INTRODUCTION

Welcome to PANOSE, an exciting new system of typeface classification. PANOSE is the first accessible, informative specimen system. In PANOSE, typeface styles are arranged according to certain style and appearance characteristics. Because the specimen listing is organized by visual characteristics, similar styles are displayed near one another, with their differences noted. Much like a nature guide that enables you to find the name of a particular tree by noting special features of its leaves or bark, PANOSE uses a seven-digit numerical classification system based on features of individual typefaces to help you quickly locate the exact typeface you desire. The 240 display fonts were chosen on the basis of both their popularity and the variety they give to the book. PANOSE also includes a single-feature cross-reference chart for each typeface, which allows you to find similar faces that have only one different feature. Finally, an alphabetical index provides access to the nearly 350 various type families listed in this manual, totaling over 500 individual fonts.

This sourcebook can be used by anyone interested in type, regardless of experience. If you are a student or client, selecting type for the first time or the fiftieth, the PANOSE system can help you locate the style you want, regardless of your knowledge of type names or historical periods. Identify the characteristics of a type style you want, and use the classification index to find it as well as to locate similar fonts. Artists and designers will find PANOSE indispensable for matching an existing typeface or for finding a new variation of an old favorite. Teachers, historians, and professionals will appreciate the natural groupings that occur in PANOSE; families such as single-weight Egyptian, and visually similar groups such as Stressed Sans Serif are on adjacent pages for easy comparison and accurate identification.

USING THIS BOOK

You can locate type specimens in this book in four different ways, depending on what you are looking for and your knowledge of type.

Even with little or no knowledge of typography, you should be able to choose the seven digits concerning serifs, proportion, form, stroke, and other details in order to determine a classification number. Once you have decided on the classification number for the font, look in the Classification Index at the back of this book to find the corresponding display page number where your desired type style is located. With very little practice, you should be able to generate numbers in less than a minute to locate whatever typeface you desire, if it exists. In some instances, the numbers you choose will have no exact match in the Classification Index. In these cases, find the closest number and use the cross-reference chart on the specified page to locate the variation of the displayed font that meets your needs.

The second method of access to the display section is used when you want to match or identify an existing type style. When choosing the number-generating digits, you should usually avoid the options followed by a bullet, which indicates that an option is seldom used and so few faces with it will be available. When matching type, however, it is not necessary to avoid options with bullets; in fact, these bulleted options will usually speed up your matching process. Once you have determined a number based on characteristics, you can find a name for your style and a display page number in the Classification Index. The display page will provide positive identification, as well as a cross-reference chart that lists alternate pages to check in case you have an imperfect match.

For the experienced designer or typographer, the Stylistic Index lists both historical periods and various stylistic families of type by name, along with their corresponding classification and page numbers. Because the type styles are categorized by appearance, most families and historical periods are adjacent in the body of the display section. If, for instance, you are interested in an Egyptian type font, the Stylistic Index will list the areas of the book where the Egyptian styles are found. For an experienced designer or typographer, the Stylistic Index can therefore be even more expedient to use than the number-generating process.

Finally, for the expert typographer who knows all type by name and has less need for an arrangement of type by style, there is the Alphabetical Index. This index lists by name all the fonts displayed in this manual as well as any names referred to in the alternate names section of each display page and provides a corresponding classification and display page number.

There is one more intended use for this book: thumbing through it. It is the least time effective, but if you are not in a hurry, it will provide the greatest educational use of this resource. The list of fonts compiled in this book is vast; many are new designs. Thumbing through, in what used to be the only way to access a specimen book, gives you exposure to new faces and allows you to develop new design application ideas.

USING THE NUMBER GENERATOR

This book classifies a wide range of standard text and display type styles. The following is an explanation of the categories and features used to generate the seven-digit classification number by which the type styles in this book are arranged. These options do not attempt to pinpoint the dimension, size, or weight of a particular typeface; those variations are shown on the display page or surrounding pages in the display section to which the classification number will guide you.

Many of the options provided in the different categories listed below are applicable to only a few type styles and are rarely seen. These options are followed by a bullet and should be avoided in the process of determining a classification number for the font you desire, as you may not find an appropriate type style with the number you specify, simply because no such typeface exists. Usually these options can be explored by using the cross-reference chart once you have located a proper starting page in the display section. Remember, this book can quickly locate a typeface for you, but at this point it cannot design one. Maybe next year.

1. SERIF STYLE

The first decision you must make in selecting a type style is whether or not the design you are looking for has feet, known as serifs, and what those serifs look like. Sans serif means “without feet.” Ten choices are provided for how the serifs, or lack thereof, should appear.

