, Sweet recorded Inside, playing most of the instruments, backed by a drum machine, and augmented with cameos by Aimee Mann, Chris Stamey (dB's), and Anton Fier. With Fier, Sweet played on the Golden Palominos' Blast of Silence (1986), cowriting one song, "Something Becomes Nothing."

Maher coproduced Sweet's next album, Earth, with the Blasters' Dave Alvin. Again it was mostly Sweet, with guest appearances by New York guitarists Richard Lloyd (Television) and Robert Quine (Richard Hell, Lou Reed) and singer Kate Pierson (B-52's). Like Inside, it generated massive critical admiration but scant sales. Recorded during the breakup of his marriage in 1990, Girlfriend (originally titled Nothing Lasts) was delayed when Sweet was dropped by A&M. Sweet was about to give up on shopping the tape when Zoo—which had passed on the album—signed him after its president heard the demo playing in a staffer's office. The album marked the first time Sweet had recorded with a "live" band. Its success (over 400,000 copies sold) allowed Sweet to take on other projects, playing on Lloyd Cole's 1990 European solo tour and coproducing Velvet Crush's debut, In the Presence of Greatness (1991).

Moving to L.A. in 1992, Sweet used producer Richard Dashut (Fleetwood Mac, Lindsey Buckingham) with Quine and Lloyd, joined by guitarist Ivan Julian, pianist Nicky Hopkins, and drummers Pete Thomas (Elvis Costello), Mick Fleetwood, and Jody Stephens (Big Star) for Altered Beast (#75, 1993). Sweet's 1995 release, 100% Fun (#65), produced by Brendan O'Brien (Pearl Jam, Stone Temple Pilots), again featured guitarists Lloyd and Quine and contained the hit single "Sick of Myself" (#58). Sweet reteamed with producer O'Brien for 1997's Blue Sky on Mars (#66), and then hired the team of Jim Scott (Tom Petty), Fred Maher, and longtime Sweet collaborator Greg Lesz to produce 1999's In Reverse (#188). Inspired by Phil Spector's production work, the verb-heavy album featured a cast of 17 backing musicians, including bassist Carol Kaye (the Beach Boys' Pet Sounds).

Rachel Sweet

Born 1963, Akron, OH

1979—Fool Around (Stiff/Columbia) 1980—Protect the Innocent (Columbia) 1981—... And Then He Kissed Me 1982—Blame It on Love 1992—Fool Around: The Best of Rachel Sweet (Rhino).

Rachel Sweet was 18 when rock fans first heard her on Stiff Records' Akron Compilation, with a big twangy voice that elicited comparisons to Linda Ronstadt and Brenda Lee. Sweet had begun performing at age five, when she won first prize at an Akron talent contest with a rendition of "I Am a Pretty Little Dutch Girl." She went on to perform in summer stock theater, in TV commercials, and in club shows with Mickey Rooney and Bill Cosby. At age 11, she cut a minor country & western hit single for Derrick Records in Nashville. A few years later, producer Liam Sternberg (a friend of Sweet's father) asked her to sing on a demo of his songs, which he sent to Stiff. Sweet was attending Firestone High School in Akron when "Who Does Lisa Like?" became a minor hit in England and New York. A cover of Carla Thomas' "B-A-B-Y," from Sweet's debut album, also generated some attention, as did her segments in the 1979 Be Stiff Tour and her own tour backed by British band Fingerprint.

With her second album, Sweet parted ways with Sternberg and Stiff, and has since been searching for a major pop hit. She reached the Top 50 with "Everlasting Love," a duet with teen idol Rex Smith; it appeared on ... And Then He Kissed Me. Sweet herself wrote and produced the album Blame It on Love, and in 1982 she worked on a 3-D horror film, Rock 'n' Roll Hotel. In 1988 she sang the title song of John Waters' Hairspray. She has since appeared on the Comedy Channel and become the voice of the animated Barbie. She continued acting throughout the '90s, notably as a guest on the hit comedy Seinfeld.

One of the leading British hard-rock/bubblegum bands in the Chinnichap stable of British writer/producers Nicky Chinn and Mike Chapman, Sweet had hits in the U.K. and later in America as well. The band was originally formed by Brian Connolly and Mick Tucker as Wainwright's Gentlemen in 1968. As Sweet, the band members recorded four unsuccessful singles that flopped before Chinnichap took over in 1971. Sweet's U.K. hits that year included "Co-Co" and "Funny Funny." In 1972 came "Poppa Joe," "Little Willy" (also Top 10 in America in 1973), and "Wig Wam Bam"; and in 1973, "Blockbuster," "Hell Raiser," and "Ballroom Blitz" (Top 10 in the U.S. two years later).

By 1973, the blatant nature of many of Sweet's lyrics and overt stage antics led some British clubs to ban the group. It subsequently tried to abandon its bubblegum image and left inactively from Chinnichap. The band went on to hit in 1976 in both the U.K. and the U.S. with the Top 10 single "Fox on the Run," but it didn't really change its sound until 1978's Level Headed (#52), which yielded the worldwide smash "Love Is Like Oxygen" (#8). A followup entitled "California Nights" was a modest U.S. hit but its last here. Things were not going so well in the U.K. either, and after the disappointment of Water's Edge, the group disbanded.

Sweet has returned in various incarnations with different lineups. A club remix of its hits entitled "It's It's the Sweet Mix" was a U.K. hit in 1985, prompting another re-formation, but it was short-lived. Scott toured in the late '80s with the group Paddy Goes to Holyhead. Scott and Tucker re-formed the group for Live at the Marquee. Connolly, whose years of hard drinking eventually led to several heart attacks and partial paralysis, continued to perform until his death in 1997.

The Sweet Inspirations

Formed ca. '50s as the Drinkard Sisters, Newark, NJ. Emily "Cissy" Houston, voc.; Sylvia Shemwell (b. Sylvia Guions), voc.; Judy Clay (b. Judy Guions), voc.; Dede Warwick, voc.; Dionne Warwick (b. Dec. 12, 1940, East Orange, NJ), voc. Ca. mid-'60s (- Dionne Warwick; - Dede Warwick; - Clay; + Estelle Brown, voc.; + Myrna Smith, voc.) 1968—Sweet Inspirations (Atlantic); What the World Needs Now Is Love 1970—(- Houston) 1994—The Best of the Sweet Inspirations (Ichiban).

The Sweet Inspirations trace their beginnings back to the Drinkard Sisters, with Cissy Houston [see entry] and her nieces Dede and Dionne Warwick [see entry] along with the Guions sisters, Judy (later Judy Clay) and Sylvia (later Sylvia Shemwell). They recorded gospel music for RCA before the group disbanded, leaving Houston and Shemwell to round out the group with two new members.

This quartet became renowned throughout the record industry for its fine backing work on hundreds of records, including some by Ronnie Hawkins, William Bell, Solomon Burke, Neil Diamond, Dusty Springfield, and Wilson Pickett. The four women were featured prominently on some of Aretha Franklin's best work. Atlantic Records' Jerry Wexler dubbed them the Sweet Inspirations, and led by Cissy, the group recorded two critically acclaimed albums in 1968 and had a hit single with "Sweet Inspiration" (#18 pop, #5 R&B).

The group continued doing backup work, most notably on Elvis Presley's 1969 hit "Suspicious Minds." The Sweet Inspirations toured with him into the mid-'70s. In 1970 Houston left to join Darlene Love and Dede Warwick as backup singers for Dionne Warwick. The remaining trio continued working, touring with Elvis and, briefly, with Rick Nelson. Former Sweet Inspiration Myrna Smith cowrote the bulk of the material on Beach Boy Carl Wilson's eponymous 1981 solo album. Shemwell, Smith, and Estelle Brown performed together in 1994. They have also reunited for various tributes to Presley.

The Swingin' Blue Jeans

Formed 1959, Liverpool, Eng.
Original lineup: Ray Ennis (b. May 26, 1942, Liverpool), gtr., voc.; Ray Ellis (b. Mar. 8, 1942, Liverpool), gtr.; Les Braid (b. Sep. 15, 1941, Liverpool), bass; Norman Kuhlke (b. June 12, 1942, Liverpool), drums; Paul Moss, banjo (b. Liverpool). N.A.—(- Moss) 1964—(+ Terry Sylvester [b. Jan. 8, 1945, Liverpool], gtr., voc.) Hippy Hippy Shake (Imperial); Shaking Time (Lectrola) 1965—Hey Hey Hey Hey 1968—(- Sylvester) 1973—(group re-forms; numerous lineup changes follow) 1993—Hippy Hippy Shake: The Definitive Collection (EMI Legends).

In 1963, just as England's Merseybeat sound was coming together, the Swingin' Blue Jeans emerged with one of the wildest rock raveups of the era, a cover of Chan Romero's "Hippy Hippy Shake." It went to #2 in the U.K. and #24 in the U.S. The next year, the group's cover of Little Richard's "Good Golly Miss Molly" hit #11, and a version of the Betty Everett hit "You're No Good" (a hit for Linda Ronstadt over a decade later) made it to #3. Though the Swingin' Blue Jeans continued to record and perform, and even re-formed in the early '70s, they would enjoy no further successes. Terry Sylvester later joined the Hollies, replacing Graham Nash. A version of the group, led by guitarist Ray Ennis and bassist Paul Braid, continued to tour in 2001.

Swing Out Sister

Formed 1985, Manchester, Eng.
Corinne Drewery (b. Sep. 21, 1959, Nottingham, Eng.), voc.; Andy Connell (b. July 26, 1961, Manchester), kybds.; Martin Jackson (b. Aug. 30, 1958), drums. 1987—It's Better to Travel (Mercury) 1988—(- Jackson) 1989—Kaleidoscope World (Fontana/Mercury) 1992—Get in Touch With Yourself (Fontana) 1994—Living Return (Mercury) 1997—Shapes and Patterns.

This British dance-pop band scored right out of the box with its first single, "Breakout" (#6, 1987), a sprightly and melodic showcase for Corinne Drewery's bright vocals. The song's video gently mocked Drewery's background as a fashion designer. Andy Connell had played with Manchester-based avant-fusion band A Certain Ratio, while Martin Jackson had drummed with such bands as Magazine. Jackson left after the #1 U.K. LP It's Better to Travel (#40, 1987), which yielded a lesser hit in "Twilight World" (#31, 1987); he contributed drum programming to Kaleidoscope World (#61, 1989), which spawned the single "Waiting Game" (#86, 1989). Get in Touch With Yourself (#113, 1992) yielded the minor hit single "Am I the Same Girl" (#45, 1992). While the group has sustained its career with popularity in Japan, its presence in America became increasingly scarce. In 1994 it released Living Return and in 1997 Shapes and Patterns, which featured a cover of Laura Nyro's "Stoned Soul Picnic."

Take 6

Formed 1987, Huntsville, AL

Alvin Chea (b. Nov. 2, 1967, San Francisco, CA), voc.; Mervyn Warren, voc.; David Thomas (b. Oct. 23, 1966, Brooklyn, NY), voc.; Cedric Dent (b. Sep. 24, 1962, Detroit, MI), voc.; Claude V. McKnight III (b. Oct. 2, 1962, Brooklyn), voc.; Mark Kibble (b. Apr. 7, 1964, Bronx, NY), voc.

1988—Take 6 (Reprise) 1990—So Much 2 Say 1991—(– Warren; + Joel Kibble (b. May 16, 1971, Buffalo, NY), voc.) He Is Christmas 1994—Join the Band 1996—Brothers 1998—So Cool 1999—We Wish You a Merry Christmas 2000—Tonight: Live.

Take 6 is an a cappella gospel group that achieved surprising critical and commercial success with their sophisticated, jazz-based arrangements. The group formed in the early '80s at Oakwood College, a Seventh-Day Adventist school. Mark Kibble joined when he heard a quartet singing in a bathroom and added his own improvisation; as the group's primary arranger, he expanded their sound from barbershop quartet to big band, with voices imitating instruments. He also brought in sixth member Mervyn Warren. Originally called Alliance, Take 6 changed their name in 1987 (the same year they signed to Reprise) when they discovered another band with that name.

Their first album contains spirituals and compositions by Kibble and Warren. Take 6, featuring "Spread Love," won three Grammys and went gold. So Much 2 Say has a larger array of original compositions penned by additional band members. The added variety includes instruments—everyone in the group also plays, and Dent and Warren have done graduate work in music theory—and hip-hop and Latin rhythms. Their second album also went gold and won a Grammy. In 1990 Take 6 performed with k.d. lang [see entry] in the film Dick Tracy singing "Ridin' the Rails."

Warren left the band in 1991; he had composed TV theme songs along the way, including the one for Murphy Brown, which Take 6 sang. He was replaced by Mark's brother Joel. He Is Christmas, which also won a Grammy, is a collection of carols. Take 6 has recorded with Dianne Reeves, Quincy Jones, Joe Sample, Johnny Mathis, and Smokey Robinson. The group's 1994 recording, Join the Band (#86 pop, #17 R&B), featured Ray Charles, Stevie Wonder, Queen Latifah, and Herbie Hancock, among others.

Brothers (#71 R&B, 1996) continued in the pop vein of Take 6's most recent work, stressing solo voices over the group's trademark vocal blend. The album, which included a version of Earth, Wind & Fire's "Sing a Song," was a commercial and artistic disappointment. Its 1998 followup, So Cool (#92 R&B), found Take 6 once again singing a cappella. It also saw the sextet expanding their sound to include elements of mbube, the rhythmic South African vocal style popularized by Ladysmith Black Mambazo. In 2000 Take 6 released their first live album; the set featured a wide range of material culled from a performance at the Blue Note in Tokyo.

Talking Heads

Formed 1975, New York, NY

David Byrne (b. May 14, 1952, Dumbarton, Scot.), voc., gtr.; Tina Weymouth (b. Nov. 22, 1950, Coronado, CA), bass, synth.; Chris Frantz (b. May 8, 1951, Ft. Campbell, KY), drums; Jerry Harrison (b. Feb. 21, 1949, Milwaukee, WI), kybds., gtr. 1977—77 (Sire) 1978—More Songs About Buildings and Food 1979—Fear of Music 1980—Remain in Light 1982—The Name of This Band Is Talking Heads 1983—Speaking in Tongues 1984—Stop Making Sense 1985—Little Creatures 1986—True Stories 1988—Naked 1992—Popular Favorites 1976–1992: Sand in the Vaseline 1996—(– Byrne, as The Heads) No Talking Just Head (Radioactive) 1999—Stop Making Sense (Special Edition). Tom Tom Club (Weymouth; Frantz; + others): 1981—The Tom Tom Club (Sire) 1983—Close to the Bone 1989—Boom Boom Chi Boom Boom 1992—Dark Sneak Love Action 2000—The Good the Bad and the Funky (Rykodisc). Jerry Harrison solo: 1981—The Red and the Black (Sire) 1988—Casual Gods 1990—Walk on Water. David Byrne solo: see entry.

Talking Heads was a band of smart, self-conscious white musicians intrigued by the rhythms and spirit of black music. They drew on funk, classical minimalism, and African rock to create some of the most adventurous, original, and danceable music to emerge from new wave—a movement Talking Heads outlasted and transcended in their accomplishment and influence.

David Byrne and Chris Frantz met at the Rhode Island School of Design, where they were part of a quintet called, variously, the Artistics and the Autistics. With Tina Weymouth, Frantz's girlfriend, they shared an apartment in New York and formed Talking Heads as a trio in 1975; they played their first shows at CBGB that June. Their music was never conventional punk rock; it was more delicate and contrapuntal, and their early sets included covers of the '60s bubblegum group the 1910 Fruitgum Company. Jerry Harrison, a Harvard alumnus who had been a Modern Lover with Jonathan Richman until 1974 and had also backed singer/songwriter Elliott Murphy, completed the band in 1977.

Talking Heads toured Europe with the Ramones before recording their first album, and once it was released they began constant touring of the U.S. and Europe. Their first album contained "Psycho Killer," which typecast them as eccentrics, an impression confirmed by Byrne's nervous, wild-eyed stage presence. The album reached the Top 100, and every subsequent album reached the U.S. Top 40.

With More Songs About Buildings and Food, Talking Heads began a four-year relationship with producer Brian Eno, an experimentalist who toyed with electronically altered sounds and shared their growing interest in Arabian and African music. More Songs included a cover of Al Green's "Take Me to the River," which was the band's first hit (#26, 1978). Fear of Music (#21, 1979) was a denser, more ominous record, but its followup, Remain in Light (#19, 1980), was an almost complete shift in tone. It used rhythm tracks improvised by Eno and the band in the studio that were layered with vocals and solos, a mixture of African communalism and Western technology (an approach signaled by "I Zimbra," the opening track on Fear of Music).

After Remain in Light, Talking Heads toured the world with an expanded band: keyboardist Bernie Worrell of Parliament/Funkadelic, guitarist Adrian Belew (who had played with Frank Zappa and David Bowie), bassist Busta Cherry Jones, percussionist Steven Soles, and singers Nona Hendryx (formerly of Labelle) and Dollette McDonald.

Band members then turned to solo projects. Byrne has explored electronics, performance art, and world music and scored music for films and the stage. Harrison made The Red and the Black, and Frantz and Weymouth recorded as the Tom Tom Club, scoring a major disco hit with "Genius of Love," which made the album go platinum. In 1982 the Heads ended their association with Eno; they released a compilation of live performances by all versions of the band and toured the U.S. and Europe as an eight-piece group.

Speaking in Tongues, the first album of new Heads songs in three years, was released in 1983. (A limited edition release of 50,000 copies featured a complex cover designed by artist Robert Rauschenberg. Subsequent copies boasted a simpler design by Byrne.) It was their highest-charting album ever (#15, 1983) and yielded their biggest hit single, "Burning Down the House" (#9, 1983), which was also featured in an eye-catching video that MTV had in heavy rotation. They toured with an expanded band including Alex Weir, a guitarist with the Brothers Johnson. The tour was documented in the acclaimed movie Stop Making Sense, directed by Jonathan Demme. The soundtrack (#41, 1984) spent nearly two years on the pop albums chart.

The Heads returned to their core lineup and simpler song forms, on Little Creatures (#20, 1985), which included the Cajun-flavored single "Road to Nowhere" and "Stay Up Late," a sardonic commentary on parenting (which Frantz and Weymouth, by then married, were doing). That album, like its predecessor, went platinum (the only two to do so). In 1986 Byrne directed the feature film True Stories (#17), a seemingly sincere look at small-town American eccentrics; the soundtrack album, on which Talking Heads performed straightforward versions of songs sung by various characters in the film, yielded a hit single in "Wild Wild Life" (#25, 1986).

Naked (#19, 1988), produced in Paris by Steve Lillywhite (U2, Simple Minds) and reggae/world-beat keyboardist/producer Wally Badarou, featured guest performances by assorted African and Caribbean musicians living in Paris. After producing the hit album Conscious Party for Ziggy Marley and the Melody Makers, Weymouth and Frantz got Byrne, Harrison, and Lou Reed to guest on Tom Tom Club's Boom Boom Chi Boom Boom, for a version of the Velvet Underground's "Femme Fatale." In 1990 Tom Tom Club and Harrison's band Casual Gods (which included Alex Weir) toured the U.S. with the Ramones and Blondie singer Deborah Harry.

The long-rumored dissolution of Talking Heads was made official, sort of, in December 1991, when Byrne told the Los Angeles Times the band was finished. A month later Harrison, Weymouth, and Frantz issued a statement of their disappointment, adding that "Talking Heads was a great band." The band's final four new tracks were released as part of the Popular Favorites box-set retrospective.

In 1996 Byrne, citing "wrongful use," filed a lawsuit against the members of his former band and Radioactive Records head and former Talking Heads manager Gary Kurfirst to halt the release of a new, Byrne-less album, No Talking Just Head, and to prevent the musicians' use of the name "Heads" for a tour. The suit was settled out of court, and plans for both album—with a variety of guest vocalists including XTC's Andy Partridge and former Lone Justice singer Maria McKee—and tour proceeded. All four original members did manage to reteam in 1999 for the release of a 15th-anniversary edition of Stop Making Sense (which coincided with the film's release on DVD and a brief theatrical run). And in 2000 the Tom Tom Club was back with a new album, The Good the Bad and the Funky, which featured covers of tunes by Lee "Scratch" Perry and Donna Summer.

Tangerine Dream

Formed 1967, Germany

This German ensemble, its lineup constantly shifting, has been responsible for introducing some of the spiciest exploratory synthesizer music ever. Though many critics have dismissed them as mere self-absorbed post-psychedelic electro-doodlers, others have praised them as sonic painters. Not only did they build up a tenacious European cult following in the '70s but the seven-time Grammy nominees were precursors of both of New Age and ambient-techno music.

They started out as a rock band featuring Edgar Froese (a classical music student, as was Christophe Franke), but as they became increasingly enamored of far-flung improvisations, they abandoned guitars and drums in favor of an almost completely electronic keyboard/synthesizer setup that produced echoing, droning atmospheres rather than conventional songs. Original member Klaus Schulze went on to a career of his own, in much the same musical vein, and mainstay Froese came even further to the fore.

In 1974 the group gained further attention by playing a concert at Rheims cathedral in France, at which some 6,000 fans tried to jam into the 2,000-capacity church to hear Tangerine Dream's always-improvised and often arrhythmic, protoplasmic electronics. The next year they went to Britain for the first time, again playing cathedrals wherever possible. The tour was sold out, and featured Michael Hoenig replacing Baumann, who was busy working on his first solo album, Romance '76. By that time, Froese had recorded his first solo outing, Aqua. Among his other works are Epsilon in Malaysian Pale, Electronic Dreams, Ages, Macula Transfer, Stunt Man, Pinnacles, and Kamikaze 1989. Baumann later founded the Private Music label.

In the mid-'70s, as they introduced vocals and lyrics (on Cyclone) and otherwise continued to gather fans familiar with Pink Floyd and Yes, Tangerine Dream achieved some degree of cult success in the U.S., though never on the scale they enjoyed in England and Europe. Baumann left in 1981 to pursue a solo career, releasing Repeat Repeat in 1982, the title cut of which was a minor hit in dance clubs. At the start of the '80s, Tangerine Dream became the first Western band to play East Berlin; they also began experimenting with sampling techniques. Key member Christopher Franke left in 1987 to pursue a solo career, composing film soundtracks and New Age music (Pacific Coast Highway, The London Concert, New Music for Films). As a duo consisting of Froese and his son Jerome, Tangerine Dream soldiered on.

Tavares

Formed ca. 1959, New Bedford, MA

Ralph Tavares (b. Dec. 10, 1948), voc.; Arthur "Pooch" Tavares (b. Nov. 12, 1946), voc.; Feliciano "Butch" Tavares (b. May 18, 1953), voc.; Perry Lee "Tiny" Tavares (b. Oct. 24, 1954), voc.; Antone "Chubby" Tavares (b. June 2, 1947), voc. 1974—Check It Out (Capitol); Hard Core Poetry 1975—In the City 1976—Sky High! 1977—Love Storm; The Best of Tavares 1978—Future Bound 1979—Madam Butterfly 1980—Supercharged; Love Uprising 1981—Loveline 1982—New Directions (RCA) 1983—(—R. Tavares) 1993—The Best of Tavares (Capitol) (—P. Tavares).

Throughout the '70s, the harmonizing Tavares brothers had several R&B and disco hit singles. Their hit version of Hall and Oates' "She's Gone" paved the way for that duo's later success.

The group's grandparents were from the Cape Verde Islands (a Portuguese province in the Atlantic Ocean), and as children the five brothers learned to sing island folk songs and doo-wop favorites from their older brother, John. In 1963 they turned pro as Chubby and the Turnpikes, playing clubs throughout New England. By the time they signed with Capitol in 1973, they had changed their group name to Tavares. Tavares' first album was produced by Johnny Bristol, the second two by the Brian Potter/Dennis Lambert team. The group had hits with two ballads, "Check It Out" (#35 pop, #5 R&B, 1973) and "She's Gone" (#50 pop, #1 R&B, 1974). Ex-Motown producer Freddie Perren took over on Sky High! and the group had the first of a string of pop-disco hits, which include "It Only Takes a Minute" (#10 pop, #1 R&B, 1975), "Heaven Must Be Missing an Angel" (#15 pop, #3 R&B, 1976), and "Whodunit" (#22 pop, #1 R&B, 1977). Major public exposure came when their "More Than a Woman" (#32 pop, #36 R&B) was included on the multimillion-selling Saturday Night Fever soundtrack album.

After that, the group had a higher profile on the concert circuit and on the R&B charts than with pop audiences. Their later hits included "Bad Times" (#10 R&B, 1979), "A Penny for Your Thoughts" (#16 R&B, 1982), "Deeper in Love" (#10 R&B, 1983), and "Words and Music" (#29 R&B, 1983). Brother Ralph resigned in 1983, Tiny Tavares followed in the mid-'90s. The remaining members are sporadically active. The original quintet briefly reunited in 1998.

James Taylor

Born Mar. 12, 1948, Boston, MA

1968—James Taylor (Apple) 1970—Sweet Baby James (Warner Bros.) 1971—James Taylor and the Original Flying Machine, 1967 (Euphoria 2); Mud Slide Slim and the Blue Horizon (Warner Bros.) 1972—One Man Dog 1974—Walking Man 1975—Gorilla 1976—In the Pocket; Greatest Hits 1977—JT (Columbia) 1979—Flag 1981—Dad Loves His Work 1985—That's Why I'm Here 1988—Never Die Young 1991—New Moon Shine 1993—Live 1994—Best Live 1997—Hourglass 2000—Greatest Hits, vol. II.

James Taylor was the archetypal "sensitive" singer/songwriter of the '70s. His songs, especially his early ones, were tales of inner torment delivered in low-key tunes featuring Taylor's understated tenor and his intricate acoustic guitar accompaniments that drew on folk and jazz. Taylor came across as relaxed, personable, and open; he was imitated by a horde of would-be confessionalists, although his best songs were as artful as they were emotional. They weren't folk songs; they were pop compositions with folk dynamics, and in them Taylor put across more bitterness and resignation than reassurance. As he continued to record, Taylor split his albums between cover singles that were hits ("Handy Man," "You've Got a Friend") and his own songs, maturing into a laid-back artist with a large and devoted following of baby boomers.

Born into a wealthy family, Taylor grew up in Boston. The family subsequently lived in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, where James' father became dean of the medical school of the University of North Carolina and on Martha's Vineyard off the coast of Cape Cod. Everyone in the family was musical; James initially played the cello. His older brother Alex introduced him to folk and country music, and James soon took up the guitar. When he was 15, summering on Martha's Vineyard, he met another budding guitarist, Danny Kortchmar. Taylor attended high school at a private academy outside Boston. Lonely away from his family, he took off a term in his junior year to return to Chapel Hill, where he played local gigs with Alex's rock band. In 1965 he committed himself to a mental institution—McLean Psychiatric Hospital in Belmont, Massachusetts—to which his sister Kate and brother Livingston would later be admitted. There he began writing songs.

After 10 months, he discharged himself and went to New York, where Kortchmar was putting together the Flying Machine. The group played Greenwich Village coffeehouses and recorded two Taylor originals, "Night Owl" and "Brighten Your Night With My Day," in early 1967 before breaking up. Their demo tape was released as an album after Taylor became popular. One reason for the group's breakup was Taylor's addiction to heroin. In early 1968 he went to England, and in London he recorded a tape of his material and sent it to Peter Asher. As an A&R man for the Beatles' Apple Records, Asher encouraged Paul McCartney to sign him. In mid-1968 Taylor recorded his debut album in London; Asher produced and McCartney and George Harrison sat in on one cut. The LP attracted little attention, and Taylor, still hooked on heroin at the end of the year, returned to America and signed himself into another mental institution. During Taylor's five-month stay, with Apple in disarray, Asher—who became Taylor's producer and manager—negotiated a contract between Taylor and Warner Bros. Before Taylor was released, his solo stage debut at L.A.'s Troubadour had been arranged. From there he went to the Newport Folk Festival, where he met Joni Mitchell; she sang on Mud Slide Slim, and he played guitar on her autobiographical Blue.

Taylor and Asher rounded up Kortchmar, bassist Lee Sklar, drummer Russ Kunkel, and pianist Carole King to back him on his second album. Sweet Baby James attracted little attention initially, but "Fire and Rain" became a #3 hit. Sweet Baby James reached the Top 10 in November 1970 and stayed on the LP chart into 1972. Taylor's Apple debut was rereleased, entering the charts in October with the single "Carolina in My Mind." Taylor appeared on a March 1971 cover of Time magazine, which hailed his ascent to stardom as a turn toward maturity and restraint in pop music, but at the same time publicized his drug abuses and other skeletons in his and his family's closet. The article also alluded to a possible dynasty of Taylor-made pop stars. Livingston Taylor had launched his singing and songwriting career before his older brother had become famous, but Alex and Kate, while unquestionably musical, found less success.

Within two months of its release, Mud Slide Slim was the nation's #2 album. Taylor's version of Carole King's "You've Got a Friend" hit #1 in 1971, the same year that King's version came out on Tapestry. That year Taylor costarred with Dennis Wilson of the Beach Boys in the film Two-Lane Blacktop.

Then, almost as suddenly as he had emerged into public attention, he retreated from it. Except for a few benefit concerts for George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign, Taylor did not perform for another three years. He married Carly Simon in November 1972. Taylor continued to make and sell albums, but he didn't score a Top 10 single between "You've Got a Friend" and 1975. ("Mockingbird," a duet, was released by Simon in 1974.) One Man Dog (#4, 1973) contained "Don't Let Me Be Lonely Tonight" (#14, 1973); Walking Man (#13, 1974) boasted no hit singles.

A month-long tour in 1974 signaled Taylor's reemergence. He returned to the charts with Gorilla (#6, 1975). Taylor's cover of "How Sweet It Is (To Be Loved by You)" hit #5 in 1975. JT, including a Top 5 cover of the Jimmy Jones-Otis Blackwell "Handy Man," was Taylor's first release on Columbia. Greatest Hits (#23, 1976), for which he rerecorded "Carolina in My Mind" and "Something in the Way She Moves," fulfilled his obligations to Warners. It would go on to sell over 11 million copies. He signed Columbia's lucrative contract before Hits was released. The double-platinum JT (#4, 1977) also marked Asher's return as producer.

Taylor's albums since JT have not quite repeated its success—Flag and Dad Loves His Work both hit #10—but they have sold consistently. In 1978 he joined Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel on a Top 20 cover of Sam Cooke's "Wonderful World," released by Garfunkel. In 1979 he wrote a couple of songs for a Broadway musical, Working Flag yielded a Top 30 hit with Taylor's typically understated cover of the Brill Building classic "Up on the Roof." Taylor continued to support a variety of causes with benefit concerts. He campaigned for Jimmy Carter in 1976 and for John Anderson in 1980; in 1979 he participated in the MUSE antinuclear rally concerts at Madison Square Garden and appeared in the concert film No Nukes.

Taylor's 1981 album, Dad Loves His Work, yielded a hit single duet with J.D. Souther, "Her Town Too" (#11), released amid rumors that his marriage to Simon was ending. In 1982 Simon sued Taylor for divorce. From 1982 through 1985 Taylor toured the globe, with a band featuring Little Feat's Bill Payne on piano. That's Why I'm Here (#34, 1985), with guests including Joni Mitchell, Don Henley, and Graham Nash, yielded only a minor hit single in a cover of Buddy Holly's "Everyday" (#61, 1985). In December 1985 Taylor wed for the second time, to Kathryn Walker. He continued touring extensively between albums that remained popular—1991's New Moon Shine (#37), for instance, sold over a million copies.

The mid-'90s were a time of personal trial for Taylor, who lost his brother Alex to alcoholism in 1994 and divorced Walker in 1996. His first studio album in six years, Hourglass (#9, 1997) was yet another platinum success and went on to win the Grammy for Best Pop Album, showing that the singer/songwriter remained impervious to the vagaries of musical trends. Taylor, who has been clean and sober since 1984, married Carolyn Smedvig in 2001. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2000.

Johnnie Taylor's gritty soul vocals made him a steady mid-'60s hitmaker and gave him one mammoth disco hit in 1976. Taylor made his recording debut with a Vee-Jay doo-wop group, the Five Echoes, in 1955. In 1957 he became lead singer of the Soul Stirrers, replacing Sam Cooke in the influential gospel quintet. After leaving the Soul Stirrers in 1963, Taylor signed with Cooke's SAR label. Although he abandoned gospel music, songs like "Rome (Wasn't Built in a Day)" reflected his deep religious roots.

Taylor hit his commercial stride after signing with Stax in 1965. Two 1966 releases, "I Had a Dream" (#19 R&B) and "I Got to Love Somebody's Baby" (#15 R&B), were minor hits. With "Who's Making Love" (#5 pop, #1 R&B) in 1968, Taylor replaced the late Otis Redding as Stax's leading male singer. "Take Care of Your Homework" (#20 pop, #2 R&B), "Testify (I Wanna)" (#4 R&B), "I Could Never Be President" (#10 R&B), "Love Bones" (#4 R&B) in 1969; "Steal Away" (#3 R&B), "I Am Somebody, Part II" (#3 R&B) in 1970; and "Jody's Got Your Girl and Gone" (#1 R&B), "Hi-Jackin' Love" (#10 R&B) in 1971 continued the streak. "I Believe in You (You Believe in Me)" (#1 R&B, 1973) and "Cheaper to Keep Her" (#15 pop, #2 R&B, 1973) were his last big hits for Stax.

By 1975 Stax was in turmoil, and its distributor, CBS, took over Taylor's contract. The next year, Taylor's "Disco Lady" (#1 pop and R&B) became the first single ever to be certified platinum. His last Top 40 pop hit was "Somebody's Gettin' It" (#33, 1976), although several of his singles appeared on the R&B chart through 1990. The singer spent most of the '80s and '90s working on a string of well-received albums for the Malaco label. In early 2001, less than a year after his heart attack-related death, Taylor was nominated for a Grammy. His album Gotta Get the Groove Back placed in the category of Best Traditional R&B Vocal Album.

A mighty-voiced urban blues singer, Koko Taylor is regarded as the contemporary Queen of the Blues. She grew up in Memphis on a sharecropper's farm. She began singing in her local church choir in her teens, but fell under the influence of the blues. At age 18 she and her husband Robert Taylor moved to Chicago, where she began performing with the Buddy Guy/Junior Wells Blues Band. In 1962 Willie Dixon discovered her and arranged for her to begin recording for Chess. He produced her million-selling hit, 1965's "Wang Dang Doodle," as well as other sides. From then through the present, she has toured the U.S., Britain, and Europe extensively.

In 1970 she appeared in the film The Blues Is Alive and Well in Chicago, and she played the Montreux Jazz and Blues Festival in 1972 with Muddy Waters. Taylor began recording for Alligator, a Chicago-based independent label specializing in blues, in 1974, and the following year formed her own band, the Blues Machine. She appeared as a singer in David Lynch's film Wild at Heart (1990). Of her seven Alligator releases through 1993, five were nominated for Grammy awards; in 1984 Blues Explosion, which featured Taylor and Her Blues Machine, Stevie Ray Vaughan and Double Trouble, and others, won the Grammy for Best Traditional Blues Recording. She has received 19 W.C. Handy awards, more than any other female blues artist. In 1996 Taylor married for the second time (she was given away by Buddy Guy). In 1999 she opened the Chicago nightclub Koko Taylor's Celebrity. The uptempo Royal Blue, her first album in seven years, features performances by B.B. King, Keb' Mo', and Kenny Wayne Shepherd, along with the Melissa Ethridge-penned single "Bring Me Some Water."

The British pop duo Tears for Fears enjoyed their commercial breakthrough in 1985 with Songs From the Big Chair, an album of lush, literate songs that fused Beatlesque melodies with techno-savvy arrangements. Having met as troubled adolescents, band members Roland Orzabal and Curt Smith wrote and sang about the importance of emotional self-awareness and self-expression. Some critics found their songs whiny or precious, but most praised their tender craftsmanship.

Orzabal and Smith became friends while growing up in Bath. Both were from broken homes, and Smith, whose parents had divorced when he was very young, had dabbled in vandalism and petty theft as an adolescent. Orzabal turned to reading instead, and eventually introduced Smith to the writings of psychotherapist Arthur Janov, whose "primal scream" theory stressed that adult neuroses tend to stem from parental abandonment in childhood, and that direct confrontation with these early feelings of loss is emotionally vital. In their late teens Orzabal and Smith formed a power-pop band called Graduate, but dissolved that outfit in the early '80s and focused on exploring Janov's theories—which had also influenced John Lennon—in a musical context.

As Tears for Fears, Orzabal and Smith—with some added help from ex-Graduate keyboardist Ian Stanley—began writing songs and arranging them for synthesizers. A demo of a song called "Pale Shelter" won them a recording contract, and in 1983 their debut album, The Hurting, was released, yielding three Top 5 singles in the U.K. But Tears' American breakthrough came with their sophomore effort Songs From the Big Chair, topped the pop albums chart here, and scored two #1 singles, "Everybody Wants to Rule the World" and "Shout," as well as the #3 hit "Head Over Heels."

The band took a career risk by waiting four years before releasing a followup to Songs. The Seeds of Love reached #8 and yielded a #2 single, "Sowing the Seeds of Love." It also provided a showcase for guest vocalist and rising R&B artist Oleta Adams, whom the duo had heard sing at the Hyatt Regency hotel lounge in Kansas City in 1985. Adams sang backup on the track "Woman in Chains," and her sultry vocals contributed to the new tracks' warmer feel. The singer joined the pair on tour, and Orzabal would go on to coproduce Adams' debut solo album, Circle of One, in 1990.

Four years again passed before another Tears for Fears studio album (a hits compilation came out in 1992), and since

Smith left the act in the interim, 1993's Elemental (#45) was essentially Roland Orzabal's solo debut. The album, which went gold, generated the single "Break It Down Again" (#25, 1993). That same year, Curt Smith released a solo album, Soul on Board, which was largely ignored. By the end of 1994, Orzabal was back in the studio, recording another Tears for Fears LP, Raoul and the Kings of Spain (#79, 1995). A rarities collection of the duo's work, Saturnine Martial & Lunatic, followed in 1996. Meanwhile, Smith formed a band called Mayfield in tribute to namesake Curtis Mayfield; the group released one self-titled album on Smith's own label, Zero-Disc, in 1998.

At this point Orzabal and Smith had not spoken in several years. In 2000 they had dinner with their former manager, still a mutual friend, and soon began cowriting songs again. As of late that year, they were considering recording their efforts and perhaps releasing them as a Tears for Fears project. Yet the two continued with their own careers, with Smith releasing a solo EP in 2000 and Orzabal releasing Tomcats Screaming Outside in 2001.

Technotronic

Formed 1989, Aalst, Belgium

Ya Kid K (b. Manuela Barbara Kamosi, Jan. 26, 1972, Kinshasa, Zaire), voc.; Jo Bogaert (b. Thomas de Quincy, May 5, 1956, U.S.), synth.; MC Eric (b. Aug. 19, 1968, Cardiff, Wales), voc. 1989—Pump Up the Jam: The Album (SBK) 1995—Recall.

An unlikely success story, Technotronic was a Belgian group that brought house music—the impersonal, club-oriented, electronic postdisco dance music pioneered in Chicago—where it never intended to go: to the top of the pop charts. The group included two young African women, one who rapped in English and one who spoke no English and did not even perform on the group's records.

Technotronic began when ex-philosophy teacher and aspiring record producer Joe Bogaert moved from the U.S. to Belgium in the late '80s, aiming to infuse house music with hip-hop. He sent his "new beat" music tapes to prospective rappers, including another transplanted American, MC Eric, and a boyish-looking Zairean girl Ya Kid K, who was with Belgian rap group Fresh Beat Productions. Ya Kid K was featured in "Pump Up the Jam," which became a hit in Europe and then the U.S. (#2, 1989) thanks in large part to its music video, in which Zairean-born fashion model Felly tried to lip-sync rapid-fire lyrics in a language she did not speak. Felly was also featured on the cover of the group's album (#10, 1989), causing further confusion.

All was cleared up when Ya Kid K and MC Eric took Technotronic on tour, opening shows for DJ Jazzy Jeff and the Fresh Prince, and then for Madonna on her 1990 Blond Ambition Tour. Bogaert later admitted that Felly had been hired purely to give Technotronic "an image." "Get Up! (Before the Night Is Over)" became another dance-to-pop crossover hit (#7, 1990); this time Ya Kid K, who had finally gotten her own management, was featured in the video. Ya Kid K worked with a different Belgian house-music group, Hi Tek 3, to record a solo single, "Spin That Wheel," for SBK's Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles movie soundtrack. Without Ya Kid K, Technotronic released Body to Body on a Belgian label in 1991.

In 1992, working with Bogaert and her producer husband Jonathan Kamosi, Ya Kid K recorded the solo album One World Nation; it included "Move This," a song from Technotronic's debut album that was released as a single after being featured in a popular Revlon cosmetics commercial starring Cindy Crawford. The 1995 album Recall failed to spark a comeback.

Teenage Fanclub

Formed 1989, Glasgow, Scot.

Norman Blake (b. Oct. 20, 1965, Bellshill, Scot.), gtr., voc.; Gerard Love (b. Aug. 31, 1967, Motherwell, Scot.), bass, voc.; Francis McDonald (b. Nov. 21, 1970, Bellshill), drums; Raymond McGinley (b. Jan. 3, 1964, Glasgow), gtr., voc. 1990—(— McDonald, + Brendan O'Hare [b. Jan. 16, 1970, Bellshill], drums) A Catholic Education (Matador) 1991—The King; Bandwagonesque (DGC) 1993—Thirteen 1994—(— O'Hare; + Paul Quinn, drums) 1995—Grand Prix 1997—Songs From Northern Britain (Creation/Columbia) 2000—Howdy! (Columbia).

An alternative to the histrionics of grunge, Teenage Fanclub's witty '60s-flavored pop songs mixed with a modern guitar sound (exemplified by their 1992 Big Star soundalike single, "The Concept") gained it a college-radio following in the U.S. and moderate success in the U.K.

Norman Blake and Raymond McGinley were leaders of Glasgow's Boy Hairdressers. They recorded one single, "Golden Shower" (1988), before breaking up, but Blake and McGinley continued working together. With fellow Hairdresser Francis McDonald and new recruit Gerard Love they began writing new songs, recording an entire album's worth of material before performing in public. Francis MacDonald left for another project and Brendan O'Hare, a teenage fan, quit school to replace him. This version of the band recorded A Catholic Education. Signed by independent labels Creation in England and Matador in the States, the album emphasized guitars at the expense of songs, but caught the ear of DGC, which bought the band's U.S. contract.

The King, a difficult, noisy album of instrumentals and covers recorded to fulfill Teenage Fanclub's contract with Matador, had a very limited release. Its first DGC album, Bandwagonesque (#22 U.K., 1991), produced by Gumball's Don Fleming, showcased the band's songwriting and received critical kudos. An opening slot on Nirvana's 1992 tour brought the group's crowd-pleasing, knockabout performances to a wider audience. The self-produced Thirteen (#14 U.K., 1993), like its predecessor, failed to chart in the U.S. The same can be said for the critically successful Grand Prix and Songs From Northern Britain, which introduced new drummer Paul Quinn and showed Teenage Fanclub to be tipping its hat to the country-influenced mellowness of the Byrds and Gram Parsons rather than to the deep-fried guitar distortion of the Jesus and Mary Chain or My Bloody Valentine. Blake, Love, and MacDonald appeared to be softening with age, though they still had a knack for writing memorable power-pop hooks.

Television appeared at the same time and place as punk rock—in the mid-'70s at CBGB. But while the band's harsh attack and obvious affection for the Velvet Underground linked it to the rest of punk, Television's trademark chiming guitars and the tendency of lead guitarist (and main songwriter) Tom Verlaine and rhythm guitarist Richard Lloyd to spur each other on to long jams evoked such psychedelic-era bands as the Grateful Dead. (Verlaine cited the Rolling Stones, classical composer Maurice Ravel, and jazz musicians Miles Davis and Albert Ayler as influences.) Television had a devout following in New York City and had a major effect on British postpunk rock, but its albums were virtually ignored by the mass market.

Tom Miller (who renamed himself Verlaine after the French Symbolist poet) had dropped out of high school in Wilmington, Delaware, and had left colleges in South Carolina and Pennsylvania before coming to New York in 1968. Richard Hell was a onetime boarding school roommate. With Billy Ficca they formed a short-lived band, the Neon Boys, in 1972. When Lloyd joined in late 1973, they became Television, and were one of the first bands to play at CBGB, along with the Patti Smith Group. (Verlaine and Smith collaborated on a book of poetry, The Night.) Hell left in 1975 to form the Heartbreakers [see entry] with ex-New York Doll Johnny Thunders; later he led the Voidoids. Dee Dee Ramone auditioned as bassist, but the gig went to Fred Smith, who had played in the original Blondie. The new lineup played frequently in New York to critical raves and made an independent single, "Little Johnny Jewel."

In late 1974 Brian Eno produced the band's demo recordings (which are still unreleased). Despite a growing cult following, Television didn't release its debut album until 1977.

Marquee Moon sold poorly, but it made many critics' 10-best lists that year. Adventure was softer, more reflective, and restrained than the debut, and sold a bit better. In 1978 Television broke up, four years later the cassette-only live album, The Blow Up, was released.

Verlaine released seven solo albums, and though he retained a faithful following, he was still more a critical than commercial success. After recording the score for the film Love and a 45 in 1994, he continued in that direction. In 1998 he was commissioned to compose original music for a collection of classic silent-film shorts by Man Ray, Fernand Léger, and others, which became the basis for performances—with guitarist Jimmy Ripp—at film festivals and performing arts centers. Lloyd has released several solo albums and in the early '90s recorded with John Doe (of X) and Matthew Sweet. In 1980 Ficca resurfaced with the Waitresses, a New York–Ohio band (led by ex-Tin Huey guitarist Chris Butler) who had a hit with "I Know What Boys Like" in 1981. Smith has played with a number of artists, including the Roches, Willie Nile, the Peregrines, and the Fleshtones, among others, as well as in Verlaine's touring and recording bands, and on Lloyd's solo work.

In 1992 Television reunited to record a self-titled album that, as usual, sold modestly but was well received by critics, who noted admiringly that the band's trademarks—brilliant guitar work, clever songwriting, and noirish lyrics—were all still in evidence. The reunited band did a world tour in 1993. As of 2001, Television continued to play the occasional gig and was reportedly making plans to record.

In addition to being the most consistently commercially successful and critically lauded male vocal group in rock history, the Temptations have been charting hits for 40 years. Yet unlike most other living institutions, the Tempts remain a vital, hitmaking group, with the double-platinum Phoenix Rising from 1998 living up to its name. In their early "classic" lineup—with alternating lead singers Eddie Kendricks, David Ruffin, and Paul Williams, with Melvin Franklin, and group founder Otis Williams—the Tempts, as they were known, were simply untouchable. Through the years, the group's trademark razor-sharp choreography, finely tuned vocal harmonies, and a number of compelling lead singers (Ruffin, Kendricks, the little known Paul Williams, and later, Dennis Edwards) made them the exemplars of the Motown style. The Temptations have been distinguished among their Motown stable mates (with the exception of the Four Tops) for their ability to move comfortably from smooth pop and standards to provocative, politically charged rock soul, from the Apollo to the Copacabana (and back). Despite personnel changes and conflicts, through countless triumphs and setbacks, the Temptations, with Franklin and Otis Williams at the helm, forged ahead. Today, with Williams the sole surviving original member, the group continues.

The Temptations currently hold 13 gold and six platinum albums. The group's chart statistics are unparalleled: between 1964 and 1975 19 Top 20 albums. Over its career, the group has had 37 Top 40 singles (among them 15 Top 10s, including 4 at #1) and 32 R&B Top 10 albums (including 17 at #1).

The original Temptations came together from two struggling vocal groups. Otis Williams (not to be confused with Otis Williams of Charms fame), Elbridge (a.k.a. Al, or El) Bryant, and Melvin Franklin had been in a series of Detroit groups, including Williams' Sibenans and Otis Williams and the Distant. Once Franklin, the young bass singer of Detroit's Voice Masters, joined the Distant (which included future Tempt Richard Street) they recorded "Come On" for the local Northern label. Around the time that Williams decided to expand the group, Eddie Kendricks and Paul Williams (no relation to Otis), with Kell Osborne, were working around Detroit as the Primes. Originally from Birmingham, Alabama, this trio was making something of a name for itself in the Motor City. They were doing so well that their manager put together a "sister group," the Primettes, a quartet of young women, three of whom (Diane Ross, Mary Wilson, and Florence Ballard) would later be rechristened the Supremes. Eventually the Primes disbanded, but not before Otis Williams had seen them and been impressed by Kendricks' talent and Paul Williams' knack for creating great choreography.

Kendricks, Paul Williams, Otis Williams, Franklin, and Bryant formed the Elgins in 1961. Later rechristened the Temptations, this lineup recorded two flop singles for the Motown subsidiary label Miracle later that year ("Oh Mother of Mine" b/w "Romance Without Finance" and "Check Yourself" b/w "Your Wonderful Love"). In 1962 they had a #2 R&B single with "Dream Come True" (which featured Berry Gordy's then-wife Raynoma Gordy on harpsichord), but four more flops followed, including "Mind Over Matter" b/w "I'll Love You 'Til I Die," which Berry Gordy forced them to release under the name the Pirates.

In late 1963, following his violent attack on Paul Williams, Bryant either quit or was fired. Among the singers considered as a replacement were brothers Jimmy and David Ruffin. David, who had created a big impression by jumping onstage with the Tempts unannounced and winning over the crowd, got the spot, and the Temptations' luck changed overnight. They began working with writer/producer Smokey Robinson, whose "The Way You Do the Things You Do" (#11 pop) launched an almost unbroken run of R&B and pop hits that extended into the early '70s. Their 1965 hits included the classic "My Girl" (#1 pop, #1 R&B), "It's Growing" (#18 pop, #3 R&B), "Since I Lost My Baby" (#17 pop, #4 R&B), "My Baby" (#13 pop, #4 R&B), and "Don't Look Back" (#13 pop, #4 R&B). The latter was one of the rare A-side leads by Paul Williams, who would remain the architect of the Temptations' style and sophisticated image.

The next year the hits continued with Robinson's "Get Ready" (#29 pop, #1 R&B), following by the hard soul of producers Norman Whitfield and Brian Holland's "Ain't Too Proud to Beg" (#13 pop, #1 R&B). The first single featured Kendricks on lead, the second Ruffin. From that point on, however, the majority of A sides would feature Ruffin, as did 1966's "Beauty's Only Skin Deep" (#3 pop, #1 R&B) and "(I Know) I'm Losing You" (#8 pop, #1 R&B). Around 1967 Whitfield had become the group's sole producer, moving them more deeply into a rougher-hewn soul style. All the while, however, the group continued to perform and record standards (including Melvin Franklin's longstanding showpiece rendition of "Old Man River"). Other hits from 1967 were "All I Need" (#8 pop, #2 R&B), "You're My Everything" (#6 pop, #3 R&B), and "(Loneliness Made Me Realize) It's You That I Need" (#14 pop, #3 R&B).

The year 1968 brought "I Wish It Would Rain" (#4 pop, #1 R&B), "I Could Never Love Another (After Loving You)" (#13 pop, #1 R&B), and "Please Return Your Love to Me" (#26 pop, #4 R&B). But the most significant event of this period was Ruffin's departure for a solo career. Always a volatile personality, Ruffin had come into the group having enjoyed some limited success as a solo artist. In part, he was dissatisfied with the fact that Motown did not promote him as an individual in the same manner that it was promoting Diana Ross as a solo act. Ironically, in terms of stature and image, the Supremes would remain the Temptations' "sister group" in more ways than one. After failing to show up for a concert, the four other members of the group (not Berry Gordy, as has often been reported) fired him.

Initially, Ruffin's departure was viewed as an insurmountable blow. Dennis Edwards (formerly of the Contours) may have lacked some of the vocal polish of his predecessor, but his more aggressive approach perfectly suited the new Sly Stone-influenced, psychedelic soul-rock hybrid. Whitfield and the group forged "Cloud Nine" (#6 pop, #2 R&B) was the first of a series of hits that broached social and political issues (although Motown has long held that "Cloud Nine" contains no allusions to drugs. Gladys Knight and the Pips refused to record it for that reason), and seemed out of character given Motown's traditional conservatism. With "Cloud Nine" and the following hit singles—"Run Away Child, Running Wild" (#6 pop, #1 R&B) and "Don't Let the Joneses Get You Down" (#20 pop, #2 R&B) in 1969, "Psychedelic Shack" (#7 pop, #2 R&B) and "Ball of Confusion (That's What the World Is Today)" (#3 pop, #2 R&B) in 1970—the Tempts became one of the few Motown acts (including Marvin Gaye and Stevie Wonder) who got progressive FM radio airplay. Sandwiched between these releases were singles in the more familiar Tempts style: "I'm Gonna Make You Love Me," a duet with the Supremes recorded before Ruffin's departure (#2 pop and R&B, 1968), the Robinson ballad "I'll Try Something New" (#25 pop, #8 R&B, 1968), and the five-lead workout "I Can't Get Next to You" (#1 pop and R&B, 1969).

The year 1971 began with the last Kendricks-led hit, "Just My Imagination (Running Away With Me)" (#1 pop and R&B), which is perhaps second only to "My Girl" as the group's most beloved song. Kendricks quit to start a fitfully successful solo career. Later that year, Williams also left the group because of poor health. An alcoholic, Paul Williams had been performing with the group but with Richard Street singing his parts from behind the curtain. He remained involved with the group after his official departure, but personal demons and debt drove him to despair. Two years later he was discovered slumped in his parked car just blocks from Motown, dead, presumably from a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

With new replacements Damon Harris (ex-Vibration) Ricky Owens was in and out of the group in just weeks and never recorded with them) and Richard Street (most recently of the Monitors), the Temptations continued moving away from ballads with "Superstar (Remember How You Got Where You Are)" (#18 pop, #8 R&B, 1971), "Papa Was a Rollin' Stone" (#1 pop, #5 R&B, 1972), "Masterpiece" (#7 pop, #1 R&B, 1973), "Hey Girl (I Like Your Style)" (#35 pop, #2 R&B, 1973), "The Plastic Man" (#40 pop, #8 R&B, 1973), "Let Your Hair Down" (#27 pop, #1 R&B, 1973), and "Shakey Ground" (#32 pop, #1 R&B, 1975). While the Tempts continued to hit the R&B Top 10 regularly, their singles rarely reached the pop Top 30. Throughout this period, however, they maintained a consistent record as one of the rare Motown groups that sold albums. Through 1976 every album of new material but their debut hit the album Top 40, and 10 were Top 10.

Like many other Motown acts, the Temptations became dissatisfied with the label. Unlike most, however, the Tempts had retained the rights to their name and, by the time they left the label, had succeeded in writing and producing their own commercially overlooked but critically well received LP, The Temptations Do the Temptations. It would be their last effort under their original Motown contract. They moved to Atlantic, shortly before which Dennis Edwards left the group for the first of three times. With new singer Louis Price, the Tempts cut two disco-ish albums: Bare Back (coproduced by the Holland brothers) and Hear to Tempt You. These were unsuccessful, and with Edwards back in Price's place, the group returned to Motown at Berry Gordy's personal request. Gordy cowrote and produced their first hit single in seven years, "Power" (#43 pop, #11 R&B, 1980). The group seemed poised to reclaim its turf, but the Thom Bell-produced The Temptations missed the mark. Further releases were halted for the long-awaited Reunion Tour, which in 1982 brought Ruffin and Kendricks back into the fold. This seven-man lineup recorded Reunion (#37 pop, #2 R&B, 1982) and embarked on a mini-tour. The album's hit single, "Standing on the Top (Part 1)" (#66 pop, #6 R&B, 1982), was written and produced by Rick James (the Temptations provided background vocals for James' "Super Freak"). The reunion was a fan's dream come true, but talks to make it a permanent venture were scuttled amid intergroup tensions and problems between Kendricks and Ruffin and Motown.

By that point, each of their solo careers had peaked. Ruffin's first single, the urgent "My Whole World Ended (the Moment You Left Me)" (#9 pop, #2 R&B, 1969), was his biggest solo hit. In 1969 he had two other Top 20 R&B singles, "I've Lost Everything I've Ever Loved" (#11) and "I'm So Glad I Fell for You" (#18). Ruffin and his older brother Jimmy (best remembered for 1966's "What Becomes of the Broken-hearted") teamed up for a 1970 album that produced a minor hit in "Stand by Me." David Ruffin soon hit hard times, however. "Walk Away From Love" (#9 pop, #1 R&B, 1975), produced by Van McCoy, was his only other Top 40 hit, though he did reach the R&B Top 10 with "Heavy Love" and "Everything's Coming Up Love" in 1976, and "Break My Heart" in 1979.

After quitting the Tempts, Kendricks moved to the West Coast and began to build a solo career with Motown, which had just relocated there. His early solo recordings (on Tamla) were R&B hits: "It's So Hard for Me to Say Goodbye" and "Can I" (1971), "Eddie's Love" and "If You Let Me" (1972), and "Girl You Need a Change of Mind" and "Darling Come Back Home" (1973). Kendricks' jump to the top of the R&B and pop charts came in 1973 with the falsetto-topped "Keep On Truckin' (Part 1)" (#1 pop and R&B), followed by "Boogie Down" (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1974). For the next three years Kendricks' songs were regularly in the R&B Top 10: "Son of Sagittarius" (#28 pop, #5 R&B, 1974), "Tell Her Love Has Felt the Need" (#8 R&B, 1974), "One Tear" (#8 R&B, 1974), "Shoeshine Boy" (#18 pop, #1 R&B, 1975), "Get the Cream Off the Top" (#7 R&B, 1975), "Happy" (#8 R&B, 1975), "He's a Friend" (#36 pop, #2 R&B, 1976). In 1977 he signed with Arista. His last single hit for Motown was "Intimate Friends" (#24 R&B, 1978). The move proved to be not as smooth as expected. Kendricks' only big hit for Arista was "Ain't No Smoke Without Fire" (#13 R&B, 1978), and in 1980 he signed with Atlantic.

Both his and Ruffin's careers seemed moribund. Then, in 1985 Daryl Hall and John Oates invited the two onstage for a recorded performance at the newly reopened Apollo Theatre. A Temptations medley reached the Top 20 on the singles chart and revived interest in Kendricks and Ruffin, who later in 1985 lent their voices to the star-studded Sun City album by Artists United Against Apartheid. A 1987 album Ruffin and Kendricks, spawned a #14 R&B hit, "I Couldn't Believe It."

Kendricks next teamed up with yet another ex-Temptation, Dennis Edwards, for a 1990 single, "Get It While It's Hot," cowritten by Jermaine Jackson. Edwards had some solo success during one of his three hiatuses from the Tempts, including "Don't Look Any Further" (#72 pop, #2 R&B, 1984). Kendricks, Edwards, and Ruffin went on tour together; combined, they'd sung lead on virtually all the Temptations' '60s and '70s hits. In the late '80s, Ruffin, Kendricks, and Edwards began touring with a successful Tribute to the Temptations package tour. (In the mid-'90s, the Tempts sought to prevent Edwards from using the Temptations name [which Otis Williams and Franklin jointly owned]. In 1999 a judge issued a permanent injunction against Edwards, forbidding him to ever use the name in advertising for his performances.)

Things seemed to be looking up, but on June 1, 1991, Ruffin, long plagued by drug addiction (he'd been convicted of cocaine possession in 1988 and entered drug rehab the following year), overdosed on cocaine after visiting a crack house. He lapsed into a coma and when doctors at a Philadelphia hospital failed to revive him, he was pronounced dead. He was 50. Michael Jackson paid for Ruffin's funeral, which was presided over by the Reverend Louis Farakhan and attended by countless celebrities, among them the surviving original Temptations (Williams, Kendricks, and Franklin), who sang "My Girl." Aretha Franklin and Stevie Wonder also performed.

The following year, Kendricks died of lung cancer at age 52. Again, the surviving Tempts attended his funeral, where Franklin eulogized his former group mate. Later Bobby Womack organized two concerts to raise funds for the singer's survivors.

For the Temptations, however, the years following the reunion were marked by constant international touring and several surprise successes. Following the 1983 Motown 25 segment in which the Tempts and their friends the Four Tops performed a battle of the bands, the two groups took the show on the road. The T'n'T Tour, as it was called, ran for over three years, including a sold-out stint on Broadway, beginning in 1983. They continued cowriting and coproducing much of their more recent material, including 1984's "Treat Her Like a Lady" (#48 pop, #2 R&B), a collaboration between Otis Williams and latter-day member Ali Ollie Woodson. Other '80s singles include "Sail Away" (#54 pop, #13 R&B, 1984), "My Love Is True (Truly for You)" (#14 R&B, 1985), "Do You Really Love Your Baby" (#14 R&B, 1985), "Lady Soul" (#47 pop, #4 R&B, 1986), "I Wonder Who She's Seeing Now" (#3 R&B, 1987), "Look What You Started" (#8 R&B, 1987), "Special" (#10 R&B, 1989), "Soul to Soul" (#12 R&B, 1990), and "The Jones'" (#41 R&B, 1991). Williams penned his autobiography, Temptations, in 1988 with Patricia Romanowski. The Temptations were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, by Daryl Hall and John Oates, in 1989.

For the Temptations, the '90s would prove a decade of profound loss and unexpected triumph. Melvin Franklin, who had been in poor health for a number of years due to arthritis, died at age 52 after suffering a heart attack following a brain seizure. At the time, the group was recording a collection of standards, For Lovers Only; his last recording was "Life Is But a Dream."

The group's commercial comeback began in the fall of 1998, when NBC aired the two-part miniseries Temptations, based on Williams' book of the same name. (The book is slated to be republished in the fall of 2002.) Released about the same time, Phoenix Rising (#44 pop, #8 R&B, 1998) and its lead single, "Stay" (#20 pop, #28 R&B, 1998) brought the Tempts to a new generation. Produced by Narada Michael Walden, the album was a major coup for the Tempts, and their first album to be certified platinum. As always, the group continued to tour the world. Its followup, 2000's Grammy-winning Ear-Resistible, produced by Gerald Levert and Joe Little III, entered and peaked on the R&B albums chart at #16 (#54 pop).

Composed of four prolific singers/players/songwriters, 10cc won critical acclaim for its witty and melodic "art pop." The band began scoring pop hits as it moved closer to the boundary between parody and romantic pop. Graham Gouldman had played with Manchester bands like the Mockingbirds, as well as a later version of Wayne Fontana's Mindbenders. He wrote such mid-'60s British rock hits as "For Your Love," "Heart Full of Soul," and "Evil Hearted You" (recorded by the Yardbirds); "Look Through Any Window" and "Bus Stop" (by the Hollies); and "No Milk Today" (by Herman's Hermits). He had left the Mindbenders in 1968 to go to New York City, where he worked unsuccessfully for bubblegum producers Kasenetz and Katz and released the late-'60s solo LP The Graham Gouldman Thing, which was coproduced by John Paul Jones, later of Led Zeppelin.

In 1970 he formed Hotlegs, which included Lol Creme, Kevin Godley, and Eric Stewart. Working out of Strawberry Studios in England, which Stewart partly owned, Hotlegs had a #2 U.K. hit with 1970's "Neanderthal Man." Stewart had also been in the Mindbenders with Gouldman, when Wayne Fontana left the group. Stewart became frontman. Godley and Creme had attended art school together (they designed 10cc's debut album cover) and played together in a few local bands, then played sessions at Strawberry Studios. Like Hotlegs, 10cc would be primarily a studio group (though Hotlegs did tour with the Moody Blues on the heels of its hit single); while fooling around in Strawberry Studios with the Godley-Creme song "Donna," they band transformed it into a sharp-edged satire of late-'50s teen-idol hits and had 10cc's first demo. The tape of "Donna" was taken to British impresario Jonathan King, he claims he rechristened Hotlegs as 10cc (the name supposedly derives from the nine cubic centimeters of semen ejaculated by the average male). Within weeks of its 1972 release, "Donna" was at #2 on the British singles chart. In 1973 came "Rubber Bullets" (#1 U.K.) and "Dean and I" (#10 U.K.), followed by "Wall Street Shuffle" (#10 U.K., 1974), "I'm Not in Love" (#1 U.K., 1975), and "Art for Art's Sake" (#5 U.K., 1975). However, despite critical acclaim, 10cc had no U.S. hit singles, though "Rubber Bullets" became a novelty sensation on FM radio.

That changed with the late-blooming American success of the lush "I'm Not in Love" (#2, 1975). After that hit, Godley and Creme left, to record together and to work on their guitar-modification device, the Gizmo (it clips on over the bridge, and using continuous-motion rotary plerctums, effects infinite sustain and string-section sounds). As a duo Stewart and Gouldman made Deceptive Bends, which featured "The Things We Do for Love" (#5, 1977). They then added several new members, including drummer/vocalist Stuart Tosh, formerly of British teenybopper hitmakers Pilot. Live and Let Live (#146, 1977) was more or less a flop, but Bloody Tourists yielded "Dreadlock Holiday" (#44 pop, #1 U.K., 1978).

Godley and Creme continued to record and produce promotional videos for other bands (they refuse to tour), they even had a Top 10 U.K. single in 1982 with "Wedding Bells." Stewart and Gouldman weren't heard from again until 1982's 10cc LP 10 Out of 10 (not released domestically), for which ex-Linda Ronstadt guitarist Andrew Gold [see entry] co-wrote and coproduced three songs. 10cc then disbanded, and Gouldman and Gold formed the duo Wax, which had one U.S. hit, "Right Between the Eyes," in 1986. In 1987 "Bridge to Your Heart" went to #12 in England. Gouldman produced the Ramones (Pleasant Dreams) and Gilbert O'Sullivan. Stewart has produced other acts and worked with Paul McCartney (Tug of War).

Since 1980 Godley and Creme have become major video auteurs, conceiving and directing a number of popular, groundbreaking clips, including Duran Duran's "Girls on Film," Visage's "Fade to Grey," the Police's "Every Breath You Take," Herbie Hancock's "Rockit," and Elton John's "Kiss the Bride." The duo had a #16 hit with 1985's groundbreaking video "Cry."

Natalie Merchant solo: see entry.

Without ever scoring a major hit single, 10,000 Maniacs steadily built a considerable audience, through college and alternative radio. The band's sprightly, thoughtful folk rock was dominated by Robert Buck's brightly jangling guitar. Dennis Drew's creamy Hammond organ, and Natalie Merchant's plaintive vocals and bookish, sometimes topical, lyrics. Merchant's decision to quit 10,000 Maniacs following its 1993 tour left the band's future in doubt.

Gustafson, Drew, and Buck first came together through the college scene that spread from Jamestown Community College to the State University of New York (SUNY) at Fredonia. The trio played under such names as Still Life and Burn Victims, then became 10,000 Maniacs (a misreading of the '60s cult gore film title 2,000 Maniacs). They were soon joined at small-club and party gigs by Merchant, who attended Jamestown CC. Human Conflict Number Five and Secrets of the I Ching were recorded through a sound-engineering program at SUNY Fredonia. Both records received favorable reviews in the alternative press and some college-radio airplay.

By 1985, 10,000 Maniacs had landed a deal with Elektra. Their major-label debut, The Wishing Chair, got glowing reviews from the mainstream music press yet still sold poorly. Lombardo left after an extensive tour, he later formed a duo, John and Mary, with Mary Ramsey, who was destined to replace Merchant in 1994. Elektra assigned veteran L.A. folk-rock producer Peter Asher to oversee the next LP. The combination worked, artistically and commercially, as In My Tribe (#37, 1987) yielded the band's first chart singles, "Like the Weather" (#68, 1988) and "What's the Matter Here" (#80, 1988), about child abuse. The group's profile rose higher when it opened on tour for R.E.M.

Asher returned to produce 1989's Blind Man's Zoo (#13, 1989), a collection that spanned topics ranging from pregnancy to the colonization of Africa. Merchant wrote "Trouble Me" (#44, 1989) for her father while he was hospitalized. Hope Chest (#102, 1990) reissued the band's first two releases. On Our Time in Eden, 10,000 Maniacs switched producers from Asher to Paul Fox (Robyn Hitchcock, XTC, the Sugarcubes), expanding its sound dramatically. James Brown hornmen Fred Wesley and Maceo Parker appear on "Few and Far Between." "These Are the Days" (#66, 1992) was a minor hit single. Just after the album was completed, drummer Augustyniak was sidelined with a broken collarbone, ex-E Street Band drummer Max Weinberg sat in. Augustyniak was back on board for the group's performance at MTV's inaugural ball for President Bill Clinton in January 1993. In early August of that year, Merchant announced that she would depart the band for a solo career [see entry]. MTV Unplugged was Merchant's recorded swan song with the band, which quickly enlisted sometime backup vocalist Ramsey and reenlisted Lombardo for a new lineup. The 1997 release Love Among the Ruins, produced by John Keane (R.E.M., Cowboy Junkies) and Fred Maher, sold 200,000 copies and won the group a Top 40 hit with a remake of Roxy Music's "More Than This" (#25). Two years later, the Maniacs released a roots-oriented lo-fi effort, The Earth Pressed Flat, on the independent Bar/None label. In late 2000, however, the band lost another member when founding guitarist Buck died of complications from liver failure.

Ten Years After was a dependably hard-rocking blues-based band for many years, best remembered for the sped-up blues solos of guitarist Alvin Lee, whose supersonic version of "Goin' Home" was a smash hit at the 1969 Woodstock Festival and in the Woodstock film. Alvin Lee and Leo Lyons grew up together in Nottingham. Lee was playing guitar by age 13, and Lyons began performing publicly at age 15. By the early '60s, both were involved in blues groups. Lee performed in a John Lee Hooker show at London's Marquee; Lyons appeared at a Windsor Jazz Festival; both were also studio musicians. They got together in 1964 as Britain's Largest Sounding Trio (with Lyons on drums), which toured England and the Continent and was quite successful in Hamburg. In 1967 Ric Lee (no relation to Alvin) and Chick Churchill joined, completing what was now called Ten Years After.

Alvin Lee's speed made the band a popular concert attraction. Despite a lack of hits, the first few LPs sold well. By 1968 the members of Ten Years After were regulars at New York's The Scene—where they jammed with Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin, and Larry Coryell—and at San Francisco's Fillmore West. In Woodstock's wake, the group had several Top 30 LPs: Ssssh (#20, 1969), Cricklewood Green (#14, 1970), and Watt (#21, 1970). A Space in Time (#17, 1971) eventually went platinum. By that time the band had chalked up its first hit single, "I'd Love to Change the World," a dreamy song that made the U.S. and U.K. charts in 1971. The group followed with "Baby Won't You Let Me Rock 'n' Roll You" in 1972 and "Choo Choo Mama" in 1973, both minor hit singles.

After Rock 'n' Roll Music to the World (#43, 1972), the band took a break from touring. Lee built a studio in his 15th-century Berkshire home and recorded On the Road to Freedom with Mylon LeFevre, which also featured guest appearances by Steve Winwood, Jim Capaldi, George Harrison (credited as Harry Georgeson), and Ron Wood. Churchill recorded a solo album, You and Me.

In early 1974, with the band's status in doubt, Lee organized a nine-piece band, including reedman Mel Collins and drummer Ian Wallace (both formerly with King Crimson), who played a show at London's Rainbow Theatre before Ten Years After's scheduled appearance. Lee's band was recorded on Alvin Lee and Company. Ten Years After did end up playing the Rainbow, and it turned out to be the group's last British concert in the '70s. Positive Vibrations (#81, 1974) put an end to the band's recordings until 1989's About Time (#120).

Later in 1974, Lee announced plans for a worldwide tour with a cast featuring Collins, Wallace, and keyboardist Ronnie Leahy and bassist Steve Thompson of Stone the Crows. Though Ten Years After seemed officially defunct, its management denied the split. In May 1975 Alvin Lee declared the group to be through and it was announced that Ric Lee had formed his own band. Ten Years After then went out on one more American tour. The demise has never been made official. The original lineup has toured in the '90s.

Lee continued to record with a series of groups, including Ten Years Later (in the late '70s) and the Alvin Lee Band. A later quartet included Mick Taylor, Fuzzy Samuels, and Tom Compton, but their RX-5 (which was not released in the U.S.) vanished without a trace.

Chick Churchill became a professional manager for Chrysalis Publishing. Leo Lyons produced several mid-'70s albums by British heavy-metal band UFO. Ric Lee formed his own production company.

Tammi Terrell

Born Thomasina Montgomery, Jan. 24, 1946, Philadelphia, PA; died Mar. 16, 1970, Philadelphia

1967—United (with Marvin Gaye) (Tamla) 1968—You're All I Need (with Marvin Gaye) 1969—Irresistible Tammi Terrell; Easy (with Marvin Gaye) 1970—Greatest Hits (with Marvin Gaye).

Although Tammi Terrell began recording in 1961, her solo recordings were eclipsed by her immortal duets with Marvin Gaye. Terrell became involved in show business at an early age (her mother was an actress), but nearly gave it up to pursue her education. She was 15 when Luther Dixon discovered her at a talent show, which led to her recording her first single, "If You See Bill," for Scepter/Wand, in 1961. The following year Montgomery, as she was then known, recorded "The Voice of Experience" in 1962. After studying psychology at the University of Pennsylvania, she recorded "I Cned" for James Brown's label. Shortly thereafter, she joined his revue and began what was by all accounts a stormy romantic relationship. She left Brown around 1964, married and divorced (contrary to many sources, her husband was not boxer Ernie Terrell), recorded briefly for Checker, then signed to Motown.

Toward the end of 1965 Terrell's "I Can't Believe You Love Me" made the R&B Top 30. After its followup, "Come On and See Me," failed to make an impression on the pop chart, she was paired with Marvin Gaye for a series of Ashford and Simpson duets: In 1967 "Ain't No Mountain High Enough" (#19 pop, #3 R&B) and "Your Precious Love" (#5 pop, #2 R&B); in 1968 "Ain't Nothing Like the Real Thing" (#8 pop, #1 R&B), "You're All I Need to Get By" (#7 pop, #1 R&B), and "Keep On Lovin' Me Honey" (#24 pop, #11 R&B); in 1969 "Good Lovin' Ain't Easy to Come By" (#30 pop, #11 R&B) and "What You Gave Me" (#6 R&B). "If I Could Build My Whole World Around

You" b/w the Gaye-penned "If This World Were Mine" (#10 pop, #27 R&B) were also released in 1967.

Terrell and Gaye, widely assumed to be lovers, were not. Gaye was married to Anna Gordy, and Terrell was romantically involved with Temptation David Ruffin in what was another tempestuous, at times violent, affair. Gaye, however, felt especially protective toward Terrell. He was deeply affected after she collapsed in his arms onstage during a show in Virginia in 1967. She had long complained of severe migraine headaches, and following her collapse a brain tumor was diagnosed. Terrell retired from the road. Despite eight operations over the next year and a half (resulting in memory problems and partial paralysis), she continued to record with Gaye. Late in his life, Gaye (who was devastated by Terrell's death) revealed that it was not Terrell but Valerie Simpson singing on most of Easy, including "Good Lovin' Ain't Easy to Come By" and "What You Gave Me." Previous to that, most believed Simpson stood in for Terrell only on the posthumously released "The Onion Song."

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee

Formed 1940

"Sonny" Terry (b. Saunders Terrell, Oct. 24, 1911, Greensboro, GA; d. Mar. 11, 1986, Mineola, NY), voc., harmonica; Walter Brown "Brownie" McGhee (b. Nov. 30, 1915, Knoxville, TN; d. Feb. 16, 1996, Oakland, CA), gtr., voc.

Sonny Terry solo: 1960—Sonny's Story (Bluesville) 1963—Sonny Is King 1984—Whoopin' (Alligator) 1987—Sonny Terry (Collectables) 1991—The Folkways Years, 1944–1963 (Smithsonian/Folkways).

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee were Southern blues musicians with church roots. They paired up in the early '40s and became a popular and influential folk-blues team, despite the fact that both suffered crippling childhood diseases.

Terry was blind, the result of separate childhood accidents in 1922 and 1927. He spent his early years playing harmonica around North Carolina, slowly achieving a wider reputation in the late '30s, thanks to performances with Lead Belly and Blind Boy Fuller.

McGhee contracted polio at the age of four, though he made a substantial recovery that left him only with a limp. His entire family was musical, and he was performing with them by the age of eight. He quit school at 13 to become a full-time musician, and had just begun his recording career when he was introduced to Sonny Terry.

They were a steady duo after that, although they worked apart extensively as well, McGhee under pseudonyms like Spider Sam, Big Tom Collins, Henry Johnson, and Blind Boy Williams. After being discovered by folk revivalists in the '50s, notably Pete Seeger, they went on to perform in clubs, in colleges, and at jazz and blues festivals around the world. They've made dozens of records.

They continued to appear as a duo in the ensuing decades despite the fact they did not get along particularly well. In the early '80s McGhee began touring with his own band. Terry also maintained a solo career until his death in 1986. McGhee died 10 years later; he was 80.

Joe Tex

Born Joseph Arrington Jr., Aug. 8, 1933, Rogers, TX; died Joseph Arrington Hazziez, Aug. 12, 1982, Navasota, TX 1965—The Best of Joe Tex (Parrot); Hold On to What You've Got (Atlantic); The New Boss 1966—The Love You Save 1967—The Best of Joe Tex 1968—Live and Lively; Soul Country 1969—Buying a Book 1972—I Gotcha (Dial) 1977—Bumps and Bruises (Epic) 1978—Rub Down 1985—The Best of Joe Tex (Atlantic) 1988—I Believe I'm Gonna Make It: The Best of Joe Tex, 1964–1972 (Rhino) 1991—Greatest Hits (Curb/CEMA) 1992—Show Me: The Hits . . . & More (Ichiban) 1996—The Very Best of Joe Tex (Rhino).

Soul singer Joe Tex recorded in a variety of styles but is best known for his dance hits. Tex first recorded for King from 1955 to 1957, and from 1958 to 1960 for Ace. He was a journeyman performer through most of the early '60s, recording occasionally, but with no success. His first break came in 1961 when James Brown recorded his "Baby You're Right." In 1964 Tex signed to Buddy Killen's Dial Records, a Nashville soul label.

Recordings at what would later become the famous Muscle Shoals studio, Tex broke through in 1965 with "Hold What You've Got" (#5 pop, #2 R&B). Through soul's mid-to-late-'60s heyday, Tex had several big hits, including "I Want to (Do Everything for You)" (#1 R&B), "A Sweet Woman Like You" (#1 R&B), and "The Love You Save" (#10 pop, #2 R&B) in 1965; and the comedic "Skinny Legs and All" (#10 pop, #2 R&B) in 1967.

In 1972 Tex had a big hit with the lecherous "I Gotcha" (#2 pop, #1 R&B). A year later he left Atlantic and through the '70s recorded for numerous companies, although always under the guidance of Buddy Killen. In 1977 Tex had his last major hit, another comedy record, "Ain't Gonna Bump No More (With No Big Fat Woman)" (#12 pop, #7 R&B).

During his later years he had become a Muslim minister and in 1972 adopted the surname Hazziez; he spent most of his time on his farm and was known as a devoted Houston Oilers fan (among his last recordings was a tribute to running back Earl Campbell entitled "Do the Earl Campbell"). In 1981 Tex joined the Soul Clan reunion, which included Wilson Pickett, Don Covay, Solomon Burke, and Ben E. King. Not long after, Tex died of a heart attack on his farm at age 49.

Among the pallbearers at his funeral were Buddy Killen, Wilson Pickett, Ben E. King, Don Covay, and Percy Mayfield.

Texas Tornados

Formed 1989, San Francisco, CA

Freddy Fender (b. Baldemar Huerta, June 4, 1937, San Benito, TX), gtr., voc.; Augie Meyers (b. May 31, 1940, San Antonio, TX), kybds., voc., accordion, bajo sexto; Doug Sahn (b. Nov. 6, 1941, San Antonio; d. Nov. 18, 1999, Taos, NM), gtr., voc.; Flaco Jiménez (b. Mar. 11, 1939, San Antonio), accordion, voc.

1990—Texas Tornados (Reprise) 1991—Zone of Our Own
1992—Hangin' On by a Thread 1996—4 Aces 1999—Live From the Limo, vol. 1.

The Texas Tornados boasted four legendary Tex-Mex performers: Doug Sahn [see entry] and Augie Meyers were in the Sir Douglas Quintet in the '60s, Freddy Fender [see entry] was originally billed "El Bebop Kid" and "the Mexican Elvis," and Flaco Jiménez has been a star of conjunto music for several decades. Sahn first met Fender in 1959, when both were gigging around San Antonio, and Jiménez played accordion on Sahn's 1973 release, Doug Sahn and Band; Sahn's nickname was the Texas Tornado, the title of another 1973 Sahn recording. In 1989 Sahn was booked to play Slim's nightclub in San Francisco and invited Meyers, Jiménez, and Fender to join him. Record companies were immediately interested in their infectious, danceable mix of conjunto, country, polka, and R&B.

