Introduction

Once upon a time when type was type (metal, that is) and I used to specify jobs to set on a Linotype or a Monotype typesetter, I would dream that some day there would be a workbook or a desk tool that would help me identify all the currently used typefaces—help me to visually compare every one to any other, letter by letter if necessary. And, please, it should be easy to use, not a lot of text and instructions but showings that would help me choose between this face and that quickly and surely.

Well, here we are in the 1990s and I am retired and finally the book, or tool, of my dreams is a reality. Film type replaced metal type. Digital type replaced film type. A vast amount of type is not only used by specialized professional typographic services but at the desktop by people somewhat new to the work of typography and typefaces.

So The Concise Guide to Type Identification is too late to help me but just in time to help the hundreds of thousands of people using type today, and the wonderful thing about it is that it can be equally valuable to the experienced typographer and the typographic neophyte.

It's a no-nonsense, easy-to-use visualizer. It is very thorough, very up-to-the-minute. Some 1750 typefaces are listed in the index. The original tradenamed version is illustrated in the body of the book with full alphabet showings for upper and lower case plus numerals and key punctuation marks. Look-alike designs by other manufacturers are listed in the manufacturers' cross-reference section, which also lists the manufacturer, and designer.

For me, an outstanding feature is the way the letters of each alphabet are shown so that on every page the alphabets run across the page but all the "As" are in one column, all the "Bs" in the next column, etc. It is so easy to compare not only alphabets but key letters.

Ten chapters separate the main styles so the user won't have to compare apples with walnuts. And six pages of showings of special characters (as for math, television, music, various punctuation marks and symbols, phonetics, and ITC Zapf Dingbats and OCR characters) help one know what's available and how to choose just the right one.

So—I'm jealous. Why didn't they compile this fifty years ago for me? At least I've the comfort of knowing it's here at last and because of it many thousands of careers will be made a little more professional and a little easier.

Edward M. Gottschall
(Former Executive Vice President of ITC and Editor of U&Lc.)

Old style typefaces were modeled upon the humanist minuscule. Written with a not overly broad pen, the humanist minuscule showed very little difference between main strokes and hairlines. The pen was usually held at a 30° angle, hence the triangular serifs and the marked inclination of the diameters in round letters. The lower case characters were taken from the Carolingian minuscule and the capitals from the Roman Capitalis Quadrata. The printing type first appeared around 1470 in Venice (hence Venetian Old Style). The version the French punch-cutter, Claude Garamond, made in the middle of the 16th century, was one of the most expressive examples of an old style face ever to be produced. Its distinguishing features were a gradual and smooth transition from the stems to the serifs with rounded angles and only little contrast between hairlines and main strokes. The diameters of the round letters have a backward slant.

In the middle of the 17th century, when Holland held a leading position in the printing trade, a class of typefaces came into being which, whilst still in the tradition of the Venetian style, showed somewhat different letterforms. The axes of the round letters lost some of their slant, the difference in weight between hairlines and main strokes increased markedly, serifs were no longer triangular but slightly rounded, x-heights became generally larger. The late baroque typefaces are often called transitionals. They began to show those stylistic elements which were to prevail in the Modern typefaces of classicism.

Ariadne/Goudy Oldstyle

The letterforms clearly show the influence of copperplate engraving; the broad-edged scorer, held either vertically or at an angle, makes for the highly marked difference in line weight between hairlines and main strokes. This contrast may be regarded as the principal stylistic feature of these typefaces. There is very little rounding-out of serifs, ovals have become circles, axes have been straightened, stress has become vertical. The French family Didot, the Italian Bodoni and, in the early 19th Century, the German Walbaum, all made their mark upon this group of typefaces. The letterforms seem constructed, matter of fact, clear-cut.

In the wake of industrialization in the early 19th century there evolved in England a group of typefaces with little or no difference between hairlines and main strokes. All elements of the letterform, including serifs, have the same optical stroke thickness. This applies both for light as well as heavy weights. Emphasis on serifs is the common stylistic element. The group also comprises two other sharply distinguished kinds of typefaces: Clarendon, or Egyptienne, and Italienne. The former feature smooth transitions to the serifs whilst the Italienne letters have been extended, with the serifs appearing over-emphasized, their weight being stronger than the other letter elements.

The first typefaces without serifs were created at the beginning of the 19th century in England, their distinguishing feature being an optically consistent line weight. The "grotesques" as they were formerly called, appear constructed, although there are typefaces which show an individual touch. Curiously enough, these typefaces are regarded as the true incarnation of this century, when a hitherto unknown range of versions was created, from the lightest to the heaviest, from extremely condensed to extremely extended.

This group comprises all those typefaces which cannot be classified with certainty, in particular those which combine design elements from different styles or have markedly individual, original or especially decorative forms. The group also includes typefaces in the uncial style which were in use between the 4th and the 8th centuries, cartographic typefaces, and swash characters or alphabets made up of capital letters only.

As long as letterpress printing was the only economically feasible means of reproducing texts, typefaces were designed to meet its technical limitations. The invention of lithography opened the path to unprecedented free forms. A fine example being 'English' script which was reproduced in a most elegant form by means of the stone engraving technique. Under its influence a number of similar printing types were created whose forms were derived from the hand writing prevalent in schools and mediaeval chancelleries, in which the writing tool—be it broad-edged pen, a round pen, a pointed pen or a brush—can still be discerned. Some of these typefaces still give a glimpse of the calligrapher's style and personality.

AURIOL FLOWERS 2

During the 12th century the Carolingian minuscule evolved into the so-called gothic minuscule, a closely set, fast-to-write script with a broken ductus, the capital letter being taken from the uncial. Following this, Textura, an especially closely set bookhand with rhombic serifs, became the prototype of broken letters, the Gutenberg Bible being a prime example. Under the cultural influence of Italy and Spain letterforms became rounder and led to Rotunda. Another derivation from Textura is Schwabacher. Fraktura which is characterized by especially flourishing capitals was created shortly after 1500.

"The Concise Guide to Type Identification is . . . just in time to help the hundreds of thousands of people using type today, and the wonderful thing about it is that it can be equally valuable to the experienced typographer and the typographic neophyte."

Edward M. Gottschall, Former Executive Vice President, ITC, and Editor of U & Lc.

"The Concise Guide to Type Identification will do more for typography than anything currently out there. . . . No longer will you flip through hundreds of faces to find one. No longer will you have to limit to your selection to one face when you have so many similar styles to choose from."

Ira Finkelstein, Vice President, Director of Traffic and Print Production, Della Femina, McNamee, Inc.

A quick and easy-to-use visual tool to identify typefaces, for graphic arts students, designers, typesetters and users of electronic publishing systems, The Concise Guide to Type Identification displays 1700 laser typefaces from the Linotype library, showing all upper- and lower-case letters, numerals 0-9, and punctuation marks for each. The typefaces are grouped in the same eight categories Linotype uses in the display of its library.

To accommodate users of other typesetting systems or type libraries, the guide contains an analog section and a comprehensive index that list the names used by other type manufacturers for the same faces.

This guide is a valuable work of reference and working tool for all those handling type on a daily basis.

The authors are principal associates of V & M Graphics, Inc., a New York City typehouse serving the advertising, book publishing and electronic publishing industries.

Vincent Apicella, who has more than 40 years' experience in the graphic arts field, is the author of The Type Specimen Book, a guide to hot metal typefaces. Joanna Pomeranz and Nancy Wiatt have extensive experience in computer software design and programming.