The selection of a serif style will greatly influence the appearance of the type style you choose. It is also the most difficult option set to work through. The choices listed are very general; more minute variations are usually available among the final alphabets found in the display section. It should also be noted that a serif style may change within a single family as the character’s weight increases. The PANOSE system uses the serif style of the medium weight to classify the type. The ten choices are:

1. Cove serif
2. Square serif
3. Square cove serif
4. Thin line serif
5. Exaggerated serif •
6. Triangle serif •
7. Square normal end sans serif
8. Square perpendicular end sans serif •
9. Flared end sans serif
0. Rounded end sans serif •

SERIF

1. Cove Serif

The first option for a serif is the cove serif, by far the most common of any listed in this book, and it is easy to distinguish. The cove serif is nothing more than a line whose connection to the supporting leg has been softened by the addition of rounded coves to the inside corners.

The cove serifs appear in a great variety of ways. If you are attempting to match a cove serif design, be certain that it fits these three criteria: it is significantly rounded at the inside corners—otherwise it is a triangular serif; its tips come to a point, sharp or dull, yet not flat; and the serif is a striking element of the font’s design. The cove serifs may be slightly cusped, dull, short, or long. If the serif is very small, it might be classified as a flared sans serif.

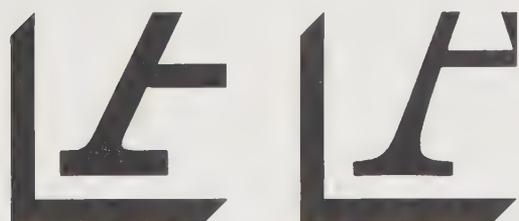

2. Square Serif

2. Square Serif

2. Square Serif

3. Square Cove Serif

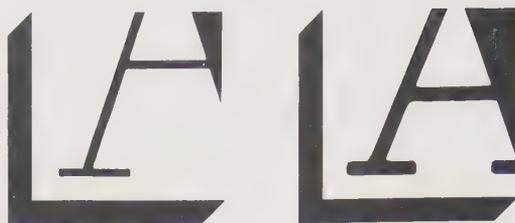

3. Square Cove Serif

3. Square Cove Serif

The square serif and its companion, the square cove, distinguish a group of type styles known as the Egyptian family. The requirement for classification as a square serif is simple: a square serif must have at least two corners on each serif. The square cove, as you might expect, is a softened version of the strict square serif.

In comparison to other serif styles, the square serif (or slab serif) is the most easily identified. Identification of the square cove is moderately more difficult because of the softening of the connection to the supporting leg. In classifying a square cove serif, be certain that the left and right sides of the serif have a straight, flat appearance; otherwise the serif style might be more similar to a cove serif or even to that of an exaggerated serif.

4. Thin Line Serif

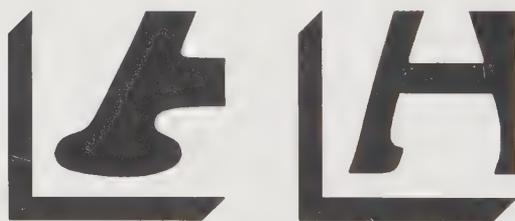

4. Thin Line Serif

4. Thin Line Serif

The thin line serif is the modern variation of the cove serif. The major difference between the two is that the thin line serif is not softened at the contact point between the supporting arm and the serif. The thin line serif includes any serif style that is uncoved and light. In some instances the difference between a thin line serif and a square serif is very difficult to distinguish. In these cases the serif is classified according to its weight, the lighter being thin line and the heavier being square.

Both of the serifs illustrated fall into the thin line serif category. If the right-most example of the thin line serif styles were any heavier or more flat-edged it would surely be a square serif.

5. Exaggerated Serif •

5. Exaggerated Serif

5. Exaggerated Serif

Because of the infinite variety of serif styles, the exaggerated serif category is used to classify those styles that do not easily fall into the standard description categories. Included in this category are the very heavy bone-shaped serifs and the strongly cusped designs. In addition to these types, there are also overemphasized and unclassifiable serif styles. Often these fonts are display fonts that border on being classified as decorative.

The serifs shown may meet the requirements of one of the other serif styles, but because of their odd or exaggerated appearance, they are classified in this category.

6. Triangle Serif •

6. Triangle Serif

6. Triangle Serif

Very few fonts incorporate the triangular serif. It is a sharp and awkward serif invented by the mind, not the eye. It is most easily seen in the typeface known as Maximal, a popular face, primarily by virtue of its triangular serifs.

Triangular serifs are very rare. Be certain, if you are matching an existing font, that the inside corners are absolutely flat; if they have any curve to them, the font is likely to be classified as having cove serifs.

SANS SERIF

The remaining serif variations describe sans serif letter styles. The sans serif leg-end styles are much easier to classify than the serif styles, mainly because they have much less variation.