Texas Tornados was released in both English and Spanish versions. Although it yielded no single, it sold well and won a Grammy. Zone of Our Own mixed English and Spanish (two band members are Hispanic, two white) and was again successful in rock, Latin, and country circles. The title track of Hangin' On by a Thread was written for and about the Grateful Dead, a band to whom the Tornados were often compared because of its rootsy sound and intrepid career; the song featured Sahn's son Shawn on guitar. Band members collaborated little on the album's tracks, however, and pursued other musical endeavors until regrouping in 1996 for 4 Aces, which included the catchy single, "Little Bit Is Better Than Nada." Live From the Limo featured country artist Leroy Parnell on slide guitar; following Sahn's sudden death in November 1999, Parnell filled in on some subsequent Tornados dates in Europe. The group later announced it would not continue to perform as the Texas Tornados.

Them

Formed 1963, Belfast, N. Ire.

Original lineup: Billy Harrison, gtr.; Alan Henderson, bass; Ronnie Millings, drums; Eric Wrixen, kybds.; Van Morrison (b. Aug. 21, 1945, Belfast), voc., sax, harmonica.

N.A.—(– Wrixen; – Millings; + Jackie McAuley, kybds.; + Patrick McAuley, drums) 1965—Angry Young Them (Decca, U.K.); Them

(Parrot) 1966—Them Again 1972—Them 1977—Story of Them (London).

In the early days of singer Van Morrison's [see entry] recording and performing career, he was backed by Them, a young Belfast garage band. Morrison and Them had major U.K. hits in 1965 with "Baby Please Don't Go" (#10) and "Here Comes the Night" (#2). Their U.S. hits were "Here Comes the Night" (#24) and "Mystic Eyes" (#33) in 1965; and "Gloria" (#71) in 1966. The latter was beaten on the U.S. chart by the Shadows of Knight's version. Morrison toured Europe and the American West Coast with Them in 1966 (the Doors opened the West Coast shows). When Morrison returned home after the tour, he took a lot of time off before planning his next career move; after a short time, Them disbanded.

During its brief career, its personnel changed often, at various times including guitarist Jimmy Page and keyboardist Peter Bardens (who went on to form Camel). Following Morrison's departure for a solo career and the group's first demise, various members attempted to resurrect the group with negligible success.

These Immortal Souls: See Nick Cave and the Bad Seeds

The The

Formed 1979, London, Eng.

Matt Johnson (b. Aug. 15, 1961, London), voc., kybds.

1983—Soul Mining (Epic) 1986—Infected 1989—Mind Bomb 1993—Dusk 1995—Hanky Panky 2000—NakedSelf (Nothing Records).

The The is the name given to bands led by Matt Johnson, a bald, mercurial, brooding singer/songwriter. While the The's sound has moved from the poppy new-wave dance tracks of Soul Mining to the intense bluesy ruminations of Dusk, the level of musicianship has remained consistent (over 300 musicians have appeared on the The albums, including Neneh Cherry, Sinéad O'Connor, and the Smiths' Johnny Marr), a testament to Johnson's uncompromising perfectionism.

Johnson was exposed to music while living above his father's pub in London's East End, which was favored by show-business types, and in nightclubs and dancehalls run by an uncle. At age 15 he was hired as tea boy for a small music publisher; by 18 he was assistant engineer at their 8-track studio. A 1979 ad he placed in the New Musical Express was answered by synthesist Keith Laws. They played their first gig that May, opening for Scritti Politti, and in 1980 released a single, "Controversial Subject" b/w "Black & White," for 4AD Records.

To satisfy a contractual obligation, Johnson released an album under his own name in 1981, Burning Blue Soul. A series of managerial wrangles led to his signing with Epic later that year. An album, The Pornography of Despair, was started, delayed, and subsequently abandoned. It took until 1983 for Soul Mining to become the The's official debut.

Illness prevented Johnson from recording another album until 1985. Infected (#89, 1987), accompanied by an album-length video, expanded the group's cult status. Mind Bomb (#138, 1989), a politically charged song cycle, was supported by the The's first tour. Dusk (#143, 1993) found Johnson working in a stripped-down acoustic context, reaching new audiences while touring with Depeche Mode. Johnson explored C&W roots music with Hanky Panky, an entire album consisting of his versions of Hank Williams songs. Shortly afterward, he moved to New York, working on his subsequent projects there.

In 1997 Johnson recorded an album titled Gun Sluts with guitarist Eric Schermerhorn (Iggy Pop), but Epic/Sony found it too experimental and refused to release it—thus making for yet another addition in the Johnson unreleased canon. (The songwriter has announced that he might eventually put the record out on his own label, Lazarus.) History repeated itself with Gun Sluts' followup, NakedSelf, except this time Johnson left Sony and took the album to Trent Reznor's Nothing Records, which released it in February 2000. But the honeymoon was to be short-lived as Johnson soon became incensed by what he felt were insufficient distribution and promotion efforts on the part of Nothing's parent company, Interscope/Universal. In retaliation, he opted to release free MP3s of NakedSelf's songs on his own Web site.

They Might Be Giants

Formed 1984, Brooklyn, NY

John Flansburgh (b. May 6, 1960, Boston, MA), voc., gtr., drum programming; John Linnell (b. June 12, 1959, New York, NY), voc., kybds., accordion.

1986—They Might Be Giants (Bar/None) 1987—Don't Let's Start EP 1988—Lincoln (Restless/Bar/None) 1990—Flood (Elektra) 1991—Miscellaneous I (Restless) 1992—Apollo 18 (Elektra) 1993—(+ Tony Maimone [b. Sep. 27, 1952, Cleveland, OH], bass; + Brian Doherty [b. The two Johns who make up They Might Be Giants play songs as infectious and goofy as commercial jingles, yet made endearing by the duo's wacky wordplay and sheer irrepressibility. There is a revenge of the nerds: College radio play and videos that look more geared for the Nickelodeon network than for MTV made them successful alternative artists and garnered them a major-label deal.

The Giants met as tykes in Lincoln, Massachusetts, where they were both from professional, middle-class households. They began writing songs together in high school, although it took them several years to form a band, during which time they both lacklusterly pursued higher education, and Linnell played in the Rhode Island new-wave band the Mundanes. In 1981 they moved to Brooklyn together and began recording songs with a drum machine. Naming themselves after a George C. Scott film, they played downtown Manhattan dives and devised an ingenious way to get around dependence on record companies and radio play: Their Dial-a-Song service featured 300 tunes on an answering machine; the line, which only costs a regular toll call, eventually received more than 100 calls a day and as of 2001 remained in operation.

Their 1986 debut became an alternative hit when MTV latched onto the video for "Don't Let's Start." The album showcased the duo's strange wit and coffee-fueled phantasmagoria of musical styles: Song titles include "Youth Culture Killed My Dog" and "I Hope That I Get Old Before I Die." The video for "Ana Ng," from Lincoln (#89, 1988), brought them even more popularity. Their major-label debut, Flood, continued their MTV-driven success with the singles "Birdhouse in Your Soul" and "Istanbul (Not Constantinople)," but the critics who had adored the band were less pleased with the album's polish. TMBG became particularly popular in England, where the readers of Q magazine voted them the best new act of 1990 (although they had been together six years at that point).

The Giants next produced Apollo 18 (#99, 1992) themselves, once again proving their adeptness at clever gimmicks: The track "Fingertips" was programmed to include 21 refrains that pop up repeatedly when the CD is played on "random" or "shuffle" mode. Touring for the album, the duo played with a band (featuring Pere Ubu bassist Tony Mai-mone) for the first time. Soon after, Maimone joined as a permanent member, as did drummer Brian Doherty. The band's next album, John Henry (#61, 1994), yielded the single "Snail Shell," which received much college-radio airplay.

Factory Showroom (#89 pop, 1996) landed the Giants a slot as the opening act for Hootie and the Blowfish, but the group was unhappy with how Elektra promoted the album and parted company with the label the following year. They put out a pair of compilation albums on the Restless label, including Severe Tire Damage (#186 pop, 1998), a collection of concert, radio, and soundcheck recordings. After that, they began releasing and marketing their music on the Internet, where Long Tall Weekend (1999) became digital download Web site Emusic's best-selling title to date. Over the years the Giants also have been involved with a number of side projects, notably scoring music for TV and movies, including the opening theme for Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me and the theme and incidental music for the TV sitcom Malcolm in the Middle.

Out in the Fields: The Very Best of Gary Moore.

Fronted by Phil Lynott, a black Irishman, Thin Lizzy was a hard-nosed rock & roll band whose music was mostly distinguished by the strongly masculine-to-macho themes of Lynott's songs, which often celebrated male camaraderie and comic-book heroism. Thin Lizzy's finest hour was unquestionably 1976's Jailbreak, whose power chords and

R&B undertones established it as a major act in Britain and contained its greatest American success, "The Boys Are Back in Town" (#12).

After being formed in Ireland by Lynott with his boyhood friend, drummer Brian Downey, Thin Lizzy relocated to England in 1971, subsequently scoring a hit single, "Whisky in a Jar" (#6 U.K., 1973). Eric Bell quit the band after the third LP, suffering exhaustion. Indifferent record sales followed until Thin Lizzy released Jailbreak. Since that LP, the group continued to record a series of uneven albums (excepting 1978's Live and Dangerous) and failed to become a superstar attraction as was once predicted. Lynott, who earned the respect of the new-wave elite in 1978 by forming a spare-time group, the Greedy Bastards, with Rat Scabies of the Damned, released a solo album in 1980, Solo in Soho, which sold disappointingly. With Thin Lizzy, Lynott continued his thematic style of songwriting on albums like Chinatown and Renegade, which also spotlighted the twin lead guitar work of Scott Gorham and new member Snowy White, Pink Floyd's ex-stage guitarist.

Through its career, Thin Lizzy released a series of hit singles in the U.K., among them "Don't Believe a Word" (#12 U.K., 1977), "Dancin' in the Moonlight (It's Caught Me in the Spotlight)" (#14 U.K., 1977), "Waiting for an Alibi" (#9 U.K., 1979), "Do Anything You Want to Do" (#14 U.K., 1979), and "Killer on the Loose" (#10 U.K., 1980). Thin Lizzy officially disbanded in 1983.

Lynott published two books of poetry, Songs for While I'm Away (1974) and Philip; he also continued to make solo LPs and recorded with a new group called Grand Slam. Among his charting singles, the most successful were "Yellow Pearl" (#14 U.K., 1981) and, with Gary Moore, "Out in the Fields" (#5 U.K., 1985). Following a drug overdose, Lynott succumbed to pneumonia and heart failure in early 1986. In May 1986 Thin Lizzy appeared at Self Aid, a Dublin concert, where Bob Geldof stood in for Lynott.

Lynott sang on Moore's U.K. single, 1979's "Pansienne Walkways" (#8 U.K.). Moore also released a number of albums, as a solo artist and with his group G-Force. A leading blues artist in the U.K., Moore has also recorded with Colosseum II, the Greg Lake Band, and BBM (with Jack Bruce and Ginger Baker). His commercial breakthrough was 1990's Still Got the Blues, the title track of which hit #97 that year.

One of the many Southern-rock groups to take its cue from the Allman Brothers Band, .38 Special specializes in blues-based rock & roll that showcases twin lead guitarists and two drummers. Featuring lead vocalist Donnie Van Zant, brother of Lynyrd Skynyrd's Ronnie Van Zant and Johnny Van Zant, .38 Special altered its sound somewhat in the early '80s to accommodate a more melodic approach. This resulted in "Hold On Loosely" (#27, 1981) and the band's first Top 10 single, "Caught Up in You," taken from Special Forces (#10, 1982).

The group cut two albums filled with competent Southern rock and toured extensively before racking up a hit album with Rockin' Into the Night (#57, 1980), followed by the platinum Wild-Eyed Southern Boys (#18, 1981), Special Forces, and Tour de Force (#22, 1983). Subsequent albums fared respectably; Strength in Numbers (#17, 1986) and Flashback (#35, 1987) are both gold. In addition, the group had a string of hit singles, including "If I'd Been the One" (#19, 1983), "Back Where You Belong" (#20, 1984), "Teacher Teacher" (#25, 1984), "Like No Other Night" (#14, 1986), and "Second Chance" (#6, 1989). With several original members intact, .38 Special continued to exist into 2000. Donnie Van Zant has also recorded with his brother, Johnny.

Carla Thomas

Born 1942, Memphis, TN

1961—Gee Whiz (Atlantic) 1966—Comfort Me (Stax); Carla 1967—King and Queen (with Otis Redding); Queen Alone 1969—The Best of Carla Thomas (Atlantic) 1971—Love Means (Stax) 1986—Chronicle (with Rufus Thomas) 1992—Hidden Gems 1994—Sugar.

Before Aretha Franklin, Carla Thomas was black music's reigning Queen of Soul. Her "Gee Whiz (Look at His Eyes)" in 1961 was, in fact, the first Memphis soul record to make a national impact (#10 pop, #5 R&B); its success resulted in the foundation of Stax Records. The daughter of Memphis music veteran Rufus Thomas, Carla Thomas made her recording debut in 1960, when she duetted with her father on "Cause I Love You" while on summer vacation from college. After "Gee Whiz" succeeded, her education took a backseat to an active performing career.

Throughout the '60s, Thomas was a star member of the Stax roster, scoring with "I'll Bring It Home to You" (#41 pop, #9 R&B) in 1962, "Let Me Be Good to You" (#62 pop, #11 R&B) and "B-A-B-Y" (#14 pop, #3 R&B) in 1966; with Otis Redding on "Tramp" (#26 pop, #2 R&B) and "Knock on Wood" (#30 pop, #8 R&B) and "I'll Always Have Faith in You" (#85 pop, #11 R&B) in 1967; and "I Like What You're Doing to Me," (#9 R&B) in 1969.

After Stax's demise in the mid-'70s, Thomas stopped recording, but still performed on the club circuit. In the late '80s she was an artist-in-residence for the Tennessee Arts Commission, where she worked with young people. She has essentially retired from recording. In 1993 she was given a Pioneer Award from the Rhythm & Blues Foundation.

Rufus Thomas

Born Mar. 26, 1917, Casey, MS

1963—Walking the Dog (Stax); May I Have Your Ticket, Please? 1970—Funky Chicken; Rufus Thomas Live/Doing the Push & Pull at P.J.'s 1972—Did You Hear Me? 1973—Crown Prince of Dance 1977—If There Were No Music (AVI); Rufus Thomas EP (Hollywood, U.K.) 1986—Chronicle (with Carla Thomas) (Stax) 1988—That Woman Is Poison (Alligator) 1992—Can't Get Away From This Dog (Stax) 1996—Blues Thang! (Sequel) 1997—The Best of Rufus Thomas: Do the Funky Somethin' (Rhino) 1999—Swing Out With Rufus (High Stacks).

Singer Rufus Thomas has been a fixture on the Memphis music scene since the '40s. He enjoyed his greatest record sales with his mid-'60s and early-'70s dance hits.

While Thomas was attending Memphis' Booker T. Washington High School in the '30s, Professor Nat D. Williams, a history teacher and emcee of a talent show at the Palace Theater, selected him to become his sidekick in a comedy act. Upon graduation from high school, Thomas toured the South with the Rabbit Foot Minstrels, telling jokes, tap dancing, and singing. He performed at tent shows until 1940, when he married. Later that year, he would replace Williams as MC at the Palace talent shows.

When he left the talent shows 11 years later, Thomas worked three other jobs—day worker at a textile plant, MC at a local club and DJing on WDIA, where he befriended another popular disc jockey, B.B. King. Dunning the early '50s he recorded for Sam Phillips and his infant Sun Records. Thomas had his first national hit in 1953 with "Bear Cat" (#3 R&B), an answer record to Big Mama Thornton's "Hound Dog." Rufus and his daughter Carla were early stars of Stax Records. His two 1963 dance hits, "The Dog" (#22 R&B) and "Walking the Dog" (#10 pop, #5 R&B), helped establish that company. In the early '70s, Thomas would have another hot streak with "Do the Funky Chicken" (#28 pop, #5 R&B) and "(Do the) Push and Pull" (#31 pop, #1 R&B) in 1970, and "The Breakdown" (#2 R&B) in 1971. Into the '70s, Thomas worked at WDIA. When Stax went bankrupt, Thomas recorded for a series of labels. He still tours.

Linda Thompson

Born Linda Pettifer, Aug. 23, 1948, Glasgow, Scot.
1985—One Clear Moment (Warner Bros.) 1996—Dreams Fly Away: A History of Linda Thompson (Hannibal/Rykodisc).

One of the clarion voices of the British folk-rock movement that began in the late '60s, Linda Thompson (born Linda Pettifer, later changed to Peters) won acclaim alongside guitarist husband Richard Thompson [see entry]. Together, the pair recorded a series of powerful, often darkly themed albums between 1974—when Linda first got full billing with her mate on I Want to See the Bright Lights Tonight—and 1982, when the couple's rapidly dissolving union was played out as recorded drama on Shoot Out the Lights. The couple divorced in 1983, the same year Linda Thompson was named female singer of the year by ROLLING STONE. Two years later, Thompson released a solo album of countryish material, One Clear Moment, whose track "Telling Me Lies" was later adapted by Emmylou Harris, Linda Ronstadt, and Dolly Parton on their 1987 Trio project. Thompson's songs have also been recorded by Celine Dion, Patti Labelle, and Kenny Rogers, among others. In 1987 work began on a second album, which was never released. (One track, a remake of Richard Thompson's "The Dimming of the Day," surfaced on the 1996 retrospective Dreams Fly Away) Thompson also joined the cast of The Mysteries, a trilogy of medieval plays staged by the Royal National Theatre in London. In 1988 Thompson went on hiatus from recording and performing when she was diagnosed with hysterical dysphonia, the medical term for the singer's voice-robbing bouts with anxiety. By 1999, however, she had begun work on a new album built around acoustic folk themes. Recorded in fits and starts, as of mid-2001 it was still incomplete.

Richard Thompson, a founding member of the British folk-rock group Fairport Convention [see entry], left that band in 1971 for a career that in many ways fulfilled Fairport's goal: to link Celtic folk music to rock. Thompson's gallows-humored, fatalistic songs, whose outlook owes something to his Sufi-Muslim religion, are steeped in the jigs and reels and marches of British folk music, although they are often played on electric instruments.

After leaving Fairport, Thompson first sat in as a guitarist on British folk-rock albums like Mike and Lal Waterson's Bright Phoebus. He joined a loose aggregation of Fairport and folk-scene veterans, including drummer Dave Mattacks, singer Sandy Denny, and bassist Ashley Hutchings under the name the Bunch to record an album of pop oldies, Rock On. On that album, a friend of Sandy Denny's named Linda Peters (née Pettifer) sang "The Loco-Motion," and she married Thompson soon afterward. Thompson also sat in on Hutchings' first solo project, Morris On.

In 1972 Thompson began his solo career with the brilliant, eccentric Henry the Human Fly, which juxtaposed Chuck Berry riffs with old-English concertinas on Thompson's original songs. Linda Peters Thompson sang a few backup vocals, but she didn't get full billing until I Want to See the Bright Lights Tonight, which was belatedly released in the U.S. as half of the double album Almost Live (More or Less). Although Richard Thompson wrote all the duo's material (except for a song on their final album cowritten by Linda), he shared lead vocals with her on the albums they made together, and Linda's emotive mezzo-soprano was widely praised. In 1974 the Thompsons put together an electric band called Sour Grapes, with ex-Fairport guitarist Simon Nicol and a rhythm section, but after a tour opening for Traffic the group broke up. In 1974 the Thompsons converted to Sufism. The pair toured Britain in 1975 with a band that included ex-Fairports Dave Peggy on bass and Dave Mattacks on drums, plus button accordionist John Kirkpatrick. Afterward they retreated to the English countryside to start a Sufi community. They returned in 1978 with First Light, which used a U.S. rhythm section. Strict Tempo! was an album of instrumentals on which Thompson played all the instruments except percussion (by Mattacks); it included traditional jigs, reels, polkas, and a Duke Ellington tune. He also sat in on the first solo album by David Thomas of Pere Ubu.

Sessions for Shoot Out the Lights were originally produced by Gerry Rafferty (Stealer's Wheel, "Baker Street"); unhappy with the results, Thompson shelved the project. Producer Joe Boyd offered to produce the album for his new label, Hannibal. Thompson toured the U.S. as an acoustic solo act before Shoot Out the Lights was released, where he met his future wife, concert promoter Nancy Covey. Returning to England, he asked Linda for a divorce. They toured together with a band including Nicol, Mattacks, and bassist Pete Zorn. But the tensions of a disintegrating marriage spilled over to the music, and the pair split acrimoniously. While Linda sought a solo contract, Richard recorded an album of country-and-Celtic-tinged breakup songs, Hand of Kindness (#186, 1983). Linda signed with Warner Bros. in 1984, and released an album of edgy, countryish songs [see entry]. It was issued concurrently with Richard's Across a Crowded Room (#102, 1985), his first major-label release in seven years.

Thompson recorded at a steady pace throughout the next decade, but his career became a succès d'estime, earning critical raves and low sales. In 1993 Rykodisc released Watching the Dark, a three-CD retrospective covering Thompson's career. He's played on albums by artists ranging from Suzanne Vega to Robert Plant. Jo-El Sonnier had a Top 10 C&W hit covering Thompson's "Tear Stained Letter." A tribute album, Beat the Retreat, featuring Bonnie Raitt, Los Lobos, R.E.M., Dinosaur Jr., and David Byrne, among other artists, covering Thompson's songs, was released in 1994. The same year Thompson released Mirror Blue and joined fellow musicians John French, Fred Frith, and Henry Kaiser to release Invisible Means, a sequel of sorts to a quirky 1986 summit of eccentricity, Live, Love, Larf & Loaf (which was subsequently reissued in 1996). In 1996 Thompson released You? Me? Us?, a Grammy-nominated two-CD set split between electric and acoustic versions of similar material. He then collaborated with bassist Danny Thompson on the 1997 Industry, a half-instrumental concept album about the rise and fall of the British industrial complex. The 1999 album Mock Tudor, a reflection on Thompson's youth growing up in suburban London, featured his son Teddy Thompson on vocals and guitar. The Thompsons toured together to promote the record, with Teddy joining his father on duets of classic Richard and Linda Thompson songs.

The Thompson Twins

Formed 1977, Chesterfield, Eng.

Tom Bailey (b. Jan. 18, ca. 1954, Halifax, Eng.), voc., kybds.; John Roog, gtr.; Pete Dodd, gtr.; Chris Bell, drums.

1981—A Product of . . . (T, U.K.) 1982—(+ Alannah Currie [b. Sep. ca. 1957, Auckland, N.Z.], perc., sax, voc.; + Joe Leeway [b. London, Eng.], perc., voc.; + Matthew Seligman, bass) In the Name of Love (Arista) (- Roog; - Dodd; - Bell; - Seligman) 1983—Side Kicks 1984—Into the Gap 1985—Here's to Future Days 1986—(- Leeway) 1987—Close to the Bone 1988—The Best of Thompson Twins: Greatest Mixes 1989—Big Trash (Warner Bros./Reprise) 1991—Queer (Warner Bros.) 1996—Greatest Hits (Arista). Babble: 1994—The Stone (Reprise) 1996—Ether (Warner Bros.).

Actually a trio—at their peak, anyway—and without a Thompson among them, England's the Thompson Twins hit pay dirt just as new wave was drawing its final breath. With their quirkily videogenic looks and buoyant technopop tunes, Tom Bailey, Alannah Currie, and Joe Leeway were the perfect bunch to usher in the era of Boy George and Duran Duran. Singer/keyboardist/chief songwriter Bailey was an aspiring classical pianist and percussionist/singer Leeway a fledgling actor when they met in 1977, at a teachers' college in Cheshire; but Bailey formed the band's original four-man lineup without Leeway. This incarnation of the Thompson Twins—a name alluding to characters in Hergé's Tintin cartoon—played around London and released singles independently before signing with Arista Records in 1981. After the release of their debut album, A Product of . . ., Bailey added Leeway, then a roadie, to the group. Bailey also recruited his girlfriend, Alannah Currie, a former journalist who dabbled in music and flamboyant fashions, and ex-Soft Boys bassist Matthew Seligman.

This seven-piece edition of the Thompsons survived only one album. After Set (released in the U.S. as In the Name of Love), their manager, another school friend of Bailey and Leeway, fired everyone except those two and Currie. The newly spare Thompsons shot to #2 in the U.K. with their subsequent album, Quick Step and Side Kick (Side Kicks in the U.S.). Moreover, the album and its successors, Into the Gap (#10, 1984) and Here's to Future Days (#20, 1985), spawned a chain of hits in England and America: in 1983, "Love on Your Side" (#45 U.S., #9 U.K.), "We Are Detective" (#7 U.K.), "Hold Me Now" (#3 U.S., 1984, #4 U.K.); in 1984, "Doctor Doctor" (#11 U.S., #3 U.K.), "You Take Me Up" (#44 U.S., #2 U.K.); and in 1985, "Lay Your Hands on Me" (#6 U.S.) and "King for a Day" (#8 U.S., 1986; #22 U.K.). In 1986 Leeway left the act, now the Twins were indeed a duo—and a couple. Bailey and Currie, who had initially kept their personal relationship a secret, had a child in 1988. Their professional collaborations proved somewhat less fruitful, their biggest hit to date being 1989's "Sugar Daddy," a #28 single in America.

In 1994 Bailey and Currie—who by now had married, had a second child, and moved to New Zealand—resurfaced in a collective called Babble, whose sound was in the trance-ambient mode. It released The Stone, which featured engineer/programmer Keith Fernley (the group's other core member), vocalists Q. Tee and Amy St. Cyr, and computer whiz Charlie Whisker. Babble released a second album, the spiritual Ether, in 1996. In the late '90s, Bailey worked as a club DJ and began another career as producer of the New Zealand pop-dance band Stellar*; he won the Top Producer title for the group's debut album at the 2000 New Zealand Music Awards. Meanwhile, Currie is concentrating on the visual art of glass-casting

Big Mama Thornton

Born Willie Mae Thornton, Dec. 11, 1926, Montgomery, AL; died July 25, 1984, Los Angeles, CA
 1966—In Europe (Arhoolie) 1967—Chicago Blues 1968—Ball and Chain 1969—Stronger Than Dirt (Mercury) 1971—She's Back (Backbeat) 1975—Jail (Vanguard); Sassy Mama 1978—Mama's Pride 1992—Hound Dog: The Peacock Recordings (MCA).

A singer/songwriter who also played harmonica and drums, Willie Mae "Big Mama" Thornton was a blues-woman who, in spanning the decades from country to city blues, carried forward the legacy of such seminal blueswomen as Bessie Smith, Ma Rainey, and Memphis Minnie. She was the originator of two songs later made famous by rock & roll superstars: "Hound Dog" (by Elvis Presley), written by Leiber and Stoller, and her own "Ball and Chain" (a hit for Janis Joplin).

Thornton was one of seven children; her father was a minister, her mother a church singer. She became interested in music at an early age and won first prize in a local talent show in her teens. From 1941 to 1948, she toured the South as a singer/dancer/comedienne with Sammy Greene's Hot Harlem Revue. She settled in Houston, Texas, in 1948 and began recording there in 1951. In 1952 she worked with Johnny Otis' band on his Rhythm and Blues Caravan tour, and appeared in package shows with Junior Parker and Johnny Ace during 1953 and 1954. She recorded for small labels like Kent and Baytone.

In 1965 Thornton toured England and Europe with the American Folk Blues Festival, and in 1967 she appeared at one of John Hammond's From Spirituals to Swing concerts at Carnegie Hall, and appeared in the PBS documentary Black White and Blue. A year later she appeared at the Monterey Jazz Festival, and in 1969 played the Newport Folk Festival and the Chicago and Ann Arbor Blues festivals. In 1971 she appeared on the Dick Cavett talk show on ABC-TV and recorded material for the soundtrack of the film Vanishing Point. In 1974 she appeared on NBC-TV's rock show Midnight Special, and in 1980 appeared on the "Blues Is a Woman" bill with such other veteran blueswomen as Sippie Wallace at the Newport Jazz Festival.

Thornton began recording her later albums with In Europe. Chicago Blues, featuring such blues giants as Muddy Waters and Otis Spann, is considered one of her best. Jail contains her versions of "Hound Dog" (originally an R&B hit for her in 1953, before Presley's version), "Ball and Chain," and "Little Red Rooster." She died of a heart attack.

George Thorogood and the Destroyers

George Thorogood (b. Feb. 24, 1950, Wilmington, DE), gtr., voc.; Ron Smith, gtr.; Billy Blough, bass; Jeff Simon, drums.
 1977—George Thorogood and the Destroyers (Rouder)
 1978—Move It On Over 1979—Better Than the Rest (MCA)
 1980—(– Smith; + Hank Carter, sax, gtr., kybds., voc.) More George Thorogood and the Destroyers (Rouder) 1982—Bad to the Bone (EMI America) 1985—(+ Steve Chrismar, gtr.) Maverick 1986—Live 1988—Born to Be Bad (EMI Manhattan) 1991—Boogie People (EMI) 1992—The Baddest of George Thorogood and the Destroyers 1993—Haircut 1995—Let's Work Together Live 1997—Rockin' My Life Away 1999—Half a Boy, Half a Man (CMC).

The son of a white-collar British immigrant and a onetime semipro baseball player, George Thorogood is a spirited re-creator of the driving, raucous urban slide-guitar blues pioneered by Chicago greats like Elmore James.

Thorogood did not become seriously involved with music until 1970, when he saw a show by another blues archivist, John Paul Hammond. Thorogood went to California, where he was soon opening shows for Bonnie Raitt and bluesmen Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee. In late 1978 Thorogood had a hit single with his raw adaptation of Hank Williams' "Move It On Over," which stayed on the chart into 1978, the first single on the folk-oriented Rouder label. Although Thorogood publicly repudiated Better Than the Rest, a demo tape he had signed away, it also charted. In 1981 he and the Destroyers opened several dates on the Rolling Stones' U.S. tour. He and the Destroyers later played gigs in 50 different states over a 50-day period.

Thorogood's big commercial break came in 1982 when "Bad to the Bone," with a video featuring Bo Diddley, got substantial exposure on MTV. The album of the same title, Thorogood's second, went gold, and the group's next three albums—Maverick, Live, Born to Be Bad—did likewise, even though none charted higher than #32. In 1985 the group backed Albert Collins at Live Aid. Thorogood is known as much for his tongue-in-cheek lyrics (as in "I Drink Alone") as his bracing guitar work. With few charting singles and a stubborn commitment to straight-ahead blues rock, George Thorogood and the Destroyers have carved out a unique niche. While critics denigrate the group's now-formulaic approach and record sales have been relatively weak, the group continues to tour and to record. Rockin' My Life Away contains two originals but devotes most of its time to songs written by such artists as Elmore James, Merle Haggard, and (somewhat surprisingly) Frank Zappa.

From the late '60s to early '70s, Three Dog Night was one of the most popular bands in America, with 18 consecutive Top 20 hits (11 of which were Top 10s, including three #1s), seven million-selling singles, and 12 gold LPs—the entire album catalogue up through 1974's Joy to the World: Their Greatest Hits. Although the group initially earned critical respect for its innovative interpretations and was a staple of progressive FM-radio playlists, it was later criticized as being crassly commercial. True, Three Dog Night's material was singles-oriented, soul-influenced pop rock, and almost always consisted of covers. But its success was phenomenal. In its favor, however, the group—which chose, arranged, and co-produced its records—provided exposure for songwriters Randy Newman, Elton John and Bernie Taupin, Harry Nilsson, Laura Nyro, Hoyt Axton, Leo Sayer, and others.

The band centered on three lead singers (Cory Wells, Danny Hutton, and Chuck Negron) with four backup musicians (Mike Allsup, Jimmy Greenspoon, Joe Schermie, and Floyd Sneed). Wells knew Hutton from the mid-'60s, when the latter produced Wells' band, the Enemys, for MGM. Hutton, born in Ireland but raised in the U.S., worked as a producer from age 18, and in 1965 he wrote, arranged, and produced as a solo artist the single "Roses and Rainbows" for Hanna-Barbera Records (the cartoon company), which became a small hit. In the fall of that year, he auditioned unsuccessfully for the Monkees. Hutton also recorded for MGM, where he had the minor hit "Big Bright Eyes." It was Hutton who first hit on the three-vocalist-band idea, and he and Wells brought in Negron, who used to sing regularly at the Apollo and had recorded unsuccessfully with Columbia in the mid-'60s. Negron also sang backup on one of Hutton's first singles. (Among others Hutton and Wells considered for the third-vocalist spot were Billy Joe Royal and Crazy Horse founder Danny Whitten.) The trio, renamed Redwood by Brian Wilson, cut two singles with Wilson producing "Darlin'" and "Time to Get Alone." Neither was ever released, and "Darlin'" later became a hit for the Beach Boys. The trio then moved on to work with Van Dyke Parks, with whom they cut a few demos.

Frustrated by their lack of artistic control, Negron, Hutton, and Wells decided to expand their group to include backing musicians, and by 1968 the lineup was a firm seven-piece. Schermie had been with the Cory Wells Blues Band, which broke up the year before. Sneed had backed José Feliciano, and Greenspoon had done many L.A. sessions. After some initial consultation with Van Dyke Parks and Brian Wilson, Gabriel Mekler, a Hungarian-born classical pianist, who had worked with Steppenwolf, became their producer.

Three Dog Night's 1968 debut, Three Dog Night (#11, 1969) contained three singles. First "Nobody" gained initial interest. Its B side was an obscure Lennon-McCartney song previously recorded by Cilla Black, "It's for You." Though never a hit itself, "It's for You" showcased the group's three-part-harmony lead vocals. "Nobody" was followed by the Top 30 cover of Otis Redding's "Try a Little Tenderness." The band's big breakthrough came in 1969 with "One," a Harry Nilsson song that soared to #5 and went gold. Suitable for Framing (#16, 1969) charted with "Easy to Be Hard" (#4, 1969) from the rock musical Hair. "Eli's Coming" (#10, 1969) by Laura Nyro, and "Lady Samantha," the first stateside success for Elton John and Bernie Taupin. On It Ain't Easy (#8, 1970), Three Dog Night covered Randy Newman's "Mama Told Me (Not to Come)" (#1, 1970). In 1971 the band went to #1 with Hoyt Axton's children's song "Joy to the World." Three Dog Night also gave Leo Sayer his first American writing hit by covering "The Show Must Go On" (#14, 1974). The group's other hits include Russ Ballard's song for Argent, "Liar" (#7, 1971), "One Man Band" (#19, 1970), "An Old Fashioned Love Song" (#4, 1971), "Never Been to Spain" (#5, 1972), "Black and White" (#1, 1972), and B.W. Stevenson's "Shambala" (#3, 1973). Three Dog Night sold out shows around the world and in 1972 hosted its own network television special.

By 1974, though, the commercial magic had finally waned. The combo's 13th LP, Coming Down Your Way (#70, 1975), was its first not to go gold. In addition, personal friction brewed among the three singers, partly because Negron sang a disproportionate number of the hits; the public saw him as the lead singer. In 1976, after American Pastime (#123, 1976), Hutton was replaced by Jay Gruska, and the band got three new musicians, all former members of Rufus—Al Ciner, Denny Belfield, and Ron Stockert. In 1977 Three Dog Night disbanded.

In the late '70s Hutton began managing punk bands, including L.A.'s Fear. He also led a group called the Danny Hutton Hitters, who appeared on the Pretty in Pink soundtrack. Wells recorded a pair of solo albums, but only one, 1978's Touch Me, was released. Negron also recorded solo in the early '80s. In June 1981 the three original vocalists reunited. Two years later, they released their final record, an EP entitled It's a Jungle. Since Negron's departure in the mid-'80s Hutton and Wells have toured with other musicians as Three Dog Night. In 1999 Negron published Three Dog Nightmare, an autobiography in which he unflinchingly details his descent into and recovery from drug addiction. Throughout the '90s, Three Dog Night's songs have appeared in numerous motion pictures and TV ads.

Throwing Muses/Belly

Formed 1980, Newport, RI

Kristin Hersh (b. Aug. 7, 1966, Atlanta, GA), gtr., voc.; Tanya Donelly (b. July 14, 1966, Newport), gtr., voc.; David Narcizo (b. May 6, 1966, Newport), drums; Elaine Adamedes, bass. 1984—Throwing Muses EP (Throwing Muses) 1986—(– Adamedes; + Leslie Langston [b. May 20, 1966, Buffalo, NY), gtr.; Chris Gorman (b. July 29, 1967, Buffalo), drums; Fred Abong, bass. 1993—Star (Sire) (– Abong; + Gail Greenwood [b. Mar. 10, 1960, Providence], bass) 1995—King. Kristin Hersh solo: 1994—Hips and Makers (Sire) 1998—Strange Angels (Rykodisc) 1999—Sky Motel (4AD) 2001—Sunny Border Blue. Tanya Donelly solo: 1997—Lovesongs for Underdogs (Reprise).

Throwing Muses pioneered a dense, dreamy, guitar-based sound long before "alternative" was a musical term. Led by singer/songwriter Kristin Hersh and, to a lesser degree, her stepsister Tanya Donelly, they articulated a female vision—intense, meditative, raw—that differed sharply from the viedogic pop of the '80s.

The band was formed by four high school friends in Newport, Rhode Island. After a self-released EP that drew critical praise in Rhode Island and Boston, the Muses changed bassists. They were the first American band signed to London's 4AD label. Their eponymous debut and Chains Changed EP, both produced by Gil Norton, were released to gushing attention from the British press.

Their first American releases, however, were too oblique and discordant for tastes here, although the Muses have over the years built a devoted following. As college radio developed into a market segment, the Muses gained greater success with the more melodic Hunkpapa. Langston left (she joined Wolfgang Press and returned to record Red Heaven with the Muses) and was replaced by Fred Abong. The Muses had a breakthrough on alternative radio with "Counting Backwards" from The Real Ramona. Hersh toured America pregnant with her second child, her belly pushing her guitar far in front of her by the final dates.

Donelly developed the side project, the Breeders, with the Pixies' Kim Deal in 1990 [see the Pixies/Breeders entry]. She had contributed one or two songs per album during the Muses' career, and after Ramona, decided she needed an outlet for her own tunes. She left the Muses and formed Belly with the brothers Tom and Chris Gorman. The album's poppy, childlike tunes (Donelly calls the songs fairy tales), especially the MTV hit "Feed the Tree," brought Belly more commercial success than the Muses had known. Belly was nominated for a Grammy for Best New Act of 1993. The group released King before disbanding in 1996; Donelly's solo debut, Lovesongs for Underdogs appeared the following year.

Meanwhile, although the Muses' Red Heaven contained several radio-friendly tunes and featured a cameo by Bob Mould (Hüsker Dü, Sugar), it did not get the same support from the record company and radio. Hersh subsequently recorded an acclaimed solo album, Hips and Makers, coproduced by Lenny Kaye. It included a cameo from R.E.M.'s Michael Stipe.

With bassist Bernard Georges and founding drummer David Narcizo, Hersh regrouped Throwing Muses in 1994 and recorded the self-produced University. Released in early 1995, the album balances streamlined modern rock with experimentation for what is perhaps the band's most accessible effort to date. Limbo (1996), a melodic, stripped-down affair, sold poorly; unable to make ends meet touring, the Muses, a band with an indie ethic struggling to make it in the world of corporate rock, called it quits. In a Doghouse, a collection of rare early material, appeared in 1998.

Hersh's first solo album after the breakup, Strange Angels (1997), was an intimate, acoustic record in much the same vein as Hips and Makers. Her next project, available only through her Web site, was a collection of Appalachian folk songs called Murder, Misery and Then Goodnight. Sky Motel and Sunny Border Blue found Hersh returning to the more electric sound of the Muses and playing most of the instruments on the records herself.

Thunderclap Newman

Formed 1969, England

Andy Newman (b. ca. 1943, Eng.), kybds.; Jimmy McCulloch, (b. 1953, Scot.; d. Sep. 27, 1979), gtr.; John "Speedy" Keen (b. Mar. 29, 1945, London, Eng.), voc., drums; and later, Jim Avery (b. Eng.), bass; Jack McCulloch (b. Scot.), drums. 1970—Hollywood Dream (Track, U.K.).

Thunderclap Newman was a group haphazardly assembled by Pete Townshend in 1969. The group had one hit, "Something in the Air," and then disbanded. Andy Newman was a 26-year-old eccentric, a barrelhouse jazz pianist who had previously worked as a post office engineer. Townshend first heard a tape of Newman back in 1963. Townshend ran into Jimmy McCulloch during a Who gig where 13-year-old Jimmy's Cowsill-type family opened the show. Townshend knew ex-Mayall roadie "Speedy" Keen from the early Who days; Keen's "Armenia City in the Sky" wound up on The Who Sell Out. Townshend made the three members into a regular band and, as producer and bass player (under the pseudonym Bijou Drains), recorded Keen's "Something in the Air." It went to #1 in England, got much FM airplay in America, but only hit #37. It was also used in the films The Magic Christian and Strawberry Statement. Keen wrote the hit and most of the other material on Hollywood Dream.

The band toured England to support the single, with Jim Avery on bass and Jimmy McCulloch's brother Jack on drums (to free Keen for the front vocal spot), but it didn't work out and they disbanded in 1970. Keen went on to make two solo albums, Previous Convictions (1973) and Y'know Wot I Mean? (1975). Newman had his own solo, Rainbow, and then briefly joined ex-Bonzo Dog Band member Roger Spear in Kinetic Wardrobe. McCulloch played with Stone the Crows (with Maggie Bell), John Mayall, and then Paul McCartney's Wings from 1975 until 1978; he died the following year.

Tiffany

Born Tiffany Renee Darwish, Oct. 2, 1971, Norwalk, CA
 1987—Tiffany (MCA) 1988—Hold an Old Friend's Hand
 1990—New Inside 1996—Greatest Hits (Unidisc/Hip-O)
 2000—The Color of Silence (Eureka).

Tiffany was only 16 when a couple of bubblegum-pop singles took her to the top of the charts. Actually, her 1987 self-titled debut album had been a commercial dud until her manager, George Tobin, helped dream up a marketing ploy that brought her to shopping malls everywhere—literally. Tobin, a music industry veteran, was producing a Smokey Robinson album in his North Hollywood studio when he met Tiffany, who was there making a demo tape. Tiffany, who began singing in public when she was nine, had been performing with country bands, but Tobin believed she could be a hot pop commodity.

It took him three years to land his discovery a major-label contract, with MCA. When the album Tiffany proved an equally hard sell, Tobin and a publicist conceived "The Beautiful You: Celebrating the Good Life," a tour that brought Tiffany to teen-infested shopping malls around the country. Tiffany eventually hit #1 on the pop chart—the first album by a teenage girl to do so—as did two of its singles, "Could've Been" and a cover of Tommy James' "I Think We're Alone Now." Another cover, of the Beatles' "I Saw Her Standing There" (substituting the masculine pronoun), went to #7.

Alas, this teen queen's reign would be brief. After "All This Time" (#6, 1988), her sophomore album quickly faded, and a third album was a total flop. In 1988 Tiffany took her mother to court, seeking emancipated-minor status. The settlement stipulated in part that while her mother remained her legal guardian, Tiffany would control her own finances. The same year as her album New Inside, Tiffany was the voice of Judy Jetson in The Jetsons: The Movie.

In 1992 she married a makeup artist she met on a photo shoot; the couple became the parents of a son, Elijah, later that year. In 1995 Tiffany and her family moved to Nashville, where she hoped to return to singing country music and reinvent her career. By 1997 she was back in L.A. to try pop music again. Inclusion on two compilation albums produced by Cleopatra Records offered interesting exposure: She sang "New Year's Day," backed by industrial band Front Line Assembly, for a 1999 U2 tribute, and "Call Me" for a 2000 Blondie collection. After performing "KeyWest Intermezzo (I Saw You First)" with John Mellencamp at that year's Farm Aid benefit concert, Tiffany released The Color of Silence.

'Til Tuesday: See Aimee Mann

Timbuk 3

Formed 1984, Madison, WI
 Pat MacDonald (b. Aug. 6, 1952, Green Bay, WI), voc., gtr., harmonica, bass; Barbara K. MacDonald (b. Oct. 4, 1957, Wausau, WI), voc., gtr., harmonica, violin, mandolin.
 1986—Greetings From Timbuk 3 (I.R.S.) 1988—Eden Alley
 1989—Edge of Allegiance 1991—(+ Wally Ingram [b. Sep. 13, 1962, Beloit, WI], drums; + Courtney Audain [b. Feb. 4, 1960, Trinidad], bass) Big Shot in the Dark 1993—Espace Ornano (Watermelon) 1995—A Hundred Lovers (High Street/Windham Hill).

Timbuk 3 is perhaps best remembered as a novelty band, based on its use of a boombox as a rhythm section and its hit single "The Future's So Bright, I Gotta Wear Shades" (#19, 1986). But the MacDonalds are actually talented musicians with serious and often grim viewpoints. "Shades," for example, was about the dangers of yuppie avarice and nuclear technology. Pat and Barbara MacDonald met in Madison, Wisconsin, in 1978 and married five years later. They moved briefly to New York City, then relocated to Austin, Texas, in 1984. Timbuk 3 got a record deal after being featured on a 1985 MTV program about Austin's thriving music scene.

Greetings From Timbuk 3 (#50, 1986), featuring "Shades," introduced the band's musical mix of rock, funk, folk, and country with Pat's often-sarcastic lyrics. Timbuk 3 toured with a boombox playing pretaped rhythm tracks. On Eden Alley, Timbuk 3 tried to establish themselves as more serious artists, avoiding novelty hits and weaving a Biblical theme through the album. Edge of Allegiance was coproduced by Denardo Coleman, the son of Ornette Coleman, and Jayne Cortez, and featured the satirical "National Holiday." For Big Shot in the Dark, the group used a human rhythm section for the first time. Espace Ornano was named after the Paris club where it was recorded. A Hundred Lovers got some radio airplay with its title track.

In 1997, shortly after the couple dissolved their musical and marital partnership, Pat MacDonald signed with Miles Copeland's Ark 21 label. His wryly titled solo debut, Pat MacDonald Sleeps With His Guitar, found him reflecting on recent events in his life with a set of spare, hypnotic songs. Pat also has worked with Aerosmith, singer/songwriter Jill Sobule, and Japanese composer Ryuichi Sakamoto. Barbara is a mainstay of the Austin club scene, performing under the name Barbara K.

The Time

Formed 1981, Minneapolis, MN

Morris Day (b. Springfield, IL, ca. 1958), voc.; Jesse Johnson (b. May 29, 1960, Rock Island, IL), gtr., voc.; Jimmy Jam (b. James Harris III, June 6, 1959, Minneapolis), kybds.; Monte Moir, kybds.; Terry Lewis (b. Nov. 24, 1956, Omaha, NE), bass; Jellybean Johnson, drums.

1981—The Time (Warner Bros.) 1982—What Time Is It? 1983—(- Jam; - Lewis; - Moir; + Paul "St. Paul" Peterson, kybds., voc.; + Mark Cardenas, kybds.; + Jerry Hubbard, bass; + Jerome Benton, voc., perc.) 1984—Ice Cream Castle (group disbands) 1990—(original lineup, + Benton, re-forms) Pandemonium (Paisley Park).

Morris Day solo: 1985—Color of Success (Warner Bros.) 1988—Daydreaming 1992—Guaranteed.

After Prince, the Time was the foremost exponent of the funk-rock hybrid Minneapolis Sound—providing a snappy, crowd-pleasing complement to Prince's more venturesome artistry. The Time was reportedly created by Prince, who put his old friend Morris Day, a onetime band mate in Prince's early group Grand Central, together with members of that band's chief rival on the Minneapolis scene, Flyte Tyme, which had included Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis, Monte Moir, and Jellybean Johnson. Day, who'd been Grand Central's drummer, replaced Alexander O'Neal [see entry] as Flyte Tyme's vocalist. The Time was completed with the additions of guitarist Jesse Johnson, and Lewis' half-brother Jerome Benton, who became the comic-foil valet to Day's preening-dandy frontman.

The Time's eponymous debut album (#50, 1981) was produced by Prince under the alias "Jamie Starr"; Day's flamboyant act, equal parts swagger and self-mockery, gave the group a cool-yet-comical personality that appealed especially to R&B audiences. Hit singles included "Get It Up" (#6 R&B, 1981), "Cool (Part 1)" (#90 pop, #7 R&B, 1982), and "777-9311" (#88 pop, #2 R&B, 1982). Opening for Prince on his 1999 tour, the Time nearly stole the show with its sharp-dressed choreography and burlesque antics. However, the band's second album, What Time Is It? (#104 pop, #26 R&B, 1982), yielded only one minor hit in "The Walk" (#24 R&B, 1982).

In March 1983 Jam and Lewis, moonlighting as freelance producers, were snowed into Atlanta by a freak blizzard while working with the S.O.S. Band. They missed a tour date with Prince, who immediately fired them. Moir left soon after. Jam and Lewis went on to become enormously successful composer/producers for Janet Jackson, among other artists; Moir wrote and produced with their Flyte Tyme Productions and on his own.

The refashioned Time continued on, with a featured role in Prince's breakthrough film Purple Rain, which yielded hits for the Time in "Jungle Love" (#20 pop, #6 R&B, 1984) and "The Bird" (#36 pop, #33 R&B, 1985), both of which were included on Ice Cream Castle (#24, 1984), the group's first platinum effort. Day and Prince grew apart, however, during the filming of Purple Rain and eventually stopped speaking with each other; Day quit the band, followed by Jesse Johnson, and the Time fell apart.

Day released two solo albums, Color of Success (#37 pop, #7 R&B, 1985), which yielded "The Oak Tree" (#65 pop, #3 R&B, 1985) and Daydreaming (#41 pop, #7 R&B, 1988), which produced the hit "Fishnet" (#23 pop, #1 R&B, 1988). He also acted in the Andrew "Dice" Clay film Adventures of Ford Fairlane and in the shortlived 1990 ABC-TV sitcom New Attitude. Johnson, who'd produced some tracks for Janet Jackson before Jam and Lewis made her a megastar, formed the Jesse Johnson Revue, which released three albums, Shockadelica (#70 pop, #15 R&B, 1986) featured a duet with Sly Stone on "Crazy" (#53 pop, #2 R&B, 1986).

In 1990 the original Time briefly reunited to appear in Prince's movie Graffiti Bridge and to record the album Pandemonium (#18 pop, #9 R&B, 1990), which included the hit single "Jerk Out" (#9 pop, #1 R&B, 1990). Day released another solo effort, Guaranteed, in 1992, and continued to front the Time, often on summer package tours where the band's catalog of hits remained in demand.

Tiny Tim

Born Herbert Butros Khaury, Apr. 12, 1931, New York, NY; died Nov. 31, 1996, Minneapolis, MN

1968—God Bless Tiny Tim (Reprise); Tiny Tim's Second Album 1969—For All My Little Friends 1996—Girl (Rounder); Tiny Tim's Christmas Album.

With his strange voice (a trembling falsetto), unique appearance (big nose, stringy hair, and bag-man clothes), and sweet demeanor, Tiny Tim became a highly successful novelty artist in the late '60s to early '70s.

The budding singer had a strong record-collector's interest in the comedic pop of bygone eras, particularly the crooners of the '20s such as Rudy Vallee. He first performed these little-known oldies, accompanying himself on ukulele and using such pseudonyms as Darryl Dover and Larry Love, to mostly uninterested audiences in Greenwich Village. By the mid-'60s, Tiny Tim was amassing a cult audience. He played often at Steve Paul's Scene, and eventually got booked on The Tonight Show, where he became an instant national celebrity of sorts.

By 1968, rock audiences at such venues as the Fillmore East and West had latched on to Tim's act. Reprise released his first LP in spring 1968. He became a frequent guest on Laugh-In as well as on the Carson show. He married 17-year-old Victoria May Budinger (Miss Vicky, as he called her) on the latter program on December 17, 1969. That show was one of the most widely watched television events of the decade. The couple named their daughter Tulip, after Tiny's one major hit, "Tip-Toe Thru the Tulips With Me" (#17, 1968). Tim and Miss Vicky first filed for divorce in early 1972, at which point he was out of public favor and broke. The divorce was final in 1977.

He continued to perform. In the latter stages of his career he released interesting singles with such titles as "I Saw Elvis Presley Tiptoeing Through the Tulips" and "The Hicky on Your Neck." His oeuvre also included a cover of AC/DC's "Highway to Hell." In the '80s and '90s Tiny Tim recorded numerous independent and import albums in addition to those listed above. By the mid-'90s he had become a frequent guest on Howard Stern's radio show and on an MTV game show. In 1996 the 64-year-old performer died in the arms of his third wife, Susan, after he had collapsed on the stage of the Minneapolis Women's Club. He had just finished singing "Tip-Toe Thru' the Tulips" at a formal fund-raiser.

TLC

Formed 1991, Atlanta, GA

Tionne "T-Boz" Watkins (b. Apr. 26, 1970, Des Moines, IA), voc.;

Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes (b. May 27, 1971, Philadelphia, PA), voc.;

Rozonda "Chilli" Thomas (b. Feb. 27, 1971, Atlanta), voc.

1992—Ooooooohhh . . . On the TLC Tip (LaFace) 1994—

CrazySexyCool 1999—Fanmail.

One of the most successful R&B groups of the '90s, the "New Jill Swing" trio TLC officially came together after Rozonda "Chilli" Thomas joined Tionne "T-Boz" Watkins and Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes in 1991, replacing a short-term original "C" known as Crystal. Under the management and direction of singer/songwriter/producer Pebbles (née Pern McKissack), the sassy young trio was signed to LaFace Records, the Atlanta-based label cofounded by Pebbles' then-husband (and future Anista President) L.A. Reid. Released in 1992, the group's debut, Ooooooohhh . . . On the TLC Tip (#14 pop, #3 R&B) gave TLC its first three of many pop Top 10 hits: "Ain't 2 Proud 2 Beg" (#6 pop, #2 R&B), "Baby-Baby-Baby" (#2 pop, #1 R&B), and "What About Your Friends" (#7 pop, #2 R&B). The women's individual personalities were established early on: T-Boz sang the no-nonsense, tough-girl parts, Chilli the pretty passages, and Left Eye—who earned her moniker by wearing a condom taped over the left lens of her spectacles—brought the rap. Lopes also contributed to the songwriting pool alongside heavyweights Babyface, Dallas Austin, and Jermaine Dupri.

In between Ooooooohhh and its followup, TLC remained active by appearing in the movie House Party 3 and contributing the Prince-penned "Get It Up" (#42 pop, #15 R&B, 1993) to the soundtrack of the Janet Jackson/Tupac Shakur film Poetic Justice. Lopes in particular remained in the headlines, thanks to her tumultuous relationship with former Atlanta Falcons player Andre Rison. In 1994 Lopes was sentenced to five years probation for burning Rison's house to the ground after an argument (they later made up). By the time CrazySexyCool (#3 pop, #2 R&B) was released later that year, however, the focus was back on TLC's music. Introducing a dramatically sexier and more mature TLC, the album went 11 times platinum and spun off the #1 pop hits "Creep" and "Waterfalls," as well as "Red Light Special" (#2 pop, #3 R&B, 1995) and "Digg'n' On You" (#5 pop, #7 R&B, 1995). But in July 1995, in the middle of CrazySexyCool's reign, the group members filed for bankruptcy, claiming they had yet to receive enough money to pay off their debts (particularly Lopes, who owed Lloyd's of London $1.3 million for her damage to her former boyfriend's house).

TLC would wait five years before releasing its next album, but the time away didn't hurt the group's popularity. Released in the spring of 1999, Fanmail entered the charts at #1 (beating Eminem's also highly anticipated debut, The Slim Shady LP to the top) and dominated the pop and R&B charts for most of the year. The album's hits included "No Scrubs" and "Unpretty," both of which went to #1 on the pop chart. After the album's chart run, however, another long hiatus seemed inevitable, with Lopes and Thomas both working on solo albums by the end of 2000. A greatest-hits album was also rumored, though as of this writing, none of the projects had been released.

Toad the Wet Sprocket

Fear 1994—Dulcinea 1995—In Light Syrup 1997—Coil

1999—P.S. (A Toad Retrospective).

Toad the Wet Sprocket, a mellow, artsy pop-rock band that took its name from a Monty Python skit that parodied rock news reports, holds the distinction of being the first group from Santa Barbara, California, to score a major-label record deal. Formed by schoolmates while still in high school, Toad honed its chops at a local bar, playing under names like Three Young Studs and Glen before settling on the Python-inspired moniker. Eventually a singer from the area asked the band to back him during a recording session, and as a return favor allowed the musicians to cut two of their own songs in his studio. With $650 Toad recorded eight more tracks, making complete what would become its first album.

Duped cassettes of the recording found their way into independent record stores in Santa Barbara, and soon word spread to L.A., where record companies became interested in the group. After being courted by several big labels, Toad decided to sign with Columbia, which rereleased its first album, Bread and Circus, late in 1989. By that point the band had almost finished a second album. Pale Columbia's investment showed no real signs of paying off, however, until 1992, when Toad's persistent touring started increasing its college-based following. It was that year that Toad's 1991 album, Fear, appeared in the Billboard Top 100. Fear itself peaked at #49, but the album generated two Top 20 singles, "All I Want" (#15) and "Walk on the Ocean" (#18). Dulcinea (#34, 1994) yielded the Top 40 single "Fall Down" (#33, 1994) and the almost-Top 40 hit "Something's Always Wrong" (#41, 1994). A collection of B sides and previously unreleased material, In Light Syrup (#37), followed in 1995, giving the members a breather. Coil (#19, 1997), featuring the single "Come Down," which reached #13 on the Modern Rock Tracks chart, that summer, the band participated in the H O R D E Tour.

In 1998 the longtime friends concluded that the band was no longer satisfying, and Toad broke up. However, the quartet reunited in the studio to rerecord one track for its 1999 swansong, P.S. (A Toad Retrospective), which was mostly a greatest-hits collection. Following the band's breakup, Phillips toured with fellow folk rockers Steve Poltz (the Rugburns), John Doe (X), and Pete Droge in the fall of 1998. He then dabbled in a band called Two Headed Boy. A solo album, Live at Largo, was released on the Internet in 2000; he also played solo acoustic dates. Toad guitarist Todd Nichols and bassist/keyboardist Dean Dinning (nephew of Mark Dinning, who had his own hit, "Teen Angel," in 1959) joined forces with Rob Taylor and Erik Herzog to form the band Lapdog. Dinning and Nichols cowrote songs for the band's album, Near Tonight, which was self-released in 2000, but Dinning left the group before the album's release; tired of the musician's lifestyle, he pursued voiceover work instead. Drummer Guss became a band manager and played gigs with various other bands as well.

The Tokens

Formed 1958, New York, NY

Best-known lineup: Phil Margo (b. Apr. 1, 1942, Brooklyn, NY), bass voc.; Hank Medress (b. Nov. 19, 1938, Brooklyn), first tenor voc.; Jay Siegel (b. Oct. 20, 1939, Brooklyn), lead baritone voc.; Joseph Venneri (b. 1937, Brooklyn); Mitchel Margo (b. May 25, 1947, Brooklyn), second tenor and baritone voc.

1962—The Lion Sleeps Tonight (RCA) 1966—I Hear Trumpets Blow (B.T. Puppy) 1967—Portrait (Warner Bros.) 1971—Both Sides Now (Buddah) 1993—Oldies Are Now (B.T. Puppy) 1994—Wimoweh: The Best of the Tokens (RCA) 1996—Esta Noche, El Leon Baila (B.T. Puppy) 1999—Unscrewed.

The Tokens' best-known achievement was their doo-wop-like smash hit "The Lion Sleeps Tonight" (#1, 1961). The song, which is derived from a Zulu folk melody originally titled "Mbube" (which sounded like "wimoweh") was first a hit recording in the '30s in Africa. It was popularized in the '50s by Miriam Makeba, who sang it in Zulu, on Victor Records. This was followed by an English-language rendition by the Weavers entitled "Wimoweh." The Tokens' souped-up English version sold over 3 million copies.

The first version of the Tokens was formed in 1956 by Neil Sedaka and Hank Medress and included Eddie Rabkin and Cynthia Zoliton. The group broke up after recording two Sedaka-Howie Greenfield sides. Medress formed another group, with Jay Siegel, Warren Schwartz, and Fred Kalkstein two years later, but it too dissolved. Medress and Siegel then teamed up with brothers Phil and Mitch Margo. These four formed the group's best-known lineup. Their first single, on Warwick, had been "Tonight I Fell in Love," which sold 700,000 copies in the U.S. and 300,000 in Canada and Europe.

"The Lion Sleeps Tonight" proved a surprise international smash hit, but the later records fell on deaf ears. Shortly after the early 1962 release of the "Lion"-like "B'wa Nina," the band members signed a production/A&R deal with Capitol. Unlike many similar vocal groups, the Tokens had played on and had a hand in producing their own records. They produced the Revlons, among others, but their biggest early production efforts were the Chiffons' "One Fine Day" and "He's So Fine." They also started their own record label, B.T. Puppy Records. Other production credits include the Happenings. Hank Medress produced another version of "Lion Sleeps" for Robert John on Atlantic, which also became a Top 10 smash in 1972. Medress also worked as a staff producer at Bell Records in the early '70s, and teamed up Dawn with Tony Orlando. He has since worked with Buster Poindexter and Dan Hill. Jay Siegel and the Margo brothers became Cross Country and recorded for Atlantic in 1973. In 1981 the best-known lineup reunited for a show at Radio City Music Hall. The group then split up again, with the Margo brothers forming one set of Tokens and Siegel another. Mitch Margo has also been successful as a manager and television producer/writer.

Although the Tokens' record sales never reached earlier levels, they were sought-after background vocalists and have performed on records by Connie Francis, Del Shannon, Bob Dylan, and Keith ("98.6"). Members of the Tokens continued to sing together on occasion, doing commercials for Pan Am ("makes the going great"), Ban, Clairol, Wendy's, Sunkist (the "Good Vibrations" spots), and other products. They have continued to perform and record through the years. They appear on Paul Shaffer's 1989 LP, teaming up with Dion DiMucci, Johnny Maestro, and other early-'60s stars for "When the Radio's On." The use of "The Lion Sleeps Tonight" in the Walt Disney animated feature The Lion King (1994) brought the Tokens back into the spotlight. Both Siegel's Tokens and the version led by the Margo brothers and their sons have continued to perform and record.

Tone-Lōc

Born Anthony Terrell Smith, Mar. 3, 1966, Los Angeles, CA
1989—Lōc-ed After Dark (Delicious Vinyl) 1991—Cool Hand Lōc.

Rap's gravely voiced hedonist Tone-Lōc (the name is short for his street "tag," Tony Loco) made rock history when his Lōc-ed After Dark became the first album by a black rap artist to go to #1 on the pop chart, thanks to "Wild Thing" (#2, 1989).

Lōc, the youngest of three children, was raised in a middle-class section of L.A. by his mother (his father died when Lōc was 12). A flirtation with gang life (he was rumored to be a member of the Crips) ended when Lōc was sent to the prestigious Hollywood Professional School. A funk fan too impatient to learn guitar, Lōc was understandably attracted to rap. After junior college he joined a short-lived trio, Triple A. After graduation he sold foreclosed houses, programmed computers, and continued to rap.

His distinctive voice—the result of having his throat scalded by hot tea and brandy, his mother's cold cure—brought him to the attention of Delicious Vinyl in 1988. An initial single, "On Fire" b/w "I Got It Goin' On," was a local radio hit. His breakthrough came with the followup, "Wild Thing," an infectious paean to the joys of casual sex rapped over a guitar riff sampled from Van Halen's "Jamie's Cryin'" and cowritten by label mate Young MC. (Apparently Young MC became involved after Lōc's rap was rejected by his label as being too obscene.) The song's video, made for about $400, became a staple of MTV, and pushed sales to 2.5 million copies, making it one of the top singles of the '80s. "Funky Cold Medina" (#3), also written by Young MC, followed, also from the debut LP.

It would be three years before the release of Tone-Lōc's next album, Cool Hand Lōc (#46 R&B, 1991), which proved a disappointment. In 1995 he was sentenced to anger-management sessions and 100 hours of community service for smashing the windows of a woman's car with a baseball bat in 1993.

Lōc, who had publicly expressed an easygoing, almost casual attitude toward his musical career, has since pursued a respectable acting career. He appeared in the films Posse, Poetic Justice, Ace Ventura: Pet Detective, and Heat, as well as in the TV series Roc and NewsRadio. He also does extensive voiceover work, having lent his voice to the animated feature film Bebe's Kids and to the children's series C-Bear and Jamal, which he also produced. Tone-Lōc still performs his hits.

Too Short

Born Todd Anthony Shaw, Apr. 28, 1966, Los Angeles, CA
 1987—Born to Mack (Dangerous Music) 1988—Life Is . . . Too Short (Jive) 1990—Short Dog's in the House 1992—Shorty the Pimp 1993—Get in Where You Fit In 1995—Cocktails 1996—Gettin' It (Album Number Ten) 1999—Can't Stay Away 2000—You Nasty.

Too Short put Oakland, California, on the hip-hop map with his slow, crude raps and proto-gangster image. The middle-class Todd Shaw re-created himself as a pimp, styled after characters in blaxploitation films and novels. Too Short, named as a youth for his then-short height, has built up a chart-topping pop career from the very bottom. He began rapping in the early '80s, when he sold homemade tapes on the streets of Oakland. His first three albums were released by the independent label 75 Girls.

After he never got paid for them, he set up his own label and production company in 1987. Along with Too Short, Dangerous Music has produced discs by Pooh Man, Spice 1, and Ant Banks. Too Short sold Born to Mack out of his trunk, generating enough attention to get signed by Jive; the album subsequently went gold.

Life Is . . . Too Short (#37, 1989) was released amid phony rumors that Too Short had died; despite little airplay, the album went platinum, as did its successor, Short Dog's in the House (#20, 1990). The latter featured "The Ghetto," a single based on the '70s Donny Hathaway hit "The Ghetto, Part One," as well as "Ain't Nothin' But a Word to Me," a duet with Ice Cube that answered critics who would censor use of the word "bitch" with a series of bleeps. Too Short became known more and more for his graphically violent and frequently misogynist raps. He developed his mack persona further on Shorty the Pimp (#6, 1992), which debuted at #6 on the pop albums chart. Get In Where You Fit In (#1 R&B, 1993) debuted even higher at #4. The followup, Cocktails (#6 pop, #1 R&B, 1995), continued Too Short's commercial success. Released the following year, Gettin' It (Album Number Ten) (#3 pop, #1 R&B) became Too Short's sixth album to go platinum. The record's title track featured members of Parliament/Funkadelic.

In 1997 Too Short turned his attention to the work of other rappers, founding Short Records and releasing Nationwide, a compilation featuring the work of little known MCs from around the U.S. Too Short also guested on a couple of Scarface's records and released a pair of his own singles, including "Call Me" (#90 pop, #30 R&B, 1997), a duet with rapper Lil' Kim that appeared in the movie Boozy Call Can't Stay Away (#5 pop, #1 R&B) and You Nasty followed in 1999 and 2000, respectively.

Tool

Formed 1991, Los Angeles, CA
 Maynard James Keenan (b. Apr. 17, 1964, Ravenna, OH), voc.; Adam Jones (b. Jan. 15, 1965, Chicago, IL), gr.; Danny Carey (b. May 10, 1961, MO), drums; Paul D'Amour (b. June 8, 1968, Spokane, WA), bass.
 1992—Opiate EP (Zoo) 1993—Undertow 1996—Aenima (Volcano) (- D'Amour; + Justin Chancellor [b. Justin Gunnar Walte Chancellor, Nov. 19, 1971, Eng.], bass) 2001—Lateralus.
 Maynard James Keenan with A Perfect Circle: 2000—Mer De Noms (Virgin).

Emerging in the early '90s, Tool bridged the gap between classic heavy metal and alternative rock, mixing grinding guitars, dark thundering rhythms, and challenging lyrics. The band never appeared in its own videos, which were typically intense and macabre, yet found a large mainstream following with its flair for harsh melody.

Maynard James Keenan was born the only child of a Baptist family near Akron, Ohio. He joined the army in 1982, after spending his youth in Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Texas. He eventually landed in L.A., where he met guitarist Adam Jones, a sculptor and film special-effects designer who had worked on Jurassic Park and Terminator 2. With bassist Paul D'Amour and drummer Danny Carey, they formed a band, originally called Toolshed.

Within a year Tool signed with Zoo Entertainment, and in 1992 released an EP, Opiate. That was followed a year later with Undertow (#50, 1993), which explored themes of inner turmoil with a sound that merged prog rock with punk energy. The album included the Modern Rock radio hits "Sober" and "Prison Sex," a song about child abuse. During the recording of Aenima (#2, 1996), D'Amour quit to form a new band, Lusk, and was replaced by Justin Chancellor.

Long periods between albums frequently led to breakup rumors, also fueled by the formation in 2000 of Keenan's band A Perfect Circle, which he refused to call a "side project," and which released Mer De Noms. Rumors were put to rest with the release of Lateralus in mid-2001.

Toots and the Maytals

Formed 1962, Kingston, Jam.

Frederick "Toots" Hibbert (b. 1946, Maypen, Jam.), lead voc.; Nathaniel "Jerry" Matthias (b. ca. 1945, Jam.), harmony voc.; Ralphus "Raleigh" Gordon (b. ca. 1945, Jam.), harmony voc. 1971—Monkey Man (Trojan) 1972—From the Roots 1973—Funky Kingston 1974—In the Dark 1975—Funky Kingston (Island) 1976—Reggae Got Soul 1978—The Maytals (State) 1979—The Best of Toots and the Maytals (Trojan); Pass the Pipe (Island) 1980—Just Like That 1981—Live! (-Matthias; -Gordon); Knock Out! (Mango) 1984—Reggae Greats: Toots and the Maytals 1988—Toots in Memphis 1996—Time Tough: The Anthology (Island) 1997—Recoup (Alla Son) 1998—Ska Father (Artists Only!) 2000—The Very Best of Toots & the Maytals (Island).

For over three decades, Toots Hibbert's exhortatory vocals and evangelistic stage delivery have charged Jamaican popular music with the fervor of American gospel-rooted soul singers like Otis Redding, Solomon Burke, and Wilson Pickett.

Toots Hibbert spent his first 15 years in a small town in the Jamaican countryside; he left home for Kingston in 1961 and formed a vocal trio with Nathaniel Matthias and Raleigh Gordon. Coxsome Dodd produced their first Jamaican hits—"Hallelujah" (1963) and "Six and Seven Books of Moses" (1963)—when they called themselves the Vikings. They left Dodd for Prince Buster in 1964 and recorded "Little Slea" as the V. Maytals before deciding to work as the Maytals. In the next two years they worked mainly with Byron Lee and his Ska-Kings band. With hits like "If You Act This Way" (1964) and "John and James" (1965), they became a leading group of the ska era.

In 1966 they won the Jamaican Song Festival prize with Hibbert's "Bam Bam." That same year Hibbert was jailed for possession of marijuana. After his release 12 months later, the Maytals recorded "54-43," commemorating his prison experience, for Leslie Kong's Beverley's label. Among the Maytals' other Beverley sides was "Do the Reggay" [sic], the 1968 song usually credited with coining the term "reggae."

By that time Kong was releasing Maytals singles in Britain. "Monkey Man" was the first Maytals song to chart overseas (#47 U.K., 1970) [it was covered in 1979 by the Specials on their debut album]. Following Kong's death in 1971, the Maytals worked with his former partner Warwick Lynn and established a following.

The 1972 release of The Harder They Come introduced the Maytals to the U.S.; the film's soundtrack featured "Sweet and Dandy" and "Pressure Drop." In 1975, now known as Toots and the Maytals, they signed their first major contract with Island Records. Island released Funky Kingston—a collection culled from Trojan's Funky Kingston and In the Dark—which contained the Maytals' unique interpretations of John Denver's "Country Roads," in which "West Virginia" became "West Jamaica." Also in 1975 Toots and the Maytals made their first tour of the U.S., opening shows for the Who. The tour was badly planned, and the Maytals were booed off the stage at many dates. While they remained critical favorites, the Maytals could never match Bob Marley's or Peter Tosh's popularity.

Toots went solo in 1982, although he continued to tour as Toots and the Maytals. In 1988 at Memphis's Ardent recording studio he was accompanied by Sly and Robbie and producer Jim Dickinson (Alex Chilton, Replacements) and recorded a set of Stax/Volt covers, Toots in Memphis. In the late '90s, Toots recorded two new studio albums, Recoup and Ska Father.

The Tornadoes

Formed 1962, London, Eng.

George Bellamy (b. Oct. 8, 1941, Sunderland, Eng.), gr.; Heinz Burt (b. July 24, 1942, Hargis, Ger.; d. Apr. 7, 2000), gr.; Alan Caddy (b. Feb. 2, 1940, London), gr., violin; Clem Cattini (b. Aug. 28, 1939, London), drums; Roger Lavern (b. Roger Jackson, Nov. 11, 1938, Kidderminster, Eng.), kybds. 1963—Telstar (London).

The Tornadoes were assembled by British producer/songwriter/entrepreneur Joe Meek in 1962 to back up vocalists who would sing his songs. After working with small-time singers John Leyton and Don Charles, the Tornadoes were hooked up with English teen idol Billy Fury. Later in the year, Meek inspired by developments in the space program, composed an instrumental for the Tornadoes to record, "Telstar."

(the name of the first U.S. communications satellite) became a #1 hit single and eventually sold over 5 million copies around the world. The group had just one other minor success, 1963's "Ride the Wind." They soon broke up. On February 3, 1967, Meek committed suicide. Of the original Tomadoes, George Bellamy and Heinz Burt pursued solo careers; Bellamy later started his own label. Only Clem Cattini, a studio drummer, remains active as a performer.

Tortoise

Formed in 1990, Chicago, IL

Doug McCombs (b. Jan. 9, 1962, Peoria, IL), bass; John Herndon (b. Apr. 8, 1966, Long Island, NY), drums, kybds., vibes; John McEntire (b. Apr. 9, 1970, Portland, OR), drums, vibes; Bundy K. Brown, gtr.; Dan Bitney (b. Oct. 7, 1964, Madison, WI), perc.

1994—Tortoise (Thrill Jockey) 1995—Rhythms, Resolutions & Clusters 1996—Millions Now Living Will Never Die (- Brown, + David Pajo [b. 1970, TX], bass) A Digest Compendium of the Tortoise's World; Remixed 1998—TNT (- Pajo, + Jeff Parker [b. Apr. 4, 1967, Bridgeport, CT], gtr.) 2001—Standards.

Tortoise is an inventive Chicago collective committed to instrumental music rooted in a broad palette of influences. European electronica, dub, modern jazz, Kraut-rock, minimalism, '70s progressive rock, and hip-hop scratching. The result is a sound both atmospheric and challenging, at the forefront of a small experimental movement for which critics provided an oblique name: postrock. The group was founded by bassist Doug McCombs (Eleventh Dream Day) and drummer John Herndon (Poster Children) to explore music that emphasized percussion and bass rhythms over words and guitar solos. They soon drafted other veterans from Chicago's indie rock community: John McEntire (Shrimp Boat, The Sea and Cake), percussionist Dan Bitney, and guitarist Bundy K. Brown.

Calling themselves Tortoise, the band recorded and released several singles in 1993, followed by the self-titled debut album in 1994. Tortoise then recruited indie musicians/producers Steve Albini, Jim O'Rourke, and Brad Wood to remix the tracks for Rhythms, Resolutions & Clusters. Live shows were improvisational blends of percussion, guitar, bass, vibes, synthesizers, and samplers, with players constantly swapping instruments mid-song onstage. After another single, 1995's "Gamera," Brown left for other band projects. Bassist David Pajo (Slint) joined in time for 1996's Millions Now Living Will Never Die, which included the epic-length track "Djed." For 1998's TNT, Tortoise introduced strings and horns for the first time. After Pajo's departure, Tortoise was joined by avant-garde guitarist Jeff Parker, a member of Chicago's Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians. In 2001 Tortoise released Standards.

Peter Tosh

Born Winston Hubert MacIntosh, Oct. 9, 1944, Westmoreland, Jam.; died Sep. 11, 1987, Barbican, St. Andrew, Jam.

1976—Legalize It (Columbia) 1977—Equal Rights 1978—Bush Doctor (Rolling Stones) 1979—Mystic Man 1981—Wanted Dread and Alive 1983—Mama Africa (EMI) 1984—Captured Live 1987—No Nuclear War 1988—The Toughest (Capitol) 1996—The Best of Peter Tosh: Dread Don't Die (EMI) 1997—Honorary Citizen (Sony) 1999—Scrolls of the Prophet: The Best of Peter Tosh.

Peter Tosh first became known (in Jamaica in the early '60s and in Europe and America in the early '70s) as the baritone vocalist of the Wailers. Through his years with the Wailers, however, he also maintained a solo career. From 1964 to 1967 he released numerous singles on Coxsone Dodd's Studio One and Coxsone labels, variously calling himself Peter Macking, Peter MacIntosh, Peter Tosh or—most often—Peter Touch. Among his solo recordings (which often featured Wailers Bob Marley and Bunny Livingston as backup singers) were early versions of "I'm the Toughest" and "400 Years," songs he was later to popularize beyond Jamaica.

Some 1969 sessions with Leslie Kong resulted in British releases on the Bullet and Unity labels, and in 1971 and 1972, recordings cut with Joe Gibbs were released in the U.K. on the Bullet, Punch, and Pressure Beat labels. In 1971 Tosh founded his own Jamaican label, Intel-Diplo H.I.M., on which he began issuing self-produced singles.

After leaving the Wailers in 1973 (complaining that because Marley attracted an undue share of attention overseas, he was relegated to the background), he recorded primarily in Jamaica for Intel-Diplo H.I.M. Tosh shrewdly leased his recordings to foreign companies for world distribution. Columbia got U.S. rights to Legalize It, on which Tosh proselytized for the many uses of marijuana, and Equal Rights, which contained his perennially popular "Stepping Razor."

In 1978 Mick Jagger and Keith Richards signed Tosh to Rolling Stones Records and sat in on Bush Doctor, which featured the Temptations' "Don't Look Back" performed as a duet by Tosh and Jagger (#81). Tosh and his Word, Sound and Power band toured America with the Stones that year, and Jagger joined on his Saturday Night Live appearance. He returned to the U.S. regularly. Mama Africa included a reggae remake of Chuck Berry's "Johnny B. Goode" (#84, 1983).

Tosh had a history of confrontation with the law. He was jailed for possession of marijuana in the mid-'60s. In 1978, performing for a Kingston crowd of 30,000 that included the Jamaican prime minister, he smoked a "spliff" onstage and berated the prime minister for 30 minutes for not legalizing "ganja." Later that year he was arrested in his studio, taken to a police station, and beaten nearly to death before he was released.

Tosh remained an outspoken figure on the reggae scene. In mid-1987 he released the antiwar album No Nuclear War. On September 11, three men armed with 9 mm pistols came to his home and murdered Tosh, local DJ Jeff Dixon, and Tosh's cook "Doc" Brown. Four others, including Tosh's girlfriend, were injured. The motive was officially cited as robbery, but speculation arose that political or personal enmities were involved. Although Dennis Lobban, a street vendor, was arrested and convicted of the murders in 1988, accusations that Tosh was executed refused to die out. A 1993 documentary, Stepping Razor—Red X (the "red X" a reference to the mark Tosh claimed was placed after his name on government documents), dramatized these charges.

Toto

Formed 1978, Los Angeles, CA

David Paich (b. June 21, 1954, Los Angeles), kybds., voc.; Steve Lukather (b. Oct. 21, 1957, Los Angeles), gtr., voc.; Bobby Kimball (b. Mar. 29, 1947, Vinton, LA), voc.; Steve Porcaro (b. Sep. 2, 1957, CT), kybds.; David Hungate (b. TX), bass; Jeff Porcaro (b. Apr. 1, 1954, Hartford, CT; d. Aug. 5, 1992, Holden Hills, CA), drums.
 1978—Toto (Columbia) 1979—Hydra 1981—Turn Back 1982—Toto IV 1984—(– Hungate; + Mike Porcaro [b. May 29, 1955, CT], bass); (– Kimball; + Denis "Fergie" Frederiksen [b. May 15, 1951, Wyoming, MI], voc.) Isolation; Dune soundtrack (Polydor) 1986—(– Frederiksen; + Joseph Williams, voc.) Fahrenheit (Columbia); The Seventh One 1988—(– Williams; – S. Porcaro) 1990—(+ Jean-Michel Byron [b. S. Afr.], voc.) Past to Present 1977–1990 (– Byron) 1992—(– J. Porcaro) 1993—Kingdom of Desire (Relativity) (+ Simon Phillips, drums) 1996—Tambu (Sony Legacy) 1998—Toto XX: 1977–1997 1999—(+ Kimball) Mindfields; Livefields.

A studio band assembled by experienced sessionmen, Toto purvey a smooth, glossy rock sound that netted them several hit singles and best-selling LPs. The group's debut album and the self-produced Toto IV were its biggest sellers.

Most of the band members had met around 1972 at Grant High School in Southern California, and they kept meeting on sessions for albums by Steely Dan, Cheap Trick, Pink Floyd, Earth, Wind & Fire, and others. In 1976 Jeff Porcaro, David Hungate, and David Paich performed on Boz Scaggs's Silk Degrees LP, for which Paich wrote several songs, including "Lowdown" and "Lido Shuffle."