7. Square Normal End

7. Square Normal End

7. Square Normal End

8. Square Perpendicular End •

8. Square Perpendicular End

8. Square Perpendicular End

Sans serif letterforms have primarily two types of leg-end styles: the square normal and the square perpendicular. The leg ends of the square normal style must either lie flat on the base line or meet it at 90 degrees. The square perpendicular leg ends, on the other hand, must always be at a 90-degree angle to their supporting arm. This is most obvious in diagonal letterforms, such as A, V, and sometimes M. The square perpendicular option is rarely used; thus it is followed by a bullet.

9. Flared End

9. Flared End

9. Flared End

The flared end style can be easily confused with a small cove serif. Watch for two differences. First, most flared end style serifs start to widen much higher on the supporting leg than do small cove serifs. Second, in a number of contemporary fonts, very minute serifs have been added to what traditionally were sans serif letterforms. In these cases, the serif is classified here as a flared end rather than a small cove because most of these “serifed sans serif” faces, in keeping with other sans serif faces, have little or no contrast within the letterform. See category 3 for a more in-depth description of contrast.

0. Rounded End •

0. Rounded End

0. Rounded End

The rounded end is very rare and should be used only to match an existing typeface. Category 0 is used when the leg end is round instead of flat. Moreover, additional fonts have been classified under this option if the overall feeling or color of the letters is rounded. In all, if a font has any rounded corners that are traditionally square in other fonts, it will be classified in this category.

2. PROPORTION

Proportion is not the shape of individual letters; rather, it is their relationship to each other. Proportion is determined by such details as the geometric rules that are used to construct the letters, as well as overall specifications such as condensed and expanded.

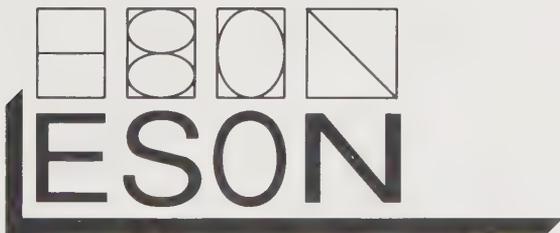

The first three proportion categories are the most difficult to identify because they are all subsets of what we would normally call plain letters, in that they are neither condensed or expanded. In these options we see how the geometry of various letterforms works to create a well-balanced alphabet.

1. Old Style

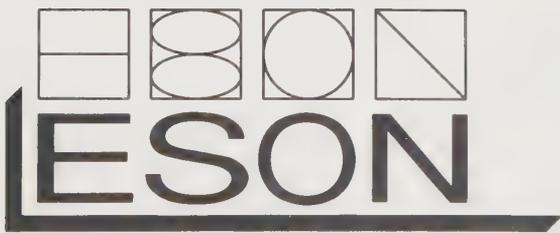

1. Old Style Proportion

2. Modern

2. Modern Proportion

3. Even Width

3. Even Width Proportion

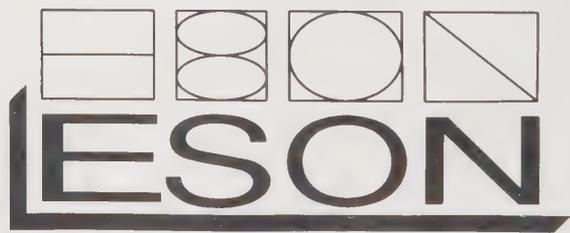

Letter designs throughout history have followed an amazingly straightforward progression with regard to their proportional changes. The early type styles are generally known as old style. The proportions of these letters are strictly geometrical; consequently, the individual letter widths vary greatly. The geometric system by which the letters of this style are constructed is based on the three primary letter shapes: the square, the circle, and the triangle. For example, the letter O is formed from a perfect circle, while the letter S is formed from two circles placed one on top of another. This results in the S being one-half the width of the O. The same situation occurs in the square shapes, as demonstrated by the double-shaped letters F and E. The letter E is formed by the stacking of two squares, making it narrow in relation to the single-shaped letters. Letters with triangular shapes have the same characteristic: the construction of the double-triangle X is half the width of the single-triangle V.

Type designs from the modern period lose their strict geometry and become less varied in width. The circular O becomes an oval, and the arms of the once narrow letter E are elongated to make it more compatible with the single-shape letterforms.

Finally, there is the even width category, typified by more contemporary type styles, where letters have been stretched and compressed until they are all of nearly equal width. You can see the return of the strict full-size geometric shapes in letters such as O and V, while the two-part letters continue to expand, as seen in the letters E and S. Also included in this category are the fonts that, while neither modern nor condensed, have full-form letters that are slightly taller than they are wide, such as Eurostile and Univers.

4. Expanded

4. Expanded Proportion

Those letters with standard widths greater than the height of the uppercase letters are classified as expanded. Expanded letterforms can be easily identified by looking at the capital O. If it is a wide oval, the overall dimensions of the characters have been expanded, creating a style of great stability and width.

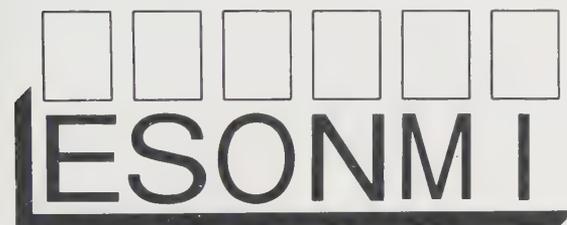

5. Condensed

5. Condensed Proportion

Condensed letters are the opposites of expanded letters. The condensed option is a little more difficult to judge because no single character can be used to identify it easily, as the O can for expanded fonts. Most often the font name itself will be identified as condensed. In those instances where this is not the case, the uppercase O is again used for reference, although it is difficult to distinguish between a modern and a condensed O, both being ovals. The more exaggerated the oval, the more likely it is that the font is condensed.

6. Monospaced (Typewriter)

6. Monospaced Proportion

Unlike even width—which has the appearance of even spacing between the letterforms, though the rules are broken for narrow letters like I and wide letters like M—each letter in a monospaced font has the same character width and spacing. Monospaced fonts are also typically known as typewriter fonts because they mimic the letter widths and spacing created by an old-fashioned typewriter. With the advent of modern typesetting, many of these styles became available in various media from hot to digital type, and several were developed into fonts in their own right. Some of these so-called typewriter fonts have dropped their true monospacing in favor of greater legibility; nonetheless, they are classified as monospace because of their typewritten appearance.

3. CONTRAST

Most letters have stems and arms of varying thicknesses; usually the horizontal members are thinner than the vertical. The Contrast category details the relationship between a letter's members, describing the structural contrast between the heavy and the light elements of the individual letterforms. Contrast does not have anything to do with the surrounding whiteness of the page or the contrasts among different letters; this category deals only with contrasts in elements of a character. Be careful not to confuse Contrast with weight when examining options here. Once again, the uppercase O acts as a good reference character to determine the contrast of a given font.

The choices you make in this Contrast category will determine which set of options you should look at in the next category, Stroke Variation (4A) or Arm Type (4B). If you choose options 1 through 5 in this category, go to 4A, Stroke Variation. If you choose option 6, go to 4B, Arm Type.

1. Low

Fonts that have low contrast are generally those serifed styles with only a very slight variation between the weights of the stems and the arms.

2. Medium Low

Medium low styles show subtle variations in contrast and maintain a very soft appearance. Many of the Old Style fonts will be found in this option, as will the optically refined sans serif fonts, such as Optima and Souvenir Gothic.

3. Medium

Medium contrast is the most common option for serifed fonts. Included in this selection are the myriad of fonts that have good typographical contrast yet are not designed to draw attention to their structural variety.

4. Medium High

Most of the modern fonts have medium high contrast, with a visible contrast between the stems and arms of the letters. This contrast is accentuated by the use of equally thin serifs.

5. High

Those fonts that use extreme contrast between stems and arms to create a dramatic effect are the only styles classified as high contrast.

6. None

If a type style has no variation in width between the stems and arms of its characters, it is said to be a single-stroke letterform and is classified here as having no contrast. Most of the fonts so classified will be sans serif styles, although many square serif styles are also single stroke. Often when the weight of a font becomes heavy, contrast is increased to provide adequate space for the horizontal arms; this increase in contrast also occurs in the rounded letterforms when they have been altered to increase legibility. Fonts are classified as having no contrast if the medium weight of the font is single stroke in form.

If you have chosen option 6, no contrast, then you will use category 4B to select your fourth digit.

1. Low Contrast

2. Medium Low Contrast

3. Medium Contrast

4. Medium High Contrast

5. High Contrast

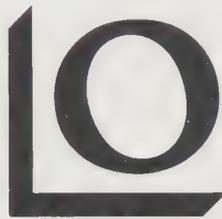

6. No Contrast

4A. STROKE VARIATION

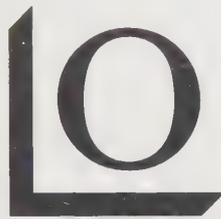

This category, used for double-stroke letters, identifies the speed at which a letter's stroke changes width and the direction of stress created by that change. The options for speed are gradual, abrupt, and instant. They are coupled with the options for stress, diagonal, vertical, horizontal, and mixed. These two sets of options are combined and listed below in their historical order, starting with typography's calligraphic beginnings, demonstrated by the diagonal stress and the gradual shifting of letter weight, continuing through the transitional period of mixed stresses, then to the modern period with its abrupt and strictly vertical stress, and finally the more decorative stroke variations of horizontal and instant vertical.