Toto's debut album sold over 2 million copies by 1979, during which year the band also had a #5 single, "Hold the Line." Both Hydra (#37, 1979) and Turn Back (#41, 1981) sold moderately, but the big breakthrough came with Toto IV, which won the Album of the Year Grammy, sold over 3 million copies, and spun off the group's biggest hits: "Rosanna" (#2, 1982) (written for actress Rosanna Arquette) and "Africa" (#1, 1982), as well as "I Won't Hold You Back" (#10, 1983). The album also earned five additional Grammys, including Record of the Year for "Rosanna."

Subsequent albums did not fare nearly as well; only Isolation and Fahrenheit cracked the Top 50. Critics derided the group's smooth professionalism, and throughout their years with Toto, group members continued to contribute to others artists' work as studio hands, producers, and writers. They cowrote the Tubes' 1982 Top 40 hit "Talk to You Later." Steve Porcaro cowrote Michael Jackson's "Human Nature." Jeff Porcaro's last studio gigs included drumming on Bruce Springsteen's Human Touch. Jeff Porcaro died in 1992 of a heart attack; initial reports stated that it was prompted by an allergic reaction to garden pesticides, but the coroner determined that cocaine use was a contributing factor. Although not released until after Jeff Porcaro's death, Kingdom of Desire was the last Toto album on which he performed. Singer Bobby Kimball, who had left Toto in the mid-'80s, rejoined the group at the end of the '90s.

Allen Toussaint

Born Jan. 14, 1938, New Orleans, LA

1958—The Wild Sounds of New Orleans by Tossan (RCA) 1971—Toussaint (Tiffany) 1972—Love, Life and Faith (Reprise) 1975—Southern Nights 1978—Motion (Warner Bros.) 1991—The Allen Toussaint Collection (Reprise) 1996—Connected (NYNCO).

Singer/pianist/songwriter/arranger/producer Allen Toussaint was as important to the music of New Orleans in the '60s as Dave Bartholomew had been in the '50s. In the '70s, musicians from the rest of the U.S. and abroad came to his city to record with him.

He began playing piano, emulating Professor Longhair, while in grade school. He made his professional debut with the Flamingos when he was in his early teens. In the mid-'50s he began working as a studio keyboardist for Dave Bartholomew (he played piano on some Fats Domino sessions) and with Shirley and Lee. In 1958 he recorded his first solo album, calling himself Tossan. One of his first compositions, "Java," was a hit for Al Hirt in 1964.

When Minit Records was founded in 1960, Toussaint became the label's house songwriter, arranger, and producer for songs like Jessie Hill's "Ooh Poo Pah Doo," Ernie K-Doe's "Mother-in-Law," Chris Kenner's "I Like It Like That," Lee Dorsey's "Ya Ya," Barbara George's "I Know," and records for Aaron Neville, Irma Thomas, Clarence "Frogman" Henry, and Benny Spellman. Toussaint established himself as a hit-maker with the definitive New Orleans sound of the '60s—jaunty dance music characterized by a dialogue of rolling piano licks and horn riffs. His regular studio band included tenor saxophonist Nat Perrilliat, baritone saxophonist Clarence Ford, guitarist Roy Montrell, bassist Peter "Chuck" Badie, and drummers John Boudreaux and James Black.

After producing records for the Instant, Fury, and AFO labels, in 1963 Toussaint went into the army. Even as a serviceman he remained a musician, forming the Stokes to record "Whipped Cream" for Instant; the song became a hit for Herb Alpert and the Tijuana Brass. Discharged from the army in 1965, Toussaint returned to Minit, but the label was sold to Liberty later that year. He and another New Orleans producer, Marshall Sehorn, then founded Sansu Enterprises, which included Marsaint Music Publishers and the Sansu, Amy, and Deesu labels.

In the second half of the '60s, Toussaint wrote and produced hits for Lee Dorsey, Maurice Williams, Ernie K-Doe, Wilbert Harrison, and Sansu's studio band, the Meters. After Sansu opened Sea-Saint Studios in 1972, artists such as Paul Simon, Paul McCartney and Wings, Sandy Denny, and the Mighty Diamonds recorded there; Toussaint produced sessions by Dr. John, Labelle (including their 1975 bestseller, "Lady Marmalade"), Badger, John Mayall, and Joe Cocker. He was also responsible for the horn arrangements on the Band's 1972 live album, Rock of Ages, and the period music for the 1978 soundtrack to Louis Malle's Pretty Baby.

Toussaint records his own albums and appears live only occasionally, but his songs have been covered by the Rolling Stones ("Fortune Teller"), Herman's Hermits ("A Certain Girl"), Betty Wright ("Shoorah, Shoorah"), Three Dog Night ("Brickyard Blues"), Frankie Miller ("High Life"), Glen Campbell ("Southern Nights"), the Yardbirds, the Pointer Sisters ("Yes We Can Can"), Maria Muldaur, Little Feat, Boz Scaggs, Bonnie Raitt, Robert Palmer, Ringo Starr, and Warren Zevon. He has also guested on other artists' albums, among them Elvis Costello's Spike. He wrote the music for the mid-'80s musical Stagger Lee. In 1993 and 1994 Toussaint appeared with a number of other singer-songwriters in a touring show called In Their Own Words. In 1996 he cofounded NYNO Records and released his first new album in nearly two decades. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1998.

1971—East Bay Grease (San Francisco) 1972—Bump City (Warner Bros.) 1973—Tower of Power 1974—Back to Oakland 1975—Urban Renewal; In the Slot 1976—Live and in Living Color; Ain't Nothin' Stoppin' Us Now (Columbia) 1978—We Came to Play 1979—Back on the Streets 1981—Direct (Sheffield Labs) 1987—Power (Cypress) 1991—Monster on a Leash (Epic/Sony) 1993—TOP 1995—Souled Out 1997—Rhythm and Business 1999—What Is Hip?: Tower of Power Anthology (Rhino).

This integrated Oakland-based R&B band reached its commercial peak between 1972 and 1975, when Lenny Williams sang lead on its hits "So Very Hard to Go" (#17 pop, #11 R&B, 1973) and "Don't Change Horses (in the Middle of a Stream)" (#26 pop, #22 R&B, 1974).

Emerging from the early-'70s Bay Area club scene, the band made its recording debut with East Bay Grease on Bill

Graham's San Francisco Records in 1971. The next year, signed to Warner Bros., Tower of Power scored with "You're Still a Young Man" (#29 pop, #24 R&B, 1974), with Rick Stevens as lead vocalist. Williams joined the band for its third album, and continued singing on Back to Oakland and Urban Renewal. During this period, the band had hits with "So Very Hard to Go" and "What Is Hip?" (#91 pop, #31 R&B). Williams left to sign with ABC as a solo artist; his R&B hits include "Choosing You" (#62) and "Shoo Doo Fu Fu Ooh!" (#31), both 1977. Hubert Tubbs succeeded him and sang lead on "You Ought to Be Having Fun" (#68 pop, #62 R&B) in 1976, when Tower was signed to Columbia.

Throughout the '70s, the Tower of Power's ultraprecise horn section worked as studio musicians on countless other acts' recordings. Among them were Elton John, Elvin Bishop, Santana, and José Feliciano. In 1983 Lenny Pickett was heard in avant-garde music concerts in New York (he now plays with the Saturday Night Live band), and keyboardist Chester Thompson joined Santana. The group—whose core membership of founder Emilio Castillo, Steve Kupka, and Rocco Prestia has remained intact through the years—then slid into a difficult period, as members dealt with substance-abuse problems and other pressures. They recorded the direct-to-CD Sheffield Labs album Direct and another Power, an album that was privately financed and originally released only in Denmark. The group did not disband officially but didn't really begin to come back until after the horn section toured with Huey Lewis and the News during the mid-'80s. (The Tower of Power horns appear on Lewis' Picture This and Fore!) Soon the rest of the group was traveling, too, joining the horns for Tower of Power midnight shows that occurred after Lewis' gigs.

Although Tower of Power's more recent releases have not been hits, its live shows still draw rave reviews. The horn section often sits in with Paul Shaffer's band on The Late Show With David Letterman, and its latest studio credits include Phish's Hoist (1994), Victoria Williams' Loose (1994), and Ray Charles' Strong Love Affair (1997).

Pete Townshend: See the Who

The Toys

Formed early '60s, Jamaica, NY

June Montiero (b. July 1, 1946, Queens, NY), voc.; Barbara Harris (b. Aug. 18, 1945, Elizabeth, NJ), voc.; Barbara Parritt (b. Oct. 1, 1944, Wilmington, NC), voc.
1966—The Toys Sing "A Lover's Concerto" and "Attack!" (DynaVoice).

The Toys were an R&B girl group whose big hit was "A Lover's Concerto," a refashioning of a Bach piece (#2, 1965). The three members met as teenagers at Woodrow Wilson High School in Queens, New York, and continued to sing after their graduation. In 1964 they were signed by the publishing firm Genius Inc., who teamed them with the songwriting duo Sandy Linzer and Denny Rendell. Their big single went #4 R&B, crossed over to pop, and also became a #5 hit in England. During 1965 the song sold over a million copies. The Toys appeared on television rock shows like Shindig!, and toured with Gene Pitney. They also appeared in the film The Girl in Daddy's Bikini. They had a less successful hit in 1966 with "Attack" (#18). By the next year they were gone from the charts but continued to do session work separately.

Traffic

Formed 1967, England

Steve Winwood (b. May 12, 1948, Birmingham, Eng.), voc., kybds., gtr.; Chris Wood (b. June 24, 1944, Birmingham; d. July 12, 1983, London, Eng.), sax, flute; Dave Mason (b. May 10, 1947, Worcester, Eng.), gtr., voc.; Jim Capaldi (b. Aug. 24, 1944, Evesham, Eng.), drums, voc.
 1967—Mr. Fantasy (United Artists) (– Mason; + Mason)
 1968—Traffic (– Mason) 1969—Last Exit 1970—John Barleycorn Must Die (+ Rick Grech [b. Nov. 1, 1946; d. Mar. 17, 1990, Eng.], bass) 1971—(+ Jim Gordon, drums; + Reebop Kwaku Baah [b. 1944, Lagos, Nigeria; d. 1981], perc.; + D. Mason) Welcome to the Canteen (– Mason) The Low Spark of High-Heeled Boys (Island) (– Grech; – Gordon; + Roger Hawkins, drums; + David Hood, bass) 1973—Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory 1974—Traffic on the Road (Hawkins; – Hood; + Rosco Gee, bass) When the Eagle Flies (group disbands) 1975—Heavy Traffic (United Artists); More Heavy Traffic 1991—Smiling Phases (Island) 1994—(group re-forms: Winwood; Capaldi) Far From Home (Virgin).

The original Traffic had two phases. At first it was a winsomely psychedelic pop band that blended blues, folk, rock, and R&B and was fronted by Steve Winwood [see entry] and Dave Mason. This group recorded such FM-radio favorites as "Paper Sun" and "You Can All Join In." After Mason left, the band became Steve Winwood's vehicle for longer, moodier excursions that leaned closer to jazz and soul. This group was responsible for "Glad," "Freedom Rider," "Empty Pages," and "Rock & Roll Stew." Traffic was popular in both incarnations.

When the band formed in 1967, Steve Winwood was its best-known member because of his lead vocals with the Spencer Davis Group [see entry]. Winwood left that band to found Traffic. He and his friends Chris Wood, Jim Capaldi, and Dave Mason wrote and rehearsed in a cottage in the English countryside. Traffic's debut LP, Mr. Fantasy, contained two British hits, "Paper Sun" and "Hole in My Shoe." But conflicts between Mason's pop style and Winwood's jazz ambitions flared up and in late 1967 Mason split, first joining up with Delaney and Bonnie Bramlett before pursuing a solo career. A 1968 film called Here We Go Round the Mulberry Bush contained some of Traffic's music, and the theme song was a minor hit.

Despite differences with Winwood, Mason helped cut Traffic, contributing the oft-covered "Feelin' Alright." But by 1968 he had left again. It looked like Traffic was finished in 1969, when Winwood joined Blind Faith [see entry] with Eric Clapton, Ginger Baker, and Rick Grech. However, Blind Faith proved short-lived, and after a stint in Ginger Baker's Air Force in 1970 Winwood began recording his first solo album, the working title of which was Mad Shadows. Capaldi and Wood sat in on some sessions, and the LP became Traffic's fifth and most commercially successful album, John Barleycorn Must Die (#5, 1970), a gold album and a staple of "progressive" FM radio. The group then added Grech. The next year, before recording Welcome to the Canteen, Reebop Kwaku Baah was added on percussion. In addition, that live album featured Jim Gordon augmenting Capaldi on drums and a guest appearance by Mason. Despite the success of the gold album The Low Spark of High-Heeled Boys (#7, 1971), Gordon and Grech departed.

Winwood was then stricken with peritonitis, and so the band was temporarily sidelined. Capaldi cut a solo album (Oh! How We Danced) in Muscle Shoals, Alabama, and in the process he recruited session players bassist David Hood and drummer Roger Hawkins into the band. They appeared on Shoot Out at the Fantasy Factory (#6, 1973) and with another Muscle Shoals musician, keyboardist Barry Beckett, on the live Traffic on the Road (#29, 1973). By the sessions for When the Eagle Flies (#9, 1974), only the original trio of Winwood, Wood, and Capaldi plus bassist Rosco Gee were left. After that album's release, Winwood and Capaldi started their solo careers in earnest. Gee and Kwaku Baah joined Can [see entry]. Wood died in 1983 in his London apartment after a long illness. Grech died seven years later of kidney and liver failure precipitated by a hemorrhage. Kwaku Baah died of a brain hemorrhage.

Winwood enjoyed the most successful solo career of any of his former band mates. In 1994 he and Capaldi joined forces for what was termed a Traffic reunion (Gee performed in the touring band), and under the group name released the critically well received Far From Home (#33, 1994). Shortly thereafter, they returned to their solo endeavors.

The Trammpp

Formed mid-'60s, Philadelphia, PA

Lineup ca. early '80s: Earl Young, drums, bass voc.; Jimmy Ellis, lead tenor voc.; Robert Upchurch, baritone voc.; Stanley Wade, bass, tenor voc.; Harold Wade, gtr., tenor voc.
 1975—Trammpp (Golden Fleece); The Legendary Zing Album (Buddah) 1976—Where the Happy People Go (Atlantic); Disco Inferno 1977—The Trammpp III 1978—The Best of the Trammpp 1979—The Whole World's Dancing 1980—Slipping Out 1994—This Is Where the Happy People Go: The Best of the Trammpp (Rhino).

While the Trammpp had their first recording success in 1965 with "Storm Warning," when they were known as the Volcanoes, it was not until a 1975 contract with Atlantic Records, several personnel changes, and the rise of disco that they became a celebrated recording and touring act. Their peak popularity came through the inclusion of their blazing rendition of "Disco Inferno" on the Saturday Night Fever soundtrack in 1977.

Basing their vocal style on that of the Coasters (a lead-and-bass vocal combination), the Trammmps' earliest success under that name came on the Buddah label with a rendition of "Zing Went the Strings of My Heart" (#17 R&B), featuring Earl Young's bass vocal. Young, a top Philadelphia International session musician and co-owner of the Philadelphia publishing and production company Golden Fleece (with producers Norman Harris and Ronnie Baker) brought the Trammmps to that label after their Buddah contract expired. Their association with Golden Fleece yielded an early disco hit, "Love Epidemic" (#75 R&B), in 1973. In 1975 they signed on with Atlantic Records and had the first of a string of hits with the uptempo love plea "Hooked for Life" (#70 R&B), followed by "Hold Back the Night" (#35 pop, #10 R&B, 1975), "That's Where the Happy People Go" (#27 pop, #12 R&B, 1976), and "Disco Inferno" (#11 pop, #9 R&B, 1977). That proved to be their last major hit, and as the disco phase drew to a close, the Trammmps faded from sight. In the '90s, a version of the group began touring again.

The Traveling Wilburys

Formed 1988, Los Angeles, CA

Nelson (later Spike) Wilbury (b. George Harrison, Feb. 25, 1943, Liverpool, Eng.), gtr., voc.; Lucky (later Boo) Wilbury (a.k.a. Bob Dylan, b. Robert Allen Zimmerman, May 24, 1941, Duluth, MN), gtr., voc.; Otis (later Clayton) Wilbury (b. Jeff Lynne, Dec. 30, 1947, Birmingham, Eng.), gtr., voc., bass; Charlie T. (later Muddy) Wilbury Jr. (b. Tom Petty, Oct. 20, 1952, Gainesville, FL), gtr., voc.; Lefty Wilbury (b. Roy Orbison, Apr. 23, 1936, Vernon, TX; d. Dec. 6, 1988, Hendersonville, TN), gtr., voc.; Jim Keltner, drums.

1988—Traveling Wilburys, vol. 1 (Wilbury) (—Orbison) 1990—Vol. 3.

With a lineup that included major figures from four decades of rock history, including three indisputable gods (Dylan, Harrison, and Orbison), the Traveling Wilburys were by definition the ultimate supergroup. But their casual good humor and easy rocking style—not to mention their "posing" as a group of brothers—made them the antithesis of a supergroup.

The Traveling Wilburys' roots go back only as far as 1988 or so, when Harrison was setting to work on his next solo album with producer/Beatles fan Jeff Lynne. By chance they happened to find rehearsal space in Bob Dylan's garage, and a series of casual jams with the garage owner, Tom Petty, and Roy Orbison resulted in the new group. Their debut album was a double-platinum smash, going to #3 in late 1988 less on the strength of the minor hit single, "Handle With Care" (#45, 1988), than public interest in the principals. Orbison died suddenly of a heart attack less than one month after Traveling Wilburys, vol. 1 hit the chart. He was not replaced in the lineup. The group's second album, the playfully titled Vol. 3 (#11, 1990), was another platinum effort, despite having no hit singles.

Randy Travis

Born Randy Bruce Traywick, May 4, 1959, Marshville, NC
1982—Randy Ray Live at the Nashville Palace (Paula) 1986—Storms of Life (Warner Bros.) 1987—Always and Forever 1988—Old 8x10 1989—An Old Time Christmas; No Holdin' Back 1990—Heroes & Friends 1991—High Lonesome 1992—Greatest Hits, vol. 1; Greatest Hits, vol. 2 1993—Wind in the Wire 1994—This Is Me 1996—Full Circle 1998—You and You Alone (DreamWorks) 1999—A Man Ain't Made of Stone.

With his warm baritone and neotraditional style, Randy Travis dominated country music in the late '80s. In the wake of George Strait, Reba McEntire, and Ricky Skaggs, he found a ready audience for music that eschewed the crossover attempts of '70s country in favor of an approach that recalled Travis' own influences, Hank Williams, Lefty Frizzell, and Ernest Tubbs.

Encouraged by his father, a construction company owner, farmer, and sometime musician who hoped his sons would become the next Everly Brothers, Randy Traywick began performing publicly with his brother Ricky at around age 10. Randy's turbulent adolescence—drinking, drugs, and 100-m.p.h. car chases with the police—however, soon sidetracked him.

Lib Hatcher, owner of a Charlotte, North Carolina, country music club, intervened with a judge in one of Randy's court battles; granted custody of the 17-year-old, she began managing him (the two married in 1991). Moving to Nashville in the early '80s, they worked in a nightclub, Hatcher as manager, Traywick as dishwasher, cook, and occasional singer. On the tiny independent Paula Records, as Randy Ray, he released two singles, then recorded the 1982 low-budget album Randy Ray Live at the Nashville Palace, which he sold at gigs.

In 1985 the singer finally inked a deal with Warner Bros., changing his name to Randy Travis, after contributing the song "Prairie Rose" to the soundtrack for Rustler's Rhapsody. He had also released a single, "On the Other Hand," that had reached #67 on the country chart (in rerelease it hit #1 in 1986).

With Storms of Life Travis became the first country performer to sell a million copies of his major-label debut within a year of its release. Joining the Grand Ole Opry and winning a Country Music Association Horizon Award, Travis embarked upon a remarkable run that saw him gain seven #1 country hits in a row (1987's "Forever and Ever, Amen," "I Won't Need You Anymore [Always and Forever]," and "Too Gone Too Long"; 1988's "I Told You So," "Honky Tonk Moon," and "Deeper Than the Holler"; 1989's "Is It Still Over?").

Travis, named Male Vocalist of the Year by the Country Music Association in 1987 and 1988, was at the height of his career (he also won Grammy Awards for Best Male Country Vocal Performance both those years). In 1989 he sustained injuries in a serious car crash but came back with two #1s, "It's Just a Matter of Time" and "Hard Rock Bottom of Your Heart." Heroes & Friends included duets with George Jones, Tammy Wynette, B.B. King, and Roy Rogers, among others. High Lonesome sold dependably, but at the start of the '90s Travis' hegemony was challenged by up-and-coming "hat acts" such as Garth Brooks and Clint Black, neotraditionalists whose style Travis had helped to pioneer.

Meanwhile, Travis had branched out into acting, since the '80s he has landed roles in numerous TV episodes and movies, including Steven Seagal's Fire Down Below and Francis Ford Coppola's The Rainmaker. In 1998 Travis signed with the Nashville division of DreamWorks Records to release You and You Alone (#49 pop, #7 C&W). The album yielded three Top 10 country singles including "Spirit of a Boy—Wisdom of a Man," which almost cracked the pop Top 40, stalling at #42.

The Tremeloes

Formed 1959, Dagenham, Eng.

Brian Poole (b. Nov. 3, 1941, Barking, Eng.), voc.; Alan Blakely (b. Apr. 1, 1942; d. June 1, 1996, Bromley, Eng.), rhythm gtr.; Alan Howard, bass; Dave Munden (b. Nov. 2, 1943), drums; Rick Westwood (b. May 7, 1943), lead gtr.

1966—(- Poole; - Howard; + Len "Chip" Hawkes [b. Nov. 2, 1946], bass) 1967—Here Comes My Baby (Columbia); Even the Bad Times Are Good; Suddenly You Love Me 1968—58/68 World Explosion 1974—Shiner (DMJ) 1992—The Best of the Tremeloes (Rhino).

The Tremeloes began their career as the backup band for British vocalist Brian Poole, and with him had a number of U.K. hit records in 1963 and 1964, including the #1 single "Do You Love Me." When Poole left them in 1966, they brought in Len Hawkes and proceeded to eclipse their former frontman with a trio of British Top 5 hit records: "Silence Is Golden," "Even the Bad Times Are Good," and "Here Comes My Baby," all in 1967. All except the second hit the U.S. Top 20 as well. Even when the hits stopped, the Tremeloes remained a viable nightclub attraction, and they continue to this day, though a car accident forced Hawkes to quit in 1974, and Blakely left on his own the following year. The Tremeloes (with drummer Dave Munden and guitarist Rick Westwood intact) and Poole's solo act are familiar sights on the nostalgia circuit.

T. Rex/Tyrannosaurus Rex/Marc Bolan

Formed 1967, England

Marc Bolan (b. Mark Feld, Sep. 30, 1948, London, Eng.; d. Sep. 16, 1977, London); Steve Peregrin Took (b. Stephen Ross Porter, July 28, 1949; d. Oct. 27, 1980, London).

1968—My People Were Fair and Had Sky in Their Hair But Now They're Content to Wear Stars on Their Brows (Regal/Zonophone, U.K.); Prophets, Seers and Sages, The Angels of the Ages 1969—(- Took; + Mickey Finn [b. June 3, 1947], gtr., perc.) Unicorn (Blue Thumb) 1970—Beard of Stars (Regal/Zonophone, U.K.); T. Rex (Reprise) 1971—Electric Warrior 1972—The Slider; Tyrannosaurus Rex (A Beginning) (A&M) 1973—Tanx 1974—Zinc Alloy and the Hidden Riders of Tomorrow 1975—Zip Gun Boogie (EMI, U.K.) 1976—Futuristic Dragon 1977—Dandy in the Underworld 1998—T. Rex Unchained: Unreleased Recordings, vols. 1–8 (Mercury).

With his Botticelli face and curls and whimsically glamorous image, Marc Bolan fronted T. Rex, a British group that generated a fan hysteria reminiscent of Beatlemania and produced 11 successive U.K. Top 10 hits between 1970 and 1974. Among these were "Bang a Gong (Get it On)" (#1, "Jeepster" (#2), and "Telegram Sam" (#1). But while T. Rex could not hardly duplicate its British success in America (where its sole major hit was the Top 10 smash "Bang a Gong"), the group's heavy guitar sound has had an enduring influence and can be heard in songs such as Love and Rockets' "I'm Alive" and groups like the Soup Dragons.

T. Rex had its beginnings when the group—known as Tyrannosaurus Rex until the 1970 success of "Ride a White Swan"—was formed by Bolan in 1967 with Steve Peregrin (often misspelled Peregrine). Took, a well-known scenemaking Mod in the early '60s, Bolan released two singles in the mid-'60s on Decca—"Hippy Gumbo" and "The Wizard"—which failed to establish him as a solo artist. But with the group John's Children, Bolan enjoyed two minor U.K. hits in 1967—"Desdemona" and "Go Go Girl." One year later, Tyrannosaurus Rex recorded its debut album (produced by Tony Visconti), which blended acoustic textures with such instruments as the Chinese gong and talking drums and accented Bolan's lyrics—a blend of myth, fantasy, and magic (others might say utter nonsense). As a British flower-power band, Tyrannosaurus Rex earned a sizable underground following and toured the U.S. in 1969.

The band began to achieve widespread success by embracing a full-blown rock attack on albums like Electric Warrior (#32, 1971) (which, like many of the group's hits, included backing vocals by Flo and Eddie). The group's highest-charting U.S. release was The Slider (#17, 1972). During the height of T. Rex mania in 1973, Ringo Starr directed a documentary on the group's success, Born to Boogie Bolan and the group were at the forefront of the glitter movement, which was far more influential and lasting in their homeland than in the U.S. T. Rex's popularity declined shortly thereafter, and Bolan declared the group extinct in 1975, leaving his wife and exiling himself to America. He returned to England in 1976 and began living with American singer Gloria Jones. Respected by followers of the then burgeoning new-wave scene, Bolan brought the Damned on tour with his newly re-formed T. Rex in 1977 as a support act.

T. Rex: Mickey Finn and Marc Bolan

But his solo career never took off in the U.S., partly because of his haphazard personal life. "I was living in a twilight world of drugs, booze, and kinky sex," he told ROLLING STONE. Bolan died in a crash on September 16, 1977, in a car driven by Jones. In 1980 Steve Took died from choking on a cherry while high on morphine. In 2001 Mickey Finn toured with his own "T-Rex."

Formed 1988, Queens, NY

Ali (b. Ali Shaheed Muhammad, Aug. 11, 1970, Brooklyn, NY), DJ; Phife (b. Malik Taylor, Apr. 10, 1970, Brooklyn, voc.); Q-Tip (b. Jonathan Davis, Nov. 20, 1970, New York, NY), voc.; Jarobi, voc.

1990—People's Instinctive Travels and the Paths of Rhythm (Jive) (—Jarobi) 1991—The Low End Theory 1993—Midnight Marauders 1996—Beats, Rhymes and Life 1998—The Love Movement 1999—The Anthology. Q-Tip solo: 1999—Amplified (Arista).

Following the lead of De La Soul, their friends and comrades in the "Native Tongues" rap collective, A Tribe Called Quest blazed alternative rap trails with a laid-back, witty, progressive style that paved the way for the "jazz rap" of Digable Planets, Jungle Brothers, and Us3.

Q-Tip, Phife, Ali, and Jarobi met at New York City's Murray Bergtraum High School for Business Careers. Q-Tip's association with De La Soul [see entry] and the Jungle Brothers and a four-song demo led to a 1989 deal with Jive Records. The singles "Description of a Fool" (1989) and "I Left My Wallet in El Segundo" (1990) were followed by their debut album, People's Instinctive Travels (#91, 1990), the first rap work to fuse jazz samples with hip-hop structures. A followup, The Low End Theory (#45, 1991), had a harder edge and extended the group's jazz leanings, featuring jazz great Ron Carter on upright bass. Low End's "Scenano" was a minor hit (#57, 1991).

In between their albums, Tribe appeared on MTV's Unplugged; Q-Tip guest-rapped on Deee-Lite's "Groove Is in the Heart" and on Lenny Kravitz and Sean Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance"; all three Tribe members contributed to the Jungle Brothers' Straight Out the Jungle and to De La Soul's "Buddy" in 1993, while Tribe was recording its third album. Ali contributed extensive production work to jazz saxophonist Greg Osby's 3-D Lifestyles. Released at the end of that year, Midnight Marauders (#8 pop, #1 R&B, 1993) yielded

A Tribe Called Quest

"Award Tour" (#47 pop, #27 R&B, 1993), with backing vocals by De La Soul's Trugoy the Dove.

During summer 1994, the group took the hip-hop slot in the Lollapalooza festival, and in 1996 released Beats, Rhymes and Life (#1 pop and R&B). Two years later, The Love Movement (#3 pop and R&B) proved to be Tribe's finale. Q-Tip pursued a solo career, releasing Amplified (#4 R&B) in 1999 and scoring hits with "Vibrant Thing" (#26 pop, #7 R&B) and "Breathe and Stop" (#21 R&B). He also was one of the guest vocalists on Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott's R&B chart-topper "Hot Boyz."

Tricky

Born Adrian Thaws, Jan. 27, 1968, Bristol, Eng.

1995—Maxinquaye (4th & Broadway) 1996—Nearly God; Pre-Millennium Tension 1998—Angels With Dirty Faces (Island) 1999—Juxtapose (PolyGram) 2001—Mission Accomplished EP (Epitaph); Blowback (Hollywood).

The dark magus of trip-hop—the hybrid genre of subterranean moods merging American hip-hop, Jamaican dub rhythms, and ambient music's otherworldly flow—Tricky hailed from the form's ground zero: Bristol, England. He grew up in Knowle West, a rough-and-tumble part of town, where he was raised by his grandmother and other members of his extended family after his mother died when he was four. Turned onto music after hearing the first Specials album, he eventually joined the Wild Bunch, a local troupe of DJs, rappers, and singers that formed in the early '80s.

He first performed under the name Tricky Kid with Massive Attack [see entry], the group that evolved out of the Wild Bunch, and appeared on its influential 1991 release Blue Lines. Tricky contributed to the sequel, 1994's Protection, but was already pursuing a solo career before its release, moving to London in 1993 to record a single, "Aftermath," which featured 15-year-old Martina Topley-Bird (who would become Tricky's companion and the mother of his daughter, Maisy). His 1995 debut album Maxinquaye (#2 U.K.) was a critics' favorite and a popular success in England, its seductive but overwhelming sense of claustrophobia offset by Tricky's radical reimagining of the rap form (a guitar-driven version of Public Enemy's "Black Steel in the Hour of Chaos," recited by Topley-Bird).

Later that year, Tricky toured the U.S. as an opening act for PJ Harvey, collaborated with horror-core rappers Gravediggaz on The Hell EP, and established a production company, Durban Poison. He also was in demand as a remixer, working with Björk (with whom he was romantically linked), Luscious Jackson, and Whale. The 1996 album Nearly God was a collection of collaborations (with Terry Hall, Björk, Alison Moyet, and Neneh Cherry, among others).

Early that year, Tricky moved to New York, where his studio work with underground rappers was documented on the EP Grassroots. In November he released his second solo album, Pre-Millennium Tension, which reflected an increasingly darker, even paranoid aesthetic. (Touring the U.S. to support the release, Tricky performed with the stage lights extinguished, a shadow illuminated fleetingly.) During 1997 the performer took a supporting role in the comedic sci-fi film The Fifth Element. The following year, Tricky released Angels With Dirty Faces, and the year after, Juxtapose, a joint effort with Cypress Hill's DJ Muggs and DMX producer Grease. In 2001 he released the Mission Accomplished EP, followed by Blowback, which features Cyndi Lauper, Alanis Monissette, and members of Live and the Red Hot Chili Peppers.

Tricky

Travis Tritt

Born James Travis Tritt, Feb. 9, 1963, Marietta, GA

1990—Country Club (Warner Bros.) 1991—It's All About to Change 1992—T-r-o-u-b-l-e; A Travis Tritt Christmas (Loving Time of Year) 1994—Ten Feet Tall and Bulletproof 1995—Greatest Hits—From the Beginning 1996—The Restless Kind 1998—No More Looking Over My Shoulder 2000—Down the Road I Go (Columbia); Super Hits, vol. 2 (Warner Bros.).

Travis Tritt's latter-day outlaw sound has brought him numerous #1 singles, as well as several Top 10 multiplatinum albums on the country charts, some of which have crossed over onto the pop charts. As deeply influenced by Lynyrd Skynyrd and the Allman Brothers as by George Jones and Merle Haggard, this honey-voiced, blue-collar "son of the new South" has scrupulously avoided any identification with Nashville and its "hat acts."

The son of a hardscrabble farmer, Tritt taught himself to play guitar at age eight and wrote his first song at 14. He married at 18 and his wife discouraged his musical career. Tritt worked for a heating and air-conditioning equipment distributor. Neither job nor marriage lasted long. By 1985 Tritt was divorced and performing in Atlanta.

In 1986 he approached a hometown friend working as an Atlanta-based promotion man for Warner Bros. to help produce a demo. Warners signed him, and released Country Club (#70 pop, #3 C&W, 1990), with its four C&W Top 40 singles: "Help Me Hold On" (#1, 1990), "I'm Gonna Be Somebody" (#2, 1990), "Put Some Drive in Your Country" (#28, 1990), and "Drift Off to Dream" (#3, 1991).

Tritt's insistence that country music broaden its attraction and open itself to new sounds may have annoyed some purists, but they could not deny his success. It's All About to Change (#22 pop, #1 C&W, 1991) featured a duet with Marty Stuart (who joined Tritt on the No Hats Tour in 1992), and the nasty kiss-off waltz "Here's a Quarter (Call Someone Who Cares)" (#2 C&W). Little Feat backed up Tritt on the raucous "Bible Belt." On T-r-o-u-b-l-e (#27 pop, #6 C&W, 1992) Tritt was joined by George Jones and Tanya Tucker on backing vocals ("Lord Have Mercy on the Working Man") and Lynyrd Skynyrd's Gary Rossington (who cowrote "Blue Collar Man"). The platinum Ten Feet Tall and Bulletproof (#20 pop, #3 C&W, 1994) yielded another #1 country single in "Foolish Pride."

Tritt next collaborated with producer Don Was on the honky-tonk-tinged The Restless Kind (#7 C&W, 1996), which spawned a pair of Top 10 country singles. But the album didn't sell as well as its predecessors, and his next release failed to go gold. Tritt, who never left his native Georgia for Nashville, went on a two-year hiatus, parting ways with his record label. In 2000 he came back with his first effort for Columbia, Down the Road I Go (#51 pop, #8 C&W), yielding the single, "Best of Intentions" (#48 pop, #20 C&W, 2001).

The Troggs

Formed 1965, Andover, Eng.

Reg Presley (b. Reginald Ball, June 12, 1943, Andover), voc.; Chris Britton (b. June 21, 1945, Watford, Eng.), lead gtr.; Peter Staples (b. May 3, 1944, Andover), bass; Ronnie Bond (b. Ronald Bullis, May 4, 1943, Andover; d. Nov. 13, 1992, Andover), drums.

1966—Wild Thing (Fontana) 1967—Best of the Troggs 1968—Love Is All Around 1969—(group disbands) 1972—(group re-forms: Presley; Bond; + Richard Moore, gtr.; + Tony Murray, bass) 1976—The Troggs (Pye) (+ Colin Fletcher, gtr.); The Original Troggs Tapes (Private Stock); Vintage Years (Sire) N.A.—(– Fletcher; – Moore; – Murray; + Peter Lucas, bass; + Dave Maggs, drums) 1992—Archeology (1967–1977) (Mercury) (– Bond) Athens Andover (with Peter Buck, Bill Berry, Mike Mills, Peter Dinklage, John Keane) (Rhino).

Though their popularity only lasted a short time, the Troggs were initially one of the most successful mid-'60s British Invasion bands. They're generally known for their 5-million-selling seminal garage-punk hit "Wild Thing" (#1, 1966).

The foursome formed in Hampshire in the mid-'60s, taking its name from the term "troglydite" "Wild Thing," the Troggs' debut single, was so popular and so frequently covered that it spawned a parody version sung by two people imitating Robert Kennedy and Senator Everett Dirksen. The Troggs' other hits in 1966 were "With a Girl Like You" (#29) and "I Can't Control Myself" (#43).

Their roots-of-power-pop sound, featuring Reg Presley's sometimes innocent, sometimes lecherous vocals, also cracked the Top 10 with "Love Is All Around" (#7, 1968) (revised as a huge U.K. hit for Wet Wet Wet). Though their hits dried up at that point, the Troggs continued to tour Europe. They didn't record, though, for several years.

In 1976 Pye released The Troggs, which featured "Summertime," a double-entendre-laden song that also received U.S. FM airplay. That same year, Sire released the Vintage Years retrospective, and Private Stock issued the new Original Troggs Tapes. The 1980 Live at Max's Kansas City included both older hits and newer songs. European albums also appeared. In the early '90s the group recorded Athens Andover, a collaboration with members of R.E.M. The Troggs remain perennially popular in Europe, where their music has graced numerous TV commercials. In 1992 the group performed at Sting's wedding. In recent years, Presley has become one of Britain's premier UFO experts.

Robin Trower

Born Mar. 9, 1945, London, Eng.

1973—Twice Removed From Yesterday (Chrysalis) 1974—

Bridge of Sighs 1975—For Earth Below 1976—Robin Trower Live!; Long Misty Days 1977—In City Dreams 1978—Caravan to Midnight 1980—Victims of the Fury 1981—B.L.T. 1982—Truce 1983—Back It Up 1987—Passion (GNP Crescendo)* 1988—Take What You Need (Atlantic) 1989—No Stopping Anytime (Chrysalis) 1990—In the Line of Fire (Atlantic) 1991—Essential 1994—20th Century Blues (V-12) 1997—Someday Blues 1999—This Was Now 74–98; Go My Way.

In his early years with Procol Harum [see entry], Robin Trower's piercing, distorted guitar sound was more often than not compared to that of Eric Clapton. But on Procol's "Whiskey Train" (on Home) and "Song for a Dreamer" (on Broken Barricades) Trower exhibited a strong Jimi Hendrix influence; "Song for a Dreamer" was dedicated to Hendrix.

By the time of Barricades, it was obvious that Trower's hard-rocking style was at odds with Procol's classical-rock direction, and he left after that album, at first forming the abortive Jude with ex-Jethro Tull drummer Clive Bunker, ex-Stone the Crows bassist Jim Dewar, and Scottish blues singer Frankie Miller. When that venture ran aground, Trower took a year off to re-form a Hendrix-style power trio with Dewar and drummer Reg Isidore. They debuted with 1973's Twice Removed From Yesterday (#106, 1973), which was produced by ex-Procol Matthew Fisher.

With Bridge of Sighs (#7, 1974) and heavy American touring, Trower came into his own as a guitar hero with U.S. audiences. After that album, Isadore was replaced by Bill Lordan, formerly with Sly and the Family Stone. Meanwhile, Trower took some guitar lessons from another pioneer of electronically modified guitar, Robert Fripp, who had just disbanded King Crimson. For Earth Below (#5, 1975) and Live (#10, 1976) were top-selling LPs, and through the '70s Trower continued to ably demonstrate his love for Hendrix, usually with solid commercial results. Long Misty Days (#24, 1976) and In City Dreams (#25, 1977) were both certified gold. Caravan to Midnight and Victims of the Fury both hit the Top 40.

In 1981 Trower began collaborating with ex-Cream bassist and singer Jack Bruce, for two well-received albums: B.L.T. (#37, 1981) (with drummer Jack Lordan) and Truce (#109, 1982) (with Reg Isidore in Lordan's place). (No Stopping Anytime is a compilation of Trower's recordings with Bruce.) Trower has continued to tour and record, and while his more recent albums have not charted nearly as highly as those of his '70s heyday, he remains a respected guitarist. In the early '90s he appeared on and coproduced with Bryan Ferry the singer's Taxi and Mamouna. Following the release of two mid-'90s blues homages, Trower returned to full-on rock with 2000's Go My Way.

John Trudell

Born Feb. 15, 1946, Omaha, NE

1983—Tribal Voice (Peace Company) 1986—AKA Graffiti Man 1987— . . . but This Isn't El Salvador; Heart Jump Bouquet

1991—Child's Voice; AKA Graffiti Man (Rykodisc) 1992—Fables and Other Realities (Peace Company) 1994—Johnny Damas and Me (Rykodisc) 1999—Blue Indians (Dangerous Discs/Inside Recordings).

Native American activist John Trudell writes and performs story songs informed by his political struggle. Growing up on a Santee Sioux reservation, Trudell served as national spokesman for the Indians of All Tribes occupation of Alcatraz Island in 1969. As National Chairman of the American Indian Movement from 1973 to 1979, he was the subject of a 17,000-page FBI file that documented his activities, including his 1979 burning of an American flag in front of the Bureau's Washington headquarters. Shortly thereafter, a fire "of suspicious origin" destroyed Trudell's house on the Shoshone Paiute Indian Reservation in Nevada, killing Trudell's three children, wife, and mother-in-law. In light of the FBI's refusal to investigate the incident, Trudell has consistently maintained government complicity in his family's death.

After publishing a book of poems, Living in Reality, in 1982, he began recording home-studio tapes with his friend Jackson Browne. He started by backing his poetry with drums and chanting, but added a rock & roll element when he began collaborating with Kiowa Indian guitarist Jesse Ed Davis (who had played with Browne as well as Bob Dylan, Eric Clapton, and others). Together they recorded AKA Graffiti Man (and two other albums), which was released as a mail-order cassette on Trudell's own label and was praised by Bob Dylan as the best album of 1986. Davis died in 1988, but Trudell released an expanded version of AKA Graffiti Man on Rykodisc in 1991. His politically charged rock & roll earned strong reviews, and Trudell followed it with his second Rykodisc set, Johnny Damas and Me, in 1994. The album examined the theme of women's power and leavened its pop music with Native American chanting. Browne produced Trudell's Blue Indians in 1999, which was released on Browne's Dangerous Discs/Inside Recordings label.

In addition to his poetry and music, Trudell has also made forays into acting. He has appeared in the feature films Thunderheart (1992) and Smoke Signals (1998), as well as the documentary Incident at Oglala (1992), all three of which featured American Indian themes.

The Tubes

Formed late '60s, Phoenix, AZ

Fee Waybill (b. John Waldo, Sep. 17, 1948, Omaha, NE), lead voc.; Bill Spooner (b. Apr. 16, 1949, Phoenix), gtr.; Roger Steen (b. Nov. 13, 1949, Pipestone, MN), gtr.; Vince Welnick (b. Feb. 21, 1951, Phoenix), kybds.; Michael Cotten (b. Jan. 25, 1950, Kansas City, MO), kybds.; Prairie Prince (b. May 7, 1950, Charlotte, NC), drums; Rick Anderson (b. Aug. 1, 1947, St. Paul, MN), bass; Re Styles (b. Mar. 3, 1950), voc.
 1975—The Tubes (A&M) 1976—Young and Rich 1977—Now 1978—What Do You Want From Live? 1979—Remote Control 1981—The Completion Backward Principle (Capitol); T.R.A.S.H. (Tubes Rarities and Smash Hits) (A&M) 1983—Outside/Inside (Capitol) 1985—Love Bomb (- Waybill) 1992—The Best of the Tubes 1993—(lineup: Steen; Prince; Anderson; Waybill; + Gary Cambra [b. Apr. 24, 1957, Walnut Creek, CA], voc., kybds.) 1995—(+ Trey Sabate [b. Nov. 3, 1963, Albany, NY], drums) 1996—(+ Dave Medd [b. Sep. 17, Alameda, CA], voc.) Genius of America (Popular/Critique) 1999—Infomercial: How to Be Tubular (Hux, U.K.); Dawn of the Tubes (Phoenix Gems) 2000—Tubes World Tour 2000 (CMC).

From the mid-'70s through the early '80s, the Tubes' mixture of rock, theater, and satire proved more capable of achieving notoriety than sales. Despite one of the wildest stage shows in the business (verging at times on soft-core pornography) and critical acclaim for their records, their five LPs for A&M were flops (even though the first was produced by Al Kooper and the last by Todd Rundgren). The Tubes came close to scoring hits during this period with a pair of radio staples—the heavy-metal parody "White Punks on Dope" (featuring Waybill in the guise of Quay Lewd) and the mock-girl-group song "Don't Touch Me There."

Bill Spooner, Rick Anderson, and Vince Welnick started embryonic versions of the Tubes in their hometown of Phoenix in the late '60s, though they wouldn't come to be known as the Tubes until they moved to San Francisco in 1972. Early performances were generally reviled, and it took the group three years to build a cult following sufficient to justify a recording contract. But as each LP became another commercial setback, the Tubes began to streamline their act, and by 1980 they were down to six, after experimenting with a proless all-music live show. Many temporary members (not listed above), including several female vocalists, have passed through the ranks since then. When their self-conscious attempt at a hit record, "Don't Want to Wait Anymore," proved successful, the only Tubes present were Waybill and Prince. That song, along with the AOR hit "Talk to You Later," made the Tubes' Capitol debut, The Completion Backward Principle (#36, 1981), a big seller. Later that year, the group appeared in the movie Xanadu.

In 1983 "She's a Beauty" reached the Top 10, helped by an eye-catching and provocative video that was widely aired on MTV. The album from which it came, Outside/Inside (#18, 1983), became the group's best-selling album to date. But the Tubes' luck didn't hold, and two years later, Love Bomb (produced by Rundgren) stalled at #87. Waybill showed up on Richard Marx's debut album, and Vince Welnick joined the Grateful Dead, replacing deceased keyboardist Brent Mydland. The group re-formed in the early '90s, touring Europe and the U.S. from 1993 until 1995. After adding another singer and a second drummer, the Tubes recorded their first new studio album in a decade, 1996's Genius of America. They have since released several CDs of live and archival material.

Tanya Tucker

Born Oct. 10, 1958, Seminole, TX
 1972—Delta Dawn (Columbia) 1973—What's Your Mama's Name 1974—Would You Lay With Me (in a Field of Stone)
 1975—Greatest Hits; Tanya Tucker (MCA) 1976—Lovin' and Learnin'; Here's Some Love 1977—Ridin' Rainbows; You Are So Beautiful (Columbia); Tanya Tucker's Greatest Hits (MCA)
 1978—TNT 1980—Tear Me Apart; Dreamlovers 1981—Should I Do It? 1982—Live 1983—The Best of Tanya Tucker; Changes (Arista) 1986—Girls Like Me (Capitol)
 1987—Love Me Like You Used To 1988—Strong Enough to Bend 1989—Greatest Hits 1990—Tennessee Woman; Greatest Hits Encore 1991—Greatest Country Hits (Curb);
What Do I Do With Me (Liberty) 1992—Can't Run From Yourself 1993—Greatest Hits 1990–1992; Soon 1995—Fire to Fire 1997—Complicated (Capitol).

In the beginning, three things made Tanya Tucker a major country-pop star at age 14: a fine voice, Billy Sherrill's MOR-Nashville production, and an image as a pubescent sexpot. In the years since, she has weathered tabloid accounts of her private life, treatment at the Betty Ford Center in 1989, and a three-year hiatus from recording at the peak of her career to emerge as a mature and extremely popular country star.

Tucker got into music through her construction-worker father, Beau Tucker, who took her to country shows after the family had moved to Wilcox, Arizona, and then to Phoenix. At age 13, she appeared in the film Jeremiah Johnson. Her first country hit was 1972's "Delta Dawn," followed by two #1 C&W hits: "What's Your Mama's Name" and "Blood Red and Goin' Down." At age 16 she made the #1 C&W single "Would You Lay With Me (in a Field of Stone)" (#46 pop, 1974).

After she reached the age of consent, Tucker left Columbia and producer Billy Sherrill and signed with MCA. In the late '70s, she briefly tried to become a rock singer, wearing leather (for TNT, at #54 pop, her highest-charting album of the '70s and '80s) and adding fuzz-tone guitars, but she soon retreated into country music. A highly publicized liaison with country-pop crooner Glen Campbell included some duet recordings, but it ended in 1981, and Tucker continued to work the country circuit on her own.

In 1983 she moved to Arista Records; it was an unhappy pairing, and Tucker did not record for the next three years after her initial Arista album. She signed with Capitol Records in 1986 and began a comeback that eclipsed her earlier success. Her #1 C&W hits included "Just Another Love" (1986) and "I Won't Take Less Than Your Love" (1987); other hits were "Highway Robbery" (#2 C&W, 1988), "What Do I Do With Me" (#2 C&W, 1991), "Some Kind of Trouble" (#3 C&W, 1992), "If Your Heart Ain't Busy Tonight" (#4 C&W, 1992), "Two Sparrows in a Hurricane" (#2 C&W, 1992), "It's a Little Too Late" (#2 C&W, 1993), "Tell Me About It," a duet with Delbert McClinton (#4 C&W, 1993), and "Soon" (#2 C&W, 1993). What Do I Do With Me (#48 pop, #9 C&W, 1991) was her first platinum album and her biggest crossover success to date. Can't Run From Yourself (#51 pop, #12 C&W, 1992) was also certified platinum. With her father functioning as her manager again, Tucker tours heavily. She also appears on Common Thread, the Eagles tribute, on Rhythm Country & Blues, where she duets with Little Richard on the Eddie Cochran classic "Somethin' Else," and has recorded an as-yet-unreleased duet with Frank Sinatra, "Embraceable

You." Her nonmusical business enterprises include a line of Western wear, salsa, and an exercise video.

In 1997 Tucker published her autobiography, Nickel Dreams, a lively account of her life and career that went to #2 on the New York Times bestseller list. Tucker also released her 30th album, Complicated, a single from the record, "Little Things," reached the country Top 10. In 1998 Tucker sued her record company, Capitol Nashville, claiming that they wouldn't release her from her contract. As of this writing, the case is still pending.

Tina Turner solo: see entry.

Ike Turner and his wife Tina were first known for their late-'60s and early-'70s recordings and their soul revue. Prior to that, however, Ike was well established as a seminal figure in the early years of rock & roll as both a performer and talent scout. During her tenure with Ike, Tina was one of the most flamboyant, overtly sexual performers in rock. Their recordings rarely captured the intensity of their live performances; in fact, their only gold album and one of their two highest charting is a live album (Live at Carnegie Hall, #25, 1970). Beginning in 1976, when Tina snuck out of a hotel and left Ike with just 36 cents in her pocket, she embarked on one of the longest but ultimately most successful comebacks in rock history.

Ike Turner grew up in racist Clarksdale, Mississippi. When he was a child, his father was abducted and beaten by a white man, then died from his injuries after being refused admission to a whites-only hospital. As a child he learned to play piano (from Pinetop Perkins, he claims), and by his teens was leading his own band, which included singer Jackie Brenston. With over 30 members, the group eventually split into two bands—the Top Hatters and Turner's Kings of Rhythm. Turner, who plays a number of instruments, performed uncredited on numerous early R&B and rock & roll tracks. In 1951 he recorded "Rocket '88" at Sam Phillips' Sun studio in Memphis with lead vocal by saxophonist Jackie Brenston. Unfortunately, Brenston and the Delta Cats, not Ike Turner and the Kings of Rhythm, got the label credit. It became a #1 R&B hit, and over the years it has been frequently cited as the first rock & roll record. Turner went on to become a top session guitarist, talent scout, and producer through the '50s, recording with Junior Parker and Howlin' Wolf, B.B. King, Otis Rush, Roscoe Gordon, Bobby "Blue" Bland, and Johnny Ace.

Turner and his Kings of Rhythm were playing St. Louis nightclubs when he met Anna Mae Bullock. Bullock repeatedly asked Turner if she could sing with his band; he said that she could but never called her to the stage. One night Bullock, who had never sung professionally but had been appearing in talent shows since childhood, simply grabbed the microphone and sang. Soon after, he changed her name to Tina. They eventually married, in Tijuana in 1962, though Ike was still married to another woman at the time. At various times both Ike and Tina have described their marriage as less than ideal.

Even though they were not yet married, they first recorded as Ike and Tina Turner in 1960 after a singer failed to appear for a session. Tina stood in for the missing singer, and the song, "A Fool in Love," became a hit in 1960 (#27 pop, #2 R&B). Ike then developed an entire revue around Tina. Ike later claimed that he patterned her aggressive image after a female Tarzan character he saw in a movie as a child. With nine musicians and three scantily clad female background singers called the Ikettes, the Ike and Tina Turner Revue became a major soul act. In 1961 they charted with "It's Gonna Work Out Fine" (#14 pop, #2 R&B) and "I Idolize You" (#5 R&B). The following year, "Poor Fool" (#38 pop, #4 R&B) and "Tra La La La La" (#9 R&B) were hits. From the mid-'60s on, they were major stars in England, where artists such as the Rolling Stones were unabashed fans. In 1966 Phil Spector recorded them for his last Wall of Sound masterpiece, "River Deep—Mountain High." It went to #3 in England, but did poorly in the U.S. Spector, who believed it to be the finest recording of his career, was so crushed by its disappointing showing that he announced his retirement and went into seclusion. (The Revue also appears in Spector's feature-length concert film, The Big T.N.T. Show)

The Turners continued to make pop hits into the late '60s and opened for the Rolling Stones on their 1969 tour. They were especially successful into the early '70s with steamy covers such as "Come Together" (#57 pop, #21 R&B), "I Want to Take You Higher" (#34 pop, #25 R&B), and "Proud Mary" (#4 pop, #5 R&B), which earned them their only Grammy, for Best R&B Vocal Performance by a Group. Throughout this time, they were also frequent guests on television variety shows. Interestingly, their widespread appeal did not translate into big album sales. The aforementioned Live at Carnegie Hall tied Workin' Together (1970) for their highest-charting pop album, at #25. Only those and 1969's Outta Season made the Top 100 albums chart. The Ikettes (which had numerous personnel changes through the years) had a couple of pop hits on their own: "I'm Blue (The Gong-Gong Song)" (#19, 1962) and "Peaches 'n' Cream" (#36, 1965).

Beginning in 1974 with Tina Turns the Country On, Tina began a parallel, initially commercially unsuccessful solo career. After a tumultuous relationship, which she has since described as being marked by physical and emotional abuse, Tina left Ike in 1976 [see solo entry].

Around the time Tina left him, Ike Turner retired to his studio in Inglewood, California, and released two solo LPs. The studio was destroyed by fire in 1982. After 11 arrests on various charges, in 1990 Ike was convicted on several charges, including possessing and transporting cocaine, and sentenced to 18 months in jail. He was in prison when he and Tina were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in January 1991. In September of that year, he was released from jail.

Ike published his autobiography, Takin' Back My Name (with an introduction by Little Richard, who claims to have taught Tina how to sing), in 1999. In the book and in numerous interviews he granted through the '90s, he has disputed Tina's account of their marriage and has taken particular issue with how he was depicted in the Disney film based on Tina's autobiography (I, Tina). What's Love Got to Do With It. In the late '90s he began writing a column for Juke Blues magazine; he performs occasionally and continues to record. In 2001 the release of Here & Now, his first album of new material in decades, was marked by numerous live appearances.

Big Joe Turner

1956—The Boss of the Blues: Joe Turner Sings Kansas City Jazz (Atlantic) 1960—Big Joe Rides Again 1976—Nobody in Mind (Pablo) 1977—Things That I Used to Do 1980—The Midnight Special; The Best of Big Joe Turner 1981—Have No Fear Joe Turner Is Here 1983—Life Ain't Easy; Blues Train (Muse) 1984—Kansas City Here I Come (Pablo) 1986—Big Joe Turner Memorial Album: Rhythm & Blues Years (Atlantic) 1987—Big Joe Turner: Greatest Hits 1989—Flip, Flop & Fly (Pablo) 1994—Big, Bad & Blue: The Big Joe Turner Anthology (Rhino).

Big Joe Turner is indisputably one of rock & roll's forefathers. Songwriter Doc Pomus once remarked of Turner, "Rock & roll would never have happened without him," and many historians agree. Turner was a classic old-style blues shouter whose powerful voice and often playful delivery turned jump-blues staples including "Shake, Rattle and Roll," "Honey Hush," "Sweet Sixteen," "Chains of Love," and "Flip, Flop and Fly" into stepping stones marking the path from the blues to rock & roll. He had been singing for over 20 years when he recorded those songs in the early '50s, and he performed until just months before his death, following years of chronic health problems, at age 74.

Turner got his start as a singing bartender in a Kansas City cabaret in the late '20s. He was already known as one of the most powerful blues singers west of the Mississippi when he teamed up with boogie-woogie pianist Pete Johnson and became one of the originators of "blues shouting." In 1938 talent scout John Hammond brought Turner and Johnson to New York to appear at the Carnegie Hall concert that sparked the boogie-woogie craze of the late '30s and early '40s. As their engagement at Cafe Society—a New York jazz club—extended into a four-year run, boogie-woogie bumped its way into mainstream white pop for the first time. Turner sang jazz-style show blues with pianist Art Tatum, but he also shouted fast boogie-woogie blues with Johnson. The propulsive rhythms and extroverted vocals of songs like "Roll 'Em Pete" showed the stirrings of the rhythm & blues that became popular in the years after World War II.

In 1941 Turner went to Hollywood to appear in Duke Ellington's Jump for Joy Revue. He was based on the West Coast for most of the '40s, joined occasionally by Johnson and pianist Albert Ammons. In 1951 he returned to New York to play the Apollo Theatre with Count Basie. There he met Ahmet Ertegun and Jerry Wexler, who brought him to Atlantic Records, where Ertegun's "Chains of Love" gave him a #2 R&B hit. (Pat Boone had a #10 pop hit with the song five years later.) It was the first of a string of R&B hits on Atlantic between 1951 and 1956, each of which is a rock & roll classic: "Sweet Sixteen" (#4, 1952), "Honey Hush" (#2, 1953), "T.V. Mama" (#9, 1954), "Shake, Rattle and Roll" (#2, 1954, a big hit for Bill Haley later that year in a bowdlerized form), "Flip, Flop and Fly" (#3, 1955), "The Chicken and the Hawk" (#13, 1956), "Cornna, Cornna" (#3, 1956; at #41, his biggest pop hit), and "Rock a While" (#12, 1956). In addition to Ertegun's songs, his own, and his brother Lou Willie Turner's, he recorded material by Doc Pomus and Leiber and Stoller. The backing musicians on his classic Atlantic R&B sessions included, variously, King Curtis, Mickey Baker, Sam Taylor, Al Sears, Panama Francis, and Choker Campbell.

While he never had the pop success of his imitators, who often cleaned up the sexual metaphors and took some of the energy out of the songs, Turner continued to work through good times and bad. He toured Europe several times in the '50s; and in the '60s and '70s he appeared and recorded with the Johnny Otis Show. Eddie "Lockjaw" Davis, Milt Jackson, Roy Eldridge, Dizzy Gillespie, and Pee Wee Crayton. In 1974 he was featured with Count Basie in The Last of the Blue Devils, a film about the Kansas City music scene.

Beginning in the early '80s, Turner suffered from diabetes and arthritis. Later in the decade heart and kidney problems often forced him to walk on crutches, then perform seated. Despite this, his voice never wavered.

After a tumultuous relationship, which she has described as being marked by physical and emotional abuse (claims her ex-husband disputes), Tina left Ike Turner in 1976 for what would prove one of the greatest comeback stories in popular music history.

Anna Mae Bullock grew up in Nutbush, Tennessee, the daughter of a black overseer and church deacon father and a part-Native American mother. When she was three, her parents moved away to find better work, grandparents essentially raised Turner and her older sister. Eventually her parents divorced and her mother settled in St. Louis, where Turner moved during high school. It was there that she met Ike Turner at the Club Manhattan. (Her early years with Ike are recounted in that entry.)

Turner had made two solo albums while with Ike. Acid Queen (#155, 1975) was named after her memorable role in Ken Russell's film Tommy. After leaving Ike in 1976 (they divorced in 1978), Turner got a few bookings but at one point was forced to live on food stamps. A Buddhist since the early '70s, Turner persevered. She recorded two unsuccessful late-'70s albums that were heavy on covers of all genres (from "The Bitch Is Back" to the syrupy "Sometimes When We Touch"). Prior to that, she had placed a cover of Led Zepelin's "Whole Lotta Love" on the R&B chart, at #61, in 1975. Turner's comeback began in earnest in 1981, when the Rolling Stones offered her a few opening spots on their U.S. tour. Around that time she also opened some shows for Rod Stewart and toured the world. In 1983 she landed a solo deal and by year's end had a U.K. hit with her steamy cover of Al Green's "Let's Stay Together" (#6 U.K.). Her U.S. breakthrough came with Private Dancer (#3, 1984), an 11-million-selling international smash that included "Let's Stay Together" (#26 pop, #3 R&B, 1984), "What's Love Got to Do With It" (#1 pop, #2 R&B, 1984), "Better Be Good to Me" (#5 pop, #6 R&B, 1984), and "Private Dancer" (#7 pop, #3 R&B, 1985). Her next two nonalbum songs were from the Mel Gibson film Mad Max Beyond Thunderdome (1985), in which Turner costarred as Auntie Entity: "We Don't Need Another Hero (Thunderdome)" (#2 pop, #3 R&B, 1985) and "One of the Living" (#15 pop, #41 R&B, 1985). Turner swept the Grammys in 1984, with "What's Love Got to Do With It" winning Best Female Pop Vocal Performance, and "Better Be Good to Me" taking Best Rock Vocal Performance. "What's Love" was also recognized as Song of the Year and Record of the Year. The following year "One of the Living" won Best Female Rock Performance.

Break Every Rule (#4, 1986), another platinum release, included "Typical Male" (#2 pop, #3 R&B, 1986), "Two People" (#30 pop, #18 R&B, 1986), and "What You Get Is What You See" (#13, 1987). In late 1985 she released a live duet with Bryan Adams, "It's Only Love," which went to #15. Turner, long legendary for her live shows, toured tirelessly. She has always been especially popular in Europe and in England, where Tina Live in Europe went to #8 as opposed to #86 in the United States. Despite the relatively disappointing chart showing, Live in Europe earned Turner a Best Female Rock Vocal Performance Grammy. She duetted with Mick Jagger at Live Aid in 1985 and is a favorite of British rock stars. Her international tours broke records in many cities. In 1986 Turner took home the Best Female Rock Vocal Performance Grammy for "Back Where You Started."

In 1986 she published her bestselling autobiography, I, Tina (cowritten with Kurt Loder), in which she maintained that Ike had been abusing her since the '60s. Her litany of his crimes against her include hitting her, pouring hot coffee on her face, burning her lip with a lit cigarette, and forcing her to perform while ill and pregnant. She also wrote that she had attempted suicide in 1968.

In 1989 came Turner's first album of new material in over three years, Foreign Affair (#31, 1989). Its singles included "The Best" (#15, 1989), with a sax solo by Edgar Winter, and Tony Joe White's "Steamy Windows" (#39, 1990). While it was not her most successful album in the U.S., it outsold Private Dancer in the U.K. Also in 1989 Turner celebrated her 50th birthday with a star-studded party that included Mark Knopfler (who wrote "Private Dancer"), Eric Clapton, and other admirers. Turner and Rod Stewart's remake of the Marvin Gaye-Tammi Terrell hit "It Takes Two" went to #5 in the U.K. in 1990. A year later, her greatest-hits package Simply the Best went to #1 in the U.K. but didn't clear the Hot 100 albums chart here. In 1992 Turner signed to Virgin.

Turner's autobiography was made into a hit feature film,

What's Love Got to Do With It (1993); the soundtrack (#17, 1993) spawned the hit single "I Don't Wanna Fight" (#9 pop, #51 R&B, 1993), which was cowritten by Steve DuBerry and Lulu.

Dividing her time in the '90s between homes in Zurich, Switzerland, and the South of France, Tumer, a Nichiren Shoshu Buddhist for many years, continues to record and tour. In 1996 she released Wildest Dreams (#61, 1996), a strong return to form (its 1997 tour was sponsored by Hanes hosiery, in tribute to Tumer's famous legs), although only one of its singles, a remake of John Waits' "Missing You" (#84 pop, 1996) made the pop chart. R&B hit singles included "Golden-Eye" (the theme from a James Bond thriller that was written for Turner by Bono and the Edge and produced by Nellee Hooper) (#89 R&B, 1995), "Something Beautiful Remains" (#34 R&B, 1996), and the title track, which featured Barry White (#34 R&B). Twenty Four Seven (#21 pop, #29 R&B, 2000) entered the charts at #21, the highest chart debut position of her career. In 2000, past age 60, she launched what she announced would be her last stadium tour.

The Turtles were a serious rock band that, through a series of catchy mid- to late-'60s hit singles, was passed off as—and burdened by the image of—happy-go-lucky Top 40 lightweights. Never creatively satisfied with the classic pop material that made them famous, the group (led by vocalists Howard Kaylan and Mark Volman) aspired instead to a more sophisticated Beatlesque style and more socially relevant material. These aspirations—coupled with devastating managerial, financial, and legal problems—broke up the band. Volman, Kaylan, and bassist Jim Pons' subsequent tenure with Frank Zappa, and Volman and Kaylan's duo career as the Phlorescent Leech [Flo] & Eddie, give some indication of the group the Turtles might have been.

The name "Turtles" came from White Whale Records. Prior to the band's signing in 1965, the L.A.-based combo had been known as the Nightriders, and later as the Crossfires. Their local singles during that time were uniformly unsuccessful. Once under contract, they were converted from a surf group (White Whale astutely noting that the trend was on the wane) to folk rock, then in vogue thanks to Bob Dylan, the Byrds, et al. Their debut single, Dylan's "It Ain't Me Babe," went Top 10 in 1965 and launched the band on a brief string of hits: "Let Me Be" (#20, 1965) and "You Baby" (#20, 1966), followed by "Grim Reaper of Love" (#81, 1966) and "Can I Get to Know You Better" (#89, 1966). Each of these showcased the group's trademark sound, a sophisticated pop rock dominated by Kaylan and Volman's distinctive vocals.

The Turtles were not content, however, and were about to break up; but first they released "Happy Together" (#1, 1967), which proved to be their biggest hit, and one of 1967's top 10 records. With their career reinvigorated, "She'd Rather Be With Me" (#3, 1967), "You Know What I Mean" (#12, 1967), and "She's My Girl" (#14, 1967) were followup hits.

Though it included their last two hit 45s—"Elenore" (#6, 1968) and "You Showed Me" (#6, 1969) (one of the first hit singles to feature a Moog synthesizer)—The Turtles Present the Battle of the Bands (#128, 1968) was an ambitious reflection of the group's desire to be more than AM-radio fodder. Each song was meant to sound completely different from the others, literally as if performed by a different group. The gatefold sleeve presented the Turtles dressed in 11 guises, including the Crossfires, the country-rock Quad City Ramblers, and the greaser group U.S. Teens featuring Raoul. The next album, Turtle Soup (#117, 1969), was produced by the Kinks' Ray Davies when he was at his least commercial. The Turtles played the White House, at the invitation of Tricia Nixon, in May 1969. Their most successful LPs were Happy Together (#25, 1967) and The Turtles! Golden Hits (#7, 1967).

Unfortunately, around the time "Happy Together" hit, the Turtles became enmeshed in legal battles that would drag on for years to come. Defeated but unbowed, the band split up in mid-1970 but did not quit the business.

Throughout their career, the Turtles had fluid personnel; only lead guitarist Al Nichol was with them from Crossfires to breakup. After some of the original members quit, replacements were found in ex-Leaves (who had one hit with "Hey Joe") bassist Jim Pons and drummer John Barbata. After Barbata quit the group, he drummed with Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young and the Jefferson Starship. Pons stuck with Volman and Kaylan into Zappa's band and the initial Flo & Eddie group. Other temporary Turtles included onetime Monkees producer Chip Douglas (he appeared on "Happy Together") and former Spanky and Our Gang drummer John Seiter.

Prohibited by their record company from using not only the Turtles name but their given names professionally in music, Volman and Kaylan became the Phlorescent Leech [Flo] & Eddie. The duo (with Pons) joined Frank Zappa and contributed to Chungas's Revenge (1970), Live at the Fillmore

East (1971), the 200 Motels album and film (1971), and Just Another Band From L.A. (which included the Turtles' "Happy Together") (1972). Although they originally used the Phlorescent moniker to avoid contractual problems, the name stuck. Their shows and albums combine straight songs with devastating sendups of rock personalities, genres, and events. They lampooned Pink Floyd's The Wall show with "The Fence," a flimsy bamboo fence over which they tossed cheap inflatable toy animals. Another popular mid-'70s, energy-crisis era routine turned the Village People's "In the Navy" into "In the Gasline." Over the years, no one and nothing—from Kiss to Joni Mitchell, Jim Morrison to Fleetwood Mac, Flashdance to the Beastie Boys—has been spared their dead-on, sometimes silly, sendups and satires. As Volman once told ROLLING STONE, "We've never catered to the industry we were trying to succeed in."

They briefly gave up touring in 1976 following the accidental death of their guitarist, Phillip Reed (he fell from a window, prompting some reports that his death was a suicide), and the untimely death of another close friend, Marc Bolan (T. Rex). Besides several LPs (the second produced by Bob Ezrin), they scored and contributed dialogue to an X-rated animation film called Dirty Duck. They have written columns for several publications, including Creem, Phonograph Record, and the L.A. Free Press. At various times beginning in the mid-'70s they have hosted their own radio program on such stations as L.A.'s KROQ and KMET, New York's WLIR and WXRK, and in syndication. Their instantly recognizable harmonies have graced tracks by Marc Bolan and T. Rex, Stephen Stills, John Lennon and Yoko Ono, Hoyt Axton, Keith Moon, David Cassidy, Alice Cooper, Tonio K., Blondie, the Knack, Sammy Hagar, Burton Cummings, Paul Kantner's Planet Earth Rock & Roll Orchestra, Roger McGuinn, the Psychedelic Furs, Duran Duran, the Ramones, and Bruce Springsteen ("Hungry Heart"), among others.

Beginning in 1980 Flo & Eddie produced and composed a series of popular children's records for the Strawberry Shortcake and Care Bears soundtracks. Kaylan appeared in the film Get Crazy (1983). Their annual New Year's Eve shows at New York's the Bottom Line have been a tradition since the '70s.

Volman and Kaylan, as Flo & Eddie, also resurrect the Turtles name for shows. Beginning in the mid-'80s the pair, with a backing band, have appeared with the Turtles, leading the Happy Together Tour, which included other '60s acts. In 1999 Volman received his master's degree in screenwriting. When not touring with Kaylan and the group, Volman teaches college courses on the music business. Pons currently codirects the David Center, a New York-area organization dedicated to helping children with autism.

Shania Twain

Born Eileen Regina Edwards, Aug. 28, 1965, Windsor, Can.
 1993—Shania Twain (Mercury) 1995—The Woman in Me
 1997—Come On Over 1999—Come On Over: International Version.

Within the span of five years Shania Twain went from singing in a resort in the Canadian boondocks to becoming the biggest sensation to hit Nashville since Garth Brooks. Combining glossy pop hooks, arena-rock crunch, and turbo-charged twang with MTV-age marketing savvy, Twain has not only sold more records than any female country singer in history but has emerged as an international pop superstar. What makes her transformation all the more remarkable is that she achieved it by overcoming great personal hardship.

Twain grew up poor in the small, rural outpost of Timmins, Ontario, where her birth father walked out on the family before Shania was out of diapers. She started singing early, getting plenty of encouragement from her mother and adoptive father, Jerry Twain, an Ojibway Indian in whose honor she took the name Shania, which is Ojibway for "I'm on my way." By the time Twain was eight, she was performing at social events and talent contests and, after that, on radio, TV, and in bars. Tragedy, however, struck when her mother and stepfather were killed in an auto accident. Forced to put her budding career on hold to care for her four younger brothers, Shania, then 21, took a job singing show tunes, pop, rock, and country hits at a resort in Deerpark, Ontario. She did that for three years until her brothers were old enough to live on their own. Then in 1991 she moved to Nashville, where she secured a contract with Mercury Records, which released her self-titled debut album (#67 C&W, 1993). Suffering from lackluster material and assembly-line production, it yielded only two minor singles.

Twain's fortune changed when she met hard-rock producer Robert John "Mutt" Lange, who had produced Foreigner, AC/DC, Def Leppard, and other rock bands. Having seen one of Twain's videos, he called to express an interest in collaborating with her. The two subsequently met, married, and embarked on the most successful musical and marital partnership of the '90s. For The Woman in Me (#5 pop, #1 C&W, 1995), the couple took Twain originals that Mercury had rejected for her debut, pumped up the volume and burnished them with a metallic rock and pop sheen. The record also found Twain eschewing the wholesome, demure image she projected on her debut in favor of a bold, sexy new persona. The record produced seven hit singles, including "Any Man of Mine" (#31 pop, #1 C&W, 1995) and "(If You're Not in It for Love) I'm Outta Here" (#74 pop, #1 C&W, 1995). Buoyed by a string of suggestive, midriff-baring videos as well as Twain's Madonna-like entrepreneurial flair, the album sold in excess of 12 million copies, consolidating the pop-country insurrection started by Garth Brooks, and all without a single tour date to support it.

Critics were divided about Twain's music and image. Nashville boosters claimed that Twain brought country in step with pop, while feminists argued that she was pandering to male libidos to sell records. Fans, however, couldn't get enough, and in 1997 Twain and Lange delivered again with the monumental, defiantly pro-woman Come On Over (#2 pop, #1 C&W). The album included a whopping nine hit singles, with "You're Still the One" (#2 pop, #1 C&W, 1998) and "That Don't Impress Me Much" (#7 pop, 1999, #3 C&W, 1998), among others, crossing over into the pop Top 10.

Twain also toured for the first time, playing a string of sold-out dates that were long on bombast and spectacle but likely helped her to secure 1998 Grammy Awards for Best Country Song and Best Female Country Vocal Performance. A perennial Nashville outsider, Twain nevertheless took home Entertainer of the Year honors at the 1999 Country Music Association Awards as well. At sales of 18 million and counting, Come On Over has also now become the best-selling album in country music history. A collection of remixes titled Come On Over: International Version followed in 1999.

Dwight Twilley

Born June 6, 1952, Tulsa, OK

As the Dwight Twilley Band: 1976—Sincerely (Shelter) 1977—Twilley Don't Mind (Arista).

Solo: 1979—Twilley 1982—Scuba Divers (EMI America)

1984—Jungle 1986—Wild Dogs (CBS) 1993—The Great Lost Twilley Album (DCC) 1996—XXI (The Right Stuff)

1999—Tulsa (Copper); Between the Cracks, vol. 1 (Not Lane).

Dwight Twilley made a music career out of trying to fuse Elvis Presley's rockabilly with the Beatles' pop, and he never came closer than on his very first single. He and partner Phil Seymour became overnight sensations when "I'm on Fire" came out of nowhere and went Top 20 in 1975. Following that early success, Twilley was bogged down by a split with Seymour, erratic live appearances, and myriad troubles with record companies.

Twilley and collaborator Phil Seymour met when they were 16-year-old Tulsans at a screening of the Beatles' A Hard Day's Night. They began playing music together, eventually going to Memphis and doing some recordings at the old Sun studio. They ended up in L.A., and as the Dwight Twilley Band, signed to the shaky Shelter Records. Twilley and Seymour laid down nearly all the parts on their two LPs, Sincerely and Twilley Don't Mind. Though they were popular with critics, neither album was a commercial success, partially due to Shelter's incompetence; for example, there was no LP to capitalize on the success of "I'm on Fire" for over a year. Seymour left to pursue a solo career in 1978.

Eventually, Twilley freed himself of Shelter and got into a new struggle with his next label, Arista. Following the release of Twilley and "Somebody to Love" some months later, Arista rejected his second solo album. After a lengthy battle, Twilley put out Scuba Divers on a new label, EMI, in 1982, complete with a redone version of "Somebody to Love." Twilley finally achieved some of the commercial success that had long been predicted for him with "Girls" (#16, 1984) from Jungle (#39, 1984).

Meanwhile, after splitting from Twilley, Seymour found some success with a #22 hit in 1981 with "Precious to Me." In addition to recording a couple of solo albums, Seymour worked with a number of other artists, including Del Shannon, and later as a member of the Textones. In 1985 he was diagnosed with lymphoma, which resulted in his death on August 17, 1993, in Tarzana, California, at 41.

Twilley returned somewhat to the limelight in 1992 when his "Why You Wanna Break My Heart" was included on the Wayne's World soundtrack, followed by the 1994 publication of his well-received book for divorced fathers, Questions From Dad. The latter project led to Twilley receiving an award from the Children's Rights Council. After an earthquake destroyed his L.A. home, Twilley returned to Tulsa, where he recorded his first new album in 13 years. He was joined by original Dwight Twilley Band guitarist Bill Pitcock and other Tulsa-based musicians. Tulsa was released on the tiny Copper label in 1999.

Twisted Sister

1982—Under the Blade (Secret) 1983—You Can't Stop Rock and Roll (Atlantic) 1984—Stay Hungry 1985—Come Out and Play 1987—(—Pero; + Joe Franco, drums) Love Is for Suckers 2000—Club Daze (Spitfire).

Widowmaker (Snider; Franco; + Marc Russell, bass; + Al Pitrelli, gr.): 1992—Blood and Bullets (Esquire) 1994—Stand by for Pain (Music for Nations).

Dee Snider: 2000—Never Let the Bastards Wear You Down (Koch Entertainment).

Twisted Sister's mix of Who-style adolescent rebellion and Alice Cooper makeup was a textbook example of mid- to late-'70s glitter/bar band style. Their 15-year career might read like a thousand others were it not for a single Top 40 hit, "We're Not Gonna Take It" (#21, 1984) and the metal anthem "I Wanna Rock."

Dressed in the most excessive glitter/trash styles, with highly teased hair and lavish eye makeup, Twisted Sister amassed a large following throughout the New York tri-state area but little label interest. Even without a record, Twisted Sister was popular enough to sell out New York City's 3,400-seat Palladium in 1979. They released the independent Under the Blade in 1982. After an appearance on the British TV show The Tube that year, the group signed with Atlantic.

You Can't Stop Rock and Roll (#130, 1983) sold poorly, and Twisted Sister was relegated to second-division status until they made a splash at an English rock festival. With their reputation as a live band assured, it took the 1984 video for "We're Not Gonna Take It," with lead singer Dee Snider's mad Pierrot image and comically antiestablishment, patrician storyline, to bring the band to the mainstream, sending the album Stay Hungry to #15. For a while Snider was a familiar face, as a regular guest on Howard Stern's radio program, a popular metal-magazine poster boy, and—along with Frank Zappa—as a spokesman against censorship at the Senate subcommittee on communications hearings. In 1987 he wrote (with Philip Bashe) a fairly serious and well-received book of advice for teenagers entitled Dee Snider's Teenage Survival Guide: How to Be a Legend in Your Own Lunchtime. Subsequent albums never matched Stay Hungry's popularity, and the band called it quits in 1987.

Unsurprisingly, Snider has remained the most active of Twisted Sister's members. After the band's demise, he formed Desperado, whose album Bloodied but Unbowed was supposed to come out on Elektra, but never did. His next band, Widowmaker, released a couple of flop albums. Snider's 2000 solo release Never Let the Bastards Wear You Down includes mostly '80s material, along with a cover of AC/DC's "Sin City" by a reunited Twisted Sister. In addition to hosting the syndicated radio show House of Hair, Snider also wrote and starred in the 1998 movie Strangeland, which featured a character, Captain Howdy, first introduced on Twisted Sister's Stay Hungry album.

In 1999 the cosmetics company Urban Decay named one of its colors after Twisted Sister, ensuring that the band would be remembered as one of the brightest footnotes in heavy-metal history. In 2000 group members requested that controversial then-Atlanta Braves pitcher John Rocker cease using their "I Wanna Rock" as his personal theme following his antigay, antiminority comments.

2 Live Crew had been making frankly salacious, but otherwise unexceptional, rap recordings for five years before gaining a national notoriety it otherwise may never have found, thanks to Florida authorities who sought to ban the group's records. 2 Live Crew's 1989 album As Nasty as They Wanna Be did, in fact, become the first recording ever declared obscene by an American court of law—even though the group had put a "parental warning" sticker on it and made an edited version, As Clean as They Wanna Be. But by March 1993 every obscenity ruling against the group had been overturned.

2 Live Crew founder Luther Campbell claimed to be raised a Catholic, as well as a devoted, community-minded family man: he defended his music as comedy—and indeed, more than any other rap act, 2 Live Crew drew on the black comic tradition of "blue-humored" party records by the likes of Redd Foxx and Richard Pryor, and the risqué '70s work of proto-rapper Blowfly. His first single, "Throw the D," helped launch the booming, bass-heavy Miami Sound in 1984. A year later he formed his label Skyywalker Records (changed to Luke Records after a lawsuit from Star Wars creator George Lucas) and 2 Live Crew. The group's second album, Move Somethin', caught enough ears to make #68 on the pop chart. But when 1989's As Nasty as They Wanna Be (#29, 1989) spawned a hit single in "Me So Horny" (#26, 1989), Jack Thompson—an evangelical Christian attorney from Coral Gables, Florida—launched the legal campaign against Campbell.