1. Gradual with diagonal stress
2. Gradual with mixed stress •
3. Gradual with vertical stress
4. Gradual with horizontal stress •
5. Abrupt with vertical stress
6. Abrupt with horizontal stress •
7. Instant vertical stress •

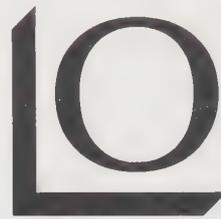

Option 2 provides a choice that is fairly rare. During what is known as the transitional period of type design, the stress of the letters changed from diagonal to vertical. Some alphabets designed during this period changed the stress in only the uppercase; the lowercase retained its diagonal stress. Thus, these faces have mixed stress. This option is not only seldom used, it is also often overlooked.

4B. ARM TYPE

To create some distinction among the various single-stroke font styles, this category details two different aspects of letter design. Although most of these options are directed toward sans serif letters, the few single-stroke serif designs that exist will be accommodated as well. The two variations covered here are Arm/Stem style and Round Letter Opening style. Each of the two topics has three variations; they are grouped into nine different options:

1. Straight arms, horizontal opening
2. Bowed arms, horizontal opening •
3. Concave arms, horizontal opening •
4. Straight arms, wedge opening
5. Bowed arms, wedge opening •
6. Concave arms, wedge opening •
7. Straight arms, vertical opening
8. Bowed arms, vertical opening •
9. Concave arms, vertical opening •

The first choice you must make in this category concerns stem and arm style. The definitions are quite simple. Straight arms applies to those fonts with arms (especially those of the uppercase A and W) that remain straight and parallel. Some of the bolder display fonts, which rely on the ability to bend their normally straight arms to compensate for their unwieldy weight, fall into the bowed arms option. The final option is for those fonts with concave stems and arms. These fonts are easiest to distinguish by evaluating the uppercase I, the sides of which will curve inward, rather than being perfectly parallel.

The second set of options defines the angle at which the opening of the uppercase C (and consequently the G and S) is set. See the illustration for an exaggerated display of horizontal, wedge, and vertical openings. In the horizontal option, the opening is parallel. If either of the opening angles is not horizontal or vertical, then the font has a wedge opening. Sometimes a wedge opening will actually be an inverse wedge. Most of the serified fonts classified as single stroke have a vertical opening.

1. Straight Arms

2. Bowed Arms

3. Concave Arms

1. Horizontal Opening

2. Wedge Opening

3. Vertical Opening

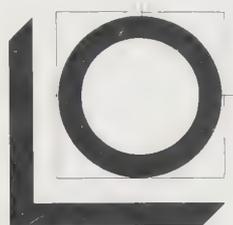

5. LETTERFORM

The form of a letter is very important for establishing the mood and appearance of any style. Classification is determined by evaluating the rounded letterforms, such as O and C, for six variations:

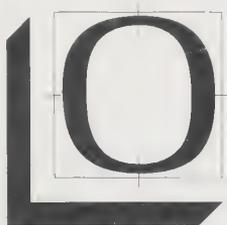

1. Contact
2. Boxed •
3. Flattened
4. Rounded •
5. Off center •
6. Square •

The first option, contact, is by far the most common: the exterior outline of the form comes in contact with the visual parameters of the letter's dimensions at only four points. Similar is the boxed option, in which there is still only one contact point per side, but the overall form of the rounded letters is square. In the flattened, or straight-sided, option, the letter will contact the edge of its external parameters for an extended length, thus flattening the sides of the rounded shapes. The top and bottom of the letterform, however, will still contact the dimensional limits at one point. The rounded option is provided for those forms that are primarily squares with dull corners, contacting the parameters for extended lengths on all four sides. Similarly, the square option is available for completely sharp, square-cornered letterforms. Off center forms are predominantly asymmetrical forms. Note that a contact style need not be a true circle: it can be an oval without flat sides.

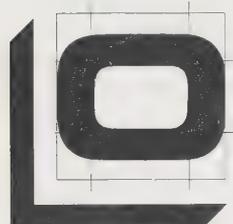

1. Contact

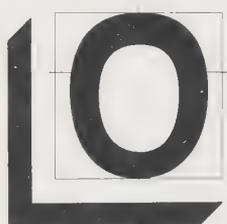

2. Boxed

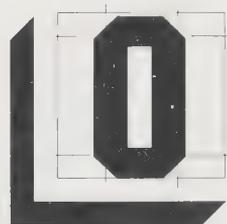

3. Flattened

4. Rounded

5. Off center

6. Square

6. MIDLINE

The Midline category encompasses two aspects of type design. The first option determines the position of the midline throughout the alphabet. This option offers four choices. These four choices are combined with the second option, which defines whether or not the apexes of pointed letterforms, such as uppercase A, W, and M, are trimmed flat or remain sharp.

1. Standard midline with trimmed apex
2. Standard midline with pointed apex
3. High standard midline with trimmed apex
4. High standard midline with pointed apex
5. Constant midline with trimmed apex
6. Constant midline with pointed apex
7. Constant low midline with trimmed apex •
8. Constant low midline with pointed apex •

Type designers have handled the midline positions in various ways. Standard midline position generally is centered slightly high throughout most of the alphabet, with the exception of the uppercase A, which is usually set equally low. A common variation on this standard is to place the midline noticeably higher than average and to drop the midline of the A considerably lower. This style is classified as high standard. The last two options, both rather decorative, pertain to those fonts without a variation in the midline of the A. These two options apply to fonts that have their midlines entirely set in the middle, constant midline, and those that are entirely set low, constant low midline. There are also a very few entirely high-set midline positions, which have been classified under the high standard option.

A trimmed apex is, it would seem, a very simple concept to visualize: if the top of an uppercase A is flat, it is considered trimmed; if it is not flat, it is considered pointed. Yet two difficulties arise. First, many sans serif fonts have only a very small flat area, one that is hardly noticeable. Second, some serifed fonts with sharp apexes have right arms that overlap the left arm beneath and to the left of the apex. (For example, see the serifed A in the serif style illustration on page ix.) Hence two more rules are added to the determination of the apex trim: to be considered trimmed, the flat area at the top of the letter must be greater than half the width of the wider arm to be considered trimmed, and to be considered pointed, the point at the top of the uppercase A must be clean and undisturbed to be considered pointed.

1. Trimmed Apex

2. Pointed Apex

1. Standard Midline

2. Standard High Midline

3. Constant Midline

4. Constant Low Midline

7. x HEIGHT

The x height of a typeface is the height beyond which the bodies of lowercase letters do not extend, generally measured as the height of the lowercase X. The size relationship between uppercase and lowercase letters varies considerably and is an important factor in a style's readability as well as the overall color of a page of typed copy. The four options here are based upon the relationship of the lowercase letters to the uppercase.

1. Small
2. Standard
3. Large
4. All caps

Lowercase letters slightly larger than half the uppercase size are standard. Those lowercase letters less than 50 percent of the uppercase height are considered small. Lowercase letters taller than 70 percent of the uppercase height are classified as large. In many display faces, no lowercase is available, and these are the all-cap fonts of option 4.

This concludes the number-generating process. Make sure you have seven digits in your number, and then locate the seven-digit number in the Classification Index. This index will provide a corresponding display page number. If no index number is similar to the classification you have chosen, recheck your number, making sure the digits are in proper order. If they are correct and you still find no similar listing in the Classification Index, choose the closest number available in the index and turn to the corresponding display page. It is often possible to use the cross-reference chart on the display page to find alternate styles of the given type that better fit your needs.

1. Small x Height

2. Standard x Height

3. Large x Height

4. All Caps

USING THE SPECIMEN PAGES

At the top of each specimen page are the font's name and classification number. Below the font name is an alphabet printed in a medium weight (if available). The entire alphabet has been printed vertically down the page so that the page can be folded back for easy comparison with a font on a different page. Red circles are drawn around identifying characteristics of each letter to indicate what makes this style different from others that might share this font's classification number.

In order to demonstrate the appearance of the type style in different weights, the uppercase letters P, A, N, O, S, and E and the lowercase letters a, b, e, g, k, m, o, q, s, and t are printed in all available weight variations beneath the classification number. These sixteen letters were selected because they represent the various basic letterforms, making it easy, in conjunction with the full alphabet listing to the left, to visualize the appearance of the other thirty-six. Beneath each of the display samples is a name label noting the full name of the preceding font.

If an unusual stylistic change occurs because of change in weight, it will either be displayed on the specimen page or a separate classification number will be listed and its specimen page noted above the font information chart. If a type style has companion alphabets, such as condensed or expanded, these variations will usually have separate classification numbers and their specimen pages can be found in the cross-reference chart. If there are not sufficient weight variations in a companion alphabet to warrant a separate specimen page, the variations that do exist will be shown on the same page that displays the roman (noncondensed, nonexpanded) style of the font.

USING THE REFERENCE INFORMATION

Below each specimen display is a cross-reference chart. When you are selecting a type style, there is often one characteristic that you wish you could alter. You could spend many hours paging through an ordinary specimen book in search of that “just right” style, or you could use the PANOSE cross-reference chart, which directs you to similar type styles if they exist. This chart, at the bottom of each page, offers digit-by-digit variations of the current classification number and lists the corresponding display page numbers of these slightly altered styles. Often the pages listed on the cross-reference chart merely reflect an adequate alternative that is close to the specifications you desire. If, on the other hand, the page listed on the chart is circled in red, this alternate is an identical digit match to your current classification number, with the exception of the single digit for which you have specified a change.

In addition to the cross-reference chart, other information is given about the font in a box above and to the right of the chart. The first information in the box is the name of the vendor who supplied the specimen for the font display. Since some font names are unprotected, many type styles with the same names are slightly altered by different suppliers to suit their needs. Knowing exactly whose font you are looking at can be very handy.