In March 1990 a Broward County, Florida, circuit court judge found probable cause that Nasty was obscene under state law, sheriff's deputies soon arrested a black record retailer in Fort Lauderdale for selling the album (his conviction was later overturned, a retailer in Huntsville, Alabama, who was also prosecuted for selling the album, was acquitted), Thompson got Florida Governor Robert Martinez to say he thought the album was obscene. Luke Skyywalker Records sued the Broward County sheriff on First Amendment grounds, and the state federal court ruled that there was a prior restraint of free speech, but that the LP was obscene. A week later Campbell and fellow rappers Chns Wong Won and Mark Ross were arrested at a Hollywood, Florida, nightclub for performing the songs on Nasty (which would sell 2 million copies, versus an eighth as many for its Clean version).

Later in 1990 the New York-based alternative-rock band Too Much Joy, in a show of solidarity, would be arrested for coming to Hollywood, Florida, and performing covers of Nasty songs; the band was ultimately cleared by a jury that deliberated for 13 minutes and then criticized authorities for wasting its time.

Between court appeals, Campbell recorded Banned in the U.S.A. (#21, 1990), with a Bruce Springsteen-derived cover and title track (#20, 1990). Capitalizing on the legal furor, Atlantic Records distributed the album. However, 2 Live Crew canceled several fall 1990 shows, as well as a Banned in the U.S.A. pay-per-view cable TV special, for lack of demand. On the plus side, Campbell and his cohorts were acquitted of obscenity charges from their nightclub arrest, by a jury that included a 76-year-old woman unfazed by 2 Live Crew's vulgarity, and another woman who wanted to deliver the not-guilty verdict in the form of a rap.

In May 1992 the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Georgia reversed the Florida obscenity ruling against the Nasty album, seven months later the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear an appeal, by which time the original 2 Live Crew had disbanded after releasing Sports Weekend (#22, 1991). Meanwhile, Campbell was in more legal trouble over 2 Live Crew's 1989 version of Roy Orbison's classic "Oh, Pretty Woman"—which Campbell and company had changed to be about "big, hairy," "bald-headed," and "two-timin'" women. Orbison's music publisher, the Nashville giant Acuff-Rose, had rebuffed Campbell's request for a license for the song, and sued him upon release of his version, claiming he'd damaged the song's value. Campbell defended his fair-use right to parody. A Nashville court's 1991 ruling against Acuff-Rose was overturned on appeal in 1992, and a year later the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear the case. Briefs on behalf of 2 Live Crew were filed by the producers of Home Box Office and political parodist Mark Russell, among others.

Meanwhile, Campbell's Luke Records struck gold in 1993 with the R&B vocal group H-Town, whose debut album, Fever for Da Flavor (#16, 1993), yielded a huge hit single in "Knockin' Da Boots" (#3, 1993). In early 1994 the U.S.

Supreme Court ruled in favor of Campbell that the Orbison takeoff was a parody. Concurrently, Campbell announced a new 2 Live Crew, and a publishing venture—an adult magazine called Scandalous. Campbell continued to pursue entrepreneurial interests—including movie production and Internet sites—and release solo albums throughout the decade, despite losing a $1.6 million lawsuit filed by one of his acts, filing for bankruptcy in 1995, and being investigated by the NCAA for allegedly making payments to members of the University of Miami football team, a charge Campbell denied. Other members of the 2 Live Crew continued to record under the name for Lil' Joe records, owned by Campbell's former attorney, Joe Weinberger, who also acquired the group's back catalogue. In 2001 Campbell claimed his Some-thin' Nasty would be his last album.

Known in the U.S. for their reggae-inflected covers of Neil Diamond's "Red Red Wine" (#1, 1988) and Elvis Presley's "Can't Help Falling in Love" (#1, 1993), UB40 has had more than 30 singles on the British charts since 1980, becoming one of the best-selling reggae bands in the world.

UB40's multiracial lineup and influences reflect their roots in working-class Birmingham. Originally a gang of lay-abouts (they took their name from the British unemployment form), they turned to music in early 1978, playing instruments bought with money awarded to singer/guitarist Ali Campbell as compensation for injuries received in a bar fight. Initially so bad they almost broke up, by Christmas they were good enough for Chrissie Hynde to invite them on a Pretenders tour. The band's quickly recorded single "Food for Thought" reached #4 in the U.K. in 1980, and was followed by the albums Signing Off (#2 U.K., 1980) and Present Arms (#2 U.K., 1981), which included their scathing anti-Thatcher anthem, "One in Ten" (#7 U.K., 1981).

Labour of Love (#14 pop, #1 U.K., 1983), an album of reggae covers that contained "Red Red Wine" (#34 pop, 1984, #1 U.K., 1983) put them in the U.S. chart for the first time. Albums of original material—Geffrey Morgan (#60, 1984), Rat in the Kitchen (#53, 1986), UB40 (#44, 1988), and an EP, Little Baggariddim (#40, 1985), which included a cover of "I Got You Babe" with Chrissie Hynde (#28, 1985)—sold only respectably in the U.S. In 1988 a Phoenix radio station added "Red Red Wine" to its playlist, other stations followed suit, and the song had a second life as a U.S. megahit, eventually climbing to #1, bringing Labour of Love with it to #14. Labour of Love II (#30, 1990) was another album of covers and included "The Way You Do the Things You Do" (a 1964 hit by the Temptations), which made it to #6. In 1993 the band released Promises and Lies (their second #1 U.K. album), with "Can't Help Falling in Love" and "Higher Ground" (#45, 1993) helping to propel it to #6 on the U.S. albums chart. UB40 never reached these heady heights again in the U.S., with 1997's Guns in the Ghetto peaking at #176. They were also dealt a blow when in 1995 a British judge ruled that the band's 1985 #1 British hit "Don't Break My Heart" had actually been written by Deborah Banks, a Birmingham amateur songwriter, and not by guest UB40 member Javid Khan.

Now better known for their cover versions than for their original material, UB40 continued to pay their respects to reggae with Presents the Dancehall Album, a collaboration with top Jamaican singers, and a third installment in the Labour of Love series featuring yet more covers of Jamaican classics.

U.K.

Formed 1977, England

Eddie Jobson (b. Apr. 28, 1955, Billingham, Eng.), kybds., violin; John Wetton (b. July 12, 1949, Derby, Eng.), bass, voc.; Allan Holdsworth, gtr.; Bill Bruford (b. May 17, 1948, London, Eng.), drums.

1978—U.K. (Polydor) 1979—(- Holdsworth; - Bruford; + Terry Bozzio [b. Dec. 27, 1950, San Francisco, CA], drums) Danger Money.

A British art-rock supergroup, U.K. drew together such respected veterans of the progressive-rock genre as Bill Bruford [see entry], King Crimson [see entry], John Wetton (King Crimson, Roxy Music [see entry], Uriah Heep [see entry]), Eddie Jobson (Roxy Music), and Allan Holdsworth (Jon Hiseman's Tempest, Tony Williams' Lifetime [see entry], Gong [see entry], Soft Machine [see entry]).

When U.K. was formed, Bruford and Wetton had last worked together in King Crimson; Holdsworth had played on Bruford's first solo album, which was released just prior to U.K.'s formation. U.K. became an immediate hit with progressive-rock fans, and its first album and U.S. tour were financially successful.

As the band featured Jobson's keyboards most prominently, Holdsworth's fluid, jazzy guitar seemed like icing on the cake, and he and Bruford soon left to work together on more jazz-fusion projects. The focus shifted decisively to Jobson as the band became a duo with the addition of drummer Terry Bozzio, fresh from a stint with Frank Zappa's Mothers of Invention. U.K.'s music became simpler and heavier, as Bozzio was less inclined toward dauntingly tricky, cracklingly precise meters than Bruford was. After Danger Money had been on the LP charts for a while, U.K. disbanded. Jobson went on to tour with Jethro Tull; Wetton cofounded another art-rock supergroup, Asia [see entry]; Bruford and Holdsworth continued to work together and separately. Bruford resurfaced in 1981 with the re-formed King Crimson, while Holdsworth came back in 1982 with a solo album and a brief low-level U.S. tour, and began working on an album produced by a fan, Eddie Van Halen. Bozzio cofounded Missing Persons [see entry].

1980—Electric Jazz (DIW); No Wave (Moers); Music Revelation Ensemble (DIW) 1992—After Dark (DIW) 1994—In the Name of the Music Revelation (Columbia) 1996—Knights of Power (DIW) 1998—Cross Fire.

In the early '80s James Blood Ulmer was hailed as the most innovative guitarist of his day. Combining a background of 10 years' hard roadwork on the R&B circuit and a grounding in "harmolodic" theory (harmony-movement-melodic) from its developer Ornette Coleman [see entry]. Ulmer's sound has roots in blues, hard rock, and avant-garde jazz.

Prior to Tales of Captain Black, his first album as a leader, Ulmer served for four months as the first guitarist for Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers and recorded with jazz organist Larry Young (Khalid Yasim) and tenor saxophonist Joe Henderson, he recorded as well with Coleman in a series of extensive though mostly unreleased sessions (Coleman appears on Captain Black). During the '80s Ulmer released more albums (Are You Glad to Be in America? introduced his Hendrix-style singing), backed by the cream of the younger jazz players, including drummer Ronald Shannon Jackson (who leads his own band, the Decoding Society) and well-regarded saxophonists Oliver Lake and David Murray. Ulmer's appeal is still largely to the jazz rather than rock audience, despite being picked by Public Image Ltd. to open their first New York concert and being signed in the early '80s to Columbia.

Starting in the late '80s, Ulmer has recorded for smaller labels (Rough Trade, Blue Note) and concentrated on live performances. In concert he usually appears as part of a highly amplified trio or quartet, most notably the Music Revelation Ensemble.

Ultravox

Formed 1973, London, Eng.

John Foxx (b. Dennis Leigh, Chorley, Eng.), voc., synth.; Steve Shears, kybds., voc.; Billy Currie (b. Apr. 1, 1952), kybds., synth., violin; Chris Cross (b. June 21, 1957], drums) 1990—U-Vox (Currie continues with numerous lineup changes).

John Foxx solo: 1981—John Foxx (Virgin, Can.).

Midge Ure solo: 1985—The Gift (Chrysalis) 1988—Answers to Nothing 1991—Pure (RCA) 1993—If I Was: The Very Best of Midge Ure (Chrysalis) 1996—Breathe (RCA).

Billy Currie solo: 1988—Transportation (I.R.S./No Speak).

An important precursor of the early-'80s British "electropop" movement, Ultravox was one of the first modern postpunk bands to dispense with guitars in favor of synthesizers.

The band was formed by and around John Foxx, who had become interested in music while dabbling in synthesizers and tapes at school. Foxx went to London in 1974, began writing songs and soon formed Ultravox, who had a minor British hit in 1977 with "My Sex" and made three critically acclaimed albums (the first produced by Brian Eno) before he left to pursue a solo career.

Ultravox regrouped with the addition of Midge Ure, formerly with Scottish popsters Slik and a late version of the ex-Sex Pistol Glen Matlock's Rich Kids. With a more dramatic lead singer and a slightly less foreboding sound, Vienna (#3 U.K., 1980) yielded a minor hit single in "Sleepwalk." Its title track hit #2 in the U.K. in 1981. Through its career, Ultravox was far more popular at home than here in the U.S. In addition to Vienna, Rage in Eden, Quartet, Lament, The Collection, and U-Vox were all U.K. Top 10 albums. The group's U.K. hit singles include "All Stood Still" (#8 U.K., 1981), "Reap the Wild Wind" (#12, 1982), "Hymn" (#11, 1982), "Visions in Blue" (#15, 1983), "Lament" (#22, 1984), and "Love's Great Adventure" (#12, 1984).

Electropopper Gary Numan, among others, has often cited Ultravox's influence on his own work, and Ultravox's Billy Currie toured with Numan. Three Into One, a compilation, followed. Rage in Eden (like Systems of Romance and Vienna) was produced by Conny Plank. George Martin produced Quartet, which went to #61 and became Ultravox's highest-charting album in the U.S. It included the minor hit single "Reap the Wild Wind" (#71, 1983). None of their other albums, before or since, broke into the Top 100 in the States. The group produced Lament, which made little impression stateside. The group's last U.S. release of new material was U-Vox, which was issued in the U.K. in 1986, a year before the band went on hiatus. A new Ultravox, led by Currie and various frontmen, released two widely ignored U.K. albums in the mid-'90s.

Several members have gone on to solo careers, most notably Midge Ure. He cowrote Band Aid's "Do They Know It's Christmas?" and is the musical director for the Prince's Trust concerts. His Answers to Nothing (#88, 1989) included "Dear God" (#95, 1989). Again, however, Ure's popularity here gives no indication of his success in the U.K., where he had a number of charting singles, including two Top 10s: "No Regrets" (1982) and the U.K. #1 "If I Was" (1985). Billy Currie's first solo album featured guitarist Steve Howe. John Foxx released several solo albums in the '80s, none of which was issued in the U.S. He has also charted a number of singles in England.

Uncle Tupelo

Formed 1987, Belleville, IL

Jeff Tweedy (b. Aug. 25, 1967, Belleville), voc., gtr., bass; Jay Farrar (b. Dec. 26, 1966, Belleville), voc., gtr.; Michael Heidorn (b. May 28, 1967, Belleville), drums.

1990—No Depression (Rockville) 1991—Still Feel Gone 1992—March 16–20, 1992 1993—(—Heidorn; + Ken Coomer, drums; + John Stirratt, bass; + Max Johnston, banjo, fiddle, mandolin, steel gtr.) Anodyne (Sire).

Small-town Midwestern high school pals Jeff Tweedy and Jay Farrar began playing together in a band called the Primitives before forming Uncle Tupelo. Mixing noisy punk-influenced guitar and feedback with country-tinged melodic twang, Uncle Tupelo was one of the preeminent roots bands that arose in the heartland in the wake of alternative rock.

After playing the local bar scene for three years, Uncle Tupelo signed with the indie label Rockville, which released

No Depression in 1990. Still Feel Gone came out the next year. Its compelling live shows gained the group a following that included college radio listeners. The live-in-the-studio March 16–20, 1992 included traditional C&W covers and was produced by R.E.M. guitarist Peter Buck. Uncle Tupelo then signed to Sire for the masterful Anodyne, which showcased Tweedy and Farrar's harmonies and put the focus on country rock, with multi-instrumentalist Max Johnston adding banjo, mandolin, fiddle, and steel guitar.

Tensions had been building between Tweedy and Farrar, however, and in June 1994 Farrar left the band. Under Tweedy's leadership, Uncle Tupelo transmogrified into Wilco [see entry]. Meanwhile, Farrar formed Son Volt [see entry] with original Tupelo drummer Michael Heidorn, enlisting bassist Jim Boquist and guitarist/fiddler Dave Boquist. Uncle Tupelo's legacy extends well beyond these offshoots, though. Along with fellow punk-bred country rockers the Jayhawks, the group was a catalyst for the grassroots alternative-country movement of the mid-'90s. Uncle Tupelo also gave rise to an online discussion folder dedicated to the group and its music. Named for the title track of the band's debut album (a cover of an old Carter Family song), the folder eventually led to the founding of No Depression magazine, which since 1995 has been the principal document of the alt-country movement.

The Undertones/Feargal Sharkey/ That Petrol Emotion

Formed 1975, Derry, N. Ire.

Northern Ireland's answer to Manchester, England's Buzzcocks, the Undertones emerged from strife-torn Northern Ireland with a rousing punk-pop sound—delivering teen angst and romance in fast, funous, catchy songs, sung in a distinctive high-pitched voice by Feargal Sharkey

The Undertones' first single, "Teenage Kicks" (#31 U.K.,

The Undertones

1978), was released on Belfast's Good Vibrations label and received heavy radio play in England from influential DJ John Peel, who called it his favorite record of all time. The band's critically acclaimed debut album (#154, 1980; #13 U.K., 1979) had cover art based on the Who's My Generation album. With Hypnotised (#6 U.K., 1980) and Positive Touch (#17 U.K., 1981), the Undertones slowed the pace and lowered the buzzsaw guitar noise; though their well-crafted pop was praised by critics, both albums failed to chart in the U.S. When the more elaborately produced Sin of Pride (#43 U.K., 1983) failed to produce a British hit single, the band broke up.

Sharkey formed the Assembly with keyboardist/composer Vince Clarke (Depeche Mode, Yazoo) to record the 1983 U.K. hit single, "Never Never" (#4), then launched a solo career with the single "Listen to Your Father" (#23 U.K., 1984), on which he was backed by British two-tone band Madness. He released three solo albums between 1985 and 1991, the first of which was produced by Dave Stewart of Eurythmics; his only U.S. charted single, "A Good Heart" (#74, 1986), hit #1 in the U.K.

In 1986 John (now Sean) and Damian O'Neill (now on bass) formed That Petrol Emotion, a critically well-received hard-rock band with some political lyrics and funk and noise elements. The band had only moderate chart success in the U.K. Sean O'Neill departed the band in 1990, and That Petrol Emotion broke up in 1994. The O'Neill brothers joined the other original members of the Undertones—minus Sharkey—for a 2000 reunion.

Underworld

Formed 1988, London, Eng.

Karl Hyde (b. May 10, 1957, Worcestershire, Eng.), voc., gtr.; Rick Smith (b. May 25, 1959, Ammanford, Wales), kybds.; Alfie Thomas, gtr.; Baz Allen, bass; Bryn B. Burrows, drums.

1988—Underneath the Radar (Sire) 1989—Change the Weather 1990—(group re-forms: Hyde; Smith, kybds., programmer; + Darren Emerson [b. Apr. 30, 1971, Hornchurch, Eng.], DJ, programmer) 1993—Dubnobasswithmyheadman (Junior Boys Own) 1996—Second Toughest in the Infants

(JBO/Wax Trax!) 1999—Beaucoup Fish (V2) 2000—Everything, Everything (—Emerson).

Thanks to its hit single "Born Slippy," Underworld was one of a small group of British electronic artists that achieved mainstream success in America during the mid-'90s. Unlike many of its even more successful contemporaries, however, Underworld did so without the help of rock-styled big-beat anthems (à la the Chemical Brothers) or by essentially transforming itself into a rock band (like Prodigy). Instead, the trio distinguished itself through its hypnotic techno beats and Karl Hyde's stream-of-consciousness lyrics, which the singer appeared to use not for their meaning but for the rhythmic patterns they created.

Underworld's origins stretch back to the early '80s, when Hyde and Rick Smith met while attending Cardiff University in Wales. Their first musical collaboration came with the art-rock band Freur, which had a minor U.K. hit with the 1983 single "Doot Doot." In 1988 they regrouped as Underworld, naming themselves after a film for which they had written the score. This early incarnation of Underworld released two albums of synth pop on Sire (1988's Underneath the Radar and 1989's Change the Weather) and then disbanded upon returning home from a support slot on the Eurythmics farewell tour.

By then, acid house had caught on in England. Rejuvenated by the change in musical climate, Hyde and Smith re-formed in 1990 with new recruit Darren Emerson, a futures trader and part-time club DJ. The trio released a few singles as Lemon Interrupt on London label Junior Boys Own in 1992; the following year, they returned to the name Underworld and recorded the singles "Rez" and "Mmm Skyscraper I Love You," the latter of which ended up on their 1993 debut, Dubnobasswithmyheadman. Critically acclaimed upon its release in Britain, the album was rereleased a year later in the U.S. on theTVT subsidiary Wax Trax! The followup, Second Toughest in the Infants, was equally hailed by the press and was nominated for the prestigious Mercury Music Prize in the U.K. Still, Underworld remained more or less unknown outside of certain circles, particularly in the U.S.

All this changed with the single "Born Slippy" released in the U.K. in 1995 and included on the soundtrack to 1996's hit film Trainspotting; the song went to #2 in the U.K. and introduced the Underworld to the American mainstream.

Underworld's third full-length, 1999's Beaucoup Fish (#93 pop) failed to garner the critical accolades of its predecessors; nonetheless, it was the first of the group's albums to chart in the U.S. A live Underworld full-length project, Everything, Everything, was released in 2000, the same year Emerson left the group to pursue DJing full-time. He released the mix CD Global Underground: Uruguay soon after his departure; the remaining two members continued to work on new Underworld material, as well as on their graphic-design company, Tomato.

"If this group makes it, I'll have to commit suicide," wrote one rock critic, expressing the critical consensus on Uriah Heep. This hard-rocking, hard-working group did indeed make it for much of the '70s with a blend of heavy metal and art rock that easily could have been the model for Spinal Tap.

The band's roots were in a London outfit called the Stalkers, which Mick Box joined in 1964. They were later joined by David Byron, who had sung on anonymous hit-cover albums alongside Elton John. Box and Byron then formed Spice with bassist Paul Newton of the Gods (which also included Ken Hensley, formerly with Kit and the Saracens and the Jimmy Brown Sound, and Mick Taylor, the latter going on to John Mayall and the Rolling Stones). Hensley worked briefly with Cliff Bennett's Toe Fat band, then joined Spice, who renamed themselves Uriah Heep after Charles Dickens' conniving paragon of "humility" They cut their hard-rock debut LP, then landed a regular drummer in Keith Baker.

The debut and Salisbury (#103, 1971), for which the band was augmented by an orchestra on some cuts, found only minor European success, though Uriah Heep was already an established concert attraction in Britain. Look at Yourself (#93, 1971) made the band a success in both the U.S. and U.K., and they consolidated their status with Demons and Wizards (#23, 1972), The Magician's Birthday (#31, 1972), Live (#37, 1973), and Sweet Freedom (#33, 1973), which all went gold in Britain and America. Uriah Heep also made the singles chart with "Easy Livin'" (#39, 1972), "Sweet Lorraine" (#91, 1973), "Blind Eye" (#97, 1973), and "Stealin'" (#91, 1973).

In 1974 dissent plagued the band. Bassist Gary Thain suffered a near-fatal electric shock onstage in Dallas, Texas, and later complained that the band was inconsiderate of his physical well-being. Personal problems and drug use furthered Thain's conflicts with the rest of the band, and in early 1975 he was "invited" to leave; he died of a drug overdose a year later. He was replaced by John Wetton, formerly of Family and King Crimson, who stayed with the band for two albums before further internal squabbles resulted in the firing of David Byron in July 1976. Wetton soon left to record a solo album and eventually joined art-rock supergroups U.K. and Asia. Hensley in the meantime had recorded two solo albums, 1973's Proud Words on a Dusty Shelf and 1975's Eager to Please. With new vocalist John Lawton and bassist Trevor Bolder, from David Bowie's Spiders From Mars band, Uriah Heep continued plowing its heavy-metal furrow for a few more albums. They were a favorite opening act and toured with Jethro Tull, Kiss, Rush, Foreigner, and other top-line arena rockers.

Through the years Uriah Heep has sustained many personnel changes. Among its former members are Chris Slade (who for a time was the drummer in AC/DC and in Jimmy Page's the Firm), and Lee Kerslake and Bob Daisley (both members of Ozzy Osbourne's Blizzard of Oz). The current lineup has remained intact since 1986. The group continues to tour and record, having played 10 sold-out shows in Moscow in 1987. Uriah Heep still keeps a high profile in Europe. On the tour following 1995's Sea of Light, the band temporarily reunited with Lawton when vocalist Bernie Shaw developed throat problems.

Usher

Born Usher Raymond, Oct. 14, 1978, Chattanooga, TN
1994—Usher (LaFace) 1997—My Way 1999—Live
2000—All About U 2001—8701.

Discovered at an Atlanta talent show, rapper/singer Usher Raymond was signed to R&B powerhouse LaFace Records when he was 14. The gospel-trained performer released his first album Usher (#167 pop, #25 R&B) in 1994 and enjoyed success on the R&B charts with "Can U Get Wit It" (#13, 1994) and "Think of You" (#8, 1995). Usher cowrote much of the 5-million-selling followup My Way (#4 pop, #1 R&B, 1997), with production by Jermaine Dupri, Babyface, and Sean Combs. The single "You Make Me Wanna" (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1997) made the vocalist a certified pop star, with "Nice & Slow" (#1 pop and R&B, 1998) and "My Way" (#2 pop, #4 R&B, 1998) confirming his hitmaking prowess. During 1998, Usher made his big-screen debut in the sci-fi spoof The Faculty, and went on to roles in the romantic teen comedy She's All That and the high-school drama Light It Up, as well as a recurring role on Moesha, the UPN TV show that featured another young R&B star, Brandy. The 1999 release Live (#73 pop, #30 R&B) marked time until Usher could complete his next studio effort, All About U. Its single, "Pop Ya Collar," (#60 pop, #25 R&B, 2000) did not fare well commercially. But "U Remind Me," the first single from his 2001 album 8701, hit #1 pop and R&B.

Formed 1982, Brooklyn, NY
Kangol (b. Shawn Fequiere, Aug. 10, 1966, Brooklyn), voc.; Dr. Ice (b. Fred Reeves, Mar. 2, 1966, Brooklyn), voc.; Educated Rapper (b. Jeffrey Campbell, July 4, 1963, Eng.), voc.; Mix-master Ice (b. Maurice Bailey, Apr. 22, 1965, Brooklyn), DJ.

U.T.F.O. touched a nerve when they released their second rap single, "Roxanne Roxanne" (#10 R&B, 1985), a dis of a girl who dared to refuse their advances. The hit, produced like all U.T.F.O. records by Full Force, set off numerous response singles, starting with Roxanne Shanté's [see entry] "Roxanne's Revenge" and leading to U.T.F.O.'s own answer, "The Real Roxanne," featuring rapper Joanne Martinez.

Untouchable Force Organization got its first break when they won a break-dancing contest in 1983 at Radio City Music Hall. The Flatbush boys subsequently toured Europe with Whodini (Dr. Ice's older brother was a member of that group), appeared on The Phil Donahue Show, and performed at a birthday party for Dustin Hoffman's daughter. U.T.F.O. featured both "Roxanne's" plus "Leader of the Pack" (#32 R&B, 1985) and "Fairytale Lover" (#36 R&B, 1985). The group grew musically on Skeezee Pleezer, although the album produced no hits, and Educated Rapper, who was battling a drug addiction, didn't perform on it. Lethal features a collaboration with thrash-metal band Anthrax and U.T.F.O.'s first foray into gangsta rap. After 1990's Bag It and Bone It bombed, U.T.F.O. split up. Kangol produced such artists as Gerardo and Lisa Lisa, and Dr. Ice released a solo album in 1989. In 1995 "Roxanne, Roxanne" was included in a listening booth at the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame & Museum designed to depict the full range of music that constitutes the genre.

As U2 as well as the Million Dollar Hotel Band (Bono with Brian Eno and Daniel Lanois): 2000—The Million Dollar Hotel soundtrack (Interscope).

U2 began the '80s as a virtually unknown "alternative" group and ended the century as one of the most widely followed rock bands in the world. The Irish rockers were influenced initially by punk's raw energy, but they immediately distinguished themselves from their postpunk peers with a huge, soaring sound—centered on Dave "the Edge" Evans' reverberated guitar playing and Paul "Bono" Hewson's sensuous vocals—and songs that tackled social and spiritual matters with an open, tender urgency. U2 shunned the sort of ironic expression and electronic gimmickry that were considered hip in the '80s—until the '90s, that is, when the band began drawing on such elements to reinvigorate and broaden its sound. By 2000's All That You Can't Leave Behind, U2 had revived its straight-ahead approach. U2 has maintained not only its massive popularity but also its status as one of the most adventurous and groundbreaking acts in pop music.

The band members began rehearsing together while students at Dublin's Mount Temple High School (the city's only nondenominational school). None was technically proficient at the beginning, but their lack of expertise mothered invention. The Edge's distinctive chordal style, for instance, stemmed largely from the guitarist's inability to play complicated leads, while bassist Adam Clayton and drummer Larry Mullen Jr. provided a rhythm section that was mostly pum-melting ardor. The novice musicians quickly developed a following in Ireland and found a manager, Paul McGuinness, who remains with them to this day. They recorded independently before signing to Island Records in 1980.

U2's 1980 debut album, Boy, was produced by Steve Lillywhite. On it, the group earnestly explored adolescent hopes and terrors, rejecting hard rock's earthy egotism and punk's nihilism. Bono, U2's lyricist, was (and still is) a practicing Christian, as were the Edge and Mullen, and on a second LP called October (a 1981 Lillywhite production), the singer incorporated imagery evoking their faith. Boy and October generated the respective singles "I Will Follow" and "Gloria," which got some airplay in the U.S. An American club tour generated further interest, thanks to U2's incendiary live performances.

War cemented U2's reputation as a politically conscious band; among its themes were "the troubles" in Northern Ireland, addressed on the single "Sunday Bloody Sunday." Another single, "New Year's Day," went to #11 in England and #53 in the U.S., while War topped the British chart and hit #12 stateside. The group commemorated its 1993 tour with the live EP Under a Blood Red Sky, recorded at Red Rocks Amphitheatre in Colorado.

U2's next studio album, 1984's The Unforgettable Fire, was the first of several fruitful collaborations with producers Brian Eno and Daniel Lanois. The album generated the group's first American Top 40 single, an ode to American Civil Rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., called "Pride (In the Name of Love)" (#33, 1984). The album hit #12 here, and the Irishmen supported it by headlining arenas around the world. In 1985 U2 was proclaimed "band of the '80s" by ROLLING STONE and made a historic appearance at Live Aid. The following year, the group joined Sting, Peter Gabriel, Lou Reed, and others for the Conspiracy of Hope Tour benefiting Amnesty International.

U2 entered the pop stratosphere with 1987's The Joshua Tree, a critical and commercial smash that topped the albums chart that year and spawned the #1 hits "With or Without You" and "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For," as well as "Where the Streets Have No Name" (#13, 1987). The LP, which was produced by Eno and Lanois, won the group two Grammys, for Album of the Year and Best Rock Performance. In 1988 U2 wrapped up a triumphant worldwide tour by releasing Rattle and Hum, a double album that combined live tracks with new material, and featured guest appearances by Bob Dylan and B.B. King. Rattle and Hum seemed bombastic to some critics; an accompanying film documentary also garnered mixed reviews. The LP nonetheless shot to #1, and produced a #3 single, "Desire" (1988). The band's next LP, 1991's Achtung Baby, reached #1 and drew rave reviews. The LP marked a stylistic departure, featuring more metallic textures, funkier beats, and intimate, world-weary love songs. Hit singles included "Mysterious Ways" (#9, 1992), "One" (#10, 1992), "Even Better Than the Real Thing" (#32, 1992), and "Who's Gonna Ride Your Wild Horses" (#35, 1992). Another track, "Until the End of the World," was featured in Wim Wenders' 1991 film of the same name. Lanois, who produced Baby with support from Eno and Lillywhite, won a Grammy for his work.

In 1992 the band embarked on its Zoo TV Tour, a flashy, multimedia extravaganza that juxtaposed the rugged simplicity of its previous shows. Bono adopted a series of wry guises—the leather-and-shades-sporting Fly the demonic MacPhisto—that he'd use for encores and, in the Fly's case, press appearances. In 1993, as the tour wound down, the band reentered the studio and made Zooropa, a quirky, techno-drunk affair coproduced by Eno, the Edge, and engineer Flood. The album reached #1 but yielded only the minor hit "Stay (Faraway, So Close)" (#61, 1993), which was also on the soundtrack to Wenders' 1993 movie Faraway, So Close. Johnny Cash sang lead on the track "The Wanderer." In 1993 the band renewed its contract with Island for an estimated $170 million. U2's contribution to 1995's Batman Forever soundtrack, "Hold Me, Thrill Me, Kiss Me, Kill Me," was a Top 20 hit. Also in 1995 the group collaborated with Eno as Passengers on a largely instrumental album called Original Soundtracks I; the only track to get attention was "Miss Sarajevo," on which Bono shared vocals with opera singer Luciano Pavarotti. Proceeds from the single's sales went toward war relief in Bosnia. The same year Bono and the Edge cowrote with Irish folk singer Christy Moore a song about the peace process in Ireland, "North and South of the River."

In 1996 Clayton and Mullen recorded a rock version of the "Theme From Mission: Impossible" for the film starring Tom Cruise. It went to #7 on the pop chart. The following year saw the release of the electronica-heavy Pop; the album debuted at #1 in 27 countries, including the U.S., and garnered hit singles in "Discothèque" (#10, 1997) and "Staring at the Sun" (#26). U2 embarked on its next stage extravaganza, the PopMart Tour, from 1997 to 1998. With a supermarket theme that played upon the concept of commercialism, the tour was even more grandiose than the Zoo TV Tour had been, with immense props that included a giant olive with a 100-foot-long toothpick, a 35-foot-high lemon, and a 100-foot-tall golden arch. At the tour's conclusion, U2 released a greatest-hits compilation with a remixed version of "Sweetest Thing," previously the B side of "Where the Streets Have No Name." This time the song was released as a single (#63, 1998).

Bono returned to political activism in 1999, with much of his focus on fighting world poverty. He met with President Bill Clinton, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, as well as the Pope, as a representative of Jubilee 2000, a nonprofit group devoted to convincing nations to forgive third-world debt in the new millennium. He also cowrote a song, "New Day," with Wyclef Jean of the Fugees [see entry]; the single's proceeds benefited relief efforts in Kosovo and the Wyclef Jean Foundation. The pair performed the song at the United Nations, as well as at NetAid, a concert held simultaneously in London, Geneva, and New Jersey's Giants Stadium, while being simulcast live on the Internet, to benefit several causes, among them third-world debt relief and global poverty.

In early 2000, the Wim Wenders movie The Million Dollar Hotel, based on a story co-conceived by Bono, was shown at the Berlin Film Festival and released in many countries. Bono coproduced the film, made a cameo appearance in it, and U2 recorded two new songs for the soundtrack, one of which, "The Ground Beneath Her Feet," was written around lyrics by controversial author Salman Rushdie. In addition, Bono recorded tracks with Lanois and Eno as the Million Dollar Hotel Band. U2 released an album of new material, All That You Can't Leave Behind (#3), in late 2000, featuring the single "Beautiful Day" (#40, 2000). Both album and single won Grammys in 2001.

Steve Vai

Born June 6, 1960, Carle Place, NY

1984—Flex-Able (Akashic); Flex-Able Leftovers (Relativity)
1990—Passion and Warfare 1993—Sex & Religion 1995—
Alien Love Secrets 1996—Fire Garden (Epic) 1999—The Ultra Zone 2000—*The 7th Song: Enchanting Guitar
Melodies*—Archives, vol. 1.

Guitarist Steve Vai has led a divided career. While his solo work has been hailed for its nuanced melding of jazz, rock, funk, and classical influences, he also has appeared as a hard-rock guitar-slinger for hire on albums by Frank Zappa, David Lee Roth, and Whitesnake.

Like countless other Long Island kids, the 13-year-old Vai picked up a guitar and formed a band. Unlike most, however, he had as a neighbor and guitar teacher Joe Satriani [see entry]. In 1979, when Vai was just 18, Frank Zappa asked him to play lead guitar in his band. Vai appears on numerous Zappa recordings, including Tinseltown Rebellion (1981), You Are What You Is (1981), Thing-Fish (1984), Them or Us (1986), and several Shut Up 'n' Play Yer Guitar albums, among others.

In 1984 Vai recorded his first solo album, Flex-Able in his home studio. Picked up by Relativity, the record sold close to 250,000 copies without much publicity or airplay. The Flex-Able Leftovers EP followed later that same year.

After a short stint in 1985 replacing Yngwie Malmsteen in Alcatrazz, Vai signed on as David Lee Roth's guitar player in 1986 and stayed with him for three years and two albums: Eat 'Em and Smile (1986) and Skyscraper (1987). He joined Whitesnake for one album, Slip of the Tongue (1989). In 1990 he released his third solo album, Passion and Warfare (#18). Sex & Religion (#48), released in 1993, signaled a move toward pop, with the addition of vocals and a band that included ex-Missing Persons drummer Terry Bozzio. That same year, Vai won a Grammy for Best Rock Instrumental Performance for his work on "Sofa" off the Frank Zappa tribute Zappa's Universe.

In 1996 Vai sang lead for the first time on his album Fire Garden (#106). That same year, he embarked on the G3 tour with fellow virtuosos Satriani and Eric Johnson. Each guitarist performed solo, then all three would get together and jam, the tour was documented on 1997's G3: Live in Concert (#108). Vai continued to experiment on his next solo album, The Ultra Zone (#121), on which he married his guitar playing to drum loops and samplers, and even explored dance grooves on tracks like "Voodoo Acid."

Though Vai has slowed down on collaborations to focus on his own music and on Favored Nations, the independent label he launched in February 2000, he still finds time for occasional guest appearances on records such as Al Di Meola's The Infinite Desire (1998) and Joe Jackson's Symphony 1 (1999).

Ritchie Valens

at Pacoima Jr. High 1981—The History of Ritchie Valens (Del-Fi/Rhino) 1986—The Best of Ritchie Valens.

The first of several Latin rockers of the late '50s and early '60s (others included Chan Romero, Chris Montez, Eddie Quinteros, Sunny and the SunGloves, and Cannibal and the Headhunters), Ritchie Valens started playing guitar as a child, and at Pacoima High (near L.A.) he formed his own band, the Silhouettes.

In the spring of 1958 Valens signed with Del-Fi Records and later that year had a Top 50 hit with "Come On, Let's Go," later covered by early-'60s British teen idol Tommy Steele. In early 1959 Valens hit #2 on the chart with his two-sided single "Donna" and "La Bamba," the latter based on a traditional Mexican wedding song. Valens appeared on nationwide TV and in package tours. On one such tour the stars' plane crashed in a snowstorm, killing Valens, Buddy Holly, and the Big Bopper. Valens was only 17. His life story was the basis of the 1987 hit film La Bamba, for which Los Lobos performed his music.

One of the few top-rank British art-rock bands that never achieved more than cult success in America, Van der Graaf Generator constructed stately sepulchers of Gothic sound with Hugh Banton's churchy Hammond organ and Guy Evans' virtuosic drumming framing the intensely existential verse and tortured vocals of Peter Hammill. Hammill's relentlessly bleak visions were later cited by some members (i.e. Johnny Rotten) of Britain's late-'70s punk-rock movement as their inspiration, and in fact Hammill created a "Rikki Nadir" persona for a solo album that presaged punk.

Van der Graaf Generator formed and split up and reformed several times, usually with the same core personnel, and played only one U.S. concert, in 1976 in New York. Hammill, however, has conducted several solo American tours, selling out club dates.

The band first came together at Manchester University in 1967. Founding member Chris Judge Smith gave the band its name (taken from a device that creates static electricity) but soon left, and the band broke up in late 1968. Hammill recorded material with the Van der Graaf core intended as a solo album, but when the band came back together before its release, The Aerosol Grey Machine was issued under Van der Graaf's aegis. Robert Fripp of King Crimson sat in on H to He. After the elaborate Pawn Hearts, the band broke up again for three years, during which time Hammill pursued his solo career in earnest. Fripp sat in on Fools Mate (Hammill returned the favor on Fripp's Exposure), ex-Spirit guitarist Randy California on Silent Corner.

In 1975, upon the release of the proto-punk Nadir's Big Chance Van der Graaf re-formed again, with a sound that was tighter and more powerful than before. In 1978 Van der Graaf apparently broke up for keeps; Hammill has continued to record solo efforts, remaining a significant cult phenomenon. He continues to tour internationally. Few of his numerous '90s albums have been released domestically.

Luther Vandross

Born Apr. 20, 1951, New York, NY

1981—Never Too Much (Epic) 1982—Forever, for Always, for Love 1983—Busy Body 1985—The Night I Fell in Love 1986—Give Me the Reason 1988—Any Love 1989—The Best of Luther Vandross, The Best of Love 1991—Power of Love 1993—Never Let Me Go (LV/Epic) 1994—Songs 1995—This Is Christmas 1996—Your Secret Love 1997—One Night With You—The Best of Love, vol. 2 1998—I Know (Virgin).

Luther Vandross emerged from jingles and background singing to become one of the preeminent black male vocalists of the era. With the exception of his solo debut and his post-1994 material, all of his LPs have been certified platinum or double platinum.

Vandross, whose older sister Patricia was a member of the doo-wop group the Crests, began playing piano at age three. In 1972 his song "Everybody Rejoice (A Brand New Day)" was included in the Broadway musical The Wiz. Throughout the '70s, Vandross sang on numerous commercials (from ads for the U.S. Army to Burger King). His singing was distinguished by his impeccable phrasing and vocal control. He first came to the attention of the pop world after his friend, guitarist Carlos Alomar, introduced him to David Bowie. Vandross ended up writing ("Fascination") and singing on David Bowie's Young Americans (1975) LP; he later toured with Bowie, then recorded and toured with Bette Midler (he appeared on her Songs for the New Depression).

He quickly became one of the busiest backing vocalists and arrangers in the business, recording with Ringo Starr, Carly Simon, Donna Summer, Barbra Streisand, and Chaka Khan, among others. During this time Vandross cut two little-noted albums under the name Luther, and sang on "Dance, Dance, Dance (Yowsah, Yowsah, Yowsah)" and "Everybody Dance" for Chic. He continued his highly lucrative jingles career. Following his lead vocal appearances on "Searchin'" and "Glow of Love" (from Change's hit album Glow of Love), several labels expressed interest in signing Vandross as a solo act. With the encouragement of his friend Roberta Flack, he invested $25,000 of his own money in two demos: "Never Too Much" and "A House Is Not a Home."

In 1981 he signed with Epic Records, who, on the basis of his demos, granted him full creative control, allowing him to write and produce. Never Too Much was a #1 R&B album and the title cut was a #1 R&B single (#33 pop), the album went platinum. Until 1993, each of his albums (with the exception of the #2 R&B The Best of and the platinum Never Let Me Go; #6 pop, #3 R&B) had topped the R&B chart. Any Love and Power of Love were also Top 10 pop albums. Other hit LPs include the platinum or multiplatinum Never Let Me Go (#6 pop, #3 R&B, 1993), Songs (#5 pop, #2 R&B, 1994), and Your Secret Love (#9 pop, #2 R&B, 1997); and the gold This Is Christmas (#28 pop, #4 R&B, 1995), One Night With You—The Best of Love, vol. 2 (#44 pop, #17 R&B, 1998), and I Know (#26 pop, 1998; #9 R&B, 1999). The latter was Vandross' debut for Virgin Records. He signed to Clive Davis' J Records in late 2000.

His hit singles include "Bad Boy/Having a Party" (#3 R&B, 1982), "I'll Let You Slide" (#9 R&B, 1983), "Superstar/Until You Come Back to Me (That's What I'm Gonna Do)" (#5 R&B, 1984), "Til My Baby Comes Home" (#4 R&B, 1985), "It's Over Now" (#4 R&B, 1985), "Give Me the Reason" (#3 R&B, 1986), "Stop to Love" (#1 R&B, 1986), a duet with Gregory Hines entitled "There's Nothing Better Than Love" (#1 R&B, 1987), "I Really Didn't Mean It" (#6 R&B, 1987), "Any Love" (#1 R&B, 1988), "She Won't Talk to Me" (#3 R&B, 1988), "For You to Love" (#3 R&B, 1989), "Here and Now" (#6 pop, #1 R&B, 1989), "Treat You Right" (#5 R&B, 1990), "Power of Love/Love Power" (#4 pop, #1 R&B, 1991), "Don't Wanna Be a Fool" (#9 pop, #4 R&B, 1991), "The Rush" (#6 R&B, 1991), the Janet Jackson duet "The Best Things in Life Are Free" (#10 pop, #1 R&B, 1992), "Sometimes It's Only Love" (#9 R&B, 1992), "Little Miracles (Happen Every Day)" (#62 pop, #10 R&B, 1993), "Heaven Knows" (#94 pop, #24 R&B, 1993), "Never Let Me Go" (#31 R&B, 1993), the Mariah Carey duet "Endless Love" (#2 pop, #7 R&B, 1994), "Always and Forever" (#58 pop, #1 R&B, 1994), "Love the One You're With/Going in Circles" (#95 pop, #28 R&B, 1995), "Every Year, Every Christmas" (#32 R&B, 1995), "Your Secret Love" (#52 pop, #5 R&B, 1996), "I Can Make It Better" (#80 pop, #16 R&B, 1996), "When You Call on Me" (#36 R&B, 1997), and "Nights in Harlem" (#29 R&B, 1998).

Throughout his career, he has continued to write and produce for other artists. He produced Aretha Franklin's Jump to It! in 1982; the title cut and the album went to #1 on the R&B chart. He also produced Franklin's 1983 Get It Right, Cheryl Lynn's 1982 LP Instant Love, which contained their duet "If This World Were Mine," a cover of a Marvin Gaye/Tammi Terrell hit, and records for Dionne Warwick, Teddy Pendergrass, and Whitney Houston. In 1993 he made his motion picture debut in Robert Townsend's Meteor Man.

Vangelis was in France at the time of the 1968 student riots; unable to return to Greece, he formed a band with Demis Roussos. That band, Aphrodite's Child, released a series of unremarkable progressive-rock albums, and had one European hit single with "Rain and Tears." Roussos went on to become an international MOR singing star. Vangelis turned to a solo career and began composing film scores with L'Apocalypse des Animeaux.

In 1974 Vangelis was rumored to be the replacement for Yes's departed keyboard whiz Rick Wakeman. Though he never did join Yes, Vangelis formed a lasting association with Yes singer Jon Anderson, and has worked with him on his solo projects. Vangelis also made albums on his own, such as Beaubourg, which were pastiches of electronic music and pop and jazz. Under the name Jon and Vangelis (see Yes entry), he and Anderson had four U.K. chart entries, including two Top 10 hits: "I Hear You Now" (1980) and "I'll Find My Way Home" (1981).

In 1982 Vangelis finally made his commercial breakthrough with the score to the film Chariots of Fire. The movie theme was on the singles chart for 15 weeks and went as high as #6, while the score won an Oscar. His followup single, "Titles," failed to match that success, but the Chariots theme did inspire numerous soundalikes for American TV commercials.

Vangelis has since scored a number of motion pictures, including Blade Runner (1982), Missing (1982), The Bounty (1984), Bitter Moon (1994), and 1492: Conquest of Paradise (1992). He has also composed music for three Jacques Cousteau documentaries. In 1992 he received the Chevalier Order of Arts and Letters, one of France's most important artistic honors. The 1994 rerelease of Blade Runner included never-before-released cuts featuring singers Mary Hopkin, Demis Roussos, and Don Percival.

Since their national debut in 1978, Van Halen has become one of the most popular American heavy-metal bands. Initially fronted by the flamboyant and ever-quotable David Lee Roth and always featuring the highly original guitar pyrotechnics of Eddie Van Halen, Van Halen garnered a loyal mass following that held fast after Roth's 1985 departure and beyond.

The Van Halen brothers' father, Jan, was a freelance saxophone and clarinet player who performed styles ranging from big band to classical in the Netherlands. The family arrived in Pasadena "with 15 dollars and a piano," as Eddie once said, in 1967, and Jan washed dishes, then played in wedding bands to support the family. Beginning around age six both Eddie and Alex received piano lessons and extensive classical music training, but once in America they discovered rock & roll. Eddie learned to play drums, and Alex learned to play guitar, eventually they traded instruments and started a band called Mammoth. Roth, the even-then outgoing and outrageous scion of a wealthy family and lead singer of another rival band, Redball Jet, joined them. The bassist and lead singer of another group, Snake, Michael Anthony came aboard shortly thereafter. After learning that there was already another group claiming the name Mammoth, the group considered calling themselves Rat Salade before deciding on Van Halen.

Van Halen played the Pasadena/Santa Barbara bar circuit for more than three years. Its sets initially consisted primarily of cover material ranging from disco to pop, but the band eventually introduced original songs and was soon one of the most popular groups in California, regulars at the Sunset Strip hard-rock club Gazzan's, and an opening act for Santana, Nils Lofgren, UFO, and other established acts. In 1977 Kiss' Gene Simmons spotted Van Halen in L.A.'s Starwood club and financed its demo tape. After seeing the group and upon hearing Simmons' recommendation, Warner Bros. Records' Mo Ostin and staff producer Ted Templeman signed Van Halen. Its self-titled debut album hit #19 and eventually sold more than 6 million copies. The debut single, a pile-driving cover of the Kinks' 1964 hit "You Really Got Me," hit #36. The followup, "Runnin' With the Devil," hit #84.

Roth's swaggering good looks and overtroverted persona, not to mention pithy statements on the rock & roll lifestyle he claimed to espouse, assured press coverage. But while the mainstream media focused on Roth, musicians and fans were riveted by Eddie Van Halen's guitar mastery and an array of unorthodox techniques that he developed as he taught himself to play: hammer-ons, pull-offs, two-hand tapping, and any combination thereof to produce his unique sound. In addition, the guitarist was also known to build and/or meticulously customize his instruments, using everything from sandpaper to chainsaws to alter the timbre of his instrument and achieve a distinct sound. Long before the group ever recorded, Eddie became a legend among local guitarists eager to learn the secret of his sound. Like countless guitarists before him, from Robert Johnson to Eric Clapton, Eddie began performing with his back to the audience to guard his technique.

Van Halen II, released as new wave began coming to the fore, continued in the group's straight-rock style and featured their first Top 20 single, "Dance the Night Away," as well as the popular "Beautiful Girls." Women and Children First spun off the single "And the Cradle Will Rock," a metal showcase that typified the band's dense, loud, crunching style. In 1979 Van Halen launched its second world tour, its first as headliner. Early on, the band embraced its larger-than-life image; for example, tour incidents ranged from Roth's breaking his nose on a lighting rig when jumping onstage to the band trashing its dressing room after a promoter failed to comply with the band's contractual stipulation that the backstage candy dish contain no brown M&Ms. Fair Warning, another multiplatinum effort, followed Diver Down, which included a hit cover of Roy Orbison's "Oh, Pretty Woman" (#12, 1982) and a Top 40 version of Martha and the Vandellas' "Dancing in the Street," became the group's highest-charting album to that point, peaking at #3. In 1981 Eddie married actress Valerie Bertinelli; in 1991 their son, Wolfgang, was born. Three years later, Eddie stopped drinking.)

Van Halen's biggest album with Roth was 1984 (#2, 1984), which contained the #1 hit "Jump" (on which Eddie played synthesizer) as well as "I'll Wait" (#13, 1984), "Panama" (#13, 1984), and "Hot for Teacher" (#56, 1984), all songs supported by popular videos that showcased both Roth's alternately swaggering and clownish persona and Eddie (and the rest of the group's) flashy musicianship. Shortly before 1984's release, Eddie Van Halen had composed and played the guitar solo on Michael Jackson's "Beat It," a few bars of heavy metal that many observers believed helped the video land a spot on MTV's then predominantly white playlist. The loquacious Roth and the soft-spoken Eddie had long been considered one of rock's oddest couples. When in 1985 Roth released his four-song EP Crazy From the Heat, and it spun off two hit singles—a cover of the Beach Boys' "California Girls" (#3, 1985) and a medley that paired Al Jolson's "Just a Gigolo" with Louis Prima's "I Ain't Got Nobody" (#12, 1985)—a breakup was widely rumored. The videos for the two songs were hugely popular, and for a time Roth had a film in development (the deal fell through). When Roth delayed recording for Van Halen's seventh album, tensions rose, and Roth left the band. That June, established hard-rock singer Sammy Hagar was named Roth's replacement.

The Hagar era began auspiciously, with the group's next three multiplatinum albums—5150, OU812, and For Unlawful Carnal Knowledge (or "F.U.C.K.," as it's slyly abbreviated)—hitting #1. Among the hit singles from these records were "Why Can't This Be Love" (#3, 1986), "Dreams" (#22, 1986), "Love Walks In" (#22, 1986), "When It's Love" (#5, 1988), "Finish What You Started" (#13, 1988) and "Feels So Good" (#35, 1989). Van Halen headlined the Monsters of Rock Tour in 1988 and in 1991 bought the Cabo Wabo Cantina, a Cabo San Lucas, Mexico, restaurant and bar. (Hagar later bought out the other members.) The innovative, text-oriented 1992 video for "Right Now" didn't boost the single beyond #55, but it did win MTV's Best Video of the Year award and provided the theme for a round of Pepsi commercials shortly thereafter. The year 1993 saw the release of the band's first live album, Van Halen Live: Right Here, Right Now (#5, 1993). Balance debuted at #1 in 1995 and sold double-platinum nearly immediately upon its release. It contained one Top 30 hit, "Can't Stop Lovin' You."

Throughout his tenure with Van Halen, Hagar continued to release solo albums [see entry]. While this wasn't considered a problem by the other members, tempers flared in spring 1996, when the band finished the Balance tour. Hagar's wife was pregnant and he wanted to take time off; the rest of the group wanted to work on a few new tracks for a greatest-hits compilation, an idea that Hagar was against. Some speculated that Hagar objected because a best-of package would undoubtedly feature songs from the Roth era, songs Hagar had declined to sing in concert. In June of that year, Van Halen claimed that Hagar left the band, while Hagar insisted that he was fired—a difference in opinion that has lasted to this day. The remaining members of Van Halen invited Roth back into the studio with them to record two new tracks for the hits album. That fall, the apparently reunited foursome presented a trophy at the MTV Video Music Awards, and speculation was that Roth was back in the band full-time. Apparently Roth thought so, too, because he was miffed when Eddie, the band's spokesperson, clarified in a press statement that Van Halen's intentions were to include Roth in a couple of new recordings and nothing more. Again, the difference of opinion regarding the group's original intention prevails.

With Hagar gone and Roth out of the picture again, Van Halen hired ex-Extreme [see entry] singer Gary Cherone as its new lead vocalist in November 1996. The choice was initially surprising, because Extreme's biggest hits, "More Than Words" and "Hole Hearted," were ballads, but the bulk of that band's catalogue was hard rock, and the collaboration seemed to reinvigorate Eddie Van Halen. He and Cherone immediately began writing songs together, with Cherone's lyrics inspiring Eddie's music—the first time the group's music wasn't written first. This new incarnation recorded Van Halen III (#4, 1998), an album that signaled another Van Halen first: Eddie singing lead on one song. The band toured and the single "Without You" rose to #1 on the Mainstream Rock chart, but CD sales fell quickly. The release sold just 500,000 copies, making it the first Van Halen album not to go at least double platinum. In November 1999 Cherone left the band. He recorded a solo album and returned to a Massachusetts stage production of Jesus Christ Superstar, which he starred in after Extreme broke up.

Although the remaining three members of Van Halen are still together, the band's future without a lead singer is uncertain. Meanwhile Eddie Van Halen, a heavy smoker, participated in what was said to be a clinical trial of preventative treatment for tongue cancer in 2000. In 2001 he revealed that he had been treated for cancer.

Diamond Dave's solo career yielded three platinum albums, with his third and fourth albums, Eat 'Em and Smile and Skyscraper, both Top 10, featuring the hits "Yankee Rose" (#16, 1986, from Eat) and "Just Like Paradise" (#6, 1988, from Skyscraper). The band for Eat 'Em included bassist Billy Sheehan, guitarist Steve Vai, and drummer Greg Bissonette.

This lineup remained fairly steady for Skyscraper, but Sheehan left, and in 1989 Vai began his solo career. A Little Ain't Enough, a critical and commercial disappointment despite its Top 20 showing, had no hit singles. In 1991 Roth fired his band and moved to New York City, where in April 1993 he was arrested while purchasing $10's worth of marijuana in Washington Square Park (he received a year's probation). His 1994 release, Your Filthy Little Mouth, continued the decline, and a 1998 album credited to the DLR Band fared no better. Even commenting on his low commercial standing, Roth remained quotable as ever and published a breezy, explicit autobiography entitled, Crazy From the Heat (with Paul Scanlon), in 1997.

One of the first heavy-rock acts, Vanilla Fudge was also a pioneer of the "long version." The band evolved from New York bar bands like the Pigeons and the Vagrants. The Pigeons included Mark Stein (who had played and sung on TV shows as a child and teenager, and who recorded in 1959 for Cameo Records), Tim Bogert, and, eventually, Vince Martell and Carmine Appice.

They named themselves Vanilla Fudge in early 1966 and began practicing their "psychedelic-symphonic rock." They made their New York concert debut July 22, 1967, at the Village Theater with the Byrds and the Seeds. By the end of the year they had signed to Atco Records. Vanilla Fudge's first single was an extended version of the Supremes' "You Keep Me Hangin' On," complete with half-speed tempo, Gothic organ, and quasi-raga guitar. The single was a Top 10 hit, and Vanilla Fudge's debut LP, which contained similarly treated versions of "Eleanor Rigby," "Ticket to Ride," "People Get Ready," and "Bang Bang," went gold. The followup LP sold fairly well but is chiefly remembered as one of the most over-reaching concept albums of all time; it purported to be a musical history of the previous 25 years, and included a 12-minute cut that, allegedly, contained the entire history of music.

The third album was even less popular and contained nine minutes of Donovan's "Season of the Witch." The band finally broke up in 1970, after its fifth, least successful album. Appice and Bogert went on to form Cactus; they later teamed up with Jeff Beck in the Beck, Bogert and Appice power trio. Appice became a session drummer; he has backed Rod Stewart, among others. In the mid-'80s he formed his own band, King Kobra, he later performed with Blue Murder. Stein played in the Tommy Bolin Band and toured with Alice Cooper. He also recorded solo for CBS, and has worked on numerous television and radio ads. The band reunited briefly in 1983, resulting in 1984's Mystery. Vanilla Fudge toured in 1987; the most recent live date took place in 1988 at the Atlantic Records 40th-anniversary concert at New York's Madison Square Garden.

Dave Van Ronk

Born June 30, 1936, Brooklyn, NY

1959—Ballads, Blues and a Spiritual (Folkways) 1960—Black Mountain Blues 1962—Inside Dave Van Ronk (Prestige) 1963—Folksinger 1964—In the Tradition; Dave Van Ronk and the Ragtime Jug Stompers (Mercury); Dave Van Ronk 1967—No Dirty Names (Verve/Folkways) 1968—Dave Van Ronk and the Hudson Dusters (Verve) 1974—Songs for Aging Children (Cadet) 1976—Sunday Street (Philo) 1985—Going Back to Brooklyn (Reckless) 1988—Somebody Else, Not Me 1990—Peter and the Wolf (Alacazam); Hummin' to Myself (Gazell) 1991—The Folkways Years, 1959–61 (Smithsonian Folkways) 1992—Statesboro Blues (EPM); Let No One Deceive You: Songs of Bertolt Brecht (with Frankie Armstrong) (Flying Fish) 1993—A Chrestomathy (Gazell); A Chrestomathy, vol. 2 1994—To All My Friends in Far-Flung Places 1995—From . . . Another Time and Place (Alcazar).

With his bawdy, gruff yet tender singing style and considerable blues-archivist skills, Dave Van Ronk became one of the most respected members of New York's early-'60s folk boom. Though he's never been a commercial success, he remains influential in folk circles as a performer, historian, and teacher.

Van Ronk grew up in a musical household, surrounded by his grandparents' collection of jazz and ragtime records. His grandfather also played ragtime piano. While in high school in Brooklyn, Van Ronk became avidly interested in traditional jazz and played with New York-area jazz groups upon graduation. After spending eight months at sea with the merchant marines, he returned to New York. Among his first gigs was one in 1957 opening for Odette, an experience that spurred him on to an in-depth investigation of blues and folk music, resulting in his becoming an avid fan of Josh White. He began performing on the folk circuit.

In 1958 Van Ronk formed a jug band with his friend, frequent collaborator, and fellow archivist Sam Charters and recorded an album for Lynchord Records. By 1959 he had played folk festivals and been signed to Folkways. While his next few albums for Folkways and Prestige stuck with his folk-blues mode, in 1964 he performed at the Newport Folk Festival with a jazz-flavored jug band, and soon after the festival he formed the Ragtime Jug Stompers, again with Charters.

By this time, Van Ronk had long been a close friend of Bob Dylan, who in the early '60s had frequently stayed at Van Ronk's Greenwich Village apartment. (In May 1974 he appeared with Dylan and others at a New York benefit for Chilean political prisoners.) At one point early in his career, Van Ronk also turned down manager Albert Grossman's offer of a place in the trio that became Peter, Paul and Mary. He briefly formed a rock-style band, the Hudson Dusters, and tried his hand at acting, but returned to touring.

Unlike many other folk artists of his period, Van Ronk is better known as an interpreter of songs rather than a writer; he was among the first to perform songs by Lightnin' Hopkins, for example, and his repertoire includes songs by writers ranging from Hoagy Carmichael and Louis Jordan to Joni Mitchell and the children's song "Teddy Bears' Picnic." Still living in Greenwich Village, he continues to perform around the world and to teach guitar. His Fingerpicking Folk, Blues, and Ragtime Guitar, a six-tape instructional tutorial, is available through Stefan Grossman's Guitar Workshop.

Little Steven Van Zandt

Born Steven Van Zandt, Nov. 22, 1950, Boston, MA
 1982—Men Without Women (EMI) 1984—Voice of America
 1987—Freedom—No Compromise (Manhattan) 1989—Revolution
 1999—Born Again Savage (Renegade Nation).

In the '80s Steven Van Zandt emerged from stints with fellow New Jersey Shoreans Southside Johnny and Bruce Springsteen to become a political artist. He is best known for putting together the antiapartheid superstar album Sun City.

Van Zandt was raised in Middletown, New Jersey, where he formed his first band, the Source, in 1966. In the early '70s he played in a number of groups, including Steel Mill and Southside Johnny's Asbury Jukes, before joining Springsteen's E Street Band as a guitarist in mid-decade. He also continued to work with Southside Johnny, writing songs for and producing the Jukes' first three albums.

In 1982 Van Zandt formed Little Steven and the Disciples of Soul, a 12-piece band including the Asbury Jukes' horn players, former Plasmatics bassist Jean Beauvoir, and ex-Rascals drummer Dino Danelli. Their first album was a solid, rootsy effort that Van Zandt produced under his E Street nickname, "Miami Steve." By his second album, Little Steven had quit Springsteen's group, dropping the "Miami." Voice of America showed his newfound commitment to international politics; Black Uhuru later covered the track "Solidarity."

In 1984 Van Zandt made two visits to South Africa, and upon his return, he gathered over 50 performers, including Springsteen, Bob Dylan, Miles Davis, George Clinton, Bonnie Raitt, Lou Reed, and Bono, to form Artists United Against Apartheid. The group recorded Van Zandt's "Sun City." The song grew into an album, coproduced by Arthur Baker, a popular video, and a concert, all of which raised money for antiapartheid efforts. It also refocused public attention on the longstanding cultural boycott against South Africa, which many entertainers had broken by playing the lucrative Vegas-style resort Sun City.

Manhattan, the label that released Sun City, signed Van Zandt and released Freedom—No Compromise, on which he continued playing protest songs. Springsteen sang on "Native American," and Van Zandt duetted with Ruben Blades on "Bitter Fruit," a song about labor conditions in Central America. None of Van Zandt's solo records has sold well in the U.S., and 1989's Revolution produced scarcely a ripple. In 1991 he reunited with Southside Johnny and Springsteen, producing Southside's Better Days. The single and video "It's Been a Long Time" featured the three Jerseyites. Van Zandt has also produced a number of other artists, including Gary "U.S." Bonds, Lone Justice, and Ronnie Spector.

Van Zandt spent much of the '90s out of the limelight, but in 1999 landed a role in the popular and critically acclaimed HBO series The Sopranos, where he plays the part of Silvio Dante, a Jersey street guy and mob enforcer. Later the same year Van Zandt signed on with Springsteen's reunited E Street Band, with whom he embarked on a year-long world tour. Van Zandt also released Born Again Savage, his fifth solo album, in 1999. Initially available only through his Web site, the record features U2's Adam Clayton on bass and Jason Bonham, the son of the late Led Zeppelin drummer John Bonham, on drums. The fifth in a series of concept albums dealing, by turns, with the individual, the family, the state, the economy, and religion, Born Again Savage finds Van Zandt exploring various dimensions of human spirituality.

Townes Van Zandt

Born John Townes Van Zandt, Mar. 7, 1944, Fort Worth, TX; died Jan. 1, 1997, Mount Juliet, TN

1967—First Album (Poppy/Tomato) 1968—For the Sake of the Song 1969—Our Mother the Mountain 1970—Townes Van Zandt 1971—Delta Momma Blues 1972—High, Low and Inbetween 1973—The Late, Great Townes Van Zandt 1977—Live at the Old Quarter 1979—Flying Shoes 1987—At My Window (Sugar Hill) 1989—Live and Obscure 1993—The Nashville Sessions (Tomato) 1994—Road Songs (Sugar Hill); No Deeper Blue 1997—Rear View Mirror; The Highway Kind 1999—A Far Cry From Dead (Arista/Austin) 2000—In Pain (Normal, Ger.).

Townes Van Zandt was a Texas-based singer/songwriter who was content to live the life of a hermetic, legendary folk artist while other performers turned his songs into hits. Van Zandt was born into a wealthy, pedigreed Texas family. His reputation as a rambling man dates back to his childhood, when his family moved frequently. He began playing guitar at 15, after seeing Elvis on TV.

Along with fellow Texas singer/songwriter cult heroes like Guy Clark, Van Zandt began singing folk clubs and juke joints in Houston, branching out into the Southwest circuit. He developed a reputation as a wild man; many of his tunes are drinking songs. His cult following is primarily interested in his somber, poetic, introspective tunes and folksy tales. Van Zandt has frequently been called a more down-home Leonard Cohen.

Van Zandt moved to Nashville the year his first album came out. He never availed himself of that city's music biz, however, releasing his records on small, poorly distributed labels and allowing his song rights to get hung up in legal quagmires. He moved to Austin, Texas, in the late '70s, just as he was getting his first mainstream exposure with Emmylou Harris' 1977 cover of "Pancho and Lefty," a song he wrote earlier in the decade. Six years later Merle Haggard and Willie Nelson turned the cut into a major country hit with their duet rendition. In 1981 Harris and Don Williams' cover of "If I Needed You" topped the country chart. Van Zandt's songs have also been recorded by Doc Watson and Guy Clark.

Van Zandt returned to Nashville in 1986 and began recording again. At My Window was his first album of new material in eight years. He was embraced by a new generation of folk-based artists. Canada's Cowboy Junkies took Van Zandt on tour with them in 1990, and Van Zandt contributed two songs to the Junkies' 1992 album, Black Eyed Man. Van Zandt continued to be more interested in writing than recording, allowing his music to be released on disparate labels around the world. Road Songs, for example, was released in Europe almost two years prior to its U.S. issue.

Van Zandt began working on a new studio album toward the end of 1996, but didn't live to finish it, dying of a heart attack on January 1, 1997, while recuperating from hip surgery at his home just outside Nashville; he was 52. Guy Clark, Steve Earle, Lyle Lovett, Emmylou Harris, and other friends paid tribute to Van Zandt at a memorial service held in Nashville immediately after his death. Joined by Willie Nelson and Van Zandt's son J.T., much the same group taped a musical tribute to the late singer/songwriter for the PBS music series Austin City Limits later in the year. Sugar Hill Records also released a pair of albums at the time of Van Zandt's death: Rear View Mirror, a reissue of an acoustic live album that first came out overseas in 1993, and The Highway Kind, a collection of more recent recordings. A Far Cry From Dead followed in 1999. The album featured studio musicians adding accompaniment to 13 songs Van Zandt had recorded between 1989 and 1991. Two of its tracks were previously unreleased numbers, among them "Sanitarium Blues," a harrowing reflection based on the time Van Zandt spent in a mental hospital as a teenager.

Stevie Ray Vaughan

Born Oct. 3, 1954, Dallas, TX; died Aug. 27, 1990, East Troy, WI

1983—Texas Flood (Epic) 1984—Couldn't Stand the Weather
1985—Soul to Soul 1986—Live Alive 1989—In Step
1991—The Sky Is Crying 1992—In the Beginning 1995—
Greatest Hits 1997—Live at Carnegie Hall 1999—The Real Deal: Greatest Hits, vol. 2 2000—Blues at Sunrise; Stevie Ray Vaughan and Double Trouble.

As the Vaughan Brothers (with Jimmie Vaughan): 1990—Family Style (Epic).

Before his untimely death in 1990, guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan had become the leading figure in the blues-rock revival he spearheaded in the mid-'80s.

Vaughan's first musical inspiration was his older brother Jimmie, a guitarist who later helped form the Fabulous Thunderbirds [see entry]. Together, the brothers immersed themselves in the work of blues guitar greats like B.B. King, Albert King, and Freddie King, and early rock guitarists like Lonnie Mack (whose 1985 comeback, Strike Like Lightning, Vaughan would coproduce). By the time he was 14, Vaughan was already playing Dallas blues clubs with a variety of bands including Blackbird, the Shantones, and the Epileptic Marshmallow. Dropping out of high school in 1972, Vaughan relocated to Austin, Texas, the up-and-coming musical haven where his brother had already established himself.

In Austin Vaughan formed the Nightcrawlers and then joined the Cobras for a year. Vaughan's next group was Triple Threat, which included Lou Ann Barton among its five vocalists. After three years with Triple Threat, Vaughan and Barton formed Double Trouble. Barton left to go solo, and Double Trouble reverted to a power trio with Chris Layton on drums and Tommy Shannon, a bassist who had played with Johnny Winter in the late '60s. Vaughan's fluid Hendrix-meets-the-blues-masters guitar playing, his rough-edged vocals, and the trio's live intensity made them local legends. (In the Beginning captures a 1980 radio broadcast.)

By 1982 the band's considerable reputation had reached the Rolling Stones, who hired Double Trouble to perform at a private party in New York. That same year, veteran producer Jerry Wexler arranged for Vaughan's band to play the Montreux Jazz Festival—the first time an unsigned, unrecorded group had done so. David Bowie caught the performance and tapped Vaughan to play on his next album. Vaughan's gritty guitar work became one of the unexpected highlights of Let's Dance. Legendary talent scout John Hammond became Vaughan's most important mentor, signing Double Trouble to Epic and acting as executive producer for the band's debut, Texas Flood (#38, 1983). Vaughan's raw, blues-drenched virtuosity struck a chord with a grass-roots audience. Couldn't Stand the Weather (#31, 1984) saw Vaughan pay explicit tribute to Jimi Hendrix with an exact cover of "Voodoo Chile (Slight Return)." In 1985 Vaughan became the first white performer to win the W.C. Handy Blues Foundation's Blues Entertainer of the Year award; that year Vaughan also added keyboardist Reese Wynans to the band.

After collapsing onstage during an English tour, Vaughan sought help to deal with his cocaine and alcohol addictions, entering a treatment center in September 1986. "Wall of Denial" on his 1989 album, In Step (#33), addressed his addiction and rehabilitation. In 1987 he made a rare film appearance trading guitar leads on "Pipeline" with surf-guitar king Dick Dale in the Annette Funicello film Back to the Beach. A 1989 tour with Jeff Beck attested to Vaughan's renewed strength and continued popularity.

On leaving an East Troy, Wisconsin, theater—following an onstage guitar jam that included Eric Clapton, Jimmie Vaughan, Buddy Guy, Robert Cray, and Jeff Healey—Vaughan was killed in a helicopter crash. By then, Vaughan was firmly established as the era's premier blues-rock performer. Two posthumous releases—Family Style (#7, 1990), a collaboration with Jimmie Vaughan, and The Sky Is Crying

(#10, 1991)—became Vaughan's best-selling recordings. Greatest Hits and Live at Carnegie Hall went to #39 and #40, respectively.

In 1995 Jimmie Vaughan organized an all-star tribute concert in Austin featuring Eric Clapton, Buddy Guy, B.B. King and more. A Tribute to Stevie Ray Vaughan, released the following year, won a Best Rock Instrumental Grammy for the cut "SRV Shuffle." As a new generation of guitarists (notably Kenny Wayne Shepherd) copied Vaughan's signature style, his catalogue continued to sell more than 800,000 copies a year. Epic/Legacy reissued his first four albums with bonus tracks in 1999, along with The Real Deal: Greatest Hits, vol. 2, which entered the charts at #53. Blues at Sunrise, a collection of slow blues recordings, was released in 2000 as was the box set Stevie Ray Vaughan and Double Trouble.

Bobby Vee

Born Robert Thomas Velline, Apr. 30, 1943, Fargo, ND
 1961—Bobby Vee (Liberty) 1962—Bobby Vee Meets the Crickets; Golden Greats 1963—The Night Has a Thousand Eyes; Bobby Vee Meets the Ventures 1967—Come Back When You Grow Up 1972—Robert Thomas Velline 1975—The Very Best of Bobby Vee (United Artists) 1990—Bobby Vee (EMI); U.K. Tour '90 (Rockhouse) 1992—Last of the Great Rhythm Guitar Players 1999—Down the Line.

One of the longest-lasting teen idols of the early '60s, Bobby Vee got his lucky break when he and his band the Shadows filled in for the late Buddy Holly at a 1958 Mason City, Iowa, concert days after Holly had died in a plane crash. The Shadows (which included Bobby's brother Bill) then managed to get their song "Suzie Baby" recorded locally, and it became a hit. Producer Snuff Garrett signed the band to Liberty Records in 1959, releasing "Suzie Baby" (#77) nationally.

At Liberty, Vee was quickly (and literally) groomed for solo success, under Garrett's supervision. First, Garrett had Vee cover British teen-idol Adam Faith's "What Do You Want?," which flopped at #93 in the spring of 1960. But later that year a cover of the Clovers' R&B hit "Devil or Angel" hit #6 on the U.S. singles chart. "Rubber Ball" (cowritten by Gene Pitney) was a Top 10 hit in the U.S. (#6) and the U.K., and for the next few years the clean-cut Vee, in his high school letter sweater, sang sweetly of the ups and downs of sexless romance from the top of the charts with hits like "Take Good Care of My Baby" (#1) and "Run to Him" (#2) in 1961; "Punish Her" (#20) in 1962, and "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes" (#8) and "Charms" (#13) in 1963.

Vee was just as enormously popular in Britain as in America, and he toured both countries frequently. In the midst of his big-hit years, Vee cut a Buddy Holly tribute album with the Crickets, as well as one other album simply backed by Holly's onetime band. The mid-'60s were fallow years for Vee, but he returned to the charts in 1967 with the million-selling "Come Back When You Grow Up" (#3). In 1972 he recorded an album under his real name, but it did not chart.

In the years since Vee has no further charting singles, but he continues to tour the world (including an annual trip to England, where in 1981 he was awarded a gold album for his Singles Album). He resides in Minnesota with his family, and has his own studio and record label, Rockhouse Records. In 1999, with the help of his three sons, Vee celebrated his 40th anniversary in rock & roll by releasing Down the Line, another tribute to Holly.

Suzanne Vega

Born Aug. 12, 1959, New York, NY
 1985—Suzanne Vega (A&M) 1987—Solitude Standing
 1990—Days of Open Hand 1992—99.9 F° 1996—Nine Objects of Desire 1999—Best of Suzanne Vega: Tried & True (PolyGram International, Swe.).

In 1987 a ballad about an abused child, "Luka," proved Suzanne Vega's unlikely ticket to pop stardom, reaching #3 on the singles chart and situating Vega, alongside Tracy Chapman, at the forefront of a new wave of thoughtful, folk-influenced female singer/songwriters. Three years later, Vega's career got another unexpected lift when a pair of enterprising British remixers brought her back into the Top 10 in 1990, with a hip-hop version of her 1987 song "Tom's Diner."

Vega grew up in New York's Spanish Harlem, the eldest of four children. Her Puerto Rican stepfather, a writer and teacher, encouraged Vega's early interest in dance and the guitar. At the High School of Performing Arts, she studied the former and began composing on the latter; at 16 she began playing her songs at Greenwich Village coffeehouses. After graduating, Vega became a literature major at New York's Barnard College while continuing to perform acoustic folk at downtown clubs. In 1983, while supporting herself as a temporary receptionist, she met lawyer Ron Fierstein and musician/producer Steve Addabbo, who were starting their own music promotion company. The fledgling partners began managing Vega, and with their assistance, she landed a contract with A&M Records.

Produced by Addabbo and ex-Patti Smith guitarist Lenny Kaye, Vega's eponymous 1985 debut album, which included "Marlene on the Wall," established her as a critical and cult favorite in the U.S., and reached #11 on the British pop chart. The next year, Vega contributed the song "Left of Center" to the film soundtrack for Pretty in Pink, and wrote lyrics for two tracks on Philip Glass' Songs From Liquid Days. In 1987 Solitude Standing proved her domestic breakthrough album, shooting to #11 (and to #2 in England) with the help of "Luka."

In 1990 Vega's third album, Days of Open Hand, peaked at #50 and spawned no hit singles. But that same year, the U.K. sampling/remixing duo DNA added a funky rhythm track to "Tom's Diner," a song from Solitude Standing, and released it—without Vega's permission—as a bootleg. Vega and A&M were savvy enough to get rights to the single, which quickly became a club sensation and then a pop hit (#5 U.S., #2 U.K.). In 1991 A&M capitalized further on this success by releasing Tom's Album, a collection of reworkings of the song by various artists, including R.E.M.

Perhaps encouraged by this reception, Vega hired noted keyboardist and producer Mitchell Froom (Elvis Costello, Crowded House, Los Lobos) to incorporate dance and technopop textures on her fourth album. Nonetheless, 99.9 F° reached only #86, but the recording of this album would change Vega's life, though they weren't involved with each other while working together, six months after wrapping the project, Froom left his wife for Vega, and the two were a secret item while doing interviews for the album in 1992. Their daughter, Ruby, was born in 1994, and the couple married the following year. Froom produced Vega's next album, 1996's Nine Objects of Desire (#92), which included the atypically upbeat "No Cheap Thrill" as well as such personal accounts as "Birth-day (Love Made Real)," about giving birth.

Froom became the keyboardist in her band in order to keep the family together while on tour. While this album wasn't a mainstream success either, Vega maintained her fan base, calling for the publication of a book of her lyrics, poems, and essays, entitled The Passionate Eye: The Collected Writing of Suzanne Vega, in 1999. Upon its publication, she embarked on a national book tour, reading excerpts and signing autographs. In 2000 she and Froom divorced, and Vega began writing songs about the end of the relationship, singing some of them on tour in Europe. She planned to write enough songs for another album, record them with producer Rupert Hine (Howard Jones, Tina Turner), and release an acoustic-based album in 2001.

(Verve)* 1986—Another View 1993—(group re-forms: Reed; Cale; Morrison; Tucker) Live MCMXCIII (Sire) 1995—Peel Slowly and See (Polydor).

The Velvet Underground never sold many records, but, as many have said, it seems like every one of the group's fans went out and started a band. While their songs were constructed on the same three chords and 4/4 beat employed by most late-'60s rockers, the Velvets were unique in their intentional crudity, in their sense of beauty in ugliness, and in their lyrics. In the age of flower power they spoke in no uncertain terms of social alienation, sexual deviancy, drug addiction, violence, and hopelessness. Both in their sound and in their words, the songs evoked the exhilaration and destructiveness of modern urban life. The group's music and stance were of seminal importance to David Bowie, the New York Dolls, Patti Smith, Mott the Hoople, Roxy Music, the Sex Pistols, R.E.M., Sonic Youth, the Jesus and Mary Chain, Luna, and countless others of the protopunk, punk, and postpunk movements.

In 1964 John Cale [see entry] met Lou Reed [see entry] in New York City. Both had been classically trained—Cale as a violist and theorist, and Reed as a pianist. By the time of their first meeting Cale was engaging in avant-garde experimentation with La Monte Young and Reed was writing poems about down-and-out streetlife. Cale, Reed, Sterling Morrison, and Angus MacLise (the percussionist in Young's ensemble) formed a group that played under various names—the Warlocks, the Primitives, the Falling Spikes—in galleries and at poetry readings around lower Manhattan. As the Primitives, they recorded a series of singles on Pickwick Records, for which Reed had once worked as house songwriter. In 1965 the quartet became known as the Velvet Underground. MacLise, who frowned upon the idea of playing for money, quit prior to the rechristened combo's first paying performance (A poet and virtuoso percussionist who spent years living in Asia, he died of malnutrition in Nepal in 1979. Archival CDs of his raga-influenced solo work appeared in 1999 and 2000.) Maureen Tucker was enlisted to take his place on a per-diem basis, which became permanent when she constructed her own drum kit out of tambourines and garbage-can lids.

On November 11, 1965, the group played its first gig as the Velvet Underground, opening for the Myddle Class at a high school dance in Summit, New Jersey. Within a few months, Reed, Morrison, Cale, and Tucker had taken up residency at the Café Bizarre in Greenwich Village, where they met pop artist Andy Warhol. When they were fired by the Bizarre's management for performing "Black Angel's Death Song" immediately after being told not to, Warhol invited them to perform at showings of his film series, Cinematique Uptight. He soon employed them as the aural component of his traveling mixed-media show, the Exploding Plastic Inevitable. For the latter, he augmented the lineup with singer/actress Nico [see entry], to whom he gave equal billing on the Velvets' first album. She sang only three songs on the record, which was recorded in 1966. Two singles—"I'll Be Your Mirror" b/w "All Tomorrow's Parties" and "Sunday Morning" b/w "Femme Fatale"—were released. The LP, which included Reed's "Heroin" and "Venus in Furs" (a song about sado-masochism), appeared nearly a year after its completion. It sported a Warhol cover with a peelable illustration of a banana.

The group had a falling-out with Warhol when it performed in Boston without Nico and the rest of the Inevitable troupe, who arrived late. The Velvets then took on Steve Sesnick as their manager. Without Warhol's name and knack for generating publicity, they faded from public attention. Their following was reduced further with the uncompromisingly noisy White Light/White Heat, which they recorded in a single day following a tour of mostly empty theaters. Cale, frequently in a power struggle with Reed, eventually quit. The remaining members enlisted Doug Yule, who had played with a Boston folk-rock Velvets, the Glass Menagerie. The third album, recorded in L.A., was much softer than either of its predecessors. It cost the group all but the most loyal of their following. MGM dropped the band and it was some months before Atlantic became interested.

Upon their return to New York to record in the summer of 1970, the Velvets played a month-long engagement at Max's Kansas City (with Doug's younger brother Billy Yule deputizing for Tucker, who was pregnant). These were the group's first appearances in New York since 1967, and they rekindled some interest. But soon after Loaded was finished, Reed, at odds with Sesnick, left the group and moved to England, where he lived for two years before reemerging as a solo performer. Although he denounced Loaded, claiming it was remixed after his departure (a charge Yule and Morrison denied), the album introduced "Sweet Jane" and "Rock and Roll."

With Doug Yule now on guitar and new bassist Walter Powers, the Velvet Underground toured the East Coast before Morrison dropped out in 1971 to teach English at the University of Texas in Austin. Tucker left following a tour of the U.K. She moved to Phoenix, Arizona, then to southern Georgia, where she raised a family and in 1980 began recording solo efforts. Yule retained the Velvet Underground name until 1973. Minus any of the principal Velvets, he recorded Squeeze, which was released only in Britain.

With the success of Reed's solo career and, to lesser extents, Cale's and Nico's, the Velvet Underground generated more interest in the '70s than it had during its existence. Two live albums were released: 1972's Live at Max's Kansas City, recorded the night of Reed's last appearance with the group, and 1974's The Velvet Underground, recorded in 1969 in Texas and California.

In 1989 Cale and Reed performed a song cycle written in memory of Andy Warhol, who died in 1988; the work was released on the 1990 album Songs for Drella. In June of that year, the best-known lineup of the Velvet Underground (minus Nico, who died in 1988 of head injuries sustained in a cycling accident) reunited onstage at a Warhol tribute in a small town near Paris. Their 10-minute version of the song "Heroin" led to another reunion three years later. With their longstanding differences seemingly resolved (particularly the battling egos of Reed and Cale), the players began rehearsals for several European shows slated for the summer of 1993. Highlights of the tour were documented on a video and album, Live MCMXCIII. That fall, however, the band fell apart once more, reportedly due to a spat between Cale and Reed over who would produce the group's upcoming MTV Unplugged appearance and album. The members again went their separate ways. All save Reed performed in late 1994, improvising music for the screenings of two silent Warhol films at the Andy Warhol Museum in Pittsburgh. Reed, Cale, and Tucker resumed their solo careers. Morrison, who occasionally performed with Tucker, died of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma in 1995. The following year, the classic lineup was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. The five-CD Peel Slowly and See contains the Reed-era albums plus numerous bonus tracks.

The Ventures are one of the first, best, most lasting, and influential of instrumental guitar-based rock combos (rivaled only by Britain's Shadows). Their trademark sound—driving mechanical drums, metallic guitars twanging out simple, catchy pop tunes—has filtered down through the years to gain prominence in the sounds of bands like Blondie, the B-52's, the Go-Go's, and others. Often classified as a surf-rock band, the Ventures actually predated surf music and lasted well beyond its early-'60s boom. Some 35 years after their forming, they still play to receptive audiences.

Founding member Bob Bogle had started playing guitar by his teens. In his mid-teens, he supported himself by bringing wet cement to bricklayers, and he moved to Seattle to work. There he met Don Wilson, who had learned piano and trombone as a child, and bass and guitar in the army. By mid 1959 they had begun playing in local clubs. They soon added Nokie Edwards on lead guitar (Bogle switching to bass) and Howie Johnston on drums. They sent their first demo, "Walk Don't Run," to various record labels. When nobody responded, Don Wilson's mother released it as a single on her own Blue Horizon label. It became an instant regional hit in 1960, and in late summer was picked up for distribution by Dolton Records (distributed by Liberty).

In August 1960 "Walk Don't Run" became a #2 hit. The Ventures followed it with a rock version of "Ghost Riders in the Sky," then "Perfidia," "Lullaby of the Leaves," "Diamond Head," and "2,000 Pound Bee," all of which were big hits through the early and mid-'60s.

In 1961 Johnston was hurt in an auto accident and left the group. He was replaced by Mel Taylor. The hits kept on coming, with versions of "Lonely Bull" and "I Walk the Line" in 1963 and a surf remake of "Walk Don't Run" in 1964. For the next few years, their albums still sold and they continued to tour. In 1965 they released what was one of the first instructional records, Play Guitar With the Ventures.

In 1967 Edwards was replaced by Gerry McGee, who in 1970 recorded with Delaney and Bonnie Bramlett. In 1972 McGee went solo and Edwards returned. By that time, keyboardist Johnny Durrill had expanded the unit to a quintet, and the Ventures had delved into fuzz-tone and wah-wah guitar modification as well as blues, calypso, and Latin material.

In 1969 they hit the charts again with a version of the theme from the TV show Hawaiian Five-O. In 1981, Bogle, Wilson, Edwards, and Taylor released a regional West Coast single, "Surfin' and Spyn'" (written by Go-Go Charlotte Caffey), and embarked on successful tours of the U.S. and Japan, where they had long been a star attraction. Bogle, McGee, and Wilson are still active in the group. Mel Taylor died of lung cancer in 1996, just weeks before, he had been on a Japanese tour with the band. His son, Leon, replaced him behind the kit. Wild Again! marked the first new Ventures studio album in 15 years. In addition, they have released numerous Japan-only records. Former guitarist Edwards continues to play solo.

The Verve

Formed 1990, Wigan, Eng.

Richard Ashcroft (b. Sep. 11, 1971, Wigan), voc., gtr.; Nick McCabe (b. Jul. 14, 1971, St. Helens, Eng.), gtr.; Simon Jones (b. Jul. 29, 1972, Liverpool, Eng.), bass; Peter "Sobbo" Salisbury (b. Sep. 24, 1971), drums.
1992—The Verve EP (Hut/Caroline) 1993—A Storm in Heaven (Vernon Yard/Virgin) 1994—No Come Down

1995—A Northern Soul 1997—(+ Simon Tong, kybds., gtr.) Urban Hymns (Virgin).

Richard Ashcroft solo: 2000—Alone With Everybody (Virgin).

School friends Richard Ashcroft, Nick McCabe, Simon Jones, and Peter Salisbury came together as Verve in 1990 in Wigan, England (near Manchester). The group landed a deal with Virgin subsidiary Hut Records in England in 1991, and established its reputation for epic-length, atmospheric guitar jams on a string of early singles like "She's a Superstar," which were collected on the 1992 EP The Verve. Its debut album, A Storm in Heaven (1993), was met with rave reviews and netted the band a second-stage spot on the 1994 Lollapalooza Tour. The buzz brought it to the attention of jazz label Verve Records, which sued the band for trademark violation and forced it to change its name to the Verve.

Lollapalooza took considerable toll on the group (Ashcroft was hospitalized for exhaustion), and a few weeks after the release of 1995's A Northern Soul, he walked. He began work on a solo album with Salisbury, Jones, and childhood friend Simon Tong, but in the eleventh hour McCabe was called in and it became a new Verve album, Urban Hymns (1997). The album reached #23 in America on the strength of the #12 single "Bitter Sweet Symphony," which sampled four bars from an instrumental version of the Rolling Stones' "The Last Time." Mick Jagger and Keith Richards were granted all of the publishing rights for the song, and the Verve could not intervene when their publisher sold it to Nike for a commercial; the resulting mainstream exposure helped push the album to platinum status in the States. In the U.K., where the album topped the album chart, the singles "Bitter Sweet Symphony," "The Drugs Don't Work," and "Lucky Man" all hit the U.K. Top 10.

In the wake of its breakthrough success, however, the Verve began to fall apart again. In July of 1998, McCabe announced that he would not tour with the band for the remainder of the year. The group carried on with steel guitarist B.J. Cole, but announced its official breakup the following April. Ashcroft released his debut solo album, Alone With Everybody in 2000. The album featured performances by Salisbury, Cole, and Ashcroft's wife, former Spiritualized keyboardist Kate Radley.

The Village People

1988—Greatest Hits (Rhino) 1994—(lineup: Rose; Simpson; Hughes; Briley; Hodo; + Jeff Olson [b. Sep. 3, 1952, New York], voc.) 1995—(— Hughes; + Eric Anzalone [b. Dayton, OH], voc.).

Under the direction of disco producer Jacques Morali, this campy vocal group had massive late-'70s pop hits with double-entendre-filled songs like "Macho Man" and "Y.M.C.A." In 1977 Morali, with business partners Henri Belolo and Peter Whitehead and lyricist Paul Hurtt, composed self-consciously gay-themed disco songs like "Fire Island" and "San Francisco." With actor/singer Victor Willis handling vocals, the music wowed both gay and straight club audiences. Backed by Casablanca Records president Neil Bogart, Morali formed a group of singer/actors dressed as a cross section of gay stereotypes: a beefy biker, a construction worker, a policeman, an Indian chief, and a cowboy. As Tom Smucker wrote, they "were gay goofs to those who got the joke, and disco novelties to those who didn't."

With major hits like "Macho Man" (#25) in 1978 and "Y.M.C.A." (#2) in 1979, the Village People scored six gold and four platinum records, sold out major concert halls, and appeared on numerous television talk shows. During their first burst of stardom, they reportedly sold over 20 million singles and 18 million albums worldwide. In 1979 Ray Simpson, Valene Simpson's brother, replaced Willis. By then, however, the group's 15 minutes appeared to have ended. For their 1981 release Renaissance, the Village People briefly traded in their old costumes for a fling with a New Romantic wardrobe. They returned to their original style for the foreign-released Fox in the Box.

Through the '80s the Village People were all but forgotten in the U.S., but the group maintained a large international following and performed elsewhere. After 1985's "Sex on the Phone" flopped in America and barely cracked the Top 60 in the U.K. (where "Y.M.C.A." reigned as one of that nation's top 25 best-selling records of all time), the act went on hiatus. In the late '80s, Miles Jay, a latter-day Villager, enjoyed minor success as a solo R&B artist. The group proper resurfaced in the '90s featuring Simpson, four original members, and singer Jeff Olson. They now controlled their own careers and toured extensively. Morali died on December 15, 1991, of AIDS-related causes. He was 44. In 1995 ex-heavy metal singer Eric Anzalone became the new Leatherman character, replacing Hughes, who remained involved in the act's business affairs. Hughes, 50, died in 2001 after a long illness and was buried in his biker uniform.

Gene Vincent

Born Vincent Eugene Craddock, Feb. 11, 1935, Norfolk, VA; died Oct. 12, 1971, Los Angeles, CA
1957—Bluejean Bop! (Capitol) 1970—I'm Back and I'm Proud (Dandelion/Elektra); If Only You Could See Me Today (Kama Sutra) 1971—The Day the World Turned Blue 1991—Gene Vincent (Capitol Collectors Series) (Capitol) 2000—The Legend at His Best (Collectables).

One of the first American rockers, Gene Vincent began singing while in the navy in the early '50s. After being discharged in 1955, he performed regularly on live country music radio shows in Norfolk. In 1956 he recorded a demo of a song he and "Sheriff" Tex Davis had written—"Be-Bop-A-Lula"—and sent it to Capitol Records. Capitol heard an Elvis Presley soundalike in his rockabilly stutter-and-hiccup style and signed him to a long-term contract. "Be-Bop-A-Lula" rerecorded by Vincent and his group, the Bluecaps (guitarists Cliff Gallup and Willie Williams, bass player Jack Neal, and drummer Dickie Harrell), in Capitol's imitation-Sam Phillips echo chamber, was a hit nationwide (#7). Vincent's looks—darker, tougher, greasier than Elvis', all blue denim and black leather—were featured in the 1956 movie The Girl Can't Help It and were imitated widely. Fans even affected his limp, the result of a Navy motorcycle accident that forced him to wear a metal brace on one leg. For several years Gene Vincent and the Bluecaps were among the most popular rock & roll acts in America ("Lotta Lovin'" was a #13 hit in 1957).

Gene Vincent and the Blue Caps

When, by the end of the decade, the record industry began to favor cleaned-up, tuned-down pop stars, Vincent went abroad and found huge followings in Australia, Japan, and Europe, wherever "real American rockers" were in demand. He toured England with Eddie Cochran and was critically injured in the car crash that killed Cochran on April 17, 1960. Although Vincent recovered from his injuries, he was devastated by Cochran's death, and his career never regained momentum. Vincent's professional pursuits were no doubt compromised by heavy drinking, mood swings, and erratic behavior; he was married and divorced four times. For most of the '60s he lived in England, where, playing the pub circuit, he retained a small following of latter-day Teddy boys.

A "comeback" album in 1969 failed to attract much attention. Through the years he suffered bouts of disabling pain because of his bad leg; in 1966 doctors suggested amputation, in fact. His fortunes continued to decline, and broke and despondent, he returned to America in September 1971. A month later he tripped in his parents' home and ruptured a stomach ulcer, he died an hour later. "Be-Bop-A-Lula" had, by that time, sold 9 million copies worldwide.

Violent Femmes

Formed 1981, Milwaukee, WI

Gordon Gano (b. June 7, 1963, New York, NY), voc., gtr.; Brian Ritchie (b. Nov. 21, 1960, Milwaukee), bass, voc.; Victor DeLorenzo (b. Oct. 25, 1954, Racine, WI), drums, voc.

1983—The Violent Femmes (Slash) 1984—Hallowed Ground 1986—The Blind Leading the Naked 1988—3 1991—Why Do Birds Sing? 1993—Add It Up (1981–1993) (– DeLorenzo; + Guy Hoffman [b. May 20, 1954, Milwaukee], drums) 1994—New Times (Elektra) 1999—Viva Wisconsin (Beyond) 2000—Freak Magnet.

Gordon Gano solo: 1987—The Mercy Seat (Slash).

Brian Ritchie solo: 1987—The Blend (SST) 1989—Sonic Temple & the Court of Babylon 1990—I See a Noise (Dali-Chameleon).

Victor DeLorenzo solo: 1990—Peter Corey Sent Me (Dali-Chameleon) 1996—Pancake Day (Almo).

Milwaukee's Violent Femmes cornered the market for frantic, angry acoustic postpunk folk rock in the early '80s with its landmark self-titled debut and its signature anthems "Blister in the Sun," "Kiss Off" and "Add It Up." The trio—singer/guitarist Gordon Gano, bassist Brian Ritchie, and drummer Victor DeLorenzo—landed its record deal with Slash shortly after being discovered and championed by Pretenders guitarist James Honeyman-Scott. The Violent Femmes remained on the label for nearly a decade, releasing a string of eclectic albums (like 1984's spooky, Appalachian-flavored Hallowed Ground) that never achieved mainstream success but fostered a loyal cult and college radio audience (1983's The Violent Femmes was finally certified platinum in 1991). The group's highest charting album was 1986's Jerry Harrison-produced The Blind Leading the Naked (#84). Like Hallowed Ground before it, the album's lyrics strongly reflected Gano's religious upbringing as the son of a Baptist minister.

Each of the members released solo albums; in 1993 DeLorenzo left the Femmes and was replaced by BoDeans veteran Guy Hoffman. The new trio recorded one album for Elektra, 1994's New Times (#90), before resurfacing on Beyond five years later for the 1999 live album Viva Wisconsin. A new studio effort, Freak Magnet, failed to dent the charts in 2000.

Vixen

Formed ca. 1980, Los Angeles, CA

Janet Gardner (b. Mar. 17, 1962, Jeanau, AK), gtr., voc.; Jan Kuehnemund, gtr.; Share Pedersen, bass; Roxy Petrucci (b. Mar. 17, 1962, Detroit, MI), drums.

1988—Vixen (EMI Manhattan) 1990—Rev It Up (EMI) 1998—(– Kuehnemund; + Gina Stile, gtr.; – Pedersen; + Maxine Petrucci, bass) Tangerine (CMC International) 1999—The Best of Vixen: Full Throttle (Razor & Tie/BMG) 2001—(original lineup re-forms: Gardner, Kuehnemund; Petrucci).

An all-female band, Vixen worked in the Bon Jovi/Warrant pop/metal tradition. Roxy Petrucci, the drummer for Madame X, a popular L.A. metal band, formed the group in the early 1980s. Although Vixen found work playing at local clubs and military bases, it went through a number of musicians, including Steve Vai's wife, Pia Koko, on bass. The lineup solidified in 1987, and EMI signed the quartet the following year.

Vixen (#41, 1988), its gold debut, was buttressed by two Top 40 hits, "Cryin'" (#22, 1989) and "Edge of a Broken Heart" (#26, 1988), the latter written, arranged, and produced by Richard Marx. Rev It Up (#52, 1990) contained all original material, including the hit "How Much Love" (#44, 1990).

After being dropped by EMI, the band remained inactive until 1998, when they released a new album, Tangerine, on which Roxy Petrucci's sister Maxine played bass. Share Pedersen turned up in 1991 on Contraband, an LP recorded by other hard-rock musicians, including guitarist Michael Schenker and drummer Bobby Blotzer, then of Ratt.

Bunny Wailer

Born Neville O'Reilly Livingstone, Apr. 10, 1947, Kingston, Jam. 1976—Blackheart Man (Island) 1977—Protest 1979—Struggle (Solomonic) 1980—Bunny Wailer Sings the Wailers (Island); In I Father's House (Solomonic) 1981—Rock 'n' Groove; Tribute to the Late Hon. Robert Nesta Marley, O.M. 1982—Hook, Line and Sinker 1983—Roots, Radics, Rockers, Reggae (Shanachie) 1986—Rootsman Skanking 1987—Rule Dance Hall; Marketplace 1988—Liberation 1990—Time Will Tell: A Tribute to Bob Marley; Gumpton 1992—Dance Massive 1993—Just Be Nice (Ras) 1994—Crucial 1995—Hall of Fame 1999—Communication (Solomonic); Dub'd'sco.

The last surviving member of the original Wailers, Bunny Livingstone—better known as Bunny Wailer—left the band less than a year after the group made its first tours of the U.K. and the U.S. His aversion to traveling was one reason for his departure. He vowed never to leave Jamaica, but in 1986 he relented, and a sold-out show at New York's Madison Square Garden kicked off a U.S. and European tour. International acclaim accrued to Bob Marley and Peter Tosh (the other original Wailers), while, until the early '80s, Bunny Wailer's following remained small even by Jamaican standards.

In his decade with the Wailers, he was considered the equal of Marley and Tosh as a singer and as a songwriter. "Let Him Go," "Who Feels It," "Jail House," and "Pass It On" are among the songs associated with him. He founded his own record company, Solomonic, in 1972, and recorded his first solo singles—"Life Line," "Bide Up," and "Arab Oil Weapon"—before quitting the Wailers in 1973. Between then and 1976, he retired from the record business and lived in the Jamaican countryside. When he resumed recording, he secured a distribution arrangement with Island Records and released Blackheart Man (backed by Marley, Tosh, and the Wailers band) in America and Europe.

Darker and denser than Marley's, less stident than Tosh's, Wailer's music found less acceptance from most quarters, and his records were usually not released in the U.S. Since 1980, as his music has become lighter and more upbeat, he has become a hitmaker in Jamaica. "Ballroom Floor," "Galong So," and "Collie Man" were big hits in 1981, while "Cool Runnings" topped the Jamaican chart that year and "Rock and Groove" followed suit in 1982.

In 1983 he began an association with Shanachie, the label that started releasing his LPs in the U.S. His recent albums, especially Liberation, have shown a new musical and political engagement, adding dancehall elements and topical lyrics. In 1990 his tribute to Bob Marley, Time Will Tell, won the Grammy for Best Reggae Album. Though he continued to record—including a second Marley tribute released in 1995—Wailer did not tour the U.S. for most of the '90s, paying a 1999 visit with a group that included celebrated guitarist Ernest Ranglin.

Loudon Wainwright III

Born Sep. 5, 1946, Chapel Hill, NC
1970—Loudon Wainwright III (Atlantic) 1971—Album II
1972—Album III (Columbia) 1973—Attempted Mustache

1975—Unrequited 1976—T Shirt (Arista) 1978—Final Exam 1980—A Live One (Radar) 1983—Fame and Wealth (Demon/Rounder) 1985—I'm Alright 1986—More Love Songs 1989—Therapy (Silvertone) 1992—History (Virgin) 1993—Career Moves 1996—Grown Man 1997—Little Ship 1999—Social Studies (Hammibal/Rykodisc) 2000—BBC Sessions (Fuel 2000).

Folksinger/songwriter Loudon Wainwright III, the son of an American writer, has gained considerable critical respect and a modicum of sales for his self-lacerating humor, deadpan irony and often deliberate tastelessness, complemented by a comic rubber-faced stage presence.

Wainwright grew up in New York's Westchester County and Southern California, where his father was the L.A. bureau chief for Life magazine. At age 15 Wainwright began attending St. Andrew's School in Delaware (where later the movie Dead Poets Society was filmed). There he developed an early interest in folk music. After graduation, he attended Carnegie Mellon University, where he studied acting and directing before dropping out in early 1967 at age 20. In 1968 Wainwright began playing the club and college circuit and attracting a following with his offbeat wit.

His first albums included just vocals and guitar and were simultaneously stark confessional and a mockery of the whole idea, presenting Wainwright as a sort of insensitive singer/songwriter. With Album III, Wainwright mellowed his approach until it resembled slapstick more than anything else, and he crossed over into the pop chart with the Top 20 single "Dead Skunk."

Attempted Mustache played things almost completely for laughs and failed to appreciably increase his sales, but Unrequited was received as a welcome return to form. For T Shirt and Final Exam, Wainwright was backed by a five-piece rock band called Slow Train for such tunes as "Watch Me Rock, I'm Over Thirty." In the early '70s, Wainwright had married Kate McGarrigle of the McGarrigle sisters, and he recorded her song "Come a Long Way." They were separated in 1977 and eventually divorced. They had two children, Martha and Rufus Wainwright, both of whom would later become recording artists.

In 1982 he and Suzzzy Roche became the parents of Lucy Roche. Three years later, he moved to England, where he is much more popular than he is here in the States. Richard Thompson coproduced the Grammy-nominated I'm Alright with Wainwright. In addition to touring and recording, Wainwright has continued to act, appearing in the Broadway play Pump Boys and Dinettes (1982), the TV series M.A.S.H., and the movies The Slugger's Wife (1985), Jacknife (1989), and 28 Days (2000). In the U.K., he appeared on the BBC series The Jasper Carrott Show as, in the words of his bio, "the resident American wise-guy singer-songwriter." Although his commercial profile in the U.S. has remained low, he is still a critics' favorite, praised for his insightful if sometimes unusual songs. In 1994 Wainwright contributed "The Man Who Couldn't Cry" to Johnny Cash's critically acclaimed LP American Recordings. With Social Studies, Wainwright focused his satirical wit on such late-'90s phenomena as Y2K paranoia, O.J. Simpson, and the "reunited" Beatles. Many of the songs were originally commissioned by National Public Radio and ABC's Nightline.

Tom Waits

Born Dec. 7, 1949, Pomona, CA

1973—Closing Time (Asylum) 1974—Heart of Saturday Night 1975—Nighthawks at the Diner 1976—Small Change 1977—Foreign Affairs 1978—Blue Valentine (Elektra) 1980—Heartattack and Vine (Asylum) 1983—Swordfishtrombones (Island) 1985—Rain Dogs 1987—Frank's Wild Years 1988—Big Time soundtrack 1991—Night on Earth soundtrack 1992—Bone Machine 1993—The Black Rider 1998—Beautiful Maladies: The Island Years (Island) 1999—Mule Variations (Epitaph).

Singer/songwriter Tom Waits is a one-man beatnik revival. He generally appears with a cap pulled over his brow, a cigarette dangling from his stubbled face, talk-singing and/or mumbling jive in a cancerous growl to the accompaniment of cool saxophone jazz; he also writes romantic ballads, which have been covered by the Eagles, Rickie Lee Jones, and others.

Waits claims he was born in a moving taxi. He grew up in California, where he listened to Bing Crosby, Stephen Foster parlor songs, and George Gershwin. He also developed an intense admiration for, and identification with, such Beat writers as Jack Kerouac and Charles Bukowski. As a teenager, Waits was living out of a car and working as a doorman at the L.A. nightclub the Heritage when he decided he should be performing and began writing songs based on overheard snatches of conversation.

He first played at L.A.'s Troubador club in 1969, and soon moved out of his car and into L.A.'s Tropicana Hotel (a favorite of visiting rock stars). Waits built up a strong cult following as an opening act. Working solo, he merged humorous Beat-influenced free-verse raps with his own compositions. In 1972 he signed to Elektra/Asylum Records, and his debut album was produced by ex-Lovin' Spoonful Jerry Yester. Though the album sold poorly, one of its songs, "Ol' 55," was covered by the Eagles on their On the Border. In 1973 Waits toured with a sax-bass-drums trio, often opening for Zappa and the Mothers and usually drawing extremely adverse audience receptions. His second album, produced by Bones Howe, sold a little better than the first.

By 1975 Waits had built a small nationwide cult following and was still opening shows, but he had to cut his trio for financial reasons. Later that year, Waits and Howe assembled a sax-led quartet and an audience to record Nighthawks at the Diner (#164, 1975). In 1976 he conducted American and European tours, which were mildly received. In London that year, he composed tunes for his next album, the jazzy Small Change (#89, 1976). Foreign Affairs (#113, 1977) contained his duet with Bette Midler, "I Never Talk to Strangers," and on Blue Valentine (#181, 1978) Waits introduced electric guitar for the first time.

Waits appeared as a honky-tonk pianist in Sylvester Stallone's film Paradise Alley, in 1979. By this time, he was involved with Rickie Lee Jones, whose picture appeared on the back cover of Valentine. They broke up in 1980. Waits wrote and recorded the title song for Ralph Waite's 1980 film about skid row, On the Nickel, and later recorded two songs for the 1985 documentary on Seattle street kids, Streetwise, as well as the soundtrack for Jim Jarmusch's 1992 film Night on Earth. In 1982 Waits' soundtrack for Francis Ford Coppola's One From the Heart featured him in a number of duets with Crystal Gayle; the soundtrack was nominated for an Academy Award. Coppola cast Waits in several of his films, including Rumblefish, The Cotton Club, The Outsiders, and Bram Stoker's Dracula (in which Waits delivered a memorable turn as the fly-munching Renfield); he's also acted in the Jarmusch cult film Down by Law, the big-budget Ironweed with Jack Nicholson and Meryl Streep, and Robert Altman's Short Cuts.

Heartattack and Vine (#96, 1980), with Waits playing more electric guitar and an R&B slant to the music, was Waits' best seller since Small Change, which gives a good indication of his low commercial profile. Waits then forsook any pretense to accessibility, instead making increasingly harsh and eccentric music. Swordfishtrombones (#167, 1983) was an experimental rock work with a surreal range of noisy instrumentation; Waits described it as "a junkyard orchestral deviation," while critics compared it to both Captain Beefheart and Kurt Weill. Rain Dogs continued the experimental direction, with Waits often singing through a megaphone; it included "Downtown Train," later a hit for Rod Stewart. (Other artists covering Waits' tunes have included Bruce Springsteen with "Jersey Girl," Marianne Faithfull with "Stranger Weather," Bob Seger with "Blind Love" and "New Coat of Paint," and Dion with "Heart of Saturday Night" and "San Diego Serenade"; Canadian vocalist Holly Cole has recorded a complete album of Waits' material.) Frank's Wild Years was based on songs from a musical play Waits wrote with the woman he married in 1980, playwright and script editor Kathleen Brennan; first staged by Chicago's Steppenwolf Company, it was about a down-and-out lounge singer freezing to death on a park bench, reliving his life in hallucinatory fashion. Big Time was the soundtrack of a concert film-with-story that Waits produced himself.

In 1990 Waits won a lawsuit against snack-food giant Frito-Lay, which in 1988 had hired a Waits impersonator to sing a tortilla-chip radio jingle closely modeled on Waits' "Step Right Up" (from Small Change). Waits, who had consistently refused to perform in any commercials, won $2.5 million in damages through a decision ultimately upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The clattering Bone Machine won a 1992 Grammy Award for Best Alternative Music album. The Black Rider, with its demented Weimar-cabaret stylings, was the score from Waits' theatrical collaboration with avant-garde stage designer/director Robert Wilson and author William S. Burroughs. Waits and Wilson collaborated again on a 1993 update of Alice in Wonderland. Waits also guested on Bay Area postpunk/fusion band Primus' Sailing the Seas of Cheese, and on British composer Gavin Bryars' Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet, an unlikely 1994 U.K. hit in which Bryars orchestrated the "found" mumbling of a hymn by a London drunkard.

In 1999 Waits returned to the studio and the concert stage after a long absence. Mule Variations, released on the California-based punk label Epitaph, outsold his more recent major-label efforts—and reached #30, his highest-charting album ever—and preceded his first tour in a decade. It also won the Grammy for Best Contemporary Folk Album. The following year, he collaborated with Wilson and Brennan on a Danish production of Woyzeck.

Though born in America, the Walker Brothers were usually thought of as a British Invasion group because they went to Britain in 1964 after failing to achieve any success in the U.S. In the U.K., pop producer/entrepreneur Jack Good introduced John Maus and Scott Engel to ex-P.J. Proby drummer Gary Leeds and renamed them the Walker Brothers. Within a year, they had a minor British hit, "Love Her," which set their style: dramatic Spectonian arrangements featuring harmony vocals.

In late 1965 they scored their first big international pop hit with "Make It Easy on Yourself," and followed it up in 1966 with "The Sun Ain't Gonna Shine (Anymore)," their biggest American Top 40 hit. The Walkers were teen sensations in England, but they still couldn't fully crack the American market. They split up after Images. Scott Engel (still referring to himself as Scott Walker) enjoyed a somewhat successful solo career in the U.K. In 1975 the original Walkers, with many sessionmen aboard, re-formed. Following one comeback hit in the U.K. with Tom Rush's "No Regrets," they faded from view and resumed their solo projects.

In 1995 Scott Walker returned with his solo album Tilt, released on the American indie label Drag City. His sentimental, melancholy pop enjoyed a certain degree of retro-happiness in the '90s. It's Raining Today compiles material from his earliest releases.

Though he first came to prominence with the psychedelic band Circus Maximus and has long enjoyed a moderately successful solo career as a "cosmic cowboy" in the Austin, Texas, area, Jerry Jeff Walker is best known for writing "Mr. Bojangles," a song covered by artists from Sammy Davis Jr. to the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band. He became attracted to folk music in his youth, and while in his teens he began performing traditional songs in clubs and coffeehouses. He left home in 1959 and became a wandering minstrel, playing the East Coast and more often the West and Southwest and writing. He also worked with guitarist David Bromberg. In Austin, Walker met singer/songwriter Bob Bruno, and together they returned to New York and formed Circus Maximus. The band merged Walker's characteristic country folk with jazz rock and other exotica and became a favorite psychedelic attraction in the Northeast. Their one minor hit was the jazzy "The Wind," which later became a staple of progressive FM radio.

Disputes between Walker and Bruno about musical direction led to a breakup in 1968. New York radio DJ Bob Fass of WBAI-FM taped "Mr. Bojangles" (about an old street dancer Walker had met in a New Orleans jail) during a broadcast by Walker and Bromberg; he aired the much-requested tape, and Walker secured a solo contract.

None of Walker's albums sold well despite the immense popularity of "Mr. Bojangles." Walker then moved to Austin, formed the Four-Man Deaf Cowboy Band, and recorded Viva Terlingua in a mobile truck parked in the middle of Luckenbach, Texas. He then formed the Lost Gonzo Band, who recorded an album of their own in 1975 and have toured and recorded with and without him. Walker hosted TNN's The Texas Connection. He continues to tour and record regularly.

Jr. Walker and the All Stars

Formed 1964, Detroit, MI

Original lineup: Jr. Walker (b. Oscar G. Mixon, a.k.a. Austry DeWalt Walker III, 1942, Blytheville, AK; d. Nov. 23, 1995, Battle Creek, MI), sax, voc.; Vic Thomas, kybds.; Willie Woods, gtr.; James Graves (d. 1967), drums.

1965—Shotgun (Soul) 1966—Soul Session; Road Runner 1967—Jr. Walker and the All Stars Live! 1969—Home Cookin'; Jr. Walker and the All Stars Greatest Hits; Gotta Hold On to This Feeling 1970—A Gasssss 1971—Rainbow Funk; Moody Jr. 1973—Peace and Understanding Is Hard to Find 1974—Anthology 1976—Hot Shot; Sax Appeal; Whopper Bopper Show Stopper 1978—... Smooth 1979—Back Street Boogie (Whitfield) 1983—Blow the House Down (Motown); The Ultimate Collection.

Jr. Walker's perky, bluesy tenor sax and raspy voice, backed by his band the All Stars, made him one of Motown's more idiosyncratic performers. In the '70s, studio musicians like Tom Scott and David Sanborn openly imitated Walker's tone and attack.

Walker was a naturally gifted musician, and played both piano and sax as a teen. He worked as a sideman in the late '60s with several R&B bands. With the original All Stars he recorded "Shotgun" (#4 pop, #1 R&B) and started a string of party hits that included "Do the Boomerang" (#10 R&B) and "Shake and Fingerpop" (#7 R&B) in 1965; "How Sweet It Is (to Be Loved by You)" (#18 pop, #3 R&B), "I'm a Road Runner" (#20 pop, #4 R&B) in 1966; "Pucker Up Buttercup" (#3 pop, #11 R&B) and "Come See About Me" (#24 pop, #8 R&B) in 1967; and "Hip City, Part 2" (#7 R&B) in 1968.

With Walker singing more, he enjoyed success with the mellow "What Does It Take (to Win Your Love)" (#4 pop, #1 R&B) and "These Eyes" (#16 pop, #3 R&B) in 1969; "Gotta Hold on to This Feeling" (#21 pop, #2 R&B) and "Do You See My Love (for You Growing)" (#32 pop, #3 R&B) in 1970; and "Walk in the Night" (#46 pop, #10 R&B) in 1972.

Walker continued recording during the '70s, including a stint with ex-Motown producer/writer Norman Whitfield's label, but was never as commercially successful and re-signed with Motown in the early '80s. He played on Foreigner's big 1981 hit "Urgent." He performed into the '90s and died of cancer in 1995.

T-Bone Walker

Born Aaron Thibeaux Walker, May 28, 1910, Linden, TX; died Mar. 16, 1975, Los Angeles, CA

1960—T-Bone Blues (Atlantic) 1969—T-Bone Walker (Capitol)
 1970—Good Feelin' (Polydor); Well Done (Home Cooking)
 1972—Feelin' the Blues (B&B) 1973—Dirty Mistreater
 (Bluesway); I Want a Little Girl (Delmark) 1990—The Complete
Recordings of T-Bone Walker, 1940–1954 (Mosaic) 1991—
The Complete Imperial Recordings, 1950–1954 (EMI) 1995—
The Complete Capitol/Black & White Recordings (Capitol)
 1996—Stormy Monday (LaserLight).

As the first bluesman to exploit the electric guitar, T-Bone Walker stands as an exceptionally important and influential figure. Walker was indispensable to the birth of urban electric blues and its descendants, R&B and rock & roll. His use of finger-vibrato and piercing electric-guitar sustain influenced scores of subsequent blues guitarists such as B.B. King, Freddie King, Buddy Guy, Albert Collins, Albert King, Lowell Fulson, J.B. Hutto, and Otis Rush. Walker's gritty chordal style on fast numbers eventually gave birth to Chuck Berry's archetypal rock guitar riffs.

Born to musical parents (he had a Cherokee Indian grandmother), Aaron Thibeaux Walker moved with his family to Dallas at age two. Through his church choir and street-singing stepfather, Marco Washington, he became interested in music. He acquired the nickname T-Bone early on; it was a corruption of his mother's pet name, T-Bow, from Thibeaux. By the time he was 10, Walker was accompanying his stepfather at drive-in soft drink stands. Soon after he became "lead boy" for the legendary Blind Lemon Jefferson, probably the most popular and influential country bluesman of the '20s. From 1920 through 1923 Walker led Jefferson down Texas streets.

By late 1923, Walker had taught himself guitar and he began entertaining at Dallas parties. He soon was ready to leave home and tour Texas with Dr. Breeding's Big B Tonic Medicine Show. In 1925 he joined blues singer Ida Cox's road show, which toured the South. Back in Dallas in 1929, Walker began recording acoustic country blues as Oak Cliff T-Bone. He continued touring the South and Southwest until 1934, when he moved to the West Coast. A year later, he married a woman named Viola Lee, for whom he wrote his "Viola Lee Blues" (later covered by the Grateful Dead, among others). Over the next decade, Walker worked with both small groups and big bands (from Les Hite's to Fletcher Henderson's), both on the West Coast and on tours through the Midwest and to New York. As early as 1935 he had begun playing primitive electric guitar models, using a sprung-rhythm, single-string lead style derived from Blind Lemon Jefferson's acoustic picking. By the time he first recorded as T-Bone Walker, in 1942, he was quite proficient on the electric guitar and made an instant impression on dozens of other bluesmen. In 1943 he had his biggest blues hit with the immortal "Call It Stormy Monday," which as "Stormy Monday Blues" or just "Stormy Monday" has become one of the most frequently covered blues songs.

Through the '40s and '50s, Walker recorded often and toured frequently (usually with smaller groups). He appeared on TV shows from the '50s through the '70s, toured all over the world, played jazz and blues festivals from Monterey to Montreux and in 1972 appeared in the French film Jazz Odyssey. In 1970 Walker won a Grammy for Best Ethnic/Traditional Recording with Good Feelin'. He became inactive in 1974, when he was hospitalized with bronchial pneumonia, which felled him a year later.

The Wallflowers

Formed 1990, Los Angeles, CA

Jakob Dylan (b. Dec. 9, 1969, New York, NY), voc., gtr.; Tobi Miller, gtr.; Rami Jaffe (b. Mar. 11, 1969, Los Angeles), kybds.; Barrie Maguire (b. Philadelphia, PA), bass; Peter Yanowitz (b. Sep. 13, 1967, Chicago, IL), drums.

1992—The Wallflowers (Virgin) 1993—(– Maguire; + Greg Richling [b. Gregory Martin Richling, Aug. 31, 1970, Los Angeles], bass, voc.) 1994—(– Miller; + Michael Ward [b. Feb. 21, 1967, MN], gtr., voc.; – Yanowitz) 1996—Bringing Down the Horse (Interscope) (+ Mario Calire [b. June 25, 1974, Buffalo, NY], drums) 2000—Breach.

Fronted by the youngest son of the most revered songwriter in rock, the Wallflowers drew an inordinate amount of press interest upon the release of their self-titled debut in 1992. But Jakob Dylan, determined to establish his own musical legacy rather than submit to profiles seeking insight into his famous father, refused to take the bait. The album sold a modest 40,000 copies, and the band subsequently left the label. Four years later, Dylan returned with a new Wallflowers lineup and stormed the charts on his own terms, landing 1996's Bringing Down the Horse in the Top 10 and winning two Grammys with the breakthrough single "One Headlight."

Dylan was born in New York to Bob Dylan and Sara Lowndes, but grew up in L.A., where his family moved when he was three. Although he was exposed to his father's music and the road early on, it wasn't until he saw a Clash concert as a 12-year-old that he felt inspired to ask for his own guitar. After graduating from high school, he briefly attended art school in New York before returning to L.A. to focus on a music career. He formed the Wallflowers in 1990 with a group of school friends, and the band was signed to Virgin Records two years later.

As uncomfortable as Dylan was discussing his father with the press, he was clearly driven by a similar work ethic; despite their debut's lack of commercial success, the Wallflowers toured tirelessly, with Dylan all the while refusing to let his name be featured along with the band's for easy publicity. The tenacity paid off. Weathering a dismissal from Virgin and a series of lineup changes, the group was picked up by Interscope in 1994 and began recording Bringing Down the Horse with producer T Bone Burnett. After a slow start, the album began a steady climb up the chart behind the Mainstream Rock radio and video hit "One Headlight" (#1, 1996). That song won the band a Grammy for Best Rock Performance and Dylan one for Best Rock Song in 1997. (That same evening, his father won the Album of the Year award for his Time Out of Mind.) The album sold 4 million copies and peaked at #8, spawning the additional Mainstream Rock hits "6th Avenue Heartache" (#10, 1996) and "The Difference" (#3, 1997). In the wake of the album's success, Dylan gradually began to open up to the press, which now sought him out as much as a rock sex symbol as for the connection to his father.

Although it would be another four years before the Wallflowers followed up Bringing Down the Horse with a new album, they scored a minor hit with a cover of David Bowie's "Heroes" (#4 Mainstream Rock Track) from the soundtrack to 1998's Godzilla. Released in October 2000, their third album, Breach, debuted at #13 but failed to match the success of its predecessor. The lead single, "Sleepwalker," reached #73, but the song that attracted the most attention critically was the album track "Hand Me Down," in which Dylan candidly alluded to the struggle of following in his father's formidable footsteps.

Joe Walsh

Born Nov. 20, 1947, Wichita, KS

1972—Barnstorm (Dunhill) 1973—The Smoker You Drink, the Player You Get 1974—So What 1975—You Can't Argue With a Sick Mind (ABC) 1978—But Seriously, Folks (Asylum); The Best of Joe Walsh (ABC) 1981—There Goes the Neighborhood (Asylum) 1983—You Bought It, You Name It (Full Moon/Warner Bros.) 1985—The Confessor 1987—Got Any Gum? 1991—Ordinary Average Guy (Pyramid/Epic) 1992—Songs for a Dying Planet 1994—Look What I Did: The Joe Walsh Anthology (MCA) 1997—Joe Walsh's Greatest Hits: Little Did He Know.

With Barnstorm: 1972—Barnstorm (Dunhill).

Hard-rock guitarist and songwriter Joe Walsh became interested in music through his mother, who played classical piano. His first instruments were the oboe and the clarinet, as a teenager he moved on to bass guitar, but it wasn't until he was a student at Kent State University that he picked up an electric guitar. Walsh went solo after leaving his first major band, the James Gang, in 1971, and later joined the Eagles [see entries]. He added some punch to the Eagles' sound, while his solo albums mixed spacious guitar production with offhandedly cheerful lyrics. Walsh's first solo album, which refined the hard-rock approach of the James Gang with vocal harmonies and more intricate arrangements, sold respectably. The Smoker You Drink, the Player You Get (#6, 1973) went gold on the strength of the #23 single "Rocky Mountain Way."

In 1974 Walsh produced and played on Dan Fogelberg's top-selling Souvenirs LP, and released his own So What. The latter included "Song for Emma," a tribute to his four-year-old daughter, who died in a car accident earlier that year. So What (#11, 1975) also featured Walsh's Barnstorm band (his Boulder, Colorado-based group between the James Gang and the Eagles, which had included bassist Kenny Passarelli and drummer Joe Vitale as well as former members of Stephen Stills' Manassas) on only a few cuts, with backing on the rest by J.D. Souther, Dan Fogelberg, and the Eagles. A year later Walsh guested on the first solo album by ex-Spirit Jay Ferguson. For the live You Can't Argue With a Sick Mind (#20, 1976), Walsh's band included ex-Beach Boys drummer Ricky Fataar, but by the time of its release Walsh had replaced Bernie Leadon in the Eagles, making his debut with them on Hotel California. Walsh continued sporadic solo work, and his platinum But Seriously, Folks (#8, 1978) lived up to its title and became a top seller on the strength of the deadpan "Life's Been Good" (#12, 1978), an account of rock-star decadence. In 1979 Walsh further endeared himself to critics and audiences with a semiserious campaign for the presidency. His platform included "Free gas for everyone"; his qualifications, "Has never lied to the American public." The Eagles broke up in 1982 but he rejoined them for their 1994 reunion tour, cheekily titled Hell Freezes Over.

Throughout the '80s Walsh continued to record, although with lessening chart success with each outing. His last Top 40 single was "Life of Illusion" (#34, 1981) from There Goes the Neighborhood (#20, 1981). You Bought It, You Name It (#48, 1983) and The Confessor (#65, 1985) were Walsh's last solo forays into the Hot 100 to date. In 1993 Walsh embarked on his Vote for Me Tour, which, at one point, reunited him with his former James Gang band mates, with whom he'd also appear in several episodes of The Drew Carey Show in 1998 and 1999. (They played the other members of Carey's amateur band.) Walsh also performed with Ringo Starr's All-Starr Band in 1992 and guested on Starr's album Vertical Man in 1998.

While releasing greatest-hits compilations and touring into the '90s and beyond, Walsh continued to display his irreverent sense of humor, at a 1998 ribbon-cutting ceremony for a new wing of the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame & Museum, for example, he pulled out a chainsaw to cut the ribbon.

War's distinctive mix of funk, Latin, and jazz kept the group on the chart for most of the '70s. In 1970 War scored its first hit as ex-Animal Eric Burdon's backup band.

War's roots reach back to 1962, when Harold Brown and Howard Scott cofounded a band called the Creators. Still in high school, the two later met up with Leroy "Lonnie" Johnson and B.B. Dickerson, and in 1965 Charles Miller joined. Through the mid-'60s the Creators worked various L.A. and West Coast clubs, opening for such acts as Ike and Tina Turner. The group came to a temporary halt when Scott was drafted and Dickerson moved to Hawaii. The remaining group members stayed active in music, and at one point found themselves working under the name the Nightshift backing L.A. Rams football star Deacon Jones' ill-fated efforts as a singer. By then percussionist Papa Dee Allen, whose past credits included playing with Dizzy Gillespie, had joined, and the horn section had been expanded.

Around this time the group met Jerry Goldstein, a former member of the Strangeloves ("I Want Candy") and writer and producer for the Angels ("My Boyfriend's Back") and the McCoys ("Hang On Sloopy"). Goldstein, who, as manager, producer, and cowriter, would play a key role in War's success, also knew Eric Burdon (see entry), who was then seriously considering quitting music altogether. After Burdon heard the band, he and his friend, a young Danish harmonica player named Lee Oskar, joined them in a series of rehearsals. The Creators were rechristened War. After just a few dates, Rosen died of a drug overdose, and Dickerson returned.

The band recorded two albums with Burdon (three, if you count Love Is All Around, which consists of material recorded in August 1969, several months before sessions for the group's debut album). "Spill the Wine" (#3, 1970) was their biggest hit together; a followup, "They Can't Take Away Our Music," went to #50 in early 1971. War and Burdon were on tour in Europe in the fall of 1970, performing to rave reviews and sold-out halls. Suddenly, shortly after the death of Burdon's friend Jimi Hendrix, the singer abruptly abandoned the group. Left on their own, the members of the band continued to tour and to fulfill their commitments.

War proved itself as a creative force in its own right with War (#190, 1971), but its breakthrough came later that year with All Day Music (#16, 1971), which featured the hit singles "All Day Music" (#35, 1971) and "Slippin' Into Darkness" (#16 pop, #12 R&B, 1972). From that point, War rolled on through the decade with four Top 10 albums, including the #1 followup, The World Is a Ghetto. Hits of the period included "The World Is a Ghetto" (#7 pop, #3 R&B, 1972), "The Cisco Kid" (#2 pop, #5 R&B, 1973), "Gypsy Man" (#3 pop, #6 R&B, 1973), "Me and Baby Brother" (#15 pop, #18 R&B, 1973), "Low Rider" (#7 pop, #1 R&B, 1975), and "Why Can't We Be Friends?" (#6 pop, #9 R&B, 1975). Deliver the Word (#6, 1973), War Live! (#13, 1974), and Why Can't We Be Friends? (#8, 1975) all went gold. Greatest Hits (#6, 1976), which included one new song, "Summer" (#7 pop, #4 R&B, 1976), was certified platinum.

Around this time War also worked on movie soundtracks for Youngblood and The River Niger. Three tracks for The River Niger soundtrack and other previously released and unreleased cuts comprised Platinum Jazz (#23, 1977), the first platinum album in the history of Blue Note Records. In 1977 War moved to MCA Records, and the title cut from Galaxy was a disco hit (#39 pop, #5 R&B, 1978). In 1978 the group suffered its first personnel shift since 1970, when Dickerson left the group during the recording of The Music Band. Just two years later, Miller was the victim of a robbery, during which he was murdered. Subsequent albums had neither the commercial nor artistic impact of their early and mid-'70s releases, although the 1982 debut on RCA, Outlaw, promised something of a comeback, boasting "You Got the Power" and the title cut, but neither entered the pop Top 40.

Beginning in the mid-'80s, War, buffeted by more personnel changes and their audience's shift to disco, ceased recording and split with Goldstein. But the act never stopped touring. During an opening performance of "Gypsy Man," Allen died onstage of a brain aneurysm; the group has retired the song from its live repertoire. Not long after Allen's passing, War reunited with Goldstein. With several musicians (including Brown's son, Rae Valentine) augmenting the original core membership of Brown, Jordan, and Scott, the band made a triumphant return to recording in 1994 with the acclaimed Peace Sign (which featured such guest musicians as Lee Oskar and José Feliciano) and a successful tour. Following more touring and the departures of Brown and Scott, Jordan and War soldiered on and released Colección Latina, a 1997 ode to Hispanic culture featuring Feliciano, an acoustic remix of "East L.A.," and a Spanish version of "Low Rider." Meanwhile, Brown and Scott wrote new material with original War chums Dickerson and Oskar. With Goldstein and Jordan in control of War's name, the quartet dubbed itself Guerra ("war" in Spanish) and later, Same Ole Band. Throughout the '90s, War's early work has been sampled or covered on hits by TLC, Janet Jackson, Korn, and Smash Mouth.

1993—Sixty Minute Men: The Best of Billy Ward and His Dominoes (Rhino).

This important, popular '50s R&B vocal group is known primarily for having once counted among its members Clyde McPhatter and his replacement, Jackie Wilson. Billy Ward's Dominoes were the first black male vocal group to master both the smooth, sophisticated style of older groups such as the Ravens and the hard-rocking R&B epitomized in their celebratory, double-entendre-filled "Sixty-Minute Man" (1951) and the protosoul classic "Have Mercy Baby" (1952).

Group founder and sole stalwart Ward had begun studying music in L.A. as a child, and at age 14 won a national contest for his composition "Dejection," the award presented by conductor Walter Damrosch. During and after an army stint in the early '40s, Ward became a boxer, and after his discharge he moved east as sports editor and columnist for Transradio Press. He still loved music and was a vocal coach in the Carnegie Hall building. By the late '40s, Ward had his own voice teaching studio on Broadway, and eventually he got the idea to start a singing group with his students. Thus were born the Dominoes.

In 1950 teenage Clyde McPhatter joined as lead tenor, and in 1951 the group had three Top 10 R&B singles: "Do Something for Me" (#6 R&B), "I Am With You" (#8 R&B), and "Sixty-Minute Man" (#17 pop, #1 R&B). Historically "Sixty-Minute Man" broke commercial barriers, for not only was it a wildly successful R&B hit despite (or because of) its ribald content, but it is considered to have been one of, if not the, first R&B record by a black group to make the pop chart as well.

In 1952 their "Have Mercy Baby" was an R&B #1 for several weeks running. They again hit the Top 10 that year with "The Bells" (#3 R&B), "I'd Be Satisfied" (#8 R&B), and "These Foolish Things Remind Me of You" (#5 R&B). McPhatter's last single with the group. He then left to form the Drifters [see entry]. His place was taken by Jackie Wilson [see entry], who sang lead on "Rags to Riches" (#2 R&B, 1953), the group's biggest hit with him. An early-1955 switch to Decca and an emphasis on smooth pop brought the group its biggest pop hit, "St. Therese of the Roses" (#13, 1956), but Wilson departed for a solo career.

With new lead singer Eugene Mumford (previously of the Serenaders and the Larks), the group had several more pop hits, including the biggest of its career, "Star Dust" (#12, 1957), followed by "Deep Purple" (#20, 1957), both on Liberty. Their last charting single was a cover of "Jennie Lee" in 1960. Mumford left to go solo; he later sang with other groups, including versions of the Ink Spots and the Jubilee Four. The group remained popular as a concert attraction into the early '60s.

Jennifer Warnes

Born Jennifer Jean Warnes, Mar. 3, 1947, Seattle, WA
1968—... I Can Remember Everything (Parrot) 1969—See Me, Feel Me, Touch Me, Heal Me! 1972—Jennifer (Reprise)
1977—Jennifer Warnes (Arista) 1979—Shot Through the Heart 1982—Best of Jennifer Warnes 1986—Famous Blue Raincoat (Cypress) 1992—The Hunter (Private); Just Jennifer (Deram).

A honey-voiced singer and sometime songwriter, Jennifer Warnes achieved her greatest success with a string of hit movie themes. Warnes' recording of "It Goes Like It Goes," from the 1979 film Norma Rae, won an Academy Award. In the 1980s she sang Randy Newman's Oscar-nominated "One More Hour" on the Ragtime soundtrack and scored #1 hits with a pair of duets: 1982's "Up Where We Belong," with Joe Cocker, from An Officer and a Gentleman; and 1987's "(I've Had) The Time of My Life," with former Righteous Brother Bill Medley, from Dirty Dancing. Each duet went to #1 on the pop chart, won an Oscar, and netted a Grammy for Vocal Performance by a Duo or Group.

Warnes toured the L.A. folk circuit in the late '60s, leading to a recording contract with London Records subsidiary Parrot. In 1968, she joined the cast of The Smothers Brothers Comedy Hour, and the following year she performed in the original L.A. production of Hair. The Velvet Underground's John Cale produced her Jennifer disc for Reprise in 1972, the first release in a series of well-received albums that combined country and folk influences. Warnes also sang backup, both in the studio and on tour, for several artists, including Leonard Cohen, whose songs she would later cover on the acclaimed Famous Blue Raincoat. Warnes resurfaced on Arista with 1977's Jennifer Warnes, which yielded the #6 pop single "The Right Time of the Night," but movie soundtrack songs sustained her through the next decade. She kept her ties to Medley, with whom she performed at a benefit concert for abused women in 1998.

Since her solo recording debut in 1962, Dionne Warwick has been one of the most successful American pop singers, particularly in the '60s, when she was the voice of songwriters Burt Bacharach and Hal David Warwick grew up in a family of gospel singers and received considerable vocal training as a girl, singing with the Drinkard Singers, a group managed by her mother and including her sister Dee Dee. She attended Hartt College of Music in Hartford, Connecticut, and after singing background on some recording sessions, she was signed to Scepter Records in 1962 to work with the production and writing team of Bacharach and David.

"Don't Make Me Over" (#21 pop, #5 R&B) in late 1962 was the first of many Bacharach-David compositions Warwick would record, including "Anyone Who Had a Heart" (#8), 1963; "Walk On By" (#6) and "You'll Never Get to Heaven" (#34), 1964; "Trains and Boats and Planes" (#22 pop, #49 R&B) and "Message to Michael" (#8 pop, #5 R&B), 1966; "I Say a Little Prayer" (#4 pop, #8 R&B) and "Alfie" (#18 pop, #5 R&B), 1967. Over the next two years, she had four huge hits: "(Theme from) Valley of the Dolls" (#2 pop, #13 R&B, 1968), "Do You Know the Way to San Jose" (#10 pop, #23 R&B, 1968), "This Girl's in Love With You" (#7 pop and R&B, 1969), and "I'll Never Fall in Love Again" (#6 pop, #17 R&B, 1970) from the Bacharach-David musical Promises, Promises. Of the above songs, only "(Theme from) Valley of the Dolls" was not a Bacharach-David composition. In addition, before 1971 Warwick had 10 more Top 40 hits.

In 1971 Warwick moved to Warner Bros. Records and left Bacharach-David behind. She couldn't duplicate her success, although she worked with a number of fine producer/writers. Just Being Myself was written by the Brian Holland and Lamont Dozier team, and Track of the Cat by Thom Bell. In 1974 she had a Bell-produced hit, "Then Came You," with the Spinners (#1 pop, #2 R&B). "Once You Hit the Road" (#5 R&B) with Bell did well in 1975. In the early '70s, on the advice of a numerologist, she added an "e" to her surname, but dropped it in 1975. A 1977 live album with Isaac Hayes, A Man and a Woman, was well received.

In 1979 she returned to the charts with "I'll Never Love This Way Again" (#5 pop, #18 R&B), produced by Barry Manilow, and "Déjà Vu" (#15 pop, #25 R&B). Manilow also produced her highest-charting album in 10 years, the platinum Dionne. In 1982 Bee Gee Barry Gibb coproduced and wrote songs for Warwick's Heartbreaker (#25), which hit with the title cut (#10, 1982). Warwick's biggest hit singles of the '80s were all duets: with Johnny Mathis, "Friends in Love" (#38, 1982), with Luther Vandross, "How Many Times Can We Say Goodbye" (#27, 1983), and with Jeffrey Osborne, "Love Power" (#12, 1987). Her biggest hit of the period, however, was "That's What Friends Are For," featuring her with Elton John, Gladys Knight and Stevie Wonder. The proceeds from the Grammy-winning #1 1985 hit went to benefit AIDS research through AMFAR (the American Foundation for AIDS Research). In addition, Warwick has received four other Grammy awards. In 1993 she was reunited with Bacharach and David for "Sunny Weather Lover," which appears on Friends Can Be Lovers. That album also contains "Love Will Find a Way," Warwick's duet with her cousin, Whitney Houston. Dionne Sings Dionne, issued in 1998, features new renditions of eight Bacharach songs, seven of which boast lyrics by David. In 2000 Warwick toured with Gladys Knight and Randy Crawford.

She has also pursued a range of business interests outside of music, including an interior design firm, a fragrance called Dionne, the Psychic Friends Network, and a television-production company. She is also involved in a number of humanitarian causes.

Dinah Washington

Born Ruth Lee Jones, Aug. 29, 1924, Tuscaloosa, AL; died Dec. 14, 1963, Detroit, MI

1959—What a Difference a Day Makes! (Mercury) 1960—The Two of Us (with Brook Benton) 1961—Unforgettable 1987—The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, vol. 1 1946–1949; The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, vol. 2 1950–1952 1988—The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, vol. 3 1952–1954; The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, vol. 4 1954–1956 1989—The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, vol. 5 1956–1958; The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, vol. 6 1958–1960; The Complete Dinah Washington on Mercury, vol. 7 1961 1993—First Issue: The Dinah Washington Story (The Original Recordings).

Dinah Washington was the most popular black female singer of the '50s; her sinuous, nasal, penetrating vocals were marvelously effective on blues, jazz, gospel, or straight pop songs. Growing up in Chicago, she gave gospel recitals on the South Side, accompanying herself on piano. At 15 she secretly entered and won an amateur contest at the Regal Theater and began appearing at local nightclubs. But in 1940 she returned to the church at the urging of Sallie Martin, a powerful figure in the gospel world who helped young Ruth Jones polish her talent.

In 1942 she became immersed in secular music after agent Joe Glaser heard her sing. He suggested she change her name to Dinah Washington and recommended her to Lionel Hampton, with whom she sang from 1943 to 1946. Jazz writer Leonard Feather arranged for her to cut two of his songs for Keynote Records in 1943, "Evil Gal Blues" and "Salty Papa Blues," backed by Hampton's band. During the mid-'50s Washington was known as the "Queen of the Harlem Blues," partially because of her sales consistency, and because her style of blues was much more complex than that of Chicago-area singers. Among her Top 10 R&B hits were "Baby Get Lost" (#1 R&B, 1949), "Trouble in Mind" (#4 R&B, 1952), "What a Difference a Day Makes" (#8 pop, #4 R&B, 1959), and "This Bitter Earth" (#24 pop, #1 R&B, 1960). Also in 1960 Washington cut two popular duets with Brook Benton, "Baby (You've Got What It Takes)" (#5 pop, #1 R&B) and "A Rockin' Good Way" (#7 pop, #1 R&B).

After 18 years with Mercury, Washington went to Roulette Records in 1961. She died in 1963 after consuming weight-reduction pills and alcohol. Thirty years later she was honored with a commemorative postage stamp. In 1993 she was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Grover Washington Jr.

Born Dec. 12, 1943, Buffalo, NY; died Dec. 17, 1999, New York, NY

1971—Inner City Blues (Kudu) 1972—All the King's Horses 1973—Soul Box 1975—Mister Magic; Feels So Good 1976—A Secret Place; Soul Box, vol. 2 1977—Live at the Bijou 1978—Reed Seed (Motown) 1979—Paradise (Elektra); Skylarkin' (Motown) 1980—Winelight (Elektra); Baddest (Motown) 1981—Come Morning (Elektra) 1982—The Best Is Yet to Come 1984—Inside Moves 1985—Anthology of Grover Washington 1987—Strawberry Moon (Columbia) 1988—Then and Now 1989—Time Out of Mind 1992—Next Exit 1994—All My Tomorrows 1996—Soulful Strut 1999—Prime Cuts—The Columbia Years: 1987–1999 2000—Aria (Sony); Millennium Collection (Uni/Motown).

Grover Washington Jr.'s recordings, featuring his soulful saxes backed by supple, funky grooves, made him, since the '70s, one of the most commercially viable pop jazzmen.

Starting to play saxophone at age 10, Washington came from a musical family, his father a tenor saxophonist, his mother a choir singer, and his brother a drummer. At 16 he left home to tour with a Columbus, Ohio-based band, the Four Clefs. While in the army from 1965 to 1967, he gigged in Philadelphia with organ trios and rock bands. He also performed in New York with drummer Billy Cobham.

After playing on a number of albums in the early '70s, Washington was signed to Kudu Records by pop-jazz mogul Creed Taylor. Inner City Blues introduced his fusion of jazz technique and pop melodicism; his gold Mister Magic, arranged by Bob James, established a style that proved successful throughout the '70s and early '80s. This was the first of seven Washington albums of the period to go #1 on the jazz chart and the first to go gold. His best-selling release was the platinum WineLight, which contained "Just the Two of Us," featuring Bill Withers' vocal.

Through the '80s, Washington's audience became even more pop oriented; his mellow sound gained exposure on the theme songs for television's The Cosby Show and Moonlighting. A multi-instrumentalist (tenor, alto, soprano, and baritone saxophone, as well as clarinet, bass, and piano), Washington began working as a producer for jazz group Pieces of a Dream, and producing some of his own albums.

In 1992 Washington again went to #1 on the jazz chart with Next Exit; it contained "Summer Chill," cowritten with his son and nominated for a Best R&B Instrumental Grammy Award. In the '90s, he performed at Bill Clinton's inauguration, and alternated acoustic jazz such as All My Tomorrows, a stylistic successor to 1988's Then and Now, with forays into hip-hop (Soulful Strut) and his usual pop-oriented fare. He died from an apparent heart attack in 1999, after taping four tunes for the CBS television show, The Saturday Early Show.

Was (Not Was)

Formed ca. 1981, Detroit, MI

Don Was (b. Donald Fagenson, Sep. 13, 1952, Detroit), bass; David Was (b. David Weiss, Oct. 26, 1952, Detroit), sax, flute; Sweet Pea Atkinson (b. Sep. 20, 1945, Oberlin, OH), voc.; Sir Harry Bowens (b. Oct. 8, 1949, Detroit), voc.; Donald Ray Mitchell (b. Apr. 12, 1957, Detroit), voc.

1981—Was (Not Was) (Ze/Island) 1983—Born to Laugh at Tornadoes (Ze/Geffen) 1988—What Up, Dog? (Chrysalis) 1990—Are You Okay?

Orchestra Was: 1997—Forever's a Long, Long Time (Nerve Forecast).

Was (Not Was) unites two audiophiles overflowing with encyclopedic knowledge of pop music, some dyed-in-the-wool R&B singers, and an absurdly eclectic host of outside guests to implore all manner of white and black musical genres.

The Was "brothers" met as children while living in suburban Detroit. Hanging out in the "humor prison"—Weiss' basement—the two spent their adolescence indulging their tilted sensibilities by publishing an alternative newspaper, staging outrageous school productions, and writing songs. Immersed in the local rock and soul scenes that commingled in Detroit, Weiss and Fagenson also dabbled in the radical rock & roll politics of John Sinclair's White Panther party.

Weiss, who plays saxophone and flute, left Detroit for L.A. Fagenson, a bassist, stayed in Detroit eking out a living doing local session work and production. Weiss was writing jazz criticism for the Los Angeles Herald Examiner but felt unfulfilled musically. The two hometown buddies began a cross-country collaboration; Weiss concocting the surreal lyrics, Fagenson devising the genre-warping music. Taking their name from a word game of Fagenson's son, Was (Not Was) proceeded to collect members of Detroit's pop-rock-funk communities to help them on their first album. Among the groups represented were P-Funk, the MC5, Brownsville Station, and Wild Cherry. The resulting "Out Come the Freaks" and "Tell Me That I'm Dreaming" became dance hits.

Born to Laugh at Tornadoes (#134) upped the eclectic ante even more. Guests included Marshall Crenshaw, Mel Torme, Mitch Ryder, Ozzy Osbourne, Kiss' Vinnie Vincent, and the Knack's Doug Fieger. Critics' darlings but poor sellers, Was (Not Was) was dropped by Geffen. Their next album didn't find them retreating from their now trademark mix-and-match collisions. What Up, Dog? (#43) featured Frank Sinatra Jr. on the priceless "Wedding Vows in Vegas" and an Elvis Costello writing collaboration, "Love Can Be Bad Luck." But extra attention was placed on the band's own superlative R&B belters, Sir Harry Bowens and Sweet Pea Atkinson (assisted by Mitchell), whose impassioned vocals helped make "Walk the Dinosaur" a #7 hit.

Are You Okay? (#99) also has its share of unexpected guests (Leonard Cohen, Iggy Pop, the Roches), but the standout track was a remake of the Temptations' 1972 hit "Papa Was a Rollin' Stone" with Bowens and Atkinson singing and G Love E adding a rap that turned the song into a contemporary howl of urban pain. The Was Brothers began to drift apart shortly thereafter, however, and by 1993 Was (Not Was) was no more.

By the late 1980s Don Was had simultaneously established himself among the most in-demand producers in the music industry. His magic touch was best felt on Bonnie Raitt's Nick of Time (1989), a project which totally revitalized her career; he was also at the helm for her followup, 1991's Luck of the Draw. Was has also produced the B-52's, Iggy Pop, Paula Abdul, and Willie Nelson. Production for Bob Dylan's 1990 Under the Red Sky was credited to David and Don Was. In 1994 Don Was produced the Rolling Stones' Voodoo Lounge, an endeavor that won him a Grammy and led to two successive Stones albums. He made his film directorial debut in 1995 with the Brian Wilson documentary, I Just Wasn't Made for These Times.

In 1997 Don Was rounded up a diverse batch of musicians (including Sweet Pea Atkinson, Merle Haggard, and Herbie Hancock) and issued Forever's a Long, Long Time under the banner OrquestraWas. The album set Hank Williams lyrics to R&B arrangements, and the enhanced CD featured a Was-directed/Francis Ford Coppola-produced minimovie starring Atkinson. The following year, Don and David Was reunited to begin working on a new album, but Don's son Tony Fagenson came out of the gate first with the debut album by his own band, Eve 6.

W.A.S.P. would be just another mildly successful L.A. metal band if not for the attention of the Parents' Music Resource Center. At the 1985 Senate Commerce Committee Hearings they became the prime example of all that was obscene in rock, illustrated with a photo of lead singer Blackie Lawless posed with a buzz saw jutting none-too-subtly between his legs.

Lawless, a nephew of '50s New York Yankee pitcher Ryne Duren, seemed born for this role. A member of the last-ditch version of the New York Dolls, he moved to L.A. in 1976. That year he joined forces with future Motley Crue member Nikki Sixx in Sister. He left in 1978 and roamed the L.A. scene until he formed W.A.S.P. with Chris Holmes, the husband of ex-Runaway Lita Ford.

The band became known for their club act, which included crotch rubbings and props such as chainsaws, raw meat, and fake blood. Capitol signed them in 1984 but refused to distribute their initial single, "Animal (Fuck Like a Beast)." The coverage of the Senate hearings boosted the band's notoriety, pushing 1985's The Last Command to #49. The Headless Children (#48, 1989) tempered the band's usual treatment of sex and violence, becoming their most popular album. In 1991 Lawless introduced a new lineup, and the band became known as Blackie Lawless and W.A.S.P., releasing a concept album titled The Crimson Idol in 1993.

Undeterred by the band being dropped from their major label, Lawless has kept W.A.S.P. busy. Still Not Black Enough was originally supposed to be a solo album, but Lawless decided to release it under the W.A.S.P. moniker. The following year, Holmes came back into the W.A.S.P. fold. The band has been recording (on small, independent labels) and touring regularly ever since, and its live shows still feature an abundance of gory theatrics.

Mike Scott solo: 1995—Bring 'Em All In (Chrysalis) 1997—Still Burning.

Scottish-born singer/songwriter Mike Scott is the sole constant member of the Waterboys, a group whose sound has changed from dramatic, horn- and keyboard-driven "big music" to folky Irish acoustic songs to guitar-based pop/rock. Throughout, Scott's incisive lyrics have for the most part reflected his interests in spirituality, mysticism, and Celtic poetry. Though quite successful in Britain in the mid-'80s, the Waterboys have yet to find a large audience in the U.S.

Scott, whose mother was an English professor, grew up in a village on the coast of Scotland. In the late '70s he started a fanzine, Jungleland, and began playing in punk bands. After studying English and philosophy at Edinburgh University, Scott moved to London with his band, Another Pretty Face. After it broke up, he started the Waterboys (named after a line in "The Kids" from Lou Reed's Berlin), recruiting multi-instrumentalist Anthony Thistlethwaite. The two played most of the instruments on 1983's The Waterboys, produced by Scott. Keyboardist Karl Wallinger joined for the band's next two recordings, adding his rich keyboard flavorings to Scott's majestic mood-rock. Critics began dubbing the Waterboys' sound "big music" after a song title on The Pagan Place (#100 U.K., 1984). This Is the Sea (#37 U.K., 1985) proved a fruitful collaboration between Wallinger and Scott, yielding the British hit single, "The Whole of the Moon" (#26 U.K., 1985). (The song returned to #3 on the U.K. chart in 1991, upon rerelease on the #2 charting greatest-hits album.)

Wallinger left the band in 1985 to start his own group, World Party [see entry]. Scott moved from London to Ireland, where he put together a new band, mainly consisting of traditional Irish folk players. Three years later, the lilting, mostly acoustic Fisherman's Blues (#13 U.K., 1988) was the result of Scott's new musical environment. Room to Roam (#5 U.K., 1990) continued in this direction.

The early '90s found Scott yearning to play electric guitar again. After a change in record labels, Scott relocated once more, this time to New York, without Thistlethwaite and his Irish band mates. Dream Harder (#5 U.K., 1993) was recorded with an assortment of session players. It marked a return to electric music, though more stripped-down than the Waterboys' early albums. In 1994 Scott moved back to Britain, living for several months at a spiritual community in Scotland. While there, he recorded his first solo album, Bring 'Em All In.

Three years later his second solo effort, Still Burning, followed. The Waterboy's moniker returned in 2000 when Scott put together a band to play England's Glastonbury Festival. A Rock in the Weary Land's release was followed by a Waterboys tour of the States—the band's first in 11 years.

Muddy Waters was the leading exponent of Chicago blues in the '50s. With him, the blues came up from the Delta and went electric, and his guitar licks and repertoire have fueled innumerable blues bands. Waters was the son of a farmer and, following his mother's death in 1918, was raised by his grandmother. He picked up his nickname because he fished and played regularly in a muddy creek. He learned to play harmonica, and as a teen he led a band that frequently played Mississippi Delta clubs. His singing was influenced by the style of local bluesman Son House. At 17, Waters began playing guitar by studying Robert Johnson records. In 1940 he traveled to St. Louis and in 1941 joined the Silas Green tent show as a singer and harmonica player. Sometime around 1941–42, Waters was recorded by folk archivists/researchers Alan Lomax and John Work in Mississippi for the Library of Congress.

In 1943 he moved to Chicago, where he found employment in a paper mill. The following year Waters got an electric guitar and began performing at South Side clubs and rent parties. He cut several sides in 1946 for Columbia's Okeh subsidiary, but none was released until 1981, when they appeared on a Columbia blues reissue, Okeh Chicago Blues. In 1946 bluesman Sunnyland Slim helped Waters get signed to Aristocrat Records, where he cut several unsuccessful singles, and Waters continued playing clubs every night and driving a truck six days a week.

In 1948 the Chess brothers changed Aristocrat to Chess. Waters' first single on the new label was "Rollin' Stone," a major blues hit. "I Can't Be Satisfied" and "I Feel Like Going Home" from that year secured his position as a major blues performer. Most of Waters' early recordings featured him on electric guitar, Big Crawford or writer/producer Willie Dixon on bass, and occasionally Little Walter on harmonica. By 1951 he was supported by a complete band with Otis Spann on piano, Little Walter on harmonica, Jimmie Rodgers on second guitar, and Elgin Evans on drums

"Honey Bee" in 1951; "She Moves Me" (#10 R&B) in 1952; "I'm Your Hoochie Coochie Man" (#8 R&B), "I Just Wanna Make Love to You" (#4 R&B), "I'm Ready" (#5 R&B), and "Got My Mojo Working" in 1954, and "Mannish Boy" (#9 R&B) in 1955 are all regarded as blues classics and have been recorded by numerous rock groups. During the '50s, many of the top Chicago bluesmen passed through Waters' band, including Walter Horton, Junior Wells, Jimmie Rodgers, James Cotton, and Buddy Guy. In addition, Waters was helpful in the early stages of both Howlin' Wolf's and Chuck Berry's careers.

During his peak years as a record seller, most of Waters' sales were confined primarily to the Mississippi Delta, the New Orleans area, and Chicago. But his reputation and music were internationally known, as the attendance at concerts on his 1958 English tour revealed. The Rolling Stones named themselves after his song "Rollin' Stone." After the mid-'50s Waters never had another Top 10 R&B single, but his albums began to reach rock listeners. Into the '60s, Waters appeared at concerts and festivals nationally, such as the 1960 Newport Jazz Festival, where Muddy Waters at Newport was cut. In the late '60s and early '70s, he recorded several albums either with rock musicians or in a rock direction, the best of which were The London Sessions and Fathers and Sons, the latter with many of the players he had influenced, including Mike Bloomfield and Paul Butterfield. In 1971 Waters won the first of several Grammys with They Call Me Muddy Waters.

In the early '70s Waters left Chess and sued Chess's publishing arm for back royalties. He signed with Steve Paul's Blue Sky records in 1976, the year he appeared at the Band's farewell concert. Using members of his '50s bands and producer/guitarist Johnny Winter, Waters made three of his best-selling albums, Hard Again, I'm Ready, and King Bee. Winter and Waters frequently performed together in the '70s and '80s. He last performed publicly at a June 1982 Eric Clapton show. Waters died of a heart attack. In 1987 he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Jody Watley

Born Jan. 30, 1959, Chicago, IL
 1987—Jody Watley (MCA) 1988—Beginnings (Solar)
 1989—Larger Than Life; You Wanna Dance With Me? 1991—Affairs of the Heart 1993—Intimacy 1995—Affection (Avitone/Bellmark) 1996—Greatest Hits (MCA) 1998—Flower (Atlantic).

A leggy dance diva whose minimalist singing and videogenic glamour evoke a more elegant Janet Jackson, Jody Watley was awarded the 1987 Best New Artist Grammy for her eponymous solo debut, which reached #10 in 1987 and yielded two slamming dance-pop singles, "Looking for a New Love" (#2) and "Don't You Want Me" (#6). (Another track, "Some Kind of Lover," went to #10 in 1988.)

The daughter of a minister father and a mother who sang, both of whom had influential friends—the singer Jackie Wilson was her godfather—Watley got her start while still a teenager in the '70s as a dancer on TV's Soul Train. She and dance partner Jeffrey Daniels were tapped by producer Don Cornelius to form the dance band Shalamar [see entry]. Little more than a decorative backup singer at first, Watley began writing songs for the band and aspired to sing more, but she was stymied by lead singer Howard Hewett. Artistically frustrated by Hewett, Watley left Shalamar in 1984 and moved to England, where she modeled and did sessions singing, notably on the 1984 Band Aid single "Do They Know It's Christmas?" Back in L.A., she hooked up with former Prince bassist Andre Cymone to cowrite several tracks for Jody Watley. Their partnership continued over the next two LPs with solid returns. Larger Than Life spawned "Real Love" (#2, 1989), "Everything" (#4, 1989), and, with Erik B and Rakim, "Friends" (#9, 1989); Affairs of the Heart featured a few songs written solely by Watley. Her next album, Intimacy, was her least dance-oriented to date—perhaps why it barely reached the Top 40 on the R&B chart, although it was well-received by critics.

In 1995 Watley went through a lot of changes. The public did not discover that she and longtime producer Cymone had been secretly married for years (and they had two children) until the couple divorced. Watley also chose to establish her own label, releasing Affection on Avitone (it was distributed by Bellmark); the album included a live, jazzy remake of "Looking for a New Love," and the title track reached #28 on the R&B chart. In 1996, Watley took to the stage as Rizzo in the Broadway revival of Grease. Despite her own strong protests that she would not participate in a Shalamar reunion, she was persuaded by Babyface to sing on, "This Is for the Lover in You" (#6 pop, #2 R&B, 1997), with her former band mates, Daniels and Hewett, along with L.L. Cool J, for a Babyface album. That year, Watley also briefly returned to modeling, displaying winter coats for Saks Fifth Avenue. In 1998 Watley did a lot of press in anticipation of her new album, her first with Atlantic; she even posed skimpily clad for a spread in Playboy. To her surprise, after releasing a single, "Off the Hook" (#23 R&B, 1998), Flower's release was indefinitely postponed in the U.S. It was, however, released internationally, and Watley played concerts in Europe and Asia. In 2000 Watley performed live with the Nuyorican Soul Orchestra in New York's Central Park and released a dance single, "I Love to Love."

Jody Watley

Johnny "Guitar" Watson

Born Feb. 3, 1935, Houston, TX; died May 17, 1996, Yokohama, Jap.

1966—Bad (Okeh) 1967—Two for the Price of One 1968—In the Fats Bag 1973—Gangster of Love (Fantasy) 1976—I Don't Want to Be Alone, Stranger; Captured Live (DJM); Ain't That a Bitch 1977—A Real Mother for Ya; Funk Beyond the Call of Duty 1978—Giant 1979—What the Hell Is This 1980—Love Jones 1981—Johnny "Guitar" Watson and the Family Clone 1987—Three Hours Past Midnight (Ace) 1994—Bow Wow (Bellmark) 1999—The Very Best of Johnny "Guitar" Watson (Rhino).

Johnny "Guitar" Watson enjoyed great popularity in the mid-'70s with several hit singles and LPs, but his work has been known in blues circles since the '50s. His playing style was influential on Jimi Hendrix, among others, and his "Gangster of Love" was recorded by Steve Miller in 1968.

Watson's father taught him to play piano, and at age 11 his grandmother gave him his grandfather's guitar, which he taught himself to play. He moved to L.A. in 1950, where he began working as a sideman in various bands and recording as a solo artist for Federal Records. Among the bands he played in through the '50s were those led by Amos Milburn, Bumps Blackwell, and Big Jay McNeely. In 1961 he began recording for King. His late-'50s and early-'60s hits include "Three Hours Past Midnight," "Those Lonely Lonely Nights," and "Space Guitar," which was one of the first recorded songs to use reverb and feedback. Through the '60s and '70s, Watson performed around the U.S. and occasionally in Europe. In the early to mid-'60s, he often toured with Larry Williams. Recording for DJM in the mid-'70s, Watson had funk hits with "A Real Mother for Ya" (#41 pop, 1977), "I Don't Wanna Be a Lone Ranger," and "It's Too Late." Later releases on A&M and Mercury were not as well received. He essentially retired in the early '80s but performed occasionally in Europe. After meeting producer Al Bell, he resumed recording. Bow Wow and a subsequent series of live gigs marked Watson's tragically short resurgence in 1994. He suffered a fatal heart attack in 1996 during a Japanese tour.

Weather Girls

Formed 1982, San Francisco, CA

Martha Wash (b. San Francisco), voc.; Izora Armstead (b. ca. 1943, San Francisco), voc.

1983—Success (Columbia) 1985—Big Girls Don't Cry

1988—Weather Girls 1994—(- Wash; + Dynelle Rhodes, voc.) Two Tons O' Fun (Fuel, Ger.).

Martha Wash solo: 1993—Martha Wash (RCA) 1998—The Collection (Logic/BMG).

Martha Wash and Izora Armstead are gospel-trained disco divas who have tried not to let their extra-large size deter them from pop stardom, whether using it to their advantage—calling themselves Two Tons O' Fun—or fighting sexism and size-ism with lawsuits, as Wash has done.