The second line of information contains the type’s proposed use as display or text. Often both are plausible uses; the most appropriate use is listed first. Usually this purpose is self-evident.

Similar names are then provided, listing type-faces that are visually related and can be found in different sourcebooks. The listed names are usually less conventional and more ornate. PANOSE does not attempt to classify decorative type styles.

Below the similar-names listing is information on the media for which this font is currently available. Although most hot-type casting methods are no longer used, many unique hot styles are included in this book because digital fonts, which are entering the market at an astonishing rate, are often remakes of popular hot fonts of the past. There is no reason to assume that a popular font will be discontinued because of the changes in typographic technology. Use the information in this list as a minimum listing of the different media currently available. The media included are: hot (including both foundry- and line-casting methods); photo (any method where a film negative font is projected onto light-sensitive paper); dry transfer (adhesive sheets of characters to be pressed onto paste-up boards); digital (fonts held in a computer as geometric formulas and imaged onto light-sensitive paper with a directed laser beam); and bit-mapped (fonts composed of dots on a grid; these fonts are used on both computer monitors and high-resolution laser printers). Concerning the two computer media, digital and bit-mapped, two additional distinctions are noted. PostScript is a new page description language which is capable of very sophisticated type manipulation. Many popular fonts are being converted into this format. These fonts are distinguished by a PS in the media listing. Also, Bitstream Inc. has digitizing fonts to create a library of high-quality outline font descriptions. These outlines can be converted into bit-mapped characters for a wide variety of laser printer, digital typesetter, and video applications. These fonts are listed with a BT. More popular faces will continue to be reworked as technology advances.

The similar fonts list generally recommends a few fonts which are different in appearance yet similar in feeling to the displayed font. These are often less popular fonts with classification numbers similar to the displayed font, that either were not able to be included in this book or are located on a nonadjacent page.

Also provided is a list of alternate names. These names often reflect fonts that differ only slightly from the shown font. In these cases an abbreviation is given to specify the supplier who uses this alternate name. A listing of the abbreviations for various suppliers precedes the bibliography. Inasmuch as a single font name will vary from supplier to supplier, so too will the alternate names listed in this book. These names are not intended to signify identical styles but rather related ones that could not be displayed.

EXAMPLES

As mentioned earlier, PANOSE can be used in a variety of ways. This section gives two examples of how to apply the PANOSE system. The first demonstrates a standard search for an appropriate typeface, and the second shows how to use PANOSE to match an existing typeface.

SEARCHING FOR A TYPEFACE

Suppose that you know nothing about type styles and have been given the task of selecting a font for a flyer or advertisement; or better yet, you have been given the task of helping a client who knows nothing about type select a font.

You feel that the font needs to be particularly bold to catch the reader's eye, so you decide to look at some sans serif styles. As you ponder the four sans serif options in the first category, you decide to be just a little different, so you choose option 8, perpendicular sans serif, as your first digit. The second digit is not as easy to select; you know that you do not want a condensed or expanded font, but beyond that you are not too certain which proportion scheme will work best. After a moment of hesitation, you decide on option 1, old style, as your second digit since it seems to have the most personality. Since most sans serif font styles are single stroke, you will have a greater variety of fonts to choose from by selecting the no-contrast (single-stroke) option when you select the digit from the Contrast category. Therefore your third digit is a 6. Because you selected a 6 from the Contrast category, you skip category 4A and debate which pair of options from 4B will work best. A review of the digits you have chosen so far indicates that you are selecting a rather standard font. You therefore decide to stay with a straight-armed letter, and you choose a wedge opening to match the perpendicular sans serif you selected in category 1. The next choice is relatively simple. Because many of the options in the Letterform category are uncommon, as indicated by the bullets, you select option 1, contact, to make certain that you will have a variety of styles from which to choose. Now that you are starting to get a feel for the overall appearance of the font you are selecting, choosing the last two digits will be much easier. In the sixth category, Midline, you decide to follow the angular mood of the font and choose 2, standard midline with pointed apex. Finally, you select a size for the lowercase. Since you want to have good legibility, you opt for a large x height and choose 3.

Your seven-digit classification number is therefore 8164123. When you turn to the Classification Index, you find that the closest font to your number is Syntax, classified as 8164112 and displayed on page 213. When you flip to that page you are delighted to find that the midline position you had originally specified is actually the position of the boldface font. In addition, you notice that this font is available from a variety of suppliers, so you should have no problem ordering it.

MATCHING AN EXISTING TYPEFACE

In this second example we will deal with a usually frustrating problem. You have just been handed an advertisement that your predecessor created just before she was promoted and transferred to an office across the country. You have been instructed to match the type style from the ad so your boss can use it to print some matching napkins for a big open house next month. The last time you did this chore, it took six hours, and by the end of it, you had blisters on both thumbs and all of the fonts looked both exactly the same and completely different, at the same time.