Both women got their starts singing in church choirs in San Francisco. They first sang together in the gospel group N.O.W. (News of the World). In the late '70s they became backup singers for disco sensation Sylvester as Two Tons O' Fun, releasing a couple albums on the Fantasy label. In 1982 Wash and Armstead teamed with producer and songwriter Paul Jabara to record the single "It's Raining Men" (#46 pop, #34 R&B, 1983). The song became a hit in dance clubs, where it was seized by gay men as an anthem, and was especially big in the U.K. Although the Weather Girls' subsequent albums were praised by critics and the duo continued to have a following, they never repeated their initial success.

In 1990 Wash began singing commercial jingles and working with various groups. She provided the vocals on such dance hits as Black Box's "Everybody, Everybody," and C + C Music Factory's "Gonna Make You Sweat." But because these were groups run by producers who did not deem Wash photogenic, she wasn't credited on the albums and svelte models lip-synched her part in videos. Wash sued the groups and their record companies for fraud, winning a contract with RCA as part of the Black Box settlement.

In 1991 she sang a duet with Luther Vandross, "I Who Have Nothing," on his Power of Love album. Wash's solo debut yielded two dance-club hits, "Carry On" and "Give It to You." To support her longtime gay following, Wash has performed numerous AIDS benefits. She rejoined the C + C Music Factory fold [see entry] in 1994, appearing that year on Anything Goes. In 1998 Wash released The Collection, a career retrospective that offers a sampling of her work with Sylvester, Two Tons O' Fun, Black Box, and C + C Music Factory. The album also contains three new tracks, including "It's Raining Men . . . The Sequel," featuring drag queen RuPaul.

Meanwhile, Armstead and her daughter Dynelle Rhodes have carried on the Weather Girls name since 1992. The duo has toured abroad extensively and their 1994 album Two Tons O' Fun topped the charts in Europe, yielding a pair of hits. Armistead writes much of the group's material, which covers topics ranging from relationships to broader social concerns.

Between its inception in 1970 and its 1987 breakup Weather Report was the premier electric jazz ensemble. Born of the Miles Davis groups of the late '60s that also spawned many other fusion bands, Weather Report was one of the very few groups that managed to win commercial success while going its own way. The band's music had the drive of rock, the harmonic sophistication of jazz, the formal ingenuity of classical music, and hints of Brazilian, African, and Asian traditions. The best-known Weather Report tunes, such as "Birdland," sound like electrified global carnivals.

Josef Zawinul and Wayne Shorter were the only constants of Weather Report. The first music Zawinul heard and played was the Gypsy folk music of his family, his first instrument was an accordion. Around the age of 12, when he was living in Nazi-occupied Vienna, he began studying classical piano. In the postwar years, he played jazz at U.S. Army clubs and Viennese cabarets. On the basis of a record he cut in a local studio, he was awarded a scholarship to study at the Berklee College of Music in Boston, and he arrived in the United States in 1959. Three weeks after classes began, he dropped out and went to New York, where he met Shorter.

Shorter had been in the city since 1951, when he entered

New York University to study music. After graduating he played tenor saxophone with Horace Silver before joining Maynard Ferguson's band. Through Shorter, Zawinul began playing with Ferguson as well. Not long after that, however, Shorter moved on to Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers, where he stayed for five years. Zawinul also left Ferguson. He led Dinah Washington's band for over a year and did sessions behind Joe Williams, Yusef Lateef, Ben Webster, and a very young Aretha Franklin. He played the electric piano extensively during nine years in the Cannonball Adderley Quintet, which he joined in 1961, and for whom he wrote "Mercy, Mercy, Mercy."

Shorter joined the Miles Davis Quintet (with keyboardist Herbie Hancock, drummer Tony Williams, and bassist Ron Carter) in 1964. Shorter's work with Davis and on a half-dozen solo albums had established him as one of the outstanding saxophonists of the John Coltrane school, although he later tempered the Coltrane influence with his own lyricism. Shorter was also an outstanding composer. His "Nefertiti" (the title track of a 1967 Miles Davis Quintet album) convinced Zawinul that the two of them should join forces. Meanwhile, Davis decided to experiment with a large electrified ensemble, which Zawinul joined. Zawinul's composition "In a Silent Way" became the title track of the album, recorded in 1968. Zawinul continued to play with Adderley, but he joined the Davis aggregation again in 1969 to record the landmark Bitches Brew, to which Zawinul and Shorter contributed compositions.

Shorter left Davis soon after the Bitches Brew sessions, and Zawinul left Adderley the following year. Each recorded solo albums before forming a group to experiment with electric jazz. They recruited Czech bassist Miroslav Vitous, who had recently played on a Zawinul date. After studying classical composition at the Prague Conservatory, Vitous—like Zawinul—had come to the U.S. on a scholarship from the Berklee College of Music. His jazz credits included work with Stan Getz, Sonny Rollins, Art Farmer, Herbie Mann, Larry Coryell, and Miles Davis. Clive Davis of Columbia Records reportedly signed the group without even listening to its demo tape. With Brazilian percussionist Airtó Moreira and drummer Alphonse Mouzon, Weather Report recorded its highly experimental debut album.

Moreira, who left Weather Report to join Chick Corea, was replaced by another Brazilian, Dom Um Romão, formerly of Sergio Mendes and Brasil '66. Mouzon joined the McCoy Tyner Quartet and was replaced in Weather Report by Tyner's drummer, Eric Gravatt. One side of 1972's I Sing the Body Electric was excerpted from a double live album released only in Japan. On the group's third album, Streetnighter, Zawinul began using synthesizers as lead instruments and sticking to a funkier beat. Streetnighter sold 200,000 copies, quite a number for an album of instrumentals. Mysterious Traveller (1974) went further toward dance music with fixed rhythms, riffs, and figures repeated in unison by the bass, saxophone, and synthesizers. Traveller introduced bassist Alphonso Johnson, formerly with Chuck Mangione. By Tale Spinnin', Johnson had taken over for Vitous.

Tale Spinnin' featured Zawinul's ARP 2600, one of the most advanced of the monophonic synthesizers. On Black Market, he introduced the Oberheim polyphonic, and the effect was dramatic. Weather Report's music became almost orchestral in texture. But as Zawinul's arsenal of sounds expanded, Wayne Shorter's role diminished on records, although in Weather Report's concerts he took ample solos. In 1973 Shorter made the album Native Dancer with Brazilian songwriter Milton Nascimento.

Black Market included one cut on which the bassist was Jaco Pastorius. Pastorius had introduced himself to Zawinul after a Weather Report concert in Miami in 1975 and given him tapes of his playing. The son of a professional drummer, he had started playing drums at age 13, before taking up the bass. He toured with Wayne Cochran's C.C. Riders for one year and played with Ira Sullivan's big band, the Baker's Dozen, for three. As a freelance bassist in New York and Boston, he worked with Paul Bley and Pat Metheny, and his solo debut album was released concurrently with Black Market, introducing his busily contrapuntal fretless bass style. By the Heavy Weather sessions, he was a full member of the group, a contributing composer, and coproducer (with Zawinul). While devoting most of his efforts to Weather Report, Pastorius also recorded and toured with Joni Mitchell.

Heavy Weather was Weather Report's most commercially successful album. It sold over 500,000 copies—the first gold album for the group—and Zawinul's "Birdland" was given considerable airplay (a vocal rendition by the Manhattan Transfer was popular three years later).

Mr. Gone (1978) did not depart far from the rich orchestral sound of Heavy Weather, but the group no longer included a percussionist. With the addition of drummer Pete Erskine, Weather Report remained a four-piece unit for almost four years. A double album, 8.30, comprised three sides recorded at two dates at the culmination of the 1979 tour, and one side recorded in Zawinul's home studio. Pastorius left Weather Report in 1982 and formed his own band, Word of Mouth. Tragically, Pastorius's heroin addiction cut his career short, practically penniless, he was beaten to death in 1987.

Procession (1983), with a new lineup, included the first Weather Report song with lyrics (sung by Janis Siegel of Manhattan Transfer). Without the creative three-way Zawinul-Shorter-Pastorius interchange, however, the Weather Report spark fizzled and in 1987 the band broke up.

Shorter formed his own touring groups, which tended toward more traditional jazz forms. Zawinul put together Weather Update, a fusion outfit that featured Erskine and guitarist Steve Khan. Shorter kept a low profile over the next few years. Apart from the heavily arranged Atlantis album and brief tours with Carlos Santana and a 1992 all-star Miles Davis tribute band, Shorter was out of the limelight. Ironically, his earlier Davis-era saxophone style and compositional technique had become the most influential sound for a new generation of jazz players. Zawinul continued his forays into neo-fusion with the Zawinul Syndicate, incorporating his continuing interest in world music. In 1996 ex-Miles Davis keyboardist Jason Miles assembled a cast of stellar players for a tribute to the band. Celebrating the Music of Weather Report, on Telarc.

The Weavers

Formed 1949, New York, NY

Original lineup: Pete Seeger (b. May 3, 1919, New York), gtr., banjo, voc.; Ronnie Gilbert, voc.; Fred Hellerman (b. May 13, 1927, New York), voc., gtr.; Lee Hays (b. Mar. 14, 1914, Little Rock, AR; d. Aug. 26, 1981, New York), voc., gtr.

Sep. 25, 1933], banjo) The Weavers on Tour; The Weavers at Home 1959—Traveling On With the Weavers 1961—The Weavers at Carnegie Hall, vol. 2 1962—Almanac (—Darling; + Frank Hamilton, banjo) 1963—Reunion at Carnegie Hall, 1963 (group disbands) 1965—Songbook 1980—(group re-forms: Seeger; Hays; Hellerman; Gilbert) 1971—The Weavers' Greatest Hits 1981—Together Again 1987—Weavers Classics; Reunion at Carnegie Hall, part 2 1993—The Weavers: Wasn't That a Time (Vanguard).

The Weavers were the most important and influential early American folk revivalists, as well as one of the most commercially successful.

The quartet came together, at first informally, in 1948. Hays and Seeger had both been in the Almanac Singers. The Weavers began recording in spring 1950, and with their second single, they had their first big hit: "Tzena, Tzena, Tzena" (#2) backed with Lead Belly's "Goodnight, Irene" (#1). That single alone later went on to sell over 2 million copies, a phenomenal number at that time. Their other hits included "So Long (It's Been Good to Know You)" and "On Top of Old Smoky." In 1952 the group was blacklisted because of some members' leftist political views and associations. They all but disappeared between 1952 and their triumphant Christmas Eve concert at Carnegie Hall in 1955.

Pete Seeger [see entry] left to go solo in 1958 after a dispute with the other members over participating in a cigarette commercial, which he opposed. He was replaced in succession by Erik Darling, Frank Hamilton, and, in 1963, Bernie Krause. A 1963 reunion concert featured all seven Weavers, including Seeger.

The Weavers' legacy heavily influenced the early-'60s folk boom. A number of popular Weavers tunes have made their way onto the pop charts and into the American folk tradition: "Kisses Sweeter Than Wine," "Wimoweh (The Lion Sleeps Tonight)," "If I Had a Hammer," "Guantanamera," and "Turn! Turn! Turn! (To Everything There Is a Season)."

The four original members were reunited in 1981 for a concert that was filmed for the documentary Wasn't That a Time. Between reunions, Seeger had gone on to an influential solo career (he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1996). Gilbert has recorded a number of albums, including two with Holly Near (Lifeline, 1983; Singing With You, 1986) and Harp (1985), with Arlo Guthrie and Pete Seeger. Her solo releases include The Spirit Is Free (1985) and Love Will Find a Way (1989).

Jimmy Webb

Born Aug. 15, 1946, Elk City, OK
 1968—Jim Webb Sings Jim Webb (Epic) 1970—Words and Music (Reprise) 1971—And So On 1972—Letters
 1974—Land's End (Asylum) 1977—El Mirage (Atlantic)
 1982—Angel Heart 1993—Suspending Disbelief (Elektra)
 1996—Ten Easy Pieces (Guardian/Angel).

At age 21, Jimmy Webb was a millionaire, having written such pop hits as Glen Campbell's "By the Time I Get to Phoenix" and the Fifth Dimension's "Up, Up and Away," both of which were Grammy nominees in 1967 for Best Song ("Up, Up and Away" won). Other often-covered Webb songs include "Wichita Lineman," "MacArthur Park," "Galveston," and "The Moon Is a Harsh Mistress."

The son of a Baptist minister, Webb grew up in rural Oklahoma, learning piano and organ. When he moved with his family to San Bernardino, California, in 1964, he was already writing songs. In 1966 he enrolled in San Bernardino Valley College, but dropped out shortly thereafter when his mother died. He moved to L.A. and began making the rounds of the record business. For a time he earned $50 a week working at one recording studio. He also worked for Motown's publishing company, Jobete Music, which in 1965 published Webb's "Honey Come Back." Singer and record executive Johnny Rivers recorded a Webb tune he liked, "By the Time I Get to Phoenix." Though Rivers didn't have a hit with it, he recommended Webb's work to the Fifth Dimension, who had a 1967 hit with "Up, Up and Away." That year Glen Campbell covered "Phoenix." After TWA airlines used "Up, Up and Away" as a commercial theme, Webb formed a company that provided jingles for Chevrolet, Doritos, and Hamm's beer. In 1968 the Brooklyn Bridge hit with Webb's "The Worst That Could Happen." That year Richard Harris (for whom Webb had written the entire LPs A Tramp Shining and The Yard Went On Forever) scored a #2 pop hit with Webb's melodramatic "MacArthur Park," which was later covered by Waylon Jennings (who won a Grammy with it in 1969), Donna Summer, the Four Tops, and countless others. Glen Campbell had a gold hit with "Wichita Lineman."

Meanwhile, in 1968 Epic had issued an album of Webb singing his own demos, without the artist's consent. Webb had previously made his singing debut with an obscure group called Strawberry Children in 1967, on the single "Love Years Coming." In 1969 he also composed music for the films Tell Them Willie Boy Is Here and How Sweet It Is and worked on a semiautobiographical Broadway musical, His Own Dark City.

Webb's solo concert debut in L.A. in February 1970 was poorly received, despite a capacity audience; none of his solo albums were popular. In 1972 he produced a Supremes album. The next year he had a genuine hit when his "All I Know" was performed by Art Garfunkel (who called Webb

"the best songwriter since Paul Simon"). Webb went on to produce Cher's Stars LP, a 1975 album by his sister Susan, and a failed Fifth Dimension reunion LP, 1976's Earthbound. He began taking three- and four-year intervals between recordings. El Mirage was produced by Beatles producer George Martin.

Webb continued writing for films (Doc, The Last Unicorn, among others) and television (Amazing Stories, Tales From the Crypt, and Faerie Tale Theater). He moved to New York, but his dream of writing musicals for the theater would not be realized. Over a decade passed before he released his critically acclaimed Suspending Disbelief, produced by Linda Ronstadt. Two late 1993 New York tribute concerts, featuring Glen Campbell, David Crosby, the Brooklyn Bridge, Art Garfunkel, Michael Feinstein, and Nancy Griffith, drew rave reviews. Webb remade some of his best-loved classics for 1996's Ten Easy Pieces. In 1998 he published his first book, Tunesmith: Inside the Art of Songwriting.

Junior Wells

Born Amos Blackmore, Dec. 9, 1934, Memphis, TN; died Jan. 15, 1998, Chicago, IL

1966—Hoodoo Man Blues (Delmark); It's My Life, Baby (Vanguard) 1968—You're Tuff Enough (Mercury); Junior Wells Sings at the Golden Bear (Blue Rock) 1970—Southside Blues Jam (Delmark) 1971—In My Younger Days (Red Lightning) 1974—On Tap (Delmark) 1977—Blues Hit Big Town 1993—Better Off With the Blues (Telarc) 1996—Come On in This House 1997—Live at Buddy Guy's Legends 1998—The Best of the Vanguard Years (Vanguard).

One of the more noted Chicago blues singers and harmonica players, Junior Wells was inspired by the blues harp of Sonny Boy Williamson and Little Walter Jacobs.

Wells began playing harmonica as a child, learning from his neighbor, Junior Parker. He played in the streets of nearby Memphis until, at age 12, he moved from the family farm in Marion, Arkansas, to Chicago. He got his first paying job at age 14. He was just 16 when he first auditioned for Muddy Waters, and in 1952 he replaced Little Walter in Waters' band.

It was with Waters that Wells cut his first solo hit, "Hoodoo Man." Wells's other best-known hit was "Messin' With the Kid," later covered by Rory Gallagher. In 1966 Wells first teamed up with guitarist Buddy Guy, a long-running touring and recording partnership. The pair's 1972 album together, Play the Blues, featured guest appearances by Eric Clapton, Dr. John, and the J. Geils Band. In the '70s Guy and Wells opened tour dates for the Rolling Stones. In later years, Wells toured with a large band. He appeared with Van Morrison on six dates of his 1993 U.S. tour. Wells died of lymphatic cancer in 1998. Prior to his passing, he had collaborated with Tracy Chapman and taped a cameo in the film Blues Brothers 2000.

Mary Wells

Born Mary Esther Wells, May 13, 1943, Detroit, MI; died July 26, 1992, Los Angeles, CA

1961—Bye Bye Baby (Motown) 1962—The One Who Really Loves You 1963—Two Lovers and Other Great Hits; Recorded Live On Stage 1964—Mary Wells' Greatest Hits; Together (with Marvin Gaye); My Guy 1965—Mary Wells Sings Love Songs to the Beatles (20th Century-Fox) 1966—The Two Sides of Mary Wells (Atco) 1981—In and Out of Love (Epic) 1990—Keeping My Mind on Love (Motorcity, U.K.); Mary Wells (Quality) 1995—You Beat Me to the Punch (Motown).

Mary Wells was Motown's first big star. At age 16, she met Berry Gordy Jr.'s assistant, Robert Bateman. She had written a song she wanted Jackie Wilson to record and had Bateman introduce her to Gordy, who had been writing material for Wilson. Unable to write her song down, she sang the tune for Gordy. He signed her, and Motown released that song as her debut single, "Bye Bye Baby" (#45 pop, #8 R&B, 1960).

She teamed up with performer/writer/producer Smokey Robinson in 1962, scoring a string of hits including "The One Who Really Loves You" (#8 pop, #2 R&B), "You Beat Me to the Punch" (#9 pop, #1 R&B), and "Two Lovers" (#7 pop, #1 R&B) in 1962; "Laughing Boy" (#15 pop, #6 R&B), "Your Old Stand By" (#40 pop, #3 R&B), and "What's Easy for Two Is So Hard for One" b/w "You Lost the Sweetest Boy" (#22 pop, #8 R&B) in 1963. In 1964 came her biggest Motown hit, "My Guy" (#1 pop). Like her other collaborations with Robinson, it featured Wells' smooth, knowing but coy delivery backed by the producer's understated poppish arrangement. Next came two duets with Marvin Gaye, "What's the Matter With You Baby" (#17 pop) and "Once Upon a Time" (#19 pop). Indisputably the first "first lady of Motown," Wells was the first female singer there to adopt a glamorous stage persona. In 1964, at their request, she opened for the Beatles.

But shortly thereafter Wells made a different kind of Motown history, becoming the first of Gordy's successful artists to sue the label. In the wake of her hits, Wells, encouraged by her husband, songwriter Herman Griffin, sued Motown and won, arguing that the recording contract she signed at age 17 was invalid. Her departure came at the height of her success and was an embarrassment to Gordy, who scrambled to discourage other labels from signing her. In an interesting press release to the music-trade magazines, Motown not only warned that Wells was still under contract to it but bravely predicted that the Supremes would have a #1 single with their forthcoming "Where Did Our Love Go." The rest is history.

Initially, Wells' future looked promising. She received a large contract with 20th Century-Fox, along with promises that she would also be making films, but her releases there went nowhere, and she never appeared in a film. She next signed with Atco in late 1965, where she had the 1966 hit "Dear Lover" (#51 pop, #6 R&B), but none of her subsequent releases was as successful as her Motown recordings. "Dig the Way I Feel" (#35 R&B) on Jubilee in 1969 was a minor hit. She retired from performing and in 1967 married Cecil Womack, with whom she had three children. They divorced in 1977, and Wells began a relationship with Cecil's brother, Curtis Womack, with whom she had another child. She began performing again in the '80s, as renewed interest in Motown created a demand.

In 1987 Wells became one of several ex-Motown artists to begin recording with Ian Levine. She had just finished an album for U.K. release, Keeping My Mind on Love, when she discovered she had cancer of the larynx in 1990. A two-pack-a-day smoker, Wells was financially devastated by her illness; she had no health insurance. Many of her friends, including Mary Wilson and Martha Reeves, rallied around her, and several artists, including Rod Stewart, Bruce Springsteen, and Diana Ross, provided financial assistance. One of Wells' last tours found her sharing the bill with ex-Temptations David Ruffin and Eddie Kendricks, who died within 14 months and 3 months of her, respectively.

Wendy and Lisa

Formed 1986, Los Angeles, CA

Wendy Melvoin (b. ca. 1964, Los Angeles), gtr., voc.; Lisa Coleman (b. ca. 1960, Los Angeles), kybds.

1987—Wendy and Lisa (Columbia) 1989—Fruit at the Bottom 1990—Eroica (Virgin) 1991—Re-Mix-in-a-Carnation. Girl Bros.: 1998—Girl Bros. (Girl Brothers).

Former Prince band mates Wendy and Lisa found a small measure of success on their own with a progressive fusion of pop musical styles. Melvoin and Coleman have known each other since early childhood in L.A., where their fathers were session musicians. Melvoin grew up on jazz; Coleman studied classical piano. Coleman began working with Prince in 1979, first touring with him on the Dirty Mind tour. From 1984 to 1986 she and Melvoin played in his band the Revolution, where they arranged songs and string sections. In the film Purple Rain, their characters challenged Prince's autocracy.

When Prince broke up the band, the women formed their own group. They played almost all the instruments on Wendy and Lisa (#88, 1987) and wrote the songs with coproducer Bobby Z., the Revolution's former drummer. In 1988 they played on Joni Mitchell's Chalk Mark in a Rainstorm. On Fruit at the Bottom (#119, 1989), the duo added more instrumentalists, including Wendy's twin sister, Susannah (who had fronted the Paisley Park band Family). By Eroica, the band was largely a family affair, including Wendy's brother Jonathan on percussion and Coleman's brother David on cello and sister Cole singing. Eroica also featured guest vocals by k.d. lang and a song by Michael Penn. The album showed that Wendy and Lisa had musically broken free of Prince; labelwise, they had also liberated themselves from Columbia's expectations of sexy pop hits. Eroica, though widely praised by critics for its fusion of funk, rock, jazz, dance, and pop, failed to chart.

Melvin and Coleman spent much of the '90s composing film scores for movies, including Dangerous Minds and Soul Food. Individually or as a duo they also played with Seal, Sheryl Crow, and Meshell Ndegeocello. In 1998 they released a self-titled album on the Internet under the name Girl Bros. A probing semi-acoustic affair, the record includes several songs that examine the death of Melvin's brother Jonathan, a keyboard player who died of an overdose while out touring as a sideman with Smashing Pumpkins [see entry].

Wham!

Formed 1982, London, Eng.

George Michael (b. Georgios Kyriacos Panayiotou, June 25, 1963, London), voc.; Andrew Ridgeley (b. Jan. 26, 1963, Windlesham, Eng.), gtr.

1983—Fantastic (Innervision, U.K.) 1984—Make It Big (Columbia) 1986—Music From the Edge of Heaven 1997—The Best of Wham!: If You Were There (Epic, U.K.).

Andrew Ridgeley solo: 1990—Son of Albert (Epic).

George Michael solo: see entry.

Dismissed as a contrived teenybopper act during its mid-'80s reign on the pop chart, the duo Wham! is remembered for its cotton-candy singles, and as singer/songwriter George Michael's [see entry] vehicle to fame. Michael met Wham!'s other half, Andrew Ridgeley, when they were schoolmates in Bushey, a London suburb. In 1979 the two began playing together in a ska-based band, the Executive. When that group dissolved, they wrote songs, made demos, and landed a deal with Innervision Records, a fledgling British label. Wham!'s debut album, Fantastic, entered the U.K. chart at #1. Innervision kept most of the royalties, though, and after some legal hassles, the duo switched to Epic.

Their first Epic single, 1984's "Wake Me Up Before You Go," premiered at #1 in England, later that year, buoyed by a bouncy video featuring Michael and Ridgeley cavorting in sportswear; it topped the American charts. The ballad "Careless Whisper" also reached #1 in both countries, as did Wham!'s second album, Make It Big. The hits "Everything She Wants" (#1), "Freedom" (#3), and "I'm Your Man" (#3) followed in 1985. Meanwhile, critics speculated that Michael, as Wham!'s principal writer and producer, was destined to pursue a career independent of Ridgeley, whose car racing and girl chasing were more conspicuous than his musical contributions. When Wham! did split, in 1986—the year of its third album, Music From the Edge of Heaven (#10)—they went out, fittingly, with a bang: a sold-out farewell concert before 72,000 fans at London's Wembley Stadium.

Ridgeley has found little post-Wham! musical success. His 1990 solo album, Son of Albert (#130, 1990) bombed in the U.S. and the U.K., producing only one minor U.K. hit, "Shake" (#58 U.K., 1990). After failed turns as an auto racer and a restaurateur, Ridgeley, seemingly content to live on Wham! royalties, put his playboy ways behind him and settled down in an English farmhouse with Bananarama [see entry] singer Keren Woodward and her son, took up surfing, and became an environmental activist for the British lobbying group Surfers Against Sewage.

Whiskeytown

Formed 1994, Raleigh, NC

Ryan Adams (b. Nov. 5, 1974, Jacksonville, NC), voc., gtr., kybds.; Caitlin Cary (b. Oct. 28, 1968, Cleveland, OH), violin, voc.; Phil Wandscher, gtr., voc.; Eric "Skillet" Gilmore, drums; Steve Grothman, bass.

1995—Angels EP (Mood Food) 1996—Faithless Street 1997—Rural Free Delivery (– Gilmore; – Grothman; + Jeff Rice, bass; + Steve Terry, drums) Stranger's Almanac (Outpost) 1998—(– Terry; – Wandscher; – Rice; – Grothman; + Gilmore; + Mike Daly [b. Jan. 28, 1972, Roselle Park, NJ], kybds., gtr.; + Brad Rice [b. Aug. 11, 1961, Evansville, IN], gtr., voc.; + Mike Santoro [b. Apr. 8, 1964, Patterson, NJ], bass, voc.; – Santoro; + Ed Crawford, gtr.) 2001—Pneumonia (Lost Highway/Mercury).

Ryan Adams solo: 2000—Heartbreaker (Bloodshot).

Of all the alt-country bands that emerged in the mid-'90s in the wake of Uncle Tupelo and its splinter groups Wilco and Son Volt, few garnered as much critical praise and cultish fan loyalty as Raleigh, North Carolina's Whiskeytown. Most of the attention drawn to the group was centered on frontman and main songwriter Ryan Adams, who began listening to Gram Parsons and more traditional country artists like George Jones shortly after the breakup of his teenage punk band, Patty Duke Syndrome. In 1994, when Adams was 20, he cofounded Whiskeytown with singer/guitarist Phil Wandscher, fiddler/singer Caitlin Cary, drummer Skillet Gilmore, and bassist Steve Grothman. After releasing the Angels EP and the album Faithless Street for local indie label Mood Food, the band signed to the Geffen imprint Outpost and in 1997 released Stranger's Almanac, which yielded the single "Yesterday's News," the band's entrée onto American radio. The mini-album Rural Free Delivery was released the same year by their previous label, while Outpost reissued an expanded version of Faithless Street in 1998.

Whiskeytown's lineup was notoriously mercurial, but Adams' voice and songs—both frequently compared to Gram Parsons and Paul Westerberg—kept the group on the Americana radar and netted them invites onto such releases as The End of Violence and Hope Floats soundtracks and the 1999 Parsons tribute album, Return of the Grievous Angel. In 2000, after the group was dropped by Geffen following the label's absorption into Universal, Chicago's independent Bloodshot Records released Adams' first solo album, the mostly well-received Heartbreaker. Adams began publicly alluding to Whiskeytown's demise, and not long after Heartbreaker's release, he was signed as a solo artist by a new Mercury Records Americana imprint, Lost Highway. In 2001 it issued a final, previously unreleased Whiskeytown album, Pneumonia.

The Whispers

Formed 1962, Los Angeles, CA

Walter Scott (b. Sep. 3, 1943, Fort Worth, TX), voc.; Wallace Scott (b. Sep. 3, 1943, Fort Worth), voc.; Nicholas Caldwell (b. Apr. 5, 1944, Loma Linda, CA); Marcus Hutson (b. Jan. 8, 1943, Los Angeles); Gordy Harmon, voc.
 1972—The Whispers' Love Story (Janus) 1974—(– Harmon; + Leaveil Degree (b. July 31, 1948, New Orleans, LA), voc.)
 1976—One for the Money (Soul Train) 1977—Open Up for Love 1978—Headlights (Solar) 1979—Whisper in Your Ear; Happy Holidays to You 1980—The Whispers; Imagination 1981—This Kind of Lovin' 1982—The Best of the Whispers; Love Is Where You Find It 1983—Love for Love 1984—So Good 1987—Just Gets Better With Time 1990—In the Mood (Solar/Epic); More of the Night (Capitol) 1991—Somebody Loves You (Intermedia) 1994—Christmas Moments (Capitol) (– Hutson) 1995—Toast to the Ladies 1997—Songbook vol. 1: The Songs of Babyface (Interscope); Greatest Hits (The Right Stuff).

In 1980, after years of minor hits, the Whispers became one of black music's most popular vocal groups, and in 1987, 25 years since they started, the group had its biggest pop hit of all time, "Rock Steady," which was written and produced by L. A. Reid and Babyface.

Twin brothers Walter and Wallace Scott formed the group in L. A. with Nicholas Caldwell, Marcus Hutson, and Gordy Harmon. They cut a few singles in the mid-'60s on the Dore label before they met producer Ron Carson. Carson produced Whispers singles for Canyon/Soul Clock Records, including "Planets of Life," which became a staple of their live show, and their first chart singles, "The Time Will Come" (#17 R&B, 1969) and "Seems Like I Gotta Do Wrong" (#50 pop, #6 R&B, 1970). When Canyon folded, they recorded for Janus, for which they continued with a steady stream of moderate R&B Top 30 hits, including "Your Love Is So Doggone Good" (#19 R&B, 1971) and "I Only Meant to Wet My Feet" (#27 R&B, 1972).

In 1974 they went to Philadelphia to work with producer/guitarist Norman Harris and the MFSB rhythm section. "Bingo" and "A Mother for My Children" did well. By then, Leaveil Degree had replaced Harmon. In the mid-'70s, the band signed with Dick Griffey's Soul Train (later renamed Solar) label and began to climb in popularity, with more R&B hits: "One for the Money (Part I)" (#10 R&B, 1976) and a cover of Bread's "Make It With You" (#10 R&B, 1977). "(Olivia) Lost and Turned Out," a song about prostitution, hit #13 on the R&B chart in the summer of 1978. They followed with "And the Beat Goes On" (#19 pop, #1 R&B, 1980) and "Lady" (#28 pop, #3 R&B, 1980), from 1980's The Whispers, "It's a Love Thing" (#28 pop, #2 R&B) in 1981, and "Tonight" (#4 R&B) in 1983.

"Rock Steady" (#7 pop, #1 R&B, 1987) pushed Just Gets Better With Time to platinum. Their 1980 album The Whispers is also platinum, Imagination, Love Is Where You Find It, and More of the Night (#8 R&B, 1990) are all gold. Among the Whispers' later hits are "My Heart, Your Heart" (#4 R&B, 1990), "Innocent" (#3 R&B, 1990), and "Is It Good to You" (#7 R&B, 1991). The Scott brothers released a duo album in 1993. The Whispers' mid-'90s singles and albums placed fairly low on the R&B charts until 1997's Songbook vol. 1, a record of material by producer Babyface, catapulted the group back to #27 in 1998; the single "My, My, My" hit #1 R&B

With his deep, husky voice, lush musical arrangements, and often love-themed songs, singer/songwriter/producer Barry White became a '70s sex symbol (despite his chubby physique). He was also a pioneering producer in disco, who often used large orchestras on his records.

An eight-year-old White made his singing debut in a Galveston church choir. Two years later he was the church organist and part-time choir director. At 16, he joined the Up-fronts, an L. A. R&B band, as a singer/pianist. Two years later he helped arrange "The Harlem Shuffle," a minor hit in 1963 for Bob and Earl.

White developed his writing and production skills. In 1966 he went to work as an A&R man for Mustang Records, where he discovered a female vocal trio called Love Unlimited (Diana Taylor, Linda and Glodean James). He produced their gold single, 1972's "Walking in the Rain With the One I Love" (#14 pop, #6 R&B) for Uni Records. In 1973 White signed with 20th Century-Fox Records and made his national recording debut with "I'm Gonna Love You Just a Little More Baby" (#3 pop, #1 R&B), "Never, Never, Gonna Give Ya Up" (#7 pop, #2 R&B), and "I've Got So Much to Give" (#32 pop, #5 R&B). Also that year he started to write for the Love Unlimited Orchestra, with whom he had a string-laden instrumental disco hit, "Love's Theme" (#1 pop, #10 R&B). Love Unlimited's "Under the Influence" was also a big hit. In 1973-74 alone, White wrote, produced, or performed on records whose total sales exceeded over $16 million. Among his gold records are Rhapsody in White by the Love Unlimited Orchestra (#8 pop), Can't Get Enough (#1 pop), "Can't Get Enough of Your Love, Baby" (#1 pop and R&B), "You're the First, the Last, My Everything" (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1974), Just Another Way to Say I Love You (#17 pop), and Barry White's Greatest Hits (#23 pop). In 1977 Barry White Sings for Someone You Love (#8 pop) went platinum and "It's Ecstasy When You Lay Down Next to Me" (#4 pop, #1 R&B) went gold. Subsequent R&B hit singles including "Playing Your Game, Baby" (#8 R&B, 1978) and "Your Sweetness Is My Weakness" (#2 R&B, 1978).

By the late '70s, White's appeal was fading, though he scored minor hits with a cover of Billy Joel's "Just the Way You Are" (#44 R&B, 1979) and with the title track from 1982's Change. With wife Glodean, White released an album and two minor R&B chart singles, "Didn't We Make It Happen, Baby" (#78 R&B, 1981) and "I Want You" (#79 R&B, 1981). In the late '80s his career experienced something of a resurgence, with "Sho' You Right" (#17 R&B, 1987) and "For Your Love (I'll Do Most Anything)" (#27 R&B, 1987), followed by "The Secret Garden (Sweet Seduction Suite)" (#31 pop, #1 R&B, 1990) from Quincy Jones' Back on the Block, "I Wanna Do It Good to You" (#26 R&B, 1990), "When Will I See You Again" (#32 R&B, 1990), and "Put Me in Your Mix" (#2 R&B, 1991). He also appears on Big Daddy Kane's 1991 R&B hit "All of Me." In late 1994 he returned to the top of the R&B chart with "Practice What You Preach" (#18 pop, #1 R&B) from the platinum The Icon Is Love (#20 pop, #1 R&B). "Come On" (#87 pop, #12 R&B) followed in 1995. In 1996 White sang on R&B hits by Quincy Jones and Tina Turner. The aptly titled Staying Power (#43 pop, #13 R&B) won two R&B Grammys and proved that he hadn't lost his potency in 1999. That same year he published an autobiography, Love Unlimited. By mid-2000 he was appearing regularly on the hit television show Ally McBeal.

Born Booker T. Washington White, Nov. 12, 1906, Houston, MS; died Feb. 26, 1977, Memphis, TN
1963—Bukka White (Sonet) 1964—Bukka White (Columbia)

1966—Memphis Hot Shots (Blue Horizon) 1969—Mississippi Blues (Takoma) 1970—Big Daddy (Biograph) 1975—Sky Songs, vols. 1 and 2 (Arhoolie) 1976—Legacy of the Blues: Bukka White (GNP/Crescendo) 1994—The Complete Bukka White (Columbia/Legacy); 1963 Isn't 1962 (Genes).

A cousin of blues guitarist B.B. King, Bukka White was, after Robert Johnson, one of the most widely heard Delta bluesmen. White's guitar playing (usually on an acoustic guitar) has influenced B.B. King and many others; his singing has influenced Richie Havens, among others.

White learned guitar as a child from his father, and at age 10 began traveling up and down the Mississippi River as a musician. He also worked as a boxer and a baseball player in the Negro leagues. He began recording in Memphis in 1930 for Victor. In 1937 he recorded his first blues hit, the often-covered "Shake 'Em On Down," for Vocalion in Chicago. But before he could record a followup, he was jailed for two years in Mississippi's Parchman Farm Prison for shooting a man. He was recorded by the Library of Congress while in prison. In 1939, pressure from his record company helped win him parole.

Upon his release, White recorded a dozen of his most famous sides for the Okeh label, but he found his rough-hewn country blues were out of style. He labored in obscurity until 1963, when John Fahey heard a recording of his "Aberdeen Mississippi Blues," and with Ed Denson, tracked White down in Aberdeen, and recorded him for his own Takoma label. The 11 songs recorded then were the first Bukka had committed to tape in 24 years.

By then in his late 50s, White enjoyed a career revival and toured the U.S. and Europe, making occasional film and television appearances. He suffered ill health in the mid-'70s and succumbed to cancer.

Karyn White

Born Karyn Lay Vonne White, Oct. 14, 1965, Los Angeles, CA
1988—Karyn White (Warner Bros.) 1991—Ritual of Love
1994—Make Him Do Right.

In the late '80s Karyn White went from being an accomplished backup singer to topping the charts with her own smooth mix of R&B and pop. As a youth growing up in L.A., White sang in her church choir, which her mother directed; her father was a trumpet player. She entered talent shows and beauty pageants as a teen, and quit the cheerleading squad to save her voice. She sold her first song to a record company at age 17. White fronted the L.A. group Legacy for a while, and toured as a backup singer for R&B vocalist O'Bryan. She did studio session work for such artists as Julio Iglesias, the Commodores, Ray Parker Jr., Bobby Brown, Johnny Gill, Patu LaBelle, Gladys Knight, and Sheena Easton, and cowrote songs for Stephanie Mills and Lacey.

In 1986 White had her first hit, singing lead on keyboardist Jeff Lorber's dance hit "Facts of Love" (#27, 1986). The single led to her own deal with Warner Bros. Karyn White (#19, 1988) went multiplatinum, led by the L.A. Reid and Babyface-produced "The Way You Love Me" (#7, 1988), the ballad/anthem "Superwoman" (#8, 1989), and "Secret Rendezvous" (#6, 1989). On Ritual of Love, Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis (White's husband) produced and cowrote most of the songs; White coproduced the album and cowrote 10 of 12 tracks. The album yielded the hits "Romantic" (#1, 1991) and "The Way I Feel About You" (#12, 1991). Make Him Do Right hit #22 on the R&B album chart.

Tony Joe White

Born July 23, 1943, Oak Grove, LA
 1968—Black and White (Monument) 1969—Continued
 1970—Tony Joe 1971—Tony Joe White (Warner Bros.)
 1972—The Train I'm On 1973—Home Made Ice Cream
 1977—Eyes (20th Century-Fox); Tony Joe White 1980—Real Thing (Casablanca) 1983—Dangerous (Columbia) 1993—The Best of Tony Joe White (Warner Bros.) 2000—One Hot July (Hip-O/Mercury).

One of the prime practitioners of the late-'60s country-rock style known as swamp or bayou rock, Tony Joe White was the only one who actually came from the Louisiana bayous and rose to national prominence. White began playing music at age 16 and formed Tony and the Mojos. His next band, Tony and the Twilights, went to Texas, where White remained as a solo singer/songwriter after the group disbanded. He then moved to Nashville, made the rounds of music publishers, and eventually hooked up with Billy Swan, who produced White's first three albums.

White's first two singles, "Georgia Pines" and "Watching the Trains Go By," went unnoticed. "Soul Francisco" was a big European hit in 1967, and White continued to be a major recording and performing star in Europe for the next five years (in 1972 he toured Europe with Creedence Clearwater Revival). In 1969 he hit the Top 10 with the single "Polk Salad Annie," which showcased White's deep, gruff voice and the stylized guitar technique White called "whomper stomper."

Despite frequent TV appearances, it was White's last hit in the U.S. However, several White songs were hits for other artists. Elvis Presley covered "Polk Salad Annie" (as did Tom Jones) and "I've Got a Thing About You Baby" (in 1969 Dusty Springfield had a minor hit with White's "Willie and Laura Mae Jones"); and a year later Brook Benton made it to the Top 5 with "A Rainy Night in Georgia." Subsequent hits included Tanya Tucker's "Steamy Windows," and he has also done commercial work for McDonald's and Levi's. Two of his early-'90s albums, Closer to the Truth and Path of a Decent Groove, were successful in Europe, New Zealand, and Australia. They were not released domestically. He returned with a U.S. release in 2000 that projected a soulful sensuality and showcased White's superb guitar playing.

June 6, 1960, Carle Place, NY], gr.) 1989—Slip of the Tongue 1994—Greatest Hits.

It wasn't just rock critics who denied Whitesnake as a Led Zeppelin rip-off—Led Zep frontman Robert Plant himself once dismissed Whitesnake vocalist and driving force David Coverdale as "David Cover version." With his long blond hair, aristocratic English accent, and relentless sexual double-entendres, Coverdale struck many detractors as the real-life model for David St. Hubbins of mock-metal parody Spinal Tap. Coverdale often had the last laugh, however, scoring pop and metal hits and, eventually, even recording with Plant's erstwhile Led Zep cohort, guitarist Jimmy Page.

Coverdale had been with Deep Purple from 1973 to 1976 [see entry], then recorded two solo albums, Whitesnake and Northwinds; the former provided a band name when Coverdale formed his own group, recruiting members from Deep Purple, and lesser-known U.K. hard-rock outfits such as Juicy Lucy, Babe Ruth, and Gillan. The band released two Britain-only albums before making its U.S. debut with Ready an' Willing (#90, 1980) which yielded a minor hit single in "Fool for Your Loving" (#53, 1980). A steady stream of personnel changes, but no hit singles, followed for the next few years, until the band was signed to the U.S. major label Geffen; despite the lack of a hit, Slide It In sold well (#40, 1984) and eventually went double platinum. The arrival of former Thin Lizzy guitarist John Sykes for that album proved crucial, as he helped to write the songs that would put Whitesnake over the top on its next album.

Whitesnake (#2, 1987), which would sell over 8 million copies, featured a chart-topping single in the pop-metal "Here I Go Again," and a #2 single in the power ballad "Is This Love"; the very Zeppelinesque "Still of the Night" was a minor hit (#79, 1987). The band's fortunes were boosted by heavy MTV play of its music videos, which featured Coverdale's buxom girlfriend, B-movie actress Tawny Ki-taen, whom he married in 1989. Augmented by the arrival of new guitarist Steve Vai (Frank Zappa, David Lee Roth), Slip of the Tongue (#10, 1989) was not as huge as its predecessor, but still successful; hit singles included an updated "Fool for Your Loving" (#37, 1989) and "The Deeper the Love" (#28, 1990). Three years later Coverdale had broken up with Kitaen and hooked up with Page (who had reportedly tried and failed to secure Plant) to record Coverdale-Page [see Jimmy Page entry]. After releasing Greatest Hits, Coverdale reformed Whitesnake with Adrian Vandenburg, Rudy Sarzo, Denny Carmassi (drummer for Heart), and Warren De Martini (ex-Ratt guitarist) for a tour in Europe. The group disbanded following a 1997 British farewell tour.

White Zombie/Rob Zombie

Formed 1985, New York, NY

Rob Zombie (b. Rob Cummings, a.k.a. Rob Straker, Jan. 12, 1966, Haverhill, MA), voc.; Sean Yseult (b. 1966), bass; Ena Kostabi, gtr.; Peter Landau, drums.

Rob Zombie solo: 1998—Hellbilly Deluxe (Geffen) 1999—American Made Music to Strip By (Interscope).

Fusing hardcore, heavy metal, and outsized theatrics, White Zombie celebrated trash culture, incorporating such elements as B-movie humor and true-crime gore. Along the lines of Alice Cooper, GWAR, the Cramps, and Marilyn Manson, they were as much a concept as a band. The group dissolved in late 1998, but frontman Rob Zombie has continued along the same path as a solo artist and horror filmmaker.

Moving to New York City after high school, Rob Cummings met Sean Yseult at art school in 1985. Soon living together, they formed White Zombie, taking the name from a 1932 Bela Lugosi horror film. Their self-produced EP gained them cult fame, as did their album Soul-Crusher, and in 1989 Bill Laswell produced Make Them Die Slowly.

White Zombie's major-label debut arrived amid personnel changes and notoriety. Televangelists attacked the band's gleefully "satanic" lyrics. Zombie courted controversy by asking convicted mass murderer Charles Manson for permission to use a sample of his voice (he declined, as did horror actor Vincent Price when presented with a similar request). When MTV cartoon characters Beavis and Butt-head praised La Sexorcisto (#26, 1993), the album entered the Top 30. The album's "Thunder Kiss '65" was nominated for a Best Hard Rock Performance Grammy, as was "More Human Than Human" from Astro-Creep: 2000 (#6, 1995). Supersexy Swingin' Sounds (#17, 1996) was a collection of Astro-Creep remixes featuring contributions by the Dust Brothers and P.M. Dawn.

Zombie released his solo debut, Hellbilly Deluxe (#5) in 1998, dissolving White Zombie a couple of weeks after the album's release. That same year, he founded his Zombie A Go-Go record label. Hellbilly spawned its own remix followup American Made Music to Strip By in 1999, in between the breakup of White Zombie and the launch of his solo career. Zombie was commissioned to write and direct The Crow III. He abandoned the project after two years of rewrites, but in 1999 he designed his own haunted Halloween maze at Universal Studios. Rob Zombie's American Nightmare. A year later he began shooting his directorial debut, House of 1000 Corpses, released in 2001.

In the annals of rock history the Who (like their contemporaries the Rolling Stones and the Beatles) stand alone. Though technically they were Mods and musically self-proclaimed "Maximum R&B," the Who were also the godfathers of punk, the pioneers of the rock opera, and among the first rock groups to integrate (rather than merely fiddle with) synthesizers. The smashed guitars and overturned (or blown up) drum kits they left in their wake fittingly symbolized the violent passions of a band whose distinctive sound was born of the couplings and collisions among Pete Townshend's alternately raging or majestic guitar playing, Keith Moon's nearly anarchic drumming style, John Entwistle's facile, thundering bass lines, and Daltrey's impassioned vocals. The Who would prove a strong influence on such late-'70s groups as the Jam. Ever since guitarist and main songwriter Pete Townshend declared in "My Generation," "Hope I die before I get old," he has been embraced as a spokesman, a role he assumed (he claims) reluctantly. Nonetheless, for the rest of his career with the Who Townshend explored rock's philosophical topography, from the raw rebelliousness of "My Generation" and adolescent angst of "I Can't Explain" to such ambitious, emotionally rich, and beautiful songs as "Love Reign O'er Me."

All four band members grew up around London—Townshend, Daltrey, and Entwistle in the working-class Shepherd's Bush area. Townshend's parents were professional entertainers. He and Entwistle knew each other at school in the late '50s and played in a Dixieland band when they were in their early teens, with Townshend on banjo and Entwistle on trumpet. They played together in a rock band, but Entwistle left in 1962 to join the Detours. That band included Roger Daltrey, a sheet-metal worker. When the Detours needed to replace a rhythm guitarist, Entwistle suggested Townshend, and Daltrey switched from lead guitar to vocals when the original singer, Colin Dawson, left in 1963. Not long after that, drummer Doug Sandom was replaced by Moon, who was then playing in a surf band called the Beachcombers. By early 1964 the group had changed its name to the Who, and not long after, the excitement inspired by Townshend's bashing his guitar out of frustration during a show ensured it would become a part of the act.

Shortly thereafter, the group came under the wing of manager Pete Meaden, who renamed them the High Numbers and gave them a better-dressed Mod image. The High Numbers released an unsuccessful single, "I'm the Face" b/w "Zoot Suit" (both written by Meaden), then got new managers, former small-time film directors Kit Lambert and Chris Stamp. By late 1964 the quartet became the Who again, and with Lambert and Stamp's encouragement they became an even more Mod band, with violent stage shows and a repertoire including blues, James Brown, and Motown covers, solely because their Mod audiences loved that music. In fact, despite the billing, the Who's original songs were anything but classic R&B. The group's demo of "I Can't Explain," with sessionman Jimmy Page adding guitar, brought them to producer Shel Talmy (who had also worked with the Kinks) and got them a record deal. When "I Can't Explain" came out in January 1965, it was ignored until the band appeared on the TV show Ready, Steady, Go. Townshend smashed his guitar, Moon overturned his drums, and the song eventually reached #8 in Britain. "Anyway, Anyhow, Anywhere" also reached the British Top 10, followed in November 1965 by "My Generation." It went to #2 in the U.K. but reached only #75 in the U.S. But the Who were already stars in Britain, having established their sound and their personae. Townshend played guitar with full-circle windmilling motions, Daltrey strutted like a bantam fighter, Entwistle (whose occasional songwriting effort revealed a macabre sense of humor) just stood there seemingly unmoved as Moon happily flailed all over his drum kit.

The Who: Roger Daltrey, Pete Townshend, John Entwistle, Keith Moon

After the Who's fourth hit single, "Substitute" (#5 U.K.), Lambert replaced Talmy as producer. Their second album, A Quick One (Happy Jack in the U.S., #67, 1967), included a 10-minute mini-opera as the title track, shortly before the Beatles' concept album Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band. The Who also began to make inroads in the U.S. with "Happy Jack" (#24, 1967) and a tour that included the performance filmed at the Monterey Pop Festival in June.

The Who Sell Out (#48, 1967) featured mock-advertisement songs and genuine jingles from offshore British pirate radio stations; it also contained another mini-opera, "Rael," and a Top 10 hit in England and the U.S., "I Can See for Miles." In October 1968 the band released Magic Bus (#39, 1968), a compilation of singles and B sides, while Townshend worked on his 90-minute opus, Tommy. The story of a deaf, dumb, and blind boy turned pinball champion/pop idol turned autocratic messianic guru was vanously considered both pretentious and profound. Most important, however, Tommy was the first successful rock opera. The album hit #4 in the U.S., and its first single, "Pinball Wizard," went to #19. The band would perform Tommy a handful of times in its entirety—at London's Coliseum in 1969, at New York City's Metropolitan Opera House on June 6 and 7, 1970, and on some dates during its 1989 reunion tour. Excerpts, including "See Me, Feel Me," "Pinball Wizard," and the instrumental "Underture," were thereafter part of the live show. Troupes mounted productions of it around the world (the Who's performances had been concert versions), and Townshend oversaw a new recording of it in 1972, backed by the London Symphony and featuring Rod Stewart, Steve Winwood, Sandy Denny, Richard Burton, and others. In 1975 Ken Russell directed the controversial high-pop film version, which included Eric Clapton ("Eyesight to the Blind"), Tina Turner ("Acid Queen"), and Elton John ("Pinball Wizard"), as well as Ann-Margret, Oliver Reed, and Jack Nicholson. Moon (as the lecherous Uncle Ernie) and Daltrey (in the lead title role) also appeared in the film.

Bits of Tommy turned up on Live at Leeds (#4, 1970), a juggernaut live set, which was followed by Who's Next (#4, 1971), a staple of FM rock radio. It included Townshend's first experiments with synthesizers—"Baba O'Riley," "Bargain," "Won't Get Fooled Again"—three songs that Townshend originally conceived as part of another rock opera entitled Lifeforce. Meaty, Beaty, Big and Bouncy (#11, 1971) was followed two years later by the Who's second double-album rock opera, Quadrophenia (#2, 1973), a tribute to the tortured inner life of the Mods. It too was a hit and became a movie directed by Franc Roddam in 1979, with Sting of the Police in the wordless role of the bellboy.

While the Who were hugely popular, Quadrophenia signaled that Townshend was now a generation older than the fans he had initially spoken for. As he agonized over his role as an elder statesman of rock—as he would do for years to come—the Who released Odds and Sods (#15, 1974), a compilation of the previous decade's outtakes. The Who by Numbers (#8, 1975) was the result of Townshend's self-appraisal ("However Much I Booze"); it lacked the Who's usual vigor, but yielded a hit single in "Squeeze Box" (#16, 1975). The band could dependably pack arenas wherever it went, but it took some time off the road after By Numbers.

The group members—whose personality clashes are almost as legendary as their music—began pursuing more individual projects. Moon released a novelty solo disc, Two Sides of the Moon, which featured such guest artists as Ringo Starr, Harry Nilsson, Dick Dale, Joe Walsh, and Flo and Eddie, and Entwistle recorded solo LPs with bands called Ox (with whom he toured in 1975) and Rigor Mortis, and produced four tracks on the debut album by the Fabulous Poodles. Daltrey also recorded solo. His first two efforts are widely considered mediocre, although Daltrey boasted the oft-played "Hard Life/Giving It All Away," which, like the rest of the album, was composed by Adam Faith and a then unknown named Leo Sayer. While Daltrey's albums did decently, he had only one Top 40 single here, "Without Your Love," from the McVicar soundtrack. The Townshend-penned "After the Fire" received substantial video exposure when released in 1985. Daltrey found considerably more success as an actor. Besides Tommy, he has starred in Ken Russell's over-the-top "biography" of composer Franz Liszt, Lisztomania (1975) and McVicar (1980), the true story of the famous British criminal John McVicar. In the mid-'80s he played the double role of the Dromio twins in a PBS production of Shakespeare's A Comedy of Errors. In recent years, he has also appeared on the London stage (The Beggar's Opera, 1991) and on British television (The Little Match Girl, 1990). In 1999 he played Scrooge in a stage version of Charles Dickens' A Christmas Carol in New York City.

In 1970 Townshend contributed four tracks to Happy Birthday, a privately released, limited-edition album recorded as a tribute to Townshend's guru, Meher Baba. The following year, I Am, a similar limited-edition Baba tribute album, was released. It contained another Townshend track, a nine-minute instrumental version of "Baba O'Riley." As both these records were heavily bootlegged, Townshend's response was to create an "official" version of both albums. The result, Who Came First (#69, 1972), was Townshend's first "real" solo album. It included the tracks from Happy Birthday and I Am, plus new songs, and demos of the Who tracks "Pure and Easy" and "Let's See Action." His second solo release was a collaboration with ex-Faces Ronnie Lane, Rough Mix (#45, 1977), which featured a number of FM/AOR radio staples: "Street in the City," "My Baby Gives It Away," and "A Heart to Hang On To."

Meanwhile, punk was burgeoning in Britain, and the Sex Pistols among others were brandishing the Who's old power chords and attitude. Townshend's continuing identity crisis showed up in the title of Who Are You (#2, 1978), but the title song became a hit single (#14) that fall, and the album went double platinum. It was the last and highest-charting album by the original band.

The next few years brought tragedy and turmoil, and in a sense, the end of the Who in the death of Keith Moon. Moon always reveled in his reputation as the madman of rock, and his outrageous stunts—onstage and off—were legend. His prodigious drinking and drug abuse (he was once paralyzed for days after accidentally ingesting an elephant tranquilizer) had begun to diminish his playing ability. In 1975 he left England for L.A., where he continued to drink heavily. He returned to England and was trying to kick his alcoholism, but on September 7, 1978, Moon died of an overdose of a sedative, Heminevin, that had been prescribed to prevent seizures induced by alcohol withdrawal. Although the group continued for another three years, each of the three surviving original members has stated repeatedly that the Who was never the same again.

In 1979 the Who oversaw a concert documentary of their early years, The Kids Are Alright (soundtrack, #8, 1979), and worked on the soundtrack version of Quadrophenia (#46, 1979), which also included a number of Mod favorites performed by the original artists (such as Booker T. and the MG's' "Green Onions" and James Brown's "Night Train"). Kenney Jones, formerly of the Small Faces, replaced Moon, and session keyboardist John "Rabbit" Bundrick began working with the Who. The new lineup toured, but tragedy struck again when 11 concertgoers were killed—trampled to death or asphyxiated—in a rush for "festival seating" spots at Cincinnati's Riverfront Coliseum on December 3, 1979. The incident occurred before the show, and the group wasn't told of it until afterward.

After 15 years with Decca/MCA, the Who signed a band contract with Warner Bros., and Townshend got a solo deal with Atco. His Empty Glass (#5, 1980) included the U.S. Top 10 hit "Let My Love Open the Door" and "Rough Boys," a song long believed to have been an angry reply to a punk musician who had insulted the Who during an interview. Much later, in a 1989 interview with writer Timothy White, Townshend denied that was the case, saying, "It's about homosexuality," and adding that "And I Moved" was as well. Townshend's admission of having "had a gay life," and the statement "I know how it feels to be a woman because I am a woman," came as a surprise to many, including his band mates.

In 1981 Townshend performed solo with an acoustic guitar at a benefit for Amnesty International, which was recorded as The Secret Policeman's Ball. His falling asleep onstage was the first public sign of his deepening drug addiction. Since the year before, Townshend had been abusing alcohol, cocaine, and freebase cocaine mixed with heroin. He subsequently developed an addiction to Ativan, a tranquilizer he was prescribed during treatment for alcoholism. Ativan combined with freebase and heroin resulted in a highly publicized, near-fatal overdose during which he was rushed to the hospital from a London club. Townshend subsequently underwent electro-acupuncture treatment and cleaned up in 1982.

Amid all this, the revamped Who soldiered on. Face Dances (#4, 1981) included the hit single "You Better You Bet" (#18, 1981) and "Don't Let Go the Coat." But Townshend later called the new lineup's debut album a disappointment. One month after Face Dances came out, the Who's former producer/manager, Kit Lambert, died after falling down a flight of stairs; he was 45. (Pete Meadon had died three weeks before Moon, in 1978.) Townshend released the wordy All the Best Cowboys Have Chinese Eyes (#26, 1982), and soon followed it with the group's It's Hard (#8, 1982), an album Daltrey has since been quoted as saying should never have been released. It produced the group's last Top 30 hit to date, "Athena" (#28). The Who then embarked on what they announced would be their last tour, ending with a concert in Toronto on December 17, 1982. Although the group officially broke up in 1982, the quartet reunited to perform several times since, appearing at Live Aid in 1985 and at a U.K. music-awards program in 1988. They celebrated the group's silver anniversary in 1989 with a 43-date U.S. tour which included guest-star-studded performances of Tommy in L.A. and New York, and later in London. For this tour Jones was replaced by session drummer Simon Phillips. It was also during this tour that Townshend, whose hearing was extremely damaged from years of listening to loud music through headphones, had to play standing behind a plastic baffle to block the onstage noise.

Townshend also released a number of solo projects throughout the '80s: Scoop (#35, 1983) and Another Scoop (#198, 1987) collect demo tapes, home recordings, and sundry tracks of historical interest to fans. White City—A Novel (#26, 1985) is a concept piece, the soundtrack to a long-form video of the same title and includes "Face the Face"; The Iron Man: The Musical by Pete Townshend is the star-studded (Daltrey, Nina Simone, John Lee Hooker) soundtrack to Townshend's rock opera based on a children's story by poet Ted Hughes. Deep End Live!, released with an accompanying live video, barely scraped into the Top 100.

Townshend wrote in the liner notes to the 1994 box-set career retrospective Thirty Years of Maximum R&B "I don't like the Who much..." Through the years his dense attitude toward the group has rung false at worst, disingenuous at best. In fact, Townshend's pride (and joy) in performing with the Who was abundantly clear during the band's 2000 tour, when he introduced it—happily—as "the fucking Who."

Despite Townshend's other projects and endeavors, including an editorship with book publisher Faber and Faber and publication of his collected stories, Horse's Neck (1985), the Who legacy endures. In 1993 the Broadway production of Tommy won five Tony Awards, including one for Townshend for Best Original Score. The next year saw the release of Townshend's PsychoDerelect (#118, 1994), a concept album that includes pieces written originally for the Lifehouse project. An examination of rock stardom's ravages, PsychoDerelect was also performed as a theater piece and filmed (it was subsequently broadcast on PBS). That year he also embarked on his first solo tour with a set list that included a number of Who classics, including "Won't Get Fooled Again." In February 1994 Townshend, Daltrey, and Entwistle reunited for two Carnegie Hall concerts in celebration of Daltrey's 50th birthday. Accompanied by a 65-piece orchestra, the trio was also joined by guest stars including Sinéad O'Connor, Eddie Vedder, and Lou Reed, and the show was filmed for cable television.

Two years later, the group recruited drummer Zak Starkey (son of Ringo Starr) along with a 12-piece backing band and embarked on a series of dates in which they performed the Quadrophenia album in its entirety for the first time. Townshend again stuck to rhythm guitar to preserve his hearing (which had been damaged by years of playing amplified lead guitar), leaving lead electric guitar duties to his brother Simon Townshend.

In 1999 Townshend reunited the band again for a charity concert at the House of Blues in Chicago, which led to yet another reunion tour the following year. This time around, however, the Who toured as a quintet—Townshend, Daltrey, Entwistle, Starkey, and John Bundrick on keyboards—with Townshend returning to the electric guitar. The no-nonsense approach resulted in glowing reviews hailing the group's 2000 shows as some of their best in nearly two decades. A live album, The Who Live: The Blues to the Bush/1999, was released online via a partnership with MusicMaker.com, and the band even began talking about the possibility of a new studio set in the future. To cap their year, the Who received a Lifetime Achievement Award at the 43rd annual Grammy Awards.

In the midst of all the Who activity in late 1999 and 2000, Townshend returned yet again to his lifelong Lifeshouse project. The BBC broadcast a Lifeshouse radio play in December 1999, and in February 2000, Townshend performed the rock opera himself at London's Sadler's Wells Theater. Shortly thereafter he released a six-disc box set, Lifeshouse Chronicles, on his own EelPie label via his Web site; a single-disc version, Lifeshouse Elements, was released in stores by Redline Entertainment. Daltrey, meanwhile, continued planning his own pet project, a film biography of the life of Moon.

 Billy Bragg and Wilco: 1998—Mermaid Avenue (Elektra) 2000—Mermaid Avenue vol. II.

The breakup of the influential, Belleville, Illinois, roots-punk combo Uncle Tupelo [see entry] found Jay Farrar and Jeff Tweedy, the band's principal singer/songwriters, fronting new groups of their own. People expected less from Tweedy than they did from Farrar, who had always been regarded as the more serious artist of the two. It wasn't long, however, before Tweedy's new band Wilco outstripped Farrar's Son Volt [see entry], emerging as one of the few old-school guitar outfits of the late '90s that mattered.

After Farrar walked away from Uncle Tupelo in 1994, Tweedy and the remaining members of the band recorded A.M., joined by Bottle Rockets frontman and former Tupelo roadie Brian Henneman on guitar. The album found Wilco playing scruffy, country-tinged rock that suggested a cross between late-period Replacements and "Wild Horses"—era Rolling Stones. Being There (#73, 1996), the band's critically acclaimed followup, saw Tweedy growing leaps and bounds as a songwriter as Wilco moved even further away from the alternative-country of Uncle Tupelo and more in the direction of the tuneful pop-rock of such early '70s bands as Big Star.

Meanwhile, with Tweedy off making a second album with Golden Smog, an alt-country supergroup consisting of members of Soul Asylum and the Jayhawks, the rest of Wilco moonlighted as Courtesy Move. Besides recording several unreleased tracks of their own, the foursome provided backing on albums by singer/songwriters Steve Forbert and Jeff Black. (By this time multi-instrumentalist Bob Egan had replaced Max Johnston, who had left Wilco to play with his sister, Michelle Shocked, and after that, with Freakwater.)

In 1998 Tweedy and company accepted an invitation from British singer/songwriter Billy Bragg to travel to Dublin to set some of Woody Guthrie's unrecorded lyrics to music. The album that resulted, Mermaid Avenue (#90, 1998), was by turns funny, sexy, and incisive, testifying to Guthrie's irrepressible spirit and ongoing relevance, it also proved to be the best record that either Bragg or Wilco had ever made. Summerteeth (#78, 1999), Wilco's third album, appeared the following year; more pop-leaning than its predecessors, the record was chock-full of bright, buoyant melodies salted with Tweedy's increasingly dark, oblique lyrics. A world tour opening for R.E.M. followed, while 2000 marked the appearance of a second volume of Mermaid Avenue that was nearly as luminous as the first.

Deniece Williams

Born June 3, 1951, Gary, IN 1976—This Is Niecy (Columbia) 1977—Songbird 1978—That's What Friends Are For (with Johnny Mathis) 1979—When Love Comes Calling (ARC) 1981—My Melody 1982—Niecy 1983—I'm So Proud (Columbia) 1984—Let's Hear It for the Boy 1986—Hot on the Trail; From the Beginning (Sparrow); So Glad I Know 1987—Water Under the Bridge (Columbia) 1989—As Good as It Gets; Special Love (Capitol/EMI) 1991—Lullabies to Dreamland (Word/Epic) 1994—Greatest Gospel Hits (Sparrow) 1996—Love Solves It All (P.A.R.); Gonna Take a Miracle: The Best of Deniece Williams (Columbia/Legacy) 1998—This Is My Song (Harmony).

As a child, Deniece Williams sang in gospel choirs, later recording for the local Chicago label, Toddlin' Town. She then turned her attention to a new career in nursing and became a "candy striper." Through a cousin's influence, Williams auditioned for and was recruited by Stevie Wonder to sing in his Wonderlove vocal group. (She toured with Wonder and can be heard on his 1972 LP Talking Book and 1976's Songs in the Key of Life.) After hearing a demo of her original songs, Earth, Wind & Fire's Maunce White signed Williams to his Kalimba Productions.

This Is Niece, Williams' first album, spawned the hit "Free" (#25 pop, #2 R&B, 1977). Collaborating in 1978 with singer Johnny Mathis, Williams had a major hit in "Too Much, Too Little, Too Late" (#1 pop, #1 R&B). The same year, the pair followed with a remake of the Marvin Gaye/Tammi Terrell hit "You're All I Need to Get By" (#47 pop, #10 R&B).

In 1982 Williams also scored with a remake of the Royalettes' "It's Gonna Take a Miracle" (#10 pop, #1 R&B), produced by Philly soul auteur Thom Bell. Two years later, "Let's Hear It for the Boy," produced by George Duke and featured in the popular film Footloose, charted at #1 pop and R&B. Although it was her last pop smash, Williams continued to have R&B hits including "Never Say Never" (#6, 1987). Williams began recording gospel albums in 1986; one of two she released that year, So Glad I Know, won a pair of Grammys.

Since then, Christian music has remained Williams' focus. Love Solves It All (1996) leavened the singer's gospel tracks with a pair of R&B singles; 1998's This Is My Song was a collection of hymns arranged in an R&B style. In the '90s, Williams also began writing children's books.

Hank Williams was perhaps the most important country & western performer of his time, and the most influential country artist in the development of rock & roll. His 36 Top 10 C&W hits—including the #1s "Lovesick Blues," "Why Don't You Love Me," "Long Gone Lonesome Blues," "Moanin' the Blues," "Cold, Cold Heart," "Hey, Good Lookin'," "Jambalaya (On the Bayou)," and "I'll Never Get Out of This World Alive"—and magnetic stage presence were instrumental in country music's rise in popularity during his lifetime. ("Kaw-Liga," "Your Cheatin' Heart," and "Take These Chains From My Heart" were posthumous #1 C&W hits in 1953.) But it is as a songwriter that Williams' influence most profoundly changed country music and touched virtually every popular style emanating from it, especially rock & roll. In compositions such as "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," for example, Williams expressed intense, personal emotions with country's traditional plainspoken directness, a then revolutionary approach that through the works of George Jones, Willie Nelson, and countless other country artists has come to define the genre. As a singer, Williams mastered a range of styles, from gospel to the pre-rockabilly playfulness of "Hey, Good Lookin'."

Hiram "Hank" Williams was born in a two-room sharecropper's shack in southeastern Alabama. His father was shell-shocked from World War I and committed himself to a veterans' hospital when Hank was seven, leaving Williams' mother to support him and his sister. She played organ in the local Baptist church, where Hank sang in the choir, and she bought him a guitar for $3.50. When he was 11, Williams moved in with relatives in a railroad camp and began frequenting the Saturday-night dances, where he learned about country music and moonshine. The following year, he moved with his family to the larger town of Greenville and began learning blues songs from a black street singer named Rufe "Tee-Tot" Payne. Williams played on streetcorners with Tee-Tot, sold peanuts, and shined shoes.

In 1937 the family moved to Montgomery, Alabama. Hank won an amateur contest by performing his "W.P.A. Blues" and, dubbed the Singing Kid, he secured a twice-weekly radio show on local station WSFA. Soon after, he formed the Drifting Cowboys and began playing the Alabama roadhouse circuit, with his mother as booking agent and driver.

By December 1944, Williams had played nearly every roadhouse in Alabama and had married Audrey Mae Shepard. Two years later, he signed a songwriting contract with Nashville publishers Acuff-Rose, and he recorded in Nashville on the small Sterling label. Soon after, he got a recording contract with newly formed MGM and began his successful collaboration with producer/arranger Fred Rose. That summer (1948), Williams joined the popular KWKH country music radio program Louisiana Hayride in Shreveport. His records started making the C&W charts, and he finally hit big with "Lovesick Blues," which became the #1 country record of 1949.

On June 11, 1949, Williams played at the Grand Ole Opry for the first time and received an unprecedented six encores. His fame grew along with his touring schedule of one-nighters across the country. Besides recording his bluesy C&W records, he also recorded gospel-influenced songs under the name Luke the Drifter. By 1952 his drinking had gotten out of hand, his health had deteriorated, and his marriage ended in divorce. Williams' chronic back problems had resulted in his dependence on painkillers, and in August he was fired from the Grand Ole Opry because of frequent no-shows. Four months later, at the age of 29, he died of a heart attack in the back of his Cadillac en route to a show in Canton, Ohio. (Many years later reports were issued that he actually died in a Knoxville, Tennessee, hotel room after excessive alcohol and drug consumption.)

After his death, Williams' records sold more than ever, and have continued to do so in the nearly 50 years since. His oft-covered catalogue has produced hits for artists ranging from Fats Domino and John Fogerty's Blue Ridge Rangers to Ray Charles and B.J. Thomas and has been the inspiration for a whole new generation of alt-country artists. In the late '90s Mercury Records began reissuing Williams' music on lavish CD sets. The 1998 box set The Complete Hank Williams won two Grammys.

Hank Williams Jr.

Born Randall Hank Williams Jr., May 26, 1949, Shreveport, LA 1964—Your Cheatin' Heart soundtrack (MGM) 1965—Father & Son (with Hank Williams Sr.) 1969—Live at Cobo Hall, Detroit 1974—Living Proof 1976—Hank Williams Jr. and Friends; Fourteen Greatest Hits 1977—One Night Stands (Elektra/Curb); The New South (Warner Bros./Curb) 1979—Family Tradition (Elektra/Curb); Whiskey Bent and Hell Bound (Elektra) 1981—Rowdy; The Pressure Is On 1983—Strong Stuff 1984—Major Moves (Warner Bros.) 1985—Greatest Hits, vol. 2; The Early Years, 1976–78; Five-O (Warner/Curb) 1986—Montana Cafe (Warner Bros.) 1987—Hank "Live"; Born to Boogie 1988—Wild Streak; Standing in the Shadows (Polydor) 1989—Greatest Hits, III (Warner Bros./Curb) 1990—Lone Wolf; AMERICA (The Way I See It) 1991—Pure Hank 1992—Maverick (Curb/Capricorn) 1993—Out of Left Field 1995—Hog Wild (MCG/Curb) 1996—A.K.A. Wham Bam Sam; Three Hanks: Men With Broken Hearts 1999—Stormy.

Hank Williams' son has carved out a country-rock career of his own. The young Williams was just three when his father died. He learned to play from his father's friends and associates, who included Jerry Lee Lewis, Johnny Cash, Ray Charles, and Brenda Lee. He changed his name to Hank Williams Jr., and with his mother guiding his career, made his debut at age eight in Swainsboro, Georgia. He made his first appearance at the Grand Ole Opry in 1960 and cut his first record at age 14, "Long Gone Lonesome Blues." His formal concert debut came soon after, at Cobo Hall in Detroit. Williams quit school and began touring, also appearing on TV. At 16, he became the youngest songwriter ever to earn a BMI citation; he also had a #5 C&W hit, "Standing in the Shadows" (1966). On tour, he mainly performed his father's material, with a band called the Cheatin' Hearts. His Your Cheatin' Heart soundtrack LP went gold. He later wrote soundtracks for Time to Sing and Kelly's Heroes. By age 25, he'd been married and divorced twice, and suffered from drug and alcohol problems.

Around 1974 Williams grew disenchanted with Nashville and with living up to his father's legacy. His association with his father endured on record as well: Fathers & Sons electronically created "duets" between Williams and his father, and 1969's Songs My Father Left Me presented the younger Williams creating melodies to songs for which his father had written lyrics before his death. Hank Williams Jr. temporarily stopped performing. On August 8, 1975, while mountain climbing in Montana, he fell 490 feet, resulting in injuries so severe that his entire face had to be reconstructed surgically.

A year and a half later, he came back in the more rock-oriented "outlaw" mold; fellow "outlaw" Waylon Jennings produced New South. In 1979 Williams' autobiography, Living Proof, was published by Putnam; it later became a made-for-television film entitled Living Proof: The Hank Williams Jr. Story (1983), starring Richard Thomas. He also recorded in the late '60s and '70s as Luke the Drifter Jr. (including two albums in 1969).

Although Williams has had a number of C&W hits through the years, he's a rare presence on the pop charts. In 1981 he had one of his biggest country hits with "All My Rowdy Friends (Have Settled Down)" (#1 C&W). Other hits included a cover of his father's "Honky Tonkin'" (#1 C&W, 1982), "Gonna Go Huntin' Tonight" (#4 C&W, 1983), "Man of Steel" (#3 C&W, 1984), "Attitude Adjustment" (#5, C&W, 1984), "All My Rowdy Friends Are Coming Over Tonight" (#10, C&W, 1984), "I'm for Love" (#1 C&W, 1985), "This Ain't Dallas" (#4 C&W, 1985), "Ain't Misbehavin'" (#1 C&W, 1986), "Country State of Mind" (#2 C&W, 1986), "Mind Your Own Business" (#1 C&W, 1986), "Born to Boogie" (#1 C&W, 1987), "Heaven Can't Be Found" (#4 C&W, 1987), "Young Country" (#2 C&W, 1988), "If the South Woulda Won" (#8 C&W, 1988), the Grammy-winning "There's a Tear in My Beer" (#7 C&W, 1989, an electronically created duet and video using old tapes and footage of his father), "Finders Are Keepers" (#6 C&W, 1989), and "Good Friends, Good Whiskey, Good Lovin'" (#19 C&W, 1990). Hank Williams Jr. also wrote and performed the theme for ABC Television's Monday Night Football program. Six albums have been certified platinum, among them: The Pressure Is On (#76 pop, 1981), Hank Williams Jr.'s Greatest Hits (#107 pop, 1982), Greatest Hits, vol. 2 (#183 pop, #1 C&W, 1986), Born to Boogie (#28 pop, 1987), and Greatest Hits III (#61 pop, 1989). He has also charted many #1 C&W LPs, including his 50th album, Five-O (1985), and Wild Streak (1988). Subsequent releases have made more modest C&W chart showings. A.K.A. Wham Bam Sam hit #40 in 1996, while 1999's Stormy peaked at #21. Also in 1996 Men With Broken Hearts, a project that utilized old recordings of Williams' father along with new recordings of Hank Jr. and his son Hank III, climbed to #29. (Hank III would go on to record as a solo artist, combining twangy C&W with hardcore punk.)

Larry Williams

Born May 10, 1935, New Orleans, LA; died Jan. 2, 1980, Los Angeles, CA

1978—That Larry Williams (Fantasy) 1988—The Best of Larry Williams (Ace) 1990—Larry Williams: Bad Boy (Specialty) 1999—Bad Boy of Rock 'n' Roll (Ace).

Larry Williams scored important hits in 1957–58 with "Short Fat Fanny" (#5 pop, #2 R&B), "Bony Moronie" (#14 pop, #9

R&B) (later covered by John Lennon on Rock 'n' Roll), and "Dizzy Miss Lizzy" (#69, 1958) (later covered by the Beatles). Their alliterative titles and frantic shouting performances made him a momentary rival to Little Richard.

Little Richard was the star performer of Specialty Records, the label that discovered Williams when he was playing piano on R&B sessions for performers like Lloyd Price, Roy Brown, and Percy Mayfield. Williams' first record for Specialty, a cover of Lloyd Price's "Just Because," was a flop, but was followed by his three big hits of 1957–58. When the hits stopped coming, Williams turned to record production for a time, and then teamed up with Johnny "Guitar" Watson, with whom he recorded several late-'60s R&B hits. He was convicted of and served time for narcotics trafficking in the '60s. His poorly received funk-oriented comeback album for Fantasy in 1978 was his last release. Two years later, he was found dead in his L.A. home, a gunshot wound in his head. The verdict was suicide.

Lucinda Williams

Born Jan. 26, 1953, Lake Charles, LA
 1979—Ramblin' on My Mind (Folkways) 1980—Happy Woman Blues 1988—Lucinda Williams (Rough Trade)
 1989—Passionate Kisses EP 1992—Sweet Old World (Chameleon) 1998—Car Wheels on a Gravel Road (Mercury) 2001—Essence (Lost Highway/Mercury).

Lucinda Williams began her career interpreting country, folk, and blues standards with a cool, almost academic reverence for the music. After a second album of original songs, she seemingly vanished for eight years. In 1988 she returned with a vengeance with Lucinda Williams, her highly praised singer/songwriter album that marked a critical turning point in Williams' career. She reached even greater commercial heights with 1998's masterful Car Wheels on a Gravel Road, her first gold album.

The daughter of a father who was a poet, college professor, and Hank Williams fan, Williams grew up listening to classic country. She was born in Louisiana, but her family relocated several times during her childhood to spots across the South, as well as Mexico City and Santiago, Chile. At 16, she discovered the writing of Southern novelist Flannery O'Connor, whom she cites as a major influence on her songwriting. Williams attended college for a short time but dropped out in 1971 to devote herself to music.

Folkways signed Williams in 1978 and released her first two albums without fanfare. Between 1980 and 1988 she worked a series of odd jobs, moving in mid-decade from Austin, Texas, to L.A., where she took voice lessons to learn how to sound like Joan Baez, and married and divorced Greg Sowders of the Long Ryders. Much of the biting material on her self-titled comeback album dealt with her marriage.

Rough Trade collapsed in 1991, and Chameleon released her 1992 album Sweet Old World. Relocating to Austin, then Nashville, Williams kept busy into the '90s. In 1993 she contributed a track to Sweet Relief, the benefit album for singer Victoria Williams (no relation), who suffers from multiple sclerosis, and lent her signature vocals to "Reunion" on Jimmie Dale Gilmore's Spinning Around the Sun. Williams' songs have also been covered by others: Patty Loveless scored a Top 10 country hit with "The Night's Too Long," Mary-Chapin Carpenter recorded a Grammy-winning version of her "Passionate Kisses," and Tom Petty's recording of Williams' "Change the Locks" appears on the soundtrack to the 1996 movie She's the One.

In 1994, after Chameleon Records became defunct, Williams briefly joined Rick Rubin's American Recordings roster. That deal fell through, and Williams wouldn't put out a new album for another four years. Meanwhile, there was considerable discussion in the press and among fans about the extent to which Williams' perfectionist tendencies might be hindering the record's progress.

The luminous, blues-steeped Car Wheels on a Gravel Road (#65, 1998), proved a triumph. The record not only boasted contributions from Emmylou Harris, Steve Earle, and the E Street Band's Roy Bittan, it won Williams widespread critical acclaim, including top honors in the Village Voice's annual critics poll. Car Wheels also earned Williams a Grammy for Best Contemporary Folk Album and became the first commercially successful record of her career, going gold within a year of its release. Williams toured extensively after the album came out, both as a headliner and as an opening act for Bob Dylan and Van Morrison. Currently signed to the new subsidiary of Mercury, Lost Highway, Williams released Essence, which debuted at #28, in June 2001 to more tempered reviews.

Maurice Williams and the Zodiacs

Formed 1959, Lancaster, SC
 Maurice Williams (b. Apr. 26, 1938); Henry Gaston; Wiley

Bennett; Charles Thomas; Little Willie Morrow; Albert Hill; N.A.—(— Hill; — Morrow).

Maunce Williams and the Zodiacs had only one major hit, "Stay." Despite clocking in as the shortest #1 hit single in history, the song has lived up to its title, claiming a place in the Top 40 for three months in 1960 but returning in Top 20 hit versions by Jackson Browne and the Four Seasons and covers by the Hollies, and others. In 1987 it was included in the hit Dirty Dancing soundtrack, which also featured the Contours' "Do You Love Me," another example of the Southeast music trend called "beach music," of which Williams' group was a part.

Williams' various groups have contained countless members and worked under many names, beginning with Royal Charms. With another group called the Gladiolas, Williams recorded his "Little Darlin'," an unsuccessful single for them but a hit a couple of years later for the Diamonds. In 1959, following a business dispute, this group lost the rights to the Gladiolas name, and later Williams gathered a new group, which he christened the Zodiacs. This lineup—Henry Gaston, Wiley Bennett, Charles Thomas, and Williams—recorded "Stay" in 1960 with Gaston taking the falsetto break. In the wake of the record's success, the Zodiacs began touring with such established acts as Chuck Berry and James Brown. Subsequent Williams compositions failed to make as big a commercial splash, but locally the Zodiacs were a top draw. Having led a number of Zodiacs lineups in the '70s and '80s, Williams continues to record for the East Coast's beach-music market.

Paul Williams

Born Sep. 19, 1940, Omaha, NE

1970—Someday Man (Reprise) 1971—Just an Old Fashioned Love Song (A&M) 1973—Life Goes On 1974—Here Comes Inspiration; A Little Bit of Love 1975—Phantom of the Paradise soundtrack; Ordinary Fool; Bugsy Malone soundtrack 1977—Classics 2001—Back to Love Again (Pioneer).

Singer/songwriter Paul Williams started out as a set painter and stunt man in films. In The Loved One in 1964, 24-year-old Williams was cast as a 10-year-old child genius. In 1965 he appeared with Marlon Brando in The Chase, as another punk kid. While on the set of The Chase, Williams first tried his hand at songwriting. He wrote songs with Biff Rose and comedy sketches for Mort Sahl before teaming up in 1967 with lyricist Roger Nichols. Together they wrote such million-selling MOR pop hits as the Carpenters' "We've Only Just Begun" (which started out as a commercial jingle for a bank) and "Rainy Days and Mondays." Helen Reddy's "You and Me Against the World," and Three Dog Night's "Just an Old Fashioned Love Song" and "Out in the Country."

Despite his limited voice, Williams became a successful singer in his own right, and has long been a regular on the talk show and Las Vegas circuits. In 1975 Williams teamed up with lyricist Ken Ascher. A year later, he starred in the title role of the rock film Phantom of the Paradise, for which he wrote the soundtrack. The next year, he scored Alan Parker's child-gangster film Bugsy Malone. Williams also contributed songs to the Barbra Streisand-Kris Kristofferson remake of A Star Is Born, among them his Oscar-winning collaboration with Streisand, "Evergreen." Williams has gone on to write music for a number of other feature films, including The Muppet Movie (1980), The Secret of NIMH (1982), The End (1978), Rocky IV (1984), Ishtar (1987), and The Muppet Christmas Carol (1992).

As an actor Williams has appeared in a number of films, including the three Smokey and the Bandit films (1977–1983), The Doors (1991), A Million to Juan (1994), and Headless Body in Topless Bar (1995), and on television (Picket Fences; Dream On; Walker, Texas Ranger). In the late-'90s he had a recurring role on the CBS soap opera The Bold and the Beautiful. In addition, he does voice-over work.

Following years of cocaine and alcohol abuse, Williams underwent treatment. He not only completed the program but became a licensed drug rehabilitation counselor. Back to Love Again, issued in Japan several years before its American release in 2001, was his first studio album since the '70s. It features collaborations with Graham Nash and Richard Carpenter. Paul Williams' brother, Mentor Williams, is a country record producer and writer of a number of well-known songs, including "Drift Away."

Tony Williams' shifting accents helped define the sound of the Miles Davis [see entry] Quintet of the '60s, a group Williams joined when he was 17. In 1969, after playing with Davis and on numerous Blue Note jazz sessions, he left to form one of the first jazz-rock fusion bands, the Tony Williams Lifetime, with organist Larry Young, guitarist John McLaughlin (who also worked with Davis at the time), and ex-Cream bassist Jack Bruce.

Lifetime played highly complex hard rock, presaging the late-'70s "punk-funk-jazz" of Ornette Coleman and James Blood Ulmer, but after its first two albums the original Lifetime disbanded. Williams freelanced as a jazz drummer and tried making a more conventional funk album, The Old Bum's Rush, on which he sang. He joined fellow Davis-quintet veterans under Herbie Hancock's leadership in VSOP, with whom he continued to tour and to record.

In the mid-'70s Williams organized another version of Lifetime, featuring guitarist Allan Holdsworth, formerly of Soft Machine and Gong. Like the first Lifetime, the group was critically acclaimed, but its records sold poorly and it broke up again. Williams' 1979 solo LP featured both fusion players and a duet with avant-garde pianist Cecil Taylor.

In the '80s Williams found new focus by returning to the music of his youth. He formed an acoustic jazz band whose nucleus included acclaimed pianist Mulgrew Miller and trumpeter Wallace Rooney. Williams can be heard on Wynton Marsalis' solo debut recording and also toured with a 1983 band featuring Wynton and Branford Marsalis.

Since 1986's Foreign Intrigue, Williams composed the majority of the music for his own band. His expanded work, "Rituals for String Quartet, Piano, Drums and Cymbals," was performed in 1990 with the Kronos Quartet. In 1992 Williams toured with his old Miles Davis band mates Ron Carter, Herbie Hancock, and Wayne Shorter in a tribute to the then recently departed Davis.

Williams then worked in a variety of groups, primarily, after 1995, with his own trio. Wilderness, a suite of orchestral works featuring an all-star lineup of Pat Metheny, Stanley Clarke, Herbie Hancock, and Michael Brecker, exemplified the ambition of his later work. He died from a heart attack following a minor gallbladder operation in 1997.

Vanessa Williams

Born Vanessa Lynn Williams, Mar. 18, 1963, Bronx, NY
1988—The Right Stuff (Wing/PolyGram) 1991—The Comfort Zone 1996—Star Bright 1997—Next (Mercury) 1998—Greatest Hits: The First Ten Years (PolyGram).

Pop music teems with great comebacks, but few are as hard-won or as unexpected as that of singer Vanessa Williams. Raised in a predominantly white suburban community in Westchester, New York, by public-school music teacher parents, Williams studied piano, violin, and French horn as well as classical and jazz dance as a child. She graduated high school with a Presidential Scholarship for drama.

While attending Syracuse University as a musical theater major, she entered the Miss America pageant, in hopes of gaining money and exposure. She won, becoming the first black Miss America in history, but got more exposure than she bargained for when in July 1984 sexually suggestive photographs she had posed for when she was 19 and working for a photographer surfaced in Penthouse. The resulting scandal cost her the crown and, it seemed, all hopes of realizing the show-business aspirations that brought her to the pageant in the first place.

Not long after the dust settled, however, Williams landed a few TV appearances and film roles; her image was slowly restored thanks to both her talent and PR consultant Ramon Hervey II, whom Williams married in 1987. The same year, she signed a deal with PolyGram's Wing Records; the following year saw the release of her well-received debut album, The Right Stuff (#38, 1988), which spawned "Dreamin'" (#8 pop, #1 R&B, 1989). The Comfort Zone (#17, 1991) was even more successful: Its Grammy-nominated third single, "Save the Best for Last," went to #1 on the pop, R&B, and Adult Contemporary charts, while "Running Back to You," the title track, and "Work to Do" respectively peaked at #1, #2, and #3, all R&B.

In 1993 Williams scored another pop hit with "Love Is" (#3), a duet with singer Brian McKnight that was featured on a soundtrack to the popular television show Beverly Hills 90210. Williams' TV-related credits also include hosting The Soul of VH1. Her charity work has ranged from taking part in an East Coast radio station's 1989 "Coats for Kids" campaign to contributing "What Child Is This" to A Very Special Christmas 2, an album whose proceeds benefited the Special Olympics. Her public disgrace apparently forgiven if not forgotten, Williams has earned several Grammy nominations and a pair of NAACP Image Awards. She released the 1994 album The Sweetest Days (#57 pop, #25 R&B, 1994), which yielded a hit single in the title track (#18 pop, #40 R&B, 1994). In 1995 she got rave reviews for her dance-heavy Broadway debut in Kiss of the Spider Woman; the same year, her "Colors of the Wind" (from Pocahontas) was an Oscar-winning #1 hit, and she costarred in a TV production of the musical Bye Bye Birdie.

In 1996 Williams costarred with action heavyweight Arnold Schwarzenegger in the movie Eraser and a Christmas album, Star Bright, was released. She and husband Hervey, who by now had three children together, divorced in 1997. The same year, Williams released Next, on which she collaborated on some tracks with dance producers Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis as well as R. Kelly, and set off on her first-ever concert tour, opening for Luther Vandross. She also appeared in the TV miniseries epic The Odyssey and starred in the feature film Soul Food in 1997. A greatest-hits album was released in 1998, along with the movie Dance With Me; Williams also appeared on stage in a limited performance of the '40s musical St. Louis Woman in New York City. The entertainer took a slight breather to marry basketball player Rick Fox in 1999 (a daughter was born in 2000), then filmed Shat with Samuel L. Jackson.

Victoria Williams

Born Dec. 23, 1958, Forbing, LA
1987—Happy Come Home (Geffen) 1990—Swing the Statue (Rough Trade) 1994—Loose (Mammoth/Atlantic) 1995—

This Moment: Live in Toronto 1998—Musings of a Creekdipper (Atlantic) 2000—Water to Drink.

Victoria Williams is one of the most unique singer/songwriters to emerge in the past decade. Yet the audience for her high-pitched warble and whimsical, deeply spiritual blend of folk, rock, country, and gospel was limited until she developed multiple sclerosis (MS) and several of her famous admirers came to her aid. Williams was diagnosed with the degenerative neuromuscular disease while touring with Neil Young in 1992; her lack of health insurance and inability to pay her medical bills motivated Pearl Jam, Soul Asylum, and other artists to record Sweet Relief, an album of Williams covers with proceeds going to set up a fund for Williams and other ailing musicians with no resources for health care. The boost not only enabled Williams to get through a rough patch in her life but also led to her record deal with Atlantic.

Williams grew up in a Methodist household in Shreveport, Louisiana, where she soaked up music ranging from folk to blues to black gospel. She later attended Centenary College and played in a bar band with a regional following, but didn't start writing songs until she later took a job in a laundromat at a Colorado resort. In 1979 Williams moved to L.A., where she became a fixture at the Troubadour club's "hoot nights." She moved back to Louisiana for a while, but returned to L.A. in 1984 and began playing with Peter Case [see entry] in a jug-band-style trio called the Incredibly Strung Out Band. The two eventually married and secured solo deals with Geffen [the couple divorced in 1989].

Williams' rootsy 1987 debut Happy Come Home featured such players as T Bone Burnett and Bernie Worrell, as well as string arrangements by Van Dyke Parks. The album's overproduction and Geffen's confusion as to how to market the eccentric Williams' idiosyncratic music resulted in its failure to make inroads. For her next release, Swing the Statue Williams moved to punk indie Rough Trade, which went under [just as the record was coming out, Williams' diagnosis of MS came shortly thereafter and, with it, the Sweet Relief tribute and her Atlantic deal.

Loose [1994] featured guest performances from Tower of Power, Soul Asylum's Dave Pirner, R.E.M.'s Peter Dinklage and Mike Mills, and Williams' new husband, Mark Olson, then of the Jayhawks [see entry]. Including covers of "What a Wonderful World" (best known for the version by Louis Armstrong) and Spint's "Nature's Way," Loose received radio and video exposure through the single "You R Loved." The live This Moment followed in 1995 along with a role in the movie Even Cowgirls Get the Blues. In 1998 Williams' Musings of a Creekdipper included contributions from Olson, with whom Williams had formed a looseknit combo, the Harmony Ridge Creek Dippers, who also began releasing albums [via its Web site] that the couple recorded at their Joshua Tree home studio. Water to Drink (2000) found Williams singing mostly pop standards.

1973—In Paris: Sonny Boy Williamson and Memphis Slim (GNP Crescendo) 1976—One Way Out (MCA) 1989—King Biscuit Time (Arhoolie) 1992—Goin' in Your Direction (Trumpet) 1993—Sonny Boy Williamson, vol. 1: 1937–1939 (EPM); Sonny Boy Williamson, vol. 2: 1940–1942 (Alligator) 1993—The Essential Sonny Boy Williamson (MCA/Chess) 1995—In Europe (Evidence) 1997—His Best (Chess).

There were two Sonny Boy Williamsons. The first was John Lee Williamson, who recorded very little and is known mainly as a major influence on such blues-harp giants as Little Walter Jacobs and Junior Wells. The second was Rice Miller, by far the better known.

The first Sonny Boy is acknowledged as the first to play the harmonica as a lead, rather than accompanying instrument. He is also considered an important and influential singer. Early in his career, he worked with Sleepy John Estes and Homesick James. He moved to Chicago in 1937, where he recorded "Good Morning, Little Schoolgirl" and "Sugar Mama" for RCA/Bluebird and played in a small group featuring Big Bill Broonzy. He was killed in a brutal attack and robbery.

The second Sonny Boy was the author of such blues standards as "One Way Out" (covered by the Allman Brothers Band), "Bye Bye Bird" (covered by the Moody Blues), "Help Me" (covered by Van Morrison), "Eyesight to the Blind" (covered by the Who on Tommy), "Fattening Frogs for Snakes," and "Don't Start Me Talking."

Miller—whose name, date of birth, and early life remain something of a mystery—was first noticed in the middle '30s, when he toured under the name Little Boy Blue, playing with Robert Johnson, Elmore James, and others. He first came to prominence, still known as Rice Miller, singing and playing blues harp on the popular radio show King Biscuit Time, broadcast from Helena, Arkansas. Miller appropriated the name Sonny Boy Williamson after the show's sponsor asked him to pose as the original Sonny Boy Williamson. The original Sonny Boy did not care to tour the South, and surprisingly—since the two harmonica players' styles were different—the public accepted Miller as Sonny Boy. Not long after, the original Sonny Boy was murdered, leaving Miller (as many fellow musicians still referred to him) the only Sonny Boy.

Williamson, as he was now known, first recorded in 1951 for the Jackson, Mississippi, Trumpet label. His first hit was his first recording there, "Eyesight to the Blind." That year he also recorded with Elmore James and appears on James' important version of Robert Johnson's "Dust My Broom." At this time Williamson was married to Howlin' Wolf's sister; they soon divorced and he remarried.

In 1955 Williamson moved to Chicago and began recording blues hits for Chess, backed at times by the Muddy Waters band. His ambivalence regarding tour commitments and recording, coupled with a penchant for drinking, gambling, women, and rambling, made him a difficult artist to manage. However, no one he ever recorded for ever got angry enough to stop working with him. Through 1961,

Williamson recorded a number of blues hits, including "Don't Start Me to Talkin'," "All My Love in Vain," "Keep It to Yourself," and "Your Funeral and My Trial."

Although by then in his 60s, Williamson never settled down. In 1963 he went to Europe, where he found an appreciative audience. He was especially popular in England, where he caused a sensation in his two-tone suit and bowler hat. In subsequent U.K. tours, he appeared on the British rock TV show Ready, Steady, Go and recorded live albums with British Invasion bands the Yardbirds and the Animals. He considered moving to England permanently but instead returned to Mississippi. He later recorded one last session for Chess, then returned to the Delta.

Shortly before his death, Williamson jammed with an early Ronnie Hawkins–led version of the Band, the Hawks, in a juke joint. All through the evening he had been spitting up blood, and some accounts attribute his death to tuberculosis. In fact, he died of a heart attack.

Chuck Willis

Born Jan. 31, 1928, Atlanta, GA; died Apr. 10, 1958, Atlanta 1971—His Greatest Recordings (Atlantic) 1980—Chuck Willis—My Story (Columbia) 1994—Let's Jump Tonight! The Best of Chuck Willis, From 1951–56 (Columbia/Legacy) 1998—The Real Story.

Chuck Willis was a blues singer/songwriter best remembered as the "King of the Stroll" (although the Diamonds cashed in on the ensuing dance craze with their "The Stroll"). Off-recorded Willis tunes include "I Feel So Bad" (Foghat, Delbert McClinton, Elvis Presley), "It's Too Late" (Buddy Holly, Otis Redding), and "Hang Up My Rock and Roll Shoes" (the Band, Jerry Lee Lewis).

As a teen, Willis was a popular R&B singer around Atlanta. A local DJ, Zenus "Daddy" Sears, took him to Columbia Records in 1952, where he cut a few minor releases for their Okeh label, including the R&B hits "My Story," a cover of Louis Jordan's "Caldonia," and "You're Still My Baby."

Willis, wearing turbans on stage—at one point he owned 54 of them—was often introduced to audiences as the "Sheik of the Shake." In 1956 Jerry Wexler signed Willis to Atlantic Records, and the next year Willis cut the blues standard "C.C. Rider" (#12 pop, #3 R&B). It was a major hit and established him as the "King of the Stroll." But within the year, Willis died from pentonitis, a complication of surgery for stomach ulcers; he was just 30. Posthumously, "What Am I Living For?" (#9 pop, #3 R&B) became his biggest crossover hit, followed by "Hang Up My Rock and Roll Shoes."

Fiddler-bandleader Bob Wills helped change the course of country and pop music in the '30s with his Texas Playboys, a Western swing band numbering anywhere from 13 to 18 members, who fused country & western, pop, blues, and big-band swing. This seminal unit introduced horns, drums, and electric guitars to country music.

The eldest of 10 children born to a fiddle-playing father, Wills moved with his family to Memphis, Texas, in 1913 and began playing fiddle and mandolin in square-dance bands. He moved to Fort Worth in 1929. A year later Wills joined the Light Crust Dough Boys with Milton Brown, and they began recording in 1932. Wills was fired from the band in 1933 for excessive drinking and personality conflicts with leader W. Lee O'Daniel. Wills left with banjoist Johnnie Lee Wills to form the Playboys, and they soon became regulars on radio broadcasts by WACO in Waco, Texas.

They moved to Tulsa, Oklahoma, and became regulars on KVOO. As Bob Wills and His Texas Playboys, they began recording for Brunswick in 1935. In the late '30s Wills's daughter Laura Lee became lead singer with the band; she also wrote songs, and later married Texas Playboys guitarist Dick McBride. In April 1940 they recorded the million-selling "San Antonio Rose" (#11 pop, #3 C&W, 1944), which also became a million-seller for Bing Crosby. Over the years Wills recorded another 22 C&W Top 10 hits, including these #1 singles: "Smoke on the Water" (1945), "Stars and Stripes on Iwo Jima" (1945), "Silver Dew on the Blue Grass Tonight" (1945), "White Cross on Okinawa" (1945), "New Spanish Two Step" (1946), and "Sugar Moon" (1947). Among his other well-known songs were "Faded Love," "Cotton Eyed Joe," "Take Me Back to Tulsa," and "Time Changes Everything."

Wills maintained the Texas Playboys through the early '60s. In 1962 his health began to deteriorate and he suffered a series of heart attacks. In 1968 he was named to the Country Music Hall of Fame. In 1973, during his last recording session, he suffered a stroke from which he never recovered, entering a coma that lasted until his death in 1975. A year later, the Texas Playboys reunited for some memorial concerts. In 1993 Asleep at the Wheel assembled a stellar cast of musicians for A Tribute to Bob Wills and His Texas Playboys. Among those participating were Garth Brooks, Merle Haggard, Brooks and Dunn, Willie Nelson, and several former Playboys.

Jackie Wilson

Born June 9, 1934, Detroit, MI; died Jan. 21, 1984, Mount Holly, NJ

1960—Jackie Sings the Blues (Brunswick); My Golden Favorites; My Golden Favorites, vol. 2 1962—Jackie Wilson at the Copa 1963—Baby Workout 1965—Spotlight on Jackie Wilson 1967—Whispers 1972—Jackie Wilson's Greatest Hits 1983—The Jackie Wilson Story (Epic) 1994—The Very Best of Jackie Wilson (Rhino).

Jackie Wilson was one of the premier black vocalists and performers of the late '50s and the '60s. No other singer of his generation so perfectly combined James Brown's rough, sexy style and Sam Cooke's smooth, gospel-polished pop.

Wilson grew up in a rough section of Detroit. In the late '40s, he lied about his age, entered the Golden Gloves, and won in his division. He later quit at his mother's request. He had sung throughout his childhood, and after high school, he began performing in local clubs. He was discovered by Johnny Otis at a talent show in 1951. In 1953 Wilson successfully auditioned for Billy Ward and His Dominoes (see entry), replacing Clyde McPhatter, who had left and formed the Drifters. Wilson sang lead on "St. Therese of the Roses," the group's second pop Top 20 hit in 1956.

Jackie Wilson

Later that same year Wilson went solo, signing with Brunswick Records. His first single, the sassy "'Reet Petite" (#62 pop, #11 R&B), written by his friend Berry Gordy Jr., appeared in 1957. In 1958 Wilson began making his mark with "To Be Loved" (#22 pop, #11 R&B) and "Lonely Teardrops" (#7 pop, #1 R&B), two more Gordy tunes. He hit his commercial stride in 1959 with "That's Why (I Love You So)" (#13 pop, #2 R&B), "I'll Be Satisfied" (#20 pop, #6 R&B), "You Better Know It" (#37 pop, #1 R&B), and "Talk That Talk" (#34 pop, #3 R&B). His success continued in 1960 with "Night" b/w "Doggin' Around" (#4 pop, #1 R&B), "All My Love," and "Am I the Man" b/w "Alone at Last" (#8 pop, #10 R&B). His stage show was as athletic as James Brown's, and the sexual hysteria surrounding it was unparalleled. In 1961 he was shot and seriously wounded by a female fan in his New York apartment. That year he hit big with "My Empty Arms" (#9 pop, #10 R&B).

With the exception of the frenzied "Baby Workout" (#5 pop, #1 R&B) in 1963, Wilson's next few years yielded few hits. Then in 1966 he was matched with veteran producer Carl Davis, with whom he scored two hits: "Whispers (Gettin' Louder)" (#11 pop, #5 R&B) and "(Your Love Keeps Lifting Me) Higher and Higher" (#6 pop, #1 R&B). Unfortunately, these were Wilson's last great recordings, although he continued to chart singles as a pop-style crooner through 1972. By 1975 he was playing the oldies circuit. On September 25, 1975, at a Dick Clark revue in the Latin Casino in Cherry Hill, New Jersey, he suffered a heart attack onstage while singing "Lonely Teardrops," and was hospitalized and in a coma from which he emerged with significant brain damage. Eight years after the heart attack, Wilson died. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1987.

Chynna Phillips: Naked and Sacred (1995).

Wilson Phillips specialized in rich harmony vocals—no surprise given the group's lineage in two of the most popular pop-rock harmony units of the '60s. Chynna Phillips is the daughter of John and Michelle Phillips of the Mamas and the Papas, and Carnie and Wendy Wilson's father is Brian Wilson, the creative genius of the Beach Boys.

Despite their musical roots, none of the three thought of becoming singers until 1986, when inspired by Band Aid, Live Aid, and USA for Africa, Chynna Phillips first conceived of having famous musicians' children record together for charity. Phillips considered Frank Zappa's daughter Moon Unit, who had scored a left-field hit with "Valley Girl," and lone Skye, the actress daughter of folksinger Donovan, but she instead turned to her old friends, the Wilson sisters.

From their first rehearsals, the story goes, they found their voices fitting together naturally—Carnie singing low harmony, Wendy singing high parts, and Chynna in between. They decided to work as a group, and briefly considered adding the late Mamas and Papas member Cass Elliot's daughter Owen. The trio polished its sound for two years, working with producer Richard Perry and with songwriter Glenn Ballard (who'd collaborated with Michael Jackson, among others). When music-publishing giant Charles Koppelman launched his SBK Records, Wilson Phillips was among his first signings. With its easy-listening tempos and girlish but rich harmonies, the group's debut album was a massive hit (#2, 1990) that sold over 5 million copies and yielded three #1 singles in "Hold On," "Release Me," and "You're in Love"; "Impulsive" was another big hit (#4, 1990).

In stark contrast, Shadows and Light was one of 1992's biggest disappointments: While it reached #4 shortly after its June release and was certified platinum, it failed to yield a hit single. Some observers blamed the album's darker songs—"Flesh and Blood" dealt with the Wilson sisters' troubled relationship with their father, and there was a song about rape—while others blamed a more mature, glamorous image that may have alienated the group's vast teenaged audience. Wilson Phillips canceled a planned summer tour for lack of ticket sales, and spent the rest of 1992 denying breakup rumors. The group disbanded the next year. Separately, Phillips recorded the solo Naked and Sacred in 1995, and the Wilson sisters cut a 1993 holiday-themed record, were reunited with their father for the 1995 documentary I Just Wasn't Made for These Times, and, in 1997, released the eponymous The Wilsons. Carnie also explored other media, launching a short-lived TV talk show in 1995, and, in a dramatic effort to resolve a lifelong struggle with her weight, undergoing gastric bypass surgery in an operation that was cybercast live over the Internet in 1999. In early 2001 the group performed together again at a televised tribute to Brian Wilson, and announced they would be recording a new album.

Jesse Winchester

Born May 17, 1944, Shreveport, LA

1971—Jesse Winchester (Ampex) 1972—Third Down, 110 to Go (Bearsville) 1974—Learn to Love It 1976—Let the Rough Side Drag 1977—Nothin' but a Breeze 1978—A Touch on the Rainy Side 1981—Talk Memphis (Bearsville) 1989—Humor Me (Sugar Hill) 1999—Gentleman of Leisure.

Singer/songwriter Jesse Winchester's early albums were tales of exile from a Southerner who had moved to Canada to avoid the draft. His later work, after he was granted amnesty, has leaned toward easygoing love songs, but Winchester still has a distinctive voice and a style that encompasses acoustic folk and Memphis rockabilly.

Winchester grew up in Memphis and played piano and sang with his church choir. He also learned guitar, and as a teenager he joined various unsuccessful rock bands. In 1967 he went to study in Munich, Germany, and when he found out that his draft notice had arrived at home, he went to Canada, where he's kept a residence ever since.

In 1970 Winchester met Robbie Robertson of the Band, who got him a management contract with Albert Grossman. Robertson produced and played on (with his bandmate Levon Helm) Winchester's debut LP, which included the much-covered songs "Biloxi," "The Brand New Tennessee Waltz," and "Yankee Lady." Todd Rundgren produced part of Winchester's second album (the title refers to Canadian football), and, like the debut, it garnered rave reviews.

Winchester became a Canadian citizen in 1973, and didn't tour the U.S. again until after President Jimmy Carter declared amnesty for draft evaders in 1977. Since then, he has appeared regularly in U.S. clubs, both with a band and as a solo performer. Although his following has never been much more than marginal, he continues to write constantly. In 1999 he emerged from a 12-year recording hiatus with Gentleman of Leisure, on which he was aided by guitarist Steve Cropper, the Fairfield Four, and a gospel group.

Winger/Kip Winger

Formed 1986, New York, NY

Kip Winger (b. June 21, 1961, Golden, CO), bass, voc.; Reb Beach (b. Aug. 31, 1963, Baltimore, MD), gtr.; Paul Taylor (b. 1960, San Francisco, CA), gtr., kybds.; Rod Morgenstein (b. Apr. 19, 1957, New York), drums.

1988—Winger (Atlantic) 1990—In the Heart of the Young (- Taylor; + John Roth [b. May 5, 1967, Springfield, IL], gtr.) 1993—Pull.

Kip Winger solo: 1997—This Conversation Feels Like a Dream (EMD/Domo) 1999—Down Incognito (Cleopatra) 2000—Songs From the Ocean Floor (Front, Swe).

Like Poison and Warrant, Winger was a popular light-metal rock group that combined poppy tunes and sex appeal. Hunky lead singer Kip Winger had studied classical piano and guitar with a Juilliard School of Music teacher, and had trained at the Joffrey Ballet School, before meeting Paul Taylor while both were in Alice Cooper's mid-'80s backing band. By 1986 they'd formed a band with drummer Rod Morgenstein, formerly with progressive-fusion band Dixie Dregs, and guitarist Reb Beach, who'd played sessions with Howard Jones, Chaka Khan, and the Bee Gees. The group originally called itself Sahara, but upon learning an L.A. band already had that name, became Winger.

Its debut album (#21, 1988) produced hits in "Seventeen" (#26, 1989) and "Headed for a Heartbreak" (#19, 1989). In the Heart of the Young (#15, 1990) had more hits in "Can't Get Enough" (#42, 1990), "Miles Away" (#12, 1991), and "Easy Come Easy Go" (#41, 1991). Although, thanks to Kip Winger, the band was tremendously videogenic, its appeal quickly waned. Taylor left to pursue songwriting on his own, John Roth joined for Pull, a conscious attempt to essay lighter, more melodic songs that bombed, producing no hit singles. After that album's release, Morgenstein left to join the re-formed Dixie Dregs. Kip Winger pursued a solo career, recording This Conversation Seems Like a Dream in 1996. His wife, Beatrice, was killed in a car accident later that year. The 1999 release Down Incognito was a live acoustic best-of with a subsequent studio album, Songs From the Ocean Floor, a reflection on his wife's death, with appearances by Morgenstein and Beach, and a duet with Moon Unit Zappa.

Edgar Winter

Born Dec. 28, 1946, Beaumont, TX

1970—Entrance (Epic) 1971—Edgar Winter's White Trash 1972—Roadwork 1973—They Only Come Out at Night 1974—Shock Treatment 1975—Jasmine Nightdreams (Blue Sky); The Edgar Winter Group With Rick Derringer 1976—Together: Live (with Johnny Winter) 1977—Recycled 1979—Edgar Winter Album 1981—Standing on Rock (Blue Sky) 1989—Mission Earth (Rhino) 1990—Live in Japan (with Rick Derringer) (Cypress) 1991—The Edgar Winter Collection (Rhino) 1994—Not a Kid Anymore (Intersound) 1996—The Real Deal 1999—Winter Blues (Rhino).

Vocalist/keyboardist/saxophonist Edgar Winter is Johnny Winter's younger brother. Edgar was playing in a jazz group around the time that Johnny rose suddenly to fame in the late '60s. Edgar joined his brother's band, playing sax and keyboards, then left to pursue a solo career. [See Johnny's entry for Edgar's early biography.]

On his debut album, Edgar played many instruments himself, though it was critically well received, it sold poorly. For his next two albums, he formed the jazz/R&B horn band White Trash, which became a popular concert attraction (they played the closing night of New York's Fillmore East). Edgar broke the band up, however, and next formed the experimental hard-rock quartet the Edgar Winter Band, which featured bassist-vocalist Dan Hartman and guitarist Ronnie Montrose [see entry]. Their first release was a single, "Hangin' Around," backed by an instrumental called "Frankenstein." An edited "Frankenstein" became the A side of the single; it went to #1 in the U.S. and sold platinum worldwide, as did the Edgar Winter Band's first album, They Only Come Out at Night (#3, 1972).

In late 1973, as "Free Ride" (#14, 1973) became another smash hit single, guitarist Rick Derringer [see entry], who'd produced White Trash and They Only, joined Edgar's band, replacing Jerry Weems, who'd replaced Montrose. They became a major concert attraction, and Shock Treatment (#13, 1974), featuring Derringer, sold well. Edgar then recorded a solo LP, Jasmine Nightdreams (#69, 1975), but returned to the group for the more rock-oriented With Rick Derringer (#124, 1975).

Edgar appears on Johnny Winter's Johnny Winter and Second Winter, Derringer's All American Boy and Spring Fever, Dan Hartman's first three solo LPs, and Bette Midler's Songs for the New Depression. In 1976 he cut an album of oldies with brother Johnny. He has since released several additional solo works that mix blues and Southern rock. His "Way Down South" appeared on the My Cousin Vinnie soundtrack; his music has since been featured in numerous films. In 1990 he teamed up again with Derringer for a world tour that resulted in Live in Japan. In 1992 he performed with Johnny at the Ritz in New York; it was the first time the two had shared a stage in 15 years. Gigs supporting 1996's The Real Deal were billed as White Trash reunions, as they featured some of the same personnel.

With Muddy Waters: 1977—Hard Again (Blue Sky) 1978—I'm Ready 1979—Muddy "Mississippi" Waters Live; King Bee.

Johnny Winter came to fame as a much-heralded blues guitarist whose roots-based hard rock was widely popular in the '70s. Late in that decade he reverted to more traditional forms when he backed Muddy Waters in concert and on several recordings. Winter returned from a four-year break to record a series of acclaimed blues records, among them two that were nominated for Grammy awards.

He grew up in Beaumont, Texas, the son of a banjo- and saxophone-playing father and a piano-playing mother. Johnny and his younger brother Edgar—who are both albinos—learned how to play several instruments. The two brothers performed as an Everly Brothers-style duo and even auditioned for Ted Mack's Original Amateur Hour when Johnny was just 11. In their teens they formed local rock bands with names like Johnny and the Jammers, the

Johnny Winter, Randy Hobbs, Richard Hughes

Crystaliers, It and Them, and the Black Plague, playing mainly blues and rock. At age 15, with Johnny and the Jammers, Winter recorded his first record, "School Day Blues," for Dart Records in Houston. After graduating high school, Johnny enrolled in Lamar Technical College but soon dropped out.

He hitchhiked to Louisiana, where he backed up local blues and rock musicians, and in the early '60s he traveled to Chicago, where he frequented blues clubs. In 1962 Winter played with Mike Bloomfield and Barry Goldberg, among others; they went on to form Electric Flag. Winter eventually returned to Texas, where he played with various journeyman blues bands. After a few years of garnering local raves on the Georgia-Florida circuit, a 1968 ROLLING STONE article, in which Winter was described as a "cross-eyed albino with long fleecy hair, playing some of the gutsiest fluid blues guitar you've ever heard," brought him to national attention. New York club owner Steve Paul read the article and flew out to Texas to sign Winter. Paul installed him as a regular attraction at his New York club, the Scene, and within weeks the guitarist was attracting capacity audiences.

Winter's debut album for Columbia sold well; concurrent with its release came The Progressive Blues Experiment, an album of demo tapes he had been peddling around before he got signed. Second Winter, recorded in Nashville, won even more ecstatic raves and bigger sales than the debut. The musicians soon assembled a new band (his previous one had been with him since his Texas journeyman days), which included his brother Edgar, guitarist Rick Derringer, bassist Randy Hobbs, and drummer Randy Zehringer from the McCoy's, who'd had a massive hit a few years earlier with "Hang On Sloopy." They recorded And, after which Bobby Caldwell replaced Zehringer for And Live. While both albums were successful, Winter's heavy touring schedule and mounting heroin problem forced him to retire for a time.

He returned in 1973 with the biggest album of his career to date, Still Alive and Well (#22, 1973), which featured a song written for him by Mick Jagger and Keith Richards, "Silver Train." Critically, it and Saints and Sinners (#42, 1974) are considered Winter's last great, rock-oriented albums. In 1976 he worked with brother Edgar for the first time in several years on Together (#89, 1976); by that time, Edgar's popularity had eclipsed Johnny's. For Nothin' but the Blues, Winter was joined by Muddy Waters and his band, but the set received only moderate critical reaction and went largely unnoticed. Winter toured and frequently played festivals both solo and as a member of Waters' backing band. He produced and sat in on Waters' LPs Hard Again, I'm Ready, King Bee, and Live. Hard Again and Muddy "Mississippi" Waters Live both won Grammy awards.

Winter eventually took four years off. Like many of his white blues-rock contemporaries, he suddenly found himself out of vogue. The Grammy-nominated Guitar Slinger marked his return but in a more blues-roots vein. It, along with Serious Business and Third Degree, were critically acclaimed. The Winter of '88 brought Winter back toward rock & roll but nowhere near the popular success he had enjoyed in the '70s. He remains one of the preeminent blues-rockers of his generation.

Steve Winwood

Born May 12, 1948, Birmingham, Eng.

1971—Winwood (United Artists) 1977—Steve Winwood (Island) 1980—Arc of a Diver 1982—Talking Back to the Night 1986—Back in the High Life 1987—Chronicles 1988—Roll With It (Virgin) 1990—Refugees of the Heart 1995—The Finer Things (Island Chronicles) 1997—Junction 7 (Virgin).

Singer/keyboardist Steve Winwood has found his own hugely successful blend of pop and R&B after years of working with blues, pop, and experimental bands.

Winwood began playing piano as a child, and picked up bass, guitar, and drums as a teenager. At 15 he was a member of his older brother Muff Winwood's jazz band, and a year later the two joined the Spencer Davis Group [see entry]. Steve Winwood's lead vocals and insistent organ riffs gave the band hits with "Gimme Some Lovin'" and "I'm a Man." At 18, Winwood participated in a studio group, Powerhouse, that included Eric Clapton on guitar; their tracks appeared on What's Shakin', an Elektra Records sampler. Winwood then went on to form Traffic [see entry], while Clapton worked with Cream. During Traffic's original on-again, off-again existence (1967–74), Winwood appeared with Clapton in the short-lived supergroup Blind Faith [see entry] and with Ginger Baker's Air Force.

In 1970 Winwood began work on a solo album to be called Mad Shadows, but it eventually became the re-formed Traffic's John Barleycorn Must Die. After Traffic's When the Eagle Flies, Winwood worked with Japanese percussionist Stomu Yamashta and German synthesizer player Klaus Schulze in 1976, resulting in an album, Go, and a concert at Royal Albert Hall in London. Winwood's 1977 solo debut, which used a backup band, was a modest success.

But Arc of a Diver (#3, 1981), on which Winwood played all the instruments but sang lyrics written by others (including Viv Stanshall of the Bonzo Dog Band and Will Jennings), went platinum, with a Top 10 single, "While You See a Chance" (#7, 1981). Talking Back to the Night (#28, 1982), made with the same method, did not fare as well as its predecessor, but four years later the triple-platinum Back in the High Life (#3, 1986) took Winwood to the top of the chart with the Grammy-winning "Higher Love" (#1, 1986, which featured Chaka Khan), "Freedom Overspill" (#20, 1986), and the title track (#13, 1987). It remains his most popular album to date. Chronicles, a best-of, included a hit in the remixed "Valerie" (#9, 1987), a song originally included on Talking Back to the Night that went only to #70 on its initial release.

Winwood's first album for Virgin, Roll With It (#1, 1988) was certified double platinum, with another trio of hit singles: "Roll With It" (#1, 1988), "Don't You Know What the Night Can Do?" (#6, 1988), and "Holding On" (#11, 1988). With Refugees of the Heart (#27, 1990) Winwood's MOR-ish formula seemed to have worn thin, although "One and Only Man" was a Top 20 hit. In 1994 Winwood rejoined Jim Capaldi in a much-heralded Traffic reunion. The Finer Things is a four-disc retrospective. The adult R&B pop of Junction 7 (#123) failed to generate much excitement.

1997—Coatings 1998—Dugga Dugga Dugga.
As Wir: 1991—The First Letter (Mute-Elektra).

Wire's art-school approach to punk set the U.K. quartet apart from its brasher contemporaries. Drawing more from avant-garde ideas about minimalism than from stripped-down rock & roll, Wire extracted the essential elements of pop—beat, rhythm, melody—and left it at that. The result was a deceptively simple, unemotional sound whose success rode on the tension between the group's often introspective lyrics, barked vocals, and sparse instrumentation. Despite little attention in the beginning, Wire's first three albums are among the most influential on the postpunk era, cited by Michael Stipe of R.E.M. and Robert Smith of the Cure.

Inspired by the burgeoning U.K. punk scene, and with only rudimentary knowledge of their instruments, South Londoners Colin Newman, Bruce Gilbert, Graham Lewis, and Robert Gotobed came together while attending the same art school. After appearing on an obscure live punk compilation, the band signed with Harvest, a mostly psychedelic/progressive-rock label, in September 1977. Wire's first release, Pink Flag, is a crudely produced, 21-track assault of throbbing bass, distortion, and dissonance, but also includes moments of gentle pop elegance. (R.E.M. covered the obscure Pink Flag song "Strange" on its first Top 10 album, Document.)

Wire stretched out on Chairs Missing, with slightly longer songs, more skillful playing, and occasional keyboard brushstrokes (played by producer Mike Thome). The group expanded its sonic palette yet again on 154, with added instrumentation and increased attention to production, resulting in a moodier, more sophisticated and textured sound. Its musical evolution complete, the band called it a day in 1980.

Had Wire stopped there, its impact on rock's future would still have been cemented. But in 1986, after five years of posthumous live releases and solo projects—Newman and Gotobed did four albums together under Newman's name; Gilbert and Lewis performed under several names including Dome—the quartet reunited. With an updated experimental synth-pop sound, Wire began churning out a string of albums and toured the U.S. for the first time in 1987. (During that tour, Wire refused to perform its classic early work, and instead had opening act the Ex-Lion Tamers perform the entire Pink Flag album.) That same year's The Ideal Copy approached the inventiveness of the first three albums, but none of the others were as well received. By 1991's The Drill EP, drummer Gotobed had tired of the group's increasing fascination with technology, particularly drum machines. When he left, the group responded by dropping the last letter from its name and releasing 1991's The First Letter as Wir before disbanding.

As the band's members explored solo projects (with the exception of Gotobed, who turned to organic farming and worked as a session drummer), the sound of Wire enjoyed an unexpected resurrection in 1995 when the edgy, minimalist riffing of "Three Girl Rhumba" was "borrowed" for Elastica's hit single "Connection." (Elastica paid Wire's song publishers an out-of-court fee.) The band re-formed momentarily in 1996 to play Gilbert's 50th birthday party. Then, in early 2000, Wire reconvened to perform at the Royal Festival Hall in London (after a Dublin warm-up gig). The band continued with a U.S. tour and a setlist that spanned its entire career. Wire also distributed live recordings via the band's Web site.

Bill Withers

Born July 4, 1938, Slab Fork, WV
1971—Just As I Am (Sussex) 1972—Still Bill 1973—Bill Withers Live at Carnegie Hall 1974—Justments 1975—The Best of Bill Withers; Making Music (Columbia) 1976—Naked & Warm 1977—Menagerie; Bout Love 1981—Bill Withers' Greatest Hits 1985—Watching You Watching Me 1994—Lean on Me: The Best of Bill Withers (Columbia/Legacy).

Singer/songwriter Bill Withers recorded a string of understated hits that mixed folk and soul music, including his classic "Lean on Me." He was nearly 30 years old before he sought a career in music. He graduated from high school and worked as a mechanic. In 1967 he moved to L.A. and, while working in an aerospace factory, began recording demos of his songs, which got no response. Withers had just learned how to play guitar, but he was considering giving up songwriting when he met Booker T. Jones in 1970.

Later in 1970 Jones produced and played on Withers' debut LP Just As I Am (#39, 1971), using MG's Al Jackson and Donald "Duck" Dunn as well as Stephen Stills, who shared guitar credits with Withers. The album contained the gold single "Ain't No Sunshine," which went to #3 in 1971 and was awarded a Grammy for Best R&B Song. That year Withers made his performing debut in L.A. His followup, "Grandma's Hands" (#42 pop, #18 R&B, 1971) has since been recorded by a number of other singers.

Recorded with members of the Watts 103rd St. Rhythm Band, Still Bill (#4, 1972) was even more successful, containing "Lean on Me" (#1 pop and R&B, 1972) and "Use Me" (#2 pop and R&B, 1972). Other hits included "Let Us Love" (#17 R&B, 1972), "Kissing My Love" (#12 R&B, 1973) and "Friend of Mine" (#25 R&B, 1973). The album was certified gold and remains the singer's most successful to date. After two more albums for Sussex, Withers signed with Columbia in 1975, and there he recorded six LPs. Making Music (#81, 1975) contained "Make Love to Your Mind" (#10 R&B), and his second gold album, Menagerie (#39, 1977), had "Lovely Day" (#30 pop, #6 R&B). But subsequent releases were not nearly as successful as his earlier albums.

He sang on the Crusaders' Rhapsody in Blues, then on Grover Washington Jr.'s Winelight in 1981. For the latter, he cowrote and sang "Just the Two of Us" (#2 pop, #3 R&B), one of that year's most popular singles. He also recorded a single, "U.S.A." He was basically retired from recording until 1985's Watching You Watching Me. He continued to tour occasionally, often with Washington. In the '90s various rappers have sampled Withers' music.

Bobby Womack

Born Mar. 4, 1944, Cleveland, OH
 1968—Fly Me to the Moon (Minit) 1971—The Womack "Live" (Liberty) 1971—Communication (United Artists) 1972—Understanding 1973—Facts of Life; Across 110th Street soundtrack (United Artists) 1974—Lookin' for a Love Again; Bobby Womack's Greatest Hits; I Don't Know What the World's Coming To 1976—Safety Zone; BW Goes C&W; Home Is Where the Heart Is (Columbia); Pieces 1979—Roads of Life (Arista) 1981—The Poet (Beverly Glen) 1984—The Poet II 1985—So Many Rivers (MCA); Someday We'll All Be Free (Beverly Glen) 1986—Womagic (MCA) 1987—The Last Soul Man 1989—Save the Children (with the Womack Brothers) (Solar) 1994—Resurrection (Slide/Continuum) 1996—Only Survivor: The MCA Years (MCA) 1999—Traditions (Capitol); Back to My Roots.

As a writer and performer, guitarist Bobby Womack has been one of the most important black musicians of the last 25 years, composing a number of rock and soul standards as well as such diverse songs as Janis Joplin's "Trust Me" and George Benson's hit "Breezin'."

Womack and his four brothers—Cecil, Curtis, Harris, and Friendly Jr.—formed a gospel group, the Womack Brothers, in the late '50s. On the gospel circuit, they met the Soul Stirrers and lead singer Sam Cooke, who later recruited Womack as guitarist for his own pop band. Cooke then signed the Womack Brothers to his Sar label, where, as the Valentinos, they cut two R&B classics, "It's All Over Now" and "Lookin' for a Love" (#8 R&B, 1962). The former would be a major hit for the Rolling Stones, the latter for the J. Geils Band.

After Cooke's death and the Valentinos' breakup, Womack became a top session guitarist, and has played on recordings by Aretha Franklin, King Curtis, Dusty Springfield, and Ray Charles, among others. By then he had married Cooke's widow, Barbara; they divorced in 1970. (Later his brother Cecil would marry Cooke's daughter Linda and form the writing and producing duo of Womack and Womack.) He also continued writing. His "I'm a Midnight Mover" and "I'm in Love" were hits for Wilson Pickett. Womack wrote and played acoustic guitar on Janis Joplin's "Trust Me."

Reviving his solo career in the late '60s, Womack had a few moderate soul hits on the Minit label, but really picked up when he moved to United Artists. His solo career took off in the early '70s with "That's the Way I Feel About 'Cha'" (#2 pop, #2 R&B) in 1971, "Woman's Got to Have It" (#1 R&B) and "Harry Hippie" (#8 R&B) in 1972, and "Nobody Wants You When You're Down and Out" (#2 R&B) in 1973. Later R&B hits include "Lookin' for a Love" (#10 pop, #1 R&B, 1974), "You're Welcome, Stop On By" (#5 R&B, 1974), "Check It Out" (#6 R&B, 1975), and "Daylight" (#5, 1976). His albums with Columbia and Arista saw Womack in a commercial decline. According to some sources, Womack, who counted Sly Stone among his closest friends, also had a drug problem. But in 1981 he announced he had cleaned up, and he made a tremendous comeback with the #1 R&B LP The Poet and a #3 R&B single, "If You Think You're Lonely Now." Later R&B hits include a duet with Patti LaBelle, "Love Has Finally Come at Last" (#3 R&B, 1984) and "I Wish He Didn't Trust Me So Much" (#2 R&B, 1985).

After that, Womack seemed to have disappeared. He appeared with Artists United Against Apartheid duetted with Mick Jagger on the Rolling Stones' Dirty Work ("Going Back to Memphis"), and he reunited with his brothers for Save the Children, but he released no new albums for nearly five years. He appeared on Paul Shaffer's Coast to Coast and Todd Rundgren's Nearly Human. After a period of personal turmoil, Womack reemerged with Resurrection, the first album released on Ron Wood's Slide Music label (Womack had produced Wood's solo debut album in 1974). It includes guest appearances by Keith Richards, Wood, Charlie Watts, Stevie Wonder, Brian May, and others.

Groomed from an early age for Motown stardom, Stevie Wonder mastered that label's distinctive fusion of pop and soul and then went on to compose far more idiosyncratic music—an ambitious hybrid of sophisticated Tin Pan Alley chord changes and R&B energy, inflected with jazz, reggae, and African rhythms. A synthesizer and studio pioneer, he is one of the few musicians to make records on which he plays virtually all the instruments, and does so with both convincing technique and abandon. A lifelong advocate of nonviolent political change patterned after Martin Luther King Jr. and Mahatma Gandhi, Wonder epitomizes '60s utopianism while remaining resolutely contemporary in his musical experiments.

Stevie Morris' prodigious musical talents were recognized when Ronnie White of the Miracles heard the 10-year-old boy, blind from infancy, playing the harmonica for his children, and introduced him to Berry Gordy Jr. of the Hitsville U.S.A.—soon Motown—organization. Gordy named him Little Stevie Wonder. His third single, "Fingertips (Part 2)" was a #1 pop and R&B hit eight months later. Both on records and in live shows he was featured playing harmonica, drums, piano, and organ, as well as singing—sometimes all in one number.

During his first three years in show business, Wonder was presented as an R&B screamer in the Ray Charles mold; much was made of the fact that both were blind. In 1964 he appeared on the screen in Muscle Beach Party and Bikini Beach. Uptight (#3, 1966) included "I Was Made to Love Her" (#2, 1967), "For Once in My Life" (#2, 1968), and "Shoo-Be-Doo-Be-Doo-Da-Day" (#9, 1968). The Wonder style broadened to include Bob Dylan's "Blowin' in the Wind" (#9, 1966), the optimistic "A Place in the Sun" (#9, 1968), and an instrumental version of Burt Bacharach's "Alfie." In 1969 he hit the upper reaches of the charts with the ballads "My Cherie Amour" (#4) and "Yester-Me, Yester-You, Yesterday" (#7).

As his adolescence came to an end, Wonder took charge of his career. By the time of Signed Sealed & Delivered (#25, 1970), he was virtually self-sufficient in the studio, serving as his own producer and arranger, playing most of the instruments himself, and writing material with his wife, Syreeta Wright. In this phase, he scored three more hit singles: "Signed, Sealed, Delivered I'm Yours" (#3, 1970), "Heaven Help Us All" (#9, 1970), and "If You Really Love Me" (#8, 1971).

When he reached his 21st birthday in 1971, he negotiated a new contract with Motown that made him the label's first artist to win complete artistic control (also at 21 he was due the money he had made as a minor, despite earning over $30 million, he received only $1 million). While his singles upheld the company tradition of hook-happy radio fare, they distinguished themselves with such socially conscious subjects as ghetto hardship and political disenfranchisement, especially in evidence in "Living for the City" (#8, 1973). His albums, beginning with Music of My Mind (#21, 1972), on which he played most of the instruments, were devoted to his more exotic musical ideas (which incorporated gospel, rock & roll, jazz, and African and Latin rhythms). To his panoply of instruments, he added synthesizers; played with rare invention and funk, they became the signature of his sound.

Wonder's 1972 tour of the United States with the Rolling Stones helped make #1 hits of two singles released within the next year—"Superstition" (written for Jeff Beck) and "You Are the Sunshine of My Life"—from Talking Book (#3, 1972). The period was difficult personally for Wonder. In 1972 his marriage to Wright ended after only a year (later, with companion Yolanda Simmons, he had two children, as well as a third child by vocalist Melody McCulley). In 1973 he was in a serious car crash that left him in a coma for four days.

In the four years and three albums following Talking Book, Wonder made three more #1 singles ("You Haven't Done Nothin'," "I Wish," and "Sir Duke"), sold millions of each, and received 15 Grammy Awards. Innervisions (#4, 1973) also included "Higher Ground" (#4, 1973), while Fulfillingness' First Finale (#1, 1974) yielded "Boogie On Reggae Woman" (#3, 1974). His songs were covered widely, and he was an acknowledged influence on musicians from Jeff Beck to George Benson to Bob Marley Working with B.B. King, the Jacksons, the Supremes, Minnie Riperton, Rufus, and Syreeta Wright, he established himself as a major songwriter and producer. Songs in the Key of Life (#1, 1976) (a double album released after he had signed a $13-million contract with Motown) was a tour de force and topped the charts for 14 weeks.

Journey Through the Secret Life of Plants (#4, 1979) three years in the making, was ostensibly the soundtrack to an unreleased film of the same name. Predominantly instrumental, it failed to catch on in a big way at the time but can be seen as a precursor to New Age music. Hotter Than July (#3, 1980) returned to the street-dancing spirit of earlier periods (updated in contemporary idioms such as reggae and rap). It yielded "Master Blaster (Jammin')" (#5, 1980) and Wonder's plea for an international holiday in memory of Martin Luther King Jr., "Happy Birthday." In 1982 fans still waiting for an album of new material were placated with hit singles: "That Girl" (#4), "Do I Do" (#13), "Ebony and Ivory" (#1)—a duet with Paul McCartney—and the greatest-hits package Musi-quanium (#4, 1982).

The '80s saw Wonder drastically curtailing studio work but continuing to tour (by the end of the decade becoming Motown's first artist to play the Eastern bloc). In 1982, with Bob Dylan and Jackson Browne, he played the "Peace Sunday" antinuclear rally at the Rose Bowl. In 1984 Detroit gave him the key to the city (he later considered a run for mayor of Detroit), and he played harmonica on Elton John's "I Guess That's Why They Call It the Blues." Participating in the recording of USA for Africa's "We Are the World" in 1985, he won that year's Oscar for Best Song for "I Just Called to Say I Love You," (#1, 1984) off The Woman in Red (#4, 1984) soundtrack. Dedicating the award to Nelson Mandela, he angered South African radio stations, which then banned all his music.

"Part-Time Lover" (#1, 1985) became the first single simultaneously to top the pop, R&B, Adult Contemporary, and dance/disco charts: its parent album, In Square Circle, reached #5 and won the Grammy for Best R&B Male Vocal Performance. Singing with Elton John and Gladys Knight on Dionne Warwick's "That's What Friends Are For" (#1, 1986) gained Wonder another hit, but, deemed relatively lightweight, neither Characters (#17, 1987) nor the soundtrack for Spike Lee's Jungle Fever (#24, 1991) were greeted with the almost universal acclaim his '70s work had generated.

In 1988 duets with Michael Jackson ("Get It") and Julio Iglesias ("My Love") kept Wonder's name before the public. And, inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1989 and earning a Lifetime Achievement Grammy, Stevie Wonder continued to enjoy an ultimately unassailable critical reputation even while his recording output was slender. In 1995, four years after receiving the Nelson Mandela Courage Award, he released Conversation Peace, an intended epic he'd been working on since the late '80s. Critics greeted the 74-minute long work with mixed reviews but were heartened by his return to recording after an eight-year absence. In 1999 Wonder performed at the half-time show for Super Bowl XXXIII and was among the recipients of the Kennedy Center Honors. He also made a rare hour-long appearance on Donny & Marie, where he performed a number of his hits, mostly accompanying himself on keyboards.

Wonder's extensive humanitarian work has concentrated on AIDS awareness; antiapartheid efforts; crusades against drunk driving and drug abuse; and fund-raising for blind and retarded children and the homeless.

World Party

Formed 1986, London, Eng.

Karl Wallinger (b. Oct. 19, 1957, Prestatyn, Wales), voc., kybds., various instr.

1986—Private Revolution (Chrysalis) 1990—Goodbye Jumbo

1991—Thank You World EP 1993—(+ Dave Caitlin-Birch, gtr.; + Chris Sharrock, drums) Bang! (—Caitlin-Birch) 1997—

Egyptology (the Enclave) 2000—Dumbing Up (Papillon, U.K.).

Former Waterboys keyboardist Karl Wallinger formed World Party essentially as a solo act, writing and singing all of the songs, arranging and playing most of the instruments, recording and producing himself in his home studio, and generally establishing the "band" as a vehicle for his singular musical vision. A true child of the '60s, Wallinger adapted his infatuation with the Beatles, Jimi Hendrix, and other pop geniuses of that era to fresh, often stunning melodies (accompanied by socially astute lyrics), shimmering guitar-pop textures, and buoyant, often funky rhythms. While this somewhat nostalgic formula engendered much acclaim, World Party's commercial performance generally failed to match its critical success.

Predictably, it was a desire for more creative control that led to Wallinger, once the musical director of the London production of The Rocky Horror Picture Show, leaving the Waterboys [see entry]—for all intents and purposes Mike Scott's band—after the release of 1985's This Is the Sea, although a song he cowrote entitled "World Party" appeared on that group's 1988 album, Fisherman's Blues. In 1987 his first World Party single, the ominous, environmentally conscious "Ship of Fools," went to #27 on the singles chart, becoming the act's biggest hit to date. Its debut album, Private Revolution, reached #39, also in 1987. Goodbye Jumbo also had its share of ecological references and warnings—and featured a guest vocal by rising star Sinéad O'Connor (as well as appearances by Waterboys Steve Wickham and Anthony Thistlethwaite)—but didn't spawn a Top 40 single, although the track "Way Down Now" was popular in new-wave dance clubs. The album peaked at #73. In promoting Jumbo Wallinger toured with two British musicians, guitarist Dave Caitlin-Birch, who had played Paul McCartney in The Bootleg Beatles (the British version of the stage show Beatlemania) and onetime Lightning Seeds drummer Chris Sharrock, who became Wallinger's core support team, collaborating with him on World Party's next album. (The touring band also included synth player Max Edie, keyboardists Guy Chambers and Ken Campbell, and guitarist Steve McKewan.) That album, Bang!, was released in 1993 and reached #2 in the U.K. In the States, however, it only made #126.

Wallinger broke out of his reclusive recording ways in 1994 to act as musical director for the movie Reality Bites; he scored the soundtrack to Clueless a year later. He released the thoughtful Egyptology, featuring Sharrock on drums, in 1997, and he and his touring band went on the road. Dumb-ing Up was released in England in 2000.

Link Wray

With Robert Gordon: 1977—Robert Gordon With Link Wray (Private Stock) 1978—Fresh Fish Special.

One of the most influential rock guitarists of the '50s, Link Wray introduced the distorted fuzz-tone guitar sound on his million-selling single "Rumble." For that tune, Wray and his band the Wraymen wanted to approximate the effect of a brawl that took place in a dancehall where they were performing. Wray punctured the speaker in his amplifier with a pencil, which added the crackling, burry fuzz-tone sound to a brooding, ominous mid-tempo riff, anticipating heavy metal by more than a decade.

Wray, who is part Native American, learned bottle-neck guitar as a youth, after moving with family to Arizona. He formed a country band in his late teens with his brothers Doug and Vernon (who sometimes sang under the name Ray Vernon), playing bars, juke joints, and brothels under the name Lucky Wray and the Lazy Pine Wranglers, later the Palomino Ranch Hands. After returning from the Korean War, where he lost a lung to tuberculosis, Wray was advised not to sing. Soon the group became a trio—Wray, Doug Wray on drums, and Shorty Horton on bass, with Vernon Wray producing and occasionally playing rhythm guitar and piano on a few tracks—the Ray Men.

In 1954 Wray recorded "Rumble," cowritten by Wray and local DJ Milt Grant; by 1958 it had sold over a million copies, and it reached #16 that year. By that time Wray had also played on sessions backing his brother Vernon and with Fats Domino and Rick Nelson on Milt Grant's Washington, DC, TV show. In 1959 Wray had another instrumental hit with the rockabilly-style "Raw-Hide" (#23, 1959). Several similar followups failed to hit, however, and by the mid-'60s Wray had retired to a family farm commune in Maryland, where he built a 3-track studio in a shed, playing live only occasionally in local bars. He recorded in his shed quite often, though; word has it that when his backup musicians could not afford drums, Wray had them stomp on the floor and rattle pots, pans, and beer cans instead. Many of Wray's 3-track recordings were issued on the 1971 Link Wray, a critically acclaimed LP that sold little and was largely made possible by the acclaim Wray had garnered from rock stars like Pete Townshend of the Who, Jeff Beck and Bob Dylan, and the Kinks.

Wray followed the 1971 LP with several more unsuccessful albums. In 1977 he began working with singer Robert Gordon [see entry], but they parted company a year later, after recording Fresh Fish Special. In 1979 Wray recorded Bullshot, which was unspectacularly received. Wray has since moved to an island off the coast of Denmark. The 1993 Rhino best-of compiles 20 tracks from the several labels for which he recorded. In 1997 Wray played his first American gigs in 12 years and began performing more frequently in North America. His latest studio releases, Shadowman and Barbed Wire, are louder and rawer than ever. "Rumble" was used in the '90s films Pulp Fiction and Independence Day.

Betty Wright

Born Dec. 21, 1953, Miami, FL

1968—My First Time Around (Atco) 1972—I Love the Way You Love (Alston) 1973—Hard to Stop 1974—Danger: High Voltage 1976—Explosion! 1977—This Time for Real 1978—Live 1979—Betty Travelin' in the Wright Circle 1981—Betty Wright (Epic) 1986—Sevens (First String) 1988—Mother Wit (Ms. B) 1989—4U2NJOY 1992—The Best of Betty Wright (Rhino) 1994—B-Attitudes (Ms. B.).

Betty Wright's fiery soul vocals made her a strong presence on Miami's black music scene of the '70s. She continued to make regular appearances on the R&B chart through the late '80s.

Wright started as a gospel singer with her family group, Echoes of Joy. She turned to R&B at age 13, after being discovered singing along to Billy Stewart's "Summertime" by songwriter/producers Willie Clarke and Clarence Reid. They recorded "Paralyzed," which got some local attention. Two years later, at 14, her "Girls Can't Do What the Guys Do" (#33 pop, #15 R&B) began an association with Miami's T.K. Records stable (including the Alston label) that would continue until that company's demise in the late '70s.

Wright was 18 when her spunky late 1971 hit "Clean Up Woman" (#6 pop, #2 R&B) was certified gold. Her other hits included "Baby Sitter" (#46 pop, #6 R&B, 1972), "Let Me Be Your Lovemaker" (#10 R&B, 1973), and "Where Is the Love" (#15 R&B, 1975), which won a Grammy. In addition to cowriting many of her hits (including the three listed above), she also contributed background vocals to T.K. disco hits by KC and the Sunshine Band and Peter Brown in the '70s.

In 1981 Wright moved to Epic; her first album there included "What Are You Going to Do With It," a collaboration between Wright and Stevie Wonder. Later that summer, she contributed the feisty rap to Richard "Dimples" Fields's "She's Got Papers on Me" that helped make it a major R&B hit. Her second and last Epic album was produced by Marlon Jackson. She then recorded for the independent First String without success before starting her own Ms. B label. Her last two major R&B chart entries were "No Pain, No Gain" (#14 R&B, 1988) and "From Pain to Joy" (#39 R&B, 1989). She remains musically active, often as a guest vocalist or producer.

Gary Wright

Born Apr. 26, 1943, Creskill, NJ
 1970—Extraction (A&M) 1971—Foot Print 1972—Ring of Changes (with Wonderwheel) 1975—The Dream Weaver (Warner Bros.); Light of Smiles 1977—Touch and Gone 1979—Headin' Home 1981—The Right Place 1988—Who I Am 1995—First Signs of Life (Worldly) 2000—Human Love (Orchard).

Gary Wright, ex-Spooky Tooth member and successful late-'70s solo act, started out as a child actor, debuting on the Captain Video TV show in New York at age seven. He also appeared in TV and radio commercials and in the Broadway play Fanny, all the while studying piano and organ. He joined various high school rock bands, went to college to study psychology in New York and then to Berlin, Germany.

In Europe, Wright met Mike Harrison, and the two began performing together, leading to the formation of Spooky Tooth [see entry]. When Spooky Tooth temporarily disbanded in 1970, Wright turned to a solo career, forming the band Wonderwheel. His solo work attracted little attention, though, and in 1973 he returned to the re-formed Spooky Tooth. When the band broke up for good in 1974, Wright again embarked on solo ventures, this time with much more success.

The mellow synthesizer-dominated Dream Weaver yielded #2 hit singles in the title tune and "My Love Is Alive," and the LP went platinum. No more hit singles were forthcoming, but Wright's subsequent albums won heavy airplay on FM radio. "Dream Weaver" was revived for a new generation, thanks to its inclusion in Wayne's World. Subsequent albums, filled with Wright's proto-New Age lyrics, proved less successful. Only The Light of Smiles (#23, 1977) and The Right Place, which featured Wright's last hit single, "Really Wanna Know You" (#16, 1981) were popular.

O.V. Wright

Born Overton Vertis Wright, Oct. 9, 1939, Leno, TN; died Nov. 16, 1980
 1965—O.V. Wright (Backbeat) 1966—Nucleus of Soul 1970—Ace of Spades 1971—A Nickel and a Nail 1973—Memphis Unlimited 1975—Into Something I Can't Shake (Hi) 1978—The Bottom Line 1992—The Soul of O.V. Wright (Duke/Peacock).

A Memphis soul singer with a dark and moody voice, Wright never attained the level of success some critics believe he deserved. Like many soul singers, he began singing gospel in church as a child. He led a group called the Five Harmonaires, then joined such better known assemblages as the Sunset Travellers, the Spirit of Memphis Quartet, and the Highway Q.C.'s. He and Roosevelt Jamison cowrote "That's How Strong My Love Is," which Wright recorded. His commercial frustrations began in 1965, when Otis Redding's version hit before Wright's did.

Wright did have several R&B hits of his own, including "You're Gonna Make Me Cry" (#6 R&B, 1965), "Eight Men, Four Women" (#4 R&B, 1967), "Ace of Spade" (#11 R&B, 1970), "A Nickel and a Nail" (#19 R&B, 1971), and "I'd Rather Be Blind, Crippled and Crazy" (#33 R&B, 1973). But despite high critical praise and the chilling quality of songs like "Ace of Spade," popular acclaim eluded Wright. Although he continued to record through the '70s, he also suffered from drug abuse, which precipitated a fatal heart attack at age 41.

Syreeta Wright

Born Rita Wright, Pittsburgh, PA
 1972—Syreeta (Mowest) 1974—Stevie Wonder Presents Syreeta 1977—One to One (Tamla); Rich Love, Poor Love (with G. C. Cameron) (Motown) 1980—Syreeta (Tamla) 1981—Billy Preston and Syreeta (with Billy Preston) (Motown) 1981—Set My Love in Motion (Tamla) 1983—The Spell.

As a performer, Syreeta Wright has had only one major hit, a duet with Billy Preston on "With You I'm Born Again" (#4 pop) in 1980. But as a writer she contributed to a number of artists, most significantly to her ex-husband, Stevie Wonder.

She cut a single, "Can't Give Back the Love I Feel for You," in 1968. After it flopped, she worked as a Motown secretary and occasional background singer. She met Wonder and began songwriting as a result. She is the cowriter of such Wonder hits as "Signed, Sealed, Delivered" and "If You Really Love Me." In early 1970, Berry Gordy Jr. wanted Wright to replace Diana Ross in the Supremes, but Mary Wilson refused. Wonder produced Syreeta's first two albums, Syreeta and Stevie Wonder Presents Syreeta. She married Wonder on September 14, 1970; they divorced 18 months later.

During that period, Wonder first sought and achieved artistic independence from Motown, with one result being some of the most acclaimed work of his career. Wright cowrote songs on Wonder's Music of My Mind, The Secret Life of Plants, and Talking Book. On the latter she cowrote "Blame It on the Sun" and "Lookin' for Another Pure Love." She continued recording for Motown, but with virtually no chart success until her duet with Billy Preston, "With You I'm Born Again" (#4, 1980). The Spell, produced by Jermaine Jackson, did not improve her fortunes, and shortly thereafter she retired from performing. In the late '80s she began recording again for the British Motorcity label. She appeared on Broadway in a 1995 revival of Jesus Christ Superstar in the role of Mary Magdalene.

The Wu-Tang Clan established a hip-hop empire with street poetics, kung fu mythology, ingenious production and entrepreneurial savvy. The outfit's rugged beats and top-notch MCing have taken the two-turntables-and-a-mike foundation of hip-hop to its grimmest, and arguably most artistic extreme.

A collective of relatives and close friends, the Wu-Tang Clan has its roots in the hostile housing projects of Staten Island, New York (also referred to as Shaolin in Wu lore). Cousins RZA and GZA, the Wu-Tang Clan's forefathers, began collaborating as early as 1976—when RZA was eight years old. As break dancing and freestyle circles sprang up all over New York City, RZA and GZA began writing rhymes and challenging other MCs to battle. During junior high school, RZA befriended Ghostface Killah, U-God, Ol' Dirty Bastard, Method Man, and Raekwon. In 1987, while selling marijuana, RZA purchased a 4-track and began moonlighting as a producer.

Around the time RZA was on trial for attempted murder (in 1992 he was acquitted on the grounds of self-defense), the Wu-Tang Clan recorded its first single "Protect Ya Neck."

The group members sold the single to local record stores and radio stations, and it became an underground success. Loud Records soon signed the Wu-Tang Clan to a deal that gave the group members creative control and the freedom to negotiate solo projects with other labels. In 1993 Loud released Enter the Wu-Tang (36 Chambers) (#41 pop, #8 R&B), a ghetto narrative filled with martial-arts metaphysics and cryptic instrumentation. Songs like "C.R.E.A.M." (#60 pop, #32 R&B, 1994) and "Can It Be All So Simple" (#82 R&B, 1994) introduced RZA's knack for juxtaposing beats, poignant subject matter, and street vernacular. The video for "Da Mystery of Chessboxin'," depicting hooded swordsmen in black and white masks dueling on a giant chessboard, received frequent airplay on BET's Rap City and illustrated the group's mystic philosophies.

In 1994 Method Man's Tical (#4 pop, #1 R&B) began a series of Wu solo projects. Tical, named after the Wu's slang term for marijuana, spawned the chart-topping remix of "I'll Be There for You/You're All I Need to Get By" (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1995), a cover of the two Ashford and Simpson classics featuring vocals by Mary J. Blige. Method Man followed up his debut with the equally successful Tical 2000: Judgement Day (#2 pop, #1 R&B, 1998) and Blackout! (#3 pop, #1 R&B, 1999), the latter a project with buddy Redman. The following Wu solo efforts, mostly produced or coproduced by RZA, also achieved both commercial and critical acclaim: Raekwon's Only Built 4 Cuban Linx . . . (#4 pop, #2 R&B, 1995) and Immobility (#9 pop, #2 R&B, 1999); Ol' Dirty Bastard's Return to the 36 Chambers: The Dirty Version (#7 pop, #2 R&B, 1995) and Nigga Please (#10 pop, #2 R&B, 1999); GZA's Liquid Swords (#9 pop, #2 R&B, 1995) and Beneath the Surface (#9 pop, #1 R&B, 1999); Ghostface Killah's Ironman (#2 pop, #2 R&B, 1996) and Supreme Clientele (#7 pop, #2 R&B, 2000); RZA's RZA as Bobby Digital in Stereo (#16 pop, #3 R&B, 1998); Inspectah Deck's Uncontrolled Substance (#19 pop, #3 R&B, 1999); and U-God's Golden Arms Redemption (#58 pop, #15 R&B, 1999). RZA also produced Wu offshoots like Shyheim, GP Wu, Killah Priest, Sunz of Man, Cappadonna, Killarmy, and LA the Darkman, and recorded two albums as a producer/member of the group Gravediggaz.

Amidst all of the prosperity, certain Wu members found themselves in legal trouble. In 1999 Ghostface Killah was sentenced to four to six months in prison for charges stemming from an assault and robbery incident. Ol' Dirty Bastard, who temporarily gave himself the pseudonym Big Baby Jesus, was arrested twice in 1998, once for threatening to kill his ex-girlfriend and once for threatening security guards at a blues club. In January 1999 ODB was arrested for opening fire on police officers (a few weeks later a Brooklyn grand jury declined to indict him), and in March of the same year was arrested for possession of crack cocaine. In November 2000 ODB fled a court-mandated stay at a Pasadena, California, rehab center and was found by law enforcement a few weeks later outside a McDonald's in Philadelphia. In April 2001 he pleaded guilty to the drug charge and faced a two-to-four-year jail term. (In light of the plea, the court ignored his flight from the rehab center.)

Despite all of the legal strife and solo achievements, the Wu-Tang brotherhood remained a unit and recorded two more group albums: Wu-Tang Forever (#1 pop, #1 R&B, 1997) and 2000's The W (#5 pop, #1 R&B). In 1995 the Wu-Tang Clan launched the lucrative Wu Wear clothing line, and three years later created the video game Shaolin Style. In 2000 RZA produced the score to and made a cameo appearance in Jim Jarmusch's Ghost Dog, a film about a black samurai who works as a Mafia hitman.

Tammy Wynette

Born Virginia Wynette Pugh, May 5, 1942, Itawamba County, MS; died Apr. 6, 1998, Nashville, TN

1967—Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad (Epic) 1968—D-I-V-O-R-C-E 1969—Stand by Your Man 1970—The First Lady 1973—First Songs of the First Lady 1978—Womanhood 1980—Only Lonely Sometimes 1981—You Brought Me Back 1987—Higher Ground 1988—Anniversary: 20 Years of Hits 1989—Next to You 1990—Heart Over Mind 1992—Tears of Fire: The 25th Anniversary Collection 1995—One (with George Jones) (MCA). With Dolly Parton and Loretta Lynn: 1993—Honky Tonk Angels (Columbia).

Tammy Wynette, whose incredible chart success was matched only by the tumultuous nature of her personal life, is a country music archetype. Between 1967 and 1979 Wynette had 29 Top 10 country hits—20 of which went to #1—and had already been married five times.

Raised by her grandparents on their farm, Wynette paid for music lessons by working the cotton fields. At 17 she married and quickly had three children, one of whom was stricken by spinal meningitis; by 20, she was divorced.

Her dreams of becoming a professional musician put on hold, Wynette got a job as a hairdresser in Birmingham, Alabama. With the tenacity and determination that had served her well throughout her career, Wynette eventually broke into the music industry as a background singer, first on a local TV program, and later on C&W singer Porter Wagoner's TV show. Wynette began making forays into Nashville and in 1967 met producer Billy Sherrill. Their first single together landed on the country charts, "Apartment Number Nine" (#44 C&W, 1966); their next single, 1967's "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad," became a #3 C&W hit.

Two #1 hits quickly followed: "My Elusive Dreams" (with David Houston) and "I Don't Wanna Play House." The year 1968 saw the release of Wynette's classics "D-I-V-O-R-C-E" and "Stand by Your Man," both #1 C&W hits. "Stand by Your Man" (#19 pop) sold more than 2 million copies and became the biggest-selling record by a female singer in country music history. Wynette's recording persona as the long-suffering but loyal wife and mother was now established, and her subsequent hits over the next decade centered around that theme.

In 1968 Wynette married country superstar George Jones. With three #1 hits, the couple had better success as a recording duet than they did as husband and wife; Jones's drinking strained the relationship (he is said to have once chased Wynette around their house with a rifle), causing them to divorce by 1975. They continued to record together, however, with "Golden Ring" and "Near You," hitting #1 on the country chart a year after their separation.

Wynette's chart-topping streak continued throughout the '70s and into the early '80s. Meanwhile, the vicissitudes of her private life were making tabloid headlines: a relationship with Burt Reynolds; a fourth marriage that lasted 44 days; 17 major operations; a fifth marriage; a kidnapping attempt that may have been a publicity stunt, a stint in 1986 at the Betty Ford Clinic to wean her off painkillers, public repudiation by her children; even a minor involvement in the '80s savings and loan scandal.

In 1992 Wynette was back in the national spotlight. "Justified and Ancient"—her collaboration with eccentric Scottish rave act, the KLF—became a freak hit in the U.S. and Britain, giving Wynette her biggest pop success since "Stand by Your Man." Another incident had wider ramifications. In an attempt to publicly defend her husband, then presidential nominee Bill Clinton, against charges of infidelity, Hillary Clinton stated on the news program 60 Minutes that, "I'm not sitting here like some little woman standing by her man like Tammy Wynette." The country icon demanded a public apology and received one two days later. She teamed with Dolly Parton and Loretta Lynn to record Honky Tonk Angels (#6 C&W) in 1993, which spawned the minor hit single "Silver Threads and Golden Needles" (#68 C&W). She also turned in an appearance on Elton John's Duets album the same year.

In 1995 Wynette reunited with Jones for the album One

Tammy Wynette

(#117 pop, #12 C&W) and their first performances together in over a decade. The album would be her last, three years later. Wynette died in her sleep at the age of 55. Wynette's final recording, a cover of the Beach Boys' "In My Room" featuring Brian Wilson, surfaced on the tribute album Tammy Wynette . . . Remembered (Asylum, 1998). The album featured a host of high-profile artists (including Elton John), but it was quickly overshadowed by a controversial lawsuit concerning the exact cause of Wynette's death. Although her physician determined that Wynette had died of blood clots, and 10 months later the medical examiner disclosed that she had had a terminal illness, three of her daughters filed a wrongful death lawsuit against the doctor and her fifth husband (and manager), George Richey. Wynette had been in poor health for years (including chronic abdominal problems), but her daughters argued that Richey and the physician had enabled their mother's addiction to painkillers and questioned why she was not admitted to a hospital before her death. An autopsy performed a year later determined that Wynette had died of natural causes, but her daughters persisted with their crusade, eventually dropping Richey from the suit but replacing him with the pharmacy that filled her prescriptions. As of this writing, the case remained a subject of hot debate—and considerable sadness—in Nashville.

X emerged from the L.A. punk scene as the most critically lauded American band of the early '80s. X helped to vindicate the West Coast scene, which had lagged behind New York and London's early punk and new-wave movements. But while X's music then was properly labeled as punk, the music and lyrics were more sophisticated than the hardcore sound that would later define the genre. And for all the speed and thrust of their playing, X claims roots in rockabilly and old-time country music, which echoes in the vocal harmonies of John Doe and Exene.

The band began in 1977, when John Doe and Billy Zoom met through classified ads in a local publication. Doe's family had moved all around America when he was growing up, and he settled in L.A. in 1976. Zoom had played guitar and sax with Gene Vincent for a while in the '70s and also fronted his own rockabilly band, who had cut several songs. Exene first met Doe at a poetry workshop in Venice, California, and the two soon became lovers and bandmates. The couple, who later married and divorced, also write all the band's lyrics. With D.J. Bonebrake, they began playing at the Masque, Hollywood's seminal punk club. A local following grew quickly, and in 1979, after seeing a performance at the Whisky, ex-Door Ray Manzarek became their producer.

The band's debut LP, Los Angeles, out on local Slash Records in 1980, sold over 60,000 copies, an incredible number for a small label, and 1981's Wild Gift also eventually sold well. In L.A., they were considered superstars. Their music touched on rockabilly, heavy metal, punk, and country, plus a bit of the Doors with Manzarek's organ and their sped-up version of the Doors' "Soul Kitchen." Both records were highlighted by Exene and Doe's minor-key vocal harmonies and by the incisive lyrics. Both LPs topped critics' year-end best-of lists, and in 1981 the band was also featured in two concert films: Penelope Spheeris' punk documentary The Decline of Western Civilization and Urh! A Music War. In 1981 the band signed with Elektra, which released its third LP, Under the Big Black Sun.

Exene continued her work in poetry, doing spoken-word performances, writing a 1982 book of poetry with Lydia Lunch for Grove Press called Adulterers Anonymous; and recording a spoken-word album, Twin Sisters, with poet Wanda Coleman. John Doe began a side career as an actor, appearing in Border Radio (1987), Slamdance (1987), Great Balls of Fire! (1989), and 1992's Roadside Prophets (which costarred Beastie Boy Adam Horowitz). Exene starred in the 1987 film Salvation! And in the mid-'80s, Doe and Exene formed the country-folk acoustic band the Knitters, with Blaster Dave Alvin on guitar, for one album, Poor Little Critter on the Road (1985), and live performances. However, X itself was about to go through a period of upheaval. Six months before the release of X's next album, Doe and Exene divorced, though they have remained close friends. After 1985's metal-leaning, critically panned Ain't Love Grand, Zoom left and eventually quit live performing. He was replaced by guitarists Alvin and Tony Gilkyson. Shortly after recording See How We Are (which included the Alvin-penned "4th of July"), Alvin left for a solo career. Both Doe and Exene embarked on solo careers as X began the first of several periods of hiatus. Gilkyson collaborated with Exene on the rootsy Old Wives' Tales and Running Sacred.

In 1990 X (with Gilkyson) began performing again and three years later released Hey Zeus! on a new label, Mercury, and undertook a national tour. Though critically well-received, the band failed to garner much commercial success. Exene continued concentrating on poetry, releasing in 1995 the spoken-word album Surface to Air Serpents on Henry Rollins' 2.13.61 label; Doe's second album, Kissingso- hard, was issued by Rhino the same year. Unclogged featured live acoustic versions of 15 years' worth of X songs. Just as the band became active again, Gilkyson quit and X broke up. Doe began focusing more on his acting career, appearing in Georgia (1996) and Boogie Nights (1997). Playing guitar, Exene formed the punk band Auntie Chrst with Bonebrake and Rancid bassist Matt Freeman, releasing Life Could Be a Dream in 1997. That same year Elektra issued Beyond and Back: The X Anthology, a collection of album tracks, live recordings, and outtakes. Renewed interest in X ultimately led to a reunion with Zoom for several sold-out live shows in 1998. The reunited quartet continued to perform sporadically and recorded (with producer Manzarek) the Doors' "Crystal Ship" for the film soundtrack of The X-Files: Fight the Future (1998). The same year Doe released an EP, For the Rest of Us, which included "This Loving Thing," a collaboration with Foo Fighter Dave Grohl. Freedom Is... followed in 2000. In 2001 Zoom (a born-again Christian since the late '70s) was working on a gospel album. He also operates Billy Zoom Music, specializing in amplifier design and repair.