But now you have the PANOSE system, in which all of the similar-looking fonts are grouped together, with pointers showing how they differ. With a sample of the font in front of you, it is easy to pick the digits that correspond to the font you are trying to match. The first digit is obviously a 1, the cove serif option, which is unfortunately the most commonly used serif style available. Undaunted, you proceed onward. The next digit is a little tougher. Because your sample does not have enough letters on it, you cannot tell whether the proportion is old style or even width. Taking a stab in the dark you choose 3 for your second digit, committing yourself to the even width option. The arbitrary nature of the Contrast category slows you down a bit; you decide to pencil in a 2 for medium low contrast. You have much less doubt in your mind about selecting a 3 for category 4A. Your sample definitely has a gradual shift in weight as it moves from thick to thin around the perimeter of the uppercase O, and the thinnest points of the O are directly above one another, giving it a feeling of vertical stress. The Letterform category is more challenging; it is unclear whether the rounded shapes are all perfect circles or slightly boxed, so you jot down the number 2. For the sixth digit you are again a bit uncertain because you do not have a sample of the letter A to judge the midline position. Considering that the rest of the font has been standard in appearance, you choose a 1. The x height is easy to gauge, as the lowercase is almost exactly 60 percent as tall as the uppercase. You jot down the last 2, and your digits are complete. Now you must check if the faces match.

In the Classification Index, you find no exact match for your number 1323212. The closest number to yours is 1321112, ITC Novarese. You turn to that page and realize immediately that something is not quite right. The font on your sample is somehow more dynamic or diverse. You wonder if any font is just like the one displayed, only more classical. You check the cross-reference chart and see that if the second digit, for proportion, were changed from 3, even width, to 1, old style, another face would be a perfect match. You turn to the page listed in the chart and notice the new font, CG Bem, is too classical and too antique. You realize that the problem arose when you neglected to match your fourth digit for arm style, gradual and vertical. Checking the cross-reference chart again, you locate another similar font, and this one, although it is not a perfect match, has a 3 for the fourth digit. When you turn to that page, you notice that there is a red line under the classification number, meaning that there are several fonts with the same number. After comparing the specimens with your sample, you find that Edelweiss matches it exactly.

NUMBER GENERATOR

Typefaces in this book are cataloged by a number that is obtained by selecting options from the following seven categories. Explanations of these options are on pages ix–xix; a review of these explanations may prove useful to anyone using the number-generating process. Keep track of your selected digits on a separate piece of paper. Digits are generated left to right. A classification number followed by a red bullet indicates a rare classification option and should be avoided, unless you are trying to match an existing type.

1. Serif Style

- 1 = Cove serif
- 2 = Square serif
- 3 = Square cove serif
- 4 = Thin line serif
- 5 = Exaggerated serif •
- 6 = Triangle serif •
- 7 = Square normal end sans serif
- 8 = Square perpendicular end sans serif •
- 9 = Flared end sans serif
- 0 = Rounded end sans serif •

2. Proportion

- 1 = Old style

Until now, no book on the market has provided a comprehensive, coherent system for the stylistic organization of typefaces. Now there is A Manual of Comparative Typography: The PANOSE System, the first and last word on locating, comparing, and matching typefaces quickly and easily. Through the use of the PANOSE system, an ingeniously simple mix-and-match numerical system, you can now not only find the typeface with the exact characteristics you seek, but also locate similar fonts of the same family.

The PANOSE system identifies seven basic variables of typeface design and provides a numbered list of possible options within each. Picking one specification for each variable in sequence yields a seven-digit number, which you then match to one of the book's 240 indexed display examples. Each display page shows at least one full alphabet and key letters featured in significant variations, and the characteristic features of these alphabets are circled in red. Instead of forcing you to hunt through alphabetically arranged pages in search of what you want as with most type-specimen books, PANOSE allows you to pick the precise type characteristics you need and tells you exactly where to find the appropriate typeface.

You can also use this book to compare similar typefaces quickly. Because the display examples are arranged in stylistically similar groups, turning to one example instantly puts you in close proximity to similar fonts. In addition, a handy cross-reference table provided on each display page shows where to find the same basic font with one or more design variable altered.

The book's scope of coverage is as contemporary as its approach. All of the display examples are completely up to date, and 90 percent were created with the latest digital equipment. Furthermore, the new and widening PostScript and Bitstream libraries are completely cross-referenced. And the supplier of each typeface, as well as alternate names and appropriate uses for each face, are indicated as well.

The unique PANOSE system makes A Manual of Comparative Typography the ideal book for everyone from the most uninitiated layperson to the most demanding professional. Its unprecedented scope allows it to function simultaneously as a textbook, catalog, reference guide, or simply an intriguing look at the design possibilities that shape the appearance of everything we read. Whether your interest is professional or recreational, you'll find A Manual of Comparative Typography: The PANOSE System to be the easiest, most comprehensive type-specimen book you've ever used.