X-Ray Spex

Formed 1977, London, Eng.

Poly Styrene (b. Marion Elliot, ca. 1962, London), voc.; Lora Logic (b. Susan Whitby, ca. 1961, London), sax; Jak Airport (b. Jack Stafford), gtr.; Paul Dean, bass; Chris Chrysler (b. B.P. Hurding), drums.

1978—(- Logic; + Rudi Thompson [b. Steven Rudan], sax) Germ Free Adolescents (Blue Plate/EMI) (- Rudan; + Glyn Johns, sax).

X-Ray Spex was one of the few bands in British punk rock's first wave with a memorable female vocalist, in Poly Styrene, who wore exotic clothing and braces on her teeth. Its other female member, saxophonist Lora Logic, would leave before the band made its only album, to lead her own group, Essential Logic.

X-Ray Spex's first hit was 1977's "Oh Bondage Up Yours!"—a sort of women's lib anthem mixing anguish and wit, which opened memorably with Styrene cooing, "Some people think little girls should be seen and not heard," before screaming out the title. Subsequent singles "The Day the World Turned Dayglo" and "Identity" critiqued the conformity of consumer culture. A year after "Bondage," X-Ray Spex released its only album, Germ Free Adolescents, with a title single that was much more polished, melodic, and mellow than "Bondage."

Two months after the album's release, Styrene broke up the band, reportedly claiming to have suffered a nervous breakdown after seeing a UFO. She later joined the Krishna Consciousness movement. X-Ray Spex released one posthumous single, "Highly Inflammable" b/w "Warrior in Woolworths." Styrene left the music business, but returned in 1980, under her given name of Manion Elliot, with the tropically inflected solo album Translucence. She released the EP Gods and Goddesses in 1986, to little notice. X-Ray Spex reunited in fall 1991 for a "punk nostalgia night" at London's Brixton Academy, also featuring Sham 69, Chelsea, 999, U.K. Subs, and the Lurkers. Another reunion, along with Lora Logic, took place in late 1996, minus Styrene.

Andy Partridge (b. Dec. 11, 1953, Swindon), gtr., voc., synth.; Colin Moulding (b. Aug. 17, 1955, Swindon), bass, voc.; Terry Chambers (b. July 18, 1955, Swindon), drums; John Perkins (b. Eng.), kybds.; —Perkins; + Barry Andrews (b. Sep. 12, 1956, London, Eng.), kybds.

I* (TVT) 2000—Wasp Star, Apple Venus vol. II.

As Dukes of Stratosphear: 1985—25 O'Clock EP (Virgin, U.K.)

1987—Psonic Psonspot (Geffen); Chips From the Chocolate Fireball.

Though never earning them sales success, XTC's fastidiously crafted art pop, characterized by innovative rhythms, highly literate lyrics, and sophisticated melodic twists, has provoked critical comparisons to the Beatles and gained them a fanatic cult following.

In 1973 they were known as the Helium Kidz, a New York Dolls-type glitter band that played straightahead rock & roll in their bucolic hometown of Swindon, some 70 miles out of London. The group included XTC's later leader, Andy Partridge, plus second writer Colin Moulding and drummer Terry Chambers. In 1976 they became XTC and reorganized around Partridge's songs—material influenced by the Beatles, Small Faces, and Captain Beefheart.

The band then included John Perkins on keyboards, who was replaced by Barry Andrews (ex-King Crimson) before the foursome recorded their debut, White Music. That album, regarded at the time as part of the new wave onslaught, was initially released in England only, as was 1978's Go 2. The 1979 U.S. debut, Drums and Wires, featured the wry humor of "Making Plans for Nigel." By that album's release, Andrews had left; he later joined Robert Fripp's League of Gentlemen and cofounded Shnekback with Dave Allen of Gang of Four. He was replaced by Dave Gregory.

In late 1980 Black Sea entered the U.S. Top 50. Echoing the elegiac Kinks, it was less frenetic than earlier XTC but featured their usual jolting rhythms and strangely perched hooks plus several songs about war. English Settlement got rave reviews but didn't sell in America. Faring better in England, it yielded the band's biggest success in "Senses Working Overtime" (#10 U.K., 1982). A double LP in Britain, it had four songs not included on the U.S. edition. The band began a spring U.S. tour, but having collapsed from exhaustion on-stage in Paris earlier that year, Partridge then suffered a nervous breakdown in California due to intense stage fright. XTC canceled the tour; Partridge spent the next year as a virtual shut-in, and the group ceased playing live. Chambers then left, and the remaining trio decided to use session drummers from then on.

Mummer and Big Express received the usual fine reviews, and a breakthrough came with 1986's Skylarking. Produced to Partridge's initial frustration, by Todd Rundgren, it gained XTC new American listeners when "Dear God," an agnostic anthem originally left off the album, was discovered by a college-radio DJ. Oranges & Lemons, 1989's #1 college-radio album of the year, featured a single that finally entered the Top 100 ("The Mayor of Simpleton," #72, 1989)—this despite Partridge's sparring with producer Paul Fox. And while a talent scout for XTC's British label at first rejected almost all of the 32 songs submitted for Nonsuch, the band stuck to its guns and again placed at #1 on the college charts.

During the '80s, XTC also fashioned its own alter ego in the Dukes of Stratosphear, releasing clever (at times even hilarious) pseudo-psychedelia that harks back to their primary models. In 1985 the Dukes' 25 O'Clock sold twice as well as XTC's Big Express (1984). Psonic Psonspot and the compilation Chips From the Chocolate Fireball continued the expert homage/spoof. In addition, Partridge has produced for the Mission U.K., Lilac Time, and other bands and, epitomizing genial English eccentricity, as a hobby has amassed regiments of toy soldiers.

XTC are notorious for their discomfort with the music industry, preferring to concentrate on the music itself. They spent the last half of the '80s in litigation against a former manager, and the bulk of the '90s on recording strike from their record company. By the time they finally found a way out of their contract (yielding a greatest-hits set, Upsy Daisy Assortment, in 1997), the group had written enough material for two new albums, Apple Venus Volume I and Wasp Star, Apple Venus Volume II, both of which were released by the indie label TVT Records.

With Apple Venus Volume I, XTC abandoned their traditional sound in favor of lushly orchestrated acoustic songs. Gregory left during the recording of the album for want of more opportunity to play guitar. The album garnered rave reviews, however, and long-suffering XTC fans were rewarded for their patience with the return to form Wasp Star, Apple Venus Volume II, which followed a year later.

“Weird Al” Yankovic

Born Alfred Matthew Yankovic, Oct. 23, 1959, Lynwood, CA
1983—“Weird Al” Yankovic (Rock ‘n’ Roll) 1984—“Weird Al” Yankovic in 3-D 1985—Dare to Be Stupid 1986—Polka Party! 1988—Even Worse 1989—UHF/Original Motion Picture Soundtrack and Other Stuff 1991—“Weird” Al Yankovic’s Greatest Hits 1992—Off the Deep End (Scotti Bros.) 1993—Alapalooza 1994—Permanent Record—Al in the Box (Way Moby/Volcano) 1996—Bad Hair Day (Scotti Bros.) 1999—Running With Scissors (Volcano).

A musical parodist in the broad, juvenile yet clever tradition of Mad magazine, “Weird Al” Yankovic is known for adding his own gently satirical lyrics to current hit songs. His shaggy, handgog appearance, affection for slapstick, and amiable willingness to do seemingly anything for a laugh made him a natural for videos. His burlesques of the form and its artistes—especially of Michael Jackson in “Eat It” (from “Beat It”) (#12, 1983) and “Fat” (from “Bad”) (#99, 1988)—became MTV staples. His medleys of rock tunes given the polka treatment inspired rumors—untrue—that Yankovic was a member of the singing Yankovic family, who made polka and Western swing records in the 1940s. Regardless of his heritage, Yankovic is undoubtedly the most successful comedy recording artist, with more than 11 million albums sold.

Yankovic, a high school valedictorian and architecture student, got his start in 1979, when he sent his “My Bologna”—a parody of the Knack’s “My Sharona”—to Dr.

Demento, a syndicated radio host specializing in novelty songs and curiosities. Recorded in a bathroom across the hall from his college radio station with only his accordion and vocal, the song was popular enough with Demento’s audience for Capitol (the Knack’s label) to release it as a single. His next parody, “Another One Rides the Bus” (based on Queen’s “Another One Bites the Dust”), became the most requested song in the first decade of the Dr. Demento show.

Yankovic signed with Rock ‘n’ Roll Records (a CBS subsidiary), which not only gave him access to better recording facilities and the production expertise of Rick Derringer but the financial backing for the video of “Ricky” (#63, 1983). A combination parody of Toni Basil’s hit single and video “Mickey” and homage to TV’s I Love Lucy, “Ricky” was the first of a string of videos that skewered the music, its creators, and its audience, not to mention pop culture in general. While often hilariously hamfisted, Yankovic’s takeoffs—such as “I Lost on Jeopardy” (#81, 1984) from “Weird Al” Yankovic in 3-D (#81, 1984), which rewrote Greg Kihn’s “Jeopardy”; “Like a Surgeon” (#47, 1985), which tackled Madonna’s “Like a Virgin,” from Dare to Be Stupid (#50, 1985)—made their creator and star as much a rock celebrity as his targets. In fact, the longevity of Yankovic’s career has surpassed several of the artists’ whose songs he has parodied. Nearly half the songs on any of his albums were comedic originals, although only his biggest fans seemed to be aware of “Weird Al” the songwriter. But his lyric rewriting earned him eight Grammy nominations, including two wins.

In 1985 Yankovic released a video collection of his paro-

"Weird Al" Yankovic

dies, The Compleat Al. That same year MTV produced an occasional series starring Yankovic as the host of Al TV, wherein he spoofed current videos. In 1989 he wrote and starred in the movie UHF, costarring a pre-Seinfeld Michael Richards. UHF did poorly in the theater but later found new life as a cultish video hit.

Polka Party! (#177, 1986), which relied more on music than on videos, stifled. Even Worse (#27, 1988) marked Al's return to rock video, and Michael Jackson. For "Fat," a grossly, literally overinflated Yankovic donned a leather outfit that copied Jackson's on the cover and video of Bad down to the last buckle. Jackson not only gave his approval for Yankovic's versions, he lent the subway set used in "Bad" for the "Fat" video.

In 1988 Yankovic collaborated with avant-garde synthesizer artist Wendy Carlos on recorded versions of the classical pieces Peter and the Wolf and Carnival of the Animals Part II. In 1992 Yankovic turned his eye to another musical trend, grunge, specifically Nirvana "Smells Like Nirvana" (#35, 1992) took on the Seattle band's image and garbled lyrics, with the accompanying video again using the original set, this time adding cows and Dick Van Patten, while the cover of Off the Deep End (#17, 1992) had Yankovic replacing the swimming baby pictured on Nevermind, his gaze focused not on a dollar bill but a donut. He also mocked the traveling summer tour Lollapalooza with his 1993 album, Alapalooza (#46), which featured "Bedrock Anthem," a combination takeoff of the Red Hot Chili Peppers' "Under the Bridge" and "Give It Away" as well as the classic cartoon series The Flintstones. In 1996 he wrote the theme song for the movie satire Spy Hard, as well as designed the opening credits and appeared as himself in the film.

The same year, Yankovic released Bad Hair Day, which rose to #14 thanks to the success of its first single and video, "Amish Paradise," a takeoff on rapper Coolio's "Gangsta's Paradise" (itself a rewrite of Stevie Wonder's "Pastime Paradise"). The album cover even mimicked the rapper's hairstyle. While Yankovic always prided himself on getting permission to parody, this time there was a miscommunication between the artists' record companies; Yankovic was told Coolio was fine with the idea, but when the album was released, Coolio claimed he never consented. Yankovic sent a letter of apology and vowed not to accept agreement from anyone but the artists themselves.

After being the subject of the Disney Channel mockumentary special "Weird Al" Yankovic: There's No Going Home in 1996, the entertainer hosted the Pee-wee's Playhouse-esque Weird Al Show on CBS' Saturday-morning lineup in 1997 and 1998. He was frustrated by the network's lack of support for his tongue-in-cheek humor, and the show was canceled after one season. Yankovic seemingly disappeared for a time in 1998; when he re-emerged without his trademark mustache and glasses—besides shaving, he'd gotten laser eye surgery—he was unrecognizable. His 1999 release, Running With Scissors, peaked at #16, due to the well-timed single "The Saga Begins," a rundown of the current Star Wars movie The Phantom Menace sung to the tune of Don McLean's "American Pie." Even the official Star Wars Web site plugged Yankovic's album, whose release was also timed to the premiere of his Behind the Music episode on VH1. In 2000 Yankovic contributed the original "Polkamon" to the soundtrack of the kids' flick Pokémon 2000: The Movie.

While Yankovic and his band (bassist Steve Jay, drummer Jon "Bermuda" Schwartz, guitarist Jim West, and keyboardist Ruben Valtierra) are often not taken seriously, they are able to play the original songs they parody note-for-note, both in the studio and on tour, making them a great cover band. Yankovic has also tried his hand at directing music videos, both his own and for other artists, including country comedian Jeff Foxworthy, the Jon Spencer Blues Explosion, Hanson, and the Black Crowes.

The Yardbirds virtually wrote the book on guitar-oriented blues-based rock & roll. They were a crucial link between mid-'60s British R&B and late-'60s psychedelia, setting the groundwork for heavy metal. This seminal band spawned three major guitar heroes—Eric Clapton, Jimmy Page, and Jeff Beck—who, with the Yardbirds, pioneered almost every technical six-string innovation of the era, including feedback and fuzz tone.

The Yardbirds formed in June 1963 with Keith Reiff, Chns Dreja, Paul Samwell-Smith, Jim McCarty, and guitarist Anthony “Top” Topham, who was replaced in October by Eric Clapton [see entry]. Originally called the Most Blueswailing Yardbirds, the five some initially played all strict blues covers of Chess/Checker/Vee-Jay material. They began to attract a large cult audience, especially when they took over the Rolling Stones' residency at the Crawdaddy Club in Richmond. They soon toured Europe with American bluesman Sonny Boy Williamson: a joint LP under both their names was issued in 1965. (It was rereleased in 1975.)

The band's first “solo” album in America was For Your Love in August 1965, yielding the hit title track written by Graham Gouldman, later of 10cc. (In the U.K., their first LP was titled Five Live Yardbirds and was out in 1964. Rhino reissued it stateside in 1988. The band's British records had different lineups of songs, album titles, and release dates than the U.S. versions.) The Yardbirds' second U.S. LP Having a Rave Up, featured Clapton on only four cuts. He quit in 1965 because he objected to the band's increased pop-commercial direction, namely “For Your Love.” In order to stick with purist blues, he joined John Mayall's band. His replacement was Jeff Beck [see entry], and the band soon enjoyed two more hits by Gouldman—“Heart Full of Soul,” with its prepsychedelic guitar fuzz licks, and “Evil Hearted You,” which charted in the U.K. In 1966 the band had two more hits—“Shapes of Things” (#11) and “Over Under Sideways Down” (#13)—but then Samwell-Smith, who had coproduced the band's records, bowed out to become a producer full-time. He later produced artists including Carly Simon, Cat Stevens, Jethro Tull, and Beverley Craven.

His replacement on bass was Jimmy Page [see entry], who moved to lead guitar as soon as rhythm guitarist Dreja learned bass. For a brief time beginning in the summer of 1966, Page and Beck were co-lead guitarists. (Page was earlier asked to be Clapton's replacement but declined, recommending Beck instead.) This lineup lasted only until November. It can be seen in the rock-club sequence in Michelangelo Antonioni's film Blow Up, wherein the Yardbirds perform “Stroll On” (actually a reworking of the Johnny Burnette Trio's “Train Kept A-Rollin’”). Beck had been missing many shows because of illness, and at the end of the year he suffered a full breakdown and left.

The band foundered from there. As a quartet, it released one LP in 1967 called Little Games, produced by Mickie Most, but the work was filled with old demos and bad left-over tracks. It came out only in the U.S. More singles were released, but they didn't go far, and in July 1968 the Yardbirds finally broke up. Relf and McCarty formed a folk duo called Together, followed by the classical-rock Renaissance [see entry], and later the heavy Armageddon. Relf died of an electric shock at home on May 14, 1976. Dreja became a photographer; he shot the album-sleeve photos for the first album by Led Zeppelin [see entry], the band Jimmy Page formed first as the New Yardbirds to meet the group's remaining contractual obligations.

Several repackagings of Yardbirds tracks were released through the '80s and '90s. In 1971 the Live Yardbirds LP (recorded at New York's Anderson Theater on March 30, 1968) was issued, without the band's consent; the members quickly demanded its removal from the market. It has since become a highly valuable, oft-bootlegged collector's item.

In 1983 McCarty, Dreja, and Samwell-Smith reunited to play the Marquee, and soon formed Box of Frogs with lead vocalist John Fiddler. That band released two albums, only one of which, Box of Frogs, was available domestically. In 1989 McCarty joined several other British '60s pop-group members in the British Invasion All-Stars. Most recently he has also been successfully recording new-age music as part of Stairway.

Following the Yardbirds' 1992 induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, McCarty and Dreja, abetted by ex-members of Mott the Hoople and Dr. Feelgood, began using the band's name on the reunion-tour circuit. However they have yet to record a new studio album. McCarty is also a solo artist.

Trisha Yearwood

Born Patricia Lynn Yearwood, Sep. 19, 1964, Monticello, GA
1991—Trisha Yearwood (MCA) 1992—Hearts in Armor
1993—The Song Remembers When 1994—The Sweetest Gift
1995—Thinkin' About You 1996—Everybody Knows 1997—Songbook: A Collection of Hits 1998—Where Your Road Leads 2000—Real Live Woman.

With a debut that went double-platinum and a powerful voice reminiscent of Linda Ronstadt's, Trisha Yearwood epitomized the early-'90s Nashville artist: grounded in country tradition but reaching an audience raised on '70s pop. Over the past decade, she has released a slew of Top 10 country hits and nine gold or platinum albums.

Moving to Nashville in 1985, Yearwood began singing demos. Garth Brooks enlisted her to sing backup on his debut and to tour with him; through Brooks, she met producer Garth Fundis, who produced Trisha Yearwood (#2 C&W, 1991). The album was an instant success, its singles, "She's in Love With the Boy" (#1 C&W, 1991), "Like We Never Had a Broken Heart" (#4 C&W, 1991), "That's What I Like About You" (#8 C&W, 1992), and "The Woman Before Me" (#1 C&W, 1992) helping Yearwood win the Academy of Country Music's Top New Female Vocalist Award in 1992.

Featuring "Wrong Side of Memphis" (#5 C&W, 1992) and a duet with Don Henley, "Walkaway Joe" (#2 C&W, 1993), Hearts in Armor (#46 pop, #12 C&W, 1992) consolidated Year-wood's gains. By 1993, she had signed a deal with Revlon to market a perfume called Wild Heart, been featured in the movie This Thing Called Love, and been the subject of a biography, Get Hot or Go Home—Trisha Yearwood: The Making of a Nashville Star by Lisa Gubernick. The Song Remembers When (#40 pop, #6 C&W, 1993), with its accompanying cable-television special and singles "You Say You Will" (#12 C&W, 1993), "Down on My Knees" (#19 C&W, 1993), and the title track (#2 C&W, 1993), continued her rise.

Yearwood has twice won a Best Country Vocal Collaboration Grammy: for her 1994 duet with Aaron Neville on the duet "I Fall to Pieces" and her 1997 duet with Brooks, "In Another's Eyes" (#2 C&W). She has frequently scored hits with songs by women songwriters, including Matraca Berg, Kim Richey, and Bobbie Cryner, among others. She was nominated for an Oscar for the Grammy Award-winning "How Do I Live," featured in the 1997 film Con Air. Yearwood had continued to do acting, appearing as a forensic pathologist on the CBS television series JAG. In 2000 Real Live Woman debuted at #4 on the country chart; the album featured guest vocals by Emmylou Harris and Jackson Browne.

One of the most successful progressive-rock bands in history, Yes combined virtuosic musicianship, suitelike neoclassical structures, and three-part high vocal harmonies to form an elaborate whole that most critics called irrelevant high-flown indulgence—and that audiences loved. After undergoing byzantine personnel changes, they updated their sound in the mid-'80s and enjoyed greater commercial success than ever.

Yes was formed after Jon Anderson met Chris Squire at a London music-industry bar in 1968. Anderson had spent the previous 12 years in various bands; Squire, a self-taught bassist, had been in the Syn. With guitarist Peter Banks, keyboardist Tony Kaye, and drummer Bill Bruford [see entry], they formed Yes. One of their first engagements was opening for Cream's London farewell concert in November 1968. The band won instant critical acclaim in Britain, and by the time of their debut album, which mixed originals with covers, were hailed as "the next supergroup." Time and a Word, which used an orchestra to flesh out intricately shifting arrangements, was somewhat less well received.

At this point, Yes had yet to break through in America, and Atlantic Records informed them that the next album might be their last. Banks left to form Flash, and new guitarist Steve Howe—formerly of such bands as the Syndicate and Tomorrow—helped make The Yes Album (#40, 1971) their breakthrough. With continual FM airplay it went gold.

protective and then Badfinger). His replacement, Rick Wakeman, had garnered acclaim with the Strawbs. Fragile (#4, 1972) consolidated the band's success. Highlighted by an edited "Roundabout" (#13, 1972), the album went gold. With Close to the Edge (#3, 1972), Yes' ambition attained new heights. Consisting of three extended cuts, with a four-movement title suite, the album too went gold in short order. After recording it, Bruford left to join King Crimson (whose leader, Robert Fripp, had once been approached to replace Peter Banks). His replacement was sessionman Alan White, who had played in John Lennon's Plastic Ono Band.

The live Yessongs (#12, 1973) was followed by the critically dented Tales From Topographic Oceans (#6, 1974). The album sold well, however, and the band continued to be a top-drawing live act. But Tales brought to a head conflicts between Wakeman, an extroverted meat-eating beer drinker, and the other players, who were sober vegetarians. Wakeman, openly expressing his disillusionment, soon left.

Wakeman's replacement was Patrick Moraz (like Wakeman, classically trained), of progressive-rock band Refugee. He debuted on Relayer (#5, 1974), which, like Close to the Edge featured an extended suite and forays into jazz fusion. With the release of Yesterdays (#17, 1975), a compilation including tracks from the first two (uncharted) Yes albums, the band took a year off as each member pursued solo projects.

After Yes had made a successful world tour with Moraz, Wakeman rejoined. Both Going for the One (#8, 1977) and Tormato (#10, 1978) returned to shorter, tighter song structures. But though Yes continued to sell albums and fill arenas, its days seemed numbered. Wakeman left again, followed by Anderson, who had written most of Yes' lyrics. Trevor Horn and Geoffrey Downes of the new-wave band the Buggles (who had a hit with "Video Killed the Radio Star" [see entry]) debuted on Drama (#18, 1980). Shortly thereafter, Yes broke up.

Howe and Downes then joined with Carl Palmer of Emerson, Lake and Palmer and John Wetton to form the progressive-rock supergroup Asia [see entry], who debuted in 1982 with a massively successful album. Anderson continued to make solo albums. Squire and White planned to start a band called Cinema But in mid-1983 Anderson, Kaye, Squire, White, and South African guitarist Trevor Rabin re-formed Yes and went on with 90125 (#5, 1983) and its Rabin-penned #1 single, "Owner of a Lonely Heart," both to score the band's highest chart position and to redefine its sound. Largely due to producer Trevor Horn, Yes streamlined its approach, eschewing classical stylings for sonically gorgeous, crafty pop. Rabin's songwriting dominated The Big Generator (#15, 1987), after which Anderson quit.

By 1989 the band's personnel squabbles reached new intensity, after a court battle over the group name, Squire, White, Rabin, and Kaye continued as the official Yes, while the warring faction of Anderson, Bruford, Wakeman, and Howe toured and recorded using their surnames. The two camps reconciled on Union (#15, 1991), going on to a world tour that, for all the logistical unwieldiness of its eight-player lineup, was a huge commercial success.

In 1993 Anderson, Bruford, and Howe joined the London Philharmonic in an album of symphonic versions of Yes songs. A year later, Yes—this time comprised of the members who'd released 90125—announced plans to record again, and early 1994 saw the release of Talk (#33, 1994). In 1997 the band, with new guitarist Billy Sherwood and additional keyboardist Igor Khoroshev, released two albums in one month, the catchy pop of Open Your Eyes and the more typically ambitious Keys to Ascension, vol. 2. By this time, Rick Wakeman, while still pursuing a career in Christian music, was back in the Yes fold. The Ladder (1999) echoed the progressive-rock melodrama of the band's early heyday.

Dwight Yoakam

Born Oct. 23, 1956, Pikesville, KY

1986—Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., etc. (Reprise) 1987—Hillbilly Deluxe 1988—Buenas Noches From a Lonely Room 1989—Just Lookin' for a Hit 1990—If There Was a Way 1993—This Time 1995—Dwight Live; Gone 1997—Under the Covers; Come On Christmas 1998—A Long Way Home 1999—Last Chance for a Thousand Years—Greatest Hits From the '90s 2000—dwrightyoakamacoustic.net; Tomorrow's Sounds Today.

Honey-voiced singer/songwriter Dwight Yoakam can glide from an insinuating croon to a country holler. He set out to revive the honky-tonk tradition pioneered by Merle Haggard, but his highly stylized image and sometimes self-righteous attitude have earned him the disapproval of Nashville's more conservative establishment.

Kentucky-born and Ohio-bred, Yoakam wrote his first song at age 10. By the time he turned 18 he was performing on the Ohio Valley honky-tonk circuit. After attending schools in Ohio and California, Yoakam set out for Nashville, where, by his account, he was rejected for being "too country" (Nashville's The Tennessean reported that this rejection consisted of his being passed over at an Opryland audition.)

Inspired by Californian Buck Owens, from Bakersfield, Yoakam relocated in 1978 to neighboring L.A., where he put together the Babylonian Cowboys. Pete Anderson, whose guitar playing, arrangements, and production have been a crucial element in Yoakam's success, joined in 1981.

Gigging in San Fernando Valley honky-tonks, Yoakam and his outfit eventually scored opening slots for bands that were part of L.A.'s burgeoning roots-rock scene, such as the Blasters and Los Lobos. In 1984 Yoakam released an EP, Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., on his own Oak label. It helped land him a record deal with Reprise's Nashville subsidiary, which re-released it as an album by adding three songs (and a second Etc to its title). Its debut single, a cover of Johnny Horton's "Honky Tonk Man" (#3 C&W, 1986) and title track (#4 C&W, 1986) proved that straight-ahead country music could go platinum.

Dwight Yoakam

A steady stream of country Top 10 singles—a cover of the Elvis hit “Little Sister” (#7 C&W, 1987), “Little Ways” (#8 C&W, 1987), “Please, Please Baby” (#6 C&W, 1987), and “Always Late With Your Kisses” (#9 C&W, 1988), from Hillbilly Deluxe (#55 pop, #1 C&W, 1987)—did not change Yoakam’s outsider status, though. His trademark look—’50s style fancy embroidered bolero jackets, skintight faded jeans, cowboy boots, and cowboy hat—reflected Yoakam’s love for the look as well as the sound of traditional C&W. (In 1990 Yoakam invested in a C&W clothing venture with Manuel, the Western-wear designer who got his start with legendary cowboy couturier Nudie.)

Yoakam’s next album, Buenas Noches From a Lonely Room (#68 pop, #1 C&W, 1988), yielded the #1 C&W hits “Streets of Bakersfield” (with Buck Owens, whom Yoakam coaxed out of retirement) and “I Sang Dixie.” Yoakam sang a duet with k.d. lang—the Flying Burrito Brothers’ “Sin City”—on Just Lookin’ for a Hit (#68 pop, #3 C&W, 1989), and with Patty Loveless on “Send a Message to My Heart” (#47 C&W, 1992), on If There Was a Way (#96 pop, #7 C&W, 1990). Way also featured the Top 20 C&W singles “You’re the One” (#5, 1991), “Nothing’s Changed Here” (#15, 1991), and “It Only Hurts When I Cry” (#6, 1992), cowritten with Roger Miller.

In the early ’90s, Yoakam made a cameo in the cult film Red Rock West, which starred Nicolas Cage, Dennis Hopper, and Lara Flynn Boyle. He also scored the soundtrack for the 1992 film White Sands and contributed a version of Elvis’s “Suspicious Minds” (#35 C&W, 1992) to Honeymoon in Vegas (the soundtrack album hit #4 in 1992). An ill-fated love affair with actress Sharon Stone in 1992 resulted in several emotionally charged compositions on Yoakam’s 1993 platinum album This Time (#25 pop, #4 C&W, 1993). The album yielded the hits “Ain’t That Lonely Yet” (#2 C&W, 1993), which won the Grammy for Best Male Country Performance in 1994, “A Thousand Miles From Nowhere” (#2 C&W, 1993), “Try Not to Look So Pretty,” (#14 C&W, 1994), and “Fast as You” (#70 pop, #2 C&W, 1994).

Yoakam has continued to juggle his music-making with his acting. Between 1995 and 1998, he appeared in four films—The Little Death, Painted Hero, Sling Blade, and The Newton Boys—as well as several television projects. At the same time, he toured and released Dwight Live (#56 pop, #8 C&W, 1995), Gone (#30 pop, #5 C&W, 1995), Under the Covers (#92 pop, #8 C&W, 1997), the holiday collection Come On Christmas (#32 C&W, 1997), and A Long Way Home (#60 pop, #11 C&W, 1998). None of those albums sold as well as Yoakam’s early-’90s work, although Gone yielded the #20 country single “Nothing” (1995) and Home the #17 country single “Things Change” (1998).

Under the Covers was Yoakam’s collection of often radical reinterpretations of songs by an odd assortment of artists including the Clash, the Kinks, Sonny and Cher, and Jimmie Rodgers. The album rendered a minor country hit “Claudette” (1997), a Roy Orbison tune made famous by the Everly Brothers in 1958. In 1999 Yoakam scored his biggest hit in six years, “Crazy Little Thing Called Love” (#64 pop, #12 C&W, 1999), a faithful rendition of Queen’s #1 pop hit of 1980.

The song was a newly recorded track on the singer’s best-of collection, Last Chance for a Thousand Years (#80 pop, #10 C&W, 1999).

Yoakam kicked off the new millennium with a back-to-basics collection of acoustic versions of his most popular tunes, Dwight Yoakam Acoustic.net. He followed that with Tomorrow’s Sounds Today, a collection of new songs including more collaborations with Buck Owens and another rock cover (Cheap Trick’s “I Want You to Want Me”).

The literal and figurative definition of a “critic’s band,” Yo La Tengo was cofounded by onetime rock scribe (and Encyclopedia contributor) Ira Kaplan, who wrote for New York Rocker and The SoHo News in the early 1980s. His wife and band mate Georgia Hubley, the daughter of Oscar-winning animators (Mister Magoo), was raised on Manhattan’s Upper West Side. Inspired amateurs whose early albums were tributes to their record collections, guitarist/vocalist Kaplan and drummer/vocalist Hubley emerged in 1984 from the active indie-rock scene that revolved around the Hoboken club Maxwell’s. The group, which took for its name what a Spanish-speaking outfielder would yell while awaiting an approaching fly ball (“I’ve got it!”), has evolved through various lineups and enthusiasms over a nearly two-decade career, displaying both remarkable staying power and impressive artistic growth.

Kaplan and Hubley were joined by a variety of bassists and guitarists prior to recording the 1986 debut album Ride the Tiger, a roots-oriented collection that featured guitarist Dave Schramm and bassist Mike Lewis, with production from ex-Mission of Burma bassist Clint Conley. The band’s revolving door spun again for the following year’s New Wave Hot Dogs, with bassist Stephan Wichnewski briefly onboard. Yo La Tengo, whose embrace of both feedback-driven raves and folksier fare have prompted comparisons to the Velvet Underground, made the influence explicit with a version of John Cale and Lou Reed’s “It’s Alright (The Way That You Live).” President Yo La Tengo was produced by guest bassist Gene Holder (of kindred pop spirits the dB’s), with Schramm back to play on 1990’s Fakebook, an acoustic-driven mostly covers album with selections from the Kinks, Gene Clark, the Escorts, and fellow New York rockers The Scene Is Now. Two years later, May I Sing With Me marked both a return to the band's noisier instincts and the arrival of new bassist James McNew (ex-Christmas), whose presence formalized Yo La Tengo as a trio.

The 1993 album Painful displayed a greater range of tones and textures, as the musicians cultivated their knack for keyboard and guitar-laden atmospherics. They continued in that direction for Electr-O-Pura, which mixed clever pop writing and balladry with experimental pieces. The rarities double-disc Genius + Love = Yo La Tengo surveyed the band's penchant for quirky cover tunes, collecting tracks from various singles, EPs, and compilations, and boasting a humorous telephone collaboration with Austin, Texas, songwriter/eccentric Daniel Johnston on his song "Speeding Motorcycle." The group also made its big-screen debut portraying "the Factory house band" in the 1996 film I Shot Andy Warhol. I Can Hear the Heart Beating as One, from 1997, was a major critical success and became its bestseller, approaching sales of 75,000 copies. Three years later, And Then Nothing Turned Itself Inside-Out, was a subdued, lyrical meditation on domestic life that was widely interpreted to be about Kaplan and Hubley's marriage, and featured a cover of George McRae's 1974 disco tune "You Can Have It All."

Singer/songwriter Neil Young is sometimes visionary, sometimes flaky, sometimes both at once, but he has never been boring. Indeed, Young has weathered runs of critical and popular ambivalence only to be vindicated by being periodically "rediscovered" by young musicians and fans. He has maintained a large following since the early '70s with music in three basic styles—solo acoustic ballads, sweet country rock, and lumbering garage rock (with some experimental music side trips), all topped by his high voice—and he veers from one to another in unpredictable phases. His subject matter also shifts from personal confessions to allusive stories to bouncy throwaways. A dedicated primitivist, Young is constantly proving that simplicity is not always simple.

As a child, Young moved with his mother to Winnipeg, Canada, after she divorced his father, a well-known sports journalist. He played in several high school rock bands, including the Esquires, the Stardusters, and the Squires. He also began hanging out in local folk clubs, where he met Stephen Stills and Joni Mitchell. Mitchell wrote "The Circle Game" for Young after hearing his "Sugar Mountain." In the mid-'60s Young moved to Toronto, where he began performing solo. In 1966 he and bassist Bruce Palmer joined the Mynah Birds (which included Rick James and had a deal with Motown Records); after that fizzled, he and Palmer drove to L.A. in Young's Pontiac hearse. Young and Palmer ran into Stills and another mutual friend, Richie Furay, out west and formed Buffalo Springfield [see entry], one of the most important of the new folk-country-rock bands, who recorded Young's "Broken Arrow," "I Am a Child," "Mr. Soul," and "Nowadays Clancy Can't Even Sing." But friction developed. Young quit the band, only to rejoin and quit again, and in May 1968, after recording three albums, the band split up.

Young acquired Joni Mitchell's manager, Elliot Roberts, and released his debut solo LP in January 1969, coproduced by Jack Nitzsche. Around the same time Young began jamming with a band called the Rockets, renamed Crazy Horse: drummer Ralph Molina, bassist Billy Talbot, and guitarist Danny Whitten. They backed Young on Everybody Knows

This Is Nowhere (#34, 1969), recorded in two weeks. The album includes three of Young's most famous songs: "Cinnamon Girl," "Down by the River," and "Cowgirl in the Sand," which, Young later said, were all written in one day while he was stricken with the flu. The album went gold (and much later, platinum), but Young decided to split his time between Crazy Horse and Crosby, Stills and Nash [see entry], whom he joined in June. In March 1970 his presence was first felt on CSN&Y's Déjà Vu.

Young's third solo, the gold (and utterly evocative) After the Gold Rush (#8, 1970), included Crazy Horse and 17-year-old guitarist Nils Lofgren. The album yielded the single "Only Love Can Break Your Heart" (#33, 1970), and that plus the CSN&Y album put the spotlight on Young. Harvest (#1, 1972), with the #1 single "Heart of Gold," made the singer/songwriter a superstar.

By the release of its live album, Four Way Street, in spring 1971, CSN&Y had broken up. In 1972 Young made a cinéma vérité film, Journey Through the Past, the film and its soundtrack were panned by critics. Young confused fans further with Time Fades Away (#22, 1973), a rough-hewn live album recorded with the Stray Gators, including Nitzsche (keyboards), Ben Keith (pedal steel guitar), Tim Drummond (bass), and John Barbata (drums). In June 1975 Young released a bleak, ragged album recorded two years earlier, Tonight's the Night (#25). The album's dark tone reflected Young's emotional upheaval following the drug deaths of Crazy Horse's Danny Whitten in 1972 and CSN&Y roadie Bruce Berry in 1973. In November Young released the groundbreaking Zuma (#25), an emotionally intense work that included the sweeping "Cortez the Killer." Crazy Horse now included Talbot, Molina, and Frank Sampedro (rhythm guitar). In 1976 Young recorded Long May You Run (#26) with Stills, which went gold, but he left Stills halfway through a tour.

In June 1977 Young was back on his own with the gold American Stars 'n Bars (#21), again a more accessible effort, with Linda Ronstadt doing backup vocals along with newcomer Nicolette Larson. Compiled by Young, Decade was a carefully chosen, not entirely hit-centered compilation. Comes a Time (#7, 1978) was folkish and went gold.

In fall 1978 Young did an arena tour called Rust Never Sleeps. He played old and new music, performing half the show by himself on piano or guitar, and the other half (which was memorably loud) with Crazy Horse, amid giant mock-ups of microphones and speakers. In June 1979 he released Rust Never Sleeps (#8) with songs previewed on the tour, including "Out of the Blue," dedicated to Johnny Rotten and the Sex Pistols. The album also featured "Sedan Delivery" and "Powderfinger," which Young had once offered to Lynyrd Skynyrd, though the band didn't record them. (Back in 1974 Skynyrd had written "Sweet Home Alabama" as an answer to Young's "Southern Man.") In November 1979 Young released the gold Live Rust LP (#15), culled from the fall 1978 shows and the soundtrack to a film of the tour (directed by Young) entitled Rust Never Sleeps.

The '80s was a particularly strange and erratic decade for Young, even by his own unpredictable standards. Right before presidential election week 1980, he issued Hawks and Doves (#30), an enigmatic state-of-the-union address, with one side of odd acoustic pieces and the other of rickety country songs. Exactly one year later he released Reactor (#27), an all-hard-rock LP. In 1982 he moved to Geffen and released Trans (#19), which introduced what Young called "Neil 2"; he fed his voice through a computerized Vocoder and sang songs like "Sample and Hold." He toured arenas as a solo performer when the album was released, singing his most-requested songs, covering "backstage" action on a large video screen, and singing along with his Vocoderized video image on songs from Trans.

Young's wandering got more extreme with Everybody's Rockin', a rockabilly-style album recorded and performed with a group he dubbed the Shocking Pinks. Despite an amusing video for the single "Wonderin'," Young's work started sliding down the charts. Old Ways was a country record with guest spots by Willie Nelson and Waylon Jennings. Landing on Water used synthesizers on standard rock songs. And Life reunited Young with Crazy Horse in lackluster performances. After his disastrous relationship with Geffen—in which he was ultimately slapped with a $3 million suit for making "unrepresentative," noncommercial music—Young returned to his former label for This Note's for You, a horn-based R&B album. The video for the title song attacked rockers who allowed their songs to be used in TV ads and was not shown on MTV, although it earned the network's Music Video Award for Best Video of the Year. In 1987, after appearing with his old cohorts in CSN at a Greenpeace benefit, Young rejoined the group briefly for the 1988 CSN&Y album, American Dream (#16, 1988). None of Young's '80s albums was particularly well received beyond the artist's loyal core audience, though some—such as Trans—had captured critics' interest. Many wrote off his '80s period as typical Neil Young flakiness.

But there were events in Young's personal life that shed light on his increased eccentricity. In 1978 his second son, Ben, was born to his wife, Pegi, with cerebral palsy (in 1972, Young's first son, Zeke, was born to his then-companion, actress Carne Snodgrass, with a milder version of the disorder). Later, in a 1992 interview with The New York Times, Young said his '80s output had reflected his frustration with not being able to communicate with Ben: "Trans signified the end of one sound and era and the beginning of another era, where I was indecipherable and no one could understand what I was saying."

Young's extramusical activities during the '80s were as unpredictable as the albums. In 1984, to the bewilderment of his fans, he spoke out in favor of conservative Ronald Reagan. He also participated in the 1985 Live Aid benefit and helped organize the subsequent Farm Aid concerts. In 1986 Young and his wife started the Bridge School in San Francisco, a learning center for disabled children. In 1989 a group of alternative rockers, including Sonic Youth, the Pixies, and Dinosaur Jr, contributed to The Bridge: A Tribute to Neil Young, whose proceeds went to the school. (Young also organized annual benefit concerts for the school, at which a wide range of artists performed each year.)

Hailed by a new generation of postpunk musicians as the Granddaddy of Grunge, Young had a major comeback beginning in 1989 with Freedom (#35), his biggest charter since Trans. He introduced its single, "Rockin' in the Free World," in an unbridled, transcendent 1989 performance on Saturday Night Live that easily ranks as one of the greatest television moments in rock history. Young then regrouped Crazy Horse for Ragged Glory (#31, 1990), a raucous, critically lauded album. With raw, feedback- and distortion-drenched garage rock, the album proved the extent of Young's influence on younger alternative-rock bands such as Dinosaur Jr and Soul Asylum. In 1991 he embraced that new generation of bands by taking noise-rockers Sonic Youth and Social Distortion on the road; the tour was documented on Weld (whose 35-minute instrumental companion Arc featured extended, noisy feedback jams). Young also began praising rap, particularly the music of Ice-T.

Reuniting him with members of the Stray Gators, Harvest Moon (#16, 1992) found Young doing his sentimental acoustic/folk songs again. A sequel to Harvest, it was his biggest seller in 13 years. In 1992 Young appeared at the 50th birthday celebration for Bob Dylan, covering Dylan's "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues" and "All Along the Watchtower." Released in 1993, Lucky Thirteen compiles Young's Geffen material, and Unplugged documents his live, acoustic performances following the release of Harvest Moon.

In 1994 Young contributed the haunting title song to Jonathan Demme's film Philadelphia, which was nominated for an Oscar. (Bruce Springsteen's "Streets of Philadelphia" also from the film won.) He also released Sleeps With Angels (#9, 1994), his strongest, most consistent, and critically lauded album since Rust Never Sleeps.

He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1995 by Eddie Vedder of Pearl Jam, who thanked Young for teaching his band a lot about "dignity, commitment, and playing in the moment." The mutual admiration between the artists resulted in the collaboration Mirror Ball (#5, 1995), with Pearl Jam backing Young on his highest-charting album since '72. The next year he was back with Crazy Horse for Broken Arrow (#31, 1996). Young recorded a haunting solo electric-guitar score for New York independent filmmaker Jim Jarmusch's 1996 film Dead Man. Jarmusch then made a documentary of Young, Year of the Horse, released in 1997. Footage from Young and Crazy Horse's 1996 tour is spliced together with older stock from 1976 and 1986, interviews with Young, band members, crew, and associates run throughout. A soundtrack album was also released. Young headlined the H.O.R.D.E. summer festival tour in 1997. In the late '90s, Young, a lifelong model train enthusiast, bought the Lionel Toy Train company, reportedly to delight his son Ben.

In 2000 Young released Silver & Gold, a pensive, largely acoustic album featuring drummer Jim Keltner, bassist Donald "Duck" Dunn, Ben Keith on pedal steel and Dobro, and keyboardist Spooner Oldham. Three years in the making, the album was nearly universally hailed. Also that year, Village Voice writer Jimmy McDonough filed a $1.8 million suit against Young, alleging that the singer refused to allow publication of a biography written by McDonough that Young originally authorized (as of this writing, the case was still pending). In November 2000, Young released Road Rock (#169), a strong live set featuring a duet with Chrissie Hynde on Bob Dylan's "All Along the Watchtower."

Paul Young

Born Jan. 17, 1956, Luton, Eng.

1983—No Parlez (Columbia) 1985—The Secret of Association 1986—Between Two Fires 1990—Other Voices 1991—From Time to Time/The Singles Collection 1993—The Crossing 1995—Reflections (Vision Music) 1997—Love Hurts (Prime Cuts).

Paul Young is a handsome, blue-eyed soul singer whose massive popularity in his native England has led to the occasional pop hit in the U.S. Young was born in a North London suburb. His first group of note, Streetband, had a novelty hit in the U.K. with "Toast" in 1978. In 1979 Streetband split, and Young and other members formed the eight-piece soul band O-Tips. The band became popular in England through frequent touring, but its eponymous 1980 album sold poorly.

Young was offered a solo contract by CBS and brought O-Tips keyboardist Ian Kewley with him. The Royal Family band, along with backup singers the Fabulous Wealthy Tarts, accompanied Young on No Parlez. Lushly produced by Laurie Latham, the album was a hit in Europe. It featured a cover of "Wherever I Lay My Hat (That's My Home)," "Come Back and Stay" (#22, 1984), and "Love of the Common People," as well as an unlikely cover of Joy Division's "Love Will Tear Us Apart."

While touring Europe and the U.S., Young strained his voice and was forced to rest. Meanwhile, the Tarts left to pursue their own careers and were replaced by George Chandler, Tony Jackson, and Jimmy Chambers; they hit with a cover of Daryl Hall's "Everytime You Go Away" (#1, 1985). The Latham-produced album included Tom Waits' "Soldier's Things" and "I'm Gonna Tear Your Playhouse Down" (#13, 1985).

Next Young cowrote and coproduced (with Hugh Padgham and Kewley) Between Two Fires, which yielded no hits, though. Young took an 18-month hiatus to attend to family, appearing publicly in 1988 to sing at the Nelson Mandela birthday tribute concert in Wembley. He changed direction on Other Voices, working with four producers (including Nile Rodgers and Peter Wolf) and such special guests as Chaka Khan, Pink Floyd guitarist David Gilmour, and Stevie Wonder (on harmonica). Young returned to the U.S. charts with the Chi-Lites 1972 hit "Oh Girl" (#8, 1990). The album also featured a version of Free's "A Little Bit of Love." Young's cover of Jimmy Ruffin's 1966 hit "What Becomes of the Broken-hearted" (#22, 1992) was featured in the movie Fried Green Tomatoes.

In 1995 Young released Reflections, a covers collection including versions of songs by Aretha Franklin ("Until You Come Back to Me"), Bill Withers ("Ain't No Sunshine"), and the Four Tops ("Reach Out I'll Be There"). The unsuccessful Love Hurts (1997) featured updates of hits by Everly Brothers, Joe Tex, and the Temptations.

The Youngbloods were a folk-rock group led by Jesse Colin Young. Though they had a jazzy, mellow West Coast sound, their roots were in Boston and New York City. Young started out playing the folk circuit in Greenwich Village, where he met Bobby Scott, a composer/singer/pianist who had played with Bobby Darin, among others. Scott financed and produced Young's debut, The Soul of a City Boy. Reputedly cut in four hours, the solo LP of Young and acoustic guitar was released on Capitol in 1964. He began to play the Boston clubs and then cut Youngblood for Mercury, again with Scott producing, this time with a backup band including friend John Sebastian.

Inspired by the Beatles, Young decided to form a group, beginning with Massachusetts folkie Jerry Corbitt and then adding Joe Bauer and Lowell "Banana" Levinger, the last being the most accomplished musician of the band. In late 1965 the new Youngbloods cut some tracks for Mercury, but these were not released until years later on Two Trips. Their official debut was The Youngbloods, which included the hits "Grizzly Bear" and "Get Together," written by Dino Valenti, later a singer for Quicksilver Messenger Service. It was first a regional hit, and it didn't take off nationally until it was rereleased two years later in July 1969 after it had been used on a TV public service ad for brotherhood. In 1969 it hit #5 and went gold. RCA later renamed the first album after the single.

The band moved to Marin County, California, in late 1967. Their next two LPs were produced in New York by Felix Pappalardi before they went west. The third, Elephant Mountain, was overseen by Charlie Daniels. Corbitt left the band during Elephant Mountain, and the Youngbloods continued as a trio, signing to Warner Bros., who gave them their own label, Raccoon, in 1970. RCA began to repackage all their older work, including a best-of that year, also rereleasing for the third time "Darkness Darkness," previously out in August 1968 and March 1969.

The Youngbloods' first two Warners/Raccoon albums were live recordings—Rock Festival and Ride the Wind. In early 1971, they added bassist Michael Kane, freeing Young to play guitar. The band issued two more LPs—Good and Dusty and High on a Ridge Top—before disbanding in 1972. Bauer and Banana made solo albums; Corbitt had previously cut two; all of these went nowhere. Bauer, Banana, and Kane briefly united to form the band Noggins, doing one LP, Crab Tunes, for Raccoon in 1972. Banana also recorded as Banana and the Bunch, worked with Mimi Fariña, and taught hang gliding. Bauer succumbed to a brain tumor in 1982.

Young was the only musician to successfully carry on. Together had the same breezy feel of the Youngbloods, again highlighted by his light, supple vocals. Surviving Youngblood members Banana, Corbitt, and Young reunited first in 1984–85 to tour. Young has continued to perform and record, occasionally with his old band mates. He currently resides on a plantation in Hawaii, where he grows and sells the famed, organic Kona coffee.

Young MC

Born Marvin Young, May 10, 1967, London, Eng.
1989—Stone Cold Rhymin' (Delicious Vinyl) 1991—Brainstorm (Capitol) 1993—What's the Flavor?

Clean-cut, college-educated Young MC was one of the first black rappers to score a Top 10 pop hit, with 1989's "Bust a Move," a credible-sounding, yet catchy and nonthreatening hip-hop track.

Marvin Young's parents, who'd emigrated from Jamaica to England, moved to Hollis, Queens (also home to Run-DMC and LL Cool J), when he was two years old. He began writing songs and poems, based on fairy tales and nursery rhymes as a child. He joined protean rap groups in high school and went to the University of Southern California, where he met Michael Ross and Matt Dike, a pair of DJ/producers who co-owned the Delicious Vinyl label. Young recorded a single for the label, "I Let 'Em Know," that found some success in the U.S. and U.K.

In 1989 Young collaborated on lyrics for Tone-Lōc's #2 pop hit "Wild Thing" (the first Top 10 pop hit by a black rapper) and its followup, "Funky Cold Medina." Still at USC, Young recorded his debut album as Young MC, Stone Cold Rhymin' (#9, 1989), which included the comical story rap "Principal's Office" (#33, 1989) and "Bust a Move" (#7, 1989), which won the Grammy for Best Rap Performance. Also in 1989 Young appeared on and wrote lyrics for Sly and Robbie's Silent Assassin.

He then tied to bolt from Delicious Vinyl, claiming, "On my album there was stuff I'd never heard before," and that the label kept him from writing soundtrack music for the Eddie Murphy movie Another 48 HRS. Delicious Vinyl sued him for breach of contract; the matter was settled out of court in 1991, and Young MC released Brainstorm (#66, 1991) on Capitol Records. The album—full of socially responsible tracks like "Use Your Head" and "Keep It in Your Pants"—yielded only the minor hit "That's the Way Love Goes" (#54, 1991). His 1993 album, What's the Flavor?, flopped. "Bust a Move" continued to resurface years later, however, covered by Star Trek icon William Shatner in one of a series of popular 1999 and 2000 commercials for the Internet bargain-shopping site priceline.com, and featured on the soundtrack for the big-screen football comedy The Replacements. By the end of the decade, he was back in the studio, working on new material.

1984—The Saga Continues 1987—Unlimited! 1991—Bridging the Gap (Reprise).

Zapp had a string of post-Parliament funk hits during the '80s, the biggest being "More Bounce to the Ounce—Part I" (#86 pop, #2 R&B, 1980). Though the group's musical foundation was funk, leader Roger Troutman often led Zapp into light jazz or blues. The group spruced up its performances with zany costume changes and quirky vocal effects.

Roger Troutman grew up one of eight children in working-class Hamilton, Ohio. As a child he remembers his parents being unhappy during the week and happy on the weekends, when they would spend time with his aunts and uncles listening to music. Troutman associated music with happiness, and decided to learn to play and sing himself. He began experimenting with a Vocoder, an electronic effect that makes the human voice sound robotic.

In 1975 Troutman and three brothers formed Roger and the Human Body, whose Vocoder-ized funk became their main schtick. The group recorded an independent record, which made its way to Parliament/Funkadelic maestro George Clinton. With Clinton's help, the group landed a deal on Warner Bros., renamed themselves Zapp, and recorded their self-titled debut album with other musicians including Bootsy Collins on guitar.

On the strength of "More Bounce to the Ounce" and "Be Alright" (#26 R&B, 1980), Zapp reached #19 on the pop chart in 1980 and went gold. Zapp II (#25 pop, 1982) produced the hits "Doo Wah Ditty (Blow That Thing)" (#10 R&B, 1982) and "Dance Floor (Part I)" (#1 R&B, 1982). Zapp III (#39 pop, 1983) spawned "I Can Make You Dance (Part I)" (#4 R&B, 1983) and "Heartbreaker" (#15 R&B, 1983). The group returned two years later with The New Zapp IV U, scoring a hit with "Computer Love (Part I)" (#8 R&B, 1986). But rap had taken over by mid-decade, and Zapp seemed to get lost in the shuffle: 1989's Zapp V charted disappointingly.

In the meantime, Troutman recorded several solo albums in the '80s and into the '90s, under the name Roger, and scored a big hit with 1987's "I Wanna Be Your Man" (#3 pop, #1). He also produced former Zapp backup singer Shirley Murdock's self-titled album, which included the R&B Top 10 single "Go On Without You." Troutman also recorded Bridging the Gap.

In 1993 the group—renamed Zapp & Roger—charted with All the Greatest Hits (#39 pop, #9 R&B, 1993), which yielded the hits "Slow and Easy" (#43 pop, #18 R&B, 1993) and "Mega Medley" (#54 pop, #30 R&B, 1993). The recordings of Zapp & Roger were also frequently sampled in the work of such hip-hop acts as Cypress Hill, Snoop Dogg, the Notorious B.I.G., and Ice Cube. In 1996 Troutman guested on Tupac Shakur and Dr. Dre's Top 10 hit "California Love," followed in 1997 by an appearance on the Johnny Gill single "It's Your Body."

The self-described "evangelist of funk" was also a community activist and businessman at home, forming Troutman Enterprises, a construction company involved in building affordable housing for low-income residents in Dayton, Ohio. The company employed unskilled youths who divided their time as construction workers and as members of the latter-day Zapp. But by the mid-'90s, the company sought bankruptcy protection. Then on April 25, 1999, Troutman was found dead from four gunshot wounds in an alley behind his recording studio. The incident was an apparent murder-suicide by older brother and sometime songwriting collaborator Larry Troutman, who was also found dead seven blocks away with a bullet in his head, a revolver by his side.

With more than 80 albums to his credit, composer/arranger/guitarist/bandleader Frank Zappa demonstrated a mastery of pop idioms ranging from jazz to rock of every conceivable variety, penned electronic and orchestral works, parlayed controversial satire, and testified in Congress against censorship. As astute an entrepreneur as he was a musician, he was impatient with any division between popular and high art, he combined scatological humor with political wit, required of his players (Little Feat founder Lowell George, guitarists Adrian Belew and Steve Vai, and drummer Terry Bozzio, among them) an intimidating skill, and displayed consistent innovation in instrumental and studio technology.

The eldest of four children of a guitar-playing government scientist, Frank Zappa moved with his family at age 10 to California, eventually settling in Lancaster. Playing in school orchestras and bands, he taught himself a variety of instruments, concentrating on guitar. A collector of '50s rock & roll and R&B singles, he also listened to modern classical composers like Stravinsky and his avowed favorite, Edgard Varèse. In high school he formed the Black-Outs and added country blues to his record collection. He met future collaborator and underground legend Don Van Vliet and allegedly christened him Captain Beefheart. In 1959 he studied music theory at Chaffey College in Alta Loma, California, dropping out after six months.

In 1960 Zappa played cocktail music in lounges and worked on his first recordings and the score for a B movie, The World's Greatest Sinner. He also appeared on Steve Allen's TV show, performing a "bicycle concerto" (plucking the spokes, blowing through the handlebars). In 1963 Zappa wrote a score for a Western called Run Home Slow, and with the money built a studio in Cucamonga, California. He befriended future Mothers Ray Collins and Jim "Motorhead" Sherwood, and formed a band with Beefheart called the Soots.

Zappa was charged with conspiracy to commit pornography by the San Bernardino Vice Squad after an undercover policeman requested some sex "party" tapes. Zappa delivered tapes of faked grunting, and served 10 days of a six-month jail sentence. The woman involved was bailed out of jail with royalties from "Memories of El Monte," which Zappa and Collins had written for the doo-wop group the Penguins.

In 1964 Zappa joined the Soul Giants, with Collins (vocals), Dave Coronada (sax), Roy Estrada (bass), and Jimmy Carl Black (drums). Renaming them the Mothers, then the Mothers, he moved the band onto L.A.'s proto-hippie "freak" circuit (Coronada quit, replaced by guitarist Elliot Ingber). The band played clubs for two years, mixing covers with social-protest tunes like "Who Are the Brain Police?" In early 1966 producer Tom Wilson signed them to MGM/Verve and recorded Freak Out! MGM, wary of the band's outrageous reputation, forced Zappa to add "of Invention" to the Mothers. Though Zappa advertised the album in underground papers and comics and earned critical respect for the album's obvious musical and lyrical distinction, it ended up losing money.

In 1966, with Ingber departing, eventually to join Captain Beefheart's Magic Band, the Mothers lineup expanded to include saxophonists Bunk Gardner and Motorhead Sherwood, keyboardist Don Preston, and drummer Billy Mundi. Released in 1967, Absolutely Free further satirized "straight" America with pointed tunes like "Brown Shoes Don't Make It" and "Plastic People." We're Only in It for the Money, a parody of the Beatles' Sgt. Pepper, found Zappa savaging hippie pretensions. His montage production techniques—mingling tape edits, noise, recitative, free-form outbursts, and Varèse-like modern classical music with rock—were coming into their own. In 1967 Zappa and the Mothers also recorded Lumpy Gravy, with a 50-piece orchestra, including many Mothers, and Cruising With Ruben & the Jets, an homage to '50s doo-wop.

Billy Mundi left after Lumpy Gravy; by now it was apparent that the Mothers were less a band than a shifting vehicle for Zappa's art. While recording Money, Zappa and the group had moved to New York City's Greenwich Village, where they began a six-month residency at the Garick Theatre. There they pioneered rock theater with a series of often-spontaneous audience-participation skits. While recording Ruben & the Jets, the Mothers also began recording Uncle Meat, a double album for a never-completed movie. It is the first example of Zappa's trademark complex-meter jazz-rock fusion.

After making Uncle Meat, Zappa moved the band back to L.A. and married his second wife, Gail; their four children include daughters Moon Unit and Diva and sons Dweezil and Ahmet Rodan (Dweezil would become a solo artist in the '80s, then form Shampoohorn with his brother in the '90s; both also became television personalities, as did their sister Moon Unit). In L.A. Zappa moved into movie cowboy Tom Mix's Log Cabin Ranch, where he assembled the increasingly complex Burnt Weeny Sandwich and Weasels Ripped My Flesh. By this time, the band had come to include second guitarist Lowell George and drummer Art Tripp III.

In late 1968 Zappa and manager Herb Cohen had moved to Warner/Reprise, where they formed their own Straight and Bizarre labels. Zappa recorded such acts as groupie collective the GTO's (Girls Together Outrageously), onetime street-singer Wild Man Fischer, Alice Cooper, and Captain Beefheart (whose Trout Mask Replica was one of Zappa's most memorable productions). By the time Weasels was released in 1970, Zappa had temporarily disbanded the Mothers because of overwhelming expenses and public apathy. Lowell George and Roy Estrada then founded Little Feat; Art Tripp III joined Beefheart (Estrada later joined Beefheart as well); Gardner and Black formed Geronimo Black.

Zappa began composing the soundtrack for 200 Motels. He also recorded his first solo album, Hot Rats, a jazz-rock guitar showcase featuring Beefheart and jazz violinists Jean-Luc Ponty and Don "Sugar cane" Harris. Hot Rats was released to great critical acclaim in 1970, as was Ponty's King Kong, an album of Zappa compositions (for legal reasons, Zappa's name couldn't be listed as producer and guitarist). In 1970 Zappa also performed the 200 Motels score with Zubin Mehta and the L.A. Philharmonic at a sold-out L.A. concert. That summer, Zappa re-formed the Mothers, retaining keyboardist/reedman Ian Underwood and adding ex-Turtles Howard Kaylan, Mark Volman (singers then known as the Phlorescent Leech and Eddie), and bassist Jim Pons, along with jazz keyboardist George Duke and British rock drummer Aynsley Dunbar. With this lineup and other session players, Zappa recorded Waka/Jawaka and Chunga's Revenge as solo albums and the Mothers' Fillmore East—June 1971 and Just Another Band From L.A.

At this point, critics began accusing the Mothers of becoming a cynical, scatological joke, but Zappa displayed no discomfort in portraying two apparently contradictory personae: the raunchy inciter and the serious composer (whose stature in fact would increase over the years, and whose cult always remained intense). In 1971 the 200 Motels film, featuring Theodore Bikel and Ringo Starr as surrogate Zappas, as well as the Mothers, was released to mixed response. In May 1971 Zappa appeared at one of the last Fillmore East concerts with John Lennon and Yoko Ono; the performance appears on Lennon/Ono's Some Time in New York City. As the Mothers personnel began to change more frequently, they embarked on a 1971 tour in which their equipment was destroyed in a fire at Switzerland's Montreux Casino (immortalized in opening act Deep Purple's hit "Smoke on the Water"), and Zappa was injured when a fan pushed him from the stage of London's Rainbow Theatre. A year later the Mothers were banned from Royal Albert Hall for "obscenity."

The Grand Wazoo, with numerous auxiliary players, was a big-band fusion album. And in 1973 Zappa and the Mothers also recorded Over-Nite Sensation, on which Zappa simplified his music and kept his lyrics in a scatological-humorous vein, as in "Don't Eat the Yellow Snow" (#86, 1974). Album sales picked up. Apostrophe (°)—Zappa's highest charting album, at #10—featured an extended jam with ex-Cream bassist Jack Bruce, as well as by-now-typical dirty jokes and satires. The 1975 Bongo Fury album reunited Zappa with Beefheart. The latter had fallen out with Zappa after Trout Mask, accusing Zappa of marketing him as "a freak."

After producing Grand Funk Railroad's Good Singin', Good Playin' in 1976, Zappa filed a lawsuit against Herb Cohen in 1977 and severed ties with Warner Bros., moving to Mercury two years later. There he set up Zappa Records and retired the Mothers name, calling all later groups Zappa. On the new label he released Sheik Yerbouti (a pun on KC and the Sunshine Band's "Shake Your Booty"), including the song "Jewish Princess," over which the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League filed a complaint with the FCC against Zappa. That album also yielded a surprise hit single, "Dancin' Fool" (#45, 1979), which lampooned the disco crowd (Sheik peaked at #21 on the albums chart.) Joe's Garage, Act I, the first installment of a three-act rock opera, included "Catholic Girls," and Zappa's penchant for barbed attacks continued to infuriate his critics while strengthening his own following.

In 1979 Zappa also released the film Baby Snakes, a mélange of concert footage, dressing room slapstick, and clay-figure animation. The late-'70s Zappa bands included guitarist Adnan Belew (who later played with Talking Heads, King Crimson, and David Bowie) and drummer Terry Bozzio (who later with his wife Dale founded Missing Persons). In 1980 Zappa recorded a single, "I Don't Wanna Get Drafted," which Mercury refused to release, prompting him to leave the label and eventually establish his own Barking Pumpkin label.

In 1981 Zappa released his first Barking Pumpkin album; and that year, some ex-Mothers, including Jimmy Carl Black, Don Preston, and Bunk Gardner, united to form the Grandmothers. They toured and recorded, playing all-Zappa material from the Mothers' vintage late-'60s period. That April Zappa produced and hosted a New York City concert of music by Edgard Varèse. He also released a limited edition mail-order-only, three-album series, Shut Up 'n Play Yer Guitar.

Zappa parlayed stereotype satire into success once more with "Valley Girl" (#32, 1982) from the Drowning Witch album. The song parodied the spoiled daughters of entertainment-industry folk, specifically those in the San Bernardino Valley city of Encino, and featured inspired mimicry by then-14-year-old Moon Unit Zappa. In 1983 Zappa conducted works by Varèse and Anton Webern at San Francisco's War Memorial Opera House.

The '80s saw Zappa consolidating his business affairs; with Gail Zappa in charge, his companies included not only Barking Pumpkin (a mail-order label, distributed by Capitol) but Honker Home Video, Barfo-Swill (for Zappa merchandise), and World's Finest Optional Entertainment Co. (to produce live shows); he also arranged with Rykodisc to rerelease his catalogue on CD. A lifelong free-speech advocate, he testified before a Senate subcommittee in 1985 and assailed the Parents' Music Resource Center (excerpts from the hearings appeared on Frank Zappa Meets the Mothers of Prevention); throughout the decade, he also championed voter registration drives. In 1990, at the invitation of Czechoslovakian president Vaclav Havel, a longtime fan, Zappa served for several months as that country's trade, tourism, and cultural liaison to the West. The following year, he considered a run for the U.S. presidency.

Artistically, the '80s were also fertile years for Zappa. Early in the decade, the Berkeley Symphony performed his work; in 1984 conductor/composer Pierre Boulez released Boulez Conducts Zappa/The Perfect Stranger (#7, 1984 on the classical chart). In 1988 Zappa undertook a world tour (documented on Broadway the Hard Way) and won a Grammy for Best Rock Instrumental for Jazz From Hell, an album composed on Synclavier, a highly sophisticated synthesizer that in Zappa found one of its chief devotees. Among his other late-'80s projects were remastering his '60s work for CD and assembling six double-CD sets of live work entitled You Can't Do That on Stage Anymore. In 1989 Poseidon Press published his autobiography, The Real Frank Zappa Book.

In 1991, in New York City on the eve of a tribute concert entitled "Zappa's Universe," Moon Unit and Dweezil Zappa announced that their father had been diagnosed with prostate cancer. A lifelong teetotaler and abstainer from drugs (Zappa, however, smoked cigarettes and drank coffee incessantly), the composer continued a rigorous work schedule. In 1992 he completed a two-CD sequel to Lumpy Gravy, Civilization Phase III and in 1993 recorded both The Yellow Shark, an album of his compositions by the classical group Ensemble Modern, and, also with the Ensemble, an album of Varèse works tentatively entitled The Rage and the Fury: The Music of Edgard Varèse. Frank Zappa died on the evening of December 4, 1993, at his L.A. home; he was 52 years old.

He had over the years remixed or remastered all of his recorded output for CD releases; nearly everything has since been rereleased on Rykodisc. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1995. That year also saw the publication, from St. Martin's Press, of Ben Watson's Frank Zappa: The Negative Dialectics of Poodle Play, an exhaustive post-modernist deconstruction/appreciation of the man's music. Four years later, he was remembered, perhaps more fittingly, by an all-Zappa program performed by the Florida Orchestra.

Warren Zevon

Born Jan. 24, 1947, Chicago, IL

1969—Wanted—Dead or Alive (Imperial) 1976—Warren Zevon (Asylum) 1978—Excitable Boy 1980—Bad Luck Streak in Dancing School; Stand in the Fire 1982—The Envoy 1987—A Quiet Normal Life: The Best of Warren Zevon; Sentimental Hygiene (Virgin) 1989—Transverse City 1991—Mr. Bad Example (Giant) 1993—Learning to Flinch 1995—Mutineer 1996—I'll Sleep When I'm Dead (An Anthology) (Rhino) 2000—Life'll Kill Ya (Artemis).

Singer/songwriter Warren Zevon's ironic tales of physical and psychological mayhem have earned him a cult following and companions to figures as diverse as Dorothy Parker, Raymond Chandler, Sam Peckinpah, and Martin Scorsese.

The son of Russian immigrants, Zevon grew up in Arizona and California. He studied music briefly, and after meeting Igor Stravinsky during his junior high school years, Zevon taught himself to play guitar and began writing songs. He played in local bands and at age 16 moved to New York, then to the Bay Area. He wrote songs (including "She Quit Me Man," used in the film Midnight Cowboy) and released his debut LP, Wanted—Dead or Alive. It was poorly received, and he went to work writing jingles (for Ernest and Julio Gallo wine ads, a famous ketchup, and the Chevrolet Camaro) and as pianist and bandleader for the Everly Brothers shortly before their breakup. Over the next couple of years he continued to work with each brother separately.

In 1976 Linda Ronstadt covered Zevon's "Hasten Down the Wind" on her album of the same title. The next year two more of Zevon's songs appeared on Ronstadt's Simple Dreams: "Carmelita" and "Poor Poor Pitiful Me," the latter of which was a hit for Ronstadt in 1978. Zevon, who had been living in Spain, was persuaded by his friend Jackson Browne to return to the U.S. and record. Browne produced Warren Zevon, which was released to critical acclaim; he would produce or coproduce all of Zevon's albums through and including A Quiet Normal Life: The Best of Warren Zevon.

In 1978 Zevon had a #21 single with "Werewolves of London" from Excitable Boy (#8). But his career was temporarily set back by his alcoholism. He did not record for two years, and his live performances were few and erratic. His two 1980 releases, Bad Luck Streak in Dancing School (#20) and the live Stand in the Fire (#20), represented something of a comeback for Zevon. He announced he had given up alcohol and he released The Envoy (#93, 1982), the title track written about U.S. envoy to the Mideast Philip Habib. Sentimental Hygiene (#87, 1987) appeared five years later, with backing from members of R.E.M. He also recorded with three-quarters of that group under the name Hindu Love Gods in 1990.

While Zevon continues to be appreciated by critics, his sometimes edgy, satirical work eludes the mass audience. Transverse City, a science-fiction-inspired concept album, and Mr. Bad Example were not received as warmly as Zevon's earlier work. But starting with his second live album, 1993's Learning to Flinch, Zevon bounced back, showing that he retains his unique, original vision and remains a compelling writer and performer. And he also has a circle of dedicated admirers: He was invited to perform "Lawyers, Guns and Money" at Minnesota Governor Jesse Ventura's inauguration party in 1998, and he is a regular guest on Late Night With David Letterman, occasionally filling in for bandleader Paul Shaffer. The pared-down Life'll Kill Ya (which included a cover of Steve Winwood's "Back in the High Life Again") was released in 2000 to excellent reviews.

In the early '90s, Zevon composed and/or performed a number of theme songs and scores for television series, including The Drug Wars (1990), Tales From the Crypt (1992), Route 66 (1993), and Tekwar (1993).

The Zombies

Formed 1963, Hertfordshire, Eng.

Colin Blunstone (b. June 24, 1945, Hatfield, Eng.), voc.; Paul Atkinson (b. Mar. 19, 1946, Cuffley, Eng.), gtr.; Rod Argent (b. June 14, 1945, St. Albans, Eng.), kybds., voc.; Hugh Grundy (b. Mar. 6, 1945, Winchester, Eng.), drums; Paul Arnold (b. Eng.), bass.

1964—(– Arnold; + Chris White [b. Mar. 7, 1943, Barnet, Eng.], bass) 1965—Begins Here (Decca) 1969—Odessey and Oracle (Date) 1973—Time of the Zombies (Epic) 1985—Live on the BBC: 1965–1967 (Rhino) 1990—Greatest Hits (Digital Compact Classics) 1998—Zombie Heaven (Big Beat, U.K.).

Though the Zombies had several major hits, their career was a frustrating one. Paul Atkinson, Rod Argent, and Hugh Grundy met at St. Albans School, and they soon linked up with Colin Blunstone and bassist Paul Arnold. Six months later Arnold was replaced by Chris White. After winning a rock-band contest held by a local newspaper, they auditioned with British Decca in 1964. That July, the electric-piano-centered "She's Not There" was released; it became a worldwide smash, going to #2 in America. A second single, "Leave Me Be," failed, but "Tell Her No" went Top 10, their last hit for some time. They also contributed songs to the movie Bunny Lake Is Missing.

In 1967 they recorded a final LP, Odessey and Oracle (the only album the band themselves approve of). They broke up two weeks after it was completed, in December 1967. Columbia staff producer Al Kooper fought to have the album issued; when it was released, in late 1968, it yielded a #1 gold hit in "Time of the Season." The band declined to re-form, although sizable sums were offered to the musicians. Argent already was moving ahead on plans for his eponymous band [see entry] and others were fed up with the music business. Blunstone had first gone back to working in an insurance office, then to working as a singer under the name Neil MacArthur. With that pseudonym he had a 1970 hit with a remake of "She's Not There." He made several, Epic-released solo LPs under his own name, beginning in 1971 with One Year (produced by Argent and White). In 1978 the unsuccessful Never Even Thought appeared on Elton John's Rocket Records. Blunstone has since formed a group called Keats. He also sang on several records by the Alan Parsons Project.

Atkinson first went into programming computers. He later worked in A&R, first for Columbia in New York, and later at RCA, where he was vice president of West Coast A&R. Grundy also worked in Columbia's A&R department, but in the '80s he ran a horse transport business near London. White cowrote songs and produced records for Argent (for whom he wrote "Hold Your Head Up"). In the '70s he helped discover Dire Straits. Original bassist Arnold became a doctor in Scotland. Epic released a two-record "best-of," Time of the Zombies, in 1973. The four-CD Zombie Heaven renewed pop fans' interest in the band. By the late '90s, critics often referred to Odessey and Oracle as the British equivalent of the Beach Boys' masterpiece Pet Sounds. By the decade's end, Argent had finished an album of classical piano and Blunstone had resumed his solo touring after over 20 years. He continues to record on his own as well. The two performed together in New York for the first time in more than 30 years as part of Cave Stomp at the Village Underground nightclub.

Composer, instrumentalist, musical subversist John Zorn was the most important figure to emerge from New York's Downtown avant-garde music scene. Zorn became interested in jazz while briefly attending the liberal Webster College in St. Louis and began studying the alto saxophone.

By the time he returned to his hometown, New York, in 1974, Zorn had already developed his own theories of composition and improvisation, incorporating ideas from traditional and avant-garde strains of jazz, classical, rock, and a panoply of international aesthetics. With his whirlwind energy Zorn became the vortex of the new musical polyglot that was brewing among adventurous players on New York's Lower East Side. His hand in a multitude of projects—from bebop tributes to obscure jazzmen to epic performances of Cobra, which applied rules of game playing to free improvisation—Zorn galvanized the scene.

While Zorn's work is generally released by independent and European labels that cater to the avant-garde, he began recording for Elektra/Nonesuch in the mid-'80s, beginning with The Big Gundown, a twisted tribute to cult film composer Ennio Morricone, and Spillane, which featured bluesman Albert Collins. Zorn's projects drew upon a pool of like-minded innovators, including guitarist Elliott Sharp, keyboardist Wayne Horvitz, and drummer Bobby Previte.

By the late '80s Zorn was dividing his year between New York and Tokyo. With Fred Frith, Bill Frisell, and Joey Baron, Zorn formed the band Naked City, which touched on, among myriad musics, his new fascination with thrash rock. Zorn's Spy Vs. Spy band transformed Ornette Coleman's music with its slamming full-force interpretations. In September 1993, in honor of Zorn's 40th birthday, the Knitting Factory (New York's chief downtown avant-garde music club) presented Zorn for a solid month, enabling him to cover a wide if incomplete spectrum of his musical endeavors. The '90s, in fact, found Zorn developing into an incredibly prolific composer. Appointed in 1993 the curator of the Radical New Jewish Culture Festival in New York, throughout the decade Zorn explored his Jewish heritage with two groups: Bar Kokhba and Masada, which combined traditional Jewish and klezmer music with Ornette Coleman-style experimentation. He recorded extensively for DIW, a Japanese jazz label, and for his own labels, Tzadik and Avant, which is a DIW subsidiary.

ZZ Top began as a rough-and-ready blues-rock power trio from Texas that became a huge mid-'70s concert attraction.

ZZ Top: Dusty Hill,
Frank Beard, Billy Gibbons

Their real commercial peak didn't come, however, until the '80s, when the "Little Ol' Band from Texas" became MTV superstars and sold multiple millions of albums.

ZZ Top was built around guitarist Billy Gibbons, whose career began with the popular Southwestern band Moving Sidewalks, whose "99th Floor" was a regional mid-'60s hit. They opened one night for Jimi Hendrix, and he later mentioned Gibbons on The Tonight Show as one of America's best young guitarists. After Moving Sidewalks broke up, Gibbons and manager/producer Bill Ham recruited Frank Beard and Dusty Hill from a Dallas band, American Blues.

Beginning with the release of First Album in 1970, ZZ Top has toured constantly, building a national following that has made all the band's albums gold or platinum. A year-long tour in 1976, the Worldwide Texas Tour, was one of the largest-grossing road trips in rock at the time. Onstage with the band were snakes, longhorn cattle, buffalo, cactus, and other Southwestern paraphernalia. The group sold over a million tickets. They didn't record for the next three years, until 1979's Deguello. Though ZZ Top's only major hit singles had been Tres Hombres' "La Grange" (#41, 1973) and Fandango!'s "Tush" (#20, 1975), their albums consistently made the Top 40.

With 1983's Eliminator, ZZ Top made a quantum leap from best-kept secret to massive stardom. Thanks to smartly directed video clips for such songs as "Gimme All Your Lovin'" (#37, 1983), "Sharp Dressed Man" (#56, 1983), "Legs" (#8, 1983), and "TV Dinners," Gibbons and Hill, with their long beards (ironically Frank Beard usually wore only a moustache), became MTV icons, as did the cherry red 1933 Ford coupe (restored by Gibbons) that gave the album its name, and which the band drove in the videos. Thanks to this exposure, a whole new audience began buying the band's albums, and Eliminator (#9, 1983) eventually sold some 10 million copies, remaining on the chart for over three and a half years. "Legs" introduced a pulsating synthesizer beat into ZZ Top's crunching blues-rock riffs.

The trend continued with Afterburner (#4, 1985), which contained such video hits as "Rough Boy" (#22, 1985), "Sleeping Bag" (#8, 1985), "Velcro Fly" (#35, 1986), and "Stages" (#21, 1986). The album sold over 3 million copies. After another long world tour, ZZ Top—which had long been based in Houston—announced that, through NASA, it had booked passage as the first lounge band on the space shuttle (though the band has yet to actually fly a mission).

At the peak of its success, ZZ Top still remembered its roots, and launched a fundraising drive to erect a Delta Blues Museum in Clarksdale, Mississippi. At a special ceremony the band unveiled the "Muddywood" guitar, made from a beam taken from the sharecropper's shack in which blues giant Muddy Waters had been raised, and which Gibbons donated to the museum.

ZZ Top appeared to have finally tapped out the motherlode with Recycler (#6, 1990), which sold a relatively disappointing 1 million units, and yielded only minor hits in "Doubleback" (#50, 1990) and "Give It Up" (#79, 1990). After Warner Bros. released Greatest Hits, ZZ Top left the label and signed a $30 million deal with RCA. The band's first album for the new label, Antenna, was named in tribute to rock radio—especially the Mexican border stations of the '50s and '60s that influenced the band. The album entered the chart at #14 but dropped rapidly and failed to yield a hit single. Still, Antenna went platinum, proving the band still had a considerable fan base.

But while ZZ Top remains a popular touring attraction, its late-'90s albums have fared poorly on the chart. Rhythmeen (#29, 1996) did well enough, but XXX (#100, 1999), a mix of live and studio recordings, had dropped out of the Billboard Top 200 three months after its release. The band performed at President George W. Bush's inaugural ceremonies in January 2001.

Completely updated with new entries and extensive revisions of the previous 1,800, THE ROLLING STONE ENCYCLOPEDIA of ROCK & ROLL is the authoritative volume on the world's music makers—from the one-hit wonders to the megastars.

In 1983, Rolling Stone Press introduced its first Encyclopedia of Rock & Roll. Almost two decades later, it has become the premier guide to the history of rock & roll and has been selected by the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame & Museum as its official source of information. Giving full coverage to all aspects of the rock scene, it tells the story of rock & roll in a clear and easy reference format, including complete discographies, personnel changes for every band, and backstage information like date and place of birth, from Elvis Presley to Eminem.

Since the last edition, the music scene has exploded in every area, from boybands to hip-hop, electronica to indie rock. The Encyclopedia explores them all—N Sync, Notorious B.I.G., Ricky Martin, Radiohead, Britney Spears, Blink-182, Sean Combs, Portishead, Fatboy Slim, Fiona Apple, Lil' Kim, Limp Bizkit, Oasis, Outkast, Yo La Tengo, TLC, and many, many more. The ROLLING STONE Encyclopedia of Rock & Roll, Third Edition includes all the facts, phenomena, and flukes that make up the history of rock.

Accompanying the biographical and discographical information on the nearly 2,000 artists included in this edition are incisive essays that reveal the performers' musical influences, first breaks, and critical and commercial hits and misses, as well as evaluations of their place in rock history. Filled with hundreds of historical photos, The ROLLING STONE Encyclopedia is more than just a reference book, it is the bible of rock & roll.
